- I think a law degree, paralegal certification or bachelors degree in some sort of law area would qualify as they pertain to the area we would practice in.
- Paralegal degree and 5+ years of experience.
- An associate degree and more than 3 years legal experience
- A paralegal certification and more than 3 years of relevant paralegal experience
- JD and law license
- High school diploma, Paralegal certification, and 3-5 years of legal experience
- An Associate's Degree in Paralegal Studies or a Bachelor's Degree with a Paralegal Certificate
- A bachelor's degree and more than 3 years experience
- A paralegal degree with X number of years of experience in that area of law.
- Bachelor's degree, at a minimum, and then either some certification with SUBSTANTIAL training (more than a real estate agent, for instance) or an apprenticeship with an attorney and some sort of test/certification afterward.
- Significant experience in the relevant area of law, perhaps demonstrated via referral from a lawyer or judge.
- Experience & a good grasp of the area of law addressed, is key. I'd say more than 3 yrs experience and some kind of degree or para certificate.
- no comment
- I am a paralegal
- A law degree-however then the point is moot, they are no longer a paralegal but an attorney
- An associate degree and paralegal training.
- A high school diploma and close supervision of a competent paralegal or attorney.
- a four year degree AND a paralegal certification

What is your profession?

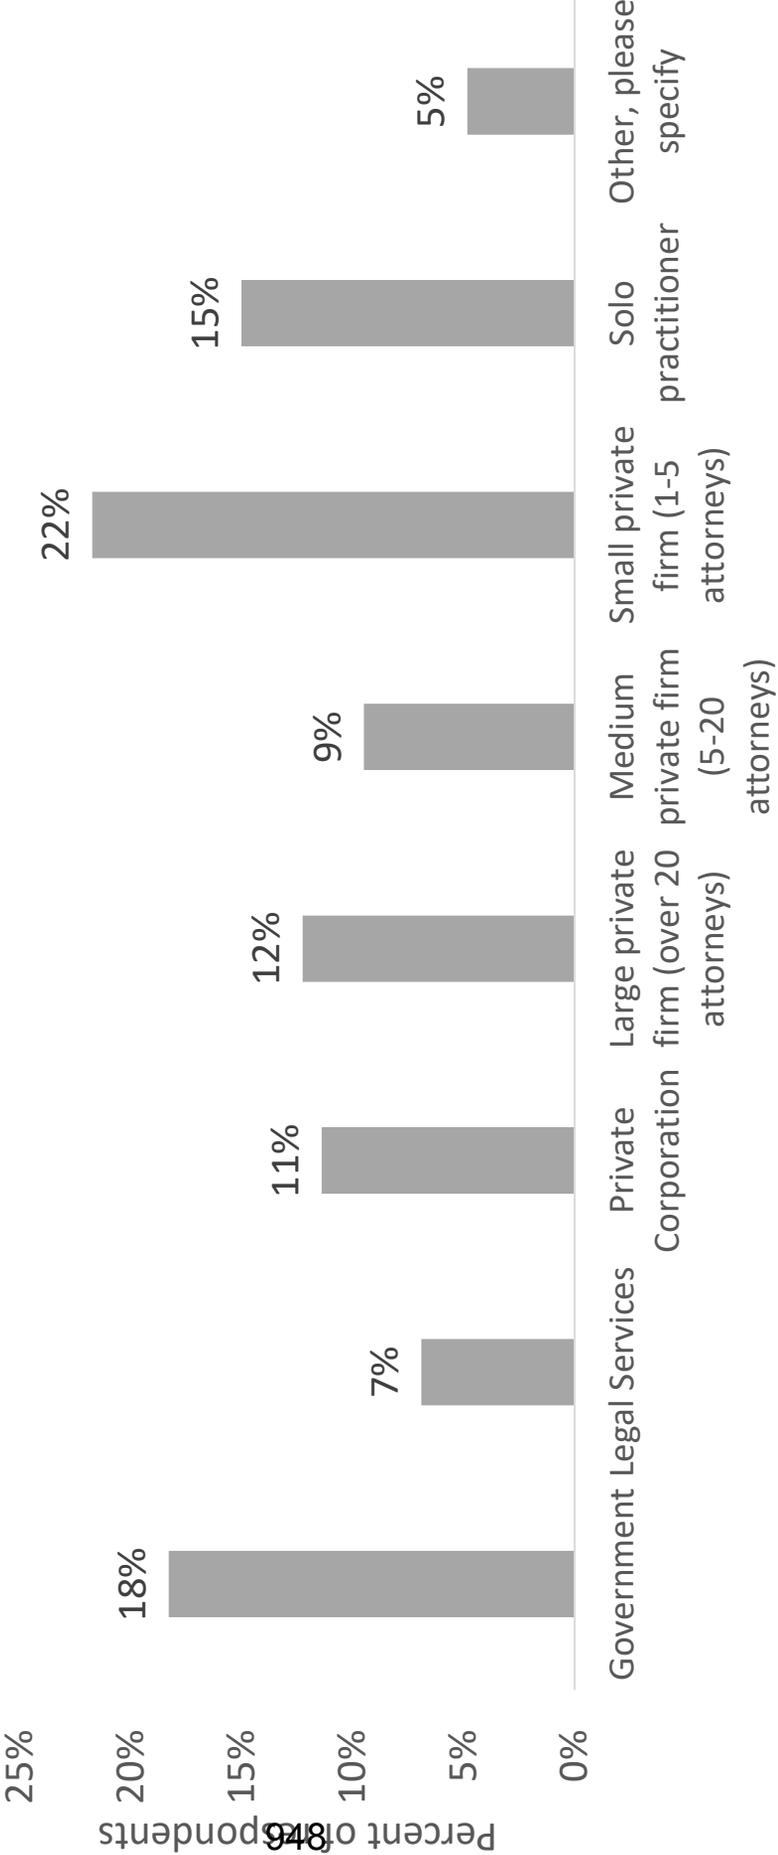

What is your profession? Other – write in

- non profit case manager
- Legal AA
- law professor
- District court judge
- Judicial officer
- Judge
- Attorney working in compliance
- Judge
- District Court Judge
- District court judge
- Judge
- Court employee
- judge
- Judge
- District Court Judge
- Judge
- judge
- Court Administration
- Legal Assistant
- Judge
- Law librarian/attorney
- Legal Assistant - no paralegal certificate
- Trust officer
- Regulatory Compliance
- Judicial Officer
- legal education

How long have you worked in your current role?

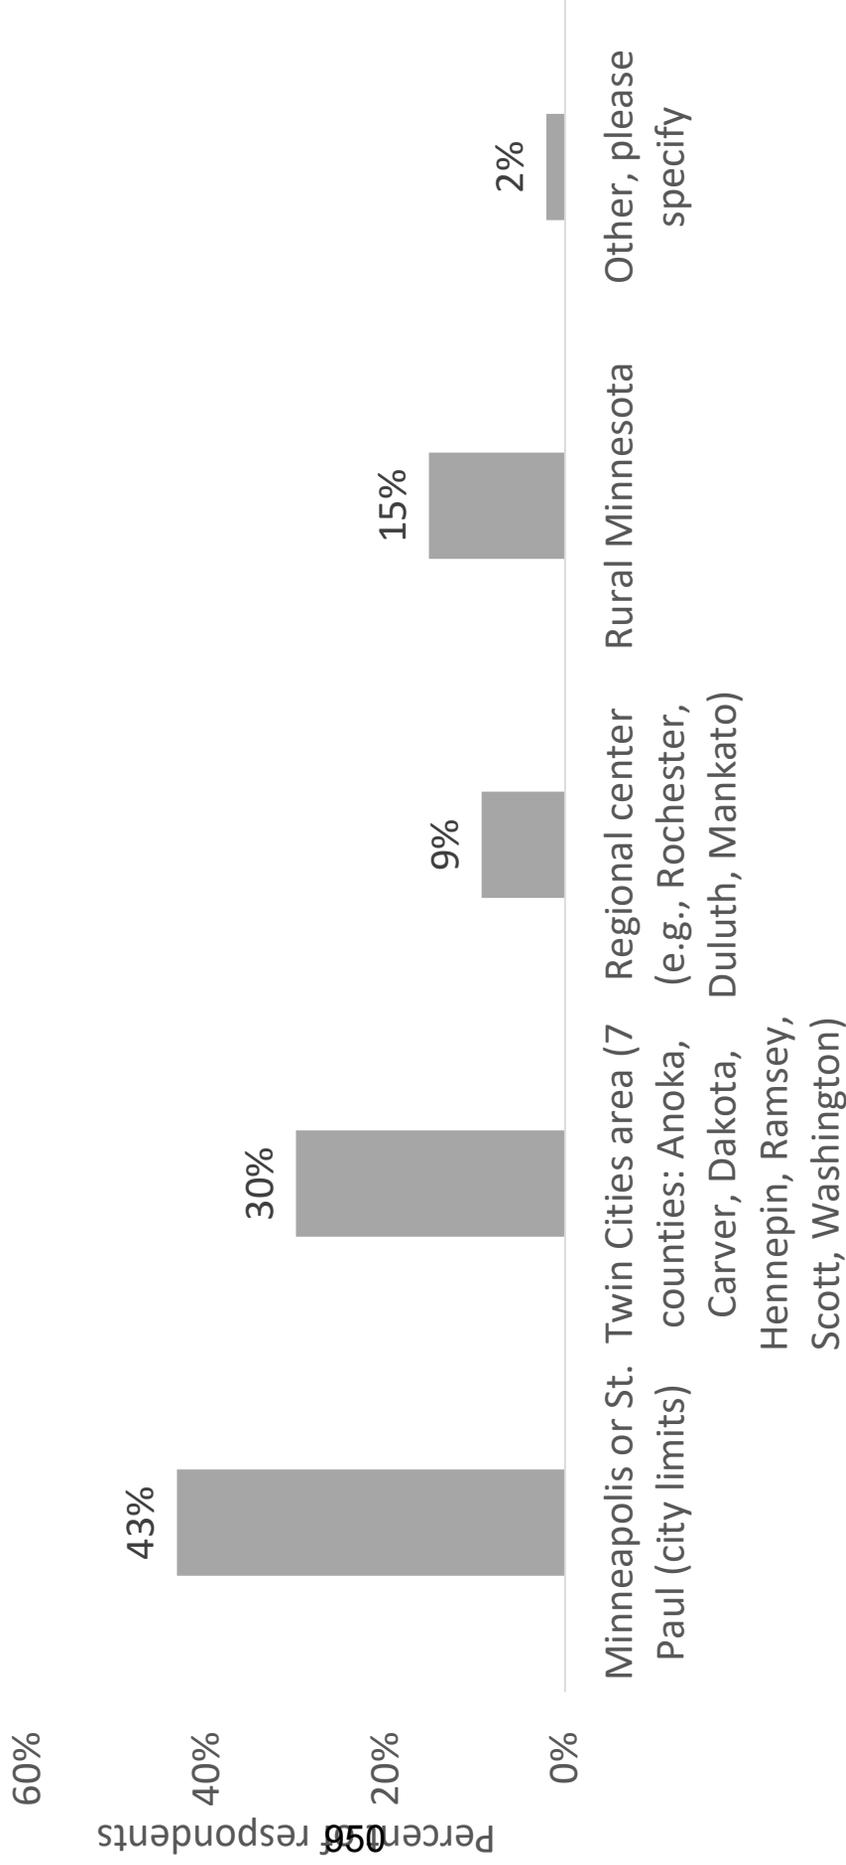

How would you describe your office? (Select the most appropriate answer.)

How would you describe your office? Other – write in

- nonprofit
- education
- Retired
- Public company
- Solo practice now; previous managing shareholder of a 20+attorneysuburban firm
- Judge
- Non-profit- Legal Education
- Consulting services
- My office provides sliding scale fee representation to low and middle income clients. We are already doing what you are trying to do and we offer attorneys to represent people.
- Judge
- I'm freelance and support 5 firms virtually
- local govt. not in CAO
- nonprofit
- Non-profit that does not provide legal services.
- Nonprofit Trade Association
- non-profit
- County law library
- In house Counsel Private Bank
- Publishing
- University
- public corporation
- Public company
- Large public corporation
- Department at the University of Minnesota
- Financial Corporation
- I am a contract paralegal working under the supervision of licensed attorneys.
- educational institution
- Non profit

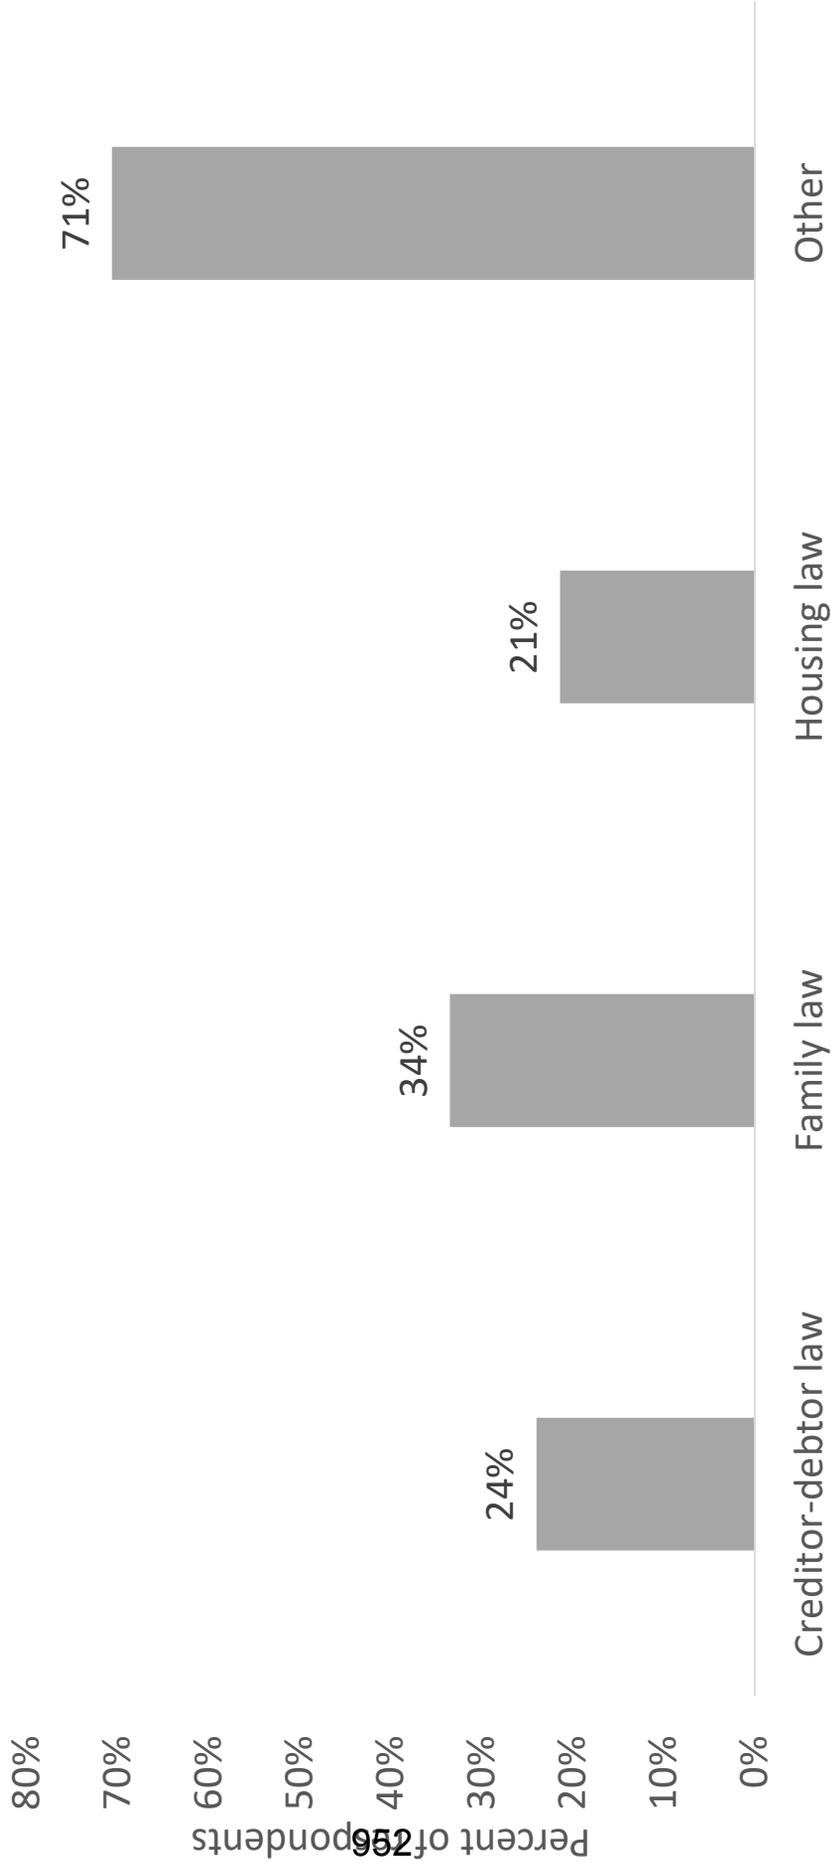

Where is your office located?

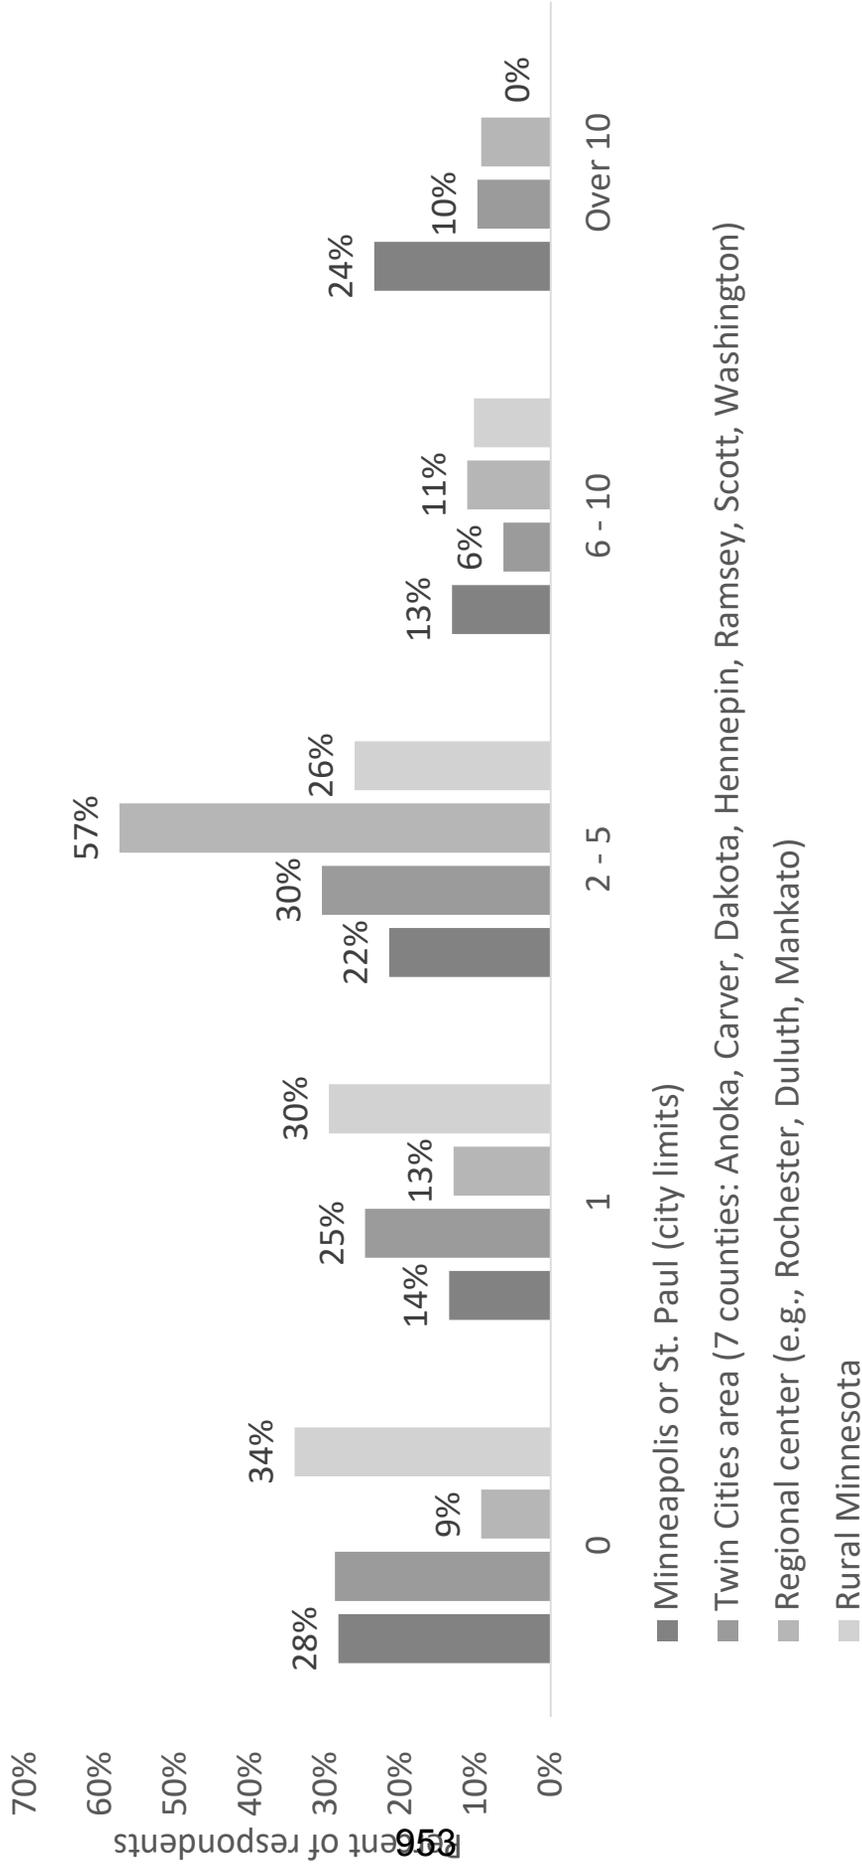

Where is your office located? Other – write in

- No office
 - CA
 - We are located in Mpls but represent people in counties that are an hour less from our office.
 - California
 - Rice and Ramsey Counties
 - Wright and Sherburne
 - Fargo
 - St. Cloud
 - There are two office locations
- one in the Twin Cities area and one in Rural Minnesota
 - Rochester and the surrounding 11 county area
 - St. Cloud. By the way, how is St. Cloud not a regional center but Mankato is?
 - I am in St. Paul, but we have other offices.

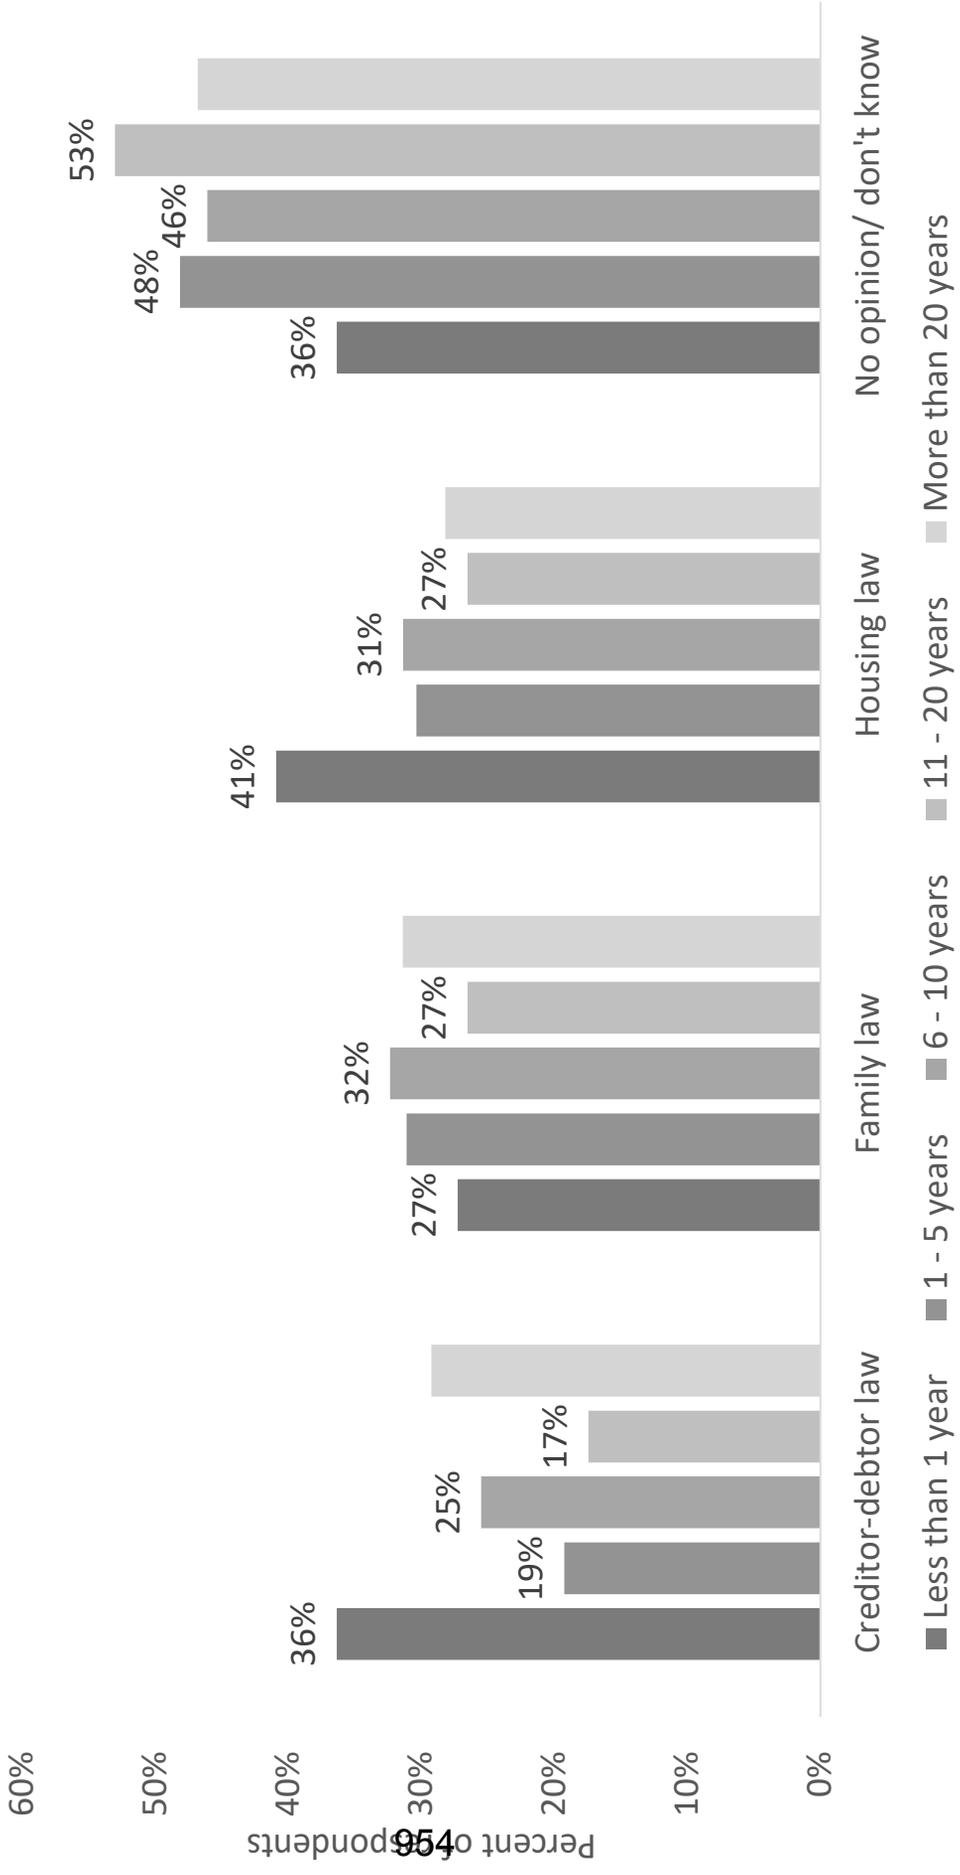

In what area(s) of law do you or your office practice?

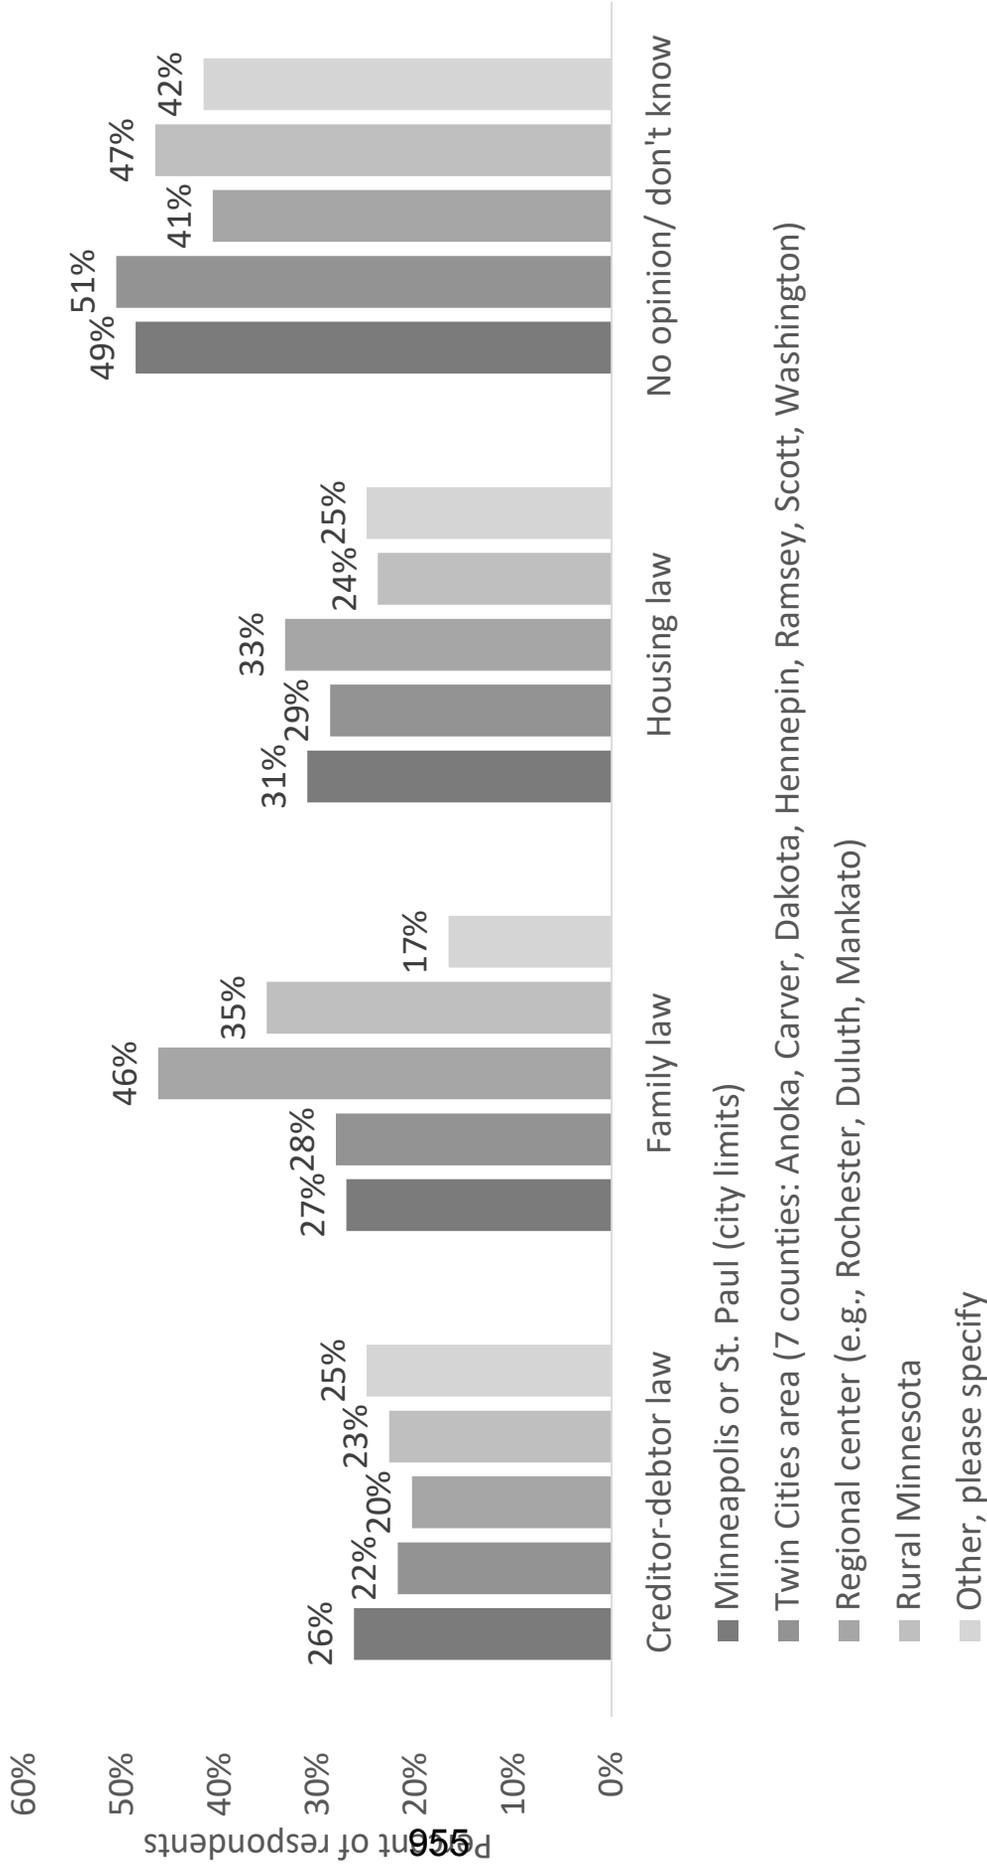

Paralegals currently employed, by office location

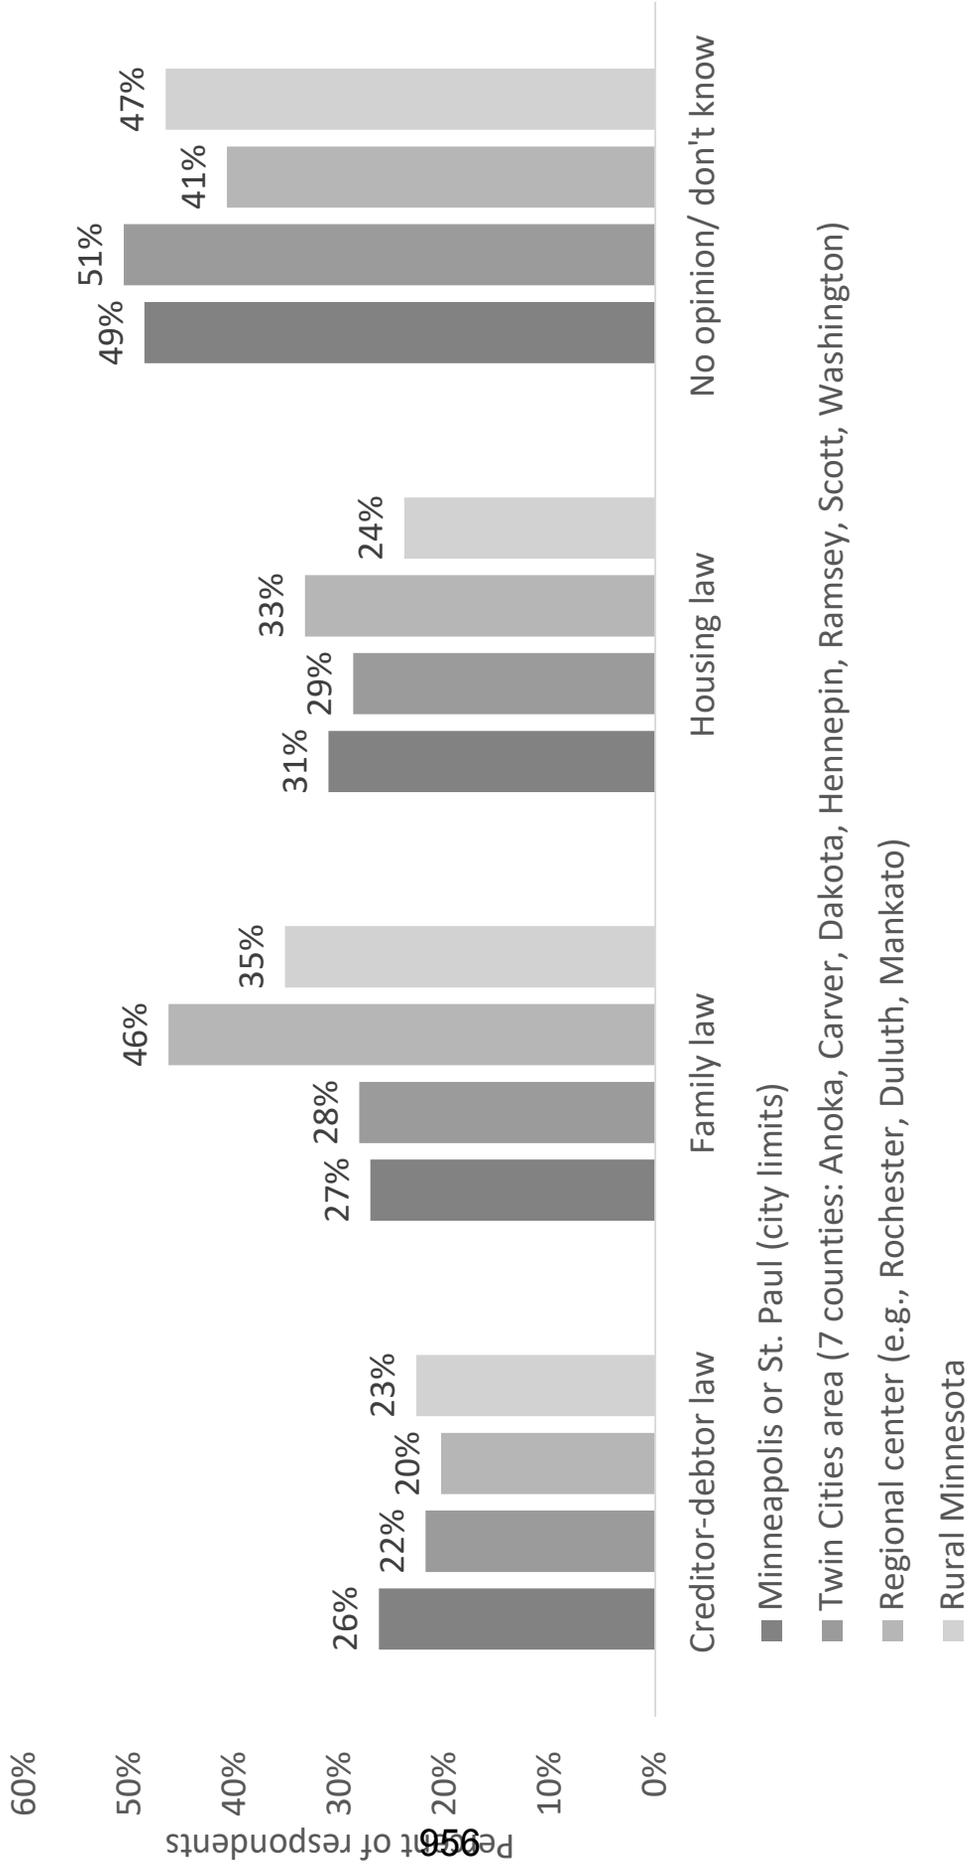

Area(s) of law where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by how long respondent has worked in current role

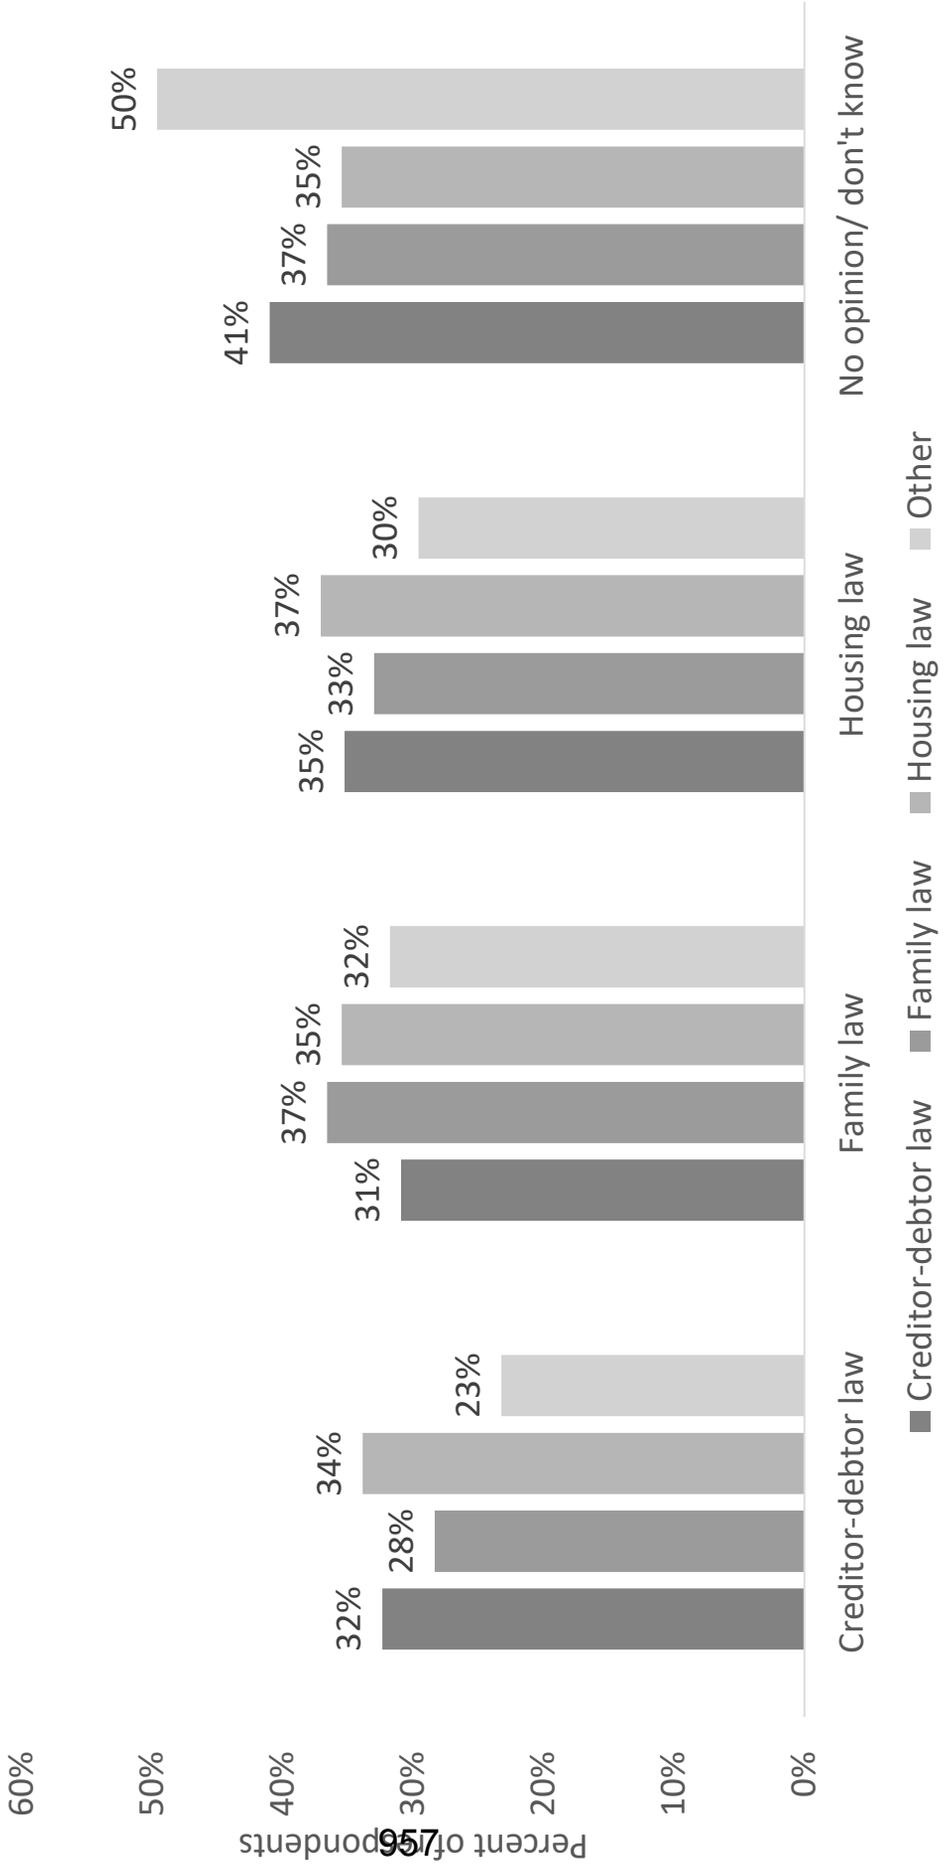

Area(s) of law where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by respondent office location

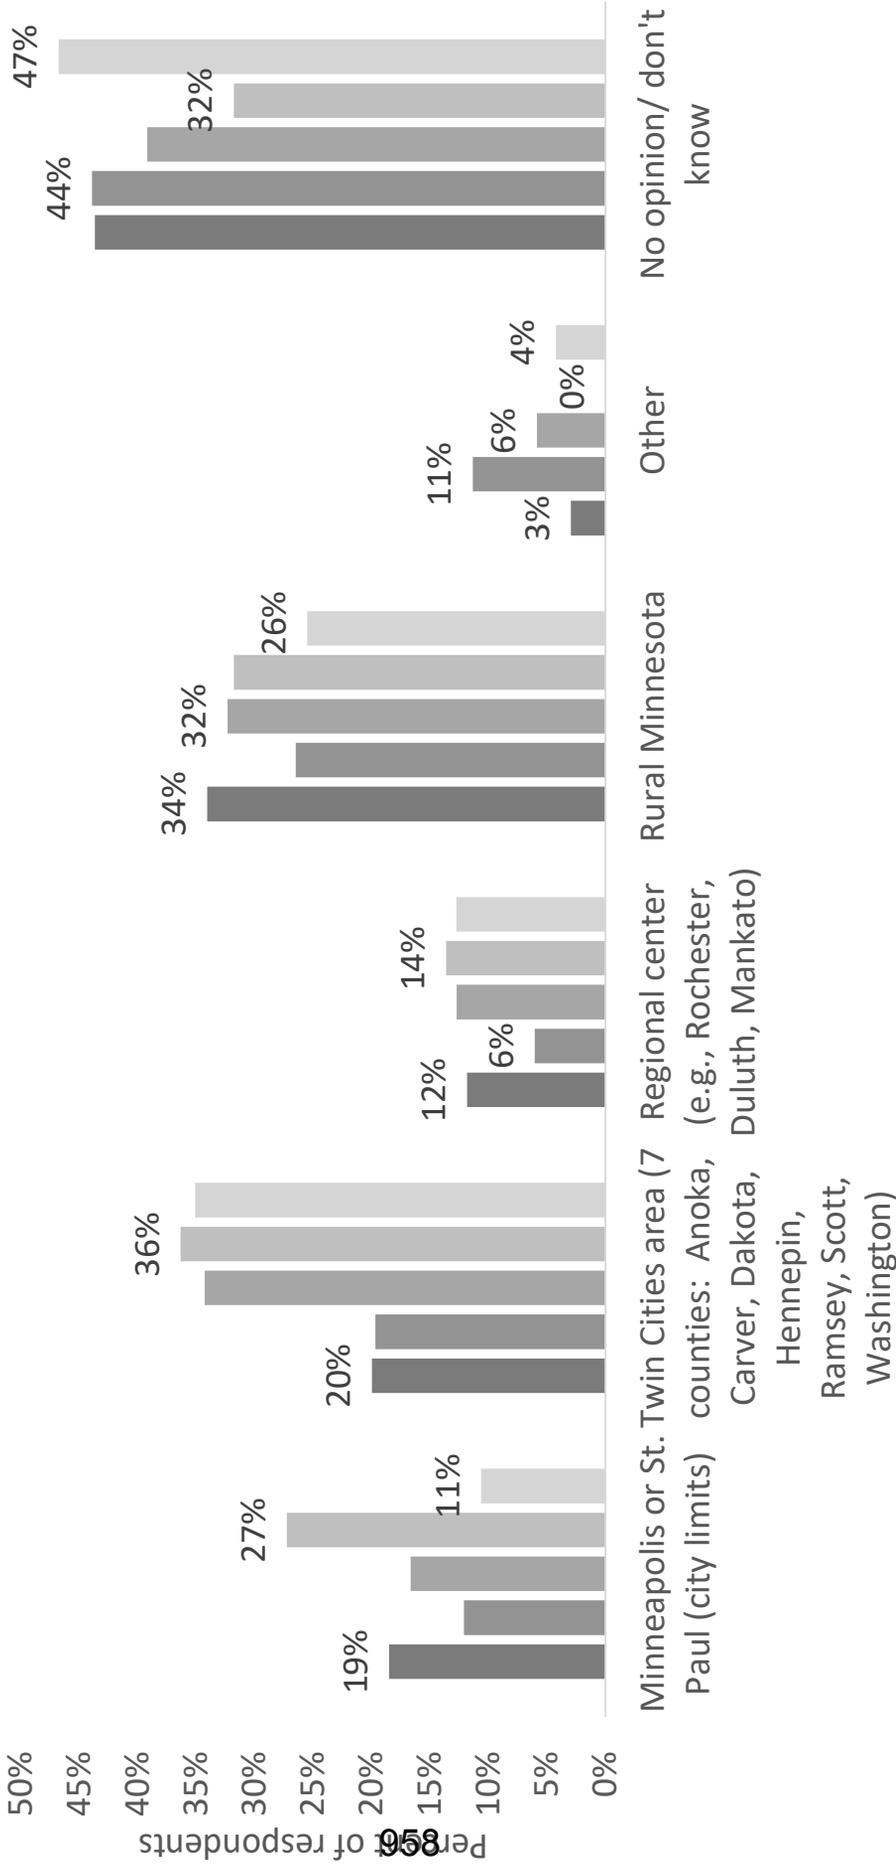

Area(s) of law where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by respondent office location

Area(s) of law where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by respondent's area of practice

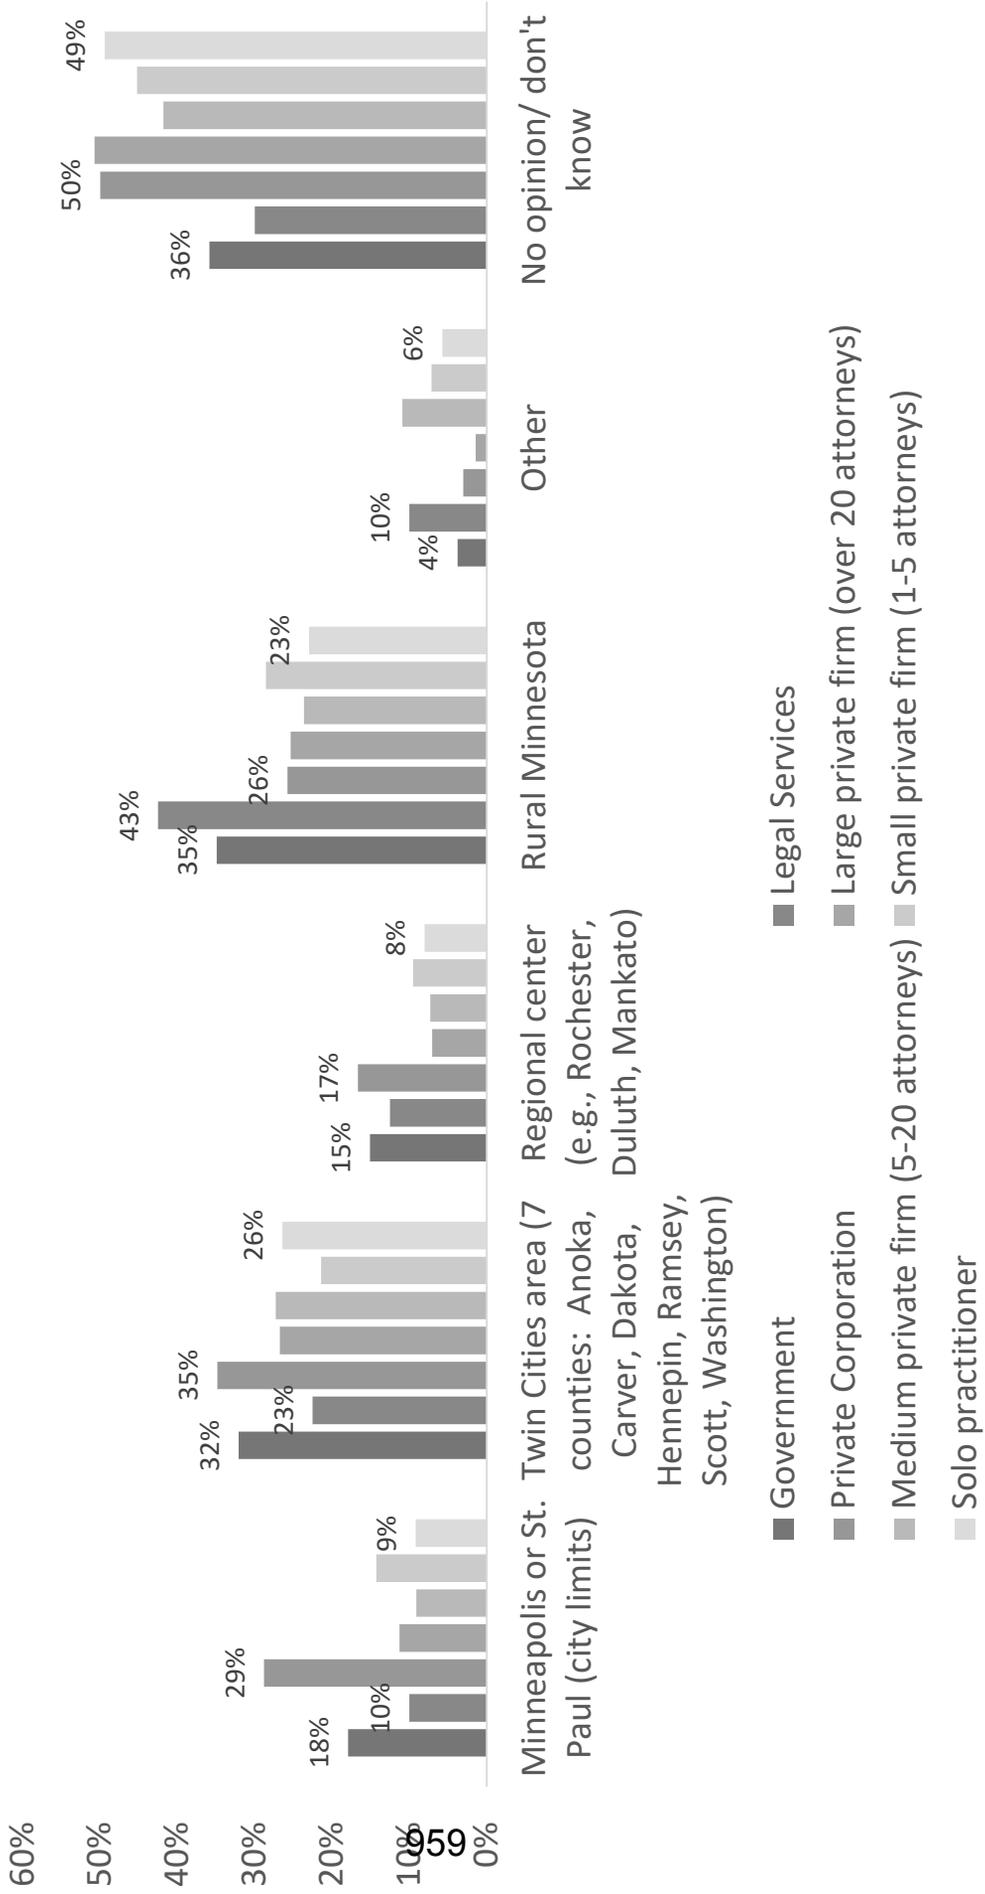

Area(s) of Minnesota where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by how long respondent has worked in current role

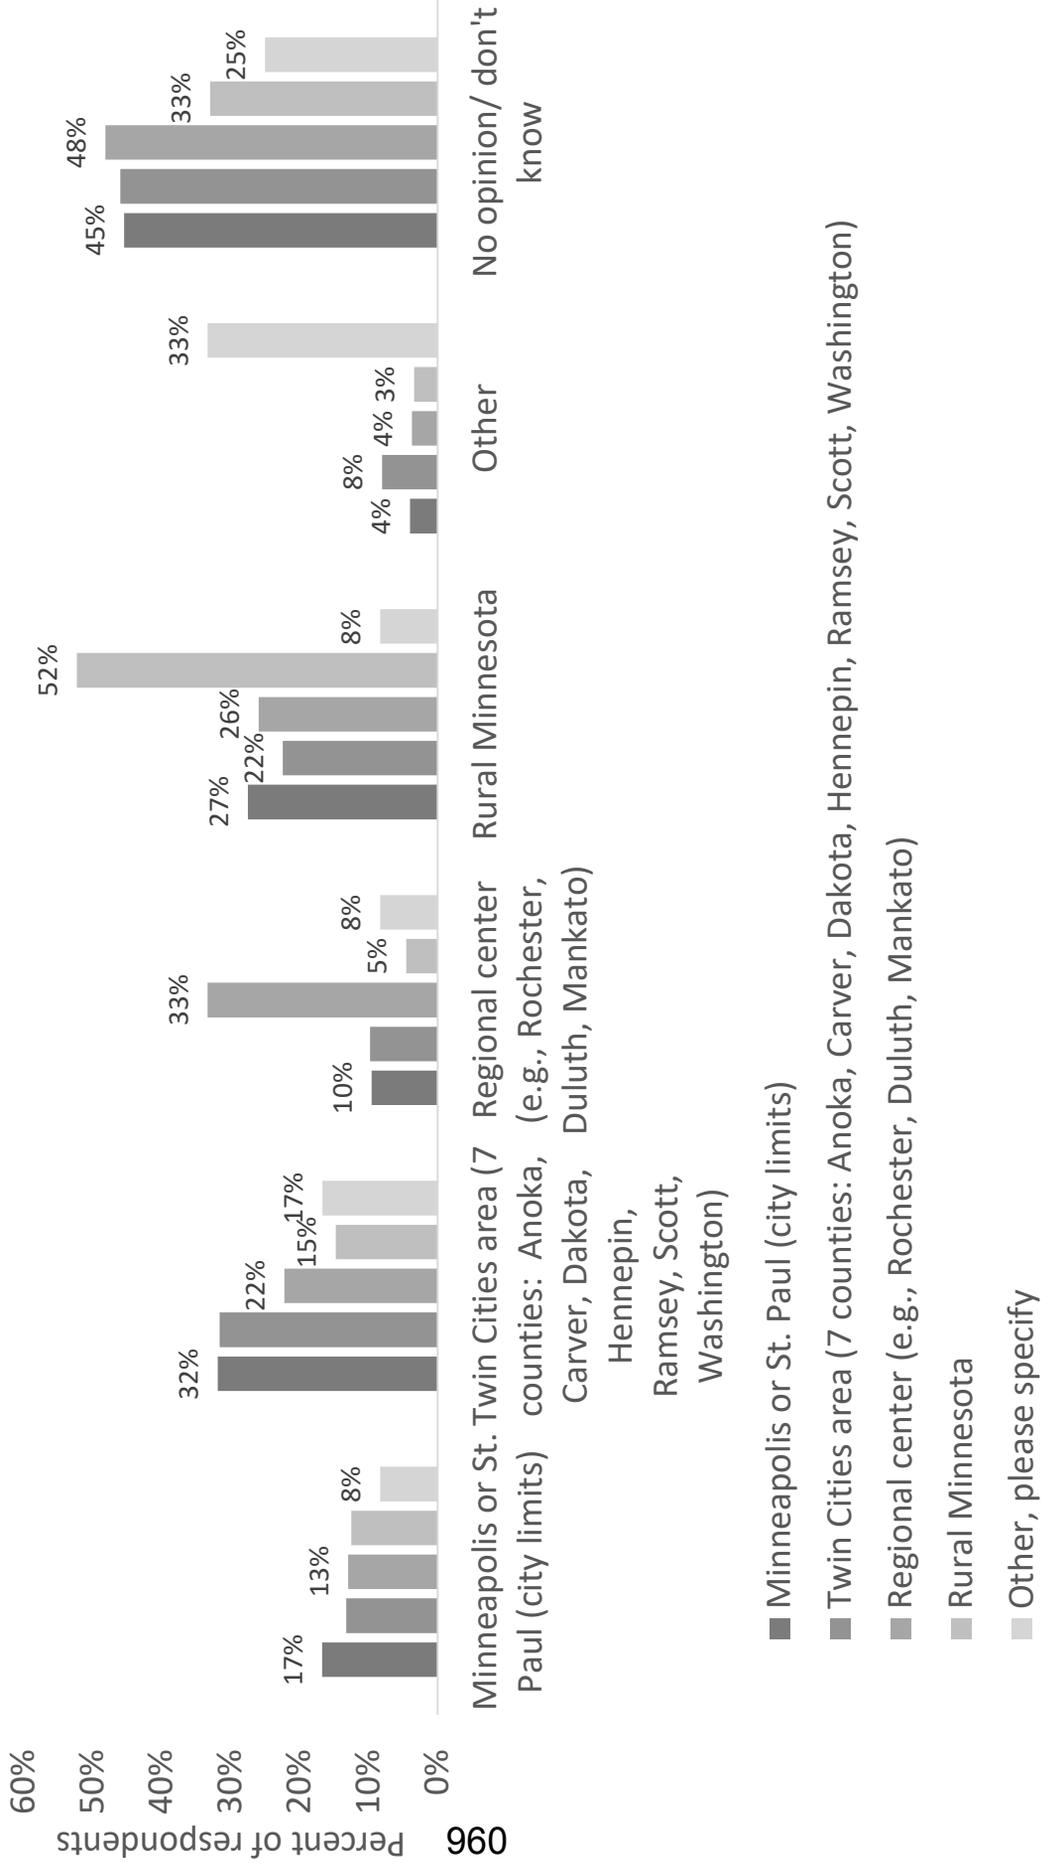

■ Less than 1 year ■ 1 - 5 years ■ 6 - 10 years ■ 11 - 20 years ■ More than 20 years

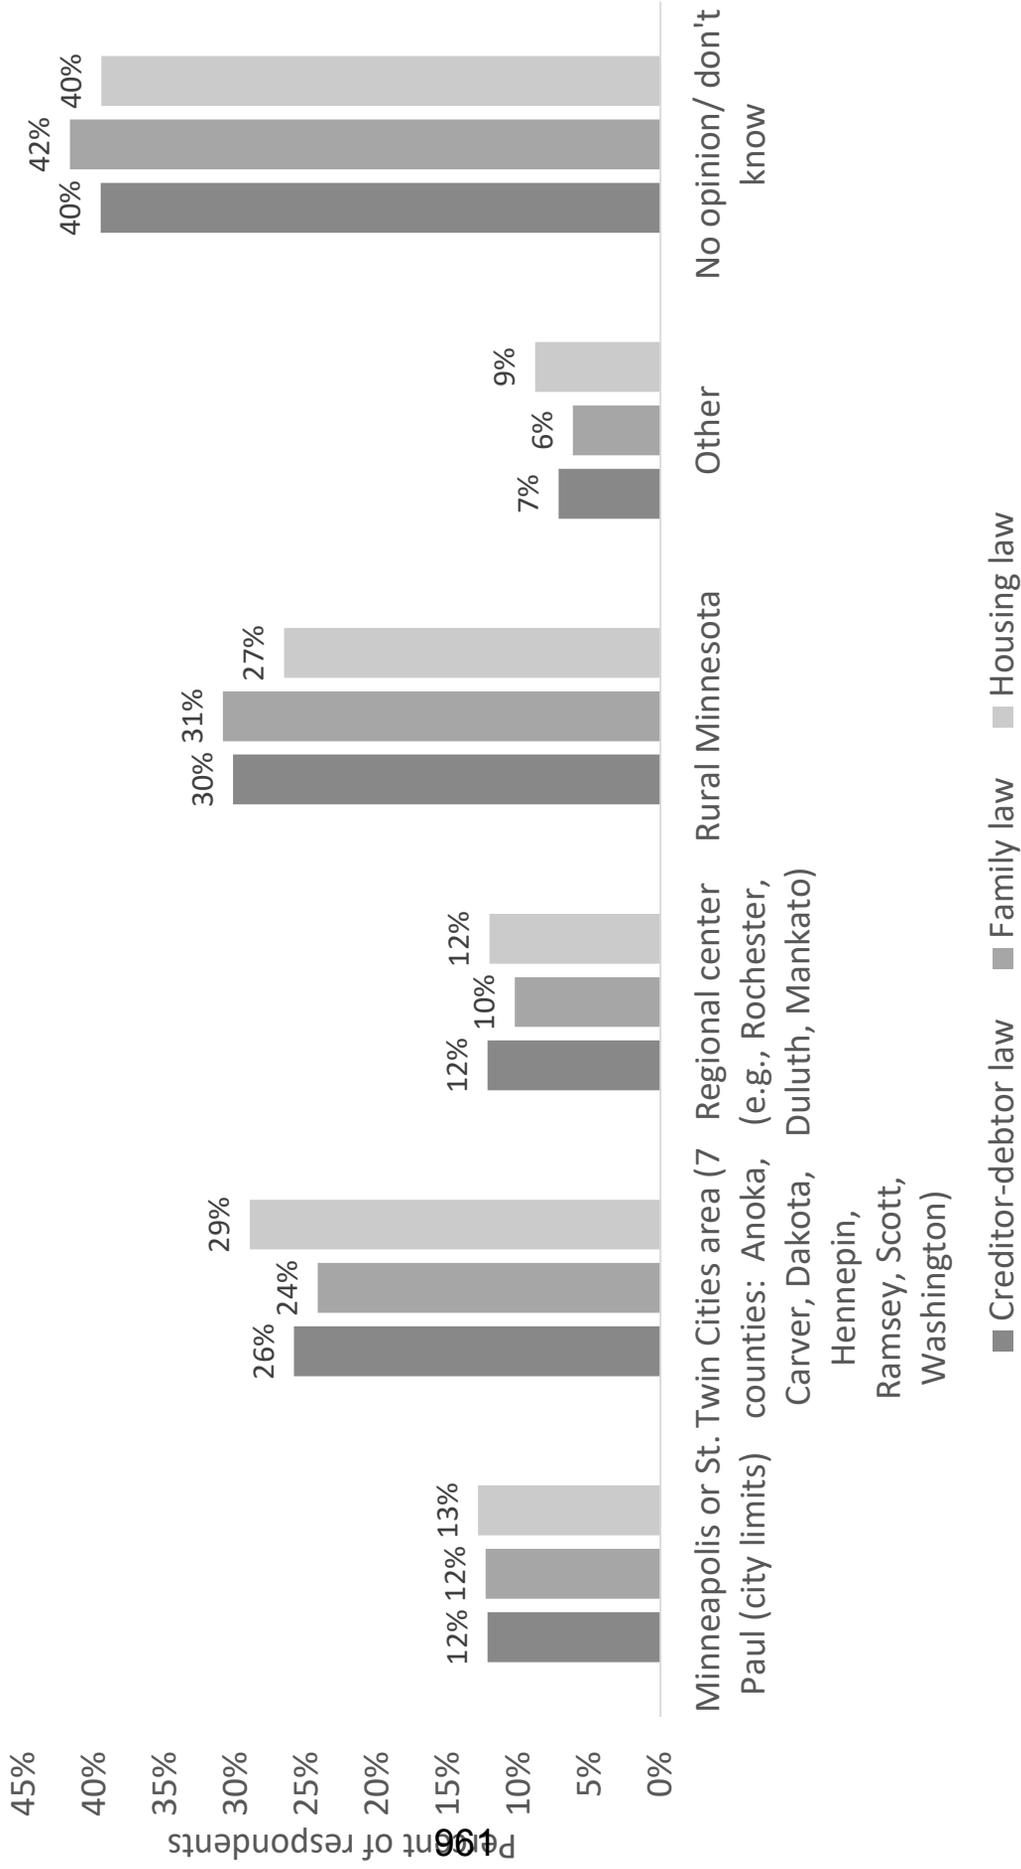

Area(s) of Minnesota where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by respondent's office type

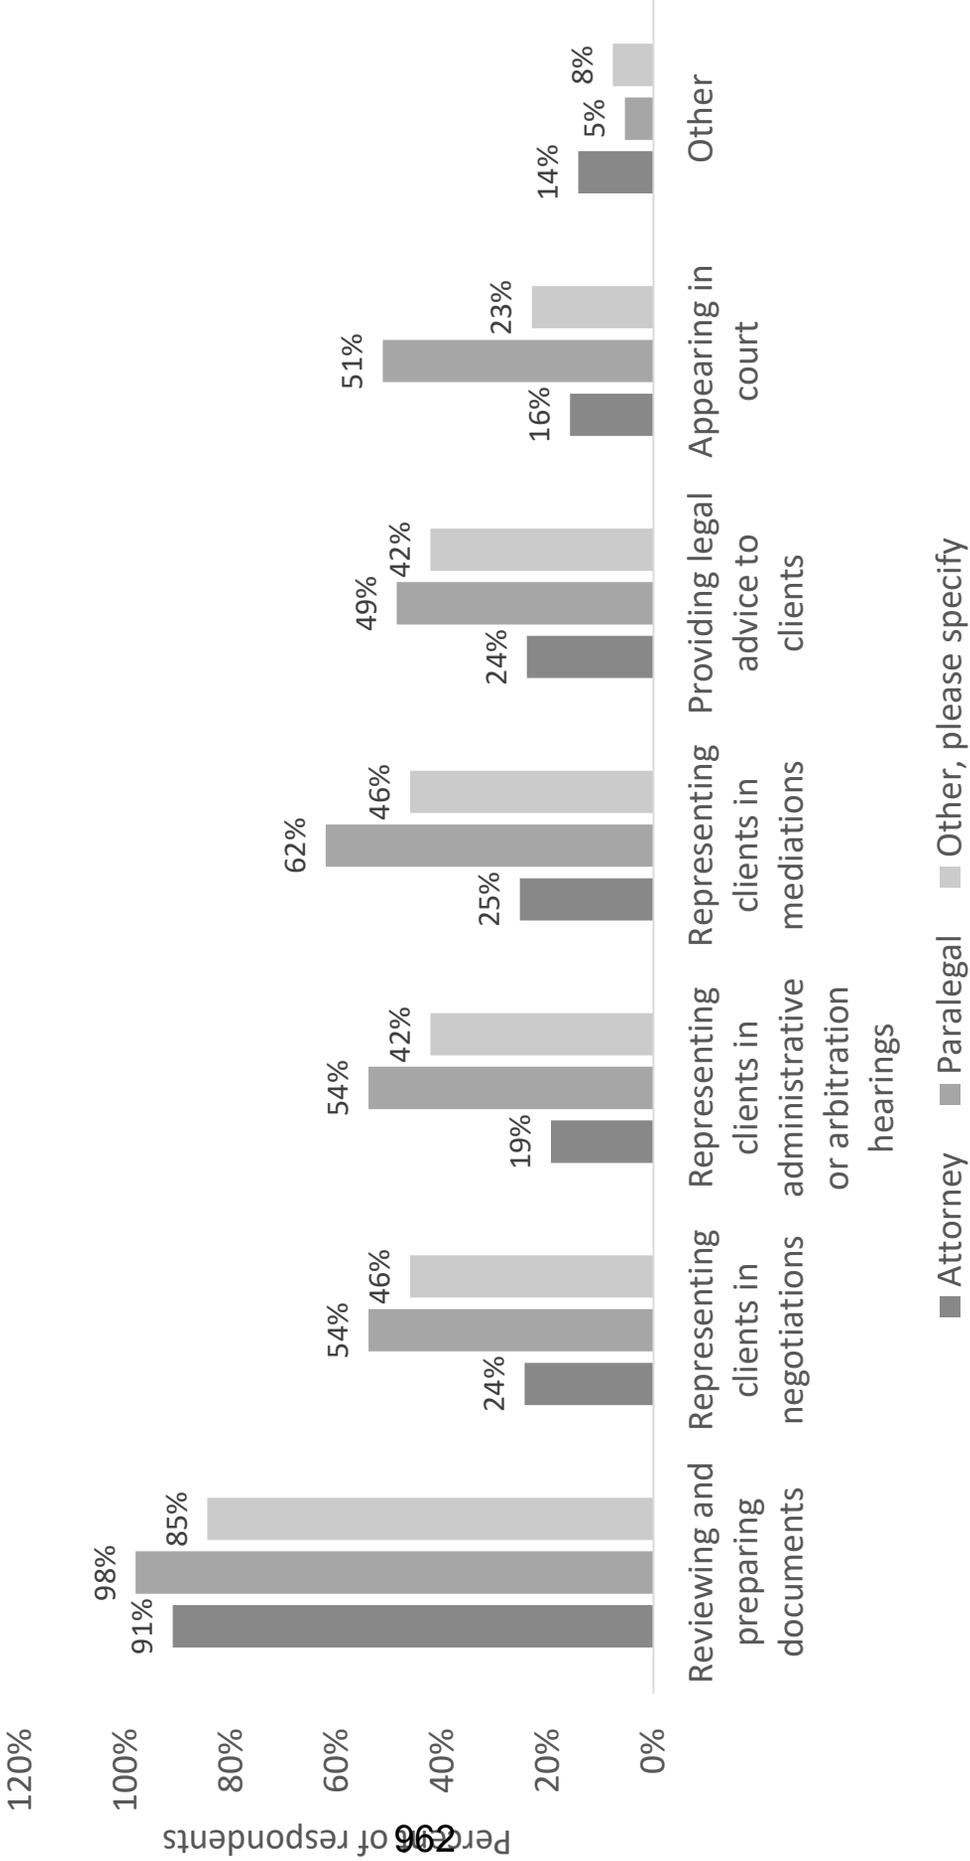

Area(s) of Minnesota where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by respondent's office location

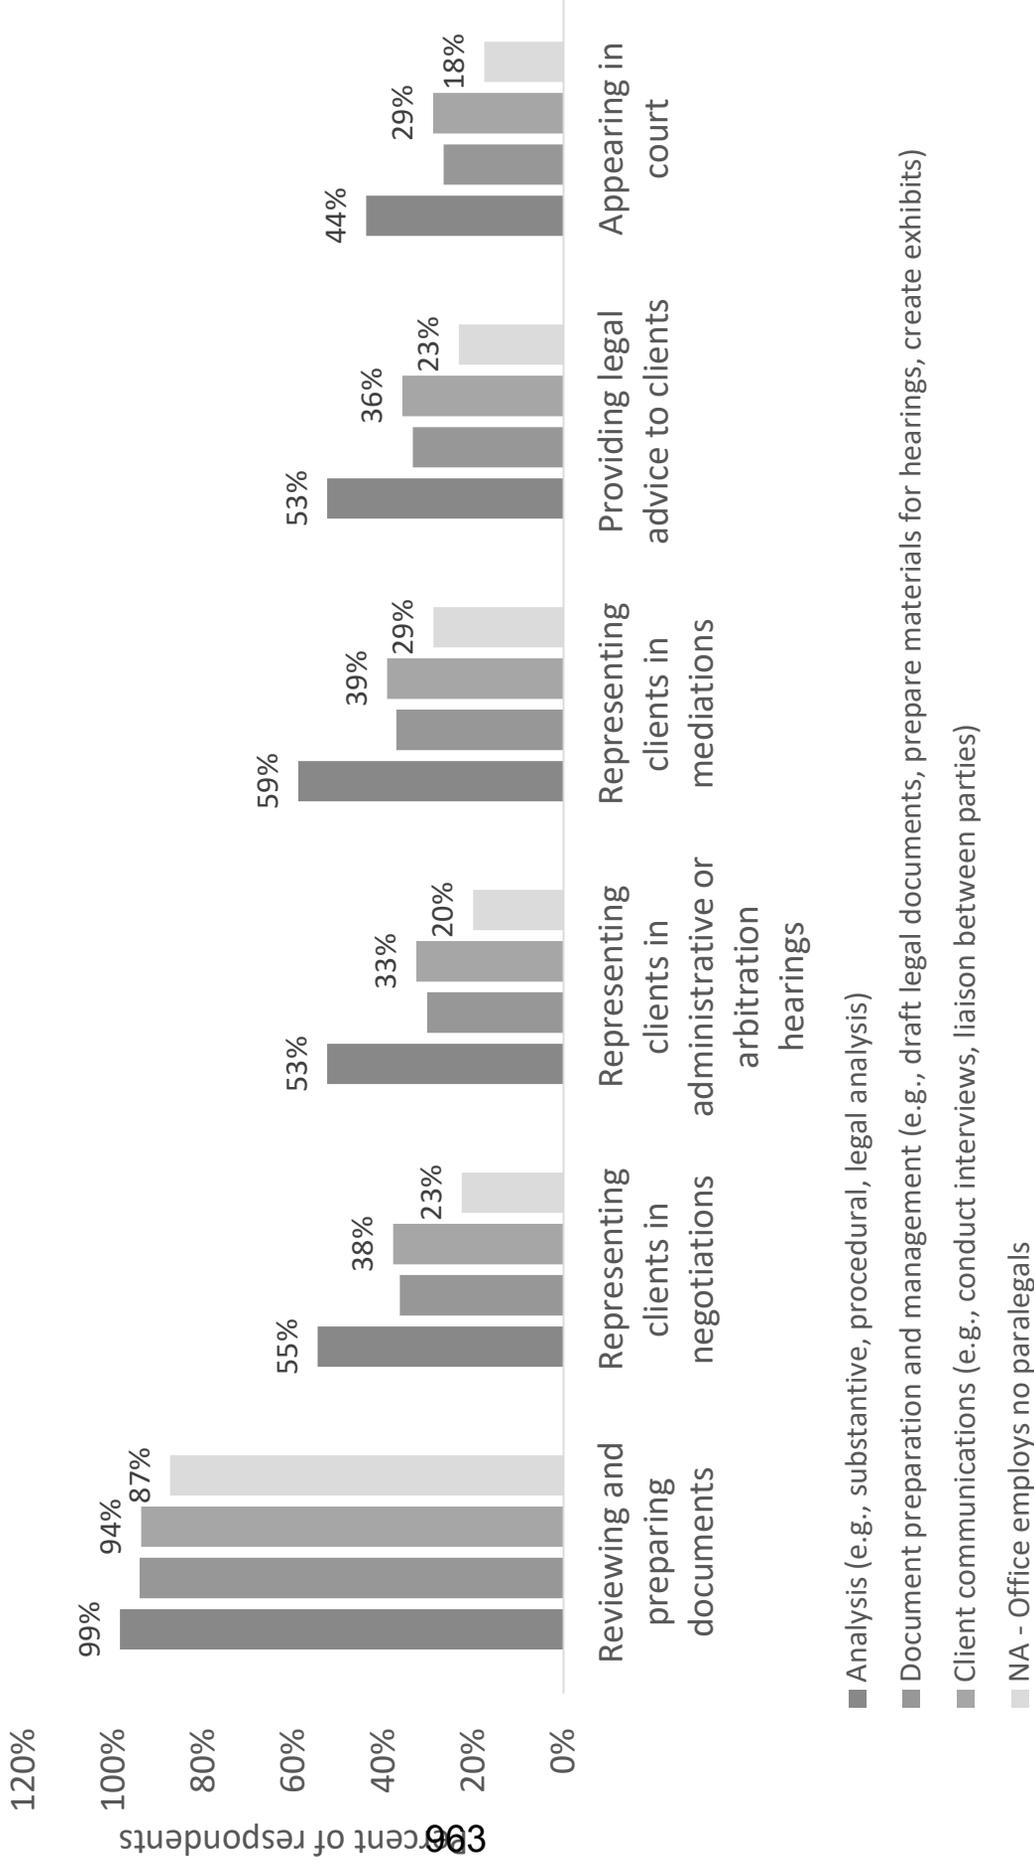

Area(s) of Minnesota where additional assistance from paralegals would most benefit clients, by respondent's area of law

Tasks respondent would be comfortable with paralegals handling under the supervision of an attorney, by respondent profession

Tasks respondent would be comfortable with paralegals handling under the supervision of an attorney, by current paralegal responsibilities

■ Analysis (e.g., substantive, procedural, legal analysis)

■ Document preparation and management (e.g., draft legal documents, prepare materials for hearings, create exhibits)

■ Client communications (e.g., conduct interviews, liaison between parties)

■ NA - Office employs no paralegals

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Comments on Difficulty Finding Qualified Paralegals

September 25, 2019

This is a small firm with many needs, and it is difficult to find a paralegal with enough experience to handle the position who doesn't demand a salary a small firm cannot afford to pay.

Low quality applicants, high pay demands

Part time estate planning paraprofessional

The ability of Paralegals varies greatly, but finding qualified and trainable Paralegals as well as keeping them within the ethical requirements when they work is a challenge.

Most paralegals applying had little experience or the most experience was more in the role of secretary or administrative assistant and not substantive paralegal work

Paralegals must have experience in field, be computer literate and understand and use multiple client EDS systems. Hard to find anyone with all those skills. To some extent, such a person is worth more than a practicing attorney

There is a shortage of qualified paralegals in the marketplace.

Yes, difficult

Paralegal expectations and requirements vary per legal field and 'side' of claim (i.e. different paralegal expectations for plaintiff vs. defense). Thus, finding a qualified paralegal for 'side' and area of law is not automatic.

It has been difficult finding competent paralegals.

It's a sellers' market.

difficulty finding skilled paralegals to appropriately manage files and provide support to attorneys

We have cycled through numerous paralegals over the past few years and many have had difficulty understanding the law and procedures. Not to mention general work requirements.

Most are entry level

It is a competitive market.

Not enough paralegals that are qualified for the position.

Shortage of highly skilled and experienced candidates

It's been difficult to hire additional qualified paralegals

Paralegal program completion is not a good indication of being a qualified paralegal. In fact, the paralegal I work with most now has no formal paralegal education or certification.

Quality of education concerns

Insufficient interest by qualified persons with required work ethic when openings were posted

Nature of the work required

Not enough experience and do not speak the native language of most of our clients.

Particularly in the patent area, it is difficult to hire paralegals with substantive experience and requisite attention to detail.

I practice IP law, primarily, and it is very difficult to find IP paralegals in Minnesota.

There aren't many experienced paralegals available

Not enough good ones

We have had two hiring rounds where we were unable to find paralegals with bachelor's degrees, a preferred qualification.

The employment market is tight, due to economic boom created by President Trump.

Rural Minnesota

Our office is located in a suburb of the Twin Cities and most paralegals do not want to travel outside the metro core.

Lack of training and skill sets required training and extra supervision that did not make it cost effective to have paralegal staff

There are many people who say that they are a paralegal but do not actually have appropriate training and background to do the job.

No enough properly trained in our area.

The title paralegal is often attached to legal assistants with no formal training or skillset.

We usually hire legal assistance. The problem is hiring of younger people whose attendance is absolutely s

Most paralegals we have interviewed who have come out of programs are poorly prepared, to work in an office, don't understand the legal process, and have no experience with customer service. The paralegal programs appear to be training people who have community college or lesser degrees and throwing them out there with a certificate.

Too many paralegals who are used as legal assistance in firms so lack training or experience; those who have training or experience are overpaid it's simply too easy to get a paralegal certificate. They come out of schools, both online and in person with inability to do even the basics, typing for example. using PDF's or advanced Word skills, no basic office decorum or ability to speak in a professional manner. Then moving on to an utter inability to problem solve. That might be developed after say 15 years...but even then unlikely.

It's difficult to find paralegals specifically educated to be paralegals.

Many people who apply for the positions do not have formal education or prior experience

There's a lack of paralegals in northern MN.

Our office is outstate and wages are lower than in the Twin Cities. We tend to train our own legal assistants. We have just 1 certified paralegal.

The best paralegals for our field of law intelligent, self-motivated, hard-working specialists. These qualities are hard to find in any field.

There are not enough qualified paralegals in the job pool and not enough persons seeking out formal paralegal training. The 'good ones' are very expensive. We have engaged a hiring firm to find paralegals over the last 2-4 years and they are hard to find.

Hard to find good people with attention to detail.

Just had some hiring misses that didn't work out.

It has been hard to compete with government positions that hire paralegals for similar pay, but far better benefits.

Finding any paralegal that is capable of problem solving or understating the legal field has been very challenging. Generally, the last 4 paralegals I have worked with have been willing and able to perform only specifically delineated tasks. They have not developed a feel for litigation, they have not been problem-solvers, they do not understand the client goals and needs. We have ONE SHINING STAR of a paralegal who should be an attorney - she could do any of this. But she has proven a unicorn, we have been unable to find anyone close.

The pool is very small. The paralegal career path is not appealing to many.

Staff turnover

They are difficult to retain as many opportunities exist for qualified legal professionals.

Hard to find people with sufficient experience to allow them to be independent enough to make the paralegal a good investment.

Few to no people apply for openings

There seems to be a very small pool of good paralegals with the interpersonal skills and intellect to do the job well.

hard to find paralegals with supervisory experience pay

Not qualified, or did not want to put in the hours

We work in a very specialized field

Candidates are hard to find. We have to locate people with basic skills and train them.

Supply appears to be tight right now.

no qualified candidates in the area

It has been difficult to find quality candidates that do a good job and have the level of detail needed for the position.

we are a legal aid office and can't pay a lot, so we tend to train recent graduates on the job which is a win-win

It is especially difficult to find qualified paralegals in Greater Minnesota.

There are fewer applicants for job openings and must fewer qualified applicants.

Rural Minnesota has a hard time finding people to hire with a paralegal degree.

Technology deficiencies

Our office is in rural Northwest Minnesota. It is hard to find paralegals that are willing to work in this area. The implementation of this pilot project would allow for more paralegals to be available because there would be more incentive to move and/ or work in the area.

We lost a very experienced paralegal. It was difficult to find a paralegal with similar experience and attitude.

Unfilled open positions

In rural Minnesota we have few applicants for Paralegal positions with education or experience. The paralegals we do have have been trained by us for the work.

Difficult to find paralegals with broad experience to work in smaller firm setting.

We have had difficulty finding qualified paralegals with the capacity to effectively research and draft.

There isn't much in the middle. Young and inexperienced or very experienced and very expensive.

We struggle to find well-trained paralegals for a litigation practice.

Our pay for paralegals might be below market which has made it difficult to replace paralegals who retire.

Most applicants are not qualified and those that are want too much money.

None around in NW Minn rural area

need additional help sometimes and people are looking for a more permanent situation.

Three in a row were self-serving, ill-prepared, disloyal, and/or substance abusing.

We require a broad set of skills and analytical capabilities

Quality; location

WE are a rural firm and can't pay what Twin Cities firms pay

We had extreme difficulty finding an experienced probate paralegal and a criminal law paralegals.

Our paralegals have to learn a variety of areas of law and handle a fairly heavy caseload, which can be difficult. There are a variety of skills necessary and it can be hard to find someone to fulfill all the expectations.

Our labor market in Bemidji makes it difficult to find potential candidates who have office experience and/or experience working in the legal sector.

to many factors to explain

The paralegal certificate graduates I've encountered are generally unprepared for the workplace and resistant to putting in the extra time to learn the 'system.' There seems to be a feeling of entitlement that a certificate will immediately produce an income-generating job without meaningful contribution or commitment to a legal project. The outstanding paralegals I've encountered are not certified and come from an office manager or small business background conducive to self-starting.

This is a bit of a cheat answer. I work for a large private corporation. Our paralegal candidates for our recent job openings have been more likely to be over-qualified. The company is reluctant to compensate the paralegals at a market rate, which can make it a challenge to find a good fit.

Hard to find someone qualified who wants to work part time and can do so independently.

It is a specialized field and finding a well qualified paralegal is not easy. Most do not have the work experience, or knowledge of the case type.

Shortage in family law of qualified candidates

Unqualified applicants with general secretary or reception skills in a law office does not equal Paralegal.

Pay is too low for qualified paralegals

Not enough good candidate paralegals in out state Minnesota.

lack of experience and understanding of legal concepts

Area specifications / probate, trust administration. Very few knowledgeable candidates in this practice area with probate and tax knowledge

Difficult to find paralegals with training. Office assistants are more prevalent in the work force.

Not enough qualified paralegals out there. People are going to law school instead- better money

We are currently short staffed. Finding corporate paralegals with securities experience and qualified intellectual property paralegals is a challenge.

Minimal difficulty; my company rarely has paralegal openings and rarely hires entry level paralegals. It can be difficult to find qualified paralegals to fill openings requiring experience, education, etc. but the company has a good reputation and pays its paralegals well.

Paralegals are expensive. They want to earn $60-80k - which is more than most first year attorneys make! Which then makes more sense to hire an attorney...

Paralegals don't have the enough experience for what law offices are looking for.

Employees don't have the education in writing, research or understanding of the profession. We see this a lot with paralegal certificates and 2 year degrees.

To hire experienced paralegals, the salary requirements are usually prohibitive of a small firm.

Experienced candidates are hard to find.

Potential candidates do not have sufficient education, training or knowledge.

Yes, skill levels and knowledge vary. Our firm does not utilize a recruiting service so all postings are done on our own through traditional job posting sites.

Paralegals who applied did not have requisite years of experience.

Extremely difficult to find somebody with the soft skills for clients and technical research skills

There has been an issue with finding paralegals with the level of experience and attention to details. There are also a fair number that have problems getting to work timely due to family commitments, etc. They are not reliable and their error level is high.

rural community

We posted and interviewed for a paralegal position but were unable to find a qualified candidate that could perform the job requirements for the salary we were offering.

We are a nonprofit and unable to pay for qualified paralegals who can support attorneys in tasks beyond technical skills. Our attorneys make approximately what a paralegal at a large firm can make.

I have looked for part time help and struggled to find qualified assistance.

Very few applicants for open position in the non-metro area in real estate, not enough highly skilled paralegals in marketplace

When I worked at a large firm, I had difficulty finding qualified paralegals to work with, largely because they had the position based on work experience and did not have current or recent education in a paralegal training program.

We're not in MPLS, so it's always a challenge to find qualified people Highly trained paralegals (not just a 6 month certificate) hard to hare-- note that this is outstate and all hiring is challenging.

We have had difficulty finding qualified, experience paralegals

Can't afford paralegals. The definition of paralegal is not clear. I use non-certificated legal assistants. That is, I use individuals that have a four year degree (and some working on their four year degree) but their degrees are not in a paralegal program.

we just used a head hunter to find a paralegal with real estate experience

We are not getting quality applicants. Turnover is high.

do not seem to be enough paralegals

We have had trouble having applicants apply.

not many paralegals have the skills required to draft briefs, etc.

Our nonprofit pay scale makes it difficult to find and retain quality paralegals.

My impression is that fewer young people are becoming paralegals. The pool of available and qualified paralegals seems to be diminishing.

We have had paralegals that have had little to no training.

just not many applications or candidates are the wrong fit.

lack of law office understanding

Salaries are an issue. Some paralegals lack drafting experience and need heavy supervision to do pleadings correctly.

Few applicants to recent job postings

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Area of Law Comments: Creditor-Debtor Law

September 25, 2019

correspondence with creditors, advising clients about the process and procedural and substantive rights

Good rules, good resources, paraprofessionals would make a huge difference.

Often low income individuals have creditor debtor problems, and low or no cost help with understanding or enforcing their rights would be helpful

A lot of paper involved and the issues are usually clear.

Paralegals should not handle family law matters.

Under the guidance of an attorney, basic rights could be conveyed by a paralegal--as well as stop creditor calling letters significant need in this area; simple turn-key matters

Too many unrepresented parties need additional legal assistance.

A paralegal can be helpful in the collection of information and by preparing legal documents.

In any area of a law practice in which there is high volume and in which basically administrative form-filling is prevalent, consumers of legal services benefit from sufficiently trained lower cost providers.

paralegals can be helpful in the procedural aspects of collection relatively simple area of law

High need and an administrative-heavy area of practice

Unlike family law, there are almost no private attorneys representing individuals in creditor-debtor cases. Unlike housing, there are almost no dedicated clinics paired with court calendars to assist individuals in creditor-debtor cases.

Often the clients have limited financial means.

Creditor-debtor law is more straight forward & assistance for those issues is not as available.

Lots of clients need simple explanations of routine matters. Paralegals can do this well.

Depends on qualifications.

Paralegals would be in an ideal position to gather data and assist with the technical aspects of resolving creditor-debtor disputes.

Debtor defense is relatively uncomplicated but the procedural hoops of maintaining a defense are often insurmountable for pro se litigants

These matters are generally less complex, and typically have the least frequency of significant collateral consequences.

The form if this question assumes I agree with the premise. In the early stages of my career as an attorney who became licensed during the recession and watched public interest and government jobs dry up, these three areas of law were my primary income source. I made a living practicing in these areas on a "low bono" basis. And I frequently watched as attorneys making $150,000+ volunteered their time to folks who genuinely could have afforded legal representation (not at typical attorneys' rates, but mine). I know I am not the only attorney who built a small practice this way. We should be reaching out to newly licensed attorneys and giving them a platform to help clients and make a living, not devaluing their services.

paralegals can help complete paperwork for clients

People finding themselves in deep debt often have neither money nor a basic understanding of personal finance. You don't need a lawyer to provide practical, effective advice and insight for most of those cases.

NOT family law.

Involves issues of money. Laws demand less interpretation.

I work for prepaid legal plans. Creditors use system to threaten/harass debtors. Service requirements are a joke for small claims and people are always dealing with suits where they had no notice they were even sued.

I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

This area has the highest ratio of unrepresented to represented parties. It is less complicated than family and housing.

Formulaic pleadings and responses that will rarely stray into unique or complex issues.

Relatively formulaic practice.

consumer, personal plight area needing to be streamlined and made more affordable

I know little about it, but I know family & many family paralegals couldn't do it. 29 years experience with paralegals both in office & on other side. Some paralegals cause a lot of the problems — dumb pursuit of minor discovery issues in particular.

Very dangerous to have paralegal representing people in housing or family law matters

It's fairly process driven and PLs would be able to assist given this.

Most of the time this area only involves filing of documents and default hearings.

Collection work involves use of a lot of statutory forms and careful attention to deadlines for service, but does not involve a lot of technical legal skill or analysis. This is a good area for paralegals to assist in to lower costs for clients.

Simplest and most frequently abused - family is far too complicated and the effects too far-reaching.

Because it is very rules oriented and form dependent and the issues are simple. Anyone could be taught to point out the correct paperwork someone should fill out, what the deadlines are and what to do next. Also, there are not a lot of attorneys who work in this area because the potential clients have no money.

Paralegals could handle conciliation court claims. Save creditors cost of legal fees (which often pass thru to debtors) and give debtors access to representation (where cost of hiring lawyer for one appearance can be 1000+). Rules of evidence are not strictly enforced; not a court of record; and either party can appeal to district court so overall low risk.

A paralegal who is specifically trained in creditor-debtor law could efficiently discuss the issues with the clients without fear of UPL. This would be a financial benefit for the client and a time-saver for the attorney.

Significant consumer needs but often cost is a barrier to access to legal assistance.

I'm a bankruptcy attorney. I think my paralegal could do an amazing job helping clients in other capacities, including those clients who do not necessarily need to file bankruptcy but could benefit from legal representation in a limited manner with one or two specific creditor issues.

We should have had an option for 'OTHER' so I could provide explanation. Our legal assistants are not decision makers. They make recommendations. I see this as the best use of legal paraprofessionals

A paralegal operating under the direction of an attorney will provide an edge an otherwise unrepresented party would lack in this setting.

As I understand this area of law, there are many issues that are similarly resolved and involve standard forms and procedures. This is where paralegals do their best work.

Often requires low-cost representation

Paralegals could advise clients on whether or not they need a bankruptcy, and if not, where resources are to draft letters to debt collectors. They can also advise if there are any violations of the FDCA.

Creditor and family seem like they have similar issues recur frequently. A paralegal could guide pro se parties in getting the lay of the land on those issues.

this area of the law is clear cut (unlike family, which is so fact-specific I think it would be very difficult to have non-attorneys handling those issues)

It's largely form-based things like bankruptcy could be handled by a paraprofessional

Clients often can't afford lawyers, or lawyers cannot prepare bankruptcy related docs cost-effectively

I believe that paralegals working in one or two specified areas can provide quality representation.

little representation is done in this area

Paralegals would reduce costs making access to justice more available.

There appears to be a shortage of well trained consumer rights lawyers who can help people resolve credit disputes that are still troubling but are not large enough to consider bankruptcy.

The statutory aspects of Creditor-Debtor law are relatively straight forward and help with garnishments, foreclosures and bankruptcies, under supervision of a qualified attorney would be of benefit to potential clients.

Given a lot of creditor rights' law firms sue out cases in bulk, it would be beneficial for debtors to have some representation through the process--particularly in regards to negotiating a settlement of the debt.

This is an area of great need, and if expanding the role of paralegals can provide a more cost-effective in at least some cases, I think it's a good idea.

Fill out the paperwork and negotiate with creditors regarding a settlement.

There is limited Housing law in our area but it would allow for clients to be better served because a paralegal would be able to provide the attention that is necessary.

I think competent paralegals are capable of work that is as high-quality and helpful as an attorney.

Clients would benefit because paralegals can provide adequate, helpful legal services.

These are generally simple cases, and it is a high volume practice area. As it is my own area of practice, I believe that the use of paralegals in an expanded role would benefit all sides.

Thousands of debt collections suits are filed annually. Most debtors cannot afford an attorney.

Creditors are very familiar with the process and either obtain default judgments or settlements even in cases where the creditor has serious proof problems. Once reduced to a judgment, the debt becomes an ongoing stressor in the debtors life- collection through garnishment may result in other bills not being able to be paid- this cycle can lead to homelessness, serious depression and more. I do have reservations about the proposal. You will note that my emphasis is on the need for paraprofessionals to help debtors defend. My concern is that the large collection firms are already streamlined- allowing them to send legal assistants to prove up cases means they will be practicing law if the case is contested. It also means that rather than working to solve a problem, we may be making it worse by making it even more easy for these firms to continue to file thousands of cases a year. This last comment applies to each of my answers. UNLESS THE PARALEGALS are required to follow our ethical guidelines, we may be doing a greater disservice to the public than we intend. It is important that whatever rules are adopted, there be some kind of licensing, maybe testing or other means to determine abilities, and an obligation to follow ethical rules similar to the ones attorneys follow.

Afford unrepresented persons legal advise as to their rights and options for resolution letter writing can often solve creditor problems and paralegals would be able to provide this service to clients which results in a higher level of service than counsel and advice.

The law seems to be fairly straightforward with little judicial discretion.

In creditor-debtor matters, there is a lot of researching of records, tracking and document preparation that needs to be executed and maintain in order to either defend or pursue a case. Often times, consult is also required because creditor debtor issues can be numerous and difficult for laymen to navigate the terrain of laws and protections.

there are simple questions that a paralegal cannot answer because he/she is not an attorney

More providers means more opportunity. This is a no-brainer. No more protectionism for lawyers.

This seems to be an area of law where people can be assisted by a paralegal to help them resolve an issue.

A paralegal, with the help of template forms, could help the debtor understand the legal proceeding and provide a checklist for defenses to claims. The paralegal could also provide references to let the debtor know about bankruptcy counsel for advice in that area..

Pretty basic fact patterns

Simple claims and responses to creditors would be easily managed by virtually all paralegals.

Paralegals can provide legal analysis of a client's case and advice on how to proceed.

Sometimes they know day to day than lawyer just seems like a very complicated area with a lot of potential clients with student loan, medical, housing, and other debts that can't be navigated by people without significant expertise

Unrepresented parties may not understand this area of law

I feel this area of law has a lot of unrepresented individuals who would benefit from assistance from a paralegal.

access to information and assistance

Ensuring that SRLs have the necessary information to enforce their rights, especially debtors.

there is min. paid work helping debts compared to creditor work so there is a need for low cost services

Time crunches

I don't think the paraprofessional project will benefit clients. This survey is not designed in a way to allow lawyers to select 'none' as an option or to voice concerns about non-attorneys practicing law in some very difficult practice areas. The MSBA previously has expressed concern about this project. The survey should allow attorneys to answer in a way that is not in the affirmative.

There are many areas in this type of law that do not specifically require an attorney to represent the client, but a paralegal to help assisting in the correct paperwork, filling out the paperwork, giving fact information and procedural information and filing assistance.

the consequences of defaulting are quite serious and clients would benefit greatly if they had an advocate to explain the process. Such as a default judgment could be granted but may not be collectible.

all of these areas are heavily used by pro-se litigants which clog up the system - having a paralegal available to assist and streamline in each scenario would be very helpful to the judicial system and other attorney's waiting to have their cases called.

Huge need

This appears to be an area of need

the rules are clear and strict and forms can be completed without attorney document preparation

Dispute Resolution, etc.

Creditor-debtor law involves contractual agreement between a debtor and creditor/borrower and lender. Attempts could be made to settle out of court.

From what I know of the bankruptcy area, it is very paper intensive and these folks are filing bankruptcy because they have no money, so paralegal rates would be cheaper and more cost effective for the clients

Debtors often lack the funds to pay their creditors, thus landing them in court, let alone being able to hire an attorney with high hourly rates.

This area can be confusing, and difficult to know the debtors rights while under stress

In conciliation type cases and/or judgment enforcement type cases, all work can be done by a paralegal most likely more efficiently and cost effective.

Paralegals can provide more cost efficient help in this area.

This affects a large population in daily life and they often don't have the money to hire representation.

It would allow for more affordable representation for people who are already struggling financially.

Law is fairly simple and need is great for low income people

Hard to find an attorney

This can assist individuals who need this service but do not qualify for legal aid and cannot afford full representation attorney. This could provide another option for the public and lessen court congestion with pro se.

Creditor-debtor law is typically procedural and straight forward. Having paralegal assistance, especially for small claims cases would be very beneficial and cost-effective for clients.

Consumers need affordable help when fighting credit cards, medical bills due etc. As a paralegal who previously worked in creditor rights for over a decade I've seen first hand how debtors give up and these creditors are not always forthcoming in proving the debt.

Attorneys typically see themselves as above this work and have little interest in it. This might be a good area for paralegals to participate.

Helps individuals that can't hire an attorney

Providing clients with legal representation for a lower cost.

paralegal can help give information on debt collection which is very helpful in easing one's mind if they are lower income, protection of assets/income very important

Standardized forms

chapter 7 bankruptcy prep and filing, advice on forms

Clients need more understanding of creditor-debtor law. Most cannot afford high legal fees when they are negotiating a debt

More opportunity to provide streamlined, less-complex legal services by legal paraprofessionals at better cost to assist broader population who need the representation from those who have more background and knowledge of issues

Minimal benefit in working on right forms.

Easier to make a difference because usually complex cases.

help and support for short-term cases more cut and dry, which requires less need for practicing law

When I was a law clerk in civil court, there was zero representation for debtors in civil actions. If people did show up, the creditors were often able to negotiate a pay agreement with them. I don't believe there is enough support in consumer law for debtors. Often, the attorneys filing consumer credit cases could barely prove that their client owned the debt but because the client wasn't there, they proceeded by default in 90% of the cases.

I believe with the knowledge paralegals have they can provide benefits to clients in all of these practice areas in many different ways.

Assuming there is some basic CLE/training required before being able to assist in this subject-matter, I believe this is a relatively simple subject-matter that would be covered and the need is high.

Many debtors simply ignore lawsuits-- if paralegals could provide unbundled services to answer and help negotiate payments plans that would be helpful for unserved clients.

Creditor-debtor seems to me to be the most opaque, with the fewest online resources and help, and the least lay experience. Paralegals have so much more experience and ability to understand the law than your general layperson, so I think they could significantly help clients in need.

Creditor collections

These kinds of disputes are usually involving folks with no means to hire an attorney providing client with support

Because it's an issue our office doesn't handle as much and is therefore less familiar.

creditor-debtor has a high volume of need, the process moves quickly would help people rebuild themselves

An experienced paralegal would be able to effectively advise a client and negotiate a fair settlement on the party's behalf short of trial.

FDCPA

I think many individuals with these issues need a simple form filled out - garnishment exemption, for example, or need help drafting a basic answer so they don't default when sued on a debt.

Many clients would not be able to otherwise afford to hire private counsel; much of the law is stable in this area

This is an area where individuals with smaller claimed debts may not be able to afford an attorney to represent them.

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Area of Law Comments: Family Law

September 25, 2019

Provide cheaper assistance to clients especially at court or driving to court in the rural areas of Minnesota.

Many parties go through family law matters alone and self-prepared documents lead to future legal problems. Paralegals could more accurately draft documents like joint petitions or child support pleadings so the public is filing sufficiently accurate documents at a lower cost than hiring an attorney.

The number of family law cases filed in MN along with the training and CLE's available seems like it would provide the most benefit with the least immediate risk to clients for a pilot project.

Creditor/debtor and housing law usually happens fast with serious impact life, money and shelter.

Many individuals just need direction in what and how to file when it comes to Family Law.

The most research involved from all the choices.

I think a lot of people can't afford an attorney. They usually are young and have families and just need some assistance in filing the divorce papers with the Court. Most people don't have a lot of money.

The ramifications of parentage, support and custody affect minors and are very difficult to modify and the determination re property are permanent and freq drafted ambiguously or inequitably by self-represented persons

Providing representation to unrepresented parties in family law would most directly benefit children, who are often the victims of family law disputes.

Under the guidance of an attorney, the sheer volume of paperwork with court forms could be completed with the help of a paralegal significant need in this area; simple turn-key matters

Paralegal would be a needed bridge between the Self-Help products produced by the State Court Administration and end users.

I know of many people who have unresolved family law issues due to the inability to pay for legal assistance

Paternity, child support, etc

Too many unrepresented parties need additional legal assistance.

A paralegal can be helpful in the collection of information and by preparing legal documents.

In any area of a law practice in which there is high volume and in which basically administrative form-filling is prevalent, consumers of legal services benefit from sufficiently trained lower cost providers.

Often the clients have limited financial means.

Lots of clients need simple explanations of routine matters. Paralegals can do this well.

Cut down on fees charge. Gathering information from client.

I would say the most typical reason for being called into court for creditor-debtor and housing issues is failure to pay due to lack of funds. In those cases there is nothing anybody can do to help. Family law involves a variety of issues that someone with legal training may be able to explain to a party.

child support, chil custody and chil protection

Much of the work is gathering information and providing it to the court, which can be done cost-effectively by a paralegal

I interact with many people who can't afford an attorney to obtain an OFP, file for a modification of custody or child support, etc, and would greatly benefit from having someone help them navigate the system.

I don't practice in the area, but I get the distinct impression that there's a real need for practical, cost-effective advice in a lot of cases where one or both of the spouses don't have money for a lawyer. I believe empathetic people with a desire to learn can do so without sitting for three years listening to non-practicing talking heads drone on about the rise and decline of the Erie Doctrine and other eggheaded navel-gazing.

I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

To provide assistance to low to middle income parties.

more and more divorce and custody matters are being handled pro se and basic issues become complicated when the judge cannot give legal advice to help the parties conclude their case.

Paralegals already provide significant service to our clients in this practice area.

Clients going through a divorce need more support.

Many cases in this area largely a consumer, personal plight area needing to be streamlined and made more affordable

Many divorces do not require full representation from attorneys, assuming the parties agree on the terms, but require assistance in drafting documents.

I practice in this area and believe that there are simple forms and documents that a paralegal can complete.

Most need

It's fairly process driven and PLs would be able to assist given this.

This area seems like the one unrepresented clients would use more often than the other areas listed.

I don't really practice housing law and debiter/creditor law. I am aware that family law is very form-based.

'Simple' divorce may be most usefully done indepently by paralegal

A properly trained paralegal would be capable of helping the attorney by handling many of the issues arising in a family law case without fear of committing UPL. This would be a financial benefit for the client and a time-saver for the attorney.

High amount of need but cost is often prohibitive to legal assistance. This area can be complex so a paralegal may not be appropriate in all situations.

Simple document prep

Many family law issues are relatively simple and routine, and need for access to justice is high in this area.

There are many routine proceedings that would require minimal customization from a legal professional but are daunting for the average person without legal training. It's expensive to hire an attorney to do this work but makes a big difference for the people involved.

A paralegal operating under the direction of an attorney will provide an edge an otherwise unrepresented party would lack in this setting.

As I understand this area of law, there are many issues that are similarly resolved and involve standard forms and procedures. This is where paralegals do their best work.

Most dissolutions do not involve significant conflict but are difficult because of the parties' unfamiliarity with court processes. Paralegals could handle many such cases more cost effectively than lawyers. Similar factors are present in guardianships and custody matters.

Individuals and families going through divorce, custody, other family law situations often cannot afford the assistance that they need, or come through the process with debt or tight finances. Having paraprofessional guidance would facilitate the process and assist individuals in navigating the court and administrative systems.

Interaction with clients

Low income individuals have the greatest need for greater access to family law assistance. Without assets family law is largely form-driven and can be handled by someone who understands the forms and doesn't necessarily have the ability to perform deeper legal analysis.

Paralegals could provide advice to clients on how to proceed with a divorce, custody, parenting time, child support, and OFPs. Paralegals could certainly advise and tell clients the standard for modification of custody to deter non-meritorious actions from being filed. They could also advise when a child support modification is necessary. In addition, they could work with family law clients to draft affidavits and motions and advise them concurrently.

Paralegals could provide basic information that would help people to know their rights at a lower cost than an attorney.

Most common request for assistance we receive

Family law has high need and legally is less complex than other areas of law. Success in family court usually involves effective story-telling, and paralegals are good at helping clients tell their stories. This involves understanding the process and knowing where to get information and how to present it. 75% or more of family law work can be done by paralegals.

Family law has many intricacies and paralegals need high quality skills to investigate and support the client and attorney through what is usually a very emotional process. There is significant evolution of a case that encompasses, at times, a person's whole life, and there can be many swift changes that require prompt response. Paralegals are needed to be able to meet with and respond to a family's changing needs.

I don't know the other areas. Maybe they would be better.

A lot of people will have experience with family law at some point in their lives these days and could use basic instruction or assurance that they're doing the right thing a lot of the paper wrk could be handled with the assistance of the paraprofessional

The pro se forms are voluminous and can be confusing for many people.

We have a lot of unrepresented people trying to handle divorces and custody cases on their own. They struggle with the forms, information is incomplete and they have no idea how to put together the necessary documents to try their own custody case.

I believe that paralegals working in one or two specified areas can provide quality representation.

Family law cases require a lot of face time with the client or time on the phone, which can be prohibitively expensive when billing at an attorney's rate. Additionally, while the facts of each case are different, the dispute resolution procedure in family law cases is fairly consistent from case to case and the rules are not overly technical.

When the issues are amicable or not disputed, a paralegal could assist cheaper and quicker than an attorney.

The need is overwhelming for clients, and most of the trouble seems to be getting agreements in writing

There are a lot of pro se forms available, but a paralegal may be of assistance helping a person fill out the forms correctly and to make sure relevant information is included for the court.

There are many pro se family law litigants and having legal assistance for them would greatly help.

Assist in filling out petitions, child care, custody, visitation, holiday schedules, debt responsibility there are so many self-represented litigants that need assistance.

Paralegals would reduce costs making access to justice more available.

There is a high need for family court in our society and a lot of people don't know where to start. A paralegal generally familiar with filings, forms and issues could help in a lot of cases. Housing law and creditor-debtor law are more technical and there are a lot of esoteric laws/rules that can be easily missed.

This is an area of great need, and if expanding the role of paralegals can provide a more cost-effective in at least some cases, I think it's a good idea.

The number of SRL in family law continues to grow. People don't have the money to hire an attorney, yet need the guidance a lawyer or paralegal could provide.

Frequent client questions; factual interviews, etc.

Fill out paperwork and prepare for mediation/court hearing.

This program would meet the demand in Family law in our area. There are more and more attorneys leaving Family law. This would better serve the rural population if this was opened up for paralegals to serve.

Spousal support and maintenance calculations are, generally, formula driven. Many marital dissolutions are done administratively. Both of these considerations are ideal for paralegals.

I think competent paralegals are capable of work that is as high-quality and helpful as an attorney. Clients would benefit because paralegals can provide adequate, helpful legal services.

I believe there is currently a shortage of legal resources to support lower income clients. Allowing paralegals to engage in additional activities at a lower price point would provide more cost effective services to a broader group of people.

Dissolution is expensive - both sides lose financially when you take one household and divide it into two separate households. The reality is that many minnesotans cannot afford an attorney for these cases but they do need advice and guidance if they are going to proceed. Having a lesser cost option would be extremely helpful- provided the paralegals are required to be licensed, and some test to determine abilities as well as ethical obligations are in place

We get daily inquiries looking for pro-bono or low bono representation on family law matters. Our geographic area would benefit greatly from additional representational options in this field.

There are numerous low-income individuals that do not have access to family law support and should be. Providing consult, setting expectations, and helping prepare documents would benefit low-income individuals seek the assistance they need.

there are simple questions that a paralegal cannot answer because he/she is not an attorney - negotiating property settlement - how much the Payee must pay, etc. --Standard guidelines

Paralegals assist in compiling documents for asset/debt issues, as well as parenting time, freeing attorneys to work on more strategic legal issues.

child custody, marriage

We are overworked and have to turn so many clients away in this area. IT takes time to prepare docs and such.

More providers means more opportunity. This is a no-brainer. No more protectionism for lawyers.

Family law is complicated and assistance in finding forms and filling them out correctly would have a significant impact.

Higher number of people needing immediate help and safety is sometimes a concern.

Family law guidelines for alimony/spousal support and child support, as well as child custody criteria could help educate the clients about what factors a court will consider on those issues.

Big area of need.

Many people do not have the means to hire an attorney for simple matters related to child support, custody and dissolution. If more people utilized paraprofessionals, there is a chance that some matters would be less contentious, thus freeing up Judges for more important matters.

Clients are going through tough times. More experienced and knowledgeable staff would be greatly beneficial.

Navigating these issues is complex and there are many self represented litigants. Undoing something that may be done wrong or may not be what the client is seeking is difficult.

It would be helpful if paralegals could attend scheduling conferences and default hearings.

Many clients lack resources to hire attorneys.

I know how great the need is and have had personal experience paying a high-level family law attorney more than the value of the outcome in services in a divorce.

drafting and filing

Having some level of support through a highly emotional conflict could provide a benefit to those who want to/ must represent themselves

Family law requires more one on one time with clients since issues can be complex..

access to information and assistance

Your question assumes that I think more involvement from paralegals is necessary in general. I don't think that is a fair assumption. Attorneys are licensed and trained for a reason. The law is complex. But intake and helping with details would be a place for the paralegal.

The demand for this service is high, the amount of paperwork necessary is high, more help is always needed.

Time crunches

there are numerous pleadings and documents that need to be prepared in this area most common area where clients are in the legal system, not of their own volition, and need representation to avert unjust results.

There are many pleadings in family law that could be prepared and filed by a paralegal alone. There are many procedural questions they could assist with.

Clients receive a great amount of misinformation from friends and media about how family law works.

Huge need to have help in filling out forms and navigating the court system.

This appears to be an area of need

document preparation

Family Law, ADR, etc.

Many people cannot afford to hire an attorney, but need basic advice about the law and help with drafting documents that are effective and do not cause them more issues, and expense, at a later time.

Paralegal's in our office often work with child support and paternity issues that involve similar procedures with any case.

if parties are amicable and there are no children, it really becomes paperwork driven. Even with children, there is so many guidelines for support etc. again if parties are amicable Parties to a family law case should have representation to educate them on their options and the law. Unrepresented parties are more likely to reach an agreement that is unfair as they do not fully understand their rights.

This is an area where there are many individuals representing themselves due to lack of finances to hire an attorney

This area is stressful, and difficult to know rights and procedures under duress

Guidance in a very emotional time from a paralegal, who knows the ins and outs of family law would be less expensive. In addition, clients often prefer talking with a paralegal- less intimidating. Many family law issues are already handled by the paralegal, under supervision of the attorney. Minor court cases, especially when undisputed, can easily and more cost effectively be handled by a paralegal. In many cases the parties are limited on funds and getting support and advice from a paralegal, under the supervision of an attorney, may be the best option. Paralegals can provide more cost efficient help in this area.

This is an area that a lot of low income people are unable to hire an attorney to help them

At our family law firm, we receive a lot of calls from people looking for pro bono or low-cost attorneys.

I currently work in family law and the ability to afford an attorney for family law disputes is limited in many cases.

It would be a more affordable option for uncontested matters or during the beginning stages for things like the Initial Case Management Meeting or Status Conferences. Often, it is the paralegal who is the most intimate with the facts of the case.

Need is great for middle to low income people who can't afford an attorney and act pro se instead.

A lot of people complain about how much family law attorneys cost when their tasks seemed relatively simple

Many clients dealing with family law matters do not have the funds necessary to hire an attorney for litigation. I could see paralegals at lower fees be a great value.

This can assist individuals who need this service but do not qualify for legal aid and cannot afford full representation attorney. This could provide another option for the public and lessen court congestion with pro se.

Helping people with forms and client management (keeping the client informed; managing expectations; listening to their stories...)

Family law is more complicated than one may think. There are a lot of complex issues that arise.

Even when neither party is legally represented, and it is an amicable situation, there are often simply questions that come up where both parties could benefit from having someone assist with legal procedures, forms, typical situations, etc.

it seems the most practical and commonly used compared to the other two areas

I think there are many facets of Family law with which a paralegal might be of assistance.

Helps individuals that can't hire an attorney

Clients have a lot of questions in family law, lots of things happen, and paralegals may have more time to talk it out with the client, easier to get in touch with than an attorney

Standardized forms

Area of law usually fact intensive and not particularly complex.

Most times, either or both sides are not represented by an attorney due to inability to afford, or desire to hire independently.

explanation of procedures for divorce, custody filings, forms, mediation, joint prep of divorce decrees

Clients need guidance in family law matters - especially younger parents. They may not have the resources to hire high level attorneys.

Many individuals need legal assistance regarding family disputes but don't qualify for legal aid and can't afford to retain a private attorney for a lengthy parenting time and/or custody dispute.

More opportunity to provide streamlined, less-complex legal services by legal paraprofessionals at better cost to assist broader population who need the representation from those who have more background and knowledge of issues

Can cause emotional and financial strain especially for those who don't have the ability to pay an attorney and if matters are prolonged.

Order for Protections and Harassment Restraining orders

the demand

I believe with the knowledge paralegals have they can provide benefits to clients in all of these practice areas in many different ways.

There are often forms that apply to family cases that pro parties can fill out, but they often need guidance in completing those forms.

Pro Se litigants often need assistance in navigating through the process.

Because it can be a very hard field to get help in, and many people don't have money for attorneys. It might be more cost effective for them to have a paralegal who can help them better advocate for themselves.

The need is huge. For simple dissolutions, paralegal assistance would be helpful if under an attorney's supervision.

much of the due diligence and drafting could be completed a paralegal

Limited to certain areas like document creation and service and filing in areas like parenting time schedules or child support modification

People need to get a court order for a divorce. Creditor-debtor is a funny area of law. 99% of the time the debtor owes the money. And have not paid. Creditors already have a high bar to pass in terms of cost to enforce debts and debtors have the majority of laws in their favor - everything is a protected asset/income from judgments. Debtors do not need additional counsel, they have all the rules in their favor. They don't have money to fight - even at a reduced rate. I think this a nonsense waste of time and effort to provide debtors with low-cost services. The only fights they ever offer are procedural.

families are already under extreme stress from divorce, whatever we can do to lessen the financial burden (without compromising on the legal help they get) we must do

There are many unrepresented parties.

This is perhaps a philosophical rather than practical choice. A married couple can want to get divorced without there being a true conflict between them. If they nevertheless need to get involved in the legal system to be allowed to end their relationship, they should be able to do so as cheaply as possible.

providing client with support

I was a family law paralegal for 22+ yrs at SMRLS & private practice. Paras could represent in OFPs which would then allow attys to focus on other family law actions. Happy to give more feedback by phone, if necessary. I think this is especially true in a more rural county.

That is where there is the most need there are many people who need assistance with basic, non-complicated matters where a paraprofessional could be a great asset to help a significant number of people with basic questions hopefully keep families together or get family members out of bad situations

can help more clients

Experienced family law paralegals are able to draft family law pleadings with instructions from attorneys with little to no supervision.

The vast majority of folks I've seen at ask an attorney events with family law questions at least benefited from a little advice. Usually the debtors simply incurred the debt and can't pay it (so there's no real legal issue, unless bankruptcy is on the table or a 'stop calling me' letter which doesn't resolve anything) or the tenant is being evicted for good reason (even if not the tenants fault-such as a lost job leading to inability to pay rent) - those folks benefit more from talking to the county for help with rent assistance if available. That said there are a ton of traps in family law where people are making decisions with long term permanent consequences, so it's also the easiest area to mess up in a way that hurts people. But a paraprofessional might be in a better position to provide limited representation without getting stuck with all the ethical baggage attorneys have to deal with that goes along with limited representation for lawyers, which can make the process smoother and more affordable by excising labor intensive due diligence and follow up.

An experienced paralegal would be able to effectively advise a client and negotiate a fair settlement on the party's behalf short of trial.

Most need. OFP's also.

Most need

Many family members are impacted by the lack of representation of an attorney and can't afford one.

A bit of a guess based on family lawyers I know!

It's an area that involves a lot of information gathering and client follow-up. Many cases are settled, and paralegals can provide much of that workup.

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Area of Law Comments: Housing Law

September 25, 2019

Because unlike the other areas of law, there simply are not the attorneys who practice in housing law. Or they only represent the landlord and not the tenants. Simply put, housing is a single issue area, as opposed to family which OFTEN has crossover in estate planning, tax, criminal, bankruptcy and immigration.

Housing law is very complicated and tenants needs to be advised on their rights especially when they are low income and often fighting with a landlord or property Management company where money is not an issue

You are taking work away from licensed attorneys with this proposed program-eroding the value of a law degree. Personally I think paralegals shouldn't be in any of these areas of law.

With the guidance of an attorney, basic guidelines around the eviction process and eviction expungement process could be aided by a paralegal.

Procedurally, the law is fairly straight-forward.

Assuming appropriate paralegal training, and the existence of a housing court, tasks could be performed by paralegals within a confined structure maximizing benefits to courts and minimizing risk to clients that unexpected legal issues raised in court exceed the scope of knowledge and training significant need in this area; simple turn-key matters

I know of many people who have had lived in illegal circumstances due to the inability to pay for legal assistance

Too many unrepresented parties need additional legal assistance.

There are currently not enough attorneys to represent all tenants facing eviction and stats show that representation improves outcome for tenants

A paralegal can be helpful in the collection of information and by preparing legal documents.

Many parties in housing court are unrepresented and a paralegal could assist otherwise unrepresented parties- usually tenants understand their rights and prepare for housing court proceedings

In any area of a law practice in which there is high volume and in which basically administrative form-filling is prevalent, consumers of legal services benefit from sufficiently trained lower cost providers.

Paralegals can be helpful in typical residential landlord/tenant situations.

relatively simple area of law

Often the clients have limited financial means.

Lots of clients need simple explanations of routine matters. Paralegals can do this well.

Much of housing law is procedural and many people are unable to afford attorneys to resolve these matters. In addition, housing law is relatively straightforward. Paralegals would be in a good position to help tenants understand their rights and assist them with hearings in eviction proceedings, etc.

Just having a knowledgeable person at an eviction hearing can make a big difference

The area of most need and with least amount of subtleties in most situations.

It's the simplest/most recurring issues

In my experience clients either self-represent in housing court, often going against the landlord's attorney, or they avoid housing court even if their case has merit. Access to additional and more affordable assistance may provide better outcomes for those clients who need this assistance.

Housing law is, generally, statutorily clear. And the likelihood of accidentally ruining someone's life is less.

paralegals can help complete paperwork for clients

I work in a pro bono housing clinic. Most of the clients I see don't understand what's going on. Many of them have no significant defenses and really just need someone to hear them out and run through a quick checklist of possible defenses. You don't need a lawyer to provide practical, effective advice and insight for most of those cases.

NOT family law

As someone who routinely provides more than 40 pro bono hours a year at legal clinics and representing OFP clients, housing is a huge area many in the cities need assistance with. Whether it's expungements of evictions or dealing with landlord tenant issues...it is a problem big enough to be a fix but not profitable enough for a lot of attorneys to specialize in. Also, family law has SO many levels and layers of complexity. I don't think paralegals are appropriately educated to deal with all of that information in a way that would be beneficial to most clients.

I think of evictions as the primary issue in housing law. It seems the area of housing law is narrow and defined enough that a non-attorney could readily learn and master the content and procedures without difficulty.

Litigants are not represented and the issues are not particularly difficult.

Tends to be one hearing and limited legal issues

I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

Poor people who are in most need of advice in usually urgent circumstances mostly about money

High need for help

consumer area personal plight area needing to be streamlined and made more affordable

Many people don't know their rights as a tenant.

its an area where help may be needed

Same - I know little about housing but I know family & many family paralegals couldn't handle.

Housing law is fairly basic and usually involves similar issues case to case, which would limit the expertise the paralegal would need.

It would be helpful to have a paralegal be able to explain the basics to many clients at a fraction of the cost of an attorney.

Landlords often have more experience/familiarity with the system than renters. Any representation by a person, with even minimum knowledge of housing law, should help those who have previously been unrepresented.

There are a number of tenants that are unrepresented but would benefit if they had it.

Housing court less complicated another other areas.

It's fairly process driven and PLs would be able to assist given this.

Obviously, there is a great need in all three categories. I chose housing, since I suspect it would be the fastest area to learn.

Probably just based on familiarity stemming from some of my pro bono work, but I know how large the need is and how straightforward the legal issues tend to be.

Simplest and most frequently abused - family is far too complicated and the effects too far-reaching.

Paralegals could handle eviction hearings. Many LL use property managers. Many T rely on legal aid who are unable to spend much time with client or provide individualized advice. Including paraprofessionals could increase access to client-specific advice and possibly ease burden on court

The process is currently set up to handle pro se litigants , so adding non licensed paralegals will not substantially change the advocacy structure

The need for effective communication with a client suffering unfair treatment from a landlord requires more than just licensed attorneys. Again, the fear of UPL would be eliminated and the cost to the client would be minimized.

High need, but not a lot of legal options for clients who cannot afford to retain an attorney. Often, the dispute is not overly complex.

Housing. Housing is a low dollar area of the law where there are very few practitioners, since there is so little ability to make any money. If a person is renting that sets the tone of their financial straits right there. Creditor debtor might be the next area, for the same reason. Letting paralegals work unsupervised by an attorney to help fill out forms would be catastrophic for the damage that would occur to families breaking up both on the financial side and on the children side.

Many housing law issues are relatively simple and routine, and need for access to justice is high in this area.

There are many routine proceedings that would require minimal customization from a legal professional but are daunting for the average person without legal training. It's expensive to hire an attorney to do this work but makes a big difference for the people involved.

A paralegal operating under the direction of an attorney will provide an edge an otherwise unrepresented party would lack in this setting.

As I understand this area of law, there are many issues that are similarly resolved and involve standard forms and procedures. This is where paralegals do their best work.

Often requires low-cost representation

Could do initial intake

Lots of details to navigate, forms to fill out.

The principles of basic residential housing law can be mastered by anyone with a basic education and enough motivation. A paralegal could help individuals fill out the right forms, guide the tenant through the process and prepare him or her to present arguments at court. The paralegal should not assist the presentation but could assist the pro se party's preparation.

Paralegals can assist with public housing denials, advise on eviction defense, appear with clients in housing denials, appear for first appearances on evictions. They could also provide assistance in and representation in rent escrow actions.

Of the three areas, tenants likely leave the most meritorious defenses and claims on the table because they lack representation

Housing law hearings are often less formal than other types of hearings and many people represent themselves. Access to paralegals could be beneficial for people who would not be able to afford an attorney.

Housing law seems like it is very form-based. A paralegal could help pro se parties navigate the forms.

information only

I've seen paralegals do good work in housing cases

Rental Tenant Eviction law can more easily be reduced to standardized scripts/boilerplate documents. Family law is too complex for paralegals to make decisions or give advice, or represent clients, even with close supervision. I don't know about creditor/debtor.

Again a lot of this could be handled with a paraprofessional and this would save money for the clients

Currently registered agents represent landlords so the paraprofessional playing field is level. Not so in other areas of practice, like family law or debtor/creditor.

Housing law is arguably more straight forward and less complicated than family law.

I believe that paralegals working in one or two specified areas can provide quality representation.

This is such a niche area of law that a paralegal could become proficient at it and offer a great alternative to attorney representation. Because timelines can be so short in eviction actions, having alternate, cheaper options could benefit many.

Those most affected by eviction need to be well informed about their rights. It is my opinion that involvement of skilled paralegals in this area would help achieve a better balance of rights between landlord/tenant; home owner/lender.

High need for people with knowledge of the housing laws.

There are fewer legal issues to address and the subject matter is straight forward. Individuals who are being evicted are unlikely to be able to afford to pay attorneys.

Paralegals would reduce costs making access to justice more available.

This is a discrete legal area in which knowledgeable paralegals could effectively provide guidance, support, and representation to an under-served client population.

Land-lord Tenants and Evictions are often done pro-se and some guidance and assistance with the Statutory defenses and processes could be provided as again, these are relatively straight forward.

Given the power disadvantage for tenants and landlords, it would be beneficial for tenants to have access to someone who can represent them through the process.

This is an area of great need, and if expanding the role of paralegals can provide a more cost-effective in at least some cases, I think it's a good idea.

Represent clients if it is a simple eviction hearing.

There is limited Housing law in our area but it would allow for clients to be better served because a paralegal would be able to provide the attention that is necessary.

I think competent paralegals are capable of work that is as high-quality and helpful as an attorney. Clients would benefit because paralegals can provide adequate, helpful legal services. I believe there is currently a shortage of legal resources to support lower income clients.

Allowing paralegals to engage in additional activities at a lower price point would provide more cost effective services to a broader group of people.

Large numbers of people & housing is such a fundamental right and need.

Similar to my response to creditor debtor law. Tenants need assistance, most large landlords do not- they already are familiar with the system. We have witnessed non-attorney agents misleading tenants in court about their rights. There have to be licensing and ethical obligations in place to protect the public.

Afford unrepresented persons legal advice as to their rights and options for resolution

Paralegals can handle administrative processes such as public housing and subsidized housing application denials, lease terminations, and appeal process. This frees up an attorney's time. The law seems to be fairly straightforward with little judicial discretion.

Many tenants do not know their rights nor how to pursue relief from housing matters, which can greatly impact their lives for the long term. Paralegals would be integral to this area, because they could assist with researching a housing issue, assist with filling out forms, advise on filings, and provide consult with regard to local housing matters.

Paralegals assist in compiling documents relating to payment, rent abatement claims, etc., freeing attorneys to work on more strategic legal issues.

Housing law seems to be the area that could use the most help and, frankly, would be easiest for paralegals to help.

There is always work to do in this area.

More providers means more opportunity. This is a no-brainer. No more protectionism for lawyers.

Housing law is generally conducted as an administrative/quasi-judicial process in cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Needs are immediate for clients, cannot wait for volunteer attorneys

It's arguably the least intricate of the three legal areas with usually the most immediate and life-altering outcome (i.e. being evicted).

A template form of an answer or rent escrow action, could be provided to help educate the litigant.

It would do the least harm to have paralegals assist with these issues.

Seems like an area where limited means folks could use some additional assistance

Pretty basic fact patterns

Paralegals could help in all areas of court in housing law. Housing law suffers from a lack of legal professionals, and help from paralegals would help protect all parties' rights.

Limited scope of the area of representation.

Many clients lack resources to hire attorneys.

Paperwork prep

It's not clear whether the question refers to my current clients or to 'clients' generally, i.e. people with a legal problem who do not have a lawyer. That said, most of LL/T law (what I assume you mean by 'housing') consists of negotiating with the landlord rather than analyzing the law or providing unique legal advice.

Studies have shown better outcomes when people have representation of some sort

I would be very concerned about a non-lawyer handling family law cases. Housing law seems like it might be more straightforward.

access to information and assistance

Tight timelines require the delivery of quick, efficient and accurate information to litigants.

Housing law has some clearly defined requirements regarding service requirements, escrow, and other bright-line rule issues. Areas such as family law are far more discretionary and require more focused practice, legal study, and training.

The demand for this service is high, the amount of paperwork necessary is high, more help is always needed.

I think a lot of bad advice will be given in the family law area, doing permanent damage in an already tense and expensive environment.

Time crunches

Evicting parties are almost always represented by counsel, and, in my experience, tend to try to bully individuals who aren't familiar with the law and can't stand up for themselves. Housing law is narrow enough that I believe many paralegals can adequately advise tenants/foreclosed homeowners on their rights and options so they don't simply get steamrolled by parties with more resources.

There are many areas in this type of law that do not specifically require an attorney to represent the client, but a paralegal to help assisting in the correct paperwork, filling out the paperwork, giving fact information and procedural information and filing assistance.

so many problems could be resolved if clients had a basic understanding of their rights.

Huge need

This appears to be an area of need

document preparation

Section 8, Labor/Housing Law

Housing law is again a contractual area that often involves local ordinances or laws. A paralegal with knowledge in those areas could certainly work to resolve disputes with landlord/tenant issues.

Same as with debtors, above.

This is an area of great need without sufficient attorneys to handle the flow as well as lack of finances by most potential clients.

This area is extremely time sensitive as well as stressful. Difficult to navigate rights when facing eviction/poor living conditions without a legal advocate

The dollar amounts in each case don't justify having lawyer fees. A paralegal knowledgeable in the area would be able to handle the case without a problem.

Many housing law cases are undisputed and just require presentation of facts to the court. This is work paralegals prepare for and are more than capable of handling through the hearing. Paralegals can provide more cost efficient help in this area.

This is an area that a lot of low income people are unable to hire an attorney to help them

This affects a lot of renters who don't have the money to hire representation.

It would be an affordable option for people to be able to have representation. Usually housing matter are pretty straight forward as well.

Law is fairly simple and need is great for low income people

Cost savings compared to lawyers

Believe there is a great need for legal assistance in this area of law really hard to find an attorney, especially for seniors and other who are working class

This can assist individuals who need this service but do not qualify for legal aid and cannot afford full representation attorney. This could provide another option for the public and lessen court congestion with pro se.

LL/Tenant law is an important area - people need help; if more attorneys were familiar with Alternative Fee Models then maybe they'd take more of these cases

Housing law isn't taught in paralegal school and of the firms that I have worked at, we didn't practice housing law.

Tenants and smaller-size landlords cannot typically afford legal representation and could benefit from legal assistance.

This is our most popular area. It would definitely help if paralegals could be more involved.

Helps individuals that can't hire an attorney

Providing clients with legal representation for a lower cost.

Our housing law can consist of advice/information on notices to vacate, L/T issues, and then evictions, loss of subsidized/public housing - paralegals can be trained to give out information to help with these areas, and fact gather for the court level cases

Standardized forms

Area of law not complex.

Most times, either or both sides are not represented by an attorney due to inability to afford, or desire to hire independently.

More opportunity to provide streamlined, less-complex legal services by legal paraprofessionals at better cost to assist broader population who need the representation from those who have more background and knowledge of issues

Housing law is fairly cut and dried so perhaps paralegals could help them fill out the forms.

Highest volume calls for United Way 211 - (formerly First Call for Help) regard Housing issues.

landlords break the rules all the time

help and support for short-term cases

I believe with the knowledge paralegals have they can provide benefits to clients in all of these practice areas in many different ways.

The need is great and the issues tend to be insular.

I am a housing law paralegal. Our office participates in a clinic 2x/wk in one county. Several of the hearings are settled prior to court or at court. A paralegal could easily handle these cases. Paralegals could also rep clients at Rent Escrow/TRA cases. Most of the investigation is done by the paralegals already. Paralegals can already handle administrative hearings for subsidized housing issues (PBS8, Section 8, Public Housing, Section 42, Section 515, Bridges, etc.).

Assuming there is some basic CLE/training required before being able to assist in this subject-matter, I believe this is a relatively simple subject-matter that would be covered and the need is high.

helping tenants in evictions would hopefully get better results for tenants

Evictions frequently involve folks who cannot afford an attorney

providing client with support

My office has a para who represents and maintains her own case load in housing matters.

There are a lot of people who have landlord questions and who can't afford an attorney the need is great, impacts the housing stability of people

I think the other two are too complicated. Housing seems more clear cut.

hopefully avoid homelessness

can help more clients

An experienced paralegal would be able to effectively advise a client and negotiate a fair settlement on the party's behalf short of trial.

It's an area in demand, with many low-income individuals who cannot afford an attorney.

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Geography Comments: Minneapolis or St. Paul

September 25, 2019

These are heavily populated areas.

Could provide cheaper assistance for those who can't afford an attorney existence of specialty courts, huge volume of unrepresented parties, existence of nonprofits willing to train volunteers, an established system where trained paralegals could make a difference minimizing risk to clients significant need in this geography

I know of many people who have unresolved family law issues due to the inability to pay for legal assistance and I know of many people who have had lived in illegal circumstances due to the inability to pay for legal assistance

The problem of unrepresented parties and the lack of access to justice is a state-wide issue.

This pilot project could impact the supply-side of legal representation. By increasing supply, competition should increase and prices for legal representation decrease. The metro areas have the highest populations. The metro areas have the highest populations of legal representors. Thus the demand side (i.e. client-side) would benefit most in the metro area.

I think the pilot could be helpful throughout the state and is not geographically specific

Low income clients who are on budgets could benefit from having paralegals do some of the work.

lower cost

For a pilot program of this nature to be successful, you need to have one set of laws and procedures as well as a large pool of cases.

Lots of evictions

I think all areas would benefit from this service, but I believe the greatest need is in Minneapolis and St. Paul. Additionally, I think it would be good to start with a limited number of jurisdictions for the pilot at first, then see how things go and expand the services to other areas if the pilot is successful once the major kinks are worked out..

All 3 law schools, numerous communities in need, and an overwhelming population are there, it would be unreasonable to have the pilot project excluded from this geographic area.

Sufficient numbers of attorneys willing to provide supervision and large numbers of persons unable to afford legal representation

From the clinics I work at in Hennepin and Ramsey I know for a fact there is great need in this area.

All. I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

Highest case load and population.

I believe allowing paralegals to represent individuals in a limited capacity would allow low income and middle class individuals to seek more guidance. It would improve their access to legal services.

High need

Volume of unrepresented individuals.

Most need

Plenty of attorneys are available in the suburban and rural counties.

Court & legal access is becoming more expensive and PLs would reduce these costs considerably.

Sheer volume of cases and number of attorneys available to train and supervise.

High number of low income persons seeking legal assistance.

Housing court is overwhelmed in those counties

The cost and time saving would benefit clients in all areas of the state.

I think the tone of the question implies that clients would benefit...they would not. Right now you have licensed attorneys who are nearly incompetent, they graduate law school, hang a shingle then proceed to commit malpractice daily. The PR complaints are up and letting paralegals do anything more than what they do...would just drive that number even higher at the same time providing even poorer (if that is possible) service to clients on the low end of the financial spectrum.

More housing issues because of density

There's a substantial number of individuals who do not qualify for civil legal aid, and this may be a more affordable option to help decrease the justice gap.

Biggest concentration of people and poverty

Greatest need

High volume of cases so a paralegal could provide a great alternative.

More need for resources for clients of limited means

All places would benefit from a project that helped pro se litigants be better prepared when coming to court.

Higher concentrations of people who need services.

unique housing court and large populations who regularly face issues of this nature, often without representation

Need is great, many employers that would benefit from higher level work; many company's use paralegals at higher levels that law firms all ready.

Every part of the state would benefit.

This is a very high volume area.

I believe that broader use of paralegals for Housing cases in particular, would assist currently unrepresented clients in the Twin Cities.

The second and 4th judicial districts serve a lot of low and lower income individuals- Affordable options for assistance would help both the individuals needing assistance and the courts.

Dense population with limited ability to afford legal representation majority of educated paralegals

Any area would benefit because the cases would be streamlined better -- efficiency, take on more cases, cost less for the client. Cases only need an attorney should they reach the court level.

Family law, especially, should be an administrative matter. If a person appeals the decision, then an attorney needs to step in and represent them in court.

All areas would benefit, because of population, at least one metro city could be selected.

Good area for a test largest concentration of people

It should be equal access

I believe this venue would be most appropriate as I feel there are a lot of individuals who cannot afford an attorney in these venues.

There is a high population of low income persons and minorities that account for the majority of these cases.

They know the cases as much if not more than the attorneys

high volume

There are many people in this area that could benefit from this program because of the lack of finances to pay for an attorney and the lack of assistance that the courthouse offers in this area.

Huge need

This would be the most geographically compact area in which to perform a pilot.

low income

Minneapolis or St. Paul cases.

High volume of low income or indigent clients who need help

I think that every where would benefit for individuals who cannot afford an attorney

I believe this would be beneficial for all areas

I believe in all of these areas there are persons who cannot afford to hire attorneys.

This is a highly populated area and certainly all of the citizens aren't going to be able to afford attorneys. Access to paralegals who could assist with people with legal services and provide access to the legal system.

There are low income people everywhere who need access to justice smaller area for pilot project may reflect whether it would work

the public who don't qualify for legal aid but cannot afford to retain a attorney.

I think Minneapolis/St. Paul has a wider base of lower-income potential clients.

More people this will help take case load off attorneys/legal aid

The need for these services at a more reasonable cost are not defined by where those who need the services live in MN

They have a lot of people and few solo/small law firms

There is a huge case load and if paralegals could do some of the leg work and administrative filing, attorneys could get to more clients volume of people

Higher population of people that need help and courts are over booked so there is limited time for courts to help.

rural minnesota residents do fall victim to predatory lenders because there aren't any.

There are individuals who lack financial resources in all areas of Minnesota and would benefit from this pilot project.

There are more housing cases.

I think the higher populated communities or area would have more individuals needing this help.

Large debt-collection practices in civil / conciliation courts in Hennepin / Ramsey.

Non profit and legal aid need paralegals and the high population of low income cases in Minneapolis supports this reasoning

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Geography Comments: 7-County Twin Cities Metro

September 25, 2019

The Twin Cities is heavily populated with diverse groups of people and limited low-cost/no-cost legal services, particularly for minorities.

Larger law firms within this area.

These are the areas I am familiar with.

Biggest area with most paralegals.

Could provide cheaper assistance for those who can't afford an attorney

Because of the volume of cases that need help to efficiently move through the court system.

Pilots need sufficient participation to create meaningful data results and this area has true highest population.

The higher poverty levels--especially in Ramsey County indicate people cannot afford attorneys

I would say the entire metro area.

Higher volume, more need.

uneven existence of specialty courts and trained volunteers, greater travel burdens on attorneys, leaves a hole that would need judicial structures like specialty courts and administrative support to locate and coordinate paralegal representation--nonprofits dont have the funding to make this happen and smaller firms dont have the resources or incentives to address these big picture market issues. The impact could be huge on clients in reducing the cost of representation but also increases the burden on supervising attorney (but on the upside for attorneys, it reduces the need for attorney travel and expands potential client base). It is unclear whether there are sufficient qualified paralegals to meet the need of firms so firms could remain competitive in the market

significant need in this geography

I know of many people who have unresolved family law issues due to the inability to pay for legal assistance and I know of many people who have had lived in illegal circumstances due to the inability to pay for legal assistance

The problem of unrepresented parties and the lack of access to justice is a state-wide issue.

Most coverage of areas needed

I think the pilot could be helpful throughout the state and is not geographically specific low income clients have need

That's where more than half the state's population resides.

Low income clients who are on budgets could benefits from having paralegals do some of the work.

All of the above.You should not force people to answer questions.

lower cost

To make it worthwhile you need a large population. Rural areas clients expect to talk directly to their attorney.

Wherever the need exists and the person is truly competent and FAIR

Clients come from all these counties and more; very few clients from the core cities of Minneapolis or St. Paul

Lots of evictions

I suspect this is a statewide need, but I am personally familiar with the metro

Provide assistance in conciliation court

Metro areas are generally more litigious, generally have a higher population of vulnerable individuals, generally have a higher frequency of incidences requiring external intervention, and metros have the housing stock and amenities to attract and retain professionals.

Lots of renters

Although the Twin Cities area has a large concentration of attorney, many people cannot afford their rates. The additional assistance, offered at lower rates, has the potential for helping those who need the help the most.

the need is great and making additional resources available would help underserved populations

Great need.

From the clinics I work at in Hennepin and Ramsey I know for a fact there is great need in this area.

Where the most people are.

That is where the paralegals are.

All. I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

As a pilot project for low to middle income parties the metro area makes sense as a high volume family law population

These are the areas with the busiest court houses and larger calendars

This is our principal geographic practice area.

Greatest concentration of people and filed cases

most people

Not enough legal aid representatives in these areas

The 7 county metro area has the highest population of clients and paralegals. Economically diverse.

More cases in these areas

Highest demand for legal services and clients who cannot afford to pay attorney rates

Court & legal access is becoming more expensive and PLs would reduce these costs considerably.

Higher number of low income persons seeking legal assistance.

Lower income individuals in the inner city could benefit from having a paralegal perform at a lower cost a lot of the divorce work which CAN BE very form based.

The cost and time saving would benefit clients in all areas of the state.

Most densely populated and can assist the most clients.

Specialized court systems may be helpful. For example, Hennepin and Ramsey counties have specialized housing courts where it may be easy to pilot this structure.

This is where most people live, so I would suspect this is where they could have the greatest impact.

In this well populated area there are many without three funds to hire an attorney. Allowing paralegals to step in under three directing of an attorney allows attorney to help more pro bono cases without jeopardizing their ability to do paying work at the same time. It cost attorneys time and money to leave the office and attend court.

Higher density of population

Greatest number of cases.

More housing issues because of density

More access

Same answer as above.

The Twin Cities area has a lot of the population and most of the attorneys in that geographic area are too busy or practice in other areas to help with creditor, family, and housing law.

this is where there is the most need, although I can see how a program like this could also be useful in the other regional hubs (duluth, rochester, etc.) as well as very rural areas

Seems to be where the paralegals are

Large population in need of lower cost legal services.

more population of lower income

Some people cannot afford attorneys and yet do not qualify for legal aid.

Paralegals still need supervision by a lawyer qualified in the subject matter. The majority of debtor-creditor lawyers are located in the metro.

High volume of cases so a paralegal could provide a great alternative.

Plenty of paralegals available

Will help the most people

Am making that assumption based on population density.

All places would benefit from a project that helped pro se litigants be better prepared when coming to court.

The need exists across the region in suburbs as well as cities. I suspect there also is a need in rural Minnesota, I'm not as familiar with the services provided out state so I cannot say for sure.

Ramsey and Hennepin are understaffed and overburdened so they could use paralegals that could offer more help. The other counties have less work so they have fewer staff and having a paralegal being able to do more would help fill in some of those gaps.

for the same reasons as set forth above

The courts in general are overburdened and underfunded with regard to these high-volume civil issues, and this problem is worst in higher population areas. A lot of people cannot afford lawyers and at the same time do not qualify for low-income legal services. Having some direction and assistance can streamline the process and save courts time.

Because the volume of cases is so high in this area, presumably the need is greatest there.

I think the twin cities metro would benefit best from this program.

Every part of the state would benefit.

This is a very high volume area.

Limited access to legal representation that is largely located in Minneapolis/St. Paul.

majority of educated paralegals

There is a significant population within this area.

Any area would benefit because the cases would be streamlined better -- efficiency, take on more cases, cost less for the client. Cases only need an attorney should they reach the court level. Family law, especially, should be an administrative matter. If a person appeals the decision, then an attorney needs to step in and represent them in court.

Paralegals can help contain costs of representation in the metro, where hourly rates are normally higher.

Most need, I assume

Too many cases

Because of the population size, one of these counties would be a good location.

Population centers - large numbers of pro se clients

All listed metro area counties

Diverse population

many lower-income people end up living in the suburban areas around the twin cities, thus the need for services close to where they are rather than expecting them to come into the city

It should be equal access

I actually think whole state would benefit

It seems like a good idea to test out this project in a smaller area.

I believe this venue would be most appropriate as I feel there are a lot of individuals who cannot afford an attorney in these venues.

access to information and assistance

its the metro area

They know the cases as much if not more than the attorneys

high volume

Majority of State population

There are many people in this area that could benefit from this program because of the lack of finances to pay for an attorney and the lack of assistance that the courthouse offers in this area. the court cases are increasing - and the calendars are very tight - any help would be welcomed.

Huge need for assistance

This would be the most geographically compact area in which to perform a pilot.

low income

County cases

Probably the areas with the most issues in housing, family or creditor/debtor issues.

My selection is based on volume of people needing this service.

This area is populated more densely therefore would have a higher number of individuals needing representation or legal advice.

High volume of low income or indigent clients who need legal assistance

While the central urban areas are visibly affected just based on density, outlying areas face the same issues

These 7 counties make up a good variety of the state population- city and country. I believe you need to start with Hennepin and Ramsey County first and then add the other 5 counties.

This area encompasses a large amount of law firms and paralegals, and likely has the large caseload of work that would fit into the areas considered for the pilot project.

I think that every where would benefit for individuals who cannot afford an attorney

Would assist with the cost and time of attorneys.

I believe this would be beneficial for all areas

High demand, cost of attorney legal services too high for anyone middle-income or lower

I believe in all of these areas there are persons who cannot afford to hire attorneys.

Based on the calls we get, I believe an area larger than just Hennepin and Ramsey would be beneficial.

This is a highly populated area and certainly all of the citizens aren't going to be able to afford attorneys. Access to paralegals who could assist with people with legal services and provide access to the legal system.

There are low income people everywhere who need access to justice

highly populated

I know there's a need for help amongst working class people in the twin cities the public who don't qualify for legal aid but cannot afford to retain a attorney.

More firms in the Twin Cities area

I live in the suburbs and often get asked questions on these three areas of law - and typically it is a simple question and understandably, people are reluctant to approach an attorney and pay large legal fees for something that isn't very complicated.

this is the most populated area of the state

There is a great need. These are the population centers.

More people have moved to the outer counties outside of Minneapolis and St. Paul.

More people this will help take case load off attorneys/legal aid

Probably the greatest need is in the Twin Cities.

Paralegals would be helpful anywhere.

Areas with the most population likely have the heaviest Court case loads.

all 7 counties

I believe everyone should have access.

The need for these services at a more reasonable cost are not defined by where those who need the services live in MN

more people>more poverty

All the Suburbs around the Twin Cities

These are major counties that need as much help as possible, paralegals are mini attorneys and can help in a major way.

High case loads tax other resources whether people may otherwise be able to get assistance. Wait lists for legal aid are long.

Higher population of people so less time for the courts to help as well as more people needing assistance.

There are a lot of people in the 7-county area who are on the border of being able to get help, but they make just a little too much, but not enough to pay for legal services of an attorney. This would fill that gap.

Greater demand

There are many people/cases here that are being handled pro se, where the litigants have very little money, and for which it would be beneficial.

Population centers

everyone can use legal help, likely more users in these counties

More people in the metro area have needs that a paralegal could assist.

lots of people cannot afford a lawyer and need help in the cities

There seem to be a high number of unrepresented litigants in the metro area

I would think Density would be key . . . especially if there's any hope for the pilot project to create any kind of actual market, and not just be a series of Ask a Paralegal advice clinics. Harder to get buyin if it's one person a day who needs 30 minutes of help because there's a lot of overhead in setting up a new service.

There are individuals who lack financial resources in all areas of Minnesota and would benefit from this pilot project.

Many more people are affected and go without legal representation

This way you can have more diversity within the target area and population that is served.

These counties are relatively close to each other. Would have easier access getting to a paralegal if not located in their community.

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Geography Comments: Regional Center

September 25, 2019

These areas are big enough that there are attorneys, but also have a need for additional programs. Could provide cheaper assistance for those who can't afford an attorney and add available resources where there aren't any now significant need in this geography

I know of many people who have unresolved family law issues due to the inability to pay for legal assistance and I know of many people who have had lived in illegal circumstances due to the inability to pay for legal assistance

The problem of unrepresented parties and the lack of access to justice is a state-wide issue.

I think the pilot could be helpful throughout the state and is not geographically specific lower cost

Lots of evictions

This is where housing courts are seeing more cases.

Answer similar to the explanation given for the Twin Cities area.

Clients would likely benefit from improved access to legal services.

All. I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

There are less attorneys in these regions.

Court & legal access is becoming more expensive and PLs would reduce these costs considerably.

The cost and time saving would benefit clients in all areas of the state.

There is a relatively high population of potential users compared to more rural areas but relatively few resources such as those already established in the TC Metro.

Same answer as above, plus there is a much lower number of attorneys in greater Minnesota than in the metro, and this would increase the options and potential for pro bono work if paralegals could also provide these services.

information only

High volume of cases so a paralegal could provide a great alternative where there many not be attorneys available to help or out of reach for many people.

Allow would-be lawyers in these areas to serve their community without having to go away to law school first

All places would benefit from a project that helped pro se litigants be better prepared when coming to court.

We have a history of taking on pilot projects.

There is no reason to limit these services to the Twin Cities.

The courts in general are overburdened and underfunded with regard to these high-volume civil issues, and this problem is worst in higher population areas. A lot of people cannot afford lawyers and at the same time do not qualify for low-income legal services. Having some direction and assistance can streamline the process and save courts time.

The Twin Cities already has a number of ways to help SRL, but areas that are very busy like Rochester, Duluth and Mankato do not have the same resources - but do have the need for them.

Every part of the state would benefit.

There are fewer attorneys to represent parties in this area.

Duluth has a high number of housing cases and this program would benefit our area.

Any area would benefit because the cases would be streamlined better -- efficiency, take on more cases, cost less for the client. Cases only need an attorney should they reach the court level. Family law, especially, should be an administrative matter. If a person appeals the decision, then an attorney needs to step in and represent them in court.

These are areas where there's a higher need for legal assistance.

One of the areas selected for the pilot project should be outside the Twin Cities.

Greater Minnesota has fewer resources for low income clients

It should be equal access

access to information and assistance

Duluth, Virginia, Grand Rapids, Brainerd, Pine City

They know the cases as much if not more than the attorneys

Huge need

low income

There are many more resources available already in the Metro area. Regional centers are accessible to larger populations outside the metro, and to many in rural areas. Rural Western and Northwestern Minnesota also would have a high need.

I think that every where would benefit for individuals who cannot afford an attorney

Would assist with the cost and time of attorneys.

I believe this would be beneficial for all areas

I believe in all of these areas there are persons who cannot afford to hire attorneys.

People in out state don't have as many options for legal services as those in the metro area. Allowing use of paralegals to provide some limited legal services will broaden access to the legal system.

A Regional center is the hub for many legal proceedings, especially creditor/debtor matters, since there is a Federal Court located in them. Also, they are somewhat populated area, but not as big as the metropolitan areas where you have a vast array of options available to you.

There are low income people everywhere who need access to justice

the public who don't qualify for legal aid but cannot afford to retain a attorney.

Limited number of attorneys

The need for these services at a more reasonable cost are not defined by where those who need the services live in MN limited number of legal professional

Greater demand

Legal services handles most of the defendant housing cases. Staff have the expertise. While we don't have housing court in these areas, I believe the case load for evictions would be smaller and better local attorney collaboration.

There is limited affordable legal services for these types of litigants, so there would be a fair amount of litigants who could benefit rather than handling the matter pro se.

Rochester is short on paralegals and attorneys.

Due to lower accessibility of pro bono legal services

less resources and staff

There are individuals who lack financial resources in all areas of Minnesota and would benefit from this pilot project.

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Geography Comments: Regional Center

September 25, 2019

There is a shortage of attorneys in rural Minnesota. If this program can help where there are no, or limited legal help rather than act in competition to the current attorney market, that would be best for all.

Fewer attorneys in out state.

Rural Minnesota lacks many of the support systems and access to affordable justice tools that the Twin Cities and surrounding areas have. The number of attorneys, volunteer attorneys, clinics, self help centers are substantially less available in rural Minnesota.

Services in Rural MN are limited so offering outside the metro would be ever so helpful

St. Cloud area

Rural-only because lawyers in rural areas are retiring and no new attorneys are replacing them. There are many attorneys in the Twin Cities needing clients. This pilot is unfair to them.

It's more likely there's not available assistance in rural aread

Many small towns have no attorney.

Fewer legal resources, increased low income populations (by %), no public transportation, little access to interpreters...so often the last group to receive innovative services

Less likely to have lawyers available.

Could provide cheaper assistance for those who can't afford an attorney and add available resources where there aren't any now

Clients could benefit from lower cost and access to representation, attorneys could benefit in expanding a client base but with the added responsibility of oversight and management of paralegals which might require training (not all attorneys have or need to develop this skill); adding these providers might significantly impact the way legal services are delivered and lead to a restructuring of small firms to remain competitive and whether there are qualified paralegals might determine firm competitiveness and viability

Harder to get legal assistance in the rural communities.

significant need in this geography

Greater likelihood of lawyer shortage.

I know of many people who have unresolved family law issues due to the inability to pay for legal assistance and I know of many people who have had lived in illegal circumstances due to the inability to pay for legal assistance

The problem of unrepresented parties and the lack of access to justice is a state-wide issue.

I think the pilot could be helpful throughout the state and is not geographically specific

low income clients have need

See, Pruitt, Lisa R. and Kool, Amanda L. and Sudeall, Lauren and Statz, Michele and Conway, Danielle M. and Haksgaard, Hannah, Legal Deserts: A Multi-State Perspective on Rural Access to Justice (June 18, 2018). 13 Harvard Law & Policy Review 15 (2018); Georgia State University College of Law, Legal Studies Research Paper No. 2019-01. Available at SSRN: <https://ssrn.com/abstract=3198411>)

Low income clients who are on budgets could benefits from having paralegals do some of the work.

lower cost

lack of attorneys generally

Less paralegal help out there

My colleagues tell me that it is difficult to get younger attorneys to move to the 'outstate' areas; the paralegals could help solve that issue

Lots of evictions

Provide assistance in conciliation court

Fewer attorneys available.

Access to legal representation is often limited in Rural Minnesota. This pilot project would fill a big need for legal assistance in this area.

Clients would likely benefit from improved access to legal services.

Lack of lawyers in rural areas.

Resources are light in rural Minnesota where local offices for legal services for the indigent are either closing or do not offer services. In addition, if a client has to drive for a meeting, it is better to have someone in those rural areas be able to assist than having the client drive for half of a day to receive services. This affects a client's employment or clients are possibly incapable.

the need is great and making additional resources available would help underserved populations

Not enough attorneys.

Fewer attorney options

I am in a town with a population of fewer than 4,000. The closest town with a population of more than 10,000 is one hour away. The closest metro area is two hours away.

All. I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

Expanding legal services in rural areas would be beneficial to rural communities.

There are probably fewer resources currently available in rural Minnesota.

The financial burden and travel costs could be offset with this program

Areas underserved by attorneys

There are just not sufficient attorneys in many rural areas.

Areas where not enough attorneys are available

Court & legal access is becoming more expensive and PLs would reduce these costs considerably.

There are fewer pro bono attorneys in rural Minnesota.

There are not as many lawyers.

Underserved in general (lack of licensed attys)

Because this area does not have the resources that the Twin Cities has.

Rural Minnesota could use more paralegal support due to the overall lack of attorney support in those areas.

We have plenty of lawyers in the metro.

The cost and time saving would benefit clients in all areas of the state. Additionally, in the rural areas of the state, legal assistance would be more readily available if paralegals could take over some of the duties of an attorney, saving traveling time and money.

Fewer low cost options

Lack of professionals in rural mn

Rural Minnesota has folks that are lower income or that don't want to hire one of the two lawyers in town. Allowing a paralegal to come in would allow attorneys who aren't local to provide representation. This Also allows the public to sample outside the 'good ol' boys club' found in small towns.

Few attorneys in rural Minnesota represent persons on low-profit matters.

Based only on rumors, my perception is that attorneys are difficult to find in rural Minnesota.

There tend to be more attorneys and legal professionals located in the Twin Cities and regional centers; it would be helpful to have access to qualified paraprofessionals for rural Minnesotans so they don't have to spend money/time to travel to the nearest regional center.

Where ever there are few attorneys per 100,000 people, and potential law clients have limited resources.

There are not enough attorneys in rural Minnesota to represent the populations out there.

information only

Rural Minnesota lacks the density of resources that exist in the metro area. From my own experience, pro se family law litigants are the rule, not the exception.

There are a lack of lawyers in rural Minnesota, so there would not be a dual system of legal representation. In contrast, urban centers have a plethora of lawyers and all citizens deserve to be represented, by a licensed attorney, in court.

something other than the metro

Rural MN benefits from few pilot projects, yet has some of the most diverse populations based on need, geography, cultural differences, and economic issues. The highest levels of poverty are in Northern MN and there are limited attorneys with limited professional staff resources. Any opportunity to help further develop and support small community resources helps further develop that community.

attorneys are easier to come by in the metro and regional centers. rural areas would benefit the most from increased access to legal services.

difficulty with getting lawyers and access to low cost legal services

There are fewer legal resources in outlying areas. County law libraries and self help centers can be fifty miles away.

There are less/no options in rural Minnesota.

Rural Minnesota has less attorneys per person than the metro or regional centers.

large cities already have lots of pro se clinics, specialty courts etc. for these issues. Even Regional centers have free legal services. Rural MN does not.

I think there is a shortage of attorneys in these areas generally, but especially in the rural areas.

There are fewer stakeholders to get on board with the project.

Fewer attorney options in rural Minnesota.

High volume of cases so a paralegal could provide a great alternative where there many not be attorneys available to help or out of reach for many people.

It's hard enough to find attorneys in these areas...

There are very few private attorneys in rural Minnesota that take family cases or even evictions.

There are a lot of people who may have an agreement on custody, parenting time, etc. and need to get a court order (stipulation signed by a judge) but the system is not set up for parties in agreement to navigate the process.

All places would benefit from a project that helped pro se litigants be better prepared when coming to court.

There are fewer attorneys in rural areas, and incomes tend to be lower, and so increased access to affordable legal guidance could be helpful in rural areas.

Larger number of the population would benefit from lesser fees..

There is more working poor and not a lot of options for attorneys to take low-bono or pro-bono work. Plus, if one party has legal aid and the other does not, there is no incentive for the party who is represented to settle and will more likely go to trial.

There are fewer and fewer attorneys, mainly in Family law, in rural Minnesota. This pilot project would allow for the population in these areas to be better served by allowing Paralegals to be able to assist. This is almost a necessity at this point in our area.

less access to attorneys and other assistance mechanisms, including affordable services in rural areas. Greater access to paralegals could help.

Every part of the state would benefit.

There are fewer attorneys to represent parties in this area.

I believe that family law practice would benefit from broader use of paralegals across the state, but in particular, in rural areas.

Fewer lawyers and fewer clinics/free services available

Sadly there are fewer attorneys practicing in rural mn- having another option would help, but here my concern is supervision. People should be able to obtain high quality, competent assistance regardless of where they live.

Practicing in rural Minnesota I see a significant need for additional avenues of representation.

I believe there are less practicing attorneys in general in Rural Minnesota. In addition, I believe there specifically less 'junior' level attorneys in Rural Minnesota. In my opinion, it sounds like the work that would be completed by this pilot project is the same type of work that would be completed by a 'junior' attorney.

Any area would benefit because the cases would be streamlined better -- efficiency, take on more cases, cost less for the client. Cases only need an attorney should they reach the court level. Family law, especially, should be an administrative matter. If a person appeals the decision, then an attorney needs to step in and represent them in court.

Paralegals can help bridge the representation gap in rural MN.

Attorney's in rural Minnesota are difficult to find and legal aid does not visit rural courthouses on a regular basis

IT is where i work so i can not comment on the other, but we are understaffed and a paralegal being able to do things they are capable off would lighten the load.

Access to attorneys (both privately paid and through Legal Services) is limited in rural areas.

These are areas where there's a higher need for legal assistance.

It seems there is no shortage of lawyers in the metro area and a reasonable number work for below-market rates, but rural areas may benefit from additional legal resources.

Scarcity of nearby legal resources would make rural Minnesota a good location for the project.

Fewer outstate lawyers to assist people.

Access to legal help might be limited due to fewer attorneys

There is not enough help in the rural areas with many legal needs. And frankly, there's not enough legal help to help poor people in any area. Though, giving them someone who is not an attorney is not necessarily giving them effective help.

Outstate Minnesota has a paucity of legal representation and many debtors

Access to justice for indigent persons in rural communities could be improved.

There is a dearth of attorneys in rural Minnesota.

There are fewer legal resources for a person in Rural Minnesotas.

Shortage of attorneys in rural Minnesota.

The attorney shortage is greatest in rural MN

Within 100 miles of the Metro as the economic landscape changes, and trade wars linger, many rural citizens are likely in need of assistance with financial issues

It should be equal access

access to information and assistance

It is extremely difficult to recruit attorneys to practice in a rural area. Legal paraprofessionals would help expand the ability of a small firm to offer services.

Bemidji

Rural Minnesota has a lower percentage of lawyers than the metro with less access to services such as legal aid.

They know the cases as much if not more than the attorneys

I have a belief that these are underserved areas

Legal services in rural MN are not as easily obtained, so I'm told.

I think the Rural areas would benefit the most because their courthouses do not supply attorneys to the building to help on preparing documents and assisting. This area would be most beneficial. Also, the income is much lower typically in this area, so the clients would benefit from that.

Huge need, few attorneys

Due to the lack of attorneys that practice in the area and distance to courthouses

There are plenty of legal programs in the Twin Cities and surrounding Counties; Sherburne, Stearns need assistance.

low income

Lack of attorneys available in the rural outstate areas.

It's where I live.

I think that every where would benefit for individuals who cannot afford an attorney

Would assist with the cost and time of attorneys.

I believe this would be beneficial for all areas

Cost of attorney legal services too high for rural community

I believe in all of these areas there are persons who cannot afford to hire attorneys.

People in out state don't have as many options for legal services as those in the metro area. Allowing use of paralegals to provide some limited legal services will broaden access to the legal system.

It would allow for there to be additional options for people to gain representation where there are not many options.

There are low income people everywhere who need access to justice

I've heard that it's very difficult to find attorneys in rural mn

the public who don't qualify for legal aid but cannot afford to retain a attorney.

Less access to the court system due to lack of finances or the ability to travel.

I think that people in rural MN often feel overlooked and not offered the same services as those in 'the Cities'. There are many indigent people in rural MN who may not have access to legal assistance.

Limited number of attorneys

More need for affordable legal services.

Rural Minnesotans likely have more limited incomes to be able to retain an attorney's services outside of county law workshops not a lot of options

I believe everyone should have access.

The need for these services at a more reasonable cost are not defined by where those who need the services live in MN

Fewer and fewer lawyers practice in rural Minnesota. Allowing supervised paralegals to assist would enlarge the pool of available legal help.

There is a rapidly decreasing number of attorneys practicing in Rural Minnesota, many of the hearings presented in court are uncontested and could be easily performed by a legal paraprofessional e.g.

uncontested probate hearing or assisting a conservator with annual accountings. The demand for legal services are growing because there are a limited number of licensed attorneys.

fewer attorneys

because there are limited resources in general limited number of legal professionals

Rural Minnesota doesn't have as much access to legal sources as the cities, paralegals would help fill that gap.

Clients in rural MN have less access to legal services and less income available to pay for legal services. The expanded use of paralegals would allow more access to professional legal services at a lower cost to the client than if they had to pay the usual hourly rates for attorney work.

Fewer attorneys available

ALL of the legal services clinics exist in a metro area or smaller city. None exist in smaller communities. Plus, small town and solo attorneys in Rural areas lack the capacity to cover all the practice areas they're expected to handle. Having one of these paraprofessionals in smaller communities, even to assist a client to get prepared before they meet with an attorney in a city if they end up needing that, would make a huge difference in these smaller communities.

being outstate doesn't mean issues don't apply, the hard part of course is that there are fewer lawyers and paralegals. Consider on line and web conferences

Attorneys are leaving and no one is replacing them.

It seems the rural areas are in most need of legal professionals. Urban areas of MN have larger numbers of atty's available

Our office is based in Grand Rapids (i.e., not a regional center).

To help address shortage of attorneys in those regions

Due to lower accessibility of pro bono legal services

there are very few resources for people who need it in rural Minnesota less access compared to large cities

less resources and staff

There are individuals who lack financial resources in all areas of Minnesota and would benefit from this pilot project.

There are less choices for attorneys.

Not as many attorneys

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Geography Comments: Other

September 25, 2019

I do not believe this concept is a good idea. Allowing others to do attorney work devalues a law license. Profession is already under attack from AI and computerized systems.

They won't benefit

While I suspect rural communities have the most to gain from any access initiative, I don't think geography or proximity to lawyers/paraprofessionals should be the only factor in measuring need. State-wide.

None

You're assuming there would be a benefit. Your questions are phrased poorly.

This seems like jumping the gun. You will find more potential paraprofessionals and attorneys willing to use them in the metro area but there are barely any attorneys in the rural areas.

Awful framing of question, as with previous question, especially for those who believe that this is not appropriate. Presupposes support.

Thank you for giving an 'other' option. I still have difficulty with legal assistants or paralegals giving legal advice. It's hard enough dealing with individuals who received poor advice from an attorney. I hate thinking what would happen when someone receives poor advice from a paralegal--with the attorney responsible for the advice.

I believe that paralegals can benefit clients throughout Minnesota without regard to geography.

I don't believe that clients would benefit from this project. I have worked in all three areas, and find them all to be relatively complex. Most clients need an attorney to make the most informed decision. Even with my best paralegal, she was unable to appreciate small facts which changed the tenor of the case remarkably. No matter what the rules say, courts give deference to unrepresented parties, and having a paralegal would diminish that deference, without providing actual representation.

All would benefit equally. The issues of access to justice or the high cost of legal representation are not unique to any community or geographic local.

I think this project is a terrible idea. We have TONS of lawyers in Minnesota, and lawyers are licensed professionals with a minimum knowledge and education level - and there are STILL bad lawyers. Telling poor people to get their legal advice from paralegals is rude to them and dismissive of the legal profession.

Rental tenants get evicted everywhere.

I'd look at whether pro se parties tend to be from the metro area or out of state.

This is a terrible idea that is going to result in more people turning to self employed paralegals to help with 'simple' cases that are not actually simple. People will go for a 'cheap' alternative and wind up in significant financial trouble when creditor-debtor, and especially family law matters, are mishandled.

Client will not benefit from having unqualified non-attorneys do legal work

Anywhere in Minnesota

None of Minnesota would benefit from this pilot program. This survey is skewed toward accepting the program and assumes the program is a good idea. It is not. It is a disservice to the profession and to clients to allow those untrained in the law or subject to the obligations of the profession to act as advocates in creditor/debtor, housing or family matters. All of these matters have collateral consequences beyond resolution of a particular case and non lawyers are not equipped to provide full and complete advice regarding such consequences. Time and effort would be better devoted to developing newly admitted lawyers to provide services for these cases. Develop a pro se project.

Structure an internship program. It doesn't matter what form -- just make sure that we use licensed, trained lawyers to practice law.

Must be statewide to begin. Totally unfair to provide more services in the Twin Cities if a whole system change is being proposed

All of the options and all for same reasons - needs exceed availability of professional support and many paralegals are better than some lawyers and know day to day how things work

Again, to what 'clients' is the question referring? How is geographic location related to whether the services would be useful or effective?

I am concerned that this proposal will benefit anyone.

I don't think the paraprofessional project will benefit clients. This survey is not designed in a way to allow lawyers to select 'none' as an option or to voice concerns about non-attorneys practicing law in some very difficult practice areas. The MSBA previously has expressed concern about this project. The survey should allow attorneys to answer in a way that is not in the affirmative.

The whole state could benefit-you don't have to be inner city to have legal issues, there are poor people all over the state. Personally I'm tired of everything focusing on inner city.

I think all places in MN would benefit, why just limit it to one area when every where needs more support.

I am not convinced any clients would benefit from this pilot project.

Wherever courts/judges/staff would be most amenable to participate in a pilot.

None. A person without a JD and law license should NEVER provide legal advice or counsel period. This survey is poorly designed and clearly biased/tainted in favor of permitting uneducated and unlicensed people to provide legal advice and counsel. This should NEVER be permitted; it is a logical fallacy to even claim it can occur under the supervision of a licensed attorney--that simply is not possible to govern.

Hard to know - larger areas have more clients so more need....but also more resources. Paras could be used for more simple/streamlined cases. Rural areas have less clients, but less resources and attorneys. Paras could be used to fill the gap of legal resources in rural locations.

As long as a paralegal is directly supervised by an attorney; being able to draft simple family law forms would be beneficial; however, if child support and/or property analysis is required, then attorneys should be more involved. Attorneys, NOT paralegals, should appear in court because final settlement agreements may need to be tweaked and/or renegotiated.

I am adamantly opposed to the use of paralegals for any type of legal representation. Paralegals provide an extremely valuable service to the legal system by providing SUPPORT to attorneys, government agencies, as well as corporations by researching legal precedent, conducting investigative work on cases, as well as preparing legal documents for the licensed attorney to review. The ultimate liability is on the attorney for any misinformation regarding the law or an individual's possible cause of action in any given area of the law. Attorneys go through a rigorous educational program (i.e. must have a four year degree, a high GPA, and a proficient LSAT score) prior to entering law school which is at minimum a three year commitment) AND are then required to take the bar exam and pass in order to become an attorney. A typical paralegal program is at most two years and accreditation is irrelevant, as paralegal education is not mandated under Minnesota law. Each of us plays an integral role in the justice system and I strongly encourage you to think not only of the additional number of people who MAY be assisted under this program but rather how many will unknowingly be harmed irreparably if paralegals are allowed to provide legal assistance to individuals.

In what area(s) of law do you or your office practice? Other - write in

A variety of civil law	Bankruptcy	Child protection and ICWA
Administrative Law Judge	Bankruptcy and tax controversy.	Civil [x2]
Administrative, labor, OSHA, employment, and workers' compensation.	Bankruptcy, Criminal Defense	Civil law, Criminal defense
Adoption/Juvenile protection	Bankruptcy, Real Estate	civil legal aid - so all areas of poverty law
Agricultural law, banking law, business law, criminal defense, guardianships & conservatorships, probate & trust law, real property law, tax law, etc.	Broad array of civil litigation.	civil lit, criminal defense
all [x8]	Business [x3]	Civil litigation [x14]
all low-income civil matters	Business & Estate Planning	Civil Litigation, Corporate Transactional, and IP
All of the above and other poverty law areas including criminal expungement, bankruptcy, immigration, etc.	Business and commercial law	Civil litigation, criminal prosecution, tax protest, condemnation, child support, protective services unit, victim witness, many areas that local county governments represent the citizens and community
all of the above plus Estate planning, Probate, Employment, Real Estate, criminal and a couple others	Business and estates and trusts; employment, litigation	civil litigation, estate litigation
all relevant corporate areas for a major corporation	Business Law, Education Law, Corporate Law, Litigation	Civil Litigation; Corporate; Appeals
Any legal area that patrons ask about	business law, litigation, employment law	civil litigation; probate; estate planning appellate	Business law, tax law, litigation, trust and estate, and real estate	Civil probate criminal appellate in the areas of criminal, civil, family and immigration	Business litigation, corporate law, and similar business-orientated areas	Civil rights
Banking Law	Business real estate litigation	civil, estate planning
Banking Regulation	Business Transactional	Civil, many areas generally
Banking; Estate; Probate	Business, Corporate, Real Estate, Estate Planning	Civil, real estate, estate and trusts, guardianships/conservatorships, and criminal
	Business, estate planning, elder law	Class action plaintiffs-side cases
	Business/Commercial Law
	Charitable trust and estate planning

Commercial contracts	Contracts, health Care, real estate, litigation	criminal and immigration commercial in-house		criminal but I have done family law
Commercial law, Advertising law, Regulatory	Contracts; agricultural law
Commercial law, Municipal law	Corporate [x13]	Criminal Defense [x3]
Commercial litigation [x4]	Corporate (corporate governance, regulatory, litigation, contracts)	Criminal defense, but I have taught paralegals for several years.
commercial litigation, employment law, real estate transactions, criminal defense, privacy law	corporate advice and litigation	criminal defense, juvenile
Commercial, real estate, probate	Corporate and intellectual property	Criminal Defense, Personal Injury
Commercial/corporate/trans actions - what ever a company need but legal team is very active with VLN	Corporate and IP litigation	Criminal law and Licensure
Complex business litigation, IP litigation	Corporate counsel	Criminal Prosecution complex civil litigation and transactional work; white collar criminal defense	Corporate governance	Criminal Prosecution for the City
Compliance and civil litigation	corporate law department	criminal prosecution, civil forfeiture
Compliance and corporate governance	Corporate law firm	Criminal, administrative Constitutional Law	corporate, business litigation, estate planning	Criminal, civil litigation construction	Corporate/Business	Criminal, civil, juvenile Construction and contract law	Corporate-Commercial-Real estate-Estate Planning	Criminal, estate planning, corporate construction litigation	Corporation	criminal, juvenile, civil
Contracted Tribal Representation	corporation - so business	criminal/civil municipal law
Contracts [x2]	County	Delinquency, Probate
	County Attorney [x6]	diversity and inclusion
	Courts	Domestic/sexual violence law
	courts-general jurisdiction	Elder Law, Estate Planning, Guardianship, Probate, Trusts
	Criminal [x16]	Election law
	Criminal and civil government	Eminent Domain, Data Practices
	Criminal and civil government related issues.

Eminent domain, probate/estate collection and litigation.	estate planning, business litigation	General business/construction/real estate
Employment [x6]	Estate Planning, Criminal Defense	General civil advice for the county
Employment and corporate law	estate planning, personal injury	General civil litigation
Employment and financial services	Estate planning, probate	General comprehensive practice
Employment and Immigration	Estate Planning, Probate, Criminal, Litigation, Real Estate, Contracts, Business Formation and Governance	general contract, business and property law
Employment and Labor	estate planning/probate	general corporate
Employment law/ERISA	Estate Planning/Probate/Elder Law/Guardianship	General corporate law, IP, environmental and financial regulations,
Employment, consumer, ERISA	estate planning/probate/guardianship/conservatorship/real estate	General legal aid
Employment, non-compete, business and business owner	Estate, Probate, and Elder Law	General poverty law employment, other	Estates, probate, ChiPS	General practice [x6] employment, product liability, personal injury, tort, workers compensation and compliance	Ethics	General Practice excluding Family Law
employment, public benefits	Examiner of titles	government [x5]
Energy law	Financial	government employee, do not practice
Energy law, regulatory	Financial Services	Government, administrative, contract
Entrepreneur Law (all legal areas except debtor rep in bankruptcy)	Full service	I also have a contract Paralegal business in which I do mediations for civil and family matters.
Estate and probate	Full Service Law Firm [x2]
Estate planning [x6]	General [x4]	I am at SMRLS - including Government Benefits, Family, Housing, Elder Law, Education law, Immigration, Agricultural Workers Program, plus volunteer attorney program - handling consumer & other areas
Estate Planning & Administration	General business services, litigation, creditor-debtor law, and family law
Estate Planning and Administration, Elder Law
Estate planning and probate

I am in a law library--we offer information in all areas of law	In-house, insurance - product development, support, and operations	Litigation - Mass Tort, Drug & Device, product liability, business litigation, corporate
I do family law, others tend to represent the landlords or creditors. General all-practice area firm.	Insurance [x5] Insurance benefits disputes	Litigation - personal injury, etc
I work for the judicial branch, so I don't practice in any areas.	Insurance defense [x4] Insurance Defense and Civil Litigation	Litigation, corporate, general practice Litigation, insurer defense
I work in a healthcare company and specialize in regulatory compliance.	Insurance defense. Employment law. Business law. Products liability. Construction litigation.	Litigation; Professional Ethics Many misc. government
I work in a personal injury / criminal defense practice. My mother is a paralegal with 30 plus years of experience in family law. I know the work that she produces is better than what a lot of the attorneys are doing.	Intellectual property [x3] Intellectual property; contracts IP and business law Judge Judicial officer	Multiple (County Attorney's Office) Municipal [x2] Municipal law, criminal prosecution, criminal defense, family law. Municipal law, including employment and labor law
I work in the Civil Commitment area, but being in a government setting, the office itself practices in all areas.	L&E, product liability, corporate and business litigation, health care labor and employment Labor and Employment law	My division handles child protection cases. My primary focus is real estate issues right. I spent four years in private practice with 80% of the workload on housing related issues and creditor-debtor law.
Immigration [x4] Immigration, criminal defense	labor and employment OSHA; commercial contracts; corporate M&A	n/a [x6]
immigration, education, farm, public benefits, Social Security	Lawyers Professional Liability/Insurance Defense	No longer practicing
Immigration; Criminal Defense	legal aid -- lots of random stuff Legal publishing.	none None - software company
In-house	Litigation [x4]	None of the above nonprofit not law office

other [x2]	Probate, conservatorship, real estate, guardianship, estate planning, corporate	business-corporate, governmental
Other legal services		real estate, estate planning
Our firm provides legal services to governmental entities in the State of Minnesota.	Probate, Trusts, Wills, Taxation	real estate, estate planning, business, tax, probate
Pensions and employee benefits	probate. trusts. tax. other.	Real Estate, etc.
Personal injury [x7]	Probate/Estate Planning	real estate, probate & trust, estate planning, municipal, business
Personal Injury and Criminal Defense	Probate/Estate Planning	Real estate, tax, business, etc.
Personal injury, medical malpractice, class actions, civil rights, products liability	Probate/estates; personal injury; criminal; corporate	regulation [x3]
personal injury, workers compensation, Social Security Disability, Long term disability insurance disputes, and general litigation	Product liability	Regulatory Banking matters
Plaintiff injury law	Product Liability Defense	restraining orders, also provide general advice at clinics
Pretty much every practice area, but not family law	Product liability litigation (defense)	seniors law, disability law, public benefits law, immigration, other consumer
Primarily Personal Injury Defense and No-Fault	Professional defense	Social Security
Privacy [x2]	Real Estate, Estate Planning	Social security disability (administrative)
Private corporation, all areas relevant	Real estate [x2]	Social Security; Elder Law
Probate [x2]	Real Estate and Construction Litigation	Special education
Probate & Estate Planning [x2]	real estate and environmental	Tax, Business and Estate Planning
Probate and Mental Health	Real estate and landlord/tenant	tax/probate
Probate and Tax	Real Estate, Administrative Law, Environmental Law	Tax; estate planning
Probate Trust Real Estate	Real Estate, Bus, Corp. Litigation, Construction	Transactional and litigation matters for the University of Minnesota.
	Real estate, business, estates	Trust and estates [x2]
	Real Estate, Business, etc	Various
	Real estate, corporate, estate planning real estate, eminent domain, wills and trusts, probate,

We are a full service firm.

we cover most areas - all of the above plus municipal, banking, real estate,
software, transportation, litigation etc

We have 145 attorneys

we practice in nearly every area

Wide variety, but usually on the creditor's and housing owner's side

Wills and trusts, real estate, and business law

Workers Comp, Insurance
Defense, Construction Litigation

workers' compensation

Workers' Compensation,
Construction, personal injury, railroad

Workers' Compensation,
Personal Injury, employment discrimination

workers' compensation, soc.
sec.

Paraprofessional Pilot Survey Open-Ended Comments

September 25, 2019

The Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project Implementation Committee is looking for ideas about where to pilot this program. If you're aware of projects or programs in Minnesota working to provide more legal services to underrepresented parties that could benefit from the expanded work of paralegals, please describe the program/project and if know, contact information.

Neutral or positive comments:

I only know of attorneys who would love to have more clients. I suppose the law librarians could use paralegals to assist them with the 100s of people who funnel through the library wanting free legal help.

CCLI (Collaborative Community Law Initiative)--651-321-9255

I am not aware of projects or programs available for underrepresented parties, but I am a former paralegal with a bachelor's degree from Winona State. If it is decided that a bachelor's degree should be a requirement for the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot project, I would suggest looking in the Winona area for piloting it because you would have access to very qualified paralegals.

I would start with pro bono service areas like VLN and Legal Aid

Collaborative Community Law Initiative

the Olmsted County Eviction Prevention Project (EPP) provides advice and representation to eligible tenants being evicted in Olmsted County Court... this project (or a similar project) might benefit from expanded work of paralegals. For more information about the EPP contact Brian Lipford at the SMRLS Rochester office at (507) 292-0080 or brian.lipford@smrls.org

Tubman; possibly Amicus or other ex-offender programs can help with housing and employment discrimination issues, family reunification/visitation disputes; driver license (e.g. work permit) issues; and banking or debt-relief issues. Hamline-Mitchell has a program to help low income people.

General practice including real estate and corporate work

Home Line is a tenant rights organization that could likely benefit from the use of paralegals as attorney extenders.

Legal Assistance of Olmsted County has an eviction clinic held before housing court. It has been successful and a good community resource.

I work with the Volunteer Lawyers Network, representing indigent Hennepin County residents in housing matters. It's a great organization. They use paralegals, but they are essentially limited to client intake when they could do so much more.

Volunteer Lawyers Network, perhaps Legal Services Corporation.

Self help Program 10th Judicial District

The wills for heros program is always looking for volunteers. They have attorney oversight for all volunteers including attorneys. This would be a good opportunity for paralegals to interact and advise clients in a controlled environment.

Children's Law Center, Any court based self-help center completion of petition and other forms that need to be completed. Review of completed documents to ensure that they are properly completed. Helping individuals to understand legal terminology.

If any, the rural counties. It's difficult to find attorneys willing to travel to said counties.

Self help and document preparation programs.

Rural Minnesota, but only with properly trained and certified paralegals (8th district or possibly arrowhead, Iron Range areas)

I'm watching this project closely. I'm not sure if a paraprofessional would be useful in the sliding scale fee realm or not. As mentioned, so far the people who we've interviewed coming out of paralegal school have been unqualified. Maybe the more qualified ones are looking for way more pay. My contact info is emily@cooperlawmn.com (Emily Cooper - Cooper Law, LLC)

You can't find paralegals in regional hubs let alone rural Minnesota. The only possible place would be the metro area.

Volunteer lawyers network - <https://www.vlnmn.org/>, Muria Kruger is the housing lead attorney

Knowing the standards, ethical, legal and practical, I have extreme concern with allowing someone who is not a license attorney to represent clients in legal settings, but do believe assistance with document preparation, explanation of the process and support could be appropriate.

Ramsey and Hennepin county offers free legal aid counseling once or twice monthly to underrepresented individuals who may or may not need to file bankruptcy. This is not legal advice. Rather it is an initial intake and opportunity to give an individual all the options available to them. It may be a good place for a paralegal to start. They are always short staffed and looking for more volunteers.

I believe Hennepin Cty would benefit the most because they have such a large need and volume of pro se parties.

Southern Minnesota Regional Legal Services is generally unable to take on Family Law matters because of overwhelming need for critical need (housing, benefits, child custody) matters.

I would recommend Sherburne or St. Louis- Duluth. Both counties have judges that are very hands-on and would be able to provide feedback as to the quality of the representation.

Legal Aid Service of Northeastern Minnesota has a paralegal in the Brainerd office who would be a good fit for a pilot program. Brainerd is significantly understaffed for the number of those in poverty that the office serves. This would increase it's ability to provide more service. However, this would require some additional resources to promote this paralegal for the purposes of this pilot project.

Contact Executive Director, Dori Streit, to discuss. dstreit@lasnem.org

Rural areas--- housing law matters (evictions, etc.) and debtor assistance. Some probate and real estate too.

VLN or SMRLS might be a good partner, otherwise the legal incubator program through Mitchell Hamline

Volunteer lawyers network

Any legal aid office, including legal aid svc of NE MN.

This is not a project or program, but Rebecca McConkey-Greene, (218) 606-2226 Duluth, MN has taken a creative approach to parent representation. Her paralegal has social work background, is able to provide support and advocacy during case plan meetings, has assisted clients with obtaining needed services or locating services and making referrals. Can help parent attorney obtain services for parents that are needed - either through formal child protection proceedings, or family law matters and assist with navigating systems. Fathers often benefit greatly from support that is often not available in smaller communities. Places like Bemidji, MN have significantly high overrepresentation of Native Americans in legal systems with few services to assist with other associated proceedings like probate, housing, or family matters.

Law school clinics -- it's not sufficient to rely on pro bono from attorneys. There has to be lawyer staff and administrative staff to support the paralegals who would do this type of work.

Winona State University has a Legal studies major. It develops and trains wonderful paralegals every academic year. These students would be EXCELLENT sources of support for such a program. The Chair of that program is an enthusiastic man with whom I have worked in the past. I am happy to speak to him about this proposal and strongly urge the committee in charge of this program to consider Winona as a location for a pilot program.

I have no doubt this will be thoughtfully done and I have no doubt there are good intentions, but I have done family law in every socio-economic level (and continue to do so). There is complexity at every level. I am concerned that we there should be some specific training for the role they are to undertake. Perhaps there should be some requirement of liability insurance. I have seen attorneys inflict significant harm on a client by mistake. I am very concerned that paralegals would miss things and the injured party would have no recourse. I have the impression that there is a feeling that something is better than nothing but that is not true all of the time.

Under supervision of VLN

There are several Minnesota credit counseling agencies and mortgage foreclosure prevention groups that would benefit from the services of skilled paralegals.

The Office of the Public Defender in every county could benefit from this program assuming paralegals are interested. I'm always looking to expand my role and would love to be able to get more education, more certifications, and do more for the office.

The City of Minneapolis currently is trying to offer legal representation to all tenants facing eviction. There might be an opportunity to pilot an expanded role for paralegals in conjunction with the Housing Court Clinic staffed by Legal Aid and Volunteer Lawyers Network.

several programs that legal professionals can volunteer time within the Mpls area.

Minnesota Adult and Teen Challenge Legal Clinic is a great legal clinic in which attorneys help participates through any family, creditor/debtor, criminal, or child protection legal issues. The attorneys help them fill out the paperwork and get it filed, but they are usually not represented in court.

I believe that this should be piloted in rural Minnesota. This is where it is definitely needed due to access and availability of attorneys in Northwestern Minnesota. Our area has seen attorneys leaving Family law in a heavy pace. This would allow for the public to be better served if it was opened up. An option may be to run it through Legal Services of Northwest Minnesota located in Moorhead, MN.

SMRLS, VLN

Not exactly on topic with the question above, but something worth noting: I think there is a misconception among attorneys that this program would be used to: (1) artificially command higher rates for paralegals in large offices by having paralegals become 'super-certified' and thus be billable at a higher rate - something that would not assist underrepresented communities as is the goal of the program; and (2) would compete with solo/small practitioners who already feel pressure for lower rates based on their client's ability to pay. It is my understanding that this program envisions professionals (not necessarily just paralegals) working under an attorney (i.e. not by themselves) to provide quasi-legal services to low income people (i.e. to people who aren't hiring lawyers in the first place - this isn't taking away paying work from attorneys who already work on a reduced fee basis). Some iterations of the program, however, do involve these professionals working by themselves and not necessarily as part of a law office. The crafting of the program, and where (geographically, area of law, logistically) to implement it , are co-defendant decision-making processes.

Volunteer Lawyers Network

Rural areas -- Sherburne County, Anoka County, Wright County

The federal pro se project is a good model to match clients with licensed, qualified attorneys looking for opportunities for courtroom experience. The concept of having non lawyers advise clients or appear in court is frightening. I worked with many paralegals before becoming a judge -- excellent paralegals who are smart and capable people and excelled at their assigned tasks -- but the skills they develop as paralegals do not translate to the kind of representation, advising and advocacy necessary for proper representation in a court proceeding. They have no malpractice insurance and are not subject to the rules of professional conduct. They may have finished law school but were unable to pass the bar -- or worse, may have been disbarred. I can't imagine this concept will generate meaningful support from the bar, or the law schools, or the bench.

The Supreme Court should be in the business of promoting the legal profession, recruiting qualified, licensed attorneys to provide services for clients -- encourage pro bono work or mentoring programs for new lawyers. The Supreme Court should not be in the business of ignoring our existing resources by looking outside of the legal profession for inadequate substitutes.

I think almost any legal aid would greatly benefit from a program like this.

VLN

Collaborative Community Law Initiative (CCLI) - cclimn.org

I believe that paralegals could be of most use (in what I see) helping people in housing court. I personally helped a landlord (who an older woman working two jobs to pay her mortgage, and renting part of her house out to a family who was not paying and damaging her property). The family, because they were tenants, got free legal aid help, but she got nothing until she came to me. She could and was willing to pay something, but could definitely not afford an attorney. And yet, what she needed was relatively simply information, explanations and help filling out forms/writing a basic letter/putting together an accounting of damages upon move out. Easy stuff, but stuff that was hard for a regular blue collar worker.

One idea is within an existing legal-aid society setting, where more needy people can be served but where generally exists more experience, training and supervision.

Courts- help fill out forms

Legal Aid and Volunteer Attorney Program

None other than volunteer opportunities on MPA website

Probate would be a perfect

Legal Corps

Volunteer Lawyers Network, Legal Corps

HOME Line - (612) 728-5767

Judicare, Central Legal Minnesota, county law libraries

Central Minnesota Legal Services operates a Volunteer Attorney Program from its offices in St. Cloud and Willmar. Jessica Mastellar, Coordinator, (320) 253-0138.

Unmarried Parents Clinics, Expungement Clinics, and Divorce Clinics currently being offered by Legal Aid Service of NE MN. Also, Volunteer Attorney Program being recently merged with Legal Aid.

health care and disability

Negative comments:

This is a terrible idea. The previous questions assume that these areas are proper for non lawyers. There is no option to object to any use of paralegals are you contemplate.

N/A. This program constitutes a danger to the public welfare.

Should not be representing clients in court

Maybe you should focus on making it more accessible to obtaining and affording a law degree.

Rather than allowing paralegals to practice law and take away even more income from rural attorneys you should work on allowing more law schools. if you add more law schools you would force the other schools to compete in obtaining an affordable law degree. Instead of exploring ideas to get more attorneys outstate you have already decided "let's have paralegals do the legal work. Sounds like the community colleges that are hurting for students have lobbied the legislators who play golf with the judiciary. Your mind is already made up this is going to happen but it is outstate who will suffer. Good luck with your endeavors as you will need it.

This program should not be piloted anywhere. It is a bad idea, and it should be abandoned.

The program sounds like a bad idea. Don't do it.

This program is a terrible idea. It puts unqualified people into positions of legal advice to the most vulnerable citizens. It dilutes the value of actual legal professionals. There are shining stars of paralegals, but they are rare. Attorneys cannot even give casual advice to a friend without implicating an attorney's legal and ethical obligations, but this program wants to let non-attorneys give legal advice? This program is a terrible idea.

I do not think it is a good idea to allow non-attorneys to handle legal matters without supervision. Specifically, non-attorneys should not be drafting legal documents without an attorney reviewing them and approving them. A non-attorney should not appear in court on behalf of any party. Allowing a non-licensed attorney to handle these tasks is a slippery slope that will do more harm than help.

IN my experience, the paralegals I work with are not competent to represent clients individually, in any fashion.

This program should not be piloted. It is misguided to allow paralegals to do actual "legal" work, when the irresponsible law schools of the Twin Cities (and nationwide) continue to pump out far more lawyers than are needed already. Couple this with the possibilities for abuse that this program could generate, and it is a looming problem for those on the receiving end of these "services".

Ask the court staff and legal services programs in all counties. And for crying out loud, please study whether this is even going to meet the need that you think it will. I am an attorney with not enough work. I am willing to (and I do) take sliding scale work and limited scope work, and I volunteer. Feels like my law degree is being watered down with this program.

I think this is a waste of time. And - it will take business away from me. What is the purpose of me spending $200,000+ on a law degree ... then encourage me to work in rural Minnesota to provide services to those underrepresented ...if you are just going to allow competitors into my market? (clients will drive for cheap legal advice and clients in rural Minnesota have been conditioned to drive for services to metro and mini-metro areas, this would be no different). You are going to allow competitors into my market that have a lower debt level than me. Nice job focusing on lawyer's stress level...hey, lets bring in competitors that are price competitive and the lawyers can stress about the work they will lose and the rates they can charge!!! - fantastic idea. Now here are some breathing exercises and even though you have to bill hours to make ends meet for you and your staff take time off - wait, now you have to lower your already low rates some more so you have to work more hours to capture the same income level, either you work more and have less time for time away or you make less so you can't afford to take your kids to the Minnesota Zoo! Contradiction in policy goals we call that. What training does a law degree provide that these paralegals don't need? Then remove those requirements from the law school programs and cut classes and reduce lawyer's debts. do SOMETHING that helps lawyers. Not to mention you are begging for lesser quality of work. I don't care that there are a few vocal paralegals clamoring they can provide better service than some lawyers. I am correcting one of the most public paralegals ALL. THE. TIME. Hey, big bad wolf you are nice, right? Nice person you will ever meet, Red! This is why you don't ask people to be objective about themselves...they always over represent their own abilities.

If interested in participating in a focus group to inform the Implementation Committee's decisions about the location, structure, and other criteria for the pilot, please send an email with your contact information to parapilot@courts.state.mn.us. Is there anything else you would like to share with the Implementation Committee for consideration as the pilot project is developed?

Neutral or positive comments:

The project should begin with highly experienced paralegals and it would be desirable to require recommendations from attorneys regarding a paralegal's competency to serve in a more independent manner

I am in favor of the concept in general in order to provide greater access to justice for all.

I work in the Ramsey County Law Library where we hold brief advice clinics for pro se folks--there's a great need to assistance in basic legal areas, and quite often people need help completing court forms

Thank you for taking on this challenge, which is hard to do without critical knowledge of the legal market and without the full support of the bar, solo/small practitioners, and newer attorneys

Allowing paraprofessionals to do legal work for clients is necessary. The Justice Gap is too wide. There are many other professions that are already providing legal services without authorization. I often see botched cases that business advisors, accountants, real estate agents, insurance agents, and the like have created by giving legal advice. People trust these professionals but their advice isn't always the best--and they are not authorized to practice law anyway. So your committee's work is invaluable!

I'm glad you are looking at options.

Prior to working as a medical paralegal, I retired from nursing. I've seen the growing role of physician extenders in health care and have appreciated the way these paraprofessionals increase people's access to health care. Paralegals with advanced training could fill a similar role in expanding access to legal services.

Over the years, I've worked with some really good paralegals. I think the problem with low-income programs for paralegals, especially inexperienced paralegals, is that clients get pushy and angry (even with lawyers) and would worry they need a lot of training on how to deal with that.

Pour system is broken. The legal profession is a self-policed, self-propagating monopoly. Limiting supply keeps prices artificially high. I learned very little of what I need to do my job in law school and I use surprisingly little of what I did learn there. A paralegal with a field-focused 3-year apprenticeship can better serve clients in that field than can a newly-minted lawyer with nary a day in the real world. Expanding the paralegal role would also expand opportunities for bright people that can't afford 7 years of unpaid college. As an added benefit, that lack of formal schooling probably helps one relate to similarly situated clients that don't have the money to spend on a stuffed shirt in white shoes.

I support any creative solution to help historically underrepresented parties receive legal help/representation.

I have a hard time understanding how this new role would work and to whom it would appeal. Is this an entry-level legal position? Would it work for high school debate team alumni, or for law enforcement and legal retirees?

Thank you for reading!

Craig Andresen, Atty., 952-831-1995, craig@andresenlaw.com. 2001 Killebrew Dr., # 150, Bloomington, MN

My mother is a paralegal working in a family law office under a solo practitioner. She's been working there for over 30 years and the quality of the work that she produces is far superior to that of most the attorneys are there. For the majority of the legal professions history in the United States attorneys develop their skills by studying under a licensed practitioner. Allowing a paralegal who has had a certain number of years of experience under an attorney to perform legal work that is more form based would probably be a good thing given the current expense of hiring attorney, the fact that most attorneys have they're paralegals do a lot of the work, and that it's primarily form based.

Other areas of focus that would benefit greatly would be juvenile petty proceedings, employment, and immigration

I worked in law offices almost 20 years before I earned my law degree. I think I have a unique perspective on these questions

The focus should be the greatest good for the greatest number.

The implementation committee should consider expanding legal services at a much higher attorney compensation. Pay would draw competence and passion. A very dedicated attorney could reasonably supervise a cadre of competent paralegals. The infrastructure for doing so is in place through legal services, but the funding is not there. It's hard to attract and keep attorneys for long enough to build a high functioning team when the pay amounts to about half of what other positions are starting at.

I strongly support this pilot project. As lawyers, we are responsible for the devastation visited upon unrepresented parties as a result of our unwarranted restrictions around representation. The injustices that result from repeatedly matching unrepresented parties against represented parties are our fault, and this pilot project should be the start of significant structural changes to remedy that problem.

This is a politically charged topic. Look at how difficult it was to permit non-dentists to provide dental care solo in rural MN.

restrict to info only, not legal advice

You may have to sell this to lawyers afraid of losing clients. I think the key here is to focus on the number of pro se litigants who can get some help that wouldn't otherwise have it. Also helps to compare to medical model—doctors, PAs, nurse practitioners, etc. . Then lawyers can focus on the legal end of the spectrum.

this seems like a good idea to assist more people with legal services

GREAT idea--MUCH needed in rural MN

I would be happy to participate in further surveys or meetings about this. I grew up modestly and families could not afford attorneys. I am concerned about the lack of access as well as the need for quality. Tom Tuft (651) 771-0050 great idea!

I think if done correctly, leveraging the skills of legal professionals who do not have law degrees could significantly streamline some court proceedings. At the same time, we don't want to throw the baby out with the bathwater. A law degree has significant value, and should remain as the standard certification which allows someone to take responsibility for a case with some limited and carefully prescribed exceptions.

Malpractice insurance for individual paralegals

I believe that this pilot project would benefit the State of Minnesota greatly, not only by being able to assist in the maintenance of the workload of attorneys but also to better serve the population.

I strongly encourage you to look at the Ontario Canada model for licensing paralegals. They grappled with training and certification as well as ethical obligations and developed a good program. The difference there is that it is a unified bar- everyone has to be a member.

See Legal Document Assistant (California)

It would be an immense help if the court could develop a definition of 'practicing law' as has been done in other states to help clarify what it is, and what it isn't. There need to be things that only an attorney can do, otherwise the enormous expense of legal education is wasted.

I think it is great that this is being studied. This should ultimately be focused on what court litigants need, not what attorneys are comfortable with, so I hope these survey results are given an appropriate level of skepticism

It is my opinion that we need to consider de-valuing lawyers and the time and dollars spent obtaining their education as well as the experience gained through practice. Without a well-defined paralegal certification of some sort, we are potentially opening up the legal practice to persons without adequate training.

I am not in support of paralegals representing people in hearings, mediations, or other types of proceedings, or giving legal advice. However, I do think they could be utilized greatly for giving out information (not advice), and helping people with forms and such. I also think they can be used well for research and writing, because an attorney can oversee things that are not so 'in the moment' like hearings. I don't believe, based on personal experience, paralegals receive enough training on trial advocacy/court appearances, for that type of work.

If non-attorneys will be allowed to give legal advice, then those individuals should be required to perform under the same rules of professional conduct and same consequences when they fall short. The probate practice again is very paperwork driven and for estates over $75,000 but under even $500,000, people could perhaps afford a paralegal vs. an attorney to handle the administration, vs. family trying to handle pro se, which likely uses more Court personnel time.

I fear the one thing that would potentially hold this program back would be supervising attorneys allowing their paralegals to participate.

Thank you for taking on this project.

I appreciate the willingness to consider this option. I would also recommend trial/court procedure training for paralegals approved to represent clients in court.

really glad you are doing this. Legal costs are too much for the average person, but with the cost of law school and running a firm i don't think we can lower our hourly rates. Paralegals can assist here

I think there should be an ethics part of the process, but not sure what that should be. I have a 4 yr legal assistant degree. Part of my education included a legal ethics class.

I'm happy to assist the committee in anyway - Ann Sullivan, email: ann.sullivan@smrls.org

Consideration should be given to experience and certification with CLE requirements in the specific areas

Great idea to have this pilot project move forward.

I think there needs to be some instruction of paralegals involved in a pilot, such as in ethics and unauthorized practice of law, before a pilot is started.

Negative comments:

DO NOT make this a competition with current attorneys. It is already hard enough to find paying clients, do not make it harder by offering a 'non attorney' alternative. Family law is complex. Frankly, I don't know that attorneys with less than 3 years should practice without supervision, let alone someone who has not completed law school.

Please scrap this hair brained idea. The assumption that there is a qualified group of non lawyers to practice law is flawed. People finish law school and can't pass the bar to practice law and then become paralegals. You want them advising clients and appearing in court? It's a disaster waiting to happen

Why on earth would allow someone who isn't a licensed attorney practice law? I paid nearly $80K for my legal education. Now, all I need is a paralegal certificate? It is already incredibly competitive in the market place. I will now have to compete with less expensive paralegals who are handed clients by my own branch of government, while I spend hundreds on a web site and marketing? I will work with the underrepresented. Why aren't attorneys being offered this work or these clients? I am assuming these paralegals will be paid, and not be volunteering. Pay lawyers first assuming they are willing to accept the work.

This is a bad idea. Practice in court requires a lifetime of learning. This would be a disservice to the public. This is like having an amateur electrician that would burn down your house with faulty wiring. If this comes to pass the practice of law as a profession is over. This is a hare brained idea.

Instead of finding ways to take work away from attorneys, try to find ways to fund the work for low income clients in civil matters, sort of like the public defender office model.

Although I am sympathetic to the plight of many individuals who cannot access legal services, I am not in favor of this expansion because the attorney's license is still on the line if the Paralegal who goes outside the ethical guidelines and I have had experiences where Paralegal's have done so. I am not willing to gamble my license on a Paralegal undertaking any attorney functions unless the Court would license the Paralegal and would NOT punish the attorney if the Paralegal goes outside of the ethical requirements. I know of Paralegals who are good at their job, but WILL push the ethical limits because they have no skin in the game.

While paralegals can be efficient to varying degrees in filling out forms and completing repetitive client documents and become quite knowledgeable through years of experience, I have not found those coming out of a 2 year or 4 year paralegal certificated program to have the skills or knowledge to fully advise a client, 'know what they do not know', or to be able to theoretically provide competent 'representation' as a spokesperson and advisor for the client at a negotiation or hearing. The most knowledgeable paralegals who I have worked with have developed expertise in very limited areas through repetitive familiarity with documents and consistent active supervision by attorneys. Although these individuals have gained the experience to skillfully fill out forms to submit in proceedings, it is difficult to know their skill level unless they would take a comprehensive exam of limited a limited area of law. The do not have such an exam and do not appear to receive the necessary training for a paralegal certificate to undertake legal representation even in a simply narrow area without substantial quality experience. Length of time employed as a paralegal is not by itself adequate and positions of legal secretary, legal assistant, administrative assistant are often held by paralegals and titled 'paralegal' which do not provide the training to act as an attorney even in vary limited areas of practice.

I do not believe that paralegals should be used to replace functions that should be reserved for those trained as an attorney. We can all appreciate the need to save money and provide services to underserved populations, however, that should be a reason to diminish legal services provided by trained attorneys.

I don't like this idea. I think it will end up helping large firms cut out younger lawyers. I don't believe the underserved will actually benefit. I am also worried about protecting the public.

I believe that well-meaning paralegals will not recognize the nuances and unintended outcomes in many family law cases and may do more harm than good. I do not believe it is appropriate for paralegals to appear in court nor negotiate settlements.

I object to this program and programs like it. Such programs serve to increase supply of legal representation. Moreover, paralegals require less education/certification. Thus, a paralegal can hypothetically obtain the similar business to an attorney with fewer resources/debt and charge a lower price. As an attorney, such programs facially are adverse to our business and professional interests. Presumably, this would especially impact small or solo practitioners. Moreover, there would be ethical concerns on the efficacy of paralegal representation when legal advice can be provided without legal degree and corresponding licensure.

I think paralegals drafting and reviewing documents is acceptable, but not giving legal advice, negotiating, or representing clients. Speaking as a former paralegal that is now a practicing attorney, there is a vast difference between the two roles. The education and licensing required to be an attorney and complete the tasks only attorneys are allowed to do is mandated for a reason. Paralegals are essential to the practice of law and a key resource to minimize legal fees to the client, but the line between these two roles should not be blurred. Who will screen paralegals in this program to determine whether they are giving competent legal advice on the possible legal ramifications of the client making a certain decision or whether they simply know how to fill out the form because they have filled it out before? Who bears the liability if the advice given by a paralegal is wrong? The goal of more affordable legal representation is wonderful, but I am not sure this is the best way to achieve that. Too often, the more cost-effective routes are the ones that end up costing the client more in the long run because it was done incorrectly.

I am very concerned about the ethical requirements for the paralegal. Will they be held to the same standard as an attorney? Who is held accountable if they harm a client? What is the disciplinary process?

I would be very hesitant to have a paralegals perform tasks beyond the scope of preparing documents. Allowing paralegals to conduct negotiations, provide legal advice (tasks listed in one of the questions above) appears to be allowing them to practice law without a license.

The reason unrepresented persons are not represented is because they do not have the funds, or are unwilling to pay, for legal representation. Unfortunately, any business, whether paralegals or attorneys, exists to make a profit sufficient to pay its employees at the very least a living wage, and whether you're an attorney or paralegal, you'll find that you cannot live on the amounts this market is willing to pay. These people do not lack representation because there is a lack of attorneys; these people lack representation because NOBODY can make a living on what these people are willing to pay.

Be careful; harm can be done by well meaning but inexperienced folks trying to practice law

It's my understanding Gildea supports this so it's a done deal. Don't waste my time.

I have seen work performed by paralegals in the past, and often times the paralegals with which I have worked have had a misunderstanding of certain laws and how they are applied. Often times the paralegals appear to be essentially secretaries, but it seems that they think they know more than they do. I think allowing them to actually represent clients would be an error. I do not believe it would be beneficial to the clients

I have a concern that these types of paraprofessionals generate a race to the bottom in terms of providing legal services. Without character/fitness reviews, ongoing education, and a limited scope, we risk flooding the marketplace and ultimately damaging professional legal services as a whole. Finally, in my humble opinion, legal paraprofessionals should be attached to larger institutions like a non-profit social service group, a courthouse, or the county law libraries. This would provide credibility, reduce the risk of duplication of services, encourage public participation in the existing frameworks, and potentially reduce the overhead costs of the program. It would also emphasize the social justice nature of the program.

Best of luck!

I really believe expanding their role to appearing in court and other matters beyond what is allowed now is a big mistake!!! Expanding it will not serve clients or the profession well.

Expanding access to justice is no doubt a worthy and necessary cause. I simply urge you not to overlook the potential of our high number of newly licensed attorneys graduating from our three (formerly four) law schools who may simply need a platform to help.

Will paralegals be subject to the same stringent laws as attorneys under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act?

My concern with permitting paralegals representing clients is their lack of knowledge and accountability may actually increase the costs of representation to other litigants. I practice in the area of creditor rights, an area of practice all too often portrayed by anecdotal misrepresentations of events. I receive enough frivolous answers prepared by self help centers and MN Court forms which only delay the inevitable. Where normally I would forgo request for attorneys fees in such situations I will request (and receive) fees to relieve the burden imposed on my client. How will the pilot program protect those it seeks to help from the inappropriate assistance of a paralegal?

In addition there is also the deference to a paralegal by the court in contested matters. In my experience, the court often gives lip service to holding the unrepresented to the same standards as an attorney while then permitting that which not be allowed an attorney, ignoring the court rules, statutes and caselaw.

In my opinion allowing paralegals to do more than they currently do is a dilution of our profession and I am against it.

This program constitutes a danger to the public welfare.

Please stop trying to broaden who can provide legal services to the public. Look at the federal VA claims process to see what kinds of things happen when unlicensed laypersons attempt to practice law.

I worry about further devaluing legal education (law school) and attorney services while many attorneys (myself included) are in significant debt due to JD program

I have serious reservations about lay people practicing law without enough supervision. I think that people who cannot afford a lawyer should still have adequate representation. There is no shortage of attorneys where I practice. There is a shortage of attorneys who charge a reasonable fee for the income of the clients. However, overhead is still there whether one is an attorney or not. Malpractice insurance, rent, etc. do not stop. I try to keep reasonable rates, but I have paralegals at other firms charging almost as much as I charge and most attorneys are charging double or more compared to my rates.

Will this increase available legal services? Or, will it take resources away from one group of professionals to another?

I don't support paralegals representing people in court, mediations, or negotiations due to the fluidity and possibility of unique or complex issues arising that they are not equipped to advise on.

I think this is a slippery slope, particularly if non-lawyers are allowed to do real legal work. I understand the desire to help, but anything beyond filling out forms and providing guidance about the process should require a law degree. We have standards and ethical rules for a reason. As a profession, we should not bend those rules because we want to help. The answer is to get attorneys to do more pro bono work - not to allow non-attorneys to practice law.

Better to more boldly incentivize innovation and regulatory reform in Minnesota than to tinker at the paralegal level.

Stop taking away our business. There are plenty of legal clinics, etc. to help. I volunteer a lot.

It looks as if you have already made up your mind by the questions of This survey so why bother asking

Most paralegals with whom I have worked (many, both in office or opposing counsel's paralegals) don't have the knowledge or judgment to make lawyer decisions. Maybe 5-10% of the paralegals out there are super-qualified and could do so. They are the ones I have urged to go to law school but they either don't want to spend the money or shirk from the responsibility. As a family attorney, I take offense that family is even on the list. There are some no kids, no real estate, no assets other than "a car and a toaster" cases that most paralegals could handle unsupervised. There are many cases where a domineering husband has convinced his wife not to seek spousal maintenance but she should, for example. (Major problem with some minority populations). It is very important to have people with the judgment to question the parties' "agreements" drafting papers.

I am an attorney of 13 years and work side by side on a daily basis with paralegals, most of whom are early in their career. Many of the people we provide service to need assistance with the areas of law that are being considered as part of this pilot. Although the paralegals provide valuable service I do have significant concerns about giving them too much independence, especially in conducting legal analysis. There is a stark contrast between the analytical skill of the paralegals in our office and the attorneys in our office (some of whom are also early in their careers).

This survey appears to be rigged to support a conclusion reached in advance.

I am very worried about this, I do not think expanding the role of a paralegal would result in good legal services to underrepresented parties

This is a bad idea, and there is a better solution. Civil Gideon cannot and should not be created by judicial fiat; rather, meaningful civil Gideon can only be created by legal precedents, probably from the US Supreme Court.

Paralegals are integral to the practice of law and a quality paralegal is invaluable to a firm or legal department. However, paralegals are not attorneys or law students (i.e. a group training to be attorneys and, thus, allowing them to practice law while supervised makes sense). I am concerned about blurring the line for who can engage in the practice of law and what that will mean for our legal system as a whole. In short, based on the information I have, I disagree with this pilot and would rather see effort put towards incentivizing attorneys to do more pro bono work for underrepresented parties.

I think this survey has an answer in mind and is not really interested in attorneys opinions but how the program will be implemented. I think this is wrongfully being forced on the profession and is a very bad idea.

I think more could be done to engage attorneys for Legal work.

These are complex areas of law (particularly in family law) and opening the door to "very low cost" legal services will have clients further objecting to anything but 50-100 dollar wills and complimentary consultations. This issue is bad enough without adding paralegals in the mix.. This program is a Terrible idea.

Terrible idea.

This is a bad idea and should not move ahead.

I believe allowing paralegals to practice law without a license would be an ethical violation and must be strictly limited and have supervision by licensed attorney.

I am generally not in favor of this program. My view is that legal services should be performed by a lawyer. what is needed is better funding for Legal Aid and his project could even divert needed funds for Legal Aid programs. The VAP program in Duluth has been quite a success and our firm has put steadfast hours into being involved. I just did a 6 hour hearing on rather complex issues in such a matter. It needed a lawyer.

Legal advice and representation are not appropriate for the paralegal role. There are plenty of forms and procedural questions paralegals can answer and frankly know better than attorneys, but entering into negotiations, settlement, action steps, future repercussions of legal decisions - they are a separate thought process and the whole point of legal training. Most paralegals are capable of studying and taking the Bar exam, but without some measure, it is a recipe for disaster to open the field to ALL paralegals to provide legal advice - ESPECIALLY in family law. The irritating idea that it is the easiest area of the law and anyone can do it has GOT to be rooted out. It is dangerous to Minnesota's children to include family law in such a program.

This takes away from the education and work done to receive a law degree. Paralegals should not be providing legal advice.

It is always good to see those who have secure positions, as do members of this committee, envision ways to make less secure the positions of others. The problem is not that there are not attorneys to represent the un(der)represented. The problem is one of fees. Attorneys, like judges, work for a living. They cannot take all cases on a pro bono basis. Your committee is suggesting a program that would significantly devalue the JD for a significant percentage of the practicing population. Again, that might look noble from your perch. From the bottom looking up (i.e., from the solo practitioner's view), however, it is akin to pulling the rug out. It is not at all clear that you would be addressing the primary problem. Rather, you would simply be creating a larger group of for-pay 'professionals,' thereby reducing hourly fees. That might work well for paralegals, but it is not so helpful to those who invested in a legal education. It also would not address the issue for the vast majority of pro se parties--the complete lack of resources. Rather than devalue the JD degree, you might consider better funding non-profit legal services.

I think this is a bad idea. I would much rather see foreign law school grads admitted to the bar after a one year LLM degree here.

This seems like a slippery slope to incompetent representation.

The liability exposure created with this opportunity. Is concerning. There is no error/ommission, pro cardinal liability or malpractice type insurance available to paralegals because they do not hold a license.

I am not sure housing law is an appropriate area for paralegals as it relates to rep'ing tenants in Court. Certainly, not appropriate for rep'ing LLs. Currently, there are many lawyers in housing court rep'ing tenants that do not understand housing law. The lawyers from VLN and Mid MN Legal Aid are sometimes not competent to represent the tenants they represent. They fill out canned Answers and documents and send litigants into Court with documents they do not understand. I think paralegals will do the same thing and it will not be helpful in housing cases. I am not sure paralegals could represent Tenants in the current environment just due to all the nuance in housing law. Maybe 1st appearances? I believe housing law is the most contentious, adversarial, and litigated among LL and T cases. It demands persons with experience - not some paralegal under the supervision of an atty that has never done housing law. Since the Supreme Court has denied the hybrid rule that was proposed by the 2nd and 4th districts re representation of corporate entities by attys at trials, I am not sure paralegals add anything to the equation except more confusion and problem for LLs.

This program is a terrible idea, and it harms both the legal profession in Minnesota and Minnesota's most vulnerable citizens.

Please consider civil Gideon as an alternative. The idea that poor people should be represented by anything less than a licensed attorney is offensive. For example, should a consumer bring a Fair Debt Collection Practices act against one of my clients, my first step will be to remove the matter to federal court. Not only is it unlikely that the federal courts will allow a non-attorney to appear, a non-attorney would struggle to comply with the procedural and substantive hurdles that a federal court action would entail. Even if debt resolution does not necessarily implicate an FDCPA action, a civil litigant is at a disadvantage if they are not advised of the possibility of such an action before executing a release of claims related to resolution of the underlying debt.

I would also note that Hennepin and Ramsey county already have a housing court project that would allow non-attorneys to represent people. Although these 'agents' do fine at initial appearances, once they have to introduce exhibits into evidence and comply with the rules of civil procedure, their sheen of knowledge quickly falls apart.

Non-lawyers should not practice law in the State of Minnesota. Instead, these resources should be dedicated to providing people with qualified counsel.

There are plenty of unemployed actual lawyers with licenses who would be happy to accept paralegal wages in a full time job with benefits. Rather than saddling the disadvantaged with legal advice/representation from someone who does not have the fundamental education to get a law license, why not just advocate a job class for lawyers where they are paid less, with less responsibility? I would absolutely do that job after retirement, and I know many younger, unemployed lawyers who would jump at it. I also regularly see Family lawyers who cannot understand the current complexities of the shared income guidelines and PEA, even in simple cases. Why would less legal education help pro se parties? Baby boomer lawyers like me can't carry the load we once did, and many of us would love a limited job, with paralegal wages to keep a hand in, but reduce stress. Many new lawyers are forced to hang out a shingle as a solo, before they have any competence at all, because they can't get hired. There are many, many of us who would be happy to take this less stressful job, for a fraction of the money.

There are large numbers of attorneys in the metropolitan areas that are underemployed - temporary e-discovery, Small contract jobs, or doing work outside the legal profession. Find a way to utilize this attorneys in large population areas. Use paraprofessionals sparingly in practice areas where formally trained legal expertise is not available.

I have deep concerns about this - I am an immigration attorney and it is VERY COMMON for bad actors to hold themselves out as 'notarios' and provide incorrect legal advice that results in clients's being removed from the United States or it being impossible to fix problems. I view this as a slippery slope and I believe the only professions who should be allowed to provide unsupervised legal services in Minnesota should be licensed attorneys.

The existing system is there for a reason. These areas have significant impacts on people's lives. If the cost of an attorney is too high, then the State should look at reducing the costs to produce attorneys by condensing law schools, reducing costs for law school for individuals servicing low income areas, or offering money to defray legal costs. Handing the lives of Minnesota Citizens to underqualified legal service providers is poor planning.

The only legal services a non-lawyer should be providing is making copies!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!! This is a farce!!!

I am concerned about creating a two tier or two class system for our citizens where the wealthy and poor have lawyers, but middle class are relegated to less appropriate representation. As the Court said in the desegregation cases 'Separate is not equal'.

Quality paralegals are difficult to find. Most of the ones that I have worked with require quite a bit of oversight and supervision and/or don't have the level of detail needed for this type of position so I have concerns about this pilot project. I do not think it is a good idea to allow paralegals to handle negotiations, legal advice to clients, court appearances, etc.

Having non-attorneys perform attorney work .. if the ultimate goal is to reduce the lawyer population in Minnesota - great job!

Look at the legal aid services in the rural areas and compare them to the cases chosen in the twin cities. The working poor does not get any options and they are the ones that get further into debt and make it difficult for anyone to stay in these areas to practice.

I have background knowledge about this project based on my bar association, but for those that don't, this survey was not set up to provide the committee with useable answers. Little background information was given on what the answer choices mean, and the answer choices did not encompass all possible answers (ex: 'None' was not a possible choice for the question about what areas of law would benefit). Many of the answers are dependent on what exact program is implemented - for example, 'representation at a hearing' is not something that I would delegate to a paralegal if it meant a regular trial, but I would not have a problem if that meant assisting pro se parties at a conciliation court hearing on a debt collection calendar. All that to say: whatever results you get from this survey, take them with a grain of salt.

My concern about this option is that it will disadvantage new lawyers who will be phased out of this type of work by people who will be able to get this work at a cheaper rate than they can afford to (and are entitled to) provide.

This is a terrible idea

I will again say that giving people who cannot afford an attorney lesser legal services is not the way to really solve the problem. A lot of the ideas asked here about what tasks a paralegal could/would perform appear to be the unauthorized practice of law, which is unethical. I understand there is a definite need for good legal help, but throwing paralegals at the problem is not the way to go. I love the paralegals I work with, but there is no substituting them for attorneys.

not super comfortable with this idea...

I am not sure if paralegal certification would include how to represent a client in court. Even though I passed the bar exam, only actual court experience prepared me.

This survey is very disappointing. The questions are far too broad to elicit meaningful responses. I hope that there will be other opportunities to provide input other than applying to participate in focus groups.

I think this is a mistake. Paralegals should not be giving legal advice, appearing in court, etc.

This is a terrible idea. There is obviously a need for people to be represented, but it's unfair to people with lower incomes to provide worse representation. If there are any areas of law that are straightforward and don't have surprise issues, a paralegal might be able to handle representation on that, but for most legal matters, even simple cases can rapidly become complex. If law school and lawyers are too expensive, we should be focusing on improving access to lawyers and remodeling law school to focus on essential skills over 2 years, not providing paralegals when people need lawyers. I can only imagine how many legal messes the lower and middle class clients will be caught up in when paralegals start trying to do everything a lawyer does without the training. We owe the public more.

I think this pilot program is a horrible idea, you are only devaluing the J.D. and contributing to the over population of attorneys in this field. If you allow Paralegals to provide legal advice and represent clients there is no longer incentive to get a J.D. this will be the downfall of qualified attorneys.

I think you're treading on thin ice here and will erode the profession if you begin allowing paralegals in court.

I don't think the paraprofessional project will benefit clients. This survey is not designed in a way to allow lawyers to select 'none' as an option or to voice concerns about non-attorneys practicing law in some very difficult practice areas. The MSBA previously has expressed concern about this project. The survey should allow attorneys to answer in a way that is not in the affirmative. Family law in particular is significantly more complicated than non-family law attorneys realize. My paralegals are wonderful, they both have paralegal certificates from highly rated programs, but they are not qualified or trained to enter my role.

I am very concerned about this bordering on the unauthorized practice of law. Is protection of the public from incompetency a consideration? Also, if paralegals become authorized to practice law, defaults on student loan debt for earning a law degree could skyrocket. Lawyers will have to settle for being underemployed as paralegals, which is likely to depress salaries.

I do not agree with this pilot project. People need ATTORNEYS not some second-rate second-class separate but equal sort of representation. Paralegals can never do what attorneys do; attorneys know how to 'think' about the law (think like an attorney). Many paralegals are highly skilled and professional but they should NEVER be allowed to work without the supervision of an attorney.

The focus on creditor-debtor, housing and family law is too narrow. There are many areas of probate and real estate practice in which a supervised paralegal could provide valuable assistance.

I think the premise is highly flawed. Our firm is very suspect of this process and program. We have countless young attorneys who leave the profession and just as many who struggle to pay their law school debts- finding a way to make it harder for them to hang a shingle or in any way devaluing the service they provide is a slap in the face to those who have spent 6 figures investing in their legal education.

This is basically the legal field's equivalent of nurses getting doctorates and wearing white coats, giving patients the impression that they are equally qualified to do the work of an MD. Paralegals doing attorney work is the equivalent of the hygienist practicing the dental work because she's seen 90% of it. The point in legal services being performed in a representative capacity by attorneys is for the 10% that makes them qualified to do 100% of the job, not 90%. I recently had my taxes done by Jackson Hewitt, only to find out that I was not in fact talking to a CPA, only after going through the entire interview and finishing the meeting. My whole point in having someone do my taxes was that I would be assured 100% that they were correct, and I in fact had done them correctly prior to the meeting. I was a little bamboozled--that's how people will feel when paralegals do not immediately present themselves as paralegals rather than attorneys. Let me make my point clear: the paralegals will begin to forget or entirely stop telling clients they are in fact paralegals and not attorneys. The idea of 'under attorney supervision' is not 'supervision' when the paralegal is in fact acting in the advocacy and representative roles--that is a sham idea.

I am very concerned that they have a level of understanding of the law and the implementation. I have seen far too many attorneys who are providing inadequate advice. I am concerned that we are adding another level of instability to the people most in need of good legal advice.

A person without a JD and law license should NEVER provide legal advice or counsel period. This survey is poorly designed and clearly biased/tainted in favor of permitting uneducated and unlicensed people to provide legal advice and counsel. This should NEVER be permitted; it is a logical fallacy to even claim it can occur under the supervision of a licensed attorney--that simply is not possible to govern.

I am strongly opposed to paralegals appearing in court on behalf of clients. This undermines the value of law school and passing the bar exam.

The implementation committee entirely lacks representation by anyone with any familiarity with rural Minnesota. Rochester and Duluth are not rural communities. They are cities. Their problems are not the same problems as Walker, Bemidji, Marshall, Morris, Sauk Centre, Pine City, Virginia, and the dozens of other small cities and towns that act as hubs for their surrounding rural communities. You need to get outside the Metro bubble and start seeking answers from attorneys in the styx.

You think you will reach 'unrepresented' parties. Majority of them can't help themselves - regardless of rate of service provider.

I think this is a bad idea. I don't think attorneys are going to want to supervise these para-professionals. And if they do, it will be for a cost that will negate the whole idea of this, which is to provide low-cost legal services. Also, there are enough attorneys out there, myself included, who provide sliding scale fee structures to clients in need.

Again, I wish to reiterate that paralegals should not be representing clients in court; paralegals should only be doing their work under the direct supervision of an attorney. Family law requires analysis of income and assets that are should only be completed under direct supervision of an attorney.

As I previously stated, in my opinion this pilot project is a disaster waiting to happen. If the Committee truly perceives an extreme shortage of representation to individuals in the State of Minnesota there are other avenues to explore to remedy this issue rather than allowing a non-licensed attorney to provide legal advice and representation. Possibilities to consider may be to require a certain amount of time every attorney in the state must work at a volunteer clinic in the areas of housing, family, and creditor/debtor law. In the area of bankruptcy law there are volunteer bankruptcy clinics attorneys can volunteer their time at in order to assist non-represented parties with bankruptcy questions. While I realize that there are many attorneys who will not participate in such clinics unless forced to do so, I honestly believe this is a better solution that to allow paralegals to provide legal services to underrepresented parties.

Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project

Recommendations for the Minnesota Supreme Court
Implementation Committee

December 19-20, 2019

Table of Context

Welcome and Introductions

Page 3

Supreme Court Order Review

Page 5

Survey Review

Page 6-7

Strategic Juncture Analysis

Page 8-9

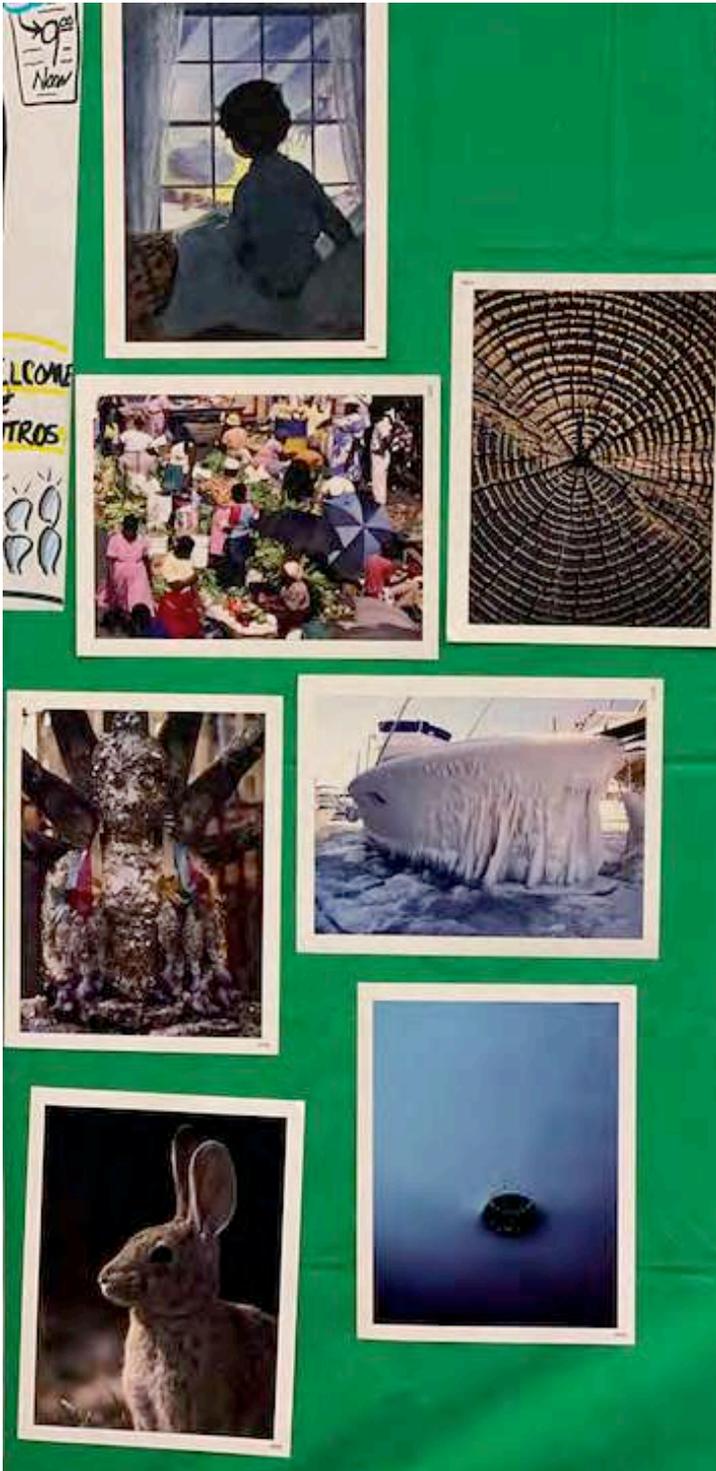

Key Elements of a Successful Program

Page 10

Committee Recommendations

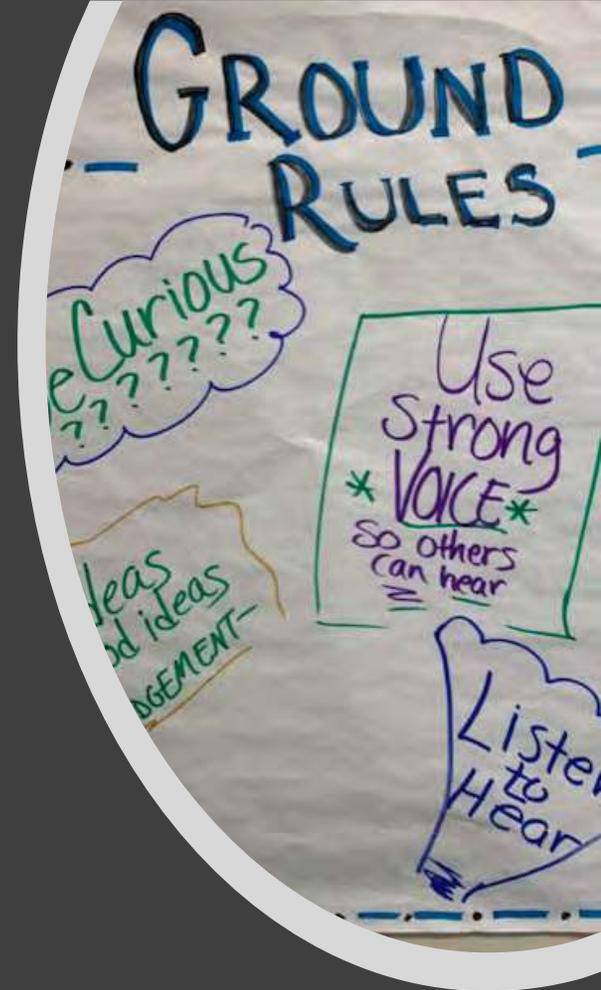

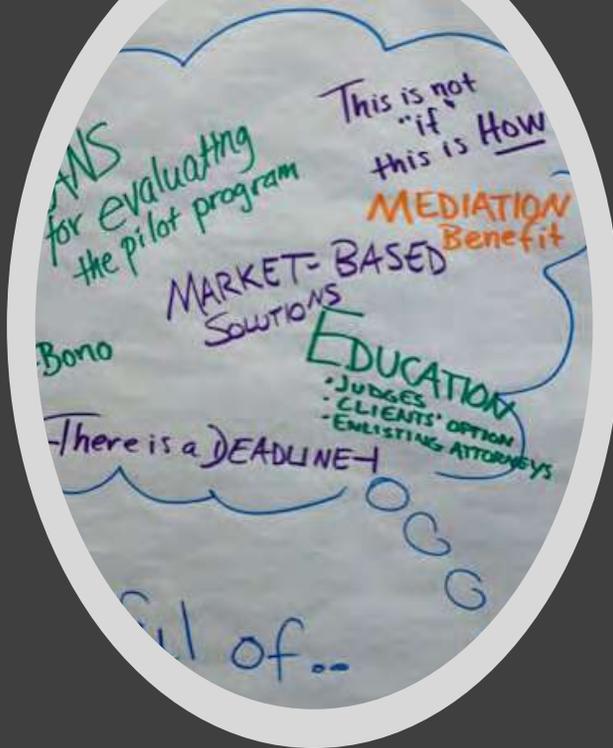

Page 12-21

WELCOME AND INTRODUCTIONS

Day 1 | Shared Understanding

Ground Rules and Supreme Court Order Review

Survey Review

The 104-page survey was reviewed using a cooperative study approach. Each group distilled themes from sections of the report.

Difficulty Finding Qualified Paralegals

+	-
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • None / Not many comments • 579 Respondents = 69% completion rate • Most paralegals are employed full-time (7%) independent paralegal contractors • Over 1/2 paralegals are doing legal research • Paralegals are used broadly • 96% paralegals supervised 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • FEAR • Lack of paralegals outside metro area (wages lower) • Knowledge of specific legal area • Harder for smaller firms to hire paralegals • Paralegals are too expensive • Concern about paralegal training qualifications

Key points to be mindful of:

Responses appear to be mostly from attorneys
 Underappreciation of paralegals' abilities
Educate attorneys on what skilled paralegals can do
 Approximately 1/2 of respondents worked with 0 or 1 of paralegals
 Qualifications need to be defined guidelines

Geography

+	-
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Metro / County • More housing issues b/c of density • Need enough data • More economic diversity • Transportation is better 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Metro / County • Metro has lots of services already • Not a lot of attys or paralegals • Economic disparity

Key points to be mindful of:

Need is everywhere – access in remote areas
Family / housing mentioned most for need

Areas of Law

+	-
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Paralegals can collect info & prepare legal paperwork • Specific training in legal area & experience • Paralegal supervised by atty will provide an edge to an unrep party • Paralegals c/would reduce costs, making access to justice more available • More people providing representation is opportunity for unrep parties – not only attys can do some of this work • More comments contradicting w/creditor / debtor • Family / Housing stronger support in survey responses • High % agree that paralegals can rep parties in mediations 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Very dangerous to have paralegals representing in housing & family • Reach out to newly licensed attys giving them a platform to help clients & not devaluing the new attys services • Depends on qualifications • Do not think this will benefit clients • Training & skills for complex areas • Seems that many do not understand what paralegals are already permitted to do

Key points to be mindful of:

Comfort w/what paralegals already do
 Many see this as cost effective & expanding access to justice
 Comfort w/clear qualifications & ongoing ethics / education
 Lots of confidence that paralegals "can do this well" in all 3 legal areas
 Scope of family law

Survey Review

The 104-page survey was reviewed using a cooperative study approach. Each group distilled themes from sections of the report.

Open Ended Comments

+

- Huge need recognized
- Rural communities need recognized
- Recognizing that highly experienced paralegals needed
- Training, certification, education and accountability is needed
- "I learned very little of what I need to do my job in law school..."
- There is support for the idea

-

- De-valuing law school and JD
- Attorney buy-in
- Lack of understanding of paralegals vs support staff
- Competition
- Form prep only
- UPL
- Unemployed attorneys
- Bad legal advice
- Malpractice, UPA, consequences

Key points to be mindful of:

Attorneys need to be educated on what good paralegals (or secretaries) can do now and what is included in current education programs

This is not a competition (or should not be)

Anything Else To Share With The Committee

+

- Using legal aid / VLN as pilot agency
- Concern about loss of business or competition
- Need is rural
- Qualified / Trained paralegals
- Need for supervision
- Level of insurance

-

- Availability of paralegals
- Concern about loss of business or competition
- Need is rural
- Qualified / Trained paralegals

Key points to be mindful of:

Overall info shows current underuse of paralegals
 Concern of qualified paralegals
 Get past income-based programs

Strategic Juncture Analysis

A look at multiple perspectives as to what is impacting the development of the pilot project. Answering the question: What are the factors in the pilot project that require strategic attention?

What is our window of opportunity?	What are the negative consequences of inaction?	What could be affected or changed in a positive direction in 5-10 years if we successfully implement the pilot program?	What future desired result is going to require our persistence and perseverance for this program to be successful?
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> •  Interest of the court in providing leadership • More represented – NOW • Building up the legal profession as a whole • Delivering on the Chief Justice's Order • Get info to litigants when they come to the Court Admin's window • National Conversation 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Continue Increase in SRLs in court •  Need not met • People come in with the wrong forms! • Eroding public trust and confidence in courts / justice system • Inefficient use of court resources and time • Bad outcomes for litigants / parents / children • People feeling hopeless / overlooked • The powerful and status quo win • People messing up that requires more expensive fix later • Citizens lose faith in legal system • Unrepresented # explode • People suffering / chain reaction • Harder to go forward in life • If we don't someone else will w/o our input 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Courts might / would arrive at more-just results for litigants not being served today • Less disparity in representation • The financial & emotional well-being of single parents and children • Meeting the needs of our citizens • Finding a solution and appreciation for the joint practice of law • ^^Develop a model that can be used in other areas of law • Increased / new educational opportunities for paralegals. Innovation b/c of market need for educators • People law affordable to middle-income clients • Paralegals could see/explain process and law in different ways that may lead to better ways of actually serving clients • Helps with systems change • Opportunity / cultural proficiency • New vision/new voices • Self rep. people will have better resources • System more user friendly (forms) • Lawyers more efficient & better understand their area of expertise • Altering leads area of expertise 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Viewing success through the client perspective rather than attorney perspective • Continue current energy & results • Understanding that paralegals can assist underserved with attorneys • Maintaining a system perspective • Having attorneys and the public understand the skills and specific roles paralegals can have in meeting legal needs • Judges buying in and developing organized processes – consistency • Tweak program as results come in- don't be rigid • With good advice and support early fewer contested cases in the court – move mutually agreed resolutions

Strategic Juncture Analysis

A look at multiple perspectives as to what is impacting the development of the pilot project. Answering the question: What are the factors in the pilot project that require strategic attention?

What bold new risks could we explore or take?	What is working that needs to be carefully watched, preserved or encouraged?	Where do you see signs of the future happening now?	What is placing limits on our success?	What are barriers to success?
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Not only defining, clarifying, and refining role of paralegals for attys during pilots but for paras after pilot. • Team approach to serving underrepresented • Regulatory sandbox – ask innovative people to try new things with less regulation • YES – opportunities for metro firms (atty & paralegal) to provide services to rural area through remote work structures • More process simplification (success of child support system) • Getting attorneys & paralegals in the same live space to work together • Getting other professionals (e.g. social workers) involved in helping clients – broader team approach to serve needs of those facing family, house – debt issues – beyond just legal issue. • Joint innovative law program (combine business with law) • Re-regulation approach • Call “this” name something different 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Legal assistance / pro bono clinics • The pilot should be seen as a supplement to SMRLS, etc. • County law clinics – some via skype / zoom • Participation in pro bono services / pro bono challenge • Self-help options for those who can (want to) handle things alone • How the pilot proceeds – what is working what are opportunities / what doesn't work • MNCIS Website • North Star Attorneys – include paralegals • What is appropriate for pilot • Unbundled legal services (limited scope) 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Utah • Washington (licensing of paralegals) • California • Canada • Minnesota • Administrative law immigration • Court navigators • Healthcare legal partnerships • Other areas – Drs and APNs • British Columbia • Child Support Magistrates • Paralegal Advocates  	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Lack of understanding • Recognition that how things exist is not working • This is not a metro vs outstate issue – it's a statewide concern • Attorney comfort in delegating more to paras • Risk averse profession & move of law to serving business rather than people • Options for remote court hearings • Court calendaring practices • Disparities in paralegal training / ability – don't limit based on someone who isn't adequately prepared – against someone who can do the work well • Other blocks to access –gender, culture, language, etc. • Large debt (school loans) of attorneys 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Attorney buy-in • Understanding / education of scope • Failure to adequately explain limits, requirement • Clients can't afford services – how do you make this work as market model? • Funding for legal services / VLN type programs • Financial based programming • $$$ • Judges need to be willing to hear these paralegals in court • Non-requirement of judges to hear • "Most of the things worth doing in this world were deemed impossible before they were done" – Justice Louis Brandeis • Understanding cultural differences of litigants • $ for use of interpreters • Client buy-in • Burn out rates

Key Elements of a Successful Program

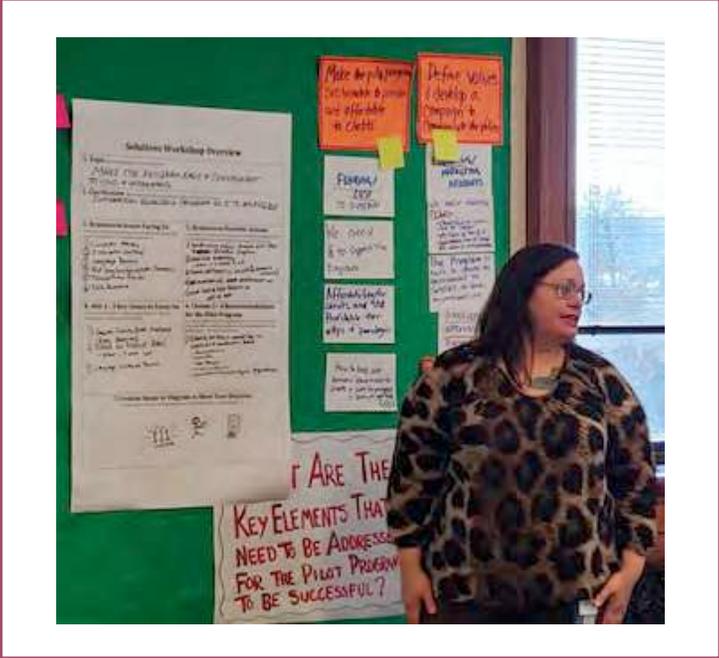

What are the key elements that need to be addressed for the pilot program to be successful?

Make the program easy & convenient to find & understand	Make the pilot program sustainable to providers and affordable to clients	Establish a cool identifier for participating paraprofessionals	Identify pilot goals & establish evaluation plan	Establish required minimum qualifications	Develop a process to protect consumers & hold providers accountable	Define values & develop a campaign to communicate the values	Define parameters for programs	Define what services participant can and cannot provide
As illustrated by:
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Public access / education Getting info to the public – awareness that project exists Way to match needs to service (roster) Education, marketing for consumer buy-in Ease of access for all clients. (language, location, cost, understand program) 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Funding / cost to sustain We need $ to support the program Affordability for clients and still profitable for attys & paralegals How to keep cost barriers down & costs for clients (costs for paralegals, salary for paralegals) 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Name / Title of paraprofessional Branding / naming for clarity of role 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Evaluation plan to learn for future How to evaluate and get quality data There must be a way to measure success ... for clients and for the program Evaluation plan measures success from client perspective What is the goal? 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Education and training is essential for all parties Highly skilled/educated paralegals Clear qualifications (education, experience) for paralegals Paralegals brave enough to go into court & attys to support & encourage Attorney supervision & vouching for paralegal(s) How to define paralegal qualifications Competent attorney supervision 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Define complaint process & consequences Program oversight Identify entity for complaints or concerns from consumers 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Educating / marketing attorneys We must address FEARS (client fear of outcomes... and no "lawyer" ... atty fear of loss of $... court system fear of change and adding to work / calendars The program is built to create an environment of SUPPORT – for bench, bar, participants, etc. Innovative attorneys to learn for future 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Generate pilot idea / programs Where pilot will take place 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Define scope (area of law and practice limitations) Handbook / guideline What and how to provide applicable education ...

Day 2 | Committee Recommendations

Make program easy & convenient to find & understand

What and Why:
Information regarding program so it's accessible

Issues:

1. Computer literacy
2. Information overload
3. Language barriers
4. Pilot program / geographic restrictions
5. Transportation issues
6. Public awareness

Possible Actions:

1. Consider using Judicial Branch self-help to advertise program
2. NEED for rollout plan – what it is / what it isn't
3. Identify add'l players (i.e.. interpreters, community involvement)
4. Lawhelpmn.org / mnfindalawyer.com
5. State bar to help rollout as well as MPA

Key Issues:

1. Computer literacy / info overload (public awareness)
2. NEED for ROLLOUT PLAN
- what is & what isn't
3. Language / Cultural barriers

Committee Recommendations:

- 1) Identify all players needed for a successful & coordinated rollout.
 - Associations
 - Websites
 - Law libraries
 - Public libraries
 - Community & Ethnic & Religious Organizations

Image:

Make the pilot program sustainable to providers and affordable to clients

What and Why:

Who are we serving? Low & moderate income clients
 We want it to continue beyond the pilot

Issues:

1. Financial concerns – clients
2. Credibility – get what you pay for
3. Energy & interest by providers
4. Insurance?
5. Profitability for providers
6. Impact of client's emotions
7. Other sources of funding

Possible Actions:

1. Sliding fee scale / other fee structure
2. Discuss w/practitioners how it would work
3. Marketing / min req. / evals
4. Insurance companies – discuss
5. Flat fee
6. Registry of participants
7. Ensure oversight process

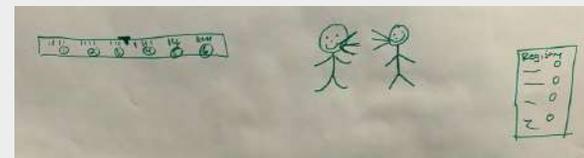

Key Issues:

1. Profitability
2. Credibility
3. Financial concerns for clients

Committee Recommendations:

1. Develop oversight process
2. Outreach to providers Re: fee schedule
3. Determine models for profitability using business models (RFP: request for proposal)
4. Create a registry of participants

Image:

Establish a cool identifier for participating paraprofessionals ❄️

What and Why:

Need a way to quickly distinguish paraprofessionals who work in these programs as different from all other legal paraprofessionals

Issues:

- Communicate the specialization focus of the role
- Attorneys think of paralegals as many different things
- Not a distinct role for attys or legal profession
- Clients don't know what the term paralegal means
- Need to build cohesion and pride in the role
- Communicate what these individuals do thru name
- Will paralegals not in this role feel left behind?
- Legal profession may not be the best group to come up w/name – need marketers / advertisers
- Path to advancement

Possible Actions:

Consult branding / marketing firms / professionals
 Focus group names options
 Select a simple, clear, vivid, non-acronym-based name
 Consider a logo / visual – how does this look on swag? – will someone buy the T-shirt?
 Do not need precision in the name, we need emotion and positivity

Key Issues:

1. Client focused name that builds cohesion and pride
2. Communicate specialized focus of role
3. Consult professional cool "namers"! (e.g. not attorneys) (ALSO NO ACRONYMS)

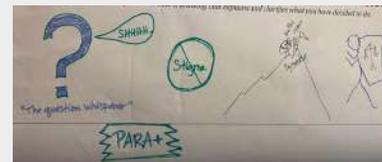

Committee Recommendations:

Qualities, values of the role

- Advocate Accessible Sherpa (Federal Sherpa 🟡) Champion Advisor
- Helper Companion People-first Community Docent Guide Democracy
- Empowered

Ask clients what they wish they'd had

Image:

Identify pilot goals & establish evaluation plan

What: Identify goals and data/info needed to assess whether satisfied
 Why: Order, pilot program, identify area to improve/change

Issues:

- Defining area of law may drive goal
- Are goods consistent w/order
- Who is going to evaluate?
- Identify what is success?
- How do we track data?
- Know what tasks paralegals did?
- Who do we check in with?
- Does geography limit help?
- Can we scale pilot, and sell pilot?

Possible Actions:

- Who do we check in with?
 - Courts (judges, administrators)
 - Paralegals
 - Clients
 - Lawyers (both supervision & "other side")
- Identify what is success
- Look at Order
 - Look at need
- How do we track data
- Survey
 - Will modesty of scope affect ability to collect data
 - How do we get non-court data (mediation)
 - Are there new types of data we need to collect

Key Issues:

- Identify what is success
- How do we track data
- Who do we check in with

Committee Recommendations:

- Identifying success
- Fewer SRL
 - More satisfied clients
 - Calendar congestion reduction
 - Low & moderate income, unmet needs, met
 - Paralegals are comfortable / satisfied

Image:

Establish required minimum qualifications

What and Why:
 Must be minimum qualifications that are measurable/verifiable, so we have confidence in the program/individuals by clients/attorneys

- Issues:
- No consistent current paralegal requirements
 - Experience/knowledge of area of law (A)
 - No consistent definition of paralegal (B)
 - Type of proof needed
 - Deciding what is qualifying & agreement on it (C)
 - Is further education or test required
 - What training is needed

- Possible Actions:
- Define minimum education &/or experience
 - Define paraprofessional roles for this project
 - Consider attorney training, vouching and/or certifying

Key Issues:
 A
 B
 C

- Committee Recommendations:
 All 3 (A, B, C)
- Talk with attorneys on what is required to meet this
 - Minimum 5-year experience in that area of law
 - MnCP certification by MPA

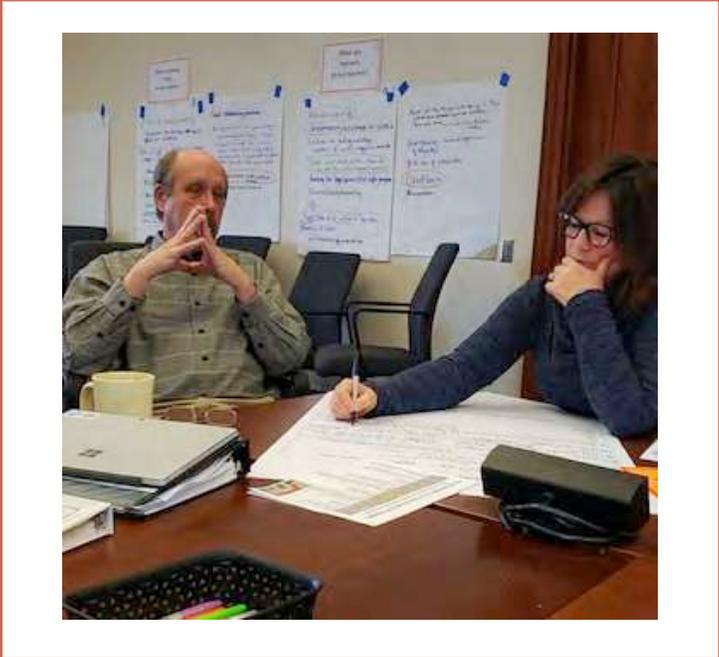

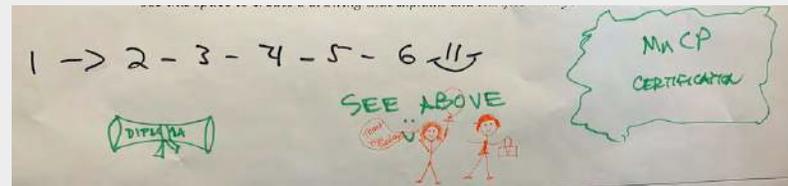

Image:

Develop a process to protect consumers & hold providers accountable

What and Why:

There needs to be a person or entity to receive and act on complaints concerning the pilot project, to provide some level of consumer protection and to determine the merits of complaints

Issues:

- There is no such thing right now
- Lack of uniform definition of a paralegal
- Multiple credentialing organizations
- What role, if any, does the Lawyers Board of Professional Responsibility have?

Possible Actions:

- Develop a form / affidavit / certification for participating lawyers and paralegals
- Enlist assistance of Lawyers Board of Professional Responsibility

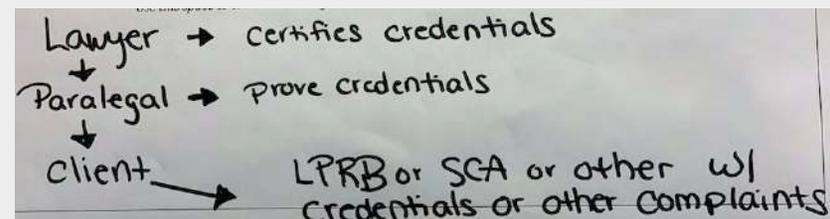

Key Issues:

- Identify credentialing organization(s) for paralegals
- How to verify paralegal qualifications
 - Something from supervision attorney?
- At what point is a registry created

Committee Recommendations:

1. Committee will identify the credentialing paralegal organization(s)
2. Identify additional / other credentialing requirements
3. Develop reporting system for both lawyer and paralegal (Lawyers Board, State Court Admn)

Image:

Define values & develop a campaign to communicate the values

What and Why:

- Establish the direction
- Allows us to assess alignment w/values to make intelligent choices resources
- Educate and engage attorneys, para, Judicial Branch / stakeholder
- UPL concerns & define supervision

Issues:

- Mixture of knowledge about program
- ✓ Current confusion about goal(s) of program
- ✓ No succinct definition of program
- No consistent definition of para
- Communicate WIIFM for all
- Concern about skills to expand role
- There is work to be done to expand knowledge
- Can this be addressed uniquely based on audience
- ✓ Message might be different to family law attys vs other attys
- Need champions / evangelists
- Validation of pts of view
- ✓ Recognize shared need & approach

Possible Actions:

- Create an environment of support
- Document WIIFM
- Identify benefits
- Identify spectrum of tasks that role does
- Visual – infographics, accessible communication, varied channels & methods
- Develop user stories, anecdotes
- Say specifically what this is NOT
- Distinguish from what other states are doing (WA state example)
- Create examples of how to use the program
- Client testimonials
- Already work w/paraprofessionals
- Do not have exp w/ paraprofessionals
- Handbook / templates knowledge bank

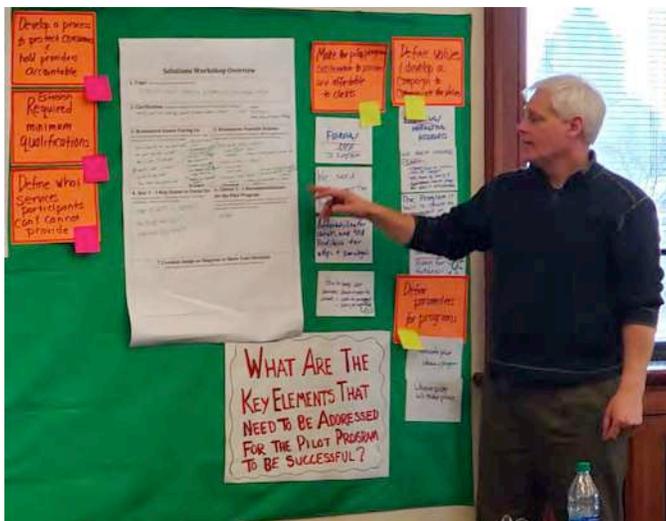

Key Issues:

1. Shared need & approach
2. Unique communication strategy to include WIIFM & role acknowledgment
3. Confusion re: goals & definition of program

Committee Recommendations:

1. Create CLE re: Rule 5 & Supervision of paraprofessionals in this role for ethics credit / elimination of bias
2. Environment of Support – knowledge bank, mentoring, shared space, like MSBA section, blog/online space
3. Document benefits and WIIFM
4. Make sure the communication campaign is full circle

Image:

Define parameters for programs

What and Why:
 Need geographic areas defined
 Need substantial legal areas defined

Issues:

- A. Is rural better / worse
- B. Identify how many venues & where
- C. Start with 1, 2 or 3 legal areas (subjects)
- D. Start with 1 or multiple geographic areas
- E. Do we house it in legal services
- F. Do we also allow it outside of legal services (market based)

Possible Actions:

- Need to have sufficient number of cases where the current resources are insufficient
- Recruiting willing & qualified providers (attorneys & paralegals)
- Pilot needs to be big enough to be helpful & small enough to be studied

Key Issues:

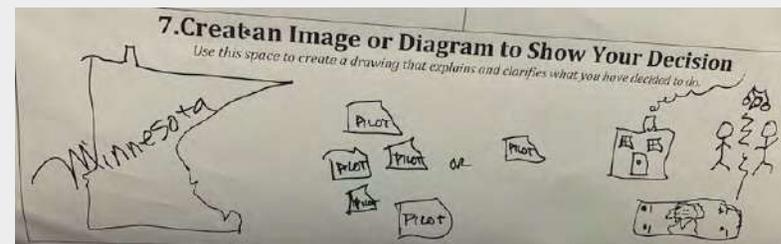

- B)
- C)
- D)

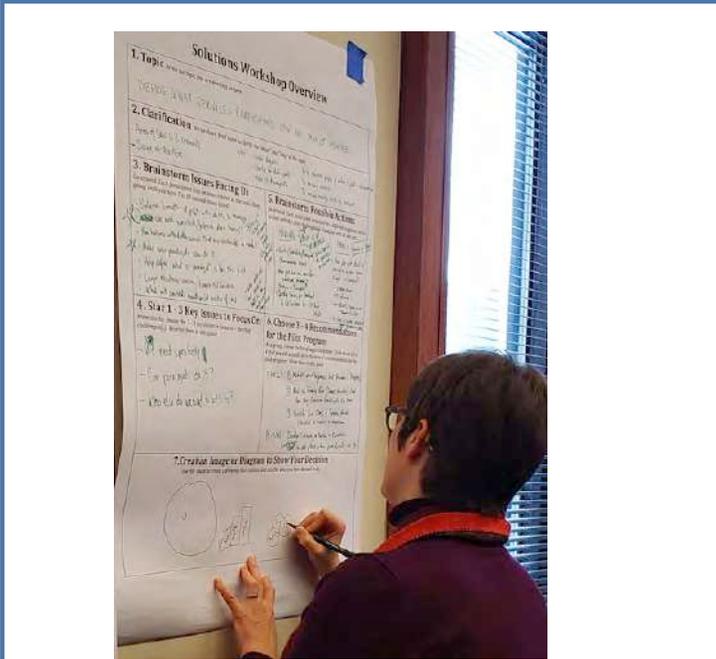

Committee Recommendations:

All three above
 (Done ☺)

Image:

Define what services participant can and cannot provide

What:
Area of law
Scope of practice

Why:

- Order requires
- Clarity for participants
- Make it manageable

- Help convince people of value of pilot – alleviate fear
- To ensure success
- To ensure enough data to evaluate

Issues:

- Balance breadth of pilot with ability to manage
- ★ We need specifics (to break down 'housing')
- How balance affordable services that are sustainable in market
- Make sure paralegals can do it
- ★ Help define what a "paralegal" is for this pilot
- Layer resistance concern / lawyer enthusiasm
- What will constitute authorized practice of law
- "Policing" issues of making sure people stay w/in scope of practice
- Who else do we need to talk to too understand program of scope

Possible Actions:

Housing

- ★ Value is in reaching solutions as opposed to ejection
 - Eviction / Habitability / Expungement (home ownership issues)
 - Move fast but one area for paralegals because housing is trainable
 - Develop training for paralegals to place guidance in – pro se litigant
- Family (practice as dyad)
- How do we deal w/morphing of case from simple -> complex
 - Mediation
 - Informal
 - Identify tipping point (domestic viol/OFP)
 - Family lawyer w/in each that couldn't cover

Key Issues:

- We need to specify
- Can paralegals do it?
- Who else do we need to talk to?

Committee Recommendations:

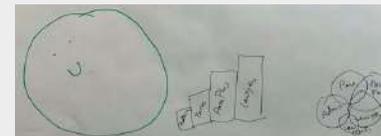

Family

1. Mediation and informal court process (morphing)
2. Meet with Family Bar (small practices) about how they conceive paralegals do more
3. Identify red flags / tipping points (related to training & experience)

Housing

- Develop training on housing & evidence
- Eviction trials is one place where paralegals in ct.

Image:

Final thoughts for the committee to be mindful of...

- Arriving at an organized and understandable public rollout that reaches communities in need of legal services
- What needs to be included in the pilot vs. what can come after the pilot?
- Outreach to other unique stakeholder groups. i.e. family law section, courts/judges, community organizations (any connections w/committees who confirm/affirm for equality & justice) qualifications? Buy-in
- Regulatory changes that need to be made in courts for paralegals to appear in court
- Who will handle oversight / registry / complaints
- Pilot doesn't have to be perfect; need to keep in continuous improvement mindset
- Can this just all be overseen by a supervising atty (case by case) or does there need to really be a separate structure to oversee
- How will you get the word out?
- Who is going to manage this pilot project?
- Will there be a point person(s)?
- Reach out to already existing law firm partners during implementation process or for ideas
- Think about the paradox: the "newest" lawyers & paralegals who "know the least" (1-3 years practice) are often the most motivated to serve, most diverse, best connected to communities needing services, most able to work at affordable rates, most open to change & innovation, most skilled at social media evangelism, hungriest for clients, mentorship & experience – and everyone thinks it is someone else's job to train them so they are largely abandoned & overlooked. How do we integrate them into this program and harness their energy? A pathway to participation?
- This is about the clients with unmet needs – not about lawyers & paralegals
- We need to talk to practitioners working on the ground to see how it will work
- Allow grassroots ideas to bubble up
- We need to work through concerns & values in communication
- Must do and communicate what we did over the last 2 days
- What does "attorney supervision" look like? What are the requirements? What liability is taken on by the attorney vs. the participant? - Key to attorney buy-in, but maybe has to be limited supervision vs. normal in office to get them to agree to supervise
- Scale realistic for a business model that is sustainable
- Serves the greatest number of those in need
- Attorney buy-in
- Cool name (not acronym/paralegal)
- This happens
- This program needs to be able to offer value and be realistic for : paralegals; attorneys; clients
- Use what resources are available now to make it happen (associates, MSBA, Paralegal Association, M CCP, etc.) and not create something new from scratch

Stephanie Ahles, MPA, CTF
COO, Training and Facilitation Specialist
Stephanie.ahles@hue.life

www.hue.life

Angie Asa-Lovstad, MS, CTF
Training and Facilitation Specialist
Angie.asa-lovstad@hue.life

THANK YOU!

Recommended Documents Legal Paraprofessionals May File without Final Attorney Review

General Filing Documents

- Notice of Appearance
- Certificate of Representation
- Application to Serve by Alternate Means
- Affidavit of Default
- Affidavit of Service
- Substitution of Counsel
- Notice of Withdrawal
- Notice of Filing
- Affidavit for Proceeding In Forma Pauperis
- Proposed In Forma Pauperis Order
- Settlement Agreement
- Request for Continuance
- Motion to Request Correction of Clerical Mistakes

Landlord-Tenant Specific

- Affidavit of Compliance and Proposed Order for Expungement
- Notice of Motion and Motion for Expungement of Eviction Record
- Petition for Emergency Relief Under Tenant Remedies Act
- Rent Escrow Affidavit
- Eviction Answer
- Eviction Action Proposed Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Order and Judgment
- Answer and Motion for Dismissal or Summary Judgment (Eviction)
- Notice of Motion and Motion to Quash Writ of Recovery
- Petition for Possession of Property After Unlawful Lockout

Family Law Specific

- Confidential Information Form 11.1
- Confidential Information Form 11.2
- Felon name change notice
- Notice to Public Authority
- Notice of Default and Nonmilitary Status
- Affidavit of Non-Military Status
- Default Scheduling Request
- Notice of Intent to Proceed to Judgment
- Proposed Default Findings
- Initial Case Management Conference Data Sheet
- Scheduling Statement
- Parenting/Financial Disclosure Statement
- Discovery (Interrogatories, Request for Production of Documents, Request for Admissions)
- Summary Real Estate Disposition Judgment
- Certificate of Dissolution
- Delegation of Parental Authority
- Revocation of Delegation of Parental Authority
- Application for Minor Name Change
- Parenting/Financial Disclosure Statement
- Certificate of Settlement Efforts
- Notice of Motion and Motion to Modify Parenting Time
- Stipulation of the Parties
- Notice of Motion and Motion to Modify Child Support/Medical Support
- Notice of Motion and Motion (examples: Stop COLA, Reinstate Driver's License)
- Request for County to Serve Papers

Implementation Committee Member Bios

Sally Dahlquist, J.D. is the Director of an ABA-approved Paralegal Program and Chair of the Beyond the Yellow Ribbon Company at Inver Hills Community College in Minnesota. She is very active as a member of the Minnesota Paralegal Association, American Bar Association Standing Committee on Paralegals, and Minnesota State Bar Association, and has served as the Past Chair of the ABA Approval Commission for Paralegal Educational Programs. Ms. Dahlquist works tirelessly to bring attorneys and paralegals together to deliver competent and affordable legal representation to our citizens, and is a dedicated advocate of public access to equal justice.

Tiffany Doherty-Schooler serves as Director of Advocacy for Legal Service of Northeastern Minnesota, a civil legal service provider that provides legal services to low income clients in 11 counties in matters such as housing, family law and benefits. Previously she owned a general legal practice in rural central Minnesota and served as a part-time public defender. She is a former Humphrey School of Public Policy Fellow and has years of experience working to meet the legal needs of the residents of Greater Minnesota.

Bridget Gernander has worked for the Minnesota Judicial Branch since 2001, focused exclusively on access to justice funding and policy work for the last twelve years. Prior to joining the Judicial Branch, Bridget was an Equal Justice Works Fellow with the Minnesota Justice Foundation. She is a graduate of the University of Minnesota Law School.

Kimberly Larson is the manager of business education for the Minnesota Judicial Branch. Prior to coming to the Judicial Branch, Kim worked as an attorney with Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid representing clients in the areas of family, housing, immigration, and disability law. She is a National Center for State Courts Fellow, certified Court Executive, and graduate of Hamline University School of Law in St. Paul.

Tom Nelson is the 2019/2020 President of the Minnesota State Bar Association. He previously served as the President of the Hennepin County Bar Association. He is a partner at the Stinson law firm, formerly Leonard, Street and Deinard; prior to that, he was with Popham, Haik, Schnobrich, Kaufman and Doty.

Christopher Petersen is president of the Columbia Mutual Funds and a senior legal officer at Ameriprise Financial supporting U.S. registered products and the global asset management business. In this role, he and his team are responsible for corporate governance and providing legal support for the Columbia Mutual Funds and their service providers. Mr. Petersen has worked for Ameriprise Financial since 2004. From 1999 to 2004, Mr. Petersen worked for U.S. Bancorp and Strong Financial providing legal support to their asset management business and sponsored fund groups. Mr. Petersen received B.A. and J.D. degrees from the University of Minnesota.

Implementation Committee Member Bios

Liz Reppe is the Minnesota State Law Librarian. She earned a J.D. from Hamline University School of Law and an M.L.I.S. from Dominican University. She has been assisting people seeking legal information for almost 20 years as a public and academic law librarian. She was a recipient of the 2017 Minnesota Attorney of the Year award for her work creating the Appeal Self-Help Clinic and the First Judicial District Amicus Curiae award for her efforts to create the Dakota County Criminal Defense Panel.

Hon. John R. Rodenberg is a 1978 graduate of St. Olaf College, cum laude, and a 1981 graduate of Hamline University School of Law, cum laude, where he was an Associate and later an Editor of the HUSL Law Review. He entered the private practice of law with the firm of Berens, Rodenberg & O'Connor, Chtd., in New Ulm, MN, where he was primarily a civil trial practitioner from 1982 to 2000. Judge Rodenberg was appointed to the District Court in Minnesota's Fifth Judicial District by Governor Ventura in 2000, a position to which he was reelected in 2002 and 2008. Judge Rodenberg was appointed to the Minnesota Court of Appeals by Governor Dayton in 2012, a position to which he was reelected in 2014.

Maren Schroeder, RP, MnCP holds an M.B.A. in Legal Administration, and is a PACE Registered, Minnesota Certified Paralegal who performs freelance paralegal work in the areas of litigation, family law, and criminal law. She is the current Director of Positions & Issues for the Minnesota Paralegal Association (MPA) and serves in various capacities with the National Federation of Paralegal Associations. Previously, she served as MPA's Director of Greater Minnesota, Director of Professional Development, and Director of Marketing, and as NFPA's Regulation Review Coordinator and Association Management Coordinator. In 2014, Maren led a committee to establish the Minnesota Certified Paralegal program, a non-governmental credentialing program for paralegals in Minnesota.

Hon. Paul C. Thissen was appointed to the Minnesota Supreme Court in 2018. Prior to that, he worked as an attorney for 25 years and made access to justice and pro bono an important priority. He served in the Minnesota House of Representatives for 16 years including as Speaker of the House.

Pamela Wandzel is the Director of Pro Bono at Fredrikson & Byron where she has managed the firm's pro bono legal program for the past 24 years. Pam also served as a litigation paralegal at the firm after graduating with honors from North Hennepin Community College's paralegal program. She has served on a number of committees at the MSBA and on the board of numerous community-based nonprofits.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 11

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW MEXICO

May 13, 2019

NO. 19-8110

IN THE MATTER OF THE
NEW MEXICO LICENSED LEGAL TECHNICIANS WORK GROUP

ORDER

WHEREAS, a team of judges and court staff from New Mexico attended an Innovation Summit sponsored by the Conference of Chief Justices in May 2018;

WHEREAS, the Innovation Team from New Mexico identified several projects worthy of further study for improving access to legal services in this state, including the use of licensed legal technicians or other non-lawyer professionals trained to deliver legal services that are responsive to unmet legal needs in New Mexico;

WHEREAS, recent studies reveal a chronic shortage of legal services for low and moderate income individuals who need help to address their legal needs, and some states have implemented or are currently evaluating the use of non-attorney professionals to address this persistent gap in legal services and expand

1 access to the justice system;

2 WHEREAS, the need for legal service providers to address unmet legal 3 needs in New Mexico is felt most acutely beyond the Rio Grande corridor and 4 throughout rural New Mexico, as evidenced by the fact that thirty-three percent
5 (33 %) of New Mexico's counties have ten (10) or fewer lawyers, twenty-one 6 percent (21 %) of New Mexico's counties have five (5) or fewer lawyers, and 7 two counties in New Mexico have no lawyers at all;

8 WHEREAS, following the return of New Mexico's Innovation Team from 9 the 2018 Innovation Summit, the Court identified interested parties willing to 10 study alternative methods for addressing the crisis of unmet legal needs and now 11 wishes to formalize their appointment to serve on an ad hoc work group that 12 would develop a report and recommendations for the Court to consider;

13 WHEREAS, the Court anticipates that the report and recommendations of 14 the work group would include an assessment of the use of licensed legal 15 technicians or other non-attorney professionals to help address the gap in legal 16 services in New Mexico; and

17 WHEREAS, in light of the foregoing, and the Court being sufficiently 18 advised;

1. NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS ORDERED that the Ad Hoc New Mexico
2 Licensed Legal Technicians Work Group hereby is ESTABLISHED;

3 IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the following persons are appointed to 4 serve as members of the work group until further order of the Court:

5 Hon. Donna J. Mowrer
6 Ninth Judicial District Court

7 Emmalee Atencio
8 State Bar of New Mexico Paralegal Division

9 George Chandler, Commissioner
10 New Mexico Commission on Access to Justice;

11 Prof. April Land
12 UNM School of Law Community Lawyering Clinic

13 Cindy Lovato-Farmer, Chair
14 Board of Bar Examiners;

15 Susan Page
16 Private Attorney;

17 Steven Scholl, Shareholder
18 Dixon, Scholl, Carrillo, PA;

19 William Slease, Chief Disciplinary Counsel
20 NM Disciplinary Board;

21 Scot Stinnett, Publisher/Editor
22 DeBaca County News;

23 Kathy Ulibarri

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20
21

New Mexico Independent Community Colleges; and

Dr. Katharine Winograd
Central New Mexico Community College;

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Hon. Donna J. Mowrer shall serve as chair of the work group until further order of this Court;

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the work group shall review existing rules and programs for the delivery of legal services in New Mexico and recommend changes the work group determines would be appropriate for improving the delivery of legal services in New Mexico, including whether to authorize the use of licensed legal technicians or other non-attorney professionals for the delivery of defined types of legal services; and

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the work group shall submit a report and initial recommendations to this Court no later than January 1, 2020, and may submit interim reports to the Court as the work group deems appropriate.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

WITNESS, Honorable Judith K. Nakamura, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New Mexico, and the seal of said Court this 13th day of May, 2019.

(SEAL)

Joey D. Moya, Chief Clerk of the Supreme Court of the State of New Mexico

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 12

ADMINISTRATIVE ORDER OF THE
CHIEF ADMINISTRATIVE JUDGE OF THE COURTS

Pursuant to the authority vested in me, and upon consultation with and approval by the Chief Judge and the Presiding Justices of the Appellate Division, First and Second Judicial Departments, I hereby adopt, effective February 11, 2014, the following rules relating to a pilot program for provision of pro bono non-legal services to unrepresented litigants in consumer credit, housing, and others matters where such services are urgently needed.

1. The Court Navigators Program

There is hereby established a pilot “Court Navigators Program” of the Unified Court System, in the New York City Civil Court and in such other courts and parts as shall be designated by the Chief Administrator of the Courts, for the purpose of providing essential non-legal services, without cost, to unrepresented litigants by qualified non-lawyers (“Navigators”). The program initially shall be established in the following locations:

1. Civil Court, Bronx County (consumer credit matters); and
2. Civil Court, Kings County (Housing Part).

2. Standards, Qualifications, and Assignment of Court Navigators

A. The Chief Administrator of the Courts shall establish minimum qualifications, education, and training standards for Court Navigators. These shall include an educational and field training course, pursuant to a curriculum approved by the Chief Administrator or her designee. The Chief Administrator shall maintain a list of qualified Navigators eligible for appointment pursuant to this program.

B. Court Navigators shall be assigned by, and act under the supervision of, not-for-profit service providers approved for this purpose by the Chief Administrator. For purposes of this pilot program, approved providers include the following:

1. The New York State Access to Justice Program (A2J)
2. University Settlement
3. Housing Court Answers

3. Duties and Limitations of Court Navigators

A. Upon the assignment of a Court Navigator, the Navigator may, in conformance with standards and guidelines approved by the Chief Administrator of the Courts or her designee:

(1) inform the unrepresented party about, and assist in, the completion of court-designed and court-approved “do-it-yourself” form documents, and the use of Law Help to obtain legal information or to locate an attorney;

(2) assist the unrepresented party in the gathering and organization of documents relating to the case;

(3) inform the unrepresented party about, and assist in, the scheduling of court proceedings;

(4) accompany the unrepresented party to court appearances and, if directed by the court, answer factual questions posed by the court;

(5) inform the unrepresented party about, and assist in, obtaining available court services (such as interpreter services); and

(6) provide such other non-legal information and perform such other non-legal services as the court may direct.

B. In the performance of these services, Court Navigators may not:

(1) provide legal advice, legal counseling, or (unless in a manner approved by the Chief Administrator or her designee) legal information to the unrepresented litigant;

(2) draft, execute, serve, or file with the court any documents on behalf of the unrepresented litigant (other than the provision of assistance in completing court-approved “do-it-yourself” documents as described above);

(3) hold themselves out as representing, speaking for, or advocating on behalf of a litigant, or act in any manner as to convey the impression that they are legal practitioners or are associated with a law office;

(4) address, or conduct negotiations with, opposing counsel, unless at the court’s direction;

(5) address the court on behalf of the unrepresented litigant, unless to provide factual information at the court’s direction; or

(6) perform any service that constitutes the practice of law.

C. Court Navigators shall receive neither direct nor indirect compensation from the unrepresented parties to whom they provide services.

D. Court Navigators shall follow the court’s directives at all times.

Chief Administrative Judge of the Courts

Dated: February 10, 2014

AO/42/14

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 13

ROLES BEYOND LAWYERS

Summary, Recommendations and Research Report of an Evaluation of the New York City Court Navigators Program and its Three Pilot Projects

December 2016

Prepared by Rebecca L. Sandefur, American Bar Foundation, and Thomas M. Clarke, National Center for State Courts, with support from the Public Welfare Foundation

ABF American Bar Foundation
EXPANDING KNOWLEDGE • ADVANCING JUSTICE

Public Welfare
Foundation

© 2016 Rebecca L. Sandefur and Thomas M. Clarke
All Rights Reserved

Research Summary and Recommendations

Introduction

There is now a major movement in the United States to expand the use of appropriately trained and supervised individuals without full formal legal training to provide help to people who would otherwise be without legal assistance of any kind. The general approach has been endorsed by The Commission on the Future of Legal Services of the American Bar Association,¹ and by the Guidance issued by the National Center for State Courts in support of the Justice for All Strategic Planning Initiative developed in response to a recent resolution of the Conferences of Chief Justices and State Court Administrators.²

The need for such innovations is clear. At the time this evaluation was conducted, approximately 90 percent of tenants facing eviction in New York City did not have a lawyer, while the vast majority of landlords did.³ Research from the National Center for State Courts shows that in 70 percent of non-domestic civil cases in urban counties, one party is unrepresented while the other has lawyer representation.⁴

The first comprehensive evaluation of programs providing assistance through staff or volunteers without full formal legal training provides important evidence that these initiatives can influence the experiences of unrepresented litigants in positive ways and can also shape the outcomes of court cases, including legal and real-life outcomes.

The umbrella program, New York City Court Navigators, makes use of trained and supervised individuals with no prior formal legal training to provide one-on-one assistance to unrepresented litigants in the City's Housing and Civil Courts. Navigators provide information, assist litigants in accessing and completing court-required simplified forms, attend settlement negotiations and accompany unrepresented litigants into the courtroom. If judges address direct factual questions to a Navigator, the Navigator is authorized to respond.

In February 2014, three distinct Navigator pilot projects began operation in New York City Courts as part of the larger Navigator program. Two of these pilot projects involve volunteer Navigators. A third pilot project involves experienced caseworkers on the staff of a non-profit organization; these caseworkers had previously performed more limited roles.

The evaluation of the New York City Court Navigators program was conducted by researchers from the American Bar Foundation and the National Center for State Courts, under a research project supported by the Public Welfare Foundation. The research assessed the appropriateness, efficacy, and sustainability of each of the three Navigator pilot projects. The program design and evaluation frameworks, published ¹ABA Commission on the Future of Legal Services, Report on the Future of Legal Services in the United States (2016), http://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/images/abanews/2016FLSReport_FNL_WEB.pdf.

² National Center for State Courts, <http://www.ncsc.org/jfap>.

³ SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS: CHARACTERISTICS, NEEDS, SERVICES: THE RESULTS OF TWO SURVEYS. SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS IN THE NEW YORK CITY FAMILY COURT AND NEW YORK CITY HOUSING COURT, Office of the Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives. New York, NY: Office of the Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives, 2005. At time of the release of this report (October 2016), increased funding for lawyer representation in eviction cases has reduced the percentage of unrepresented tenants to around 83 percent.

⁴National Center for State Courts Civil Litigation Project, The Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts (2015), <https://www.ncsc.org/~media/Files/PDF/Research/CivilJusticeReport-2015.ashx>.

elsewhere⁵, were newly developed for the evaluation as models for general use in access to justice evaluation research.

The positive results of the three Navigator pilot projects were produced in a context that is both adverse and supportive. The New York City Courts are among the most chaotic and overloaded in the United States. That the pilot projects showed evidence of positive contributions in such environments suggests that such programs could be effective in a wide range of jurisdictions. At the same time, the New York City Courts are leaders in developing innovations to provide fairness for unrepresented litigants. The fact that the courtrooms in which Navigators worked were those in which other significant efforts had already been made to improve the experiences of unrepresented parties may have been an important support to the pilot projects, making some results easier to achieve here than might be the case elsewhere. Alternatively, Navigators working in courts that have not made efforts to improve the experiences of unrepresented litigants could be found to have comparatively larger influence on litigant experience and case outcomes.

Key Findings: Evidence of Program Impact

The three Navigator pilot projects differ in important respects, but all involve the same core capacities: providing to unrepresented litigants the services of information, moral support, and accompaniment to negotiations with the other side’s attorneys and into courtrooms. Navigators are authorized to respond to questions from court attorneys and judges and to prompt litigants to provide additional information. Complete descriptions of each pilot project are available in the full Report.⁶ The evaluation uncovered evidence that assistance from appropriately trained and supervised individuals without formal legal training is associated with changes in a range of outcomes, including both legal and real-life outcomes.

Principal findings of the evaluation include:

- The Access to Justice Navigators Pilot Project is built around trained volunteer Navigators “for-the-day.” These Navigators assist unrepresented litigants in understanding and moving through nonpayment or debt collection proceedings. Access to Justice Navigators currently operate in a variety of housing courts and in consumer debt cases in civil court in New York City. Surveys of litigants revealed that litigants who received the help of any kind of Navigator were 56 percent more likely than unassisted litigants to say they were able to tell their side of the story.
- The Housing Court Answers Navigators Pilot Project involves trained volunteer Navigators “for-the-day,” operating in the Brooklyn Housing Court. These Navigators provide individualized assistance with tenants’ preparation of a legal document, the “answer” to the landlord’s petition for nonpayment of rent, in which the tenant responds to the petition by asserting defenses. Litigants assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators asserted more than twice as many defenses as litigants who received no assistance. A review of case files reveals that tenants assisted by a Housing Court Answers Navigator were 87 percent more likely than unassisted tenants to have their defenses recognized and addressed by the court. For instance, judges ordered landlords to make needed repairs about 50 percent more often in Navigator-assisted cases.
- The University Settlement Navigators Pilot Project employs trained caseworkers who are employees of a nonprofit organization. These Navigators, operating in the Brooklyn Housing Court, are

⁵ INCREASING ACCESS TO JUSTICE THROUGH EXPANDED ‘ROLES BEYOND LAWYERS’: PRELIMINARY EVALUATION AND CLASSIFICATION FRAMEWORKS, Rebecca L. Sandefur and Thomas M. Clarke, American Bar Foundation and National Center for State Courts, Chicago, IL and Williamsburg, VA, 2015. Available at americanbarfoundation.org/research/A2J.

⁶ The full report may be found here: americanbarfoundation.org/research/A2J/RolesBeyondLawyers.

Navigators “for-the-duration,” working the case from initial appearance through resolution and beyond. This pilot project’s aim is to prevent evictions by providing both the in-court services that all Navigators are able to provide as well as an ongoing relationship with litigants in which the Navigator both accompanies the unrepresented litigant to all of the court activities related to her case and assists the tenant outside of court in connecting with benefits and services for which she may be eligible. In cases assisted by these University Settlement Navigators, zero percent of tenants experienced eviction from their homes by a marshal. By contrast, in recent years, one formal eviction occurs for about every 9 nonpayment cases filed citywide.

The programs were found to be appropriate uses of trained personnel without full formal legal training and to have potential for sustainability. Navigator programs, through their impact on both legal and life outcomes, thus can result in *financial savings to society as well as a reduction in the hardships experienced by unrepresented litigants in civil cases.*⁷

Description of the Program, Evaluation, and Pilot Projects

On February 11, 2014, then New York State Chief Judge Jonathan Lippman announced in his State of the Judiciary speech what he described as:

[A] series of court-sponsored incubator projects to expand the role of non-lawyers in assisting unrepresented litigants. This idea of finding ways for non-lawyers to help pro se litigants is one that has only just begun to emerge in the United States. But it has taken hold elsewhere in the common-law world, including the United Kingdom, to great positive effect. With the new projects that we announce today, it is my hope that we can graphically illustrate the tremendous difference non-lawyers can make in closing the justice gap.

The three pilot projects commenced operation in 2014 under the general guidance of a special task force, the Committee on Non-Lawyers and the Justice Gap,⁸ appointed by the Chief Judge. The pilot projects operated within the New York Civil Court, under the Supervision of Deputy Chief Administrative Judge Fern Fisher and with close participation of community groups and regular input from legal aid agencies and bar associations.

All of the pilot projects shared a general approach, as described by Chief Judge Lippman in the 2014 State of the Judiciary speech:

...This kind of one-on-one assistance will include providing informational resources to litigants and helping them access and complete court do-it-yourself forms and assemble documents, as well as assisting in settlement negotiations outside the courtroom.

Most significantly, for the first time, the trained non-lawyers, called Navigators, will be permitted to accompany unrepresented litigants into the courtroom in specific locations in Brooklyn Housing Court and Bronx Civil Court. They will not be permitted to address the court on their own, but if the judge directs factual questions to them, they will be able to respond. They will also provide moral support and information to litigants, help them keep paperwork in order, assist them in accessing interpreters and other services, and, before they even enter the courtroom, explain what to expect and what the roles are of each person in the courtroom.

⁷ For estimates of the costs and benefits of providing lawyer assistance in eviction cases, see Stout Risius Ross, Inc., The Financial Costs and Benefits of Establishing a Right to Counsel in Eviction Proceedings Under Intro 214-A, (2016).

⁸ See the press release at http://www.nycourts.gov/press/pdfs/pr13_07.pdf.

Clear guidelines govern what a non-lawyer can and cannot do to ensure that they do not cross the line into the practice of law. They will receive training and develop expertise in defined subject areas. When these non-lawyers confront situations where the help of a lawyer is crucial, they will have access to legal service providers for help and referrals.

An Order issued by the Chief Administrative Judge of the Courts codified these protections and authorizations.⁹ The courthouses in which the Navigators projects were piloted are chaotic, loud, confusing and overwhelming, perhaps even to new lawyers as well as to the approximately 90 percent of tenants who, at the time of this research, were there without legal representation.¹⁰

In 2014, the Public Welfare Foundation made a grant to the National Center for State Courts and the American Bar Foundation to fund the development of frameworks for the design and evaluation of such programs and the use of that evaluation framework to assess two distinct initiatives, i) the New York Court Navigators program, reported on here, and, ii) the Washington State Limited License Legal Technicians program, which authorizes trained, licensed and regulated legal technicians to provide a range of services in a provider-client relationship without attorney supervision.¹¹

The evaluation of the New York Court Navigators program included review of court files, surveys of litigants and Navigators, and interviews with stakeholders such as lawyers, judges, court staff, staff in nonprofit organizations that work in these areas, and current and potential funders as well as Navigators themselves. The majority of the data were collected in the Brooklyn Housing Court, as this was the only site of two of the three pilot projects. Following the evaluation framework, the data collected were reviewed for evidence of 1) appropriateness: whether the services as designed could potentially produce the kinds of outcomes desired; 2) efficacy: whether the services showed evidence of producing those outcomes; and 3) sustainability: whether it was reasonable to anticipate that the project could be maintained, expanded and replicated in other jurisdictions.

Recommendations for Enhancements of the New York Navigators Program

The New York City Court Navigators Program shows evidence of achieving the goals of the program as a whole and of its individual pilot projects. One broadly shared benefit from the launch and evaluation of pilot innovations is the opportunity to learn about both what works and what could work better. Some improvements to the existing projects can be achieved at minimal cost. Expanding the projects' size to have greater impact on legal and life outcomes would be more expensive, but also likely accompanied by substantial savings to society as well as reductions in hardship.

⁹ See Administrative Order of the Chief Administrative Judge of the Courts 42-14, February 11, 2014. Available at <https://www.nycourts.gov/courts/nyc/SSI/pdfs/AO-42-14.pdf>.

¹⁰ SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS: CHARACTERISTICS, NEEDS, SERVICES: THE RESULTS OF TWO SURVEYS. SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS IN THE NEW YORK CITY FAMILY COURT AND NEW YORK CITY HOUSING COURT, Office of the Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives. New York, NY: Office of the Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives, 2005. At time of the release of this report (October 2016), increased funding for lawyer representation in eviction cases has reduced the percentage of unrepresented tenants to around 83 percent.

¹¹ "Limited License Legal Technician Program," <http://www.wsba.org/licensing-and-lawyer-conduct/limited-licenses/legal-technicians>. The Roles Beyond Lawyers Evaluation report on the Limited License Legal Technicians is scheduled to appear later this year.

Lower-cost changes to achieve improvements include:

- Providing dedicated, on-going supervision for Access to Justice Navigators in all the courthouses where they work. Volunteer Navigators should be supervised by trained and experienced staff who are on-site and available for questions, consultation, and support during all the hours Navigators are providing services. This supervision should include additional “on-the-job” training for Navigators about working with unrepresented litigants and court staff within the bounds of the Navigator role.
- Educating both the judges and the court attorneys who assist the judges about Navigators’ role and capacities, so that both groups are able to use Navigators as a resource in acquiring information they need to make decisions and in using courtroom time as efficiently as possible.
- Educating court staff about Navigators’ role, and working with court staff to develop means to better integrate Navigators into the case flow, so that Navigators’ work is a consistently helpful supplement to the work of clerks and other courthouse workers.
- Increasing availability of the DIY (“do-it-yourself”) computer kiosks for the preparation of answers and other legal documents.
- Developing a triage referral system that integrates the various services currently available in the courthouse, so that those cases that would benefit most from the enhanced services provided by some types of Navigators are more likely to receive them.
- Providing more information about all types of Navigators to the public, with the goal of increasing the use of all types of Navigators.

Cost projections for expansion of the projects appear in the full Report.

General Conclusions About “Roles Beyond Lawyers” Programs

This is the first comprehensive evaluation of a “Roles Beyond Lawyers” program, in which appropriately trained and supervised individuals without full formal legal training provide help to litigants who would otherwise be without assistance. As in all empirical social science, questions remain to be answered by future research. Nonetheless, actionable conclusions about the range of Roles Beyond Lawyers initiatives can be drawn from this evaluation.

1. People without formal legal training can provide meaningful assistance and services to litigants who are not represented by a lawyer.
2. These services can impact several kinds of outcomes, ranging from litigants’ understanding of court processes and empowerment to present their side of the case, to providing more relevant information to the decision-maker, to formal legal outcomes and the real-life outcomes experienced by assisted litigants and their families.
3. The tasks Navigators are actually able to perform, and thus their impact, are influenced by the philosophy and attitude of the court in which the services are provided, including the attitudes of case processing staff and judges.
4. Contributions of Navigators’ work to legal outcomes and real-life outcomes such as eviction prevention are likely similarly influenced by court environment and by the range of services and benefit programs available in the jurisdiction. The availability of such services and benefits to which Navigators can connect litigants is a major mechanism of Navigator impact. Some jurisdictions, such as New York City, have significantly more such resources than most.

5. The impact of Roles Beyond Lawyers programs on legal outcomes can be greatly assisted by the availability and use of plain language, standardized legal forms, such as the Answer form, and of software programs (what in New York are called “DIY” programs) that help litigants prepare legal documents such as answers. Such programs have been developed for many jurisdictions, facilitating the replication of Roles Beyond Lawyers programs.

General Recommendations

1. Sustaining the Current Program

The Navigators projects produce goods valued by a range of stakeholders. Sustaining funding for the program is recommended, with sufficient increases to follow the Navigator supervision recommendations in the Report.

2. Replication in New York City and State

Replication is recommended, but with careful attention to changes of the kind described above to enhance efficacy and total cost effectiveness.

3. Replication Beyond New York State

The Navigators program shows potential to contribute to the national goal of providing meaningful access to justice for all, as urged for adoption by the states by the Conference of Chief Justices.¹² The findings of the Report suggest that these approaches can be an important tool in helping achieve this goal, and that they should be integrated with other initiatives developed to meet the goal.

4. The Overall Evaluation Framework

The framework is recommended for evaluations of all types of “Roles Beyond Lawyers” programs. It is offered as useful for evaluations of other access to justice innovations. Potential downsides of a standardized approach are likely to be outweighed by the benefits of being able to compare different innovations on their appropriateness, efficacy and sustainability.

¹² Resolution 5: Reaffirming the Commitment to Meaningful Access to Justice for All. Conference of Chief Justices and Conference of State Court Administrators (2015). http://www.ncsc.org/~media/microsites/files/access/5%20meaningful%20access%20to%20justice%20for%20all_fi nal.ashx

Table of Contents

Research Summary and Recommendations.....	3
I. Roles Beyond Lawyers: Research Project Overview.....	13
II The New York City Court Navigators Program.....	14
A. The Courthouse Context.....	14
B. The New York City Court Navigators Program.....	16
C. Similarities among the Three Navigator Pilot Projects.....	17
D. Descriptions of the Three Navigator Projects.....	18
1. Access to Justice Navigators Project.....	18
2. Housing Court Answers Navigators Project.....	19
3. University Settlement Navigators Project.....	20
E. Relationships between the three pilot projects.....	20
III. Findings of the Evaluation -- Appropriateness.....	21
A. Broad Agreement on Appropriateness of Core Aspects of the Navigator Role.....	21
B. Varied Views on Expectations of Broader Impact.....	22
C. Conclusions: Appropriateness.....	22
IV. Findings of the Evaluation -- Efficacy.....	22
A. Usage of Navigator Services.....	22
1. Usage by Varied Stakeholders.....	22
2. Administrative Records for Litigants' Use of Navigators' Services.....	23
3. Survey Findings for Litigants' Use of Navigators' Services.....	23
4. Litigant Survey Reports of Specific Assistance Received from Navigators.....	24
5. Navigator Survey Reports of Activities.....	25
B. Competence of Court Navigators.....	27
1. Navigators' Self-Assessments of Competence.....	27
2. Review of Legal Documents (Answers).....	28
3. Courthouse Professionals' Assessments of the Quality of Information Provided by Navigators	31
4. Litigant Reports of Understanding Court Process.....	31
5. Litigant Reports of Procedural Justice Experiences.....	32
C. Case Outcomes.....	33
1. Overview of Case Characteristics.....	34
2. Case Process Outcomes.....	35

3.	Case Results Outcomes	35
4.	Case Characteristics, Process Outcomes and Results Outcomes for Access to Justice Navigators	36
5.	Case Characteristics, Process Outcomes and Results Outcomes for Housing Court Answers Navigators	37
6.	Case Characteristics, Process Outcomes and Results Outcomes for University Settlement Navigators	37
7.	Real-World Outcomes of Eviction Cases	37
D.	Conclusions and Potential Enhancements: Efficacy	39
1.	Efficacy of Access to Justice Navigators	39
2.	Efficacy of Housing Court Answers Navigators.....	40
3.	Efficacy of University Settlement Navigators	40
V.	Findings of the Evaluation -- Sustainability	41
A.	Legitimacy of the New York City Navigator Program.....	41
1.	Judges, clerks, court attorneys, and other service providers.....	41
2.	Opposing attorneys	44
3.	Litigants	45
4.	Conclusions: Legitimacy.....	45
B.	Perceived Value of the Navigator Program	45
1.	Perceived Value among Navigators.....	45
2.	Perceived Value among Current and Potential Funders of Navigator Projects	46
3.	Financial Sustainability of the Access to Justice Navigators Project	47
4.	Financial Sustainability of the Housing Court Answers Navigators Project	47
4.	Financial Sustainability of the University Settlement Navigators Project	48
D.	Conclusions and Potential Enhancements: Sustainability	49
VI.	Recommendations for Future Research.....	49
Appendix A.	Sources of Data	52
1.	Navigators Survey	52
2.	Courthouse Visitors Survey.....	52
3.	Key Informant Interviews	53
4.	Case File Review.....	54
5.	Snapshot Report	54
Appendix B.	Answer Form	55

Appendix C. Summary of Goals, Design, Evidence of Impact and Possible
Improvements.....56
Appendix D. Acknowledgments57

List of Tables

Table 1: Sources of Assistance Received by Litigants in the Brooklyn Housing Court: Summer 2015	24
Table 2. Types of Assistance Litigants Received from Court Navigators in the Brooklyn Housing Court: Summer 2015.....	25
Table 3. Types of Assistance Navigators Reported Giving “Frequently” or “Almost Always,” by Type of Navigator and Court.....	27
Table 4. Percentage of Navigators Ranking Specific Types of Assistance as Among Those They Felt Best Able to Provide to Litigants	28
Table 5. Tenant Understanding of What Happened in Contacts with Judge or Clerks and What to Do Next, by Type of Helper: Brooklyn Housing Court, Summer 2015	32
Table 6. Procedural Justice Experiences of Litigants, by Type of Help Received: Brooklyn Housing Court, Summer 2015.....	33
Table 7. Brooklyn Housing Court Case Files: Case Characteristics and Process Outcomes	42
Table 8. Brooklyn Housing Court Case Files: Results Outcomes	43
Table 9. Navigators’ Evaluation of the Benefits of Serving as a Navigator: Percent agreeing or strongly agreeing with each statement, by type of Navigator	46
Table 10. Respondents to the Navigator Survey, by Project.....	52
Table 11. Selected Characteristics of Respondents to the Survey and Residents of Kings County ...	53

I. Roles Beyond Lawyers: Research Project Overview

Roles Beyond Lawyers (RBLs) encompass a range of service models for civil legal assistance that draw upon personnel who have not received full formal legal training. These programs attempt to achieve the goals of increasing access to justice and ensuring consumer protection. The Roles Beyond Lawyers research project explores these models, both as currently implemented and as opportunities to be realized.

In 2014, the Public Welfare Foundation made a grant to the American Bar Foundation and the National Center for State Courts to fund the development of frameworks for the design and evaluation of such programs and for the use of that evaluation framework to assess two distinct initiatives: i) the New York Court Navigators program, reported on here, and ii) the Washington State Limited License Legal Technicians program, which authorizes trained, licensed and regulated legal technicians to provide a range of services in a provider-client relationship without attorney supervision.¹³

The first products of the project were two conceptual frameworks, one for program design and one for program evaluation.¹⁴ In developing these, we identified three challenges that all programs must meet in order to be successful, which became the criteria on which RBLs are evaluated in this research. Achieving the dual goals of access and protection requires programs to respond to the challenges of appropriateness, efficacy, and sustainability:

- Appropriateness. Program designers must identify a discrete bundle of services that can both make a material difference in the conduct of justiciable events and be competently performed by staff who are not fully trained attorneys. Achieving appropriateness is the foundational goal of any program using RBLs. If this goal is not met, the innovation will be ineffective even if well implemented and sustainable.
- Efficacy. The discrete bundle of services provided must be both competently performed and positively impactful on the work of participants in the legal matters served. Participants may include courts and their staff, who have interests in the timely, efficient and lawful processing of cases, and litigants, who have interests in these same goals. Litigants also have interests in the outcomes and experience of justice processes in their own particular matters. If appropriateness is meeting the challenge of designing an RBL that could work, efficacy is about implementing it so that it does work in attaining its specific goals for service delivery.
- Sustainability. Sustainability is perhaps the greatest challenge confronting any method of delivering appropriate and efficacious services. Services must be produced by personnel managed through durable models of training, supervision and regulation that ensure the consistent delivery of services of adequate quality. The means of funding production and delivery must be durable, whether the source is public funds, charity or philanthropy, client fees, or some combination of these. Models of service production successful at a small scale may require revision to succeed at a larger scale. Sustainability requires not only maintaining material efficacy, but also legitimacy. Stakeholders, who include the public and the organized legal profession as well as individual litigants and courts, must accept and employ the new roles as means of delivering assistance, and perceive them as at least as valuable as other uses of the same resources.

¹³ “Limited License Legal Technician Program,” <http://www.wsba.org/licensing-and-lawyer-conduct/limited-licenses/legal-technicians>. The Roles Beyond Lawyers Evaluation report on the Limited License Legal Technicians is scheduled to appear later this year.

¹⁴ INCREASING ACCESS TO JUSTICE THROUGH EXPANDED ‘ROLES BEYOND LAWYERS’: PRELIMINARY EVALUATION AND CLASSIFICATION FRAMEWORKS, Rebecca L. Sandefur and Thomas M. Clarke, American Bar Foundation and National Center for State Courts, Chicago, IL and Williamsburg, VA, 2015. Available at americanbarfoundation.org/research/A2J

This report presents findings from an empirical study of three different pilot projects under the larger umbrella of the New York City Court Navigators program. The research follows the evaluation framework¹⁵ and draws on multiple methods of analysis – surveys, interviews and a review of case files – that collect views from many angles, including the perspectives of litigants, judges, court attorneys, court clerks, program supervisors, potential funders, other service providers and Navigators themselves.¹⁶ Any given data source has limitations. Using the social scientific technique of triangulation, we employ information collected and analyzed with a range of different methods and from different perspectives, so that weaknesses in one type of information may be offset by strengths in others.

II The New York City Court Navigators Program

A. The Courthouse Context

Familiar from television and novels, the classic image of an American courtroom includes a robed judge who presides over a legal battle between two parties, each represented by lawyers who examine witnesses, present evidence and make legal arguments. This image no longer describes civil litigation in the United States. In many common kinds of civil court cases, including eviction and consumer debt collection, at least one side rarely has a lawyer. The modal pattern is one of imbalance: an unrepresented person faces an opponent represented by an attorney.¹⁷

When people face a legal action such as an eviction or a lawsuit to collect a debt, the prospect of going to court and seeing the matter through can be overwhelming. Consider this scene, typical of the Brooklyn Housing Court. The court is busy and chaotic, described as “hot” by more than one person we spoke to, processing on the order of 58,000 nonpayment cases each year. At the time the research was conducted, as many as 90 percent of tenants were appearing without lawyers,¹⁸ meaning that many people were arriving at the court with little understanding of where to go, what to do, and who might be able to help them.

Just before eight on a weekday morning, a long line of people, many holding papers of different sorts, snakes down the block where sits the main Kings County Civil Court. A police officer enforces a break in the line, directing people to keep free the width of a driveway, where cars enter the parking garage. Outside the locked glass doors of the courthouse, two vendors offer their wares. One is a man with a fruit cart selling bottled water and produce. The other hands out flyers, calling out, over and over again,

¹⁵ Id.

¹⁶ See Appendix A.

¹⁷ See, for example, THE LANDSCAPE OF LITIGATION IN STATE COURTS, Paula Hannaford-Agor, Scott Gravea and Shelley Spacek Miller. Williamsburg, VA: National Center for State Courts, 2015. Available at <http://www.ncsc.org/~media/Files/PDF/Research/CivilJusticeReport-2015.ashx>.

¹⁸ SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS: CHARACTERISTICS, NEEDS, SERVICES: THE RESULTS OF TWO SURVEYS. SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS IN THE NEW YORK CITY FAMILY COURT AND NEW YORK CITY HOUSING COURT, Office of the Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives. New York, NY: Office of the Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives, 2005. Increases in funding to legal aid have reduced the percentage of unrepresented tenants to 83 percent at the time of this writing (October 2016).

“Moving! Free Storage! Moving! Free Storage!” This is the public entrance to the court. Judges and court staff have their own entrance, down the block on the corner.

When the public entrance is unlocked, people file in slowly, following a line of ropes leading past a table of plastic tubs and up to a large “STOP” sign. Attorneys who have gone through background checks may show their credentials and enter through the public entrance without search. The public, by contrast, is greeted by a court officer who calls out gruffly, “Once you’ve emptied your pockets, come up to the STOP sign.” Gruffness will characterize much of the communication from court officers to the public, both in the hallways and in the courtrooms. Cloth bags, plastic sacks, purses and an occasional briefcase pass through these x-ray machines as their owners file through metal detectors. On the other side is an entry-way both high and dingy. The Brooklyn court is a converted office building, neither a pretty nor a pleasant space. A sign reads, “Information Desk. EXIT.” Just beyond it waits a bank of old, slow elevators, at least one of which is usually out of order. A court officer points to an open door and announces that this car is for judges and court staff only. Men and women in suits file in. The public waits its turn, standing in line sometimes for twenty or thirty minutes to use these elevators. Those who can, take the stairs.

If she is responding to an initial nonpayment petition - the landlord’s legal demand that the tenant pay rent owed or face eviction - the tenant’s first task is to file an answer. Under law, the tenant is required to answer within five days of receiving the Notice of Petition. It is not possible to file electronically in this court, so the answer must be filed physically with the Landlord-Tenant Clerk’s office, a bank of glassed-in windows along one side of a room on the second floor. When people arrive there, they find another line, stretching out into the hallway and looping back and forth around in front of the elevators. People wait here in the first line to tell the clerk at the information window why they are visiting the clerk’s office that day. Once the clerk determines why each is there, each receives a number.

People then wait on wooden benches in the clerk’s waiting room until their number is called and they are told which window to visit. Most people waiting will be answering “in person”: when their number is called, they will file their answer orally by speaking with a clerk, who will record their stated defenses and inform them of their court date. New York City courts provide standardized answer forms, which list the possible defenses to the claim of nonpayment.¹⁹ In the clerk’s waiting room, large signs list these possible answers and define each briefly. A big flat screen TV plays informational videos in English and Spanish, advertising the availability of various services such as interpreters and the court Help Center. The videos also explain basic concepts of housing law and the roles of different courthouse personnel. In the back of the waiting room is a table staffed by Housing Court Answers, a local nonprofit organization that provides information about law and court processes to unrepresented people involved in eviction cases.

When the court is busy, visitors may wait well over an hour – occasionally as long as two hours -- to get through their tasks with the clerk. People who have come to court because they have an appearance scheduled before a judge may find the small sign on the second floor that lists the “parts” of the court and the room number where each part is held. If they do not find this sign, they can visit each floor and inspect each courtroom’s door. Or they can ask someone. The courthouse opens at 8 a.m., and judges take the bench at 9:30. All tenants will have received an appearance time of either 9:30 a.m. or 2 p.m., but this scheduled time has little to do with the actual time of their appearance. Most courtrooms do not start actually calling individual cases until well after 9:30. Litigants must wait, sometimes for hours, until their case is called. It is often difficult for people to figure out what they are meant to do and how. For example, a first task for litigants when a courtroom opens is to find a specific number and use it to check in with the court officer. As the court officer will announce, this “number is not on any of the documents you received from the court.” Rather, it is listed on a piece of paper posted in the hall outside the courtroom. Many first-time litigants seem lost, “sitting there waiting to be scolded” into doing what comes next, as one Navigator described to us.

¹⁹ See Appendix B.

While people wait, they may watch informational videos, like those in the clerk’s office, playing on large monitors. They are often waiting not only to see a judge, but also to be called into the hall by their landlord’s attorney. There they will talk about their case and perhaps arrive at some kind of settlement. Not all attorneys exhibit the highest degree of professionalism in these hallway conferences; for example, we heard reports of bullying, deception and sexual harassment. Even when one’s landlord’s attorney is professional and respectful, this interaction can nevertheless be very intimidating for a tenant without representation. And also high stakes: a recent study in this court found that average demands for back rent were over $4,000,²⁰ and eviction is a potential outcome of a nonpayment action.

B. The New York City Court Navigators Program

It was into this context of chaos, high case volumes and low rates of attorney representation that Chief Judge Jonathan Lippman launched the Court Navigators program. Navigators are lay people who assist litigants who appear in court without attorneys to represent them. Navigators were conceived as assistants for unrepresented litigants in contexts where the vast majority of individuals appear unrepresented and most of their opponents are represented by lawyers.

On February 11, 2014, Chief Judge Lippman announced in his State of the Judiciary speech what he described as:

[A] series of court-sponsored incubator projects to expand the role of non-lawyers in assisting unrepresented litigants. This idea of finding ways for non-lawyers to help pro se litigants is one that has only just begun to emerge in the United States. But it has taken hold elsewhere in the common-law world, including the United Kingdom, to great positive effect. With the new projects that we announce today, it is my hope that we can graphically illustrate the tremendous difference non-lawyers can make in closing the justice gap.

That same month, three different pilot Navigator projects commenced under the general guidance of a special task force appointed by the Chief Judge. The pilot projects operated within the New York Civil Court, under the Supervision of Deputy Chief Administrative Judge Fern Fisher and with close participation of community groups and regular input from legal aid organizations and bar associations.

All of the pilot projects shared a general approach, described by Chief Judge Lippman in the 2014 State of the Judiciary speech:

. . . . This kind of one-on-one assistance will include providing informational resources to litigants and helping them access and complete court do-it-yourself forms and assemble documents, as well as assisting in settlement negotiations outside the courtroom.

Most significantly, for the first time, the trained non-lawyers, called Navigators, will be permitted to accompany unrepresented litigants into the courtroom in specific locations in Brooklyn Housing Court and Bronx Civil Court. They will not be permitted to address the court on their own, but if the judge directs factual questions to them, they will be able to respond. They will also provide moral support and information to litigants, help them keep paperwork in order, assist them in accessing interpreters and other services, and, before they even enter the courtroom, explain what to expect and what the roles are of each person in the courtroom.

²⁰ DATA BRIEF: PROVIDING NON-LAWYER ASSISTANCE TO NEW YORKERS IN HOUSING COURT, University Settlement and Housing Court Answers, Table 1, 2014.

Clear guidelines govern what a non-lawyer can and cannot do to ensure that they do not cross the line into the practice of law. They will receive training and develop expertise in defined subject areas. When these non-lawyers confront situations where the help of a lawyer is crucial, they will have access to legal service providers for help and referrals.

An Order issued by the Chief Administrative Judge of the Courts codified these protections and authorizations.²¹

C. Similarities among the Three Navigator Pilot Projects

Though the three Navigator pilot projects differ in important respects, all involve the same core capacities. New York Court Navigators can provide a range of in-court assistance to unrepresented litigants, including:

- Providing information about
 - the legal process the litigant is involved in.
 - the courthouse and the roles of the different people who work there.
 - resources that the litigant might find helpful, including legal services and social services available both inside and outside the courthouse.
- Assisting litigants in organizing papers they bring to court.
- Accompanying litigants
 - to meetings with clerk's office staff,
 - during hallway conversations with the opposing side,
 - during conferences with court attorneys, and,
 - during appearances before a judge.
- Speaking in court in answer to factual questions addressed directly to them by a judge or court attorney.

Court Navigators may not give legal advice, advocate for or otherwise represent litigants before the court or in conversations with the opposing side's attorney, nor may they fill out forms on litigants' behalf. While serving in court, all Navigators wear badges identifying themselves as Navigators and signaling that their presence is approved by the court.

Beyond the core capacities shared by all Court Navigators, the three models of Court Navigator represented in the pilot projects are distinctive in their aims and design. Each is described below.²²

²¹ See Administrative Order of the Chief Administrative Judge of the Courts 42-14, February 11, 2014. Available at <https://www.nycourts.gov/courts/nyc/SSI/pdfs/AO-42-14.pdf>.

²² A summary table in Appendix C of the full report succinctly describes the pilot projects, their aims, and the findings for each.

D. Descriptions of the Three Navigator Projects

1. Access to Justice Navigators Project

Navigators in the Access to Justice Navigators pilot project provide in-court assistance only. They are “Navigators for the day.” Access to Justice Navigators may accompany unrepresented litigants when they meet with judges, court attorneys, or the other side’s attorney, whether in the hallway or the courtroom. They may also assist unrepresented litigants in organizing papers they have brought to the courthouse, provide information about available resources, explain court processes and the roles of different court personnel, and help find people or places in the courthouse building. All courthouses provide computer kiosks with “DIY” (do-it-yourself) legal document creation software. Access to Justice Navigators assist unrepresented litigants in using the software to prepare court forms, such as Answers to petitions of nonpayment and Orders to Show Cause. Access to Justice Navigators operate in housing court in Brooklyn, the Bronx, Manhattan and Queens, and assist in consumer debt cases in the Bronx.

Litigants learn of the availability of Access to Justice Navigators through signage in the courthouse and announcements made in the courtroom. Near the beginning of the courtroom’s workday the judge or court attorney will announce that Navigators are available to assist and that people should sign up if they would like assistance that day.

In all of the courthouses in which they are active, Access to Justice Navigators projects have common elements of staffing and training, though recruitment, supervision, workflow and activities can be organized in different ways in different courts. All Access to Justice Navigators are volunteers, and all receive a 3-hour training including videos in which actors (often members of court staff) role-play common courthouse scenarios. They receive basic instruction about their role and an orientation to housing court, a manual, and copies of informational materials produced by the court and various nonprofit organizations. The training is interactive, with opportunities for Navigator-trainees to ask questions. To participate in the Access to Justice Navigators project, volunteers commit to serving at least 30 hours over the course of the three months after training.

In the different courthouses where they work across the city, the Access to Justice Navigator role has been implemented in somewhat different ways, including:

a. Differences in the amount of supervision:

- Because of a scarcity of court funding in the State of New York, the model of supervision varies across different courthouses. In some courts, Access to Justice Navigators are supervised by court staff assigned exclusively to this task. In other courts, supervision of the Access to Justice Navigators is a task added to the existing job responsibilities of a court attorney who works with the judge in the courtroom.
- Court attorneys differ in their engagement with the Access to Justice Navigators. Some estimate spending as much as an hour each day organizing the Access to Justice Navigators’ work and answering questions. Others are more hands-off.

b. Differences in what supervision entails:

- All Access to Justice Navigators receive the core training developed by the court. In some courts, supervisors organize additional activities that involve shadowing more experienced Navigators and supervisors’ observation of them at work and frequent feedback. The purpose of this “on-the-job” training is to help Navigators be more effective in their interactions with court staff and litigants while remaining within the bounds of the Navigator role.

- In some courts, the Navigators’ supervisor allocates Navigators across different areas of the courthouse based on anticipated workflow; in others, the Navigators decide themselves where to focus their efforts.

c. Differences in activities:

- In some courts, Access to Justice Navigators work only in a single courtroom; in others, they work in multiple courtrooms and actively roam the hallways.
- As we will discuss below, the specific tasks Navigators are most likely to perform differ from court to court.

d. Differences in the source and compensation of those staffing the Access to Justice Navigator role:

- Though all Access to Justice Navigators are volunteers, they have different credentials and experience. Most have been college students. Some law students and retirees have also participated in the project.
- Some of the college students are receiving course credit; others are not.

Since the project began in February 2014, 604 people have served as Access to Justice Navigators in housing court and 72 people have served as Access to Justice Navigators in consumer debt cases.

2. Housing Court Answers Navigators Project

Navigators in the Housing Court Answers Navigators pilot project provide in-court assistance only. They are, like Access to Justice Navigators, “Navigators for the day.” Currently, the Housing Court Answers Navigators work in the Brooklyn Housing Court. This pilot project is operated by Housing Court Answers, a New York City nonprofit organization that assists people with information about housing court and local housing laws and regulations.²³ Two days each week from 9a.m. to noon, as people line up at the clerk’s office to file paperwork or ask questions, Housing Court Answers Navigators work the line, approaching them and asking them if they are in court “because they have received nonpayment papers.” If they meet the criteria for project eligibility²⁴, a Housing Court Answers Navigator will offer to assist the litigants in filing an answer. The Brooklyn court uses a standardized answer form. The form lists the possible defenses that a tenant may have to the landlord’s claim that she owes unpaid rent, such as that notice was not properly served, that the amount demanded is incorrect, or that the conditions of the apartment are not up to code.²⁵ Using an informational script, the Housing Court Answers Navigator takes the unrepresented litigant through the potential defenses on the form. The Housing Court Answers Navigator accompanies the litigant to the clerk’s window, where the form is then filed as an answer in person with the clerk, and signed “Navigator.” All Housing Court Answers-navigated cases are currently assigned to the same courtroom, that in which Access to Justice Navigators and employees in the third Navigator project, University Settlement (see below), currently work. As part of their interaction with litigants, Housing Court Answers Navigators conduct an assessment to determine whether litigants are candidates for services from University Settlement.

²³ See <http://cwtfhc.org/>.

²⁴ To receive Housing Court Answers assistance, a litigant must be a named respondent on a nonpayment case who is in court to file a first time answer. The housing must be a rent-stabilized apartment, and cannot be in zip codes 11212 or 11226 (such cases are referred to the Legal Aid Society).

²⁵ See Appendix B.

Housing Court Answers Navigators are volunteers; almost all have been college students, though some have been law students. Some receive course credit; others do not. Housing Court Answers Navigators receive the Access to Justice Navigators training described above, as well as an additional training provided by Housing Court Answers staff. In addition, during the time that Housing Court Answers Navigators are working, a paid supervisor is present overseeing their work.

During the first year of the pilot project, 15 people worked as Housing Court Answers Navigators.

3. University Settlement Navigators Project

Navigators in the University Settlement Navigators pilot project work in the Brooklyn Housing Court. University Settlement Navigators are paid employees of University Settlement, a New York City nonprofit organization that provides social and human services.²⁶ The University Settlement Navigators pilot project coordinates activities with the Housing Court Answers pilot project, whose eligibility screening is used to identify cases to be referred to University Settlement for further screening and possible intake. The University Settlement Navigators pilot project focuses on cases that both meet the eligibility requirements for the Housing Court Answers project and have characteristics that suggest that the University Settlement Navigators project may be able to make a difference in case outcomes. The University Settlement Navigators project targets tenants who may be particularly vulnerable to eviction, such as those with limited English proficiency, limited literacy, cognitive limitations, or underlying social service needs that may be contributing to housing insecurity, those facing claims for substantial amounts of back rent, and those eligible for rent subsidies or other social programs.

University Settlement Navigators work their cases from intake through resolution and beyond. In addition to providing in-court assistance with paperwork and accompaniment to meetings with judges and court attorneys, University Settlement Navigators work to connect litigants with eviction-prevention grants, city, state and federal benefits for which they are eligible, and services for social and other needs they may identify, such as family mediation or mental health treatment. University Settlement Navigators are present with litigants when they have court appearances, and check in with them repeatedly over the life of their cases and after their cases conclude.

For most of the life of the University Settlement Navigators project, two full-time University Settlement Navigators, sometimes assisted by part-time University Settlement Navigators, have worked in the Brooklyn courthouse. Their work is coordinated by a paid supervisor who oversees the project.

E. Relationships between the three pilot projects

Access to Justice Navigators work in courts in four of the City's boroughs, including the Brooklyn Housing Court that is the site of the Housing Court Answers and University Settlement pilot projects. At present, Housing Court Answers and University Settlement work together to coordinate intake in the Brooklyn courthouse, while the Access to Justice Navigators pilot project operates independently of the other two. The three pilot projects differ in how they connect with litigants and organize the flow of cases served. Access to Justice Navigators offer services to all litigants on both sides, and serve those who accept the offer, with the only eligibility screen being that the litigant has no lawyer representation. The Housing Court Answers pilot project serves tenants filtered through a more elaborate eligibility screen, as described above. The Housing Court Answers pilot makes referrals to the University Settlement pilot for further screening.

²⁶ See <http://www.universitysettlement.org/us/about/>.

III. Findings of the Evaluation -- Appropriateness

The evaluation follows the framework developed for the research, focusing on three challenges that all Roles Beyond Lawyers programs must meet in order to be successful:

- Appropriateness: identifying a discrete bundle of tasks that makes a difference in the conduct of some legal matter and can be successfully carried out by someone who does not have the full formal legal training that has traditionally led to bar admission.
- Efficacy: carrying out that appropriate bundle of tasks competently and with desired impact.
- Sustainability: organizing and funding the production of services in a durable way, so that key stakeholders accept the new role and perceive positive value from it.

Because the different Navigator pilot projects both share core competencies and were created with different aims and important differences in their design, we discuss them both as an umbrella Navigator program and separately as distinct pilot projects.

Appropriateness requires crafting a role that makes a positive difference in the conduct of a matter but does not require the full qualifications of an attorney. Here, we focus on the perspectives of stakeholders who have expertise in the relevant law and court processes, including attorneys, judges and other court staff, and those involved in the design and implementation of the Navigator program and the three pilot projects.

A. Broad Agreement on Appropriateness of Core Aspects of the Navigator Role

Stakeholders were generally in agreement that all forms of Navigators were an appropriate model for achieving improvements in litigant experience and enhancing unrepresented litigants' participation in their own cases. They judged that the core capacities of all forms of Navigators – information, moral support, and accompaniment through case activities – could be used effectively by trained lay people, and that these capacities showed promise to achieve the aims of improved litigant experience and enhanced litigant participation. Some spoke in terms that strongly echoed what scholars term procedural justice: people's sense that a decision process was fair and incorporated their participation, that they were treated with respect, and that the decision-maker was impartial.²⁷ These stakeholders wished unrepresented litigants to have an experience that these litigants perceived as fair and just. They wanted unrepresented litigants to have information that would help them understand what was happening to them and with their cases. They described Navigators as providing this information and also moral support. They emphasized that an important part of training was explaining to Navigators what they should not do, as a way of helping Navigators to understand the boundaries of the practice of law, so that they could be sure not to “cross the line.”

²⁷ THE SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY OF PROCEDURAL JUSTICE, E. Allen Lind and Tom R. Tyler, Springer, 1988.

B. Varied Views on Expectations of Broader Impact

Some stakeholders envisioned a further expanded role for Navigators. These stakeholders shared the view that the Navigator role was an appropriate model for achieving procedural justice, but they believed Navigators could achieve other goals as well. These stakeholders focused on material outcomes. They believed that Navigators could and should change the legal outcomes of the cases they assisted, and in so doing contribute to the attainment of goals beyond the conduct of court cases, such as preventing evictions or maintaining the stock of rent-stabilized housing. These stakeholders believed that providing information, accompaniment through court processes, connections to useful services, and moral support were appropriate capacities for trained nonlawyers, but they also further expected that these activities could change both the legal and real-life outcomes of court cases.

C. Conclusions: Appropriateness

Stakeholders were in broad agreement that the Navigator roles were appropriately designed: the bundles of tasks that comprised each of the three models of Navigator were seen as being well within the capacity of trained nonlawyers and as likely to have the impacts desired by program creators.

IV. Findings of the Evaluation -- Efficacy

A program's efficacy might be reflected in a range of specific outcomes desired by pilot project stakeholders. In this report, we will focus on two: (1) usage of the service; and (2) competence of service providers. While all three kinds of Navigators were designed to be used and meant to do their work competently, the pilot projects differ in their aims and design; thus, what use and competence mean are different for the different projects. For example, case outcomes are not targeted by the Access to Justice Navigator project. Case outcomes are relevant measures of efficacy for Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators, which are intended to affect the conduct of nonpayment cases.

A. Usage of Navigator Services

1. Usage by Varied Stakeholders

Most basically, a Roles Beyond Lawyers program has to be used to have positive impact. While litigants are often understood as the main users of RBL services, RBLs work can impact a range of different actors involved in the matters on which they work. In the case of Court Navigators, we identified four groups of people who effectively used Court Navigators' services, only some of whom are clients in a conventional sense: clerk's office staff, court attorneys, judges, and litigants.

Clerks and other clerk's office staff. Clerks typically have three kinds of interactions with Navigators. The first two can occur with any of the three kinds of Navigators – Access to Justice, Housing Court Answers, and University Settlement. The first type of interaction between clerks and Navigators occurs when the Navigator accompanies a litigant to file some kind of paperwork or ask a question. A second occurs when the Navigator interacts with clerks at one remove, as when a litigant interacts with clerk's office staff based on information that she or he declares having received from a Navigator. A third occurs when clerks and Access to Justice Navigators coordinate to triage litigants to the Do-It-Yourself (DIY) computer kiosks where they can complete legal forms such as answers and orders to show cause. Access to Justice Navigators reported working with clerks to “clear the line” at the clerk’s window in the Brooklyn courthouse. The clerk at the information window would meet with litigants, try to discern what they were there to do that day, and when appropriate hand the litigant a slip of paper to give to an Access to Justice Navigator. This slip would indicate that the litigant needed to produce a specific document. The Access to Justice Navigator would then accompany the litigant to the computer and assist her in creating the document.

Court attorneys and judges. Court attorneys and judges are also users of Navigators services. Navigators may accompany litigants when they meet with attorneys or judges. In addition, Navigators can answer factual questions directed to them by judges. As we will discuss below, aspects of the context in which Navigators work affected what Navigators actually did and, therefore, the interactions they had with other participants in the cases. Judges and court attorneys in the different courthouses reported very different frequencies of interaction with Navigators. Some reported noticing them and their work, others did not. These differences corresponded with Navigators’ reports of their own activities in different courthouses.²⁸

Litigants. Litigants are the end users of all three kinds of Navigators’ services. The current Navigator projects are at the scale of pilots, and thus can serve only a small proportion of unrepresented litigants.

2. Administrative Records for Litigants’ Use of Navigators’ Services

One measure of litigants’ use of the projects’ services is provided by the administrative records of the programs themselves.

Between the beginning of the pilot and August 2016, 604 Access to Justice housing Navigators working across the city had served 9,303 tenants in housing cases. In the Brooklyn Housing Court specifically, Access to Justice housing Navigators served 1,259 litigants between the start of the project and August 2016. During this same period, 72 Access to Justice consumer Navigators served 3,196 consumers facing debt proceedings.

During two years of the pilot, Housing Court Answers Navigators records indicate answer-filing assistance to 1,371 litigants, 567 of whom were referred to University Settlement for potential services by University Settlement Navigators.

University Settlement records indicate service in 301 cases over this period.

3. Survey Findings for Litigants’ Use of Navigators’ Services

Another measure of use comes from surveys of litigants in the Brooklyn courthouse. Visitors to the courthouse were asked “while you’ve been here today, have you gotten help with your case from anyone?” As Table 1 reports, most people were not helped by anyone on the day they were surveyed: 27 percent reported getting help from someone that day while at the courthouse; 73 percent of litigants surveyed reported that they had received no help from anyone at the courthouse. Those who reported help were asked, “Who helped you? Was this person an attorney or a Court Navigator or someone else?” Of those litigants who reported being helped, the most common source of help reported was actually an attorney. Over two fifths (43 percent) of those reporting help believed that they had been helped by an attorney. Of those about two-fifths, 78 percent reported that the attorney was working with them for the whole case, while 15 percent reported receiving assistance from a “lawyer for the day.” Litigant reports thus suggest that during the summer of 2015 about 12 percent of tenants had some kind of attorney assistance in the Brooklyn Housing Court. However, this figure likely overstates the amount of representation actually received by tenants at that time. It is clear from the comments of the survey takers that tenants sometimes believed that their landlord’s attorney was an attorney representing them, and that some even believed that their landlord’s attorney was counsel appointed for them by the court. This misunderstanding is part of the confusion that pervades the court.

²⁸ See below, Table 3 and accompanying text.

About a fifth (19 percent) of those who reported help from someone believed that they had been helped by a Navigator. This implies that Navigators in the Brooklyn Housing Court were assisting about 5 percent ($=.27 \times .19$) of litigants during the summer of 2015. These reports are an imprecise estimate of Navigators’ use by litigants since, as we have seen, people are not always clear on who has assisted them.

About two-fifths (38 percent) of those who reported getting help at the courthouse from someone reported receiving help from a person who was neither an attorney nor a Navigator, such as a court officer, a clerk or another litigant.

Table 1: Sources of Assistance Received by Litigants in the Brooklyn Housing Court: Summer 2015

Receive help in the courthouse today?	Total	Of those reporting assistance
Yes	27 %	100 %
Helped by
Attorney	12 %	43 %
For the whole case	9 %	34 %
For the day	2 %	7 %
Court Navigator	5 %	19 %
Someone else	10 %	38 %

Source: Courthouse Visitors Survey. N=679.

Notes: Some quantities may not sum to 100 percent due to rounding and the omission of “don’t know” and declined to answer responses from the table. For example, 1 percent of respondents either did not know or did not want to report whether their attorney was working the whole case or was a lawyer for the day.

4. Litigant Survey Reports of Specific Assistance Received from Navigators

Just as important as whether Navigators’ services are used at all is which of the specific services that Navigators are empowered to provide are used by litigants. Tenants who reported assistance from a Court Navigator were more likely to report using Navigator assistance for some portions of their cases than for others.

Based on the information from the sample of people who believed they had been served by Navigators, as Table 2 reports, half (50 percent) of those who reported assistance from a Navigator said that the Navigator had helped them organize papers, 17 percent reported that the Navigator accompanied them in meeting with their landlord’s attorney, while 12 percent reported that the Navigator went with them to meet with the court attorney. Among the few Navigator-assisted survey respondents who had met with the judge before being surveyed, 40 percent said that the Navigator had accompanied them to meet with the judge. Because litigants do not typically know what kind of Navigator they are working with, their reports do not permit us to compare the activities of different kinds of Navigators.

Table 2. Types of Assistance Litigants Received from Court Navigators in the Brooklyn Housing Court: Summer 2015

Help organize papers	Accompany to meet with landlord's attorney	Accompany to meet with the court attorney	Accompany to meet with the judge
50 %	17 %	12 %	40 %

Source: Courthouse Visitors Survey.

Notes: Don't know, would rather not say, and not applicable responses excluded.

N=33 people reporting assistance from a Court Navigator on the day they were surveyed, of whom 5 had met with a judge, 26 had met with a court attorney, and 24 had met with their landlord's attorney.

5. Navigator Survey Reports of Activities

Navigators' reports of their own activities do allow separate examinations of the activities of the three different kinds of Navigators. They also permit a first comparison of the activities of Access to Justice Navigators working in different courts. In the survey of Navigators, each was asked to report on how frequently she or he provided seven different forms of assistance in each courthouse in which she or he reported working. Table 3 reports on results of an analysis of the activities of Access to Justice Navigators in each of the courts where they worked, as well as those of Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators working in the Brooklyn Housing Court. The Table reports, for each type of assistance, the percentage of each group of Navigators who reported "frequently" or "almost always" providing each type of assistance to the unrepresented litigants whom they served.

a. Activities Reported by Access to Justice Navigators

The first panel of the Table reports on Access to Justice Navigators' activities overall and in each of the courtrooms where each reported working during his or her period of service as a Navigator. The first row reports the percentage of Access to Justice Navigators who said that they "frequently" or "almost always" gave each type of assistance in any courtroom in which they worked. Consistent with the design of the Access to Justice Navigators pilot project, the most commonly reported activities are answering litigants' questions and providing information, either about the courthouse itself (56 percent of Access to Justice Navigators reported doing this at least frequently) or about court processes (53 percent of Access to Justice Navigators reported doing this at least frequently). The next most common activity reported was escorting litigants around the courthouse (42 percent of Access to Justice Navigators reported doing this at least frequently in at least one of the courthouses where they worked). A fifth (40 percent) of Access to Justice Navigators reported that they typically helped litigants with papers or documents. Access to Justice Navigators were less likely to report that they typically accompanied litigants to talk to court attorneys or the other side's attorney (30 percent and 33 percent, respectively, reported doing these activities at least frequently). A quarter (25 percent) of Access to Justice Navigators said that they at least frequently accompanied litigants to meet with judges.

Access to Justice Navigators are meant to engage in all of the activities queried, so it is interesting to ask why they are more likely to perform some forms of assistance than others. One possibility is, of course, that litigants are more open to some kinds of help than others. However, an analysis of Navigators' reports of what they do in different courts is instructive. The second panel of Table 3 presents Access to Justice Navigators' reports of their activities in different courts. Each court in which Access to Justice Navigators work is designated by a randomly chosen letter. As the table shows, Navigators were more or less likely to perform specific tasks depending on the court in which they were working. For example, helping litigants with papers or documents was common in most courts, but not all: for example, in Court B, only 25 percent of those Navigators who had worked there reported that they frequently or almost always helped litigants with documents in Court B. This specific finding is an example of a general pattern: Access to Justice Navigators report different patterns of activity in different courts. As we will see, a review of the evidence reveals that an important part of the differences seen across courts is associated with differences in Navigator supervision and in the openness of courthouse professionals to Navigators' presence and work.

This analysis reveals the importance of two key supports for the efficacy of this new role: supervision and cooperative court staff. The importance of supervision is illustrated by the comparison of Courts A and B to Courts D and E. Courts A and B are both environments where supervision of the Access to Justice Navigators was relatively light, while in Courts D and E supervision was active and engaged, with dedicated staff time set aside for this work. When working in the courts with dedicated supervisory staff, Access to Justice Navigators were, across the board, more active, reporting that they were more likely to provide to litigants every service that we asked them about. For example, in Court B, few Access to Justice Navigators (17 percent) reported frequently or almost always accompanying litigants to talk with the other side's attorney; few (17 percent) reported frequently or almost always accompanying litigants to talk with the court attorney; and fewer (8 percent) reported frequently or almost always accompanying litigants to meet with the judge. The picture of activity is different in Court D, where 42 percent reported frequently or almost always accompanying litigants to talk with the other side's attorney, 31 percent reported frequently or almost always accompanying litigants to talk with the court attorney, and 15 percent reported frequently or almost always accompanying litigants to meet with the judge.

The differences between Courts A and E are even more striking, and reflect the importance not only of supervision, but of the cooperation of court staff. Court A was for several months presided over by a judge who was described as "hostile" to Navigators, and who worked with a court attorney described as indifferent. It is telling that in this environment Navigators were unlikely to report that they frequently accompanied litigants to meet with the court attorney (13 percent reported doing so frequently or almost always) or the judge (none reported doing so frequently or almost always). Court E provides an interesting comparison: here, both the judge and the court attorney embraced the Access to Justice Navigators project. In this more cooperative environment, Access to Justice Navigators were much more likely to accompany the litigants they served to their meetings with the court attorney (78 percent reported doing so frequently or almost always) and the judge (89 percent reported doing so frequently or almost always).

b. Activities Reported by Housing Court Answers Navigators

The third panel of Table 3 reports on the activities of Housing Court Answers Navigators. As we described above, the Housing Court Answers Navigators focus their efforts on the front end of the case: the first trip to the courthouse to file an answer to a nonpayment petition received from the landlord. Housing Court Answers Navigators reported activities are consistent with this vision of their role: their most commonly reported activities are helping litigants with papers or documents (90 percent reported doing this frequently or almost always for litigants) and answering questions or providing information about court processes (100 percent reported doing this frequently or almost always for litigants).

c. Activities Reported by University Settlement Navigators

University Settlement Navigators take cases selected from those referred by Housing Court Answers and then follow those cases through their time in court to resolution and afterwards. University Settlement Navigators activity reports are consistent with this vision of their role: they report high rates of “frequently” or “almost always” accompanying litigants throughout activities in the courthouse, including meetings with the other side’s attorney, the court attorney, and the judge, as well as providing information about court processes.

Though all Navigators have the same in-court capacities, the different projects exhibit distinctive patterns in the extent to which Navigators actually use each of the specific capacities. These differences reflect a range of factors, including differences in how Navigators are supervised in the different pilot projects and courthouses, and differences in the openness of judges, clerks and court attorneys to interacting with Navigators.

B. Competence of Court Navigators

Competence is reflected in work product – for example, legal documents, legal advice, or information – of satisfactory quality. Our evaluation of Navigator work product will focus on Navigators’ assessment of their own competencies, assessments of Navigators’ competence from stakeholders who interact with them or observe them at work, legal documents (answer forms), litigant understanding, and case outcomes.

1. Navigators’ Self-Assessments of Competence

As we saw above, Navigators in the different projects reported different activities. Similarly, Navigators working in the different projects also reported different activities as more successful or effective. What different types of Navigators reported actually doing (above, Table 3) paralleled their assessments of what they were successfully providing to the people whom they served. Table 4 draws on questions that asked Navigators what benefits or services they felt best able to provide to litigants. The quantities in Table 4 are the percentage of each group of Navigators who ranked each kind of assistance among the two they felt best able to provide; that is, the percentage who assigned a rank of 1 or 2 to that particular form of assistance.

Table 4 groups the different types of assistance into three categories and provides the information separately for Access to Justice Navigators and for Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators.²⁹ Three kinds of assistance involve providing goods that support a positive experience of procedural justice: information about court processes, information about the courthouse, and moral support. Two kinds of help could be considered material assistance: connecting litigants to other useful services that they may want or need and helping litigants to accomplish the tasks they are in the courthouse to complete. Finally, we asked Navigators how able they felt they were to provide litigants with specifically legal help.

Providing information and support is at the core of the role intended for Access to Justice Navigators. Access to Justice Navigators see themselves as fulfilling this role. Access to Justice Navigators felt particularly effective at providing information to litigants about what was happening in their cases: 93 percent of Access to Justice Navigators ranked this form of assistance as first or second among those they felt best able to provide. Two fifths (40 percent) of Access to Justice Navigators ranked moral support as among the two forms of assistance they felt best able to provide. About the same proportion of Access to Justice Navigators (42 percent) believed that connecting litigants to useful services was among the most successful parts of their work.

²⁹ To protect Navigators’ confidentiality, the responses of Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators are combined in this report. See Appendix A for details about the Navigator Survey.

Table 3. Types of Assistance Navigators Reported Giving “Frequently” or “Almost Always,” by Type of Navigator and Court

	Help with papers or documents	Answer questions or offer information about the courthouse	Escort them to a place in the courthouse	Answer questions or provide information about court processes*	Accompany litigants when talking with the other side’s attorney	Accompany litigants when they were talking with the court attorney ⁺	Accompany litigants when they were meeting with the judge ⁺
ACCESS TO JUSTICE NAVIGATORS	40 %	56 %	42 %	53 %	33 %	30 %	25 %
Court A	50 %	63 %	50 %	50 %	38 %	13 %	0 %
Court B	25 %	50 %	33 %	33 %	17 %	17 %	8 %
Court C	67 %	67 %	56 %	78 %	44 %	50 %	33 %
Court D	62 %	85 %	77 %	85 %	42 %	31 %	15 %
Court E	44 %	78 %	56 %	78 %	67 %	78 %	89 %
HOUSING COURT ANSWERS NAVIGATORS	90 %	60 %	30 %	100 %	30 %	30 %	20 %
UNIVERSITY SETTLEMENT NAVIGATORS	60 %	60 %	80 %	80 %	80 %	80 %	80 %

Source: Navigators Survey.

See Appendix A for a description of the Navigators Survey.

* p < .05 for χ^2 test of significant difference across the three types of Navigators.

⁺ p < .10 for χ^2 test of significant difference across the three types of Navigators.

While the Access to Justice Navigators’ role is designed to enhance the procedural justice of litigants’ courthouse experiences, Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators’ roles were designed to change how these cases turn out. Our analysis of where Navigators saw their own efficacy bears these design features out. Two fifths (40 percent) of Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators ranked the two forms of material assistance -- connections to services and help doing necessary tasks at the courthouse -- as among the services they were best able to provide. These Navigators also felt effective at explaining to litigants what was happening in their cases, with 53 percent ranking information about court processes as among the two forms of assistance they felt best able to provide.

None of the Navigator roles is meant to encompass any of the tasks currently considered as part of the practice of law. Indeed, all three roles are explicitly designed to provide different kinds of help to people in court for a legal problem without straying into giving those people any kind of legal advice or representation. An important component of the Navigators’ initial training is designed to communicate the importance of not taking actions or giving advice that might shade into legal practice. Navigators’ assessments of their own effectiveness were consistent with this limitation. All types of Navigators were unlikely to say that they felt best able help litigants with their legal problems.

Table 4. Percentage of Navigators Ranking Specific Types of Assistance as Among Those They Felt Best Able to Provide to Litigants

	Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators	Access to Justice Navigators
Information and support
Information about court processes	53 %	93 %
Information about the courthouse	9 %	13 %
Moral support	20 %	40 %
Material assistance
Connections to useful services	40 %	42 %
Help doing what they needed to do in court that day	40 %	23 %
Legal assistance
Help with their legal problems	13 %	18 %

Source: Navigators Survey.

 $p < .01$ for χ^2 test of significant difference across the two groups of Navigators.

2. Review of Legal Documents (Answers)

We turn now to a review of evidence about competence as illustrated in a specific work product, legal documents. One assessment of the quality of a legal document is whether it performs successfully as the document it is meant to be – as a will, or a power of attorney, or a decree of divorce, or an answer to a petition for unpaid rent, for example.

In the sample of Brooklyn housing case files that we reviewed, every single answer filed with the assistance of a Housing Court Answers Navigator successfully performed as such. In fact, every answer in the files we reviewed successfully performed as such. No doubt this was in part a result of two factors. The first is the codification of legal expertise into the form itself, which lists for the respondent the possible defenses to the claim of rent owed (see Appendix B). The form greatly simplifies the process of constructing an answer, and likely facilitates assistance by nonlawyers. The second is the fact that clerks did not file answers that would not function as such. This screening of answers is part of clerks' interaction with litigants. The finding that all answers performed is not trivial: this specific court process has been designed so that litigants can successfully complete it without attorney assistance, when success is defined as the creation of a legal document that performs as intended.

While all answers performed, they were not all the same. In New York law, defenses must be asserted at the time of initial answer; consequently, what is asserted on the answer form shapes the possibilities for how a respondent may develop her defense to the claim of nonpayment and the possibility of eventual eviction. Thus, a key first step in defense against a nonpayment claim is the assertion of all applicable defenses at the time of answer.

We will draw on two sources of data to investigate how Navigator assistance may have shaped defenses asserted on the answer form. In both instances it is important to recognize that cases and litigants who receive service and those who do not are not necessarily drawn from identical groups. While Housing Court Answers Navigators did not target specific litigants, but rather worked the line of those waiting at the clerk's office, litigants who accepted their services may have been different in some ways from those who did not. For example, litigants who accepted their help may have been more motivated to get or hopeful about getting a good resolution for their cases, they may have been more confident talking to strangers in a bustling place like a courthouse, and so forth. These differences in who accepts assistance may have implications for how people are likely to conduct themselves as their case goes forward. Thus, while our analyses can provide some insights into how Navigators shape the conduct of cases, they are not a definitive test of a "Navigator effect." Rather, the study is an assessment of available evidence about whether such an effect might be in operation.

The first source of data is an analysis produced by Housing Court Answers and University Settlement in collaboration. They reviewed a random sample of 100 Brooklyn Housing Court case files, comprised of 50 cases assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators and processed in the courtroom where Navigators operate in Brooklyn and 50 cases that did not receive Housing Court Answers assistance and were processed in a different courtroom. The Housing Court Answers-assisted case files included answers that raised an average of 4.1 defenses, while the sample of unassisted cases raised an average of 1.3 defenses.³⁰

The second source of data is our review of random samples of case files selected from the records of each pilot project and from the case files of unassisted litigants. All cases were assigned to the same courtroom, the Brooklyn courtroom where all three kinds of Navigators work.³¹ Both Housing Court Answers and Access to Justice Navigators can assist with the answer step of the nonpayment process. Housing Court Answers Navigators specialize in this activity and provide this service to every litigant they serve. We compared the answers raised by tenant-litigants who received Housing Court Answers Navigator assistance to those who received no assistance. Housing Court Answers-assisted litigants raised an average of over two defenses more than those who received no recorded assistance (see below, Table 7). Navigator assistance is associated with a statistically significant difference in a key element of legal process in these nonpayment cases: the assertion of specific defenses to the claim of nonpayment and the possibility of eviction.

³⁰ See DATA BRIEF, included with the Snapshot Report described in Appendix A.

³¹ See Appendix A for information about the sample.

3. Courthouse Professionals' Assessments of the Quality of Information Provided by Navigators

An important part of the Navigator's role is to provide accurate and useful information. In this section we assess available evidence about the accuracy and utility of the information Navigators provided to litigants. This assessment could potentially be conducted in a variety of ways. Above, we reviewed Navigators' self-assessments: the vast majority (93 percent) felt able to provide information about court processes. Here, we draw on interviews with key informants for their assessment of the quality of the information Navigators were able to provide. Courthouse professionals who interact with Navigators or with litigants who report being assisted by Navigators provide a useful perspective on the accuracy and utility of the information that Navigators provide.

Among these observers of Navigators' work, University Settlement Navigators and Housing Court Answers Navigators were widely seen as competent and providing accurate and useful information to litigants, among other benefits.

Across the different courthouses where Access to Justice Navigators worked, many Access to Justice Navigators were described as highly competent, motivated, effective assistants to unrepresented litigants. However, in courthouses where Access to Justice Navigators were more lightly supervised, views of their work could be more varied. Some staff in these courthouses described incidents where they believed that Access to Justice Navigators had given litigants incorrect information, creating problems for court staff who then had to spend time re-educating litigants. As one staff member put it, "Some people want to do other people's jobs, and that's fine, but I have to fix their mistakes." At the same time, when asked directly about this issue, other staff who had frequent contact with Access to Justice Navigators in these courthouses "didn't find problems with them creating work" for courthouse staff members.

4. Litigant Reports of Understanding Court Process

An important part of moving successfully through a housing case is understanding the next steps. Litigant understanding, like the information that is meant to enhance it, could be assessed in a variety of ways. For example, we could quiz litigants before and after they received assistance from a service provider and see if their understanding of their cases improved. Another way of assessing litigant understanding is to ask for litigants' self-assessments of how well they understand their situations, which is what we do here. Tenant-litigants at the Brooklyn courthouse who had seen a judge or visited the clerk before being surveyed that day were asked how well they felt they understood what happened during their meeting with the judge or clerk and how well they understood what would happen next.

Table 5 compares the responses of litigants who reported receiving Navigators' services to those who reported no assistance at the courthouse on the day they were surveyed. The Table reports, for each category of assistance, the percentage of litigants who agreed or strongly agreed with the statement that they were "able to understand what was happening" when meeting with the judge or clerk, and that they "understand what to do next" in their case. Because most people (just under three quarters) reported receiving no help from anyone at the courthouse on the day they were surveyed, and only about a sixth (17 percent) had met with a clerk or judge at the time of survey, the cell sizes for the analysis are in some instances quite small; thus, small differences are less likely to be statistically significant.

Table 5. Tenant Understanding of What Happened in Contacts with Judge or Clerks and What to Do Next, by Type of Helper: Brooklyn Housing Court, Summer 2015

	Understood what was happening	Understand what to do next
Helped by
No one	86 %	85 %
Navigator	100 %	100 %

Source: Courthouse Visitors Survey.

N=75 people who had met with a judge or clerk on the day they were surveyed. “Don’t know” and “prefer not to say” responses excluded.

The differences between assisted and unassisted tenants are not statistically significant, but they are notable. While rates of reported understanding among all litigants were generally high, those among Navigator-assisted litigants were universally high. Most litigants (at least 85 percent) reported that they understood what was happening when they met with the judge or clerk, and that they understood what to do next -- regardless of whether they received any kind of help at the courthouse. While this high rate of reported understanding may reflect some people’s wish to be agreeable with the survey-taker or desire not to appear confused in front of a stranger, it is also consistent with findings from other studies of how people understand and handle civil justice problems. These studies find that people often report that they believe that they understand their situations and their options for handling them.³² All (100 percent) of the litigants who reported being assisted by Navigators agreed or strongly agreed with the two statements about understanding.

Another lens on tenants’ understanding comes from analysis of open-ended responses to the last question on the litigant survey. At the end of the survey, people were asked “What kinds of help would have made today’s visit to the courthouse easier for you?” Several themes emerged in these responses: wishes for legal assistance, need for money to pay a lawyer or rent, need for more information, a sense that the court was unfair, a sense that court staff were hostile or rude. In these open-ended responses, 15 percent of tenants expressed a wish for more information. This percentage was basically identical whether the tenant reported being assisted by a Navigator (15.2 percent of those assisted wished for more information) or not (15.6 percent of unassisted tenants expressed a wish for information).

5. Litigant Reports of Procedural Justice Experiences

When people believe that a decision process was fair and incorporated their participation, that they were treated with respect, and that the decision-maker was impartial, they experience what social psychologists have termed “procedural justice,” a positive sense of the just-ness and fairness of the process leading to a legal decision or outcome. An early investigation of the Navigator program found that people who had received Navigators’ services evaluated the experience of receiving those services in highly positive ways. In a survey of 61 litigants helped by Navigators, most respondents reported that “Navigators were helpful, courteous and understood their questions.” Most agreed that Navigators had helped them to “understand what was happening in their case” and to “feel that progress was being made in their case.”³³

³² WHAT WE KNOW AND NEED TO KNOW ABOUT THE LEGAL NEEDS OF THE PUBLIC, Rebecca L. Sandefur, University of South Carolina Law Review 67:443-459, 2016.

³³ Navigator Snapshot Report, p. 7. See Appendix A for details.

Another lens on procedural justice focuses not on satisfaction with a service received, but rather the experience of the actual process itself: the experience of moving through a nonpayment proceeding or receiving a court’s decision.

Evidence about the relationship between Navigator service and the procedural justice of these experiences is provided by examining whether service from a Navigator is associated with increases in people’s sense of procedural justice when they do have interactions with court personnel. Table 6 reports on the results of another analysis of the litigant survey. Litigants who had seen a judge or clerk at the time of the survey were asked about aspects of the procedural justice of that experience.

Table 6. Procedural Justice Experiences of Litigants, by Type of Help Received: Brooklyn Housing Court, Summer 2015

	Had chance to tell own side of story ⁺	Treated with respect	Treated fairly
Helped by
No one	64 %	91 %	80 %
Navigator	100 %	100 %	80 %

Source: Courthouse Visitors Survey.

N=75 people who had met with a judge or clerk on the day they were surveyed. Don’t know and prefer not to say responses excluded.

⁺ p<.10 for χ^2 test of significant difference between Navigator-assisted and unassisted cases.

Table 6 compares Navigator-assisted and unassisted litigants on three conventional measures of procedural justice. Each aspect of procedural justice is measured by tenant-litigants’ report of their level of agreement with statements describing their experience with the judge or clerk: “I had a chance to tell my side of the story”; “I was treated with respect”; “My case was handled fairly” (for those who saw judges) or “I was treated fairly” (for those who saw clerks). The table reports the percentage of litigants who agreed or strongly agreed with each statement by type of assistance received.

The pattern of differences and similarities is instructive. No significant differences emerge in comparisons of whether the litigant was treated fairly or treated with respect. However, a large difference emerges in the comparison of whether litigants had a chance to tell their own side of the story: 64 percent of those receiving no assistance reported that they had a chance to tell their own side of the story when they met with a judge or clerk, while all (100 percent) of those reporting Navigator assistance said that they had a chance to tell their own side of the story. Having a chance to tell one’s own side of the story of course depends on the listener, but it also depends importantly on the speaker, her preparation of the story and her confidence in her right to tell it. Navigators were meant to encourage this kind of legal empowerment³⁴ for unrepresented litigants.

C. Case Outcomes

The final lens on efficacy is provided by an analysis of case outcomes. Navigators’ work is of course not the only factor that shapes how cases turn out – there are judges, arguments, attorneys for the other side, evidence and other facts of the situation, as well as laws that guide what happens in a case. However, the three different Navigator pilot projects were designed to affect cases in distinct ways, in some instances by changing legal and/or real-life outcomes.

³⁴ See MEASUREMENT OF LEGAL EMPOWERMENT THROUGH THE SUBJECTIVE PERCEPTIONS OF INDIVIDUALS, Robert B. Porter, Impact Assessment and Project Appraisal 32(3): 213-221, 2014.

Drawing as we do on case files for our analysis of outcomes, we have available to us only some of the life history of these cases: that which is recorded by the court in the file. Case files are both a rich and a challenging source of information. They are rich in that they include a very large number of facts, such as how much money was demanded and how much was awarded, whether a warrant of eviction was issued and under what terms, what specific defenses were addressed by the judge, and many others. As a source of information, case files are challenging because the variations in case details and in record-keeping across cases can make it difficult to construct measures that are comparable across cases. For example, the case files do not reliably contain information that allows us to determine whether an actual eviction took place. We will not learn everything we want to know from reviewing case files, but we can explore how Navigator assistance is associated with certain key moments in case histories.

The analysis draws on four samples of Brooklyn Housing Court case files: those assisted by Access to Justice Navigators; those assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators; those assisted by University Settlement Navigators; those that received no Navigator or attorney assistance.³⁵ In consultation with legal aid attorneys and creators and supervisors of Navigator projects, we identified a set of case process and result outcomes that Navigators might be reasonably anticipated to affect and which could be measured in comparable ways across case files.

All of these cases were conducted in the same courtroom, and most were presided over by the same judge. Thus, by design we provide some control for an important factor shaping case outcomes: the typical practices of a given judge and the standard operating procedures of a given courtroom. The case files were collected in summer 2015, and were drawn from cases that commenced between March 2013 and March 2015, thus allowing at least three months for each case to conclude. Most cases (91 percent) commenced in calendar year 2014.

1. Overview of Case Characteristics

Before turning to differences in the outcomes of cases served by Navigators and those that received no service, it is instructive to review the characteristics of these cases in general. The case files reveal a picture of eviction cases that is highly consistent with the image from contemporary media accounts: very low rates of lawyer representation for tenants and high rates for landlords; rent demands in the thousands of dollars; and, a decision in the landlord's favor. Specifically, the typical nonpayment case in this court:

- Pits a landlord with lawyer representation against a tenant with no representation
- Demands from the tenant an average amount of almost $3,500.
- Concludes within three months (no more than 90 days between the date of the petition and the last recorded activity in the case).
- Is resolved in two or fewer appearances.
- Awards money to the landlord.
- Results in a formal judgment against the tenant, with a warrant for eviction issued forthwith.

³⁵ See Appendix A for a description of the case file sample.

2. Case Process Outcomes

Our analysis of case outcomes investigates two different types of case activity. One type of activity is a set of what might be termed “process outcomes”: these measures provide information about how the case moves through different activities in the court. The process outcomes we examine here are:

- Number of visits to the courthouse. This is a measure of both litigant and court burden, as each appearance requires work on the part of the court as well as time and travel on the part of litigants or their representatives. We begin counting visits after the tenant has filed an answer. We define a “visit” as an instance where both parties appeared before a judge to try to resolve the dispute or an occasion when one or the other side came to court to take legal actions once the case began. Typically, this latter kind of appearance is a tenant filing an Order to Show Cause to raise issues that can delay the execution of an actual eviction. Less often it is a landlord’s attorney filing an Order to Show Cause to receive a judgment when a tenant has not complied with a stipulated settlement.
- Duration of the case. This also is a measure of both court and litigant burden.
- Orders to Show Cause. We collected information about the number of Orders to Show Cause filed in each case. This is one measure of the use of legal maneuvers in a case.
- Use of court interpreters. New York is a diverse city, with over three million residents of the five boroughs born outside the United States.³⁶ In Kings County, which is coterminous with the borough of Brooklyn, almost half (46.3 percent) of residents speak a language other than English at home (see Appendix A). Nevertheless, the language of the courts is English: legal documents are written and recorded in English, most courthouse signage is in English, and court proceedings and many hallway interactions are carried out in English. People who lack English language facility thus face a real possibility of being unable to understand and participate in their own cases.

3. Case Results Outcomes

The results outcomes we discuss here are:

- Whether any of the tenant’s defenses were addressed in the stipulations that resolve the case. The defenses raised on the original answer form are the groundwork for any legal defenses against a nonpayment claim. Whether those defenses are addressed in the resolution of the case is one measure of litigants’ success in getting their claims addressed.
- Judge referrals to social services. These actions can help connect tenants to needed assistance that can aid them in maintaining their housing or working out a smooth transition to a new residence. For each case, we determined whether the judge had referred the tenant to the Department of Social Services or appointed a Guardian ad Litem for the tenant.
- Formal judgment on file. Preventing the entry or securing the vacating of a formal judgment is an important “win” for tenants, as having a judgment on record not only renders eviction imminent, but can affect future access to housing and credit. For each case, we determined whether a formal judgment had been entered and remained on file.
- Who will pay whom. In all of the cases under review, landlords are making claims of nonpayment of rent against tenants. Stipulations and judgments record parties’ agreements and/or the court’s determination about how much money is owed to whom. Routinely, tenants agree to or are ordered to pay landlords. However, in some instances landlords forgo rent or pay tenants if tenants will agree to move out.

³⁶ “New York City (NYC) Foreign-Born Population – By Country of Birth. 2012 Estimates,” <https://www.baruch.cuny.edu/nycdata/population-geography/foreign-birthcountry.htm>.

- Judge orders repairs. Low-income housing stock is often in poor repair. Poor conditions and needed repairs are a common defense asserted against nonpayment petitions. A judge's order for repairs potentially improves the housing stock and also suggests an assumption or prediction that the tenant will remain in the apartment.
- Judge orders city inspection of repairs. Judges may choose to direct the landlord to inspect and repair, or they may order a city inspection of the repairs, providing independent evaluation of the premises and whether they correspond to housing code standards.
- Rent abatement for repairs. In nonpayment cases, a possible remedy for poor conditions is the abatement of rent to the tenant.
- Judge reviews rent history. Rent demands are not always accurate and do not always reflect lawful rents. One tool for assessing the accuracy and legality of rent demands is a review of the rent history for the apartment.

Table 7 reports on the analysis of case characteristics and process outcomes, while Table 8 reports on results outcomes. Each Table presents this information both for the full sample of cases in which tenants received no lawyer assistance and, separately, for cases with no Navigator assistance and cases receiving assistance from each of the three pilot projects. Interesting differences emerge in the analysis.

4. Case Characteristics, Process Outcomes and Results Outcomes for Access to Justice Navigators

Access to Justice Navigators are navigators-for-the-day, providing service to people who sign up requesting their assistance. The Access to Justice Navigator project was not designed to affect case outcomes, but rather to support people going through stressful and confusing proceedings. Certainly, in the Brooklyn Housing Court, Access to Justice Navigators provided service in particularly burdensome cases. As Table 7 reports, the cases Access to Justice Navigators worked involved significantly higher demands for back rent, by about $1,000. Access to Justice Navigator-assisted cases involved more visits to the courthouse, more Orders to Show Cause, and lasted longer than cases that received no assistance. The analysis of case results, reported in Table 8, finds that Access to Justice Navigator-assisted cases were significantly more likely to conclude with formal judgments than were unassisted cases. There were no other significant differences in results measures: compared to unassisted tenants, Access to Justice Navigator-assisted tenants were no more likely than unassisted tenants to have any of their defenses recognized in the stipulations resolving the case, no less likely to agree or be directed to pay money to the landlord, no more likely to have the judge order repairs, and not significantly more likely to be referred to social services by the judge.

Access to Justice Navigators have relatively brief involvement with any given case – they assist on days the project happens to be staffing a given courthouse, helping litigants without lawyer representation who accept an invitation to Navigator assistance. The review of case files suggests that people who are taking up Access to Justice Navigators services are in complex and perhaps dire situations: they face larger demands for unpaid rent, their cases take longer and are in some respects more involved. Their cases tend to end less favorably. Since an Access to Justice Navigator touches a case usually only once and briefly, it is unlikely that their activities cause the differences in case outcomes that we see. Rather, the differences we see reveal a substantial need for assistance. The body of evidence is consistent with a service model that has no impact on case outcomes, but is used by tenants facing very challenging situations.

5. Case Characteristics, Process Outcomes and Results Outcomes for Housing Court Answers Navigators

Housing Court Answers Navigators are navigators-for-the-day, providing service to people screened while waiting in line at the clerk's office. The principal Housing Court Answers Navigators project goal is to assist tenants in identifying and asserting viable defenses to the claim of nonpayment. The findings support an assessment of effectiveness in achieving this goal. Compared to unassisted cases, Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted cases look very similar in terms of the amount of rent demanded, the duration of the case and the amount of activity the case involves. However, Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted cases differ from unassisted cases in two important respects. First, as Table 7 reports, Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted tenants raised significantly more defenses in their answers than did unassisted tenants. Unassisted tenants raised an average of about two defenses, whereas Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted tenants raised twice as many defenses. Second, not only did Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted litigants raise more defenses, they were more successful in getting those defenses recognized. About two-fifths (39 percent) of unassisted tenants had one or more of their defenses addressed, while almost three-quarters (73 percent) of Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted tenants had at least one of their defenses recognized. A common defense is a claim of substandard conditions. Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted litigants were also more likely to see the judge order repairs than were unassisted tenants. Housing Court Answers Navigator assistance is associated with achievement of the aims intended in the pilot project's design.

6. Case Characteristics, Process Outcomes and Results Outcomes for University Settlement Navigators

University Settlement Navigators are navigators-for-the-duration. Housing Court Answers Navigators-screened litigants who meet University Settlement's service priorities are referred to University Settlement for possible assistance. University Settlement Navigators work on their cases throughout the time of legal process and beyond, providing both in-court assistance and a range of out-of-court supports, such as assistance in securing benefits, medical treatment, and counseling.

In terms of basic characteristics, the cases worked by University Settlement Navigators look very much like cases that do not receive assistance: the amounts at stake are about the same, the time to conclusion is about the same, the number of visits to the courthouse and the number of Orders to Show Cause filed are all about the same. One important difference, however, is that University Settlement Navigators-assisted tenants are much more likely to be assigned a Court Interpreter – about four times more likely, 15 percent versus 4 percent. This is consistent with University Settlement Navigators service priorities, which include limited English proficiency of litigants as a service priority. All University Settlement Navigators-assisted tenants are first assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators, and also raise significantly more defenses than unassisted tenants.

Assistance from University Settlement Navigators is associated with statistically significant differences in case outcomes. As Table 8 reports, compared to tenants with no assistance, University Settlement Navigators-assisted tenants are more likely to have their defenses recognized by the court, and more likely to have the judge order repairs.

7. Real-World Outcomes of Eviction Cases

The case files themselves do not provide reliable information about whether evictions occurred for any group of tenants. However, we can compare Navigator project records to city eviction data to get a sense of how Navigator service may relate to changed case outcomes. The city eviction figures for cases filed and cases calendared can give us a rough idea of how likely evictions are, but cannot be used to calculate a precise annual eviction rate for the city: not all cases calendared in a given year conclude in that year, and we cannot know how all cases filed but not calendared were resolved. Administrative records indicate that, for example, citywide in 2015 one actual eviction occurred for every 9.2 cases filed and for every 5.1 cases calendared.³⁷

The records of the University Settlement Navigators pilot project indicate that, over the first project year, the percentage of University Settlement Navigators-served cases that resulted in actual eviction was zero percent. University Settlement records indicate that this Navigators pilot project retained housing for 96 percent of the tenants it served during the first project year. Those few tenants served by University Settlement Navigators who left housing did so voluntarily rather than through eviction.³⁸ Thus, for every case served by University Settlement Navigators in the first project year, no actual evictions occurred. By comparison, across New York City, one eviction was occurring for about every nine cases filed and every five cases calendared.³⁹ The University Settlement figures thus compare very favorably with the citywide figures.

The legal and real-life outcomes of University Settlement Navigators-served cases are different from those of unassisted nonpayment cases and from citywide trends. It is instructive to consider where these differences may come from. The main difference revealed in the case file review was the court’s recognition of the tenant’s defenses: University Settlement Navigators-assisted tenants were significantly more likely to have defenses recognized than were unassisted tenants. But this finding also held true for those tenants assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators, and all University Settlement Navigators clients are first assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators. University Settlement Navigators-assisted tenants were no less likely than unassisted tenants to have a judgment on file, and most judgments were attended by warrants for eviction “to be issued forthwith.”

This pattern of findings suggests that what University Settlement Navigators do outside of court -- by connecting tenants with benefits and services that provide resources to help them reliably pay their rent

³⁷ Over the past six years, the numbers of cases filed and calendared per formal legal eviction were:

Cases per Eviction
	Cases Filed	Cases Calendared
2010	8.3	5.0
2011	8.0	4.6
2012	7.6	4.6
2013	7.6	4.5
2014	7.8	4.7
2015	9.2	5.1

Source: Housing Court Answers, “Eviction Trends,” <http://cwtfhc.org/wp-content/uploads/2009/06/EvictionTrends1998to20151.pdf>.

³⁸ According to the records of the pilot project, these were instances in which the tenant left the apartment voluntarily because the rent burden was simply too high given her income.

³⁹ In 2015, 203,119 nonpayment cases were filed, 111,409 cases were calendared, and 21,988 evictions were carried out by city marshals. This amounts to one eviction for every nine filed cases ($9.2 = 203,119/21,988$) and one for every five calendared cases ($5.1 = 111,409/21,988$). See Housing Court Answers, “Eviction Trends,” <http://cwtfhc.org/wp-content/uploads/2009/06/EvictionTrends1998to20151.pdf>.

and comply with the terms of judgments and stipulations -- may be at least as important as the in-court services they provide.

D. Conclusions and Potential Enhancements: Efficacy

Our assessment of the efficacy of the three Navigators projects focused on usage of the service and competence in the service's performance. We considered a range of measures of each, including service records, litigants' reports of their experiences, Navigators' descriptions of their own work, and legal outcomes as revealed in case files. We consider the evidence on efficacy separately for each pilot project below. Without other information, we cannot know precisely how much of the difference in the conduct of Navigated cases is due to case selection and how much is due to these Navigators' work once they become involved in a case. However, services provided in each of the three Navigator projects are associated with impacts desired by program designers.

1. Efficacy of Access to Justice Navigators

Findings for the efficacy of Access to Justice Navigators' work suggest some successes, as well as some opportunities for enhancements.

Navigators working in the Access to Justice Navigators pilot project had served over 9,300 litigants between project inception and August 2016, a service load of about 15 litigants per Access to Justice Navigator who worked in the housing courts. Access to Justice Navigators working in the consumer debt parts of civil court served 3,196 litigants over this period, a service load of about 44 litigants per Navigator working in this context. These figures reveal very different service rates for Access to Justice Navigators in the two different types of courts. These differences reflect differences between housing and consumer cases, and also differences between courts in how Navigators' work is made known to litigants, supervised, and incorporated into the workflow in the different courts where Navigators work. Some Access to Justice Navigators in housing court reported feeling underutilized, wishing that more people would accept their assistance. This concern was seldom if ever raised by Access to Justice Navigators working on consumer debt cases.

All three pilot projects share the same core capacities of information, moral support and accompaniment through activities in the courthouse. Navigator-assisted litigants report universally high levels of understanding their cases and feelings of being able to tell their sides of the story. They do not report a greater sense of fairness. Access to Justice Navigators are more efficacious when they have active supervision and support available to them while they are on the courthouse floor, and when court staff are open to their participation in the cases. Describing Access to Justice Navigators in a courthouse that provided this kind of supervision and support, one observer concluded that Access to Justice Navigators helped both the litigant and the court. In this observer's view,

[A] Navigator is somebody that they can give an outline of their goals for conference or trial. [This] keeps them focused, close to what they want. Sometimes they're flustered, emotional, angry. [The Navigator] facilitates the conference [with the court attorney]. Some are good at reminding litigants about what they should say. [Access to Justice Navigators are] good even just for the emotional support.

The findings of the case file review suggest that the litigants who turn to Access to Justice Navigators for help are involved in particularly challenging cases, in the sense that more money is at stake, the cases last longer, and the cases involve more visits to the courthouse and Orders to Show Cause. Given that an

Access to Justice Navigator has a brief involvement in any given case and can provide only basic information and support, it is unlikely that Access to Justice Navigators' involvement in these cases causes the complexity we observe. The more likely scenario is that assistance from Access to Justice Navigators is accepted by people who have found themselves in very complex situations.

The Access to Justice Navigators pilot project does not currently coordinate intake with any other service. Litigants reach Access to Justice Navigators largely through their own initiative: litigants are offered the service and can take it up or not. Thus, Access to Justice Navigators' services are used by people who, for whatever reason – lack of eligibility, lack of capacity in other programs, lack of information about available resources – have not connected with other services. Some coordination with other Navigator projects and other resources available in the courthouse or the community could assist in a more efficient matching of needs to services.

2. Efficacy of Housing Court Answers Navigators

Findings for the efficacy of Housing Court Answers Navigators' work are consistent with both usage of the service and competence in its performance. The Housing Court Answers Navigators pilot project is at capacity under its current service model, with Housing Court Answers Navigators fully occupied in working with litigants during all the hours the project is in operation. The purpose of the Housing Court Answers Navigators project is to assist tenants in identifying and raising valid, viable defenses at the time of answer to a nonpayment petition. A review of case files suggests that litigants assisted by Housing Court Answers Navigators raise significantly more defenses than unassisted litigants, and these defenses are significantly more likely to be recognized by the court. These findings are consistent with success in the major goal of the project.

3. Efficacy of University Settlement Navigators

Findings for the efficacy of University Settlement Navigators are also consistent with both usage of the service and competence in its performance. The University Settlement Navigators pilot project operates at capacity under its current service model. A review of case files uncovers differences in legal process that may be related to later differences in legal outcomes, as illustrated in the analyses of tenants' answers to nonpayment petitions and access to interpreter services. A comparison of eviction rates for the City of New York to eviction rates in University Settlement Navigators project records finds that the percentage of University Settlement Navigators-assisted cases that resulted in a tenant being evicted was zero percent -- no actual evictions occurred in the cases served by University Settlement Navigators. The percentage of University Settlement Navigators-served cases that resulted in a tenant moving out for any reason, in these instances voluntarily, is roughly two-thirds to four-fifths lower than the citywide percentage of nonpayment cases that result in a tenant being evicted. At the same time, there are similarities between University Settlement Navigators-assisted cases and unassisted cases in terms of the markers available in the case files, yet University Settlement Navigators-assisted cases result in very different outcomes from the modal nonpayment case. This pattern suggests that the services University Settlement Navigators provide out of court may be at least as important as those they provide at the courthouse in preventing eviction.

This assessment of efficacy is echoed by key informants who have observed and worked with University Settlement Navigators. As one member of the Brooklyn courthouse staff told us,

The [University Settlement Navigators are] great. Because they...take complex cases where tenants have viable defenses, navigate benefits [for them and help them to work with] other offices. A tenant might have taken six months to navigate the bureaucracy, and, by that time, might have been evicted.

V. Findings of the Evaluation -- Sustainability

The ultimate test of sustainability is, of course, time: models that persist are by that result revealed to be sustainable. New York City Court Navigators, like many Roles Beyond Lawyers programs, are at a pilot stage. The challenge is to identify markers of sustainability, including those that provide evidence about how and how successfully pilot projects may be taken to scale. RBL programs face two main challenges of sustainability: they must establish legitimacy with key audiences, including potential adversaries or competitors for the same resources, and they must be perceived to create sufficient value to justify stakeholders' support.

We collected information about a range of stakeholder groups whose support, or at least acquiescence, would be necessary for the success of Navigator programs: courthouse staff, who include clerks, court attorneys, and judges; attorneys on the opposing side of Navigated cases; Navigators themselves; funders and potential funders of Navigator projects; and litigants.

A. Legitimacy of the New York City Navigator Program

The legitimacy of any innovation, such as Court Navigators, will reflect the degree to which a range of audiences accept it as an appropriate and acceptable way of doing some work or accomplishing some goal. In New York City, assessments of Navigators' legitimacy were divided. An important division arose between those who saw the Navigators' purpose as providing moral support and information and those who saw Navigators as an important tool in eviction-prevention. Among court staff and other service providers, legitimacy was threatened when Navigators' role was not understood and when Navigators were perceived as poorly trained or supervised. Navigators' legitimacy was enhanced when stakeholders understood their role and when Navigators were perceived as competent. Among attorneys on the opposing side of Navigator-assisted cases, legitimacy was threatened when Navigators' work affected standard operating procedures.

1. Judges, clerks, court attorneys, and other service providers

For some stakeholders, particularly those associated with the courts, Navigators were a legitimate innovation only if their work expressly did not affect the outcomes of court cases. These stakeholders questioned whether it was desirable that Navigators' work affect the actual outcomes of cases, since "in no way shape or form do Navigators provide legal advice or representation." These stakeholders believed strongly in the court's impartial role in the cases it hears. They felt that court support of a service that actually changed the outcome of cases would violate that impartial role.

These stakeholders did highlight the value of Navigators' ability to provide moral support, basic information, and connections to out-of-court services. They also pointed to the benefits of the Navigators program for the Navigators themselves, for example, celebrating ways the Access to Justice Navigator project allowed young people to give back to their communities and explore possible careers.

Table 7. Brooklyn Housing Court Case Files: Case Characteristics and Process Outcomes

	Case Characteristics		Process Outcomes
	Average petition amount	Landlord has attorney	Court interpreter assigned	Average visits to the courthouse	Duration in days	Average number of Orders to Show Cause filed	Average number of defenses raised in Answer
Total	$3,449	99 %	6 %	2.4	86	1.1	3.6
No recorded assistance	$3,154	100 %	4 %	2.3	72	1.1	1.9
A2JN	$4,165 ⁺	100 %	4 %	3.9 ^{}	154 ^{}	2.6 ^{}	2.7 ^{}
HCAN	$3,225	99 %	4 %	2.1	78	0.9	4.3 ^{}
USN	$3,887	100 %	15 %	2.3	79	0.8	3.7 ^{}

Source: n=181 Brooklyn Housing Court Case Files. A2JN = Access to Justice Navigators; HCAN = Housing Court Answers Navigators; USN = University Settlement Navigators.

 p < .001 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

 p < .01 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

* p < .05 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

+ p < .10 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

Table 8. Brooklyn Housing Court Case Files: Results Outcomes

	Judgment on file at review date	Any of tenants defenses' recognized in stipulations	Money to landlord	Judge refers to social services	Judge orders repairs	Judge orders city inspection	Judge inspects rent history	Rent abatement for conditions
Total	70 %	63 %	99 %	3 %	57 %	< 1 %	4 %	0 %
No recorded assistance	59 %	39 %	96 %	0 %	41 %	0 %	9 %	0 %
A2JN	86 % ⁺	42 %	100 %	10 %	52 %	5 %	0 %	0 %
HCAN	74 %	73 % ^{}	100 %	2 %	63 %	0 %	4 %	0 %
USN	63 %	73 % ^{}	97 %	3 %	60 % ⁺	0 %	3 %	0 %

Source: n=181 Brooklyn Housing Court Case Files. A2JN = Access to Justice Navigators; HCAN = Housing Court Answers Navigators; USN = University Settlement Navigators.

 p < .001 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

 p < .01 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

 p < .05 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

+ p < .10 for test of significant difference between this group and the unassisted group

When stakeholders who took this view of Navigators' role doubted its legitimacy, it was usually because they had concerns about how the role was being implemented, rather than about how it was designed. Stakeholders taking this view were concerned about unevenness in Access to Justice Navigators' competence, observing that "some [Navigators] are better than others." Some of these observers believed that certain personality traits and skills were important for Navigators to be successful, and that Access to Justice Navigators were not always well-selected for these traits. Others believed that more active supervision or the requirement of longer service commitments by Navigators would improve the quality of the services that Access to Justice Navigators were able to provide.

By contrast, another group of stakeholders regarded Navigator projects as legitimate only if they did change the outcomes of court cases. For these observers, Navigators were a legitimate innovation only if they created what these stakeholders perceived as the important value: preventing evictions. Otherwise, the projects were seen as poor uses of scarce resources. As one put it, success for the Navigator projects "would really have to boil down to evictions being prevented for low income people. No matter what anybody tells you about 'They were happy with the result of their case. They got $10,000 to move,' they're not going to find housing in New York City" after being evicted. As another observed about those Navigator projects focused on providing information and facilitating procedural justice: "if that's all they're doing...that's something that a good court attorney could do."

An additional factor that affected the pilot projects' legitimacy with court staff and other service providers working in the courts concerned how the projects were introduced to the various courthouses. When communication from central court administration to clerks, judges, court attorneys and court officers about the pilot projects was clear and timely, the results were better than when communication was confused or delayed. With a large-scale program, word of mouth and personal experience would have quickly communicated knowledge of the innovation. Here, the small scale of the pilot projects made formal communication about the projects particularly important, as the personal experience of most court staff would not have included contact with any kind of Navigator. As one Navigator put it, "there should be more communication about the program. I found myself working with court staff who never heard about the program and were not sure about the role of a Court Navigator."

2. Opposing attorneys

Attorneys on the opposing side of Navigator-served cases have not to date engaged in organized efforts to limit Navigators' impact, but they have expressed some dissatisfaction. At least initially, Navigators received some push-back from lawyers on the other side, who complained to judges or court attorneys that Navigators were acting as advocates or otherwise engaging in the practice of law. As one member of a court staff described to us, after Navigators arrived [Opposing] attorneys are getting more difficult cases because defendants are more empowered. [When the Navigators programs were first rolled out,] court attorneys got some complaints about [Navigators being] seen as that person's advocate, [because] now people are prompting the litigant not to clam up.

Without exception, all courthouse stakeholders with whom we spoke believed that these claims were unfounded and reflected opposing attorneys' frustration at having their normal business practices disrupted. As one put it, describing the work of Navigators he had observed, "I have never seen anyone crossing the line."

3. Litigants

Litigants' views of Navigators are generally positive, but many litigants are unaware of Navigators and how they can help. As revealed in an earlier study (see appendix A), in our conversations with Navigators and their supervisors, and in reports by survey takers, people who receive assistance from Navigators are often very grateful and perceive the service to have been appropriate and to have benefited them. A number of program supervisors shared with us testimonials from litigants praising Navigators and their work. At the same time, many litigants who are offered Access to Justice Navigators' services are not accepting them, as described in the accounts of Access to Justice Navigators who expressed frustration that they wished to be helpful, but felt that litigants seldom wanted their help. It is possible that part of litigants' hesitancy in embracing the service reflects a lack of information: in the survey of litigants in the Brooklyn courthouse, only 17 percent reported that they had ever heard of Court Navigators. Once again, the pilot scale of the programs means that few people could learn of them by direct experience or through word of mouth, making active outreach more important.

4. Conclusions: Legitimacy

Overall, most stakeholders have come to accept Navigators in the courthouse, if not necessarily to embrace them. Navigator legitimacy is threatened when stakeholders lack information about what they do or how they will fit in to existing roles and tasks. Stakeholders doubt Navigators' legitimacy when they perceive them as incompetent in their roles, and or as acting outside the bounds of what these stakeholders perceive as their appropriate role -- whether by affecting the conduct and outcomes of court cases, or by failing to do so, depending on which view of Navigators' role they take.

B. Perceived Value of the Navigator Program

Stakeholders can differ in their assessment of perceived value in at least two ways: they can differ in their assessment of how much of a specific kind of value a program provides, and they can differ in their views of what specific activities or contributions constitute values rather than costs, or are simply irrelevant. In the analysis of perceived value, a key difference emerged between those who saw Navigators' contribution as providing information and moral support and those who saw their value in changing legal outcomes. In this analysis, we focus on perceived value for two key groups of stakeholders: Navigators themselves and current and potential program funders.

1. Perceived Value among Navigators

A central challenge in sustainability is creating a role that incumbents value staffing. As we have described, Access to Justice and Housing Court Answers Navigators are volunteers, while University Settlement Navigators are employees. The survey of Navigators revealed that most Navigators believe that they both create and receive value. When Access to Justice Navigators were asked how often their work as a Navigator helped people, 52 percent responded that it always or almost always did so, while an additional 39 percent said it frequently did so. Asked how often their work made a difference in the outcomes of people's court cases, 30 percent of Access to Justice Navigators responded that their work always or almost always did so, and an additional 43 percent responded that it frequently did so. When Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators were asked how often their work helped people, 60 percent said that it always or almost always did so, and an additional 33 percent said that it frequently did so. When Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators were asked about how often their work made a difference in the outcome of people's court cases, 20 percent said that it always or almost always did so, and an additional 67 percent said that it frequently did so. Clearly, all types of Navigators see themselves as providing valuable and impactful services.

Nonetheless, some Access to Justice Navigators expressed frustration about what they were able to do. Some felt that more on-the-job training or better support while on task would have helped them. As one Access to Justice Navigator wrote in the Navigators survey, “the work feels kind of bleak because there are so few resources. I wish a supervisor would be available for questions.” Others wished for a broader scope of action and impact, expressing disappointment that they were not able to be more helpful.

Though Navigators indicated some areas where they desired improvements, they also reported receiving a range of benefits from their service experience. As Table 9 reports, they believed that the experience had been educational, had provided them with rewards such as personal fulfillment and self-esteem, and would be helpful to them in future work. Another telling finding from the Navigators survey was the number of volunteer Navigators who were willing to volunteer when they could have been working elsewhere for pay: almost three-quarters (72 percent) of Navigators reported that they could have been working for pay during the time they spent volunteering as a Navigator. At the same time, more than one respondent to the Navigators survey suggested that Navigators should be a paid position, as an employee of the court. These Navigators felt that their role was essential and should be a regular part of the court staff, like a clerk or a court officer.

Table 9. Navigators’ Evaluation of the Benefits of Serving as a Navigator: Percent agreeing or strongly agreeing with each statement, by type of Navigator

	Access to Justice Navigators	Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigators
Serving as a Navigator...
[Is something I do] because I feel it is important to help others	95 %	87 %
Increases my self-esteem	74 %	71 %
[Helps me make] new contacts that might help my career	68 %	33 %
Lets me learn through direct "hands on" experience	95 %	87 %
Allows me to gain a new perspective on things	98 %	87 %
Allows me to explore career options	75 %	67 %
I can learn how to deal with a variety of people	98 %	80 %
Will look good on my resume	83 %	60 %
Is personally fulfilling	86 %	73 %

Source: Navigator Survey.

2. Perceived Value among Current and Potential Funders of Navigator Projects

The three Navigator pilot projects currently operate with different models of staffing and compensation. Effectively, Access to Justice Navigators are subsidized by the court system. Access to Justice Navigators are volunteers, and their training and supervision are provided by court staff. Because of limited funding in the state court system, the predominant model is that a court attorney incorporates Access to Justice Navigator supervision into his or her initial job description, taking on Navigator supervision as an additional duty. In a minority of instances, Access to Justice Navigators work with dedicated supervisors. Housing Court Answers Navigators are also volunteers, but are supervised and supported by dedicated paid staff from Housing Court Answers. University Settlement Navigators are full- or part-time employees, whose salaries, benefits and supervision are paid for by a range of sources, and who are supervised by paid staff. Expanding any of these projects will require larger commitments from funders, whether those be philanthropies, local, state or federal government, or the court system.

Outside of the court system, potential funders of continued or expanded Navigator projects are for the most part uninterested in procedural justice and moral support for unrepresented litigants. They are interested in eviction prevention and in Navigators as one tool among several in the use of law as an anti-poverty strategy. In our conversations with these stakeholders, they indicated a willingness to consider supporting Navigators, but only if they could be shown to prevent evictions. Some funders looked forward to an expanded cadre of University Settlement-style Navigators. Others envisioned Access to Justice Navigators as adjuncts to legal aid programs, providing assistance to litigants who did not have the kinds of complex and meritorious cases that legal aid societies select for full representation.

3. Financial Sustainability of the Access to Justice Navigators Project

The court system is the current funder of the Access to Justice Navigators project. This funder prioritizes the moral support and enhanced litigant experience of procedural justice that Access to Justice Navigators were designed to provide. Keeping the projects at their current pilot scale, supplying the dedicated supervision for Access to Justice Navigators that this analysis suggests is needed for both efficacy and sustainability would require an investment of about one full time equivalent (FTE) staff annually per project per courthouse, in addition to the .4 FTE central court administration currently invests in supervising the pilot project throughout the city. Thus, providing dedicated supervision in all courthouses participating in the current Access to Justice Navigators pilot project would require an additional four FTE staff, given that Access to Justice Navigators already have dedicated, on-site supervision in two courthouses. With greater supervision, Access to Justice Navigators might be able to handle more cases than they do currently, so it is possible that expansions in scale would be possible without comparable cost increases.

4. Financial Sustainability of the Housing Court Answers Navigators Project

Housing Court Answers Navigators are volunteers working under paid supervisors. Outside of school terms, when college student volunteers are not available, supervisory staff work the project. Under the current service model, Housing Court Answers Navigators work the line of people waiting at the Clerk's office, spending one to two minutes conducting eligibility screening of each litigant. Litigants who are not eligible for Housing Court Answers Navigators services may be referred to legal services providers, to the city's Human Resources Administration, or the Help Center in the courthouse. Tenants screened as eligible who want Navigator assistance will spend 15 to 20 minutes completing the answer form with the Housing Court Answers Navigator. The Housing Court Answers Navigator then accompanies the litigant in waiting to file the answer with the Clerk's office. When the Clerk's office is busy, this third step can require as long as an hour. Under the current service model, the long lines at the courthouse limit how many people the project can serve. If Clerk's office lines were shorter, or if the project created a service model that allowed Housing Court Answers Navigators to serve more than one litigant at a time, the number served could be increased.

During one project year, Housing Court Answers Navigators screened 3,559 people for eligibility for their services and helped 544 people file answers, at a total cost of just over $88,000. Considering only the 544 answers filed, the “per case” cost under this model is about $162. This does not include services provided in the form of referrals or other information given to the 3,015 people who were screened and not found eligible.

Expansion of the Housing Court Answers Navigator project would require additional investment. Approximately 79,000 cases are filed in the Brooklyn courthouse each year. Based on Housing Court Answers service records, about 15 percent of tenants are eligible for and will accept Housing Court Answers Navigators services.⁴⁰ This implies a possible service population of around 11,850 people per year. Under the current service model, and not accounting for possible economies of scale, serving the entire interested and eligible population in the Brooklyn courthouse would cost roughly $1.9 million annually. Expanding the project to housing courts in other boroughs would require comparable investments.

4. Financial Sustainability of the University Settlement Navigators Project

The University Settlement Navigators pilot project selects for service cases from among those referred to the project by Housing Court Answers Navigators. The University Settlement Navigators pilot project focuses on tenants who may be particularly vulnerable to eviction, such as those with limited English proficiency, limited literacy, cognitive limitations, or underlying social service needs that may be contributing to housing insecurity, those facing claims for substantial amounts of back rent, and those eligible for rent subsidies or other social programs. The services provided by University Settlement Navigators include not only assistance with paperwork and accompaniment through each stage of the litigant’s case, but also out-of-court work connecting the litigant with resources that can assist her in staying in housing, such as public benefits, medical treatment, eviction-prevention grants, and counseling.

In the last contract year, University Settlement Navigators provided these services to 140 tenants, at a total cost of $149,250. Including the cost of both Housing Court Answers Navigators and University Settlement Navigators services, the total per case cost in the pilot projects under this coordinated service model averages $1,228. By comparison, a recent report on civil legal aid in New York City estimates that service by a legal aid lawyer costs approximately $2,500 per case.⁴¹

Expansion of the University Settlement Navigators project would also require additional investment. Housing Court Answers currently refers around two fifths (38 percent) of the tenants they serve to University Settlement Navigators. If the Housing Court Answers Navigators project were scaled up to full capacity in the Brooklyn Housing Court, they would be referring about 4,500 cases a year to the University Settlement Navigators project. If University Settlement Navigators were to take every referral, that would imply an annual caseload of roughly 4,500 cases for University Settlement Navigators. Under the current service model, the annual costs of a University Settlement Navigators project that size would be about $4.5 million. Combining this with the estimated cost of expanding the Housing Court Answers Navigators project, around $6.4 million would be required annually to serve all eligible and interested tenants at the Brooklyn Housing Court. By comparison, providing legal aid services to this population would cost roughly $11.3 million. Expanding the program to housing courts in other boroughs would require comparable investments.

⁴⁰ This estimate is based on Housing Court Answers’ report of providing service to 544 of 3,559 people screened while waiting in line at the Clerks’ office.

⁴¹ This is the mid-point of the estimate range presented in Stout Risius Ross, Inc., The Financial Costs and Benefits of Establishing a Right to Counsel in Eviction Proceedings Under Intro 214-A, (2016), p. 7

D. Conclusions and Potential Enhancements: Sustainability

Our analysis of sustainability has focused on legitimacy and perceived value. We investigated both of these factors for a range of stakeholders, including court staff, litigants, funders, and Navigators themselves.

Many stakeholders value the New York City Court Navigators program and its three pilot projects. Navigators themselves value the work they do, believe that they benefit from it, that it helps others and is worth doing. Volunteer Navigators are often willing to forgo income in order to serve in this role. Litigants who are aware of and receive Navigators' services value those services. Other stakeholders, including court staff, other service providers and potential funders of Navigator projects, are divided in their assessments of Navigators' legitimacy and value. These divisions reflect the distinctive goals that these groups of stakeholders have for the Navigator program. Stakeholders focused on legal and life outcomes are less appreciative of other benefits such as procedural justice and moral support. Stakeholders who believe Navigator programs should have no impact on legal outcomes are less appreciative of projects that strive to create those impacts.

Two key opportunities for improvements emerged in the analysis of sustainability: communication and, unsurprisingly, resources. The legitimacy of the Navigator program could be enhanced by better communication with litigants, judges, court attorneys, court officers, court clerks, and the landlords and debt-buyers bars about what Navigators are and what they can do. When the arrival of Navigators changes established work routines, good communication is an important means of creating a space for the new role and openness to its use. In environments as confusing, chaotic and multilingual as the New York City courts, it can be difficult to communicate to litigants what the different roles and services available in the courthouse are and how these can help, but this is essential if litigants are to be aware of services available to them.

Expanding any of the three pilot projects will require greater investment. This is true even for the project that is currently least expensive to operate on a per-case basis, Access to Justice Navigators. There is no way to expand the Access to Justice Navigators project and support its efficacy without consistent supervision by qualified staff. This means that in high volume courts, the Access to Justice Navigators project cannot be expanded based on its current model, which often adds Navigator supervision to the existing duties of an already busy court attorney. Cost estimates for expanding the Housing Court Answers and University Settlement Navigator projects are higher than for expanding the Access to Justice Navigators project, but are substantially less – by roughly half -- than the estimated cost of providing legal aid lawyers' services to the same population.

VI. Recommendations for Future Research

As with any empirical research, the evaluation provides answers while raising further questions. Among the most important questions for further research are:

- How do project efficacy and sustainability change with increased scale? All three Navigator projects are at the scale of pilots. This small scale provides many opportunities to learn, but also means we lack some useful information. First, when projects are at a small scale, samples of people who have received assistance will be small, so researchers have less information to evaluate impact than would be the case if the projects were larger. Small differences are difficult to detect in relatively small samples and in populations in which there is large variability in examined factors. Second, when innovation projects are at a small scale, they do not have the capacity to broadly affect the standard operating procedures of the courts or other agencies where they operate. Scale itself can change the environment for an innovation, for example affecting people's awareness of its existence. If the projects are expanded, researchers should take advantage of the existence of more data points to explore the significance of small differences and explore how increased scale affects the projects' operation and impact.

- How much of the differences in outcomes are due to case and litigant selection and how much are due to the impact of Navigators' work? This is a general question that emerges from all observational research that seeks to explore the effects of any kind of intervention. The evaluation finds a number of significant differences between the experiences and case outcomes of assisted and unassisted litigants. A determination of how much of these observed differences are due specifically to the services provided by Navigators, how much is due to differences between cases that receive Navigators' services and those that do not, and how much is due to differences between litigants who accept and do not accept assistance from Navigators would require more information. Different kinds of selection mechanisms are operating in the different Navigator projects. Access to Justice Navigators offer services broadly, and take all litigants who wish for their services. Housing Court Answers Navigators screen potential clients individually and offer their services to litigants who meet program eligibility requirements. University Settlement Navigators select cases based on judgments about their ability to make a difference, much as legal aid lawyers do.

One straightforward method for gathering information that would permit estimating more precisely the effect of Navigators' services would be a randomized controlled trial, where litigants are randomly assigned to different types of service. Given the potential cost savings of University Settlement Navigators over attorneys, such an experiment could fruitfully compare University Settlement assistance to attorney assistance in these cases.

- How could increased coordination shape the efficacy and sustainability of the projects? Currently, the Housing Court Answers Navigators project and the University Settlement Navigators project coordinate intake activities, while the Access to Justice Navigators project conducts intake independently. All Navigator projects make referrals to other programs, including the court Help Center and legal aid. There is currently no systematic process to guide people to the most appropriate service given their needs. Some mechanism of triage could be designed that might more effectively match people and cases to the services for which they are eligible and that are most appropriate for their situations.
- What role do judges and court environments play in shaping Navigators' activities and impact? Because the projects are at a pilot scale, a large share of the information about their impact comes from a single courthouse and a single courtroom. The courthouse is adverse in some ways and supportive in others. The court is a particularly busy and chaotic one. At the same time, the courtroom where Navigators work was for a substantial period of the Navigator pilots supervised by the same judge, who was highly supportive of the New York City Navigators program. It is clear from this research that courthouse environments shape what specific assistance Navigators are likely to perform, as well as many other aspects of litigant experience. Future research should explore the efficacy and sustainability of Navigator programs in different kinds of court environments.

- What role does community context play in shaping Navigators' activities and impact? The evidence revealed here suggests that an important mechanism enabling University Settlement Navigators' impact is the existence of benefits and services to which Navigators can connect litigants. In comparison with other areas of the country, New York City is comparatively rich in these resources. Future research should explore the efficacy and sustainability of Navigator programs in other kinds of communities, with different amounts and types of out-of-court support.

Appendix A. Sources of Data

1. Navigators Survey

Between July and September 2015, we administered a web-based survey to past and current Navigators. The Navigator projects provided email contact information for 247 past and current Navigators. Fourteen of the email addresses were no longer valid at the time of survey, leaving 233 valid addresses. From contacts with these addresses, two potential respondents wrote us to explain that they had never actually served as Navigators. From these 231 potential respondents, the survey received 72 responses, for a response rate of 30 percent. This is a common response rate for web-based surveys,⁴² and not surprising given that many Navigators were students at the time of their service and had graduated and were therefore no longer using their college email accounts.

Table 10. Respondents to the Navigator Survey, by Project

Navigator Project	N
Housing Court Answers	10
Access to Justice: Housing Court	41
Access to Justice: Consumer Debt	16
University Settlement	5

Just as litigants were not always certain who had helped them, Navigators were not always certain about which Navigator project they had participated in. In particular, several Access to Justice Navigators who had worked in the housing courts identified themselves as “Housing Court Answers Navigators.” As a result, more people identified themselves as Housing Court Answers Navigators than had ever worked in the Housing Court Answers Navigators project. Since Housing Court Answers Navigators work only in Brooklyn, it was possible to identify most of the Access to Justice Navigators who had misclassified themselves by isolating those who reported being Housing Court Answers Navigators but working in other boroughs. These Navigator-respondents were reclassified as Access to Justice Navigators, as were Navigators who could not identify the project in which they worked.

2. Courthouse Visitors Survey

During June and July 2015, teams of survey-takers recruited visitors to the Brooklyn Housing Court to take a brief, five-minute survey about their experiences in the courthouse. The survey was presented to potential respondents as the “Courthouse Visitors Survey.” Survey-takers had contact with a total of 1,493 visitors to the courthouse. Seven hundred-twenty agreed to participate, for a response rate of 48 percent. While most respondents were tenants, a few indicated that they were landlords, attorneys or building managers. The findings reported here exclude all respondents who were discernibly not tenants, leaving a sample of 679.

Table 11 reports on selected characteristics of respondents to the survey and residents of the borough. As is common in all kinds of survey research, women were more likely to agree to participate than men. The most striking differences between the demographics of the borough and those of the surveyed litigants concern race and language. The language of the survey, like that of the court, is English. And, while bilingual survey takers did report translating the survey a few times for some litigants, most surveys were conducted in English. Respondents who did not feel comfortable speaking to a stranger in this language likely declined to participate, and for this reason they may be under-represented among the survey respondents.

⁴² See, e.g., COMPARING RESPONSE RATES FROM WEB AND MAIL SURVEYS: A META-ANALYSIS, Tse-Hua Shih and Xitao Fan, Field Methods 20(3): 249-271, 2008.

The second finding of difference concerns the race of the visitors to the Brooklyn Housing Court. The respondents to the survey are much more likely to be African American or Black and much less likely to be Asian or White than are the residents of the borough. We strongly suspect that this difference reflects differences between racial and ethnic groups in vulnerability to eviction actions, rather than differences in response rates to the survey. Survey takers were asked to report their best guess about selected demographic characteristics of the people they approached who declined to participate. Survey takers identified 61.7 percent of nonrespondents to the survey as African-American/Black, a proportion similar to the group’s representation among respondents to the survey. Similarly, survey takers identified 13.1 percent of nonrespondents as White, a proportion similar to that among respondents. In the Brooklyn Housing Court, African-American and Black tenants are over-represented.

Table 11. Selected Characteristics of Respondents to the Survey and Residents of Kings County

	Kings County (US Census)	Kings County Courthouse Visitors Survey
Gender
Male	47.4 %	39.8 %
Female	52.6 %	58.4 %
Race/Ethnicity
African-American/Black	35.2 %	57.4 %
Asian	12.1 %	1.6 %
Hispanic/Latino	19.5 %	19.1 %
White, not Hispanic or Latino	35.8 %	13.4 %
American Indian, Native Alaskan or Native Hawaiian	1.1 %	0.6 %
Two or more races	2.4 %
Language spoken at home
English	53.7 %	89.1 %

Sources: US Census (<http://quickfacts.census.gov/qfd/states/36/36047.html>) and Courthouse Visitors Survey.

3. Key Informant Interviews

During summer and early fall 2015, we talked with a range of stakeholders, including project supervisors, potential and current project funders, Navigators, judges, court attorneys, and clerks. Our conversations ranged over a variety of topics, including those related to appropriateness, efficacy and sustainability. A few of the conversations were audio-recorded with the key informant’s permission; in all cases, we took detailed notes. All informants were promised confidentiality; for that reason, we do not provide information that would permit informants to be identified.

4. Case File Review

During June and July 2015, with the assistance of state court data staff and clerks in the Brooklyn Housing Court, we collected random samples of housing court case files of four different types: those served by Access to Justice Navigators, those served by Housing Court Answers Navigators, those referred by Housing Court Answers Navigators to University Settlement Navigators, and those initially assigned to the same courtroom (the “Navigators courtroom”) but not served by any of the Navigator projects. At the time the research was conducted, Navigators did in-courtroom work in only one courtroom in the Brooklyn courthouse. Because this project is interested in evidence of the impact of Navigators, we must do what we can to control for the impact of other factors on how cases turn out. Differences in specific judges’ behavior and in courtroom practices shape these aspects of case histories, so our sample controls for these differences by limiting the analysis to a single courtroom and comparing Navigated cases to other cases processed in that courtroom.

Our requests to the court produced 214 files, which were scanned and reviewed. We received 34 files for cases served by Access to Justice Navigators; 143 files for cases served by Housing Court Answers Navigators; 39 files for cases served by University Settlement Navigators; and 48 files that received no Navigator assistance. The different sample sizes for the different case groups reflect a range of factors, including the record-keeping practices of the different Navigator projects and the availability of specific court files at the time we made our requests. Not all of the scanned files were usable in the analysis: some were defaults, some were missing important pieces of information and, in a few, tenants were served by Volunteer Lawyers for the Day. These files were excluded from the analysis, leaving 181 files that could be analyzed.

Because of the way the projects are designed, it is possible for a case to be served by more than one type of Navigator. All University Settlement Navigators cases are first served by Housing Court Answers Navigators, and cases that Housing Court Answers Navigators serves but University Settlement Navigators does not take up can later receive services from Access to Justice Navigators. However, in our sample, we did not discover any cases where a Housing Court Answers Navigators-assisted person later received assistance from an Access to Justice Navigator.

5. Snapshot Report

In February 2015, the Committee on Nonlawyers and the Justice Gap, working with Professor Jeffrey Butts of John Jay College of Criminal Justice and state court data staff, produced an initial report on the Navigators programs in the Brooklyn Housing Court. The Snapshot Report drew on a small survey of litigants assisted by Navigators, survey-takers’ observations, a review of case files, and conversations with a small set of key informants. The report is available here: <http://nylawyer.nylj.com/adgifs/decisions15/022415report.pdf>.

Appendix B. Answer Form

CIVIL COURT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK COUNTY OF _____: HOUSING PART

Index No. _____

Petitioner(s),
-against-

LANDLORD/TENANT
ANSWER IN PERSON

Name: _____

Address: _____

Respondent(s).

Respondent / Person claiming possession has appeared and orally answered the Petition as follows:

SERVICE

1. _____ I did not receive the Notice of Petition and Petition.
2. _____ I received the Notice of Petition and Petition, but service was not correct as required by law.

PARTIES

3. _____ My name appears improperly , or by the wrong name , or does not appear on the Notice of Petition and Petition ; the tenant is dead .
4. _____ The Petitioner is not the landlord, owner of the building, or otherwise a proper party.

RENT

5. _____ The Petitioner never asked me or properly asked me for the rent, orally or in writing, before starting this case.
6. _____ I or someone on my behalf tried to pay the rent, but the Petitioner refused to accept it.
7. _____ The monthly rent asked for is not the legal rent or amount on the current lease.
8. _____ The Petitioner owes money to me because of a rent overcharge I paid for repairs or services
9. _____ The rent, or a part of the rent, has already been paid to the Petitioner.

APARTMENT/HOUSE

10. _____ There are or were conditions in the apartment and/or the building/house which the Petitioner did not repair and/or services which the Petitioner did not provide.
11. _____ The petition does not properly describe the apartment/house: wrong apartment/house number ; wrong or missing program(s) and/or laws covering my tenancy .
12. _____ The apartment/house is illegal.

OTHER

13. _____ The Petitioner has harmed me by waiting too long to bring this case (laches).
14. _____ General denial.
15. _____ NEW YORK CITY ONLY The Petitioner has harassed me _____
16. _____ I serve in the military or depend on someone in the military.
17. _____ The petitioner seeks the HUD or Housing Authority Section 8 part of the rent . The petitioner did not notify HUD or the Housing Authority about this case Other: _____

18. _____ COUNTERCLAIM: I seek a judgment and/or order based upon the above defense(s).
19. _____ Other counterclaim(s): _____

Dated

Clerk / Judge's Initials

COURT DATE

DATE: _____ TIME: _____ PART: _____ ROOM: _____

THE CLERK CANNOT CHANGE YOUR COURT DATE. YOU MUST COME AND BRING THIS FORM AND ALL OF YOUR PROOF (RECEIPTS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.) WITH YOU. BE AT THE COURTHOUSE AT LEAST 30 MINUTES BEFORE YOUR COURT DATE, TO ALLOW TIME TO GO THROUGH THE METAL DETECTORS. IF YOU ARE LATE OR DO NOT APPEAR, YOU MAY LOSE YOUR CASE AND BE EVICTED. IF YOU ARE UNABLE TO SETTLE YOUR CASE, YOU MAY HAVE AN IMMEDIATE TRIAL. IF YOU WILL NOT BE READY FOR TRIAL, YOU MUST ASK THE JUDGE FOR A NEW DATE. THE JUDGE WILL THEN DECIDE IF YOU HAVE SHOWN A GOOD REASON TO POSTPONE YOUR CASE.

For assistance visit a Help Center in the courthouse or the Court's website: <http://nycourthelp.gov/>

CIV-LT-91(Revised April 24, 2013)

Appendix C. Summary of Goals, Design, Evidence of Impact and Possible Improvements

Program Goals	Tasks Performed	Evidence of Impact	Possible Improvements
Access to Justice Navigators (courts throughout the City of New York) Moral support, information about the system and process, procedural justice and sense of fairness, empower to tell own side of the story.	Provide services for the day only and in court only. Provide information, accompany unrepresented litigant through tasks at the courthouse, including meetings with attorneys, judges and clerks. Assist in organizing papers. Assist in the use of court-provided “Do It Yourself” computer technology to create legal documents.	Surveys of litigants revealed that litigants who received the help of any type of Navigator were 56 percent more likely than unassisted litigants to say they were able to tell their side of the story. No other statistically significant differences in procedural justice experiences were found.	The project is most successful under two conditions: (a) when Navigators have dedicated supervision and additional “on-the-job” training to supplement their initial training; (b) when judges, court attorneys and other court staff are well-informed about Navigators and their role and not opposed to their presence. Though this is the least expensive Navigator program, increases in funding for Navigator supervision and greater investment in training court staff are indicated.
Housing Court Answers Navigators (Brooklyn Housing Court) Improve tenants’ understanding and ability to put forward their side of the case. Change legal outcomes by assisting tenants in raising legally valid defenses to eviction.	Provide services for the day only and in court only. Provide information and assistance in completing a legal document, the Answer to the landlord’s petition of nonpayment. Accompany litigant to meet with the clerk, file answer and receive court date.	Tenants assisted by Navigators asserted more than twice as many defenses as tenants who received no assistance. They were 87 percent more likely than unassisted tenants to have their defenses recognized and addressed by the court. For instance, judges ordered landlords to make needed repairs about 50 percent more often in Navigator-assisted cases.	Increased resources would permit expanded service. A modified service model might permit service to a larger number of people with the same resources.
University Settlement Navigators (Brooklyn Housing Court) Prevent evictions.	Provide services for the life of the case, both inside and outside court. Provide information, moral support and accompaniment to meetings with judges, attorneys and clerks. Work with tenant to make connections to benefits and human and social services that can support the timely and full payment of rent.	Zero percent of tenants assisted by Navigators experienced eviction from their homes by a marshal. By contrast, in recent years, one formal eviction occurs for about every nine non-payment cases city-wide.	Increased resources would permit expanded service.

Appendix D. Acknowledgments

Over the course of this research project, many people made contributions that improved it and, indeed, made it possible. We are particularly grateful to the Public Welfare Foundation and its president Mary McClymont for funding and other support of the project, and to Judge Fern Fisher, Roger Maldonado, Fern Schair, and Richard Zorza for their sustained engagement with the research. We also thank Katherine Alternator, Martha Bergmark, Steve Crossland, and Paula Littlewood for their insights and advice. Eddy Valdez was unfailingly helpful in assisting with access to court files. Yacine Barry-Wun, Jenny Laurie, and Jennifer Valone were generous in answering questions about the details of the different Navigator pilot projects. We thank David Udell and Connie Matteo for their assistance in organizing an important first step in the case file review activities. We are also grateful to Teresa Cruz-Paul, who helped us to connect with some fantastic research assistants and to Chip Mount and Gail Miller for assistance in selecting case files for review. We thank Katharine Hannaford and Cheyenne Blount for editorial assistance.

We were lucky to be able to work with a number of talented people during the data collection and analysis. For both research assistance and valuable insights, we thank Danielle Banks, Alondra Cuevas, Ejaz Ahmed, Valentin Gradinaru, Sara Helwink, Nicholas Hopkins, Darsen Hover, John Kim, Julie Kruger, Masood Mahdavifar, Isabel Mendoza, Magdalena Oropeza, Joe Rosenberg, Juliet Sato, Matthew Schneider, Edwin Torres, and Alexander Wind.

Most importantly, we thank all of the people who took the time to share their experiences and insights with us by participating in surveys or interviews. Our promises of confidentiality to them mean that we are unable to thank them by name. We will always be grateful for their contributions, without which this research would not have been possible.

Any errors or omissions that remain are the sole responsibility of the study's authors.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 14

Licensed Paralegal Task Force Report

Benchers

Trudi Brown, QC (Chair)
Michael Welsh, QC (Vice-Chair)
Jamie Maclaren, QC
Steven McKoen, QC
John-Paul Boyd, QC
Nancy Carter
David Dundee
Joanna Recalma
Michele Ross

Prepared for: Benchers

Prepared by: Licensed Paralegal Task Force

Purpose: Proposal for developing and regulating alternate legal service providers

Date: September 25, 2020

Background

1. The report proposes an approach that differs both from the Task Force’s mandate and from how the topic of alternate legal service providers has been approached to date. The Task Force seeks approval from the Benchers to make the conceptual shift set out in the report. If the Benchers adopt the recommended approach, additional work will be necessary to address some issues that are identified in the report, but not resolved.
2. The Benchers created the Licensed Paralegal Task Force in 2019. Its mandate and terms of reference are to further develop the work of the Alternate Legal Service Provider Working Group that had considered, and consulted on, the possibility of regulation and scope of practice of family law alternate legal service providers in 2018. Specifically, the Task Force was directed to:
 1. Consider and identify opportunities, in consultation with the profession and others, for the delivery of legal services in areas where there is a substantial unmet legal need and the public would benefit from the provision of those services by licensed paralegals; and
 2. If the Task Force identifies areas of legal services where licensed paralegals may meet an unmet legal need:
 - a) consider the scope of services that would be appropriate for licensed paralegals to provide in relation to the identified areas of legal services;
 - b) consider what education, qualifications, credentials, experience and insurance would be necessary to enable licensed paralegals to deliver legal services in a competent and ethical manner in the identified areas of legal services; and
 - c) make recommendations to the Benchers for a regulatory framework that will ensure that licensed paralegals provide legal services in a regulated, competent and ethical manner only in the identified areas of legal services approved by the Law Society.
3. The Task Force has met through the remainder of 2019 and into 2020. It has reviewed the Law Society’s prior work on alternate legal service providers, including a consideration of the 2018 consultation report and the commentary the Law Society received. It has also analysed the results of a 2020 IPSOS Reid survey of legal needs that updated the Law Society’s 2009 survey.
4. For the reasons set out below, the Task Force recommends an approach that varies from the approach contained in its mandate.

Licensed Paralegal Initiative: Brief Review

5. The licensed paralegal initiative is intended to address, at least in part, the broader access to justice challenge. The Law Society has made a policy decision that licensed paralegals may help address areas of underserved or unmet legal needs where people are seeking legal services, but are unable to obtain them and has obtained legislative amendments (as yet unproclaimed) through which the policy decision may be implemented.

6. The research and data reviewed by the Task Force, including our 2009 and 2020 Surveys, establish that over any three year period approximately 50% of Canadians will experience a serious, difficult to resolve legal problem.¹ These problems can cluster and cascade into more problems, including economic, social and health problems. For people experiencing these problems, only about 15% get help from lawyers.² In 2009 when the Law Society surveyed legal need, approximately 16% of people sought help from someone other than a lawyer, including paid services, and approximately 70% sought no help.³ In 2020, the number of people seeking help from someone other than a lawyer increased to 27%, the number seeking help from lawyers remained steady at 15%, and the number of people who sought no help declined to 60%.
7. Clearly, therefore, while many people facing a legal problem are getting no legal help, a sizable portion of the population facing a legal problem is getting some legal assistance from someone other than a lawyer (16% in 2009 and 27% in 2020). Some of this may be from persons (like notaries or community legal advocates) who have some ability and qualifications to provide the advice or assistance, but some will undoubtedly be from people who have no demonstrable qualification and who operate under no regulatory structure, which leaves the client vulnerable.
8. The problem faced by the justice system, to which the licensed paralegal initiative directs itself, is that a large portion of the public (a) experience serious, difficult to resolve, legal problems, and want help from a professional, (b) have some money to spend, but (c) are not getting help from lawyers.

Discussion

Setting the Stage: “Top Down” vs. “Grass Roots”

9. British Columbia is not unique when it comes to having an access to justice challenge. Other jurisdictions face the same challenge and have made efforts to examine how legal services may be provided by people who do not have the full training of a lawyer.

¹ Ab Currie, “The Legal Problems of Everyday Life – The Nature, Extent and Consequences of Justiciable Problems Experienced by Canadians”, Department of Justice, 2009-05-12; Ab Currie, “Nudging the Paradigm Shift, Everyday Legal Problems in Canada” 2016 CanLIIDocs 352.

² Law Society of BC, IPSOS Reid Surveys 2009 and 2020 confirm these data.

³ The rounding totals are explained in the reports.

10. The Task Force’s examination of other jurisdictions suggests that the consideration of regulation relating to other legal professionals has resulted in two possible approaches: “top down” or “grass roots”
11. The “top down” approach is one in which the regulator defines a category of provider, a scope of practice, and a set of qualifications, credentials and experience in the expectation that there will be an interest in joining that category.
12. An example is Washington State’s Limited License Legal Technicians (“LLLT”) program. The LLLT initiative was driven by the courts (the body ultimately responsible in that state for professional regulation) particularly in response to self-represented litigants in court. The Supreme Court issued a practice rule, which created LLLTs, and the State Bar worked with local universities and colleges to design the training and credentialing requirements. The program was limited to family law, but was intended to be scaled up for other areas of need.
13. The LLLT requirements for licensing were considerable, including an associate level of post-secondary education, completion of ABA approved programs in family law and other basic legal subjects, 3000 hours of practice experience supervised by a lawyer over a three year period, and successful completion of a core education exam and practice area exam.
14. Over the course of the seven years during which the program was in place, only 45 LLLTs were registered and as of early summer there were only 39 active LLLTs.
15. In June, 2020, at the request of the State Bar, the Washington State Courts announced the LLLT program will end. The Chief Justice’s announcement cited the costs of the program and limited participation as the reasons for ending the program.⁴ The Task Force is of the view that the Washington State experience illustrates some of the problems with a top down approach.
16. A “grass roots” approach, on the other hand, is one where the regulator looks to revise or recalibrate its regulatory scope to permit the provision of legal services by providers who may already be providing services.
17. An example of the “grass roots” approach is the evolution of licensed paralegals in Ontario.
18. As a result of the definition of the practise of law in the Ontario Law Society Act and various court decisions⁵, by the year 2000 there had developed a fairly robust community of paralegals acting as "agents," who could represent individuals in court in certain

⁴ The board of the LLLT program has recently announced that it will be asking the Court reconsider its decision or at a minimum allow more time for the LLLT candidates to complete the licensing requirements.

⁵ The most significant was R. v. Lawrie and Pointts Ltd. (1987), 59 O.R. (2d) 161 (C.A.)

circumstances. Concerns about the scope of practice which paralegals could undertake led to calls for regulation of paralegals and, on the part of the Law Society of Upper Canada, calls for limitations on what matters paralegals could act on in court.⁶

19. Over the next seven years, there were repeated calls for regulation or limitations on the role of paralegals that eventually resulted, on May 1st, 2007, in the extension of the mandate of the Law Society of Ontario to include the regulation of paralegals. The number of paralegals initially registered following 2007 exceeded the estimates of the Law Society of Ontario and today there are over 9,000 paralegal licensees.⁷
20. While the grass roots development of a viable paralegal community in Ontario was the result of factors peculiar to that province, more recently other jurisdictions have taken to implementing changes to foster a grass roots approach to the development of alternate legal service providers that aim to create an environment for the provision of legal services by persons who are not lawyers.
21. The Law Society of Saskatchewan (LSS) created a task team to explore the issues of access to justice, increased consumer options and regulatory reform. As a result of the task team's 2018 report, the LSS expanded the exemptions to the unauthorized practice rules, including identifying a range of services that currently exist and do not pose a threat to the public and therefore no longer need to be "regulated" by the Law Society. The LSS has adopted an incremental approach that is application-based, guided by a set of principles, and takes a flexible and tailored approach to defining the qualifications, scope of practice, and practice controls that would be applicable to each licensee.
22. Utah, Oregon and California are all now looking at revising their regulation of the legal profession to permit alternatives to the delivery of legal service only by lawyers. They are either considering or implementing what is commonly referred to as a regulatory "sandbox" to permit experimentation in the delivery of legal services within the ambit of the practice authority in those states.
23. The Task Force recognizes that the Law Society's entire engagement with the idea of licensed paralegals to this point has been premised on what we have described here as the "top down" approach. The recommendations from the 2013 Legal Service Providers Task Force and the 2014 Legal Services Regulatory Framework Task Force assumed that the appropriate approach was to seek an amendment to the Legal Profession Act to permit the Law Society to establish new classes of legal service providers to engage in the practice of law, set the credentialing requirements for such individuals, and regulate their legal practice. The implementation of that recommendation eventually resulted in the as-yet unproclaimed amendments to the Legal Profession Act permitting the regulation of licensed paralegals.

⁶ A convenient summary of the evolution can be found in The Cory Report and the Regulation of Paralegals in Ontario

⁷ As a further example of the "ground up" approach, it was the existing barristers and solicitors of the day in 1869 who came together to form the Law Society and it was the existing bar that prompted the creation of the Legal Professions Act in 1884.

24. The Task Force also recognizes that the predecessor to this Task Force, the Alternate Legal Service Providers Working Group, made an attempt to move forward with a “top down” approach relating to the provision of family law legal services by licenced paralegals. It encountered conceptual issues in relation to determining the scope of practice and regulation as well as objections from the bar regarding the overall proposal.
25. However, the Task Force also recognizes that the Law Society has been engaged with the issue of recognizing paralegals as independent legal service providers for many years and that during that time, no “top down” approach has resulted in the existence of any licensed paralegals. The Task Force believes that such an approach must therefore be recognised as having limitations when trying to create a cohort of legal service providers and to determine, in a vacuum, what services that cohort should provide and how they should be regulated.
26. The Task Force therefore suggests that a more fruitful approach is to undertake a “grass roots” approach to the issue and, under some supervision, create a space that will let a marketplace develop that might address the unmet or underserved legal needs of the public. It is more likely that the marketplace will identify what these services are before the Law Society is able to do so.
27. In addition, the approach recommended in this report aligns with the Access to Justice BC Triple Aim, which the Benchers adopted in 2018. The Triple Aim seeks to ensure that the user experience is improved, access to justice is enhanced, and there is overall cost efficiency.
28. The Task Force is therefore recommending the creation of a process that will allow service models to develop under general oversight of the Law Society in a manner that allows for creativity and innovation while determining, based on evidence that will be gathered as the market develops, the level of regulation required relative to the risk to the public. The environment in which this process can unfold is increasingly referred to as a regulatory “sandbox.”

A Proposed “Sandbox.”

29. The Utah Implementation Task Force on Regulatory Reform described its regulatory sandbox as a well-established policy tool through which regulators permit new models and services to participate in a market under careful oversight to test the interest, viability, and consumer consequence of the model or service and inform policy development. New legal practice providers and services have to apply to enter the regulatory sandbox before they will be permitted to offer services in the legal market. The application form sets out a series of criteria that must be met in order for people to be granted admission to the sandbox. The Task Force recommends tailoring a similar, yet British Columbia specific, model of intake. Successful applicants will be able to offer services under careful oversight to ensure there is no demonstrable harm to a person or public.

30. As will be obvious from the description of the regulatory sandbox, there is a necessary connection with s.15 of the Legal Profession Act and the exercise of the Law Society’s ability to restrain the unauthorized practice of law. To that end, the Unauthorized Practice Committee has been working to develop a clear statement of policy as to when the Law Society will and will not take steps to respond to allegations and instances of the provision of legal services that may amount to the unauthorized practice of law. The goal is to publish this policy so that individuals and organizations may be able to assist with providing access to some legal services where there is no demonstrable harm to a person or the public. This work aligns with the recommendations of this Task Force.

Populating the Sandbox

Application

31. It is expected that the application form will require basic information about the applicants, the services they intend to provide, the evidence in support of how those services meet the criteria of unmet or underserved legal need,⁸ the skills, experience and knowledge the applicant brings that are relevant to providing those services, as well as certain requirements to adhere the standard ethical obligations that will be developed as part of the regulatory process.

“No action agreements”

32. Individuals who meet the requirements of the application phase will be issued a “no action agreement,” which will set out the terms and conditions on the limited scope of legal services the applicant will be permitted to perform. The letter will also set out conditions for oversight, including reporting requirements and the potential requirement for insurance coverage. The letter will explain that the ability to provide the services is revocable by the Law Society. A no action agreement could be provided to a person, or categories of persons, who meet objective identified, approved criteria for providing particular services.
33. This approach will create a controlled environment, within a “sandbox” structure, through which to test the types of services that may be offered, the degree of regulation may be required, and the degree of qualification or background of the provider.

⁸ This evidence could be tested against existing data such as the 2009 and 2020 Law Society IPSOS Reid surveys.
DM2779721

Paralegals

34. The Task Force recognizes that the British Columbia Paralegal Association (BCPA) has, for some time, expressed interest in a more formal recognition of paralegals. A survey by the BCPA prior to the introduction of the amendments to the Legal Profession Act indicated that, if paralegals were regulated in a manner similar to Ontario paralegals, a significant majority would choose to practise as a regulated paralegal.
35. There are currently over 800 designated paralegals. Designated paralegals are permitted to provide all legal services, albeit under the supervision of a lawyer. The Law Society assumes that lawyers who have designated a paralegal as a “designated paralegal” have confidence that the paralegal has a significant degree of ability to provide legal services directly to a client. The program proposed in this report might therefore usefully leverage the existence of a group of “designated paralegals” as potential applicants for entry to the regulatory sandbox.
36. One way the Law Society can foster the “grass roots” approach is by providing a pathway for existing paralegals and designated paralegals to engage in providing legal services to the public through inclusion in the regulatory sandbox. The Task Force has come to recognize that this approach is the most viable way to move forward with a licensed paralegal program.
37. A system can eventually be developed by which paralegals who enter the sandbox, and meet identified objectives/criteria for a defined period of time, could eventually apply to the Law Society to become licensed paralegals.

Some further comments on the sandbox

38. Ultimately, the Task Force expects that if paralegals embrace the opportunity to provide legal services within the regulatory sandbox, there will eventually be a qualified cohort of providers within the sandbox that will form the basis for a more structured licensed paralegal regime, based on those actively providing paralegal services. The sandbox could continue to operate with the other individuals who, while not having a path to licensing, will be able to continue to operate under the no action agreement regime.
39. The Task Force recognizes that as the sandbox is developed, discrete matters such as the needed level of regulation will need to be determined. The sandbox will include a spectrum of responses to the access to justice problem, not a single model of service delivery or even potential licence. For some service providers, entry into the sandbox will put them on a path to eventual licensing by the Law Society, while others will operate without a license, but in a limited and discrete area of service. Although the model recommended below might present as a linear progression, it is not intended to be presented in that fashion, except to the degree that the act of licensing (if it does take place) will be informed by what the Law Society learns from the sandbox.

40. The Task Force also recognizes that even within a relaxed, regulatory sandbox it is important that the people providing legal services adhere to certain essential aspects of the Code of Conduct for British Columbia. While not all elements of the Code would transfer to people in the sandbox, at a minimum concepts of maintaining client confidences, not acting in a conflict of interest, not providing services in an illegal manner, are all important. The Task Force is of the view that key aspects of the Code must be included in the terms of any non-action letter or other contractual document that permits activity within the sandbox, and reinforced in the initial application process. The key will be to identify principles that aim to reduce the risk of harm to the public.

Recommendation

41. The Task Force recommends a “grass roots” approach to advance the licensed paralegal initiative within a regulatory sandbox.
42. The regulatory sandbox would:
- (a) Permit individuals to apply to the Law Society to provide legal advice or services in areas where the Law Society determines it is in the public interest to expand the permitted services, as well as in areas where there the Law Society has assessed that there are no services (or insufficient services) being provided by lawyers;
 - (b) Develop a system of no action agreements to cover categories of legal service providers, and individual-based letters for applicants who wish to provide discrete services based on their skills and knowledge in circumstances where the Law Society has assessed that it is in the public interest to permit the services to be provided in the sandbox; and
 - (c) Eventually provide the basis for the formal recognition of licensed paralegals within the licensed paralegal regime, by way of amendments to the LPA, providing for the types of paralegals who will be able to provide legal services directly to the public in identified areas of need, either working with lawyers or independently.
43. If this proposal is accepted by the Benchers, additional work will be required to detail the administrative and operational implications of overseeing the sandbox. The Task Force is of the view that it is premature to develop those criteria without the Benchers’ endorsement of exploring the framework of a sandbox.
44. In closing, the Task Force observes that the amendments to the Legal Profession Act have been in a holding pattern for almost two years, and it is time to move forward with a program of expanded service provision with a path towards licensing. For the reasons contained in this report, the Task Force recommends the Law Society further develop what we call a grass roots sandbox approach and consult with interested stakeholders for their ideas, comments, and critiques on how best to make that work.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 15

The Supreme Court
State of Washington

DEBRA L. STEPHENS
CHIEF JUSTICE
TEMPLE OF JUSTICE
POST OFFICE BOX 40929
OLYMPIA, WASHINGTON
98504-0929

(360) 357-2050
E-MAIL Debra.Stephens@COURTS.WA.GOV

June 5, 2020

Stephen R. Crossland, Chair
Limited License Legal Technician Board
1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Rajeev Majumdar, President
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Terra Nevitt, Interim Executive Director
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Re: Washington Supreme Court Votes to Sunset the Limited License Legal Technicians Program

Dear Mr. Crossland, Mr. Majumdar, and Ms. Nevitt:

I am writing to you on behalf of the Supreme Court to advise you that the court voted by majority Thursday, June 4, 2020, to sunset the Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT) Program. The majority also rejected the LLLT Board's requested expansion of practice areas and proposed rule revisions.

The LLLT program was created in 2012 as an effort to respond to unmet legal needs of Washington residents who could not afford to hire a lawyer. Through this program, licensed legal technicians were able to provide narrow legal services to clients in certain family law matters. The program was an innovative attempt to increase access to legal services. However, after careful consideration of the overall costs of sustaining the program and the small number of interested individuals, a majority of the court determined that the LLLT program is not an effective way to meet these needs, and voted to sunset the program.

Current legal technicians in good standing may continue to be licensed and may continue to provide services. Individuals already in the pipeline as of June 4, 2020, who can complete all the requirements to be licensed as a LLLT by July 31, 2021, may do so. No new LLLTs will be admitted after that date.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read "Debra L. Stephens", with a long horizontal flourish extending to the right.

Debra L. Stephens, Chief Justice
Washington State Supreme Court

The Supreme Court
State of Washington

BARBARA A. MADSEN
JUSTICE
TEMPLE OF JUSTICE
POST OFFICE BOX 40929
OLYMPIA, WASHINGTON
98504-0929

(360) 357-2037
FAX (360) 357-2103
E-MAIL J_B.MADSEN@COURTS.WA.GOV

June 5, 2020

Stephen R. Crossland, Chair
Limited License Legal Technician Board
1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Rajeev Majumdar, President
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Terra Nevitt, Interim Executive Director
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Re: Washington Supreme Court Votes to Sunset the Limited License Legal Technicians Program

Dear Mr. Crossland, Mr. Majumdar, and Ms. Nevitt:

Today, the court issued a letter announcing its vote to “sunset” the Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) “program.” Despite these benign words, let there be no mistake about the nature of the court’s action: the elimination of an independent legal license. What’s more, the court did so at a single meeting, without question or comment from LLLT license holders, legal practitioners, or the public at large. What took over a decade of toil to create, this court erased in an afternoon. I passionately disagree with the court’s vote as well as the way in which it was carried out.

Unlike the opaque process governing the court’s June 4, 2020 vote, I believe it is useful to review the history of the LLLT “program”—to use the court’s preferred terminology—before opining on its future. First, as a matter of definitions, limited legal technicians are those qualified by education, training, and work experience who are authorized to engage in the limited practice of law in specific subject areas. APR 28(B)(4). Turning to history, the LLLT license did not spring fully formed from the head of Zeus. Rather, it is the work of thousands upon thousands of hours dedicated to rectifying a simple truth: that access to justice in this country is not equal. The Civil Legal Needs Survey of 2003 confirmed that almost 80 percent of low income and nearly 50 percent of moderate income Americans cannot access or afford legal services.^[1] Critically important to addressing this disparity was protecting the public from the unauthorized practice of law. The solution to both was expanding the options for providing legal services. Thus, APR 28 was approved and the limited legal technician license was born.

The creation of the LLLT was by no means the end of our labors. In many ways it was only the beginning. Since 2012, stakeholders have crafted and this court has approved the contours of the LLLT license: educational requirements, scope of practice, and governing ethical rules. E.g., APR 28; Order (July 12, 2013) (setting out educational requirements and scope of practice for LLLT, among other things); Order (Aug. 8, 2013) (establishing the admission and licensing requirements for LLLT applicants); Order (March 23, 2015) (adopting changes to Rules of Professional Conduct for Lawyers to coordinate those rules with the LLLT Rules of Professional Conduct); WASHINGTON LLLT EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM APPROVAL STANDARDS, WASHINGTON STATE BAR ASS'N (June 10, 2019). Throughout this rule-making process, we have heard from interested parties, students, legal professionals, and members of the public. The questions and comments from all sides have formed and shaped the LLLT from an ambitious plan into a concrete professional license. Make no mistake, LLLT is a new professional license.

2014 marked the first class of LLLT candidates and more have added to these ranks. THOMAS M. CLARKE & REBECCA L. SANDEFUR, PRELIMINARY EVALUATION OF THE WASHINGTON STATE LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN PROGRAM 5 (March 2017), http://www.americanbarfoundation.org/uploads/cms/documents/preliminary_evaluation_of_the_washington_state_limited_license_legal_technician_program_032117.pdf. The Public Welfare Foundation studied this new legal practice after its creation and found it was significant in helping create access to justice and was replicable. See id. at 14. As a testament to this, other states are considering adopting similar licenses: efforts are underway in states such as Utah, California, Oregon, Colorado, New Mexico, Minnesota, Massachusetts, and Connecticut; and in Canada, British Columbia. Simply put, countless individuals have contributed thousands of hours of their time and energy to devise, bring about, grow, and support the LLLT practice. Not to mention the men and women who have taken on the challenge of trailblazing this innovative, new profession in our state.

^[1] The dire need for affordable legal services has not decreased. In 2017, 86 percent of litigants in civil cases received inadequate or no legal help. 2017 Justice Gap Report: Measuring the Civil Legal Needs of Low-income Americans, Legal Services Corporation, June 2017, <https://www.lsc.gov/media-center/publications/2017-justice-gap-report>.

I recall this history in order to illustrate the depth of the court's misunderstanding in eliminating the LLLT license. Not only is the LLLT not simply a "program" that was easily created, and just as easily paused and canceled as budgets—or attitudes—permit, the LLLT is an independent legal license. As such, it warrants the respect of time and consideration before alteration, let alone total elimination. With yesterday's vote, the court sua sponte ended a completely viable licensing category that the public can draw on. There was no process. No questions. No comments. The public was not consulted. This is not how an institution should go about changing or dismantling such a bold initiative. In no other professional area would a regulated license be so summarily erased with so little thought given to those who will be most affected.

Not only was yesterday's vote a disservice to the stakeholders, current and aspiring LLLT license holders, and to the people of Washington, it stands in stark contrast to the way in which the LLLT license was crafted and directed for over a decade. The primary reason offered by the Washington State Bar Association Board of Governors for eliminating the LLLT "program" is cost: it is too expensive to maintain and lawyers should not have to underwrite the cost. This ignores the fact that the cost of growing and maintaining this group of licensed professionals is less than 1 percent of the Association's budget. It also ignores the many thousands of dollars the Bar expends every year investigating lawyer misconduct and does not acknowledge the lack of grievances against LLLT practitioners. I find the Board of Governors' cost rationale a hollow one. While current LLLT license holders are "grandfathered in" and allowed to continue practicing, there has been no evaluation offered about the cost of this decision and whether there would be any appreciable change in the cost of administering the LLLT license. As a fiscal matter, the silence on this point speaks loudly, as does the lack of deliberation on other options to address concerns expressed by the Bar while maintaining this professional license and the valuable services it provides in the pursuit of access to justice.

Today's decision also resonates on another level, both abstract and imminently tangible. Just this week, my colleagues and I authored a letter examining the systemic racism that has plagued our country since its inception. We accepted the role judges and the legal community at large have played in maintaining this reality, and recommitted our efforts to ending racial disparity in our governmental, community, and social institutions. The elimination of the

Dissent to Sunset of LLLT

June 5, 2020

Page 4

LLLT license, which was created to address access to justice across income and race, is a step backward in this critical work. It is not the time for closing the doors to justice but, instead, for opening them wider.

With these considerations in mind, I respectfully dissent.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "Barbara Madsen". The signature is written in a cursive, flowing style.

Barbara A. Madsen
Justice

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 16

LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN (LLLT) BOARD
AGENDA for October 8, 2018

Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue – Suite 600
Seattle, Washington 98101
1:00 p.m. to 4:00 p.m.

1. Call to Order/Preliminary Matters (1:00 p.m.)
 - Introductions
 - Outreach Update
 - Approval of Meeting Minutes - ACTION
2. Trust Account Committee Report (Jeanne Dawes, Sarah Bove and Andrea Jarmon) (1:30 p.m.)
3. Consumer, Money, and Debt Committee Report (Nancy Ivarinen) (1:45 p.m.)
4. Board Development Committee Report (Steve Crossland) (2:00 p.m.)
5. RPC and Family Law Enhancement Comments (WSBA Staff) (2:15 p.m.)
6. Courthouse Facilitator Discussion (WSBA Staff) (2:30 p.m.)
7. ELC & ELLTTC: Overview and Comparison (Felice Congalton) (3:00 p.m.)

MEETING MATERIALS

1. Outreach Update
2. August 16, 2018 Draft Meeting Minutes
3. Consumer, Money, and Debt Comments
4. Signing Authority on Trust Accounts Issue Summary
5. Court Facilitators Issue Summary
6. Family Law Enhancements Comments sent to Supreme Court
7. LLLT RPC Comments sent to Supreme Court
8. Consumer, Money and Debt FAQs

LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN (LLLT) BOARD

UPDATE: October 2018

Outreach & Press
Press: <ul style="list-style-type: none">July 24, 2018: Limited License Legal Technician with guest host Patrick Palace (Episode #27 7/24/18)August 6, 2018: Utah Nears Licensing of Paralegals to Practice Law in Limited Circumstances Recent Events: <ul style="list-style-type: none">September 4, 2018: Q&A session at Spokane Community College for students. Attended by Jaimie Patneau and Barbara Esselstrom, LLLT.September 24, 2018: LLLTs added to the WOIS.org database Upcoming Events: <ul style="list-style-type: none">September 29, 2018: Family Law and Mediation CLE with Washington State Paralegal Association (Christy Carpenter will be a guest speaker)October 25-28, 2018: NFPA Annual Convention, Hilton Seattle Airport. Steve Crossland & Paula Littlewood. WSBA table will be staffed by Renata Garcia, Jaimie Patneau and LLLTs.October 27, 2018: NALS of Washington Fall Education Conference, Great Wolf Lodge. WSBA table will be staffed by Sara Niegowski and LLLTs.
Statistics & Other Events
<ul style="list-style-type: none">Number of current LLLTs: 384 LLLTs are inactive
Meetings
Recent: <ul style="list-style-type: none">September 18, 2018: Collection Agency Board Meeting attended by Jean McElroy, Renata Garcia, Sarah Bove, and Jennifer Ortega Upcoming: <ul style="list-style-type: none">November 19, 2018: LLLT Board MeetingNovember 19, 2018: New Practice Area, Consumer Money and Debt Workgroup Meeting

LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN (LLLT) BOARD
Meeting Minutes for August 16, 2018

Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue – Suite 600
Seattle, Washington 98101

LLLT Board Members in Attendance:

- | | |
|---|--|
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Stephen Crossland | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Nancy Ivarinen |
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Sarah Bove | <input type="checkbox"/> Andrea Jarmon |
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Brenda Cothary | <input type="checkbox"/> Genevieve Mann |
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Greg Dallaire | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Ruth McIntyre |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Jeanne Dawes | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Jennifer Petersen |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Stephanie Delaney | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Amy Riedel |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Lynn Fleischbein | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Gail Hammer (remote) |

Staff and Others in Attendance during some or all of the meeting:

Renata Garcia (Innovative Licensing Programs Manager), Jean McElroy (RSD Associate Director), Jaimie Patneau (LLLT Lead), Doug Ende (Chief Disciplinary Counsel), Geoff Revelle (ATJ liaison), Dan Clark (BOG liaison, remote), Christy Carpenter (FY2019 Board Member), Catherine Brown (FY2019 Board Member), and Kim Kinchen (paralegal student, remote)

Call to Order / Preliminary Matters

The meeting was called to order at 1:00 p.m.

- Outreach Update

Sarah Bove advised the Board of a class she is involved in preparing that will be held at the King County Law Library. This class will be recorded and shared with anyone interested and will cover LLLTs and unbundled legal services. Sarah's goal is to get this recording shared at other law libraries and local libraries.

Steve Crossland mentioned he is working on creating a group that will work with LLLTs and attorneys.

Brenda advised Seattle will be hosting the National Federation of Paralegal Association convention October 25th-28th. WSBA will have a booth at the convention and Steve and Paula Littlewood will be speaking at the convention.

The Board generally discussed making connections with community colleges in other states and Steve discussed the steps for redoubling efforts in this area.

Amy discussed how Whatcom Community College has created a certification of completion for the paralegal courses, and this change allows someone with a Bachelor's degree to take these courses and receive financial aid.

- Approval of Meeting Minutes

The May 10, 2018 meeting minutes were approved.

- Approval of Board Meeting Schedule

The Board approved the meeting schedule for FY19. The Board discussed the agreement made at the Board retreat to adjust the meeting day to every second Monday. The Board changed the November meeting from November 12th to November 19th.

License fee increase for LLLTs

Steve discussed a letter he has drafted to the Supreme Court regarding the increased license fee for LLLTs. This letter will also discuss the LLLT/LPO seat on the Board of Governors that has not been filled.

Staff Report

- LLLT exam was held on July 23rd
- Applications are being accepted for the family law curriculum at the University of Washington
 - Discussion of other outreach options to spread the word to people who qualify for the limited-time waiver

Trust Account Report

Members of this committee need to connect on trust account issue. Steve asked the committee to make a recommendation to the Board at the next board meeting.

New Practice Area Discussion

The Board requested that staff create a chart detailing all substantive comments received related to Consumer, Money and Debt along with a FAQ page on the website we can direct people to. The Board determined that the people who provided substantive comments should be invited to the next New Practice Area committee meeting to assist with this process.

The family law enhancements comment period was also discussed. Members were advised to encourage contacts to provide comments to the Supreme Court.

Board Development Committee Report

Steve discussed the ATJ meeting and support. He asked Geoff Revelle for clarification on how to respond to the ATJ Board. Geoff suggested gathering more statistics and providing information on what is changing and if there are a significant amount of people interesting in becoming licensed. Geoff explained they are not opposed but would like to see more documentation before a new practice area is requested.

Steve described the committee determining a workgroup is a group of Board Members and public members working together on a specific topic. Committees are considered the long standing groups (exam committee, education committee, etc.) who meet consistently and are comprised of only Board Members. Steve also discussed how the committee determined the best way to set chairs for each committee would be to have an executive committee assign chair positions.

Coordinated Discipline Presentation from Jean McElroy, Doug Ende, and Paula Littlewood

Executive Session

The Board went into executive session to answer staff questions related to applicant qualifications for enrollment in the Family Law classes at the University of Washington.

Adjournment

The meeting adjourned at 4:00 p.m.

NANCY HAWKINS
ATTORNEY AT LAW

6814 GREENWOOD AVE. N.
SEATTLE WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
FAX (206) 781-7014

July 16, 2018

Cindy Phillips
Judicial Administrative Assistant to
Chief Justice Mary E. Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court

Re: LLLT Expansion Proposal

Dear Ms. Phillips:

Please provide this letter to the Justices of the Washington Supreme Court for their consideration.

At the time that I started to be active in the Family Law section and started attending meetings of the WSBA Board of Governors, the Family Law section's opposition to the LLLT program was well-known. Detailed comments had been submitted by individuals and the section executive committee for several years. Nonetheless, I approached the subject with an open mind. I write today as an individual member and not as a representative of the Family Law Section. It is a continuing concern that issues are raised without adequate time for Section Executive Committee's to discuss and formulate detailed responses. This letter has not been reviewed nor approved by the Family Law section; I speak only for myself.

I comment today against the proposed expansion of the LLLT program into debt issues or any other subject area. The presently considered expansion seems truly ill-advised. As another attorney stated in a listserv email recently "the fact that many lawyers don't know how to do this stuff and/or do it badly is not an argument that other people who don't have a law school education should be taught it so they can represent people." Another said with regard to the LLLT program, "the cost was incredibly high for the number of people who are licensed, and I can't believe that anyone would want to replicate that result with other disciplines...FDCPA stuff is so insanely complicated that very few lawyers really understand it..."

While there are consumer and/or debt issues that the low income public struggles with, the LLLT program that is being considered is clearly headed for failure. The LLLT Board itself said that "it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems ... and whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer." The LLLT Board also reported that significant advice already exists through the Northwest Justice Project site washingtonlawhelp.org. Yet the recommendation continued to be pushed forward.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs be able to assist with RCW 10.82 Motions re Interest in LFOs. These apply to convicts trying to integrate into society. I didn't see that the LLLT Board provided any number of the people seeking help in this matter. There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with small claims court matters. There are numerous websites and materials available to help pro se parties with these small claims. Certainly paying a LLLT is not a likely priority when a person is trying to get someone to pay them $500 that is owed. The recommendation is that LLLTs can help with debt collection not involving collection agencies. In fact, in this day and age, most collection actions involve collection agencies. There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with garnishments. Very few consumers initiate garnishment actions and there are limits on reimbursable "legal" fees. There are rarely court hearings. Packets of forms and instructions are generally available in every county and are also part of the legal forms available through the Administrator of the Courts. The recommendation regarding identity theft is also ill-advised. This information is available through the Attorney General's office at no cost. The recommendation regarding loan modifications is also somewhat laughable. These programs are very complicated and there are attorneys that specialize in it. These loan modifications are rarely granted and adding LLLTs to the mix will not improve that. LLLTs are not needed with regard to protection orders since each county is required to have people at the courthouse to help provide forms. It is not explained how they would help get no contact orders in criminal cases; this is routinely done by prosecutors at initial criminal hearings. LLLTs cannot provide meaningful help in bankruptcy issues since federal laws govern the debt counseling that consumers must obtain. The program is simply designed for failure; hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent and any LLLT eventually trained will have few clients, if any, able to pay his/her fees.

The LLLT program is not being forthright with the WSBA membership and, perhaps, the Washington Supreme Court. The program seems to be exploring expansion into numerous fields and, is now doing so without any meaningful oversight. I have reviewed the LLLT Board meeting minutes, as much as are available. This can be difficult since I have sometimes had to prompt staff to get the minutes online. Of course, I do not know if the LLLT board is not providing their minutes to the staff on a timely basis. Most recently, the LLLT Board cancelled its April and June 2018 meetings so no minutes are available. The May 2018 draft minutes are not available either. See attached email of July 9, 2018 from Renata Garcia.

The minutes of the New Practice Area sub-committee which explores subject expansion used to be on-line. That is no longer the case. In fact, I was informed this morning that I would have to submit a public records request to get them. See the attached email of July 16, 2018 from Margaret Shane.

My review of LLLT board minutes and the New Practice Area Committee have been revealing and startling, particularly with regard to a previously planned expansion into immigration law. The April 2018 minutes state that the LLLT program is expanding into immigration law and that they had already contacted Governor Inslee to get his support for legislation to try and “preempt” the federal law to allow local LLLTs to practice in the immigration field. This action by the LLLT program seems to have been done without the permission of the Washington Supreme Court or the WSBA Board of Governors. This attempted expansion is ill-advised and should not be encouraged or permitted. The Washington State Immigration Services page on the Attorney General website calls immigration law “one of the most complicated areas in the legal field.” ... [and] specialized training” is required...[and] the lawyer/expert must be “authorized under federal law to provide immigration services.” While it seems that this attempted expansion has been dropped, the LLLT board seemed to have acted improperly by going to the Washington State Governor without the support of the BOG or the Supreme Court.

I also ask the Washington Supreme Court to demand some answers from the LLLT board. Such answers should be in writing and made available to WSBA members. How many LLLTs are presently in practice and whom are they representing? What are they charging? While their fees may not be controlled under anti-trust considerations, the fees can certainly be used to determine whether this program is meeting the needs of low-income people. What is the goal of the LLLT program?

I am concerned that the LLLT program seems to be operating without true and objective oversight or administration. The meeting with the Governor’s office involving the Executive Director, Paula Littlewood, is a prime example. It is troubling that this action was not disclosed in her monthly activity reports. She apparently had two BOG members with her but this action was not reported in their monthly activity reports provided to the BOG and the membership. The Executive Director report of January 12, 2018 makes no mention of LLLT issues at all. Steve Crossland’s report to the Board of Governors of January 4, 2018 discusses proposed expansion of the LLLT Family Law work and needed amendments to APR 28 and RPCs but no mention of immigration or consumer debt expansion.

How was it acceptable for these people to go to the Governor to lobby for changes in the law? Sections are not allowed to make any public statements without approval of the WSBA yet a meeting was apparently conducted with the Governor of this state without any such prior approval. Making public statements on the LLLT program and potential expansion without any report of the meeting to the BOG means that the BOG and the membership is being denied information that it should have.

I have another concern about the LLLT program and its administration. The program is marketed enthusiastically by Paula Littlewood and Steve Crossland. It is an open secret that they are involved in a personal relationship. This is a delicate issue that seems to be ignored. I do not easily raise this issue; it should be personal and private. But, it cannot be ignored in this circumstance. I do not see how the program can be administered by the WSBA appropriately under those circumstances. Paula and Steve travel to various other states and countries together “wearing WSBA hats” to talk up the LLLT program concept. I am concerned about the direct and indirect costs of their joint travel to various locales, including Hawaii and Canada. I am concerned about the appearance to the membership. It would certainly seem that the WSBA and the WSC are leaving themselves open to public criticism.

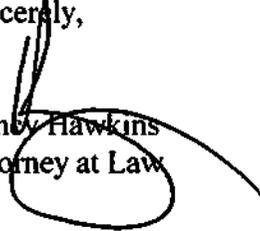

The lack of independent and objective analysis and administration by Littlewood is also clear if the WSBA website is reviewed. The website lauds the LLLT program as a way to practice law without going to law school. It is excited and enthusiastic about the program. Contrast this with the website with regard to lawyers. There is no reference to the long and distinguished role of lawyers in civil rights, or in helping people access the justice system. There is instead a dry description of the costs and burdens of becoming an attorney (fees, testing, etc.) The legal directory now lists LLLTs and lawyers in the same directory. Not only are the lines being blurred, the preference for LLLTs by the Executive Director is obvious.

It also seems that the LLLT program is described by Crossland and Littlewood in their various travels as a “success.” This seems to be an inaccurate description of the program. After years of funding, the program continues to operate at a substantial loss and has very few people working in the field. There is no proof that the program is truly meeting the needs of low-income people and, in fact, the anecdotal information conveyed at meetings is that LLLTs are charging significant rates for their work, generally comparable to attorneys. The Washington Supreme Court should require that Crossland and Littlewood provide transcripts of any speeches and copies of any written materials that either has provided with regard to the LLLT program. Their representations must be accurate and complete so that the reputation of this state bar association and the Washington Supreme Court is not harmed.

Washington Supreme Court
LLLT Expansion Program
July 16, 2018
Page 5

I think it is time for the Washington Supreme Court to take another good hard look at the LLLT program and its purpose and structure. It is time for a plan for reasonable administration. It is also time for the Washington Supreme Court to demand that the WSBA administration enthusiastically support and applaud the work of lawyers.

Sincerely,

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law

cc. LLLT Board

Nancy Hawkins

From: Margaret Shane <Margarets@wsba.org>
Sent: Monday, July 16, 2018 11:10 AM
To: Nancy Hawkins
Subject: RE: LLLT New Practice Area Committee minutes

Hi Nancy –

Since minutes for LLLT committee and work group meetings are not posted on the website, it has been determined that the information you are looking for needs to be obtained through a Public Records Request. To request Bar records, please send your request to WSBA's public records officer at PublicRecords@wsba.org. Under Washington General Rule 12.4(e)(1), requests must be made in writing to WSBA's public records officer, and may not be made to other Bar staff.

Best,
Margaret

Margaret Shane | Executive Assistant

Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8244 | fax 206-727.8316 | margarets@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact karar@wsba.org.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 13, 2018 2:10 PM
To: Margaret Shane
Subject: LLLT New Practice Area Committee minutes

These used to be on the website. Are they somewhere else now?

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

Nancy Hawkins

From: Renata Garcia <renatag@wsba.org>
Sent: Monday, July 09, 2018 2:55 PM
To: Margaret Shane; Nancy Hawkins
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

Hi Nancy –

The LLLT Board April meeting was cancelled. The June meeting was also cancelled which means that the May meeting minutes have not yet been approved.

The meeting materials are posted on the website. Here is one way to access them:

1. <https://www.wsba.org/Legal-Community/Committees-Boards-and-Other-Groups/LLLT-board>
2. Click on WSBA Event Calendar

Meeting Materials

WSBA
NB: Starting October 2017 meeting materials are linked to the meeting event item in the WSBA Event Calendar. This static list will not be updated.

January 2017
February 2017
March 2017

3. Select Limited License Legal Technician Board

WSBA | EVENTS CALENDAR

WSBA
Updated: June 9, 2018

Enter Email

Today	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30	31	Agenda
Sunday	Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday

4. Select the month and click on the event
5. Click on the link under "Agenda"

Add to:

- Outlook
- iCal
- Google Calendar

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board

Agenda:

LLLT Board Meeting Materials - March 2018

Let me know if you have any other questions.

Thank you,
Renata

Renata de Carvalho Garcia | Innovative Licensing Programs Manager
Washington State Bar Association | 206.733.5912 | renatag@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact barbarao@wsba.org.

From: Margaret Shane
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 1:49 PM
To: Nancy Hawkins
Cc: Renata Garcia
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

Hi Nancy –

Renata Garcia is the person to contact for LLLT matters, but she is out of the office today. I have copied her on this email so she can contact you when she returns to the office next week.

Please let me know if you need anything further at this time.

Best,
Margaret

Margaret Shane | Executive Assistant
Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8244 | fax 206-727.8316 | margarets@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact karar@wsba.org.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 10:32 AM
To: Margaret Shane
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

I also don't see any board meeting materials for the past year or so on the website.

Nancy

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 10:30 AM
To: 'Margaret Shane'
Subject: LLLT Board minutes

Do you have minutes for their April, May and June board meetings?
Nancy

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

NANCY HAWKINS
ATTORNEY AT LAW

6814 GREENWOOD AVE. N.
SEATTLE WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
FAX (206) 781-7014

September 14, 2018

Cindy Phillips
Judicial Administrative Assistant to
Chief Justice Mary E. Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court

Re: LLLT Expansion Proposal

Dear Ms. Phillips:

Please provide this letter to the Justices of the Washington Supreme Court for their consideration.

I am a 36 year member of the Washington State Bar Association. I am a proud family law attorney. I practice law in Seattle, Washington, and am a sole practitioner. Almost all of my practice is family law.

I graduated from the University of Puget Sound Law School in 1981 and was admitted to the Washington State Bar in 1982. I am also admitted to practice in the Federal courts in the State of Washington. In addition to being a member of the family law sections of the Washington State Bar Association and the King County Bar Association, I am a former chair of the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section's Legislative Committee and a former chair of the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section. I have spoken at numerous continuing legal education seminars on the subject of family law. I am a chapter author for the Washington State Bar Association's Family Law Deskbook. I have received awards for my work from the Greater Seattle Business Association as well as the King County Bar Association Access to Justice Award, and the WSBA Family Law Section Attorney of the Year award for 2017. I coordinate a neighborhood family law clinic in King County and have performed hundreds of hours of pro bono work.

Over the past two years, I have studied the LLLT situation and I write today after learning more disturbing information about the program. I urge the Washington Supreme Court to reject any expansion of the program in Consumer, Money and Debt Law, reject any expansion of the Family Law Program and, instead, examine this entire program in detail and determine its future.

Program training.

The training provided to prospective LLLTs is clearly inadequate since, according to information provided at the July WSBA Board of Governors meeting, more than 50% of the persons taking the test fail. No information was given as to the results of those who passed. It would be appropriate to know how many barely pass, solidly pass or sail through with flying colors. It appears that the training is not being improved but, instead, the qualifications of the trainers is being reduced down. There is no indication that the LLLT Board is concerned in any way about the low passage rate and the apparent inadequacy of the training provided to date.

With such a poor passage rate, it is inconceivable to me that it would be appropriate that there would be an increase in the curriculum/program in the areas of family law to be taught. As has been demonstrated by prior submissions from the Family Law Section, family law is an extremely complex area covering a broad gamut of legal issues. Adding subjects is far more likely to further reduce the passage rate. This seems grossly ill-advised at this time.

There has been no objective determination that the LLLT program is a success in family law. After years of efforts and hundreds of thousands of dollars, there are a minimal number of independently practicing LLLTs. There has been no determination of the number of low income people actually helped by the program. In fact, it seems that most of the LLLTs work as paralegals just as they were doing prior to any certification or licensing at a LLLT. With the poor passage rate and the lack of success of the LLLT program with regard to family law, it seems further ill-advised to add any new subject area or any expansion of the existing subject area. Without objective analysis and determination of the flaws in the curriculum design, teaching methods and training overall in the family law program, the flaws are likely to be repeated in a new or expanded subject area. Expansion into a new subject area is premature, at best.

The choice of Consumer, Money and Debt Law for expansion is particularly ill-advised.

Expansion into Consumer, Money and Debt Law.

I comment again against the proposed expansion of the LLLT program into debt issues or any other subject area. The presently considered expansion seems truly inappropriate. As another attorney stated in a list serve email recently “the fact that many lawyers don’t know how to do this stuff and/or do it badly is not an argument that other people who don’t have a law school education should be taught it so they can represent people.” Another said with regard to the LLLT program, “the cost was incredibly high for the number of people who are licensed, and I can’t believe that anyone would want to replicate that result with other disciplines...FDCPA stuff is so insanely complicated that very few lawyers really understand it....”

While there are certainly consumer and/or debt issues that the low income public struggles with, the LLLT program that is being considered is clearly knowingly headed for failure. The LLLT Board itself said that “it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems ... and whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer.” The LLLT Board also reported that significant advice already exists through the Northwest Justice Project site washingtonlawhelp.org. Yet the expansion recommendation continued to be pushed forward.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs be able to assist with RCW 10.82 Motions re Interest in LFOs. These motions apply to convicts trying to integrate into society. I didn't see that the LLLT Board provided any number of the people actually seeking help in this matter. In my 36 years of practice, including work with convicted criminals, no one has ever sought help with this kind of matter. I wouldn't think that this is a population with the funds to hire a LLLT.

There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with small claims court matters. There are numerous websites and materials available to help pro se parties with these small claims. Certainly paying a LLLT is not a likely priority when a person is trying to get someone to pay them $500.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs can help with debt collection not involving collection agencies. In fact, in this day and age, most collection actions involve collection agencies. If they don't initially, they surely will shortly.

There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with garnishments. Very few consumers initiate garnishment actions and there are limits on reimbursable "legal" fees. Packets of forms and instructions are generally available in every county and are also part of the legal forms available through the Administrator of the Courts.

The recommendation regarding identity theft is also ill-advised. This information is available through the Attorney General's office at no cost.

The recommendation regarding loan modifications is also somewhat laughable. These programs are very complicated and there are attorneys that specialize in it. These loan modifications are rarely granted and adding LLLTs to the mix will not improve that.

LLLTs are not needed with regard to protection orders since each county is required to have people at the courthouse to help provide forms. It is not explained how LLLTs would help get no contact orders in criminal cases; this is routinely done by prosecutors at initial criminal hearings.

LLLTs cannot provide meaningful help in bankruptcy issues since federal laws govern the debt counseling that consumers must obtain.

This proposed expansion of the LLLT program is simply designed for failure. If it is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent by the WSBA and any LLLT eventually trained and licenses will have few clients, if any, able to pay his/her fees.

LLLT family law program costs.

The Washington Supreme Court mandated the existing LLLT program and required the Washington State Bar Association to pay its costs. But, the Court also anticipated that the program would be self-sufficient in a reasonable period of time. In fact, the Court required that it do so in its Order: "[t]he Court is confident that the WSBA and the Practice of Law Board, in consultation with this Court, will be able to develop a fee-based system that ensures that the licensing and ongoing regulation of limited license legal technicians will be cost-neutral to the WSBA and its membership." June 15, 2012 Order by the Washington Supreme Court, page 11. Despite the Court's good intentions, this confidence has not been borne out.

At this point, it is six years since that order by the Court. Not only is the program not self-sufficient, it is operating at a greater loss year after year. In 2017, the program sustained a loss of $189,508.00. It was budgeted to lose $262,022 in 2018. The draft budget for 2019 projects a loss of $240,000 but this figure is misleading in that it does not reflect the total cost of the program. It is my understanding that many of the costs for the program are now included in other portions of the WSBA budget so this $240,000 appears to be artificially lowered. See page 48 of the materials for the July 2018 BOG meeting, attached hereto. I am making a request for the data necessary to determine the cost of those other line items not included in the $240,000 (see the footnote to that same page 48). It is concerning to note that the LLLT Board claimed that its expenses, direct and indirect, for 2018 were $17,000 and $92,636 (see page 433 of the materials for the July 2018 BOG meeting, attached hereto.) These significant costs seem to be in addition to the $240,000. Additional data for those expenses has also been requested.

Time for a limit.

The lawyers of Washington State pay a significant sum in license fees. Many object to the amount of fees. Many sought to hold a referendum on the amount of fees but were not allowed to do so when the Court issued an order that the fee increase that had been imposed was "reasonable." Unhappiness with the fee increase and the inability to register an opinion with the referendum still resonates with many. This is made more concerning to many when the fees paid are used to pay for unpopular and unsuccessful programs such as the LLLT program. The BOG seems to feel that they are powerless to control costs in this program since the Court has mandated the program. But, the Court did not mandate a program that would be funded at the present extent by the lawyers of the WSBA or that the program would operate at such a loss. At this point, it seems this annual substantial financial loss seems to be permanent. This concern is not abated by the July 2018 fee development. As the Court likely knows, at its July 2018 meeting, the Board of Governors recommended that the LLLT license fees be increased to that of lawyers. That increase, even if approved by the Washington Supreme Court, would not make the present program self-sufficient. There would need to be over 500 LLLTs to even come close to paying for the program for one year. There is no realistic expectation that this will ever happen, let alone happen before another $2,000,000-$3,000,000 in WSBA losses occur.

The LLLT program simply shows no promise whatsoever that it will EVER be self-sufficient. Its budgeted costs are approximately 35% higher for 2019 than for 2018. This cannot be sustained for even another year or two without hurting other more successful WSBA programs, a further increase in fees or staff reductions. Yet the LLLT Board and the Executive Director do not seem to be concerned about this in any way.

In the June 15, 2012 order which established the program, it was clear that the program was not necessarily permanent but that it would be "a sound opportunity to determine whether and, if so, to what degree the involvement of effectively trained, licensed and regulated non-attorneys may help expand access to necessary legal help in what that serve the justice system and protect the public. June 15, 2012 Order by the Washington Supreme Court, page 11-12. That objective analysis has never been done.

Time for a program assessment.

The LLLT program was designed to meeting the needs of low income Washingtonians. The program has provided no substantive analysis demonstrating that this goal has been met. The hourly rate charged by LLLTs is, quite simply, beyond the ability of low income people. The rates are also beyond the ability of almost all moderate income people.

After over five years of work, there are only 38 active LLLTs. I have reviewed the information available via the internet and/or the WSBA website. Most work in law firms and it is reasonable to assume that their work is little changed from that of an employed paralegal. It is likely that each of those LLLTs are being billed out at a significant rate. My review concludes that about half or less of the LLLTs are independently employed.

The needed type of assessment of the LLLT program must be done objectively. It is not reasonable to expect the Executive Director or staff under her control to conduct this objective analysis since, in fact, they have not done so. In the past several years, there have been no flags raised over the low number of active LLLTs given the funds spent and the hours of work, no flags raised over the increasing cost of the program, no flags raised over the dismal passage rate, etc. If the LLLT Board or the Executive Director have not done so by now, and given the conflict of interest posed by the personal relationship between the LLLT Board President and the WSBA Executive Director, the Court must provide a mechanism for this kind of objective analysis. Frankly, I believe that the available information should be sufficient to determine that the program is an utter failure already without any further analysis.

Lack of transparency.

I am also concerned about the large gaps in transparency about this program. The April, June, July and September 2018 LLLT Board meetings were cancelled. Without minutes from meetings, it is not possible to review the work of that Board during that time. The meetings of the sub-committee that considers new subject areas used to be announced on the WSBA website with minutes available for review but are not any longer. My request for the minutes of the sub-committee working on new subject areas was denied. I was told I needed to make a public records request. This lack of transparency is quite troubling, particularly given the funds being expended and the demonstrably poor decision-making by the Board and the Sub-Committee from my perspective (and that of many others).

My review of the materials for the August LLLT Board meeting were troubling. The Board supposedly was given all of the comments about the program expansion but, upon review, my own prior comments were not included in the material provided. I don't know how many comments from others were withheld from the Board. The Board also commented about a letter favorable to the expansion and suggested that the author be invited to a meeting to elaborate. There seems to be little concern that the majority of responses were negative to the expansion idea.

It was also disturbing to see that the LLLT Board seems to be planning on offering scholarships to LLLTs. With a program operating hundreds of thousands of dollars in the red, even consideration of a program scholarship is inappropriate.

My review of the available LLLT board minutes and the New Practice Area Committee raise more concerns, particularly with regard to a previously planned expansion into immigration law. The April 2018 minutes state that the LLLT program is expanding into immigration law and that they had already contacted Governor Inslee to get his support for legislation to try and, in effect, "preempt" the federal law to allow local LLLTs to practice in the immigration field. This action by the LLLT program seems to have been done without the permission of the Washington Supreme Court or the WSBA Board of Governors. That attempted expansion was also ill-advised and should not be encouraged or permitted. The Washington State Immigration Services page on the Attorney General website calls immigration law "one of the most complicated areas in the legal field." ... [and] specialized training" is required...[and] the lawyer/expert must be "authorized under federal law to provide immigration services." While it seems that this attempted expansion is not presently being pursued, the LLLT board seemed to have acted improperly by going to the Washington State Governor without the support of the BOG or the Supreme Court.

The Washington Supreme Court should demand some answers from the LLLT board and the Executive Director. Such answers should be in writing and made available to WSBA members. How many LLLTs are presently in practice and whom are they representing? What are they charging? While their fees may not be controlled under anti-trust considerations, the fees can certainly be analyzed to determine whether this program is meeting the needs of low-income or moderate means people. After all, this was the intent of the LLLT program. It is odd that the Executive Director and the LLLT Board are quick to say that they cannot/will not look at the fees charged by LLLTs while allowing LLLTs to advertise that they charge one-third of that of a lawyer. How do they make that assertion without a factual basis for it?

I am concerned that the LLLT program seems to be operating without true and objective oversight or administration. The meeting with the Governor's office involving the Executive Director, Paula Littlewood, is a prime example. It is troubling that this action was not disclosed in her monthly activity reports. She apparently had two BOG members with her but this action was not reported in their monthly activity reports either. The Executive Director report of January 12, 2018 makes no mention of LLLT issues at all. Steve Crossland's report to the Board of Governors of January 4, 2018 discusses proposed expansion of the LLLT Family Law work and needed amendments to APR 28 and RPCs but no mention of immigration or consumer debt expansion.

How was it acceptable for these people to go to the Governor to lobby for changes in the law? Sections are supposedly not allowed to make any public statements without approval of the WSBA yet a meeting was apparently conducted with the Governor of this state without any such prior approval. Making public statements on the LLLT program and potential expansion without any advance consideration of the BOG or a subsequent report of the meeting to the BOG means that the BOG and the membership is being denied information that it should have.

Promotion of the program as a success.

I am particularly concerned about the promotion of the LLLT program to other states as a success. This program has 35 people working in the field, only some of which work independently. The others work in law firms and it seems that their work is that of a normal paralegal.

This program has cost the WSBA over $1,000,000 since its inception. It operates at a considerable loss and that loss is increasing each year. This is not a success. The program should not be "sold" to other states as a success. Doing so will only serve to lower our standing with those states when they, too, suffer such losses and failures. It is distressing that our funds are being spent by Paula Underwood and Steve Crossland to visit various other states and countries "wearing WSBA hats" to talk up the LLLT program concept. I am concerned about the direct and indirect costs of their joint travel to various locales, including Hawaii and Canada. While I have been told that their "travel costs" are not paid by the WSBA, I do not know the status of their other costs. But, even if the costs are out of the picture, I am concerned about the appearance to the membership of this joint travel. It would certainly seem that the WSBA and the Washington Supreme Court are leaving themselves open to public criticism.

WSBA approach to LLLT program.

The present Executive Director's unbalanced and unobjective support for the LLLT program compared with her tepid or non-existent support for actual lawyers is disturbingly clear

Washington Supreme Court
LLLT Expansion Program
September 14, 2018
Page 8

when the new website is examined. I am proud to be a lawyer. From my childhood spent reading and watching Perry Mason and other legal shows, I have always wanted to be a lawyer. This was solidified as I became an active feminist starting at age 16 or so and has continuing for the last 46 years. I followed and studied a civil rights movement that included landmark legal cases regarding education, public facilities, marriage (interracial and gay), sexuality, privacy and many others. None of that glorious history is reflected in the WSBA website, not even a reference to Thurgood Marshall, Ruth Bader Ginsburg or, even, our own William O. Douglas. Not a mention of any landmark cases which have resulted in improved lives for millions of Americans. In fact, the website page which describes becoming a lawyer is a dry recitation of the costs and burdens of being a lawyer.

By contrast, the website pages which describe becoming a LLLT is enthusiastic and glowing and makes broad promises about a career as a LLLT.

Conclusion.

I think it is time for the Washington Supreme Court to take another good hard look at the LLLT program and its purpose and structure. If it is to continue, it is time for reasonable and unbiased administration. It is also time for the Washington Supreme Court to demand that the WSBA administration enthusiastically support and applaud the work of lawyers.

If the Court agrees with my concerns, it is likely time to end this failed program. The 35 people that are presently licensed would likely just continue as well-paid paralegals.

Sincerely,

Nancy Hawkins, a proud lawyer.

cc. LLLT Board (with enclosures)

Washington State Bar Association
Budget Comparison Report
For the Period from October 1, 2018 to September 30, 2019

LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN	FISCAL 2018 BUDGET	FISCAL 2019 BUDGET	$ CHANGE IN BUDGET	% CHANGE IN BUDGET
REVENUE:
TOTAL REVENUE:	-	-	-
DIRECT EXPENSES:
LLT BOARD	17,000.00	17,000.00	-	0%
LLT OUTREACH	8,000.00	8,000.00	-
STAFF TRAVEL/PARKING	600.00	600.00	-	0%
TOTAL DIRECT EXPENSES:	25,600.00	25,600.00	-	0%
INDIRECT EXPENSES:
FTE	1.70	1.55	(0.15)	-9%
SALARY EXPENSE	142,602.00	135,526.00	(7,076.00)	-5%
BENEFIT EXPENSE	49,304.00	41,592.00	(7,712.00)	-16%
OVERHEAD	42,495.00	38,095.00	(4,400.00)	-10%
TOTAL INDIRECT EXPENSES:	234,401.00	215,213.00	(19,188.00)	-8%
TOTAL ALL EXPENSES:	260,001.00	240,813.00	(19,188.00)	-7%
NET INCOME (LOSS):	(260,001.00)	(240,813.00)	19,188.00

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) license type (APR 28), was created by the Supreme Court and delegated to WSBA in 2012. In the past, this cost center was used to track all revenues and expenses associated with the "LLLT Program". LLLTs are now WSBA members, and consistent with the WSBA Bylaws and the Washington Supreme Court Admission and Practice Rules, the administration and regulation of these member license types has been consolidated within existing work groups and cost centers that already perform these functions for lawyers, including Admissions, License and Membership Records, and MCLE (although it continues to be possible to determine these costs separately by member type if needed). For FY19, this cost center is used primarily to track staffing and expenses related to the LLLT Board, which by court rule oversees the license.

WSBA COMMITTEE/BOARD ANNUAL REPORT – FY18

Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board Chair: Steve Crossland Staff Liaison: Renata Garcia BOG Liaison: Dan Clark	Size of Committee: 15 Number of FY19 Applicants: 6 FY18 direct expenses: $17,000 FY18 indirect expenses: $92,636
FY18 Demographics: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Gender (Female: Male: Not Listed): 12:2:0 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified with a racial/ethnic under-represented group: 3 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified as having a disability: 2 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified as LGBT: 2 (0 did not answer)
Background & Purpose: The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board derives its authority from the Washington Supreme Court under Rule 28 of the Admission to Practice Rules (APR), adopted effective September 1, 2012. By order of the Court, the WSBA is to administer and fund the LLLT Board and the program. APR 28 authorizes persons who meet certain educational and licensing requirements to advise clients on specific areas of law. The only currently approved practice area is domestic relations. The Supreme Court established the LLLT Board to oversee the LLLT license.
Strategy to Fulfill Purpose: From 2013-2016, the LLLT Board concentrated on creating the operational details for the LLLT license; the LLLT Board is now focusing on the promotion, expansion, and development of the license.
2017-2018 Accomplishments and Work in Progress: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1) In February 2018, the LLLT Board submitted suggested amendments to APR 28, the LLLT RPC and the RPC for lawyers for consideration by the Washington Supreme Court. These amendments would enhance the scope of the current family law practice area. The Court recently published the suggested amendments for comment. Comments are due by no later than September 14, 2018. 2) The LLLT Board is currently circulating a new proposed practice area, Consumer, Money, and Debt, for comment before taking further action, i.e., developing curriculum requirements, seeking approval by the Court, etc. The LLLT Board hopes to engage as many subject matter experts as possible in the development of this and any future proposed practice areas.

- 3) The LLLT Board recently approved the University of Washington Continuum College Paralegal Studies Program to teach the LLLT core curriculum.
- 4) The LLLT Board has been engaging in discussions to explore ways in which LLLT students may qualify for financial aid.

2018-2019 Goals:

- 1) The LLLT Board will continue to consider and recommend new practice areas for approval by Supreme Court.
- 2) If the family law enhancements are approved by the Court, the LLLT Board will develop the required training for currently licensed LLLTs.
- 3) The LLLT Board also plans to expand the accessibility of the LLLT core curriculum across the state by continuing to approve core class programs at additional community colleges.
- 4) The LLLT Board will continue to engage in outreach efforts, including working with the WSBA communication team to expand outreach to a diverse pool of LLLT candidates, including college and high school students.
- 5) The LLLT Board also plans to advance its efforts to provide access to financial aid for students in the LLLT practice area classes.

Please report how this committee/board is addressing diversity:

1) Are you using any of the tools provided by WSBA and if so, how? 2) Have you sought out training or consultation from the Inclusion and Equity Specialist? 3) How have you elicited input from a variety of perspectives in your decision-making? 4) What have you done to promote a culture of inclusion within the board or committee? 5) What has your committee/board done to promote equitable conditions for members from historically underrepresented backgrounds to enter, stay, thrive, and eventually lead the profession? 6) Other?

- 1) The LLLT Board seeks members from different backgrounds and experiences who work together to foster a positive work environment in concert with WSBA's commitment to diversity and inclusion.
- 2) The LLLT Board will schedule training with WSBA's Inclusion and Equity Specialist.
- 3) The LLLT Board seeks input from all WSBA members as well as the legal community in general when making important decisions such as developing a new practice area.
- 4) APR 28 has been amended at the request of the LLLT Board to allow LLLTs and LPOs as well as attorneys with judicial and emeritus pro bono status to serve as Board members.
- 5) The core curriculum educational approval process reflects the LLLT Board's commitment to diversity in that it requires any institution offering the core curriculum to have diversity, inclusion, and equal access policies and practices in place. The LLLT Board also sought to increase diversity within the LLLT profession by extending the limited time waiver (see APR 28 Regulation 4) to 2023 in order to allow a group of candidates qualified by work experience rather than by education to enroll in the practice area classes. The ongoing effort to provide a pathway to financial aid for the practice area classes also aims to provide more opportunities to join the LLLT profession to prospective applicants from diverse socio-economic backgrounds.
- 6) N/A

Please report how this committee/board is addressing professionalism:

- 1) Does the committee/board's work promote respect and civility within the legal community?
- 2) Does it seek to improve relationships between and among lawyers, judges, staff and clients?
- 3) Does it raise awareness about the causes and/or consequences of unprofessional behavior?
- 4) Other?

- 1) The LLLT Board has set up rules of professional conduct and a disciplinary system for LLLTs, as well as requiring LLLTs to carry malpractice insurance and conform to the same rules as lawyers regarding IOLTA accounts.
- 2) The LLLT Board has worked to promote LLLTs in the legal community and educate all legal professionals about the permitted scope and models for LLLT practice, as well as highlighting the ways in which collaboration with LLLTs can contribute to the efficiency and accessibility of any legal practice.
- 3) N/A
- 4) N/A

Please report how this committee/board is integrating new and young lawyers into its work:

- 1) How have you brought new and young lawyers into your decision making process? 2) Has the committee/board supported new and young lawyers by (for example) helping to find and prepare them for employment, assisting with debt management, building community, and providing leadership opportunities? 3) Other?

- 1) All WSBA members are invited to provide comments on rules and new practice area suggestions and development, including new and young lawyers.
- 2) N/A
- 3) N/A

From: Gary Morean
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: [Possible Spam] LLLT
Date: Thursday, July 05, 2018 5:13:31 PM
Importance: Low

Dear LLLT Board,

Do not expand this monster into any other areas of law. It should never have been created in the first place. Please kill this expensive, ugly beast.

Gary A. Morean
WSBA #12052

Gary A. Morean, Partner
Attorney at Law
INGRAM, ZELASKO & GOODWIN, LLP
120 East First Street | Aberdeen, WA 98520
360.533.2865 (phone) | 360.538.1511 (fax)
Email: gmorean@izglaw.com
Website: www.izglaw.com

From: Matt Purcell
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Against expanding the LLLT program
Date: Tuesday, May 29, 2018 10:57:31 AM
Attachments: image001.png

The program has ZERO data that it has remotely met the original goals under family law. It is asinine to expand at this time and seriously calls into question the sanity of those running the program. The way this is being run is so offensive it's not even funny at this point...

Happy to talk about how to make the program better but no one asks (certainly not anyone from the eastside of the state where all these LLLTs were allegedly going to help low income and rural communities...).

Truly,

MATHEW M. PURCELL
Attorney

2001 N. Columbia Center Blvd.
Richland, WA 99352
Phone: (509) 783-7885
Fax: (509) 783-7886

Please be aware that Domestic Court is held Monday morning, Tuesday all day and Wednesday morning each week; my ability to respond to email is limited during those days/times.

Heather Martinez: HM@PurcellFamilyLaw.com
Maria Diaz: MD@PurcellFamilyLaw.com
Mark Von Weber: MV@PurcellFamilyLaw.com

Office Hours: Monday-Thursday from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. Friday from 9:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m.
Closed for lunch from 12:00 p.m. – 1:00 p.m.

Confidentiality Note: This e-mail message (including any attachments) may contain information that is confidential, protected by applicable legal provisions, or constitute non-public information. It is intended to be conveyed only to the designated recipient(s). If you are not an intended recipient of this message, please notify the sender by replying to this message and then delete it from your system. Use, dissemination, distribution or reproduction of this message by unintended recipients is strictly prohibited. Thank you.

From: Bonnie Sterken
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: Paula Littlewood; Diana Singleton; geoff.revelle@FisherBroyles.com; steve@crosslandlaw.net
Subject: ATJ Board Comments for LLLT Board
Date: Monday, July 16, 2018 11:17:51 AM
Attachments: ATJ Board letter to LLLT Board 7.16.2018.pdf
image001.png

Good morning,

Attached, please find the ATJ Board's letter in response to the new proposed practice area.

Thank you!

Bonnie Middleton Sterken | Justice Programs Specialist

Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8293 | bonnies@wsba.org

1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org

Pronouns: She/Her

The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact bonnies@wsba.org.

MEMBERS

Francis Adewale
Judge Laura T. Bradley
Hon. Frederick P. Corbit
Lynn Greiner
Hon. David S. Keenan
Lindy Laurence
Michelle Lucas
Salvador A. Mungia
Mirya Muñoz-Roach
Geoffrey G. Revelle, Chair
Andrew N. Sachs

STAFF

Diana Singleton
Access to Justice Manager
(206) 727-8205
dianas@wsba.org

THE ALLIANCE
for Equal Justice

MEMBER

July 16, 2018

Steve Crossland
Limited License Legal Technician Board
1325 4th Ave, #600
Seattle, Washington 98101
Sent by email: LLLT@wsba.org

RE: LLLT Proposed New Practice Area

Dear Steve:

The ATJ Board has reviewed the "Draft for Discussion and Comment: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law Proposed New Practice Areas for Limited License Legal Technicians." We understand that this is just that – a draft proposal and this appears to be a broad outline of a proposal to us where the specifics are still being considered.

We understand that 36 people have graduated from the LLLT program since it began and of those 36, 33 are in practice. We also understand that three LLLTs are practicing in Eastern Washington while the rest practice in Western Washington.

It is our understanding that none of the 33 LLLTs are employed by a civil legal aid provider. (To our understanding one LLLT has a contract with the Chelan-Douglas County Volunteer Attorney Services – how much of her time is involved with that contract is unknown.)

It is also our understanding that the LLLT Board does not know the amount LLLT's are charging for their services. Without that basic information it is difficult to conclude how much of the population would gain access to the justice system if this newest proposal were to be adopted. For purposes of this letter the ATJ Board is assuming that the proposed expansion would provide greater access to the segment of the population that can pay some amount for legal services.

We are aware that your Board is looking for feedback before July 16, 2018, so we will provide some general comments at this point in time.

In order to further access to the justice system, the expansion into the scope of practice that the LLLT Board is recommending should be limited. Your proposal should not allow LLLTs to represent any corporate entity, partnership, or person in connection with the business of debt collection, debt buying, or money lending. Without this restriction your proposal would not expand access to the justice system for those who need it but instead only allow another avenue for those who already have the means to access the justice system.

As an overarching concern, the ATJ Board will want to see how this new proposal would promote access to the justice system. If the overwhelming majority of LLLTs are charging for their services then this proposal will not promote access to the justice system for those who have no ability to pay. It may, however, promote access to the justice system for those who have the ability to pay some amount, i.e., those of moderate means. At this point in time the ATJ Board does not have sufficient information to make that determination.

As I stated throughout this letter our comments are general in nature. The ATJ Board may have concerns about specifics of the proposal as they become clarified.

We look forward to receiving the information that we requested.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "Geoffrey S. Revelle".

Geoffrey Revelle, Chair
Access to Justice Board

From: Kylie Purves
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Comment on Proposed Consumer, Money, and Debt Law LLLT Practice Area
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 12:39:28 PM

I think there is a weak nexus between the evidence of unmet need and some of the proposed practice areas.

For example, I do not believe these two areas are appropriately under the heading of Consumer, Money, and Debt Law:

Small Claims Proposed Permitted Actions: Assistance preparing the Notice of Small Claim, Certificate of Service, Response to Small Claim, Small Claims Orders, Small Claims Judgment, and counterclaims Preparation for mediation and trial Obtaining and organizing exhibits.

Protection Orders Proposed Actions: Selecting and completing pleadings for Protection Orders for domestic violence, stalking, sexual assault, extreme risk, adult protection, harassment, and no contact orders in criminal cases.

Small claims is broad and could include matters outside of the consumer, bankruptcy, and credit related issues cited in the section entitled Evidence of Unmet Need. The inclusion of protection orders is not supported at all by the evidence provided.

Inclusion of extra practice areas in a call for comments on Consumer, Money, and Debt Law is also potentially misleading because people who have an interest in commenting on something like no contact orders in criminal cases might disregard a call for comments on a seemingly unrelated topic.

Kylie J. Purves

Assistant City Attorney
City of Bremerton
345 6th Street, Suite 100
Bremerton, Washington 98337
(360) 473-2336
kylie.purves@ci.bremerton.wa.us

ATTORNEY-CLIENT PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION

This e-mail message and its attachments may contain confidential attorney work product and be subject to the attorney-client communication privilege. It is intended solely for the use of the individual named above. If you are not the intended recipient, or the person responsible to deliver it to the intended recipient, you are hereby advised that any dissemination, distribution or copying of this communication is prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please immediately notify the sender by reply e-mail and delete and/or destroy the original and all copies of the e-mail message.

From: Ryan Santini
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Comment re New Practice Area
Date: Wednesday, June 20, 2018 10:18:56 AM

Hello,

I am writing you today to voice support for the addition of the practice area Consumer, Money, and Debt. When it comes to access to justice, it should come as no surprise that those who are priced out would have need of legal services related to debt. This proposed practice area is of great interest to me personally as someone with a background in working for a local credit union. Everyday I worked with the under-served members of my community; I am thrilled to think I might be able to continue doing this and draw on some of my financial industry knowledge. I am currently studying for my Associates in Paralegal Studies at Whatcom Community College.

Thank you for your time,

--

Ryan Santini
(808) 457-6063
237 W. Kellogg Rd
Bellingham, WA
98226

From: Edgar Hall
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Commentary on LLLT including money, debt, and consumer law
Date: Monday, May 07, 2018 8:33:27 PM

My name is Edgar Hall. My practice, Washington Debt Law, is entirely focused on all three areas to includes resolution of debt issues via settlement, litigation, and bankruptcy. I have practiced in this area for the last ten years as both debtor and creditor attorney. I believe that I am well situated to discuss these issues.

I will break down my analysis by the anticipated scope of services as presented on pages 4-6.

1. Assisting with LFOs & reducing interest on them

- simple motion, well within LLLT ability
- very supportive of all proposed activities

2. Small Claims

- limited amount in controversy, opposing party likely not represented behind the scenes by serious legal rep, fast and efficient forum
- very supportive of all proposed activities

3. Student Loans

- Often times huge sums, up to 35% mark up under the higher education act, requires deep level understanding of accounting and review of accounting over life of loan, understanding of securitization and how loans are originated, stored, sold and transferred necessary, understanding of state law and federal remedies, understanding of bankruptcy, etc
- Absolutely, 100% against all proposed activities. There are no statute of limitations on federal loans generally, large attorney fees on the other side could be racked up by inarticulate litigation, LLLT licensed in WA cannot practice bankruptcy (often a necessary component to successful defense), LLLT would need to be able to give advice on federal statutes and federal law, LLLT would need to be able to argue administrative law before ALJ's potentially to appeal federal garnishments, etc. If poor advice is given regarding consolidation, it can impact access to income based repayment and other programs. Settling without understanding the threat of bankruptcy, hardship discharge, and deeper level accounting and consumer protection errors would be weak. I could go on and on but essentially LLLT's likely could not obtain proper licenses to give the necessary advice to productively assist clients.

4. Debt Collection Defense and Assistance

- I am mixed on this one. Generally there are three ways to handle a debt: settlement, counterclaims, and bankruptcy. LLLT's cannot practice or advise on bankruptcy matters and that threat is a huge part of the defense and necessary leverage proper settlements. FDCPA is federal law, along with FCRA, TCPA, TILA, etc. Can LLLT advise on federal law and the strategy of the collection industry would be to just remove every case to escape the free help and magnify fees at the same time, relying on attorney fee clauses and fee shifting statutes to force debtors to pay even more for this trouble. Frivolous, unsuccessful, or missed counterclaims would likely be a problem. The only reason I am mixed is purely based on need and some combination of form discovery and help could be useful. Some matters are straightforward enough that some small portion could be helped.

-I would HESITATINGLY say that these activities would be allowed with the reservations below

- a) negotiation of debt
- b) filling out answers but NOT counter claims unless they associate with someone licensed in federal court as the claim will just get removed and additional attorney fees added
- c) reporting statutory violations to regulatory agencies

-Given the very close interaction of debt defense with bankruptcy, it is very hard to consider anyone not familiar with bankruptcy laws as being competent to render debt defense advice on a gestalt level

-I believe allowing LLLT's to file counterclaims will lead to an increase in additional attorney fees and likely against the debtor

If I had an ideal world, there would be some sort of mandatory BK screen, counter claim screen, and either of those being flagged and a referral given to the client. LLLT's can help with basic notices of appearance, limited discovery, perhaps a review of the accounting with proper background/training, and basic negotiation.

5. Garnishment

To short cut, I support everything stated and would only add that a referral to a BK attorney or a screen would be useful and should be mandatory.

6. Identity Theft

I support as drafted

7. Wage Complaints & Defense

Essentially I will reiterate my objections as listed in section 4 above. I do not know much about the employment side of things, but there are state and federal laws to consider and only being able to handle half the book is problematic at best. Likewise, in fee shifting perspective, this is opening up the employee to some pretty large counterclaims that will mandate their bankruptcy should they fail. But if they are not working, at least they qualify.

8. Loan Modification & Foreclosure Defense

I have worked as a creditor attorney on this side of things at a mortgage default servicing firm and as a consumer atty defending against judicial and non-judicial foreclosures.

Loan modification is fine. The bank is going to do a net present value, determine if its more profitable to foreclose or not, and will basically act accordingly. The only problem here is the

LLLT could mistakenly take away standing arguments by shooting for modification when it should be litigated. That can be the difference between a valid defense and/or a free house. The malpractice the LLLT might have in this market could not cover the amount lost. I would recommend requiring a much higher policy as a minimum to practice here.

As far as foreclosure defense, I am absolutely against it. Defense generally (aside from modification) consists of litigation, possible class action, understanding of numerous federal laws in addition to state laws, understanding of securitization, understanding of how mortgage accounting works and loan processing. I cannot begin to describe the harm that I have seen licensed attorneys without foreclosure experience have harmed files, I shudder to think of what someone with limited licensure and experience could do. Keep in mind, there are fee shifting statutes in all of the contracts, deeds of trust, promissory notes, and most consumer protection statutes that are relevant.

Making a distinction between judicial and non-judicial foreclosures seems like a true distinction, it is not. Here is why. To stop a non-judicial sale, you file a TRO and claims and then essentially you have turned it into a judicial FC because you are alleging all the same issues, just with an additional bond required by RCW 61.24. Do you know what they are going to do? Just start everything as a judicial, ramping up costs and not waiving deficiency. This will compel more bankruptcies. What makes the non-judicial nice is the deficiency is waived, if a slew of LLLTs pop onto the market and the defense knows they are not allowed to work judicial cases, what do you think will happen from a game theory perspective? More judicial foreclosures, more fees, fewer waivers of deficiencies, more bankruptcies, and more bad outcomes.

This is not family law where each side bears their own fees unless they are in contempt, violate a parenting plan, or do something to compel that outcome. These are banks which are always represented by experienced firms and in many instances national/multinational white shoe firms.

I support loan mod assistance, I do not support foreclosure defense other than perhaps through the foreclosure mediation program, RCW 61.24.163.

9. Protection Orders

Not sure how this is debt related but I like it as written

10. Bankruptcy awareness and advice

Support as written

ADDITIONAL OBSERVATIONS

If you really want to help with all of these debt issues. Require more precision of process servers. 90% of my clients claim they are not served. White, black, old, young, religious, non-religious, educated, uneducated, etc- the only pattern is consistency of claims of not being served and legitimate surprise and anger. It is so easy for a process server to sewer serve it is beyond ridiculous. Drive by, see the lights on, and say it happened. A statute should be added making statutory punishments for servers and process serving companies for fibbing about service as well as higher bonds or insurance.

I actually advise my clients to install drop cams and in several instances the process server can be seen tossing the papers at the door or nothing at all. I do so many motions to vacate it makes me dizzy. A constant stream of false service. I had one recently claim to serve someone at a youth hostel they had not been to in over 10 years because likely it came up on the skip trace at some point.

Further, we need more protective garnishment laws. We need less than 25% of wages to be garnished and more exemptions. Throwing gobs of LLLT's is not the solution, the solution is systemic protections and better process. Imagine how many fewer attorneys and LLLT's would be necessary if only 10% of your income were taken, inline with many other states.

We should reintroduce the old fraud provision of the deed of trust act instead of this victim blaming RCW 61.24.127 that we have instead.

We can require more in the initial complaint than some vague statement that money is owed two or three paragraphs long. Most of my clients actually think its a scam when combined with no case number its so vague. We can make stronger case law that sets judgment interest as the measure rather than hit and miss case law that allows a higher contract rate without necessary TILA disclosures. We can make stronger prove up that service was made.

In any case, this is a topic near and dear to my heart and I would be happy to give more input upon request. I hope this assists.

-Edgar Hall

Edgar I. Hall, Attorney
Washington Debt Law, PLLC
2611 NE 113th St Suite 300A
Seattle, WA 98125
Phone: (206) 535-2559
Fax: (206) 374-2749
www.wadebtlaw.com

From: Paula Plumer
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Comments - new practice area
Date: Tuesday, July 03, 2018 10:38:25 AM

I don't think this expansion is useful and I disagree with watering down the law license to add this or the other practice areas.

/paula plumer

From: Minh Tran
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Comments on "Consumer, Money and Debt Law"
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 3:58:58 PM

Hello,

I have been practicing since 2009. When I started practicing, my focus was on consumer bankruptcy law (Ch 7 and Ch 13). I worked at one of those firms that filed thousands of cases per year. We often charged around $800-1,200 attorney's fee to file a simple case. I believe the going rate still hasn't changed. What was mind boggling to me back then, and now, is that some people will pay $500 to an unlicensed bankruptcy document preparer to draft their pro se bankruptcy petition. Sure, the cost savings is huge for someone who is completely out of cash, but most of my Ch 7 clients were all in the same boat. We found a way to make it work. After leaving the firm, I started my own practice where I expanded my practice to alternative means of debt resolution--which sometimes include litigation. I have litigated against insurance companies on subrogation claims, against big banks for wrongful foreclosure tactics, and I have also negotiated settlements with creditors and then pursued contribution claims against ex-spouses. I don't find what I do in my practice as "simple", and I wouldn't trust any of my paralegals to advise clients or work on cases without my supervision (for the sake of the client). I find it troubling that the workgroup would trust LLLTs with this role.

I read over the proposed practice area and for the most part, I think the proposal creates a situation where some desperate debtors will end up being more harmed than helped due to advice from untrained "litigators". It should be noted that debt collection is a very broad area, and it could involve other areas such a debtor being sued for an automobile subrogation claim, car accident without insurance, breach of lease agreement, a breach of credit card contract, or even for a tortious action. These are all ordinary lawsuits where the end results is a judgment and garnishment if the defendant loses. To simplify it down to simply a debt collection matter ignores all the complexities of litigation.

The proposal goes beyond simply helping debtors understand their rights and completing forms; it would allow LLLT to draft motions, directly negotiate with opposing parties, coming up with counter claims and affirmative defenses, "accompanying and assisting in court", and advising on bankruptcy matters. All of these actions require both experience and knowledge in litigation strategies. And what's the worst thing that can happen to a desperate debtor who was sold on using a LLLT due to cost savings? Well, the debtor could lose his/her home, waive a statute of limitations defense or other waivable defenses, or be liable for massive amount of attorney's fee due to fee shifting clause in a contract.

I also want to remind the workgroup of United States v. Tally, Western District of Washington CR18-0082-RJB, where a lady ran a business called "Driving Dirty" to help people get their drivers license back. One thing she did was she assisted folks in filing frivolous bankruptcy petitions pro se to get their license back. The U.S. Trustee got an injunction against her and eventually she was prosecuted for a felony for lying at a 2004 examination (where she was asked if she ever advised people to file bankruptcy). Although her intentions were good, helping folks who can't afford attorneys get relief, her advice and strategy harmed creditors and wasted public resources. She obviously did not have all the tools to fulfill her goal with her limited knowledge.

While I think LLLT can provide valuable service to family law practice, where the court has developed forms and advice for filers, "debt collection" is too broad of an area. A simple motion to vacate a default judgment so that a summary judgment can later be entered could mean additional attorney's fee assessed against the debtor. Defending and prosecuting "debt collection" requires some litigation experience because every case requires strategy.

While some debtors may benefit from having LLLTs in this area, the risk to others is not worth it. I hope that the workgroup will reconsider LLLT's role in consumer, money, and debt law.

--

MINH T. TRAN

Attorney | Admitted to practice law in Washington and Oregon

Arrow Law Group, PLLC | 12826 SE 40th Ln, Ste A11 · Bellevue, WA 98006 | Ph. \(425\) 531-7946

Clients can now schedule an appointment online by clicking here.

Link: Business Card

NOTICE OF CONFIDENTIALITY: This e-mail and its attachments, if any, are for the exclusive and confidential use of the intended recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please do not read, distribute or take action in reliance upon this e-mail. If you have received this email in error, please notify the sender immediately by reply e-mail and delete this e-mail and any attachments from your computer system. The transmission of this message does not constitute the waiver of attorney-client or work product privilege. Arrow Law Group is also a debt relief agency helping people file for bankruptcy relief under the bankruptcy code.

From: vlaparker@aol.com
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: comments
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:04:35 PM

Dear Steve,

I think a true analysis of this "program" needs to be performed BEFORE expansion. It needs to be analyzed in terms of whether or not it is meeting the original purpose and evaluation of the unforeseen consequences.

No one evaluated the actual billings of an attorney throughout the state in the areas "served" before implementing this. Has anyone checked the billings of these fake attorneys? Probably not.

Has anyone checked the numbers of these non-attorneys who have violated the rules and the numbers who depart from their practice?

There are so many questions and NO answers.

Call this what it is -- another "feel good" program -- not a solution.

As you look to expand, consider the reality of the need to go beyond approved forms. Review the problems associated with LPO involved in real estate. I have had to correct many problems created by LPOs.

As an attorney who works with Wills and Probates, I can tell you that there is no such thing as a simple Will or Probate. Not only that but the broadly touted living trusts in which an attorney was a front man for a business in which trusts were churned out by non-attorneys using forms for all sorts of situations. One huge problem was the conflict created as the bits and pieces were selected.

I hate that attorneys are being dismissed by the claim that a person with a little training can adequately do out jobs. The ones who suffer are the clients. This is truly shameful.

I know this will probably circular file but I speak again because someone MUST voice the truth.

Thank you,

Vicki Lee Anne Parker,
Attorney at Law

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: The information and documents in this electronic mailing contains confidential information belonging to the sender which is legally privileged. The information is intended only for the use of the individual(s) or entity stated herein. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, distribution or the taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this transmission in error, please immediately notify VICKI LEE ANNE

PARKER by telephone at 360-491-2757 to arrange for disposition of the original documents.

From: antimony9@gmail.com on behalf of Vanessa Shaughnessy
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Consumer Money and Debt Law
Date: Sunday, July 08, 2018 3:57:09 PM

I'm writing you to strongly support the addition of the new LLLT practice area. I'm intending to become a LLLT and am currently volunteering at an organization that provides legal aid for tenants and those who have past financial issues that are keeping them from getting housing. From that vantage point, I can say that our state absolutely needs more accessible legal resources to help people with their financial issues.

I do hope the scope of the practice area will include settling judgments, as this a crucial need for people trying to get their lives back on track. My family needed this kind of legal help when we purchased our home, and it cost us $8,000 on top of the existing financial burden of the old judgement. It nearly cost us our chance at homeownership, and we would have jumped at the opportunity to use a moderately priced alternative.

I hope that the new practice area will go forward with a wide enough scope to provide meaningful, coherent help for people.

All the best,
Vanessa Shaughnessy

From: d.hein
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Consumer, Money and Debt law- proposal
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:16:23 PM

Dear Ms. Ivarinen and LLLT Board:

Thank you for allowing bar members to comment upon this proposed area of practice.

In short, there are currently plenty of providers for the services that were listed as being considered possibly appropriate as LLLT practice areas. Consumer counseling services are readily available at various price points. In addition, identity theft is usually handled more than adequately with one's Bank and the three major reporting credit bureaus.

A recent LLLT experience:

My husband and I, both lawyers in the state of Washington, sold a house in Washington last month and dealt with a licensed LLLT as the closing officer. Her employer claimed she had been a real estate closing officer for more than 15 years. She was unable to answer questions of any sort including the most basic type, gave unasked-for advice which I believed was unnecessary in the circumstances, and claimed that she had no authority to modify any of the forms she utilized. One form in question was defective on its face, requiring modifications in order to be accurate. When she informed me she could not change the form I had to ask to speak to house counsel. No one knew the name of her supervising attorney. Her service was unsatisfactory, to say the least. Our closing was completed only because I ensured that it was. I cannot imagine what non-lawyers must endure in order to effect a real estate transaction.

This anecdote is not a stand alone, unfortunately. Instead of expanding the powers and authority of LLLTs in the name of serving the public, my recommendation is that we clean up the standards and the competencies of the current group of LLLTs. It is a disservice to the public for us to do anything else.

I believe that LLLTs can and do serve the public. I am a former paralegal educator and am aware of the good that can be done for clients in terms of simple, repetitive tasks. This would not include, for example, much in the areas of debt or loan counselling. But in our hurry to put LLLTs to work quality and standards should not be compromised.

Thank you for this opportunity to raise a red flag.

Dana Hein

From: Crawford, Sarah \(DOL\)
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law
Date: Friday, July 13, 2018 3:21:03 PM
Attachments: image2018-07-13-145625.pdf

Good Afternoon,

Please find attached comments submitted on behalf of the Washington State Collection Agency Board.

Thank you,

Sarah Crawford

Washington State Department of Licensing
Board Support Supervisor
Regulatory Boards Section
Mailing: P.O. Box 9012, Olympia WA 98507
State Mailstop: 48049

WC: 360.819.0620 | 📞 360.664.1567 | ✉️ scrawford@dol.wa.gov

STATE OF WASHINGTON
DEPARTMENT OF LICENSING
PO Box 9020 • Olympia, Washington 98507-9020

July 13, 2018

Washington State Bar Association
LLLT Board
LLLT@wsba.org

Re: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law
Public Comment from the Washington State, Collection Agency Board

Mr. Chairman Crossland and Members of the Board:

Please accept these comments of the Washington State, Collection Agency Board concerning the proposed new practice area for LLLTs in Consumer, Money and Debt Law.

The Washington State Collection Agency Board ("CAB") is a state regulatory board created by statute, RCW 19.16.280, to advise and assist the Department of Licensing (Department) with enforcement of the Washington State Collection Agency Act, RCW 91.16. et. seq., and with the power to adopt rules and regulations, investigate collection agency complaints, impose discipline and grant or deny collection agency licenses. See RCW 18.235.030. The board is comprised of five members, two public and two industry representatives appointed by the Governor, and one member of the Department of Licensing appointed by its director.

The purpose of this letter is to neither support nor oppose the Consumer, Money, and Debt Law LLLT proposal (LLLT Proposal), but rather to request that the CAB be included and consulted as a stakeholder with respect to certain portions of the proposal which may overlap or interfere with the DOL's current regulatory function. The CAB would like to avoid any unintended consequences created by the interplay and potential conflict between the Consumer LLLT proposal and CAB's regulatory duties.

Currently, CAB is concerned by the following services listed in the LLLT proposal, which potentially fit within the definition of a "collection agency activities" under RCW 19.16.100(4)(b):

- Small Claims: "Assistance preparing the Notice of Small Claim ... Small Claims Judgment, and counterclaims."
- Debt Collection Defense and Assistance: "Assistance filling out complaints"; and
- Garnishment: "Assistance filling out forms (Application for Writ of Garnishment, Continuing Lien of Earnings, Return of Service, Notice of Exemption Claim, Release of Writ of Garnishment, Motion and Cert. for Default Answer to Writ of Garnishment, Application for Judgment, Motion/Order Discharging Garnishee, and Satisfaction of Judgment)."

CAB is concerned that by including the activities listed above, LLLTs who perform them could be required to be licensed as collection agencies, or conversely, that their inclusion could cause those activities to fall under the purview of the practice of law, requiring collection agencies to be licensed by the WSBA.

It is the hope of the Board that any LLLT Proposal adopted will account for the Departments function or avoid the potential licensing conflicts identified above. In any case, the CAB would appreciate being included as a stakeholder going forward.

The CAB would like to request that the Washington State Bar Association conduct additional outreach to various stakeholders of the industry and the CAB would like to propose the deadline for comment on this topic be extended past the original July 16, 2018 deadline, to allow for various stakeholders to provide comment that were not included in the original outreach from the Washington State Bar Association and the LLLT Board.

Tami Dohrman, Chair

Date

From: Matt Crane
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law proposal
Date: Monday, May 21, 2018 6:32:52 AM
Attachments: image001.png

Dear Mr. Crossland—

I am in favor of the proposed LLLT practice area for consumer, money and debt law. It makes sense to me that trained LLLT practitioners be allowed to provide limited legal services in this area to help fill an unmet need.

Matthew C. Crane, WSBA 18003
Direct | 206.905.3223
Email | mccrane@bmjlaw.com

From: Cameron Fleury
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Do not expand (or keep) the LLLT program
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 4:34:30 PM

To Whom it May Concern:

Thank you for requesting input from Members.

First, by way of full disclosure, let me say that I am opposed to the entire LLLT program. While it may have been well-intentioned to start, the reality is that the LLLT's are not providing a stop-gap for low income persons to avoid being Pro Se. They are competing directly with, and at the same rates, as attorneys and we are being forced to subsidize them with our Dues. The entire program was "sold" as providing low income assistance, which was almost immediately dropped. Then it was "sold" as being a test that once substantial data had been collected and analyzed, if the program was a "success" then it would be considered to be expanded. The truth is that there has not been anything near enough data to support any conclusions (even whether they are harmful) at this time.

Barreling forward at breakneck speed to expand into as many areas of practice as possible is helping Community Colleges and the WSBA Staff dedicated to the LLLT program. It is not assisting the target market (low income persons with access to justice issues), it is in direct competition with those of us who paid our dues in schooling, testing, CLE requirements and disciplinary supervision if/when needed.

That said, I strongly believe that before even considering whether to expand the LLLT program, it should at least be in existence long enough to support a reliable conclusion it is 1) a benefit to the public, 2) does not financially harm attorneys, and 3) does not harm the public (failure to properly distribute retirements, calculate support deviations, address various consequences of different distributions of a marital estate, etc. etc. etc.).

I do not practice debtor/creditor law, but I can envision many issues with allowing under-trained LLLT's into the area and the potential harm to the public.

Regards,
Cameron J. Fleury
WSBA #23422

From: Kathy Rall
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: expansion of LLLT program
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:05:07 PM

Why don't you just open every area to the practice by LLLT's and all the lawyers can quit their jobs and go do something fun with their time? How to solve problems such as these? Earn more if possible, but more importantly, SPEND LESS and SPEND WISELY. This is an educational process, but my parents taught me that I was entitled to something when I could afford to pay for it. No one is entitled to have expensive TVs, new cars, expensive toys, new clothes every season etc. Each of us is entitled, to have that for which we can pay. As Mom and Dad used to say....."you don't get what you want until you can afford to pay for it" and "you need to decide to purchase that which you need, not what you want". If more people would keep Mr. Visa or Mr. Debit Card, or Mr. contract" etc. in his or her pocket then some of these issues would go away. Call me old fashioned, but if we started here, then perhaps not all of these services would be necessary

--

Kathy J Rall
kjrall8@gmail.com
C: 206-604-4193

Virus-free. www.avg.com

From: N. Smith \(Smitty\) Hagopian
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: full speed ahead
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:55:45 PM

Hi Board/Steve: This is an area that needs to be filled and an LLLT is the right move for our times. I trust you/your Board will be cautious in drafting the parameters and wish you well.

My two cents.

Thanks,

Smitty Hagopian

DUNKIN, HAGOPIAN PC
ATTORNEYS
330 King St., Suite 6
Wenatchee, WA 98801
509-888-0750 - ph
509-888-0751 - fax

The information contained in this message is intended only for the addressee or addressee's authorized agent. The message and enclosures may contain information that is privileged, confidential, or otherwise exempt from disclosure. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient or recipient's authorized agent, then you are notified that any dissemination, distribution or copying of this message is prohibited. If you have received this message in error, please notify the sender by telephone and return the original and any copies of the message by mail to the sender at the address noted above.

'Sinner' and 'saint' are waves of differing size and magnitude on the surface of the same sea. Each is a natural outcome of forces in the universe; each is governed by time and causation. Nobody is utterly lost, and nobody need despair.

From: Bar Leaders
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: FW: LLLT in creditor/debtor practice
Date: Tuesday, July 17, 2018 10:58:04 AM

-----Original Message-----

From: Mark Kaiman [<mailto:mark@lustick.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, July 17, 2018 8:31 AM
To: Bar Leaders
Subject: LLLT in creditor/debtor practice

Why did I bother going to law school? Why did I even bother getting a Bachelor's degree? The WSBA seems determined to allow community college graduates with a few hours of supplemental training to practice law. What practice area is next on your agenda? Which group of lawyers who have worked hard for years to build successful practices are you going to undermine by allowing LLLT's to move in and steal their business? Maybe the WSBA is going to start recommending that LLLT's sit as judges. Why not? You can pay them less than judges who are actually qualified. It sounds absurd, but it is no more absurd than allowing unqualified people to practice family law or creditor/debtor law.

The Bar Association does not represent my interests. Instead of helping hard working attorneys and clearing a path for us to serve our clients and build our practices, the WSBA continually thinks of ways to place roadblocks and obstacles in front of us. LLLT's have should not even be practicing family law. I am extremely disappointed that the Bar Association would even consider allowing LLLT's to move beyond the family law area.

Mark A. Kaiman
Lustick Kaiman & Madrone PLLC
222 Grand Ave. Suite A
Bellingham WA 98225
Telephone 360.685.4221
Fax 360.734.4222

NOTICE: Confidentiality Warning: This e-mail is for the sole use of the intended recipient(s) and contains information belonging to Lustick Kaiman & Madrone PLLC, which is confidential and/or legally privileged. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, distribution or taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this e-mail information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please immediately notify the sender by reply e-mail and destroy all copies of the original message.

From: Bar Leaders
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: FW: Opposition to Allowing LLLTs to Practice Debtor/Creditor Law
Date: Tuesday, July 17, 2018 10:58:25 AM

-----Original Message-----

From: jwchessell@rockisland.com [<mailto:jwchessell@rockisland.com>]
Sent: Monday, July 16, 2018 3:17 PM
To: Bar Leaders
Subject: Opposition to Allowing LLLTs to Practice Debtor/Creditor Law

Monday July 16, 2018

To: Washington State Bar Assn
Seattle, WA 98101

RE: Opposition to Allowing Limited License Legal Technicians to practice Debtor/Creditor law

Dear WSBA:

I am opposed to allowing Limited License Legal Technicians to practice Debtor/Creditor law. This is a complicated field that embraces many other areas of law, such as contracts, agency, residency, standing, bankruptcy, criminal law, constitutional law, equity, remedies, commercial paper, evidence, and on-and-on.

The proposal does not well-serve the community, but rather allows persons with a limited knowledge of law and a limited experience in practicing law to represent clients who may make their choice of representation based solely on price.

The proposal is a mistake and should be shelved.

Very Truly Yours,

John Chessell Bar # 19370
San Juan Island, WA
jwchessell@rockisland.com

From: Rick Bartholomew
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Input regarding LLLT program
Date: Wednesday, May 16, 2018 12:13:44 PM

I am a retired family law attorney, although I still do GAL work and mediation.

I do not believe the LLLT program should be expanded. I was involved when the original proposal came up years ago. The first (and primary) justification for the program was that there was an unmet need for legal services for those who could not afford attorneys. LLLT's now charge rates comparable to those of attorneys, and indicate that they cannot afford to provide services for less. In addition, there are very few LLLT's. We do not have enough information to know how this program will work.

LLLT's have smaller bar dues than do attorneys. I assume the justification for that is that they were expected to charge lower fees, which they do not do. In other words, attorneys are subsidizing direct competitors.

So LLLT's were supposed to help low income folks, which they do not do. We were told that they would not be allowed to represent clients in court, which they are now asking to be able to do. If the program is to be expanded, it should go back to its original purpose (providing low income clients with legal help), and we should have more information on how well they are doing.

In the past, I had clients come to me to fix problems created by non-attorneys who helped them with their legal work. Sometimes I could do so, although the cost was higher than it would have been for me to represent them in the first place. Sometimes it was too late to do anything. This is why we need time to gather information regarding the effectiveness, and, frankly, competence, of LLLT's, before we expand the program.

Rick Bartholomew
WSBA #3107
Guardian ad Litem and Mediator
1800 Cooper Pt. Rd. SW, Bldg. 14
Olympia, WA 98502

Kinickinic50@gmail.com
360-701-5257

NOTICE: This electronic communication and any attachments may contain privileged or other confidential information. If you have received it in error, please advise the sender by reply email and immediately and permanently delete the message and any attachments without copying, transmitting, or disclosing the contents. Thank you.

I HANDLE GUARDIAN AD LITEM CASES AND MEDIATIONS, BUT I HAVE RETIRED FROM THE PRIVATE PRACTICE OF LAW, MEANING I NO LONGER ACCEPT PRIVATE CLIENTS. I DO MEDIATIONS IN CASES IN WHICH BOTH PARTIES ARE REPRESENTED BY COUNSEL.

From: Steven Palmer
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Letter in opposition to the formation of a Consumer, Money and Debt Law LLLT
Date: Friday, May 25, 2018 3:23:55 PM
Attachments: image001.jpg
image002.jpg

Dear WSBA,

The practice of law surrounding debt can be extremely complex, impacting practically every substantive area of the law. It is also one of the most impactful areas of the law on individuals. If someone misses a deadline, a house can be in jeopardy, a bank account can be attached or wages can be garnished. There are enough qualified unemployed members of the bar to pick up the slack in this area of the law. Perhaps the WSBA could act as an advocate for these unemployed attorneys and train them to help the people that this LLLT group would serve.

The average student debt of a newly graduated attorney in Washington state was $140,616 in 2012. Between 31 and 51% of law school grads do not have long term employment requiring a law license after graduation from Washington law schools. Source – American Bar Association. There are still law school grads that do not have jobs and the subject matter here is too sensitive to leave to non-lawyers to try to figure out.

I can imagine situation after situation where an LLLT would end up inadvertently or purposefully advising clients on the merits of bankruptcy as an alternative. This single scenario would run the LLLT in violation of the bankruptcy code. Further, it would potentially put the assisted person's vulnerable assets at risk.

We do not need another LLLT practice area.

Sincerely,

Steven M. Palmer
ATTORNEY

OH#0085298
WA#48823
SPALMER@CURTISLAW-PLLC.COM
PH: (425)409-2745
FAX: (425) 645-7878
CURTISLAW-PLLC.COM

CURTIS, CASTEEL & PALMER
3400 188TH ST SW, SUITE 565
LYNNWOOD, WA 98037

CONFIDENTIALITY: This email and attachments are solely for the use of the named addressees, and may contain information that is PRIVILEGED, CONFIDENTIAL and/or ATTORNEY WORK PRODUCT. If you have received this email in error, any dissemination is prohibited: please delete it, destroy all copies and promptly notify the sender. Thank you.

We are a debt relief agency. We help file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.

From: Eric Theile
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT - Consumer, Money, and Debt Law
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:19:25 PM
Attachments: image003.jpg

Dear Mr. Crossland and Ms. De Carvalho Garcia,

I was formerly a collection attorney in Washington and Arizona, and ran my firm's Washington office. I have filed thousands of collection lawsuits. I now very often represent debtors against those same types of claims.

I think the expansion of the LLLT program to this area is a fantastic idea. I would strongly caution that LLLT's be thoroughly trained on how to provide value and assistance to consumers.

99.9% of debtors owe the accounts and balances being sought by their creditors. And unfortunately, most of those debts provide for default interest rates and attorney's fees. Debtors certainly should not roll over when they don't believe they owe an alleged debt, but any collection attorney will tell you stories of $2,000 turning into $5,000 after contested hearings, interest and judgment enforcement.

My point is: as attorneys we are counselors. And while the LLLT program may not mirror all of the duties and obligations of an attorney, their role inevitably will be (and should be) to counsel their clients. Understanding when to fight a debt, and when to seek favorable settlement terms is crucial to providing value to the debtor. Availing oneself of an LLLT in order to file answers or objections is wonderful for people who are intimidated or unable to act on their own. The flip side is that very often, the best result is achieved by picking up the phone and seeing what can be agreed to outside of court.

I welcome the opportunity to speak further with anyone on this issue. Godspeed.

Kind regards,

Eric M. Theile - WSBA 44397

O: (970) 945-6546 | D: (970) 928-3473 | www.balcombgreen.com
P.O. Box 790 | 818 Colorado Ave | Glenwood Springs, CO 81602

B+G-HOR-Logo-3C-grey

This message may contain or attach confidential or privileged information. Any disclosure, use or retention of this message and/or any attachments is unauthorized. If you have received this email in error and are not the intended recipient of this message, do not read this email and inform the sender of the transmittal error. If you are a client, please do not forward this message. No privilege waiver is implied.

From: Malena Pinkham
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT - New Practice Area
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:45:58 PM

Expanding the LLLT program to additional practice areas is a terrible idea. The entire LLLT program is bad for the citizens of Washington. The answer to limited legal services is not to provide people with sub-standard advice from non-lawyers. Why do the less fortunate deserve lesser quality services? I continue to be amazed and embarrassed that this program was ever started. Expanding it is naïve, dangerous and unfair to the vulnerable people receiving, and making major life decisions based on, the advice and issue-spotting ability of these “technicians.”

Absurd.

Malena F. Pinkham
Staff Attorney
The Confederated Tribes of the Umatilla Indian Reservation
46411 Timi’ne Way
Pendleton, OR 97801
Phone & Fax: (541)429-7408
Work Cell: (541)215-2004
MalenaPinkham@ctuir.org

From: Kirk Davis
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:01:41 PM
Attachments: LOGO for email.jpg

My concern is the continued expansion of the LLLT and licensing of same by the Bar. I think the continued pushing of LLLT into other areas is a bad idea for the bar and for the public. The public will think they are getting the same service from an LLLT that they would be from an attorney as this activity is sanctioned by the Bar. Of course, this assumption is incorrect.

Kind regards,

Kirk C. Davis
Attorney

Seattle Tower
1218 Third Avenue
Suite 1000
Seattle, WA 98101
Office: (206) 684-9339
Cell: (206) 999-8677
Fax: (206) 260-3685
www.kirkdavislaw.com

CONFIDENTIALITY STATEMENT

This message contains information that is protected by the attorney-client or work product privilege. If this message was sent to you in error, any use, disclosure or distribution of its contents is prohibited. If you receive this message in error, please contact me at the e-mail address listed above and delete this message without printing, copying, or forwarding it. Thank you.

From: Mark McClain
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:25:32 PM

This is really disappointing. While I appreciate there are needs for many, we continue to fund them through things like NWJP, yet fail to demand they actually serve these needs. If you are going to take away opportunity from your members with this area of law, you should first reduce the cost for your membership.

From: Chris Van Vechten
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT Consumer & Debt Law
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 7:24:56 PM

Greetings,

While the idea of the LLLT is well meaning, in practice, it strikes me as ineffective and ignorant of the realities on the ground people living in poverty face. I'm primarily a criminal defense attorney (hopefully the Constitution will, in 10 years, still be interpreted to entitle defendants to an attorney and not a LLLT) and the vast majority of people I represent are the sort of people who these programs are targeted to address.

I have often worked for people at rates that work out to less than $40 an hour, but poverty tends to be the result of compounding problems that often exceed the financial bandwidth of the client. I do not believe that an LLLT could realistically assume the multiple roles an attorney does for less than $40 an hour, without sacrificing significant quality.

I understand pro ses are frustrating for judges, but I suspect they are also inevitable. I have yet to find a member of my profession who supports this program and other than some super law firms who turn their paralegals into LLLTs to charge additional fees, I rarely confront them in my practice. The program should be scrapped.

--

Chris Van Vechten
Attorney at Law
The Law Office of Chris Van Vechten
253-666-8987
www.soundlawyering.com
705 S 9th St #206,
Tacoma, WA, 98405-4622

This e-mail may be protected by the Attorney-client privilege or Attorney work product doctrine. If you are not the intended recipient of this e-mail please reply to sender indicating that you received it inadvertently and please immediately delete this e-mail.

From: Donna Person Smith
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT Expansion
Date: Friday, May 25, 2018 2:14:17 PM

Good Afternoon:

I understand the board is working on a new LLLT practice area — consumer, money and debt law. I am opposed to any expansion of the LLLT program. I am also opposed to any expansion of the role of LLLTs in family law matters. I am appalled that there is now a push for them to be able to appear in court. There are plenty of attorneys willing to work with low income clients by offering their services pro bono or on a reduced fee schedule.

Donna Person-Smith
Managing Attorney
Law Office of Donna Person Smith, PLLC
3708 14th Street Place Southwest
Puyallup, Washington 98373
(253) 840-0288- office
(253) 465-5929-fax

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE

This transmission may contain information which is privileged, confidential, and protected by the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges. If you are not the addressee, note that any disclosure, copying, distribution, or use of the contents of this message is prohibited. If you have received this transmission in error, please destroy it and notify me immediately by email or at 253-840-0288

From: stewart law
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT expansion
Date: Friday, May 25, 2018 4:37:07 PM

This letter is intended to respond to the call for input on the expansion of LLT's area of practice.

LLLTs were not, are not and will not be a good thing for the WSBA, its members or the public they ostensibly were intended to serve.

Hurting the current and future dues-paying, licensed, educated Attorney members of the WSBA by allowing LLLTs to compete with us, at our expense is an affront. The idea is so obviously contrary to the core function of any professional organization, it remains a mystery how it was initially approved.

No expansion of the areas of practice and allowed functions of LLTs should be made. A complete review of the program and the funding spent by WSBA should be undertaken.

William J. Stewart, Attorney at Law

From: Carter Hick
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT Feedback
Date: Friday, May 25, 2018 1:18:00 PM
Attachments: image001.png

Hello,

Per your 5/25 e-newsletter, I want to provide feedback on the LLLT program and its possible expansion.

The entire program is a waste. If the WSBA, law schools and state government want lawyers to provide affordable legal services, then efforts should be made at making law school affordable. Tuition at 30k a year, 40k a year . . . and higher for law school? How can you expect a recent grad to work in public service, provide affordable services, or engage in pro bono work if she is saddled with 100k plus in student loan debt?

The solution is to great a LLLT program? Really?

Sad for us and any other person that is not independently wealthy and chooses to go to law school, but I guess it is good for the law schools – they can start collecting LLLT tuition on top of the law school tuition. Oh yeah, lenders will benefit, too. The public? You tell me. How is the LLLT program working so far? How many do we have now in the state?

Carter Hick

HICK LOGO color-no logo-logo

STATEMENT OF CONFIDENTIALITY: The information in this electronic mail (e-mail) message is legally privileged and confidential information and intended only for the use of the addressee listed in this message. If the reader of this e-mail is not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution or copying of this e-mail is strictly prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please immediately erase this message.

From: Anita Redline
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT new fields of law REALLY?
Date: Sunday, May 20, 2018 11:32:20 PM
Attachments: image001.gif
image004.jpg

Hello, Just my 0.2

Has there been a study as to whether the needs were actually unmet in these additional legal fields of law?

If the needs of the majority were met but there exists a minority whose needs were unmet, why? Only financial? Many attorneys offer a payment plan, a discount upon an initial sizeable payment, or the attorney's paralegal can handle the matter under supervision of the attorney.

Were the individuals unable to understand how to use the WSBA Directory, unable to find the law group, unable to use various websites like AVVO, etc.?

Many attorneys are not charging the high rates anymore and not charging for every email or phone call. But if LLLTs enter into some of these legal fields filled with new attorneys trying to make a living, those attorneys will leave for other legal fields but those other fields are already filled to the brim with attorneys too. LLLTs are becoming like balloons: you squeeze one end and the other end pops out. We have just too many legal representatives, three law schools, numerous students graduating into the legal fields, we're over capacity to maintain financial supports of these various levels of legal expertise.

Once LLLTs are in another legal field, attorneys struggle to meet their bottom line because attorneys are far more in debt than LLLTs for their education.

LLLTs are undercutting paralegals who work already under supervision by their attorneys. Attorneys graduating in the last 5 years are still struggling.

The real motive for LLLTs is not to help the common person but to help law schools that are suffering from decreasing students.

The real challenges in the world of law: A law education is so expensive, complexities of law have greatly increased, law schools inadequately prepare potential attorney, rules and regulations continually change, too many experienced attorneys, too many newly graduated law students - how can LLLTs make it?

How are new attorneys suppose to get any experience when LLLTs jump in? These legal fields listed in the report are the types of fields new attorneys use to get their experience. It's like taking away the wetlands from baby salmon. Leave the environment alone so that new attorneys can grow and become great attorneys. (notice I didn't say expensive)

I am so glad that I am not a new attorney!

Very truly yours, Anita Redline

The "secret" to caring for the client is caring about the client.

Anita Redline, Attorney at Law
A Professional Limited Liability Company
Waterfront Park Building
Edmonds Law Center
144 Railroad Avenue, Suite 308
Edmonds, WA 98020
Mailing Address: PO Box 772, Edmonds, WA 98020
(425) 879-4628 (Phone)
(425) 771-7919 (Fax)
Anita@RedlineLaw.net

Notice: Unless you have previously signed an engagement agreement with this firm and the firm has accepted you as a client, then no exchange of information by virtue of emails or other communications will create an attorney-client relationship, including a duty of confidentiality between sender and/or recipient.

Confidentiality Notice: This communication and any document(s) accompanying it contains confidential information belonging to the sender which is protected by attorney-client privilege and other privileges pertaining to the documents. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that disclosure, copying, distributing, or taking any action whatsoever with regard to the contents of this communication is strictly prohibited.

From: Rich Davis
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT Question
Date: Friday, May 18, 2018 4:35:54 PM

Is the proposal likely to be an expansion of existing licensing authority, or a separate license in the area of consumer debt? I think the former is a good idea, the latter a mistake. I can expand my comment depending on your answer.

This area of practice is full of land mines. The big creditors have a lot of influence in the law, the credit reporting bureaus seem to require a deposition order to begin communicating, and some of the federally required credit resolution processes for credit card companies are not working. I have found a good solution; I use very little credit. However, even the three credit cards I use and pay fully each month cause me trepidation. I also order on-line from very few vendors: Amazon, Southwest Airlines, and two antique car providers is almost a complete list. It is a fright out there.

Thank you,

Richard J. Davis
WSBA 12481

From: Donald Ferrell
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Illt was conjured up by the incompetent idiots at WSBA and so called "supreme court". Family law was first and proved to be a bust. Why keep repeating your errors?
Date: Wednesday, June 20, 2018 10:29:07 AM

Donald W. Ferrell Honorary WSBA 1973
Sent from Mail for Windows 10

From: Jennifer R. Smith
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 9:52:51 PM

I hate to be so frank but this program is a complete disaster! I practice family law in Thurston County. The documents I have received from LLLTs are not done correctly. Parties will use LLLT to draft and give legal advice but they use the LLLT as a bar to negotiations because they cannot negotiate on the client's behalf. Then what I find absolutely shocking is the amount of money the LLLTs are charging. It is the same amount as many attorneys. This program was to reduce costs. It has done quite the opposite after an attorney has to come in and do clean up.

This program should be discontinued. Complete insult to the legal profession.

Very truly yours,

Jennifer R. Smith

LAW OFFICES OF JENNIFER R. SMITH, P.S.
1800 Cooper Point Road, S.W., Bldg. 12
Olympia, Washington 98502

\(360\) 339-7488 Tel.

\(877\) 669-8509 Fax

jennifersmith@thurstonmasonlaw.com

Confidentiality Notice: This message is being sent by or on behalf of an attorney. It is intended exclusively for the individual or entity to which it is addressed. This communication may contain information that is proprietary, privileged or confidential or otherwise legally exempt from disclosure. If you are not the named addressee, you are not authorized to read, print, retain, copy or disseminate this message or any part of it. If you have received this message in error, please notify the sender immediately by e-mail and delete all copies of the message.

From: MICHAEL GOLDENKRANZ
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLT expansion into consumer debt
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:46:00 PM

Great idea- keep expanding into more areas and providing the education venues and programs to train LLT's.

Why not have them help with actual bankruptcy filing?

And, while I think the protection order help is essential, confusing that it got folded into consumer debt expansion.

Kudos

Michael Goldenkranz (pro bono attorney)

From: Steve Lovekin
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLT New Practice Area
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:50:03 PM

I strongly object to the addition of new practice areas for the LLT's. It was inevitable when the LLT system started that, like all good bureaucracies it was seek to expand its reach. From what I've seen LLT's often charge a fairly high hourly rate, taking business away from lawyers who are just starting out and who want to charge less than the big established firms in order to gain business. LLT's are also appearing in court in family law cases, which they should not be doing. Court appearances are a quintessentially legal activity that should be reserved for lawyers who have spent the time, energy, and money to attend three years of law school, usually with at least one trial practice course under their belt. If one can essentially practice law without going to law school, why would one even bother going? This expansion of non-lawyers into the practice of law demeans the profession and should be eliminated.

Osgood S. Lovekin

Law Office of Osgood S. Lovekin
705 Second Avenue, Suite 1050
Seattle, WA 98104
Phone: 206-447-1560
Fax: 206-447-1523

IMPORTANT NOTICE: This communication, including any attachment, contains information that may be confidential or privileged, and is intended solely for the entity or individual to whom it is addressed. If you are not the intended recipient, you should delete this message and are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, or distribution of this message is strictly prohibited. Nothing in this email, including any attachment, is intended to be a legally binding signature.

From: David Mott
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Lt to WSBA -LLLT
Date: Friday, July 06, 2018 4:59:09 PM
Attachments: Lt to WSBA -LLLT.doc

The MOTT LawFirm

David C. Mott

also admitted in Ohio and Illinois

July 17, 2018

TO: LLLT Board via email to LLLT@wsba.org

RE: Proposed Consumer, Money, and Debt Law LLLT Practice Area
Scope Proposed Permitted Actions & Proposed Limitations

LLLTs should be licensed to assist clients with issues related to legal financial obligations, debt collection and garnishment defense, identity theft, preparing for small claims court, and filing protection orders.

I strongly support the expansion of LLLT's service into this area of practice based on (1) my 49 years of law practice during which I have provided defense services to my clients in this practice area and (2) a successful history of collaborating with an LLLT to provide family law services to mutual clients. In addition, I have extensive experience in the foreclosure defense and mediation practice area.

This debt-collection area of the law is fraught with traps often initiated against unsuspecting consumers. In the consumer debt-collecting defense area, I typically begin my representation of a client by having my client fill out an extensive questionnaire that is designed to establish creditor-collector violations of the debt collection statutes. In almost every case, there is a violation. More recently, there are a lot of statute of limitation violations by collectors. In some cases, the collector does not have a Washington state license to engage in collection services. In almost every case, I conclude such services with a very satisfied client.

If the matter is in litigation, sending an extensive subpoena duces tecum and scheduling a deposition often results in favorable results for my client.

Most often, I do this work at a very minimal fee but it often concludes with most of my services being provided pro bono. I do this because I was raised in a very poor, large family wherein I experienced the devastating adverse effects perpetrated against my parents by bill collectors.

Based on my experience of working collaboratively with an LLLT in the family law area, I can envision an equally successful collaborative practice with LLLTs in this expanded practice area.

MAIL ONLY TO: 16821 Smokey Point Blvd, # 811, ARLINGTON, WA 98223
OFFICE AT: Professional Services Center, Smokey Point Dr., Arlington, WA 98223
PHONE/VOICE MAIL: 360-435-5656 ♦ FAX: 360-435-4742 ♦ EMAIL:
mott@mottlaw net

I would strongly support the proposed scope of Permitted Actions & Proposed Limitations with one recommendation: that is, that the LLLT be permitted to review with prospective client the requirements for qualifying for Chapter 7 & Chapter 13 relief under the Bankruptcy statutes.

Very truly yours,

The MOTT LawFirm

By /s/ David C. Mott
David C. Mott

DCM/jem

MAIL ONLY TO: 16821 Smokey Point Blvd, # 811, ARLINGTON, WA 98223
OFFICE AT: Professional Services Center, Smokey Point Dr., Arlington, WA 98223
PHONE/VOICE MAIL: 360-435-5656 ♦ FAX: 360-435-4742 ♦ EMAIL:
mott@mottlaw.net

From: Inez "Ine" Petersen
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: Bill Pickett
Subject: My comment: The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:22:08 PM

Dear LLLT Board:

I recommend that your Board be disbanded immediately.

Is the WSBA undermining its members or representing them? It looks like the former to me.

This is the most absurd idea since mandatory professional liability insurance. And it shows that the Bar has just too much money laying around and must seek ways to spend it no matter how it hurts the attorneys they allegedly represent.

I don't want the WSBA taking action that reduces my chances of making a living. I want the WSBA to facilitate my career, not undermine it!

WHAT ARE YOU THINKING? WHO IS REALLY BEHIND THIS?

This shows that there is a real need for voting to occur at the member level on everything with a greatly reduced staff. All the committees, boards, and huge number of in-house employees seem to be working on projects that are not in the best interest of the attorneys. This is just another one.

A voluntary bar association would nip this problem in the bud or would it? The Titanic needs a new captain, one with eyes to see the icebergs. I look at the WSBA as a professional union; I want that union to plug the holes in the life boats, not create more holes.

Sincerely,
Inez Petersen
WSBA #46213

----- Forwarded message -----

From: Washington State Bar Association <noreply@wsba.org>
Date: Tue, May 15, 2018 at 11:46 AM
Subject: The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you
To: inezpetersenjd@gmail.com

Washington State Bar Association

The LLLT Board is working on developing a new LLLT licensed practice area—Consumer, Money, and Debt Law—and would like your feedback. A draft outline of the proposed practice area is under development. The LLLT Board is seeking comments through July 16.

There are several ways you can help shape and be involved in the process, and we hope you will be. Please consider reviewing the draft and being involved in the next steps by:

- Providing feedback on the initial draft and subsequent versions,
- Attending the LLLTT Board meetings, which are open to the public, and
- If the new practice area is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, assisting the LLLT Board with writing the rule, regulations, and exam for this practice area.

Please submit comments, questions, or concerns to lllt@wsba.org.

The LLLT Board looks forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Stephen R. Crossland

Chair, LLLT Board

Renata de Carvalho Garcia

WSBA Staff Liaison to the LLLT Board

WSBA seal

Washington State Bar Association

1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600

Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | Map

Toll-free: 800-945-9722

Local: 206-443-9722

Official WSBA communication

All members will receive the following email, which is considered official:

- Licensing and licensing-related materials
- Information about the non-CLE work and activities of the sections to which the member belongs
- Mandatory Continuing Legal Education (MCLE) reporting-related notifications
- Election materials (Board of Governors)
- Selected Executive Director and Board of Governors communications

From: Lynn Clare
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: New licensing area
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:23:19 PM

Reader:

Originally when the reason for the existence of the LLLT was given as "a way for low income folks to receive legal help", I supported the idea of a limited license. Now however, I hear that is no longer the justification. In my opinion, it was the only reason that justified the existence of this class of license to practice law.

Therefore, not only should this class of license to practice law NOT be extended to Consumer, Money, and Debt -- it's existence to practice any other area of law should be revoked. I am angry and appalled that the WSBA -- which should be defending my license that I worked so hard to obtain -- is, in fact ready and willing to extend this serious dilution of the quality of the legal profession in the state of Washington.

Lynn C. Clare
Clare Law Firm, PLLC
Office: 206-223-8591
Direct: 253-444-4058

From: Kyle Hills
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: Mimi Wagner
Subject: New LLLT Licensed Practice Area - Consumer, Money, and Debt Law
Date: Monday, July 16, 2018 2:40:14 PM
Attachments: 18WSBA-LLLT0716.pdf

Dear Sir/Madam:

Enclosed is a letter from Attorney Mimi M. Wagner in regards to expanding the LLLT practice areas to include consumer, money, and debt law. Please let me know if you have any difficulty opening the attachment.

Sincerely,

Kyle Hills
Legal Assistant
Wagner Law Offices P.C.
kyle@sanjuanlaw.com
Phone (360) 378-6234
Fax (360) 378-6244
www.sanjuanlaw.com

This email is sent by a law office and contains information that may be privileged and confidential, or protected by the work product doctrine. If you believe that it has been sent to you in error, do not read it. Please notify the sender that you have received the message in error, and then delete it. To comply with IRS rules, we must tell you that if this message contains advice relating to federal taxes, that advice was not intended to be used, and cannot be used, for avoiding penalties that may be imposed under federal tax law.

Virus-free. www.avg.com

WAGNER LAW OFFICES P.C.
385 COURT STREET, SUITE 4
POST OFFICE BOX 3019
FRIDAY HARBOR, WASHINGTON 98250
WWW.SANJUANLAW.COM • TELEPHONE (360) 378-6234 • FAX (360) 378-6244

MIMI M. WAGNER
ALSO MEMBER OF COLORADO BAR
MIMI@SANJUANLAW.COM

July 16, 2018

Via email to: lllt@wsba.org
Washington State Bar Association
Limited License Legal Technician Board

Re: New LLLT Licensed Practice Area – Consumer, Money, and Debt Law

Dear LLLT Board Members:

I am opposed to the further expansion of the LLLT practice areas to “Consumer, Money, and Debt Law.” In general, I believe the LLLT programs are expanding rapidly without adequate evidence that they are a benefit to the public, do not financially harm attorneys, and do not harm the public. I urge the Board to act with care and consideration in its administration of the program.

Consumer, money, and debt law is enormously complicated, with implications in other bodies of law, and allowing LLLTs to practice in this area is very concerning.

I am also opposed to allowing LLLTs appear in court in this practice area, and in any other practice area for that matter. Attorneys are required to undergo years of training to appear in court, and it is an enormous responsibility to appear in court on behalf of a client. LLLTs need not have a four-year college degree. I expect that LLLTs in general may lack the perspective and appreciation for legal complexities that are borne out of law school, studying for the Bar, and practicing law as a licensed attorney.

I am also opposed to the Bar’s dramatic amounts of money being spent on this program for a limited number of LLLTs. The last information I received was $1.7 million has been spent on 36 LLLTs. That is over $47,200 per LLLT. The Bar’s money comes entirely or almost entirely from its members, yet the Bar members are unfairly forced to subsidize the LLLTs.

Thank you for your consideration of my comments.

Very truly yours,

Mimi M. Wagner

From: Kelly.Boodell@faa.gov
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: New practice areas
Date: Wednesday, May 16, 2018 5:02:57 PM

I am a huge fan of the LLLT program! I used an LLLT for a family law matter and now have renewed faith in our legal system as a result. While access to our legal system is critical to communities who are under represented and have limited economic means, there are many who may not meet that criteria and still can't afford the prohibitive costs of attorneys.

Please continue to expand the LLLT program into all areas of practice that may touch individuals with legal needs.

Respectfully,

Kelly A. Boodell
Director, Civil Rights
Western Service Area

We have moved! Our new address is 2200 S. 216th Street, Des Moines, WA. 98198.

e-mail: Kelly.Boodell@faa.gov
office: (206) 231-2044
cell: \(425\) 495-4544495-4544)

From: Ashley Lauber
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Objection to Expansion into Debt Law
Date: Thursday, July 05, 2018 4:47:16 PM

Pursuant to the request for comments, please see my statement as follows:

I've been a bankruptcy and debt settlement practitioner for five years. In the time I have been practicing, I have watched my filing rates and caseload diminish by 15-20% year over year and is now down to the bottom quarter of my overall revenue. Take this from a firm who had a presence in every conceivable advertising channel for debt issues including having run a television commercial for two years on Fox 13. We have done everything possible to sustain our business while providing exceptional services, using sliding scale fees even providing pro bono representation at certain points. We have had to make the decision two years ago to expand into family law, an area which is being undercut by the existing LLLT family law program, and if we hadn't chosen to make that expansion my firm would be out of business. I take great pride in having been a partner of a woman-owned firm this long that provides debt services, but we are far from thriving. It is personally insulting to me that the bar association who happily takes nearly $500 a year from its members promptly turns its backs on us and spends dues to encourage our competition in the marketplace. It is unconscionable.

There is NO SHORTAGE of affordable legal representation in this practice area. I voice my strong objection to its implementation.

--

Ashley Lauber
Partner, Attorney at Law
Lauber Dancey PLLC
2817 Wetmore Ave, Suite B
Everett, WA 98201
Phone (425) 312-7956
Fax (866) 497-7028
alauber@lauberdancey.com
www.lauberdancey.com
www.startfreshnw.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This email and any attachments may contain confidential or attorney-client protected information that may not be further distributed by any means without permission of the sender. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that you are not permitted to read its content and that any disclosure, copying, printing, distribution or use of any of the information is prohibited. If you have received this email in error, please immediately notify the sender by return e-mail and delete the message and its attachments without saving in any manner.

Under IRS regulations, we must inform you that any U.S. tax advice contained in the body of this e-mail was not intended or written to be used, and cannot be used, by the recipient for the purpose of avoiding penalties that may be imposed under federal tax law. By regulation, a taxpayer cannot rely on professional advice to avoid federal tax penalties unless that advice is reflected in a comprehensive tax opinion that conforms to strict requirements.

From: jwchessell@rockisland.com
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Opposition to Allowing LLLTs to Practice Debtor/Creditor Law
Date: Monday, July 16, 2018 3:24:06 PM

Monday July 16, 2018

To: Washington State Bar Assn
Seattle, WA 98101

RE: Opposition to Allowing Limited License Legal Technicians to practice Debtor/Creditor law

Dear WSBA:

I am opposed to allowing Limited License Legal Technicians to practice Debtor/Creditor law. This is a complicated field that embraces many other areas of law, such as contracts, agency, residency, standing, bankruptcy, criminal law, constitutional law, equity, remedies, commercial paper, evidence, and on-and-on.

The proposal does not well-serve the community, but rather allows persons with a limited knowledge of law and a limited experience in practicing law to represent clients who may make their choice of representation based solely on price.

The proposal is a mistake and should be shelved.

Very Truly Yours,

John Chessell Bar # 19370
San Juan Island, WA
jwchessell@rockisland.com

From: Daggett, Teresa
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Opposition to proposed new LLLT practice area
Date: Friday, May 25, 2018 12:48:11 PM
Attachments: image001.png

Please register my opposition to expanding the LLLT program. With only 33 active participants, expanding the program is not reasonable.

Teresa Daggett

Attorney at Law

Gordon Thomas Honeywell LLP

One Union Square Building
600 University Street, Suite 2100
Seattle, Washington 98101

T 206 676 7584

F 206 676 7575

<http://www.gth-law.com>

NOTICE: The information contained in this e-mail communication is confidential and may be protected by the attorney/client or work product privileges. If you are not the intended recipient or believe that you have received this communication in error, please do not print, copy, retransmit, disseminate, or otherwise use the information. Also, please indicate to the sender that you have received this email in error and delete the copy you received. Thank you.

From: Law Office of Reed Speir
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Please stop taking work from lawyers
Date: Wednesday, June 20, 2018 3:34:50 PM

It is bad enough that LLLTs are taking work away from lawyers in the areas of family law. Please do not take more work away from lawyers by invading another area where lawyers can earn a living. There are sliding scale and low-income options all over the State that have been available to low-income individuals for years. LLLTs undercut small firms and solo practitioners and put them out of business. Why am I paying dues to an organization that is actively working to decrease my client base? I see lots of concern for making sure that LLLTs can have a practice that thrives, but what about the lawyers who are losing clients and going out of business because of LLLTs? Seattle is an aberration. Lawyers all over the State are struggling to make ends meet and the WSBA is promoting a program to take away more clients from those struggling lawyers. The WSBA is not serving its membership at all by pushing LLLTs.

Reed Speir

From: Kerry Lawrence
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Proposed new LLLT for consumer, debt, etc.
Date: Friday, May 25, 2018 12:51:48 PM

I think this is a great area for LLLT's.

One question I have is whether the forms they are allowed to fill out would include mechanic's lien forms, RCW 60.04?

Individual workers and small businesses need help in this area, and there definitely is a demand for these services as demonstrated by the number of lien services that already offer these services.

The lien services are of varying quality, but overall I think they do better than the majority of the liens and related documents I see that lawyers have prepared and recorded. Having an LLLT course would help improve the quality of what those services provide, and benefit a lot of individual workers and very small businesses.

Kerry Lawrence
WSBA #8479

This e-mail contains confidential, privileged information intended only for the addressee. Do not read, copy, or disseminate it unless you are the addressee. If you are not the addressee, please permanently delete it without printing and call me immediately at \(425\) 941-6887.

Kerry C. Lawrence
Pillar Law PLLC
1420 Fifth Avenue, Suite 3369
Seattle, WA 98101
Phone: 425-941-6887
kerry@pillar-law.com

From: REDACTED
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: REDACTED
Subject: RE: [EXTERNAL] The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you
Date: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:07:12 PM

Abolish the LLLT board entirely. They hurt attorneys and hurt litigants who are not getting the best legal representation possible by people without law degrees.

Thank you,
REDACTED

From: Washington State Bar Association [mailto:noreply@wsba.org]
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:05 PM
To: REDACTED
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you

Washington State Bar Association

The LLLT Board is working on developing a new LLLT licensed practice area—Consumer, Money, and Debt Law—and would like your feedback. A draft outline of the proposed practice area is under development. The LLLT Board is seeking comments through July 16.

There are several ways you can help shape and be involved in the process, and we hope you will be. Please consider reviewing the draft and being involved in the next steps by:

- Providing feedback on the initial draft and subsequent versions,
- Attending the LLL T Board meetings, which are open to the public, and
- If the new practice area is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, assisting the LLLT Board with writing the rule, regulations, and exam for this practice area.

Please submit comments, questions, or concerns to lllt@wsba.org.

The LLLT Board looks forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Stephen R. Crossland
Chair, LLLT Board

Renata de Carvalho Garcia

WSBA Staff Liaison to the LLLT Board

Washington State Bar Association

1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600

Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | Map

Toll-free: 800-945-9722

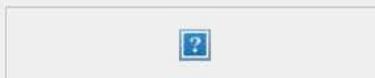

Local: 206-443-9722

Official WSBA communication

All members will receive the following email, which is considered official:

- Licensing and licensing-related materials
- Information about the non-CLE work and activities of the sections to which the member belongs
- Mandatory Continuing Legal Education (MCLE) reporting-related notifications
- Election materials (Board of Governors)
- Selected Executive Director and Board of Governors communications

From: REDACTED
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: RE: [EXTERNAL] The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you
Date: Wednesday, May 23, 2018 2:45:39 PM

In light that you will consider all comments, please add the following to my additional comment:

I speak as a member of the WSBA since 2009, but also as a former low-income customer of paralegal services for a divorce with children in the early 2000's in Lakewood, Washington. These paralegals caused so many problems for me that I had to pay a real, licensed attorney several years later to undo all of the issues (major modification) that they could not foresee due to their limited training. Thus, these paralegals, specializing in family and equivalent to the LLLT program, caused nothing but heartache, frustration, and economic loss for the people they are allegedly serving. I will never refer anyone to a paralegal for legal services, regardless of the alleged training differences. They are simply not trained enough (as only law school gives this training) to handle the complex issues that lower income folks tend to present in family law cases. Period.

Thank you kindly,

REDACTED

From: Limited License Legal Technician [mailto:LLLT@wsba.org]
Sent: Wednesday, May 23, 2018 2:40 PM
To: REDACTED
Subject: RE: [EXTERNAL] The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you

REDACT

Thank you for your input regarding the new proposed Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) practice area, Consumer, Money, and Debt Law.

WSBA staff members are compiling all comments, which will be provided to the LLLT Board for consideration in deciding next steps. In the meantime, we appreciate all feedback as we work toward fulfilling our mandate by the Washington Supreme Court under APR 28 to continue to recommend and develop practice areas of law for LLLTs.

At the end of the comment period in July, the LLLT Board will carefully review all comments and input. LLLT Board members may modify the proposed practice area based on the comments, issues discovered during the drafting of regulations, and issues that arise during the law schools' development of the curriculum.

From: REDACTED
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:07 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: REDACTED
Subject: RE: [EXTERNAL] The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you

Abolish the LLLT board entirely. They hurt attorneys and hurt litigants who are not getting the best legal representation possible by people without law degrees.

Thank you,

REDACTED

From: Washington State Bar Association [<mailto:noreply@wsba.org>]

Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:05 PM

To: REDACTED

Subject: [EXTERNAL] The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you

Washington State Bar Association

The LLLT Board is working on developing a new LLLT licensed practice area—Consumer, Money, and Debt Law—and would like your feedback. A draft outline of the proposed practice area is under development. The LLLT Board is seeking comments through July 16.

There are several ways you can help shape and be involved in the process, and we hope you will be. Please consider reviewing the draft and being involved in the next steps by:

- Providing feedback on the initial draft and subsequent versions,
- Attending the LLL Board meetings, which are open to the public, and
- If the new practice area is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, assisting the LLLT Board with writing the rule, regulations, and exam for this practice area.

Please submit comments, questions, or concerns to lllt@wsba.org.

The LLLT Board looks forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Stephen R. Crossland
Chair, LLLT Board

Renata de Carvalho Garcia
WSBA Staff Liaison to the LLLT Board

Washington State Bar Association

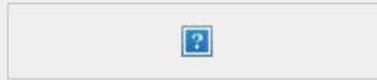

1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | Map
Toll-free: 800-945-9722
Local: 206-443-9722

Official WSBA communication

All members will receive the following email, which is considered official:

- Licensing and licensing-related materials
- Information about the non-CLE work and activities of the sections to which the member belongs
- Mandatory Continuing Legal Education (MCLE) reporting-related notifications
- Election materials (Board of Governors)
- Selected Executive Director and Board of Governors communications

From: Scott M. Kinkley
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: César Torres
Subject: RE: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law - comments from the Northwest Justice Project
Date: Friday, June 29, 2018 1:20:49 PM
Attachments: Revised NJP Response to Proposed Expansion of LLLT Program To Consumer Law 6-29-18 smk.pdf

Mr. Chairman,

Please accept the revised Northwest Justice Project letter, concerning the LLLT Board's Consumer, Money and Debt Law proposal. The revision removes my bio reference to my position on the state Collection Agency Board. Please discard the prior proposal and substitute it for this. The content is otherwise the same. Thank you.

Scott M. Kinkley
Staff Attorney
Northwest Justice Project
1702 W. Broadway
Spokane, WA 99201
(509) 324-9128
scottk@nwjustice.org

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTE: This electronic mail transmission may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. This communication originates from the law firm of Northwest Justice Project, and is protected under the Electronic Communication Privacy Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2510-2521. Do not read this if you are not the person(s) named. Any use, distribution, copying, or disclosure by any other person is strictly prohibited. If you received this transmission in error, please notify the sender by telephone (509) 324-9128 or send an electronic mail message to the sender or ScottK@nwjustice.org and destroy the original transmission and its attachments without reading or saving in any manner. Do not deliver, distribute or copy this message and/or any attachment and, if you are not the intended recipient, do not disclose the contents or take any action in reliance upon the information contained in this communication or any attachments.

From: Limited License Legal Technician [mailto:LLLT@wsba.org]
Sent: Thursday, June 14, 2018 8:34 AM
To: Scott M. Kinkley <ScottK@nwjustice.org>; Limited License Legal Technician <LLLT@wsba.org>
Cc: César Torres <Cesart@nwjustice.org>
Subject: RE: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law - comments from the Northwest Justice Project

Hi Scott,

Thank you for your input regarding the new proposed Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) practice area, Consumer, Money, and Debt Law.

WSBA staff members are compiling all comments, which will be provided to the LLLT Board for consideration in deciding next steps. In the meantime, we appreciate all feedback as we work toward fulfilling our mandate by the Washington Supreme Court under APR 28 to continue to recommend and develop practice areas of law for LLLTs.

At the end of the comment period in July, the LLLT Board will carefully review all comments and input. LLLT Board members may modify the proposed practice area based on the comments, issues discovered during the drafting of regulations, and issues that arise during the law schools' development of the curriculum.

From: Scott M. Kinkley [<mailto:ScottK@nwjustice.org>]
Sent: Wednesday, June 13, 2018 11:20 AM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Cc: César Torres
Subject: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law - comments from the Northwest Justice Project

Mr. Chairman Crossland and Members of the Board,

Please accept the attached letter from the Northwest Justice Project, concerning the LLLT Board's Consumer, Money and Debt Law proposal. Thank you.

Scott M. Kinkley
Staff Attorney
Northwest Justice Project
1702 W. Broadway
Spokane, WA 99201
(509) 324-9128
scotk@nwjustice.org

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTE: This electronic mail transmission may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. This communication originates from the law firm of Northwest Justice Project, and is protected under the Electronic Communication Privacy Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2510-2521. Do not read this if you are not the person(s) named. Any use, distribution, copying, or disclosure by any other person is strictly prohibited. If you received this transmission in error, please notify the sender by telephone (509) 324-9128 or send an electronic mail message to the sender or ScottK@nwjustice.org and destroy the original transmission and its attachments without reading or saving in any manner. Do not deliver, distribute or copy this message and/or any attachment and, if you are not the intended recipient, do not disclose the contents or take any action in reliance upon the information contained in this communication or any attachments.

Northwest Justice Project

1702 W Broadway
Spokane, WA 99201
Tel. (509) 324-9128
Fax (509) 324-0065

Toll Free 1-888-201-1019
www.nwjustice.org

César E. Torres
Executive Director

June 29, 2018

Washington State Bar Association
LLLT Board
LLLT@wsba.org

Re: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law
Public Comment From The Northwest Justice Project

Mr. Chairman Crossland and Members of the Board:

Please accept these comments of the Northwest Justice Project concerning the proposed new practice area for LLLTs in Consumer, Money and Debt Law.

A. ABOUT THE NORTHWEST JUSTICE PROJECT

The Northwest Justice Project (NJP) is a dynamic statewide law firm providing low income legal advice and representation, community partnerships, and education to empower low income clients and combat injustice in all its forms.

NJP also maintains WashingtonLawHelp.org, the public website referenced in your proposal which contains an extensive library of legal resources and self-help materials including necessary court forms in areas of law needed most by low income people, the great majority of whom are forced to appear in court unrepresented. In addition, NJP is an integral member of, and provides support for, the Alliance for Equal Justice, Washington's coordinated statewide civil legal aid delivery system which brings together a network of volunteer attorney programs, specialty legal aid providers, and supporters working to ensure equal justice for all low-income communities in Washington. It was largely through this network, and through the work of NJP staff and attorneys, that the Civil Legal Needs Study was conducted.

In response to the Civil Legal Needs Study, NJP re-organized its Strategic Advocacy Focus (SAF) and dedicated roughly one third of its resources to addressing consumer debt, legal financial obligations and landlord tenant debt. There is without a doubt an expanding need for representation in these areas. However, NJP has significant concerns with aspects of the proposal but is in support of others. More specifically, the proposal to permit LLLTs to negotiate consumer debt would likely revive the predatory debt settlement industry. In addition, the Board's proposal to permit LLLTs to engage in debt collection, including garnishments, supplements the competitive debt collection industry, a result directly averse to the Board's mandate and the findings of the Civil Legal Needs Study.

Ancillary to NJP's primary concerns, the Board's proposal does not recognize or address the various legislative statutes and executive enforcement bodies that already regulate the majority of privileges the Board proposes to grant to LLLTs. In other words, the Board's proposal creates a secondary licensing system over non-legal professionals already engaging in many of the activities the Board intends to license. This is a concern that was not relevant to the debate over granting LLLTs the right to practice of family law, which is an exclusive domain of attorneys. Consumer law, by contrast, is substantially intertwined with market participants, statutory regulation and for profit non-lawyer services; many of which are historically predatory. For example, permitting an LLLT to "negotiate" debts would immediately subject LLLTs to regulation as a "debt adjuster" under the Debt Adjustment Act. LLLTs permitted by the WSBA to commence garnishments or prepare a debt collection complaint, would fall squarely within federal regulation as "debt collectors" under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, 15 USC § 1692a(5) and as "collection agencies" under Washington Collection Agency Act, RCW 19.16.100(4)(a). Moreover, the Board has not addressed the significant question of what the impact would be of creating a secondary licensing system under Washington's judicial branch of government regulating and licensing existing businesses already subject to statutory regulation and executive agency oversight.

Notwithstanding these concerns, with appropriate training and oversight, permitting LLLTs to engage in limited form based practices and non-adversarial proceedings (such as preparing answers to civil lawsuits, exemption claims to bank garnishments, and assisting with driver's relicensing and legal financial obligation waivers, restoration of civil rights etc.), and with training to identify and appropriately refer cases of unfair and abusive conduct to consumer attorneys or regulatory bodies, might positively serve the public and meet the Board's mission.

B. DEBT ADJUSTING

The proposal permits Consumer LLLTs to provide "Debt Collection Defense and Assistance" through "negotiation of debt or payment plans, loan modifications, loan forgiveness and debt relief discharge." NJP has grave concerns that these activities will increase the number of people operating as "Debt Adjusters" in Washington.

Debt adjusting is a highly regulated profession in this state. The Debt Adjusting Act was enacted in 1978, in response to rampant abuse and victimization of low income people struggling with debt collectors. The profession is defined by statute, and clearly includes the activities proposed for LLLTs.¹ The licensing proposal also overlaps and interferes with federal bankruptcy law permitting non-lawyers to engage in credit counseling. See 11 U.S. Code § 111.

With respect to debt adjusting, Washington's Supreme Court observed that the Debt Adjuster Act was passed in response to "deep-seated concern about the abuses inherent in the debt adjusting industry." The Court found, "the lack of industry regulation, and the frequently unsophisticated and/or desperate client seeking relief from bill collectors' harassment, gave rise to numerous unfair and deceptive practices." Carles v. Global Client Solutions, 171 Wn.2d 486, P.3d 321 (2011) quoting Performance Audit: Debt Adjusting Licensing and Regulatory Activities, Report no. 77-13, Jan. 20, 1978, at 7 (on file with the Wn. State Archives, H.B. 86 (1979) at 7).

"Debt Adjusting," or selling services to negotiate settlement of debt with creditors, is an existing private industry that does not require either a full or limited license to practice law. However, people licensed as LLLTs who engage in debt negotiation will also meet the statutory definition of a "Debt Adjusters" and be separately regulated by that Act. This fact produces at least two truths in opposition to the proposed rule. First, requiring licensing as a LLLT merely supplements the existing legislative and executive regulatory framework of the debt adjusting profession with a licensing requirement governed by the judicial branch of government (raising separation of power concerns). More importantly, the proposal fails to achieve the purpose of fulfilling an "unmet need" where it merely supplements an existing, often predatory, highly regulated, non-legal profession.

The Board's current proposal also ignores the hard-learned lessons of the past. For example, NJP attorneys know from their clients' experiences that operators in the debt settlement industry often take consumers' money and fail to provide meaningful service, leaving the consumer with no benefit, and depleted resources to offer creditors. In response, many debt collectors have adopted policies to accelerate collection efforts and immediately sue debtors when a debt adjuster appears on their behalf in a race to collect depleting resources since the consumer has demonstrated an ability to pay something by hiring the service. In these instances, consumers are often betrayed by a false sense of security and allowed default judgments to be entered on the assumption the debt adjuster they hired is providing meaningful relief. Debt adjusters, as well as the putative Consumer LLLTs, cannot provide meaningful representation; Northwest Justice Project attorneys repeatedly expend substantial effort to vacate, when possible, default judgments resulting from this practice. The proposal does not offer any protection or solution, and NJP anticipates this portion of the LLLT proposal will lead to similar harm to low income debtors.

¹ "Debt Adjusting means the managing, counseling, settling, adjusting, prorating, or liquidating of the indebtedness of a debtor, or receiving funds for the purpose of distributing said funds among creditors in payment or partial payment of obligations of a debtor." RCW 18.28.010(2).

Further, fully licensed attorneys are subject to regulation under the Debt Adjustment Act, and it is axiomatic that LLLTs will be as well. See Bronzich v. Persels & Assocs., LLC, No. CV-10-0364-EFS, 2011 WL 2119372, at *6 (E.D. Wash. May 27, 2011) (“Even if the Attorney Defendants are licensed to practice in Washington and therefore can seek reliance on the services-solely-incidental-to-legal-practice exemption, the Court determines this exemption does not apply to an attorney or law firm specializing in debt adjustment”).

Permitting LLLTs to engage in a business already available to non-lawyers, but subject to existing regulation, creates a confusing overlap of WSBA licensing policies with pre-existing state industry regulations. Worse, the licensing of LLLTs to specifically engage in debt settlement encourages a false perception that existing regulation is inapplicable to LLLT licensees. This perception is likely to lead to temporary growth in a predatory industry; it will likely be up to NJP and private consumer attorneys to bring consumer protection litigation against LLLTs unfamiliar with Washington’s extensive consumer protection regulations to counter regulatory transgressions and generally unfair and deceptive practices that are part and parcel with this industry.

NJP encourages the Board to strike the provisions of the proposal that authorizes Consumer LLLTs to engage in any activities classified as “Debt Adjusting”, debt settlement, credit counseling, or the like.

C. WASHINGTON STATE COLLECTION AGENCY ACT AND THE FEDERAL FAIR DEBT COLLECTION PRACTICES ACT

By allowing LLLTs to provide debt collection services, such as garnishments or ghost writing collection complaints, the Board’s current proposal also infringes on existing state and federal regulatory statutes and unnecessarily supplements a competitive industry in derogation of the LLLTs mandate to meet unmet civil legal needs.² Similarly, the proposed licensing requirement to allow certain debt collection activity places the putative LLLTs squarely within existing state and federal debt collection regulation.

The FDCPA prohibits debt collectors from engaging in various abusive and unfair practices. McCullough v. Johnson, Rodenburg & Lauinger, LLC, 637 F.3d 939, 947–48 (9th Cir. 2011) (internal citations omitted). “The statute was enacted to eliminate abusive debt collection practices; to ensure debt collectors who abstain from such practices are not competitively disadvantaged; and to promote consistent state action to protect consumers.” Id.; 15 U.S.C. § 1692(e). The statute defines a “debt collector” as one who “regularly collects ... debts owed or due or asserted to be owed or due another,” 15 U.S.C. § 1692a(6), and covers lawyers who regularly collect debts through litigation, Heintz, 514 U.S. at 293–94, 115 S.Ct. 1489. Consumer LLLTs licensed to garnish, draft collection complaints or participate in collection cases in Small Claims Court meet this definition and will be regulated by the FDCPA.

² On March 27, 2018, 1,524 entities had an active collection agency licensed issued by the Department of Licensing, representing a growth of 35 licensees since the fall of 2017.

Similarly, the Washington State Collection Agency Act, chapter 19.16 RCW, enacted in 1971, requires collection agencies to obtain a license, follow certain internal procedures, and adhere to a code of conduct. Washington has a strong public policy underlying the state and federal laws regulating the practice of debt collection. Panag v. Farmers Ins. Co. of Washington, 166 Wn.2d 27, 54, 204 P.3d 885, 897 (2009) (“the business of debt collection affects the public interest, and collection agencies are subject to strict regulation to ensure they deal fairly and honestly with alleged debtors”). Consumer LLLTs licensed to garnish, draft collection complaints or participate in collection cases in small claims courts meet this definition, are regulated by the WCAA and must be separately licensed by the Department of Licensing.

What is confusing about the LLLT proposal, is these “services” are already widely available by regulated non-lawyer businesses (i.e. collection agencies) which also happen to be the antithesis of consumer protection law.

The Board must seriously consider whether licensing LLLTs to engage in these activities serves any unmet need identified in the Civil Legal Needs Study. It must also seriously give weight to the fact that the proposal will extend WSBA regulatory authority over thousands of non-lawyers legally performing the function the LLLT Board intends to license.

D. CONCLUSION

Finally, it is concerning that the initial Consumer LLLT proposal was developed without seeking input from Washington’s consumer protection community or legal services organizations. Consumer lawyers in this state are highly self-organized both as a subgroup of the National Association of Consumer Advocates, via participation in Washington based restricted email listservs, in person CLEs and galvanized together by the common experience of difficult litigation against well organized and well-funded corporate opponents. When the proposal was revealed, it came as a complete surprise to this community of consumer attorneys. It is regrettable that this wealth of experience and knowledge was not consulted in the development of this proposal. There is real and ongoing harm to low income consumer and debtor’s in this state; there are not enough consumer attorneys helping them to enforce their rights. But while the proposal has some promising features for our client base, our experience predicts it will, as currently drafted, be largely ineffective and in several ways harmful to consumers with unmet legal needs. Moreover, the licensing proposal cuts both ways: LLLTs will be able to represent creditors as well as debtors thereby increasing access to justice for creditors – the unintended consequence of this rule. The unintended consequence is not theoretical given the financial resources available to hire LLLTs are greater for creditors than for debtors.

Consumer LLLTs may have a role in the quest to combat predatory practices and inform the public, but the proposed rule as drafted seems ineffective to serve that purpose. Significant modifications should be made. NJP would like to see the proposal revised to focus more on helping consumers with form based or non-adversarial proceedings, and not grant any authority to engage debt collection or to engage directly with debt collectors on a consumer's behalf.

Therefore, NJP recommends that the LLLT Board:

1. Abandon the proposed permitted actions of:
 - a. Negotiation of debt;
 - b. Assistance filling out complaints and counterclaims;
 - c. All actions related to garnishment except assistance with exemption claims;
 - d. All actions related to loan modification and foreclosure defense and assistance; and
 - e. Representation in court and at depositions.
2. Consider revising the scope of the proposed permitted actions of:
 - a. Activity involving student loan debt by permitting LLLTs to assist a debtor only with federal student loan repayment options;
 - b. Reporting unfair acts, deceptive practices, and consumer statutory violations to consumer protection attorneys and/or a legal services agency in addition to regulatory authorities;
 - c. Providing bankruptcy advice in a manner that conforms with and does not overlap with 11 U.S. Code § 111 (creating non-lawyer credit counseling) and fulfills an identified legal need or supplements a need not already met by “credit counselors”; and
 - d. Reducing the level of participation permitted in Small Claims Court cases to not exceed the participation restrictions in place against fully licensed attorneys. In addition, a strict prohibition against LLLTs assisting creditors in small claims litigation or engaging in other conduct meeting the definition of “debt collector” under the FDCPA or a “collection agency” under WCAA.

3. Adopt the proposed permitted actions of:

- a. Assistance with waiving legal financial obligations or interest on legal financial obligations;
- b. Preparing answers to debt collection lawsuits, including helping consumers apply for Charity Care from hospitals where appropriate;
- c. Providing advice regarding identity theft, including assistance with filing police reports and filling out necessary forms from government entities or private creditors;
- d. Educate consumers on identity theft issues, best practices and provide resources (i.e. www.washingtonlawhelp.org);
- e. Assisting consumers with wage complaints to Labor and Industries, assistance with negotiation and administrative hearing in wage complaints cases, advice and reporting under the Minimum Wage Act and Fair Labor Standards Act, and referral to private attorneys or legal services of claims and statutory rights enforcement that requires civil litigation; and
- f. Assisting consumer with billing disputes with original creditors that are not in litigation, which may include preparing complaints to local, state and/or federal agencies.

4. Add proposed permitted actions of:

- a. Assisting consumers in obtaining relief in abbreviated or form based procedures in addition to applying for legal financial obligation (LFOs) interest waivers such as:
 - i. Waiver of LFOs (or a limited waiver of LFO interest);
 - ii. Exemption claims in garnishment;
 - iii. Relicensing programs;
 - iv. Expungement or sealing of criminal records;
 - v. Restoration of civil rights (voting);

- vi. GR 34 waiver of Court fees;
 - vii. Other appropriate form based or non-adversarial proceedings.
- b. Assisting and advising consumers with pre-unlawful detainer landlord tenant disputes, such as documenting the condition of the property, habitability rights, applications for subsidized housing, education and resources.

Sincerely,

NORTHWEST JUSTICE PROJECT

Scott M. Kinkley³
Attorney at Law

smk/np

cc Cesar E. Torres, NJP Executive Director

³ Presenter at twenty-two WSBA accredited CLEs on debt collection defense and related issues, author of the WSAJ's Consumer Protection Handbook chapters on the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act and the Washington Collection Agency Act, , and 10-year member of the National Association of Consumer Advocates.

From: Inez "Ine" Petersen
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Re: My comment: The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you
Date: Wednesday, May 23, 2018 4:17:21 PM

Dear LLLT Board:

Did it ever occur to you that you should be lobbying the State Supreme Court to change APR 28 instead of undermining the very jobs of the attorneys to whom you owe a duty of loyalty of the first order?

Mission creep needs to stop with the goal to reduce dues by 40%. Now that is a goal I believe the majority of members of the Bar could support.

Perhaps you are too close to the problem to see that you have a problem.

Sincerely,
Inez Petersen, WSBA #46213

On Wed, May 23, 2018 at 3:08 PM, Limited License Legal Technician <LLLT@wsba.org> wrote:

Inez,

Thank you for your input regarding the new proposed Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) practice area, Consumer, Money, and Debt Law.

WSBA staff members are compiling all comments, which will be provided to the LLLT Board for consideration in deciding next steps. In the meantime, we appreciate all feedback as we work toward fulfilling our mandate by the Washington Supreme Court under APR 28 to continue to recommend and develop practice areas of law for LLLTs.

At the end of the comment period in July, the LLLT Board will carefully review all comments and input. LLLT Board members may modify the proposed practice area based on the comments, issues discovered during the drafting of regulations, and issues that arise during the law schools' development of the curriculum.

From: Inez "Ine" Petersen [mailto:inezpetersenjd@gmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 1:21 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician

Cc: Bill Pickett

Subject: My comment: The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you

Dear LLLT Board:

I recommend that your Board be disbanded immediately.

Is the WSBA undermining its members or representing them? It looks like the former to me.

This is the most absurd idea since mandatory professional liability insurance. And it shows that the Bar has just too much money laying around and must seek ways to spend it no matter how it hurts the attorneys they allegedly represent.

I don't want the WSBA taking action that reduces my chances of making a living. I want the WSBA to facilitate my career, not undermine it!

WHAT ARE YOU THINKING? WHO IS REALLY BEHIND THIS?

This shows that there is a real need for voting to occur at the member level on everything with a greatly reduced staff. All the committees, boards, and huge number of in-house employees seem to be working on projects that are not in the best interest of the attorneys. This is just another one.

A voluntary bar association would nip this problem in the bud or would it? The Titanic needs a new captain, one with eyes to see the icebergs. I look at the WSBA as a professional union; I want that union to plug the holes in the life boats, not create more holes.

Sincerely,

Inez Petersen

WSBA #46213

----- Forwarded message -----

From: Washington State Bar Association <noreply@wsba.org>

Date: Tue, May 15, 2018 at 11:46 AM

Subject: The LLLT Board is developing a new practice area and wants to hear from you

To: inezpetersenjd@gmail.com

Washington State Bar Association

The LLLT Board is working on developing a new LLLT licensed practice area—Consumer, Money, and Debt Law—and would like your feedback. A draft outline of the proposed practice area is under development. The LLLT Board is seeking comments through July 16.

There are several ways you can help shape and be involved in the process, and we hope you will be. Please consider reviewing the draft and being involved in the next steps by:

- Providing feedback on the initial draft and subsequent versions,
- Attending the LLL T Board meetings, which are open to the public, and
- If the new practice area is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, assisting the LLLT Board with writing the rule, regulations, and exam for this practice area.

Please submit comments, questions, or concerns to lllt@wsba.org.

The LLLT Board looks forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Stephen R. Crossland
Chair, LLLT Board

Renata de Carvalho Garcia
WSBA Staff Liaison to the LLLT Board

WSBA seal

Washington State Bar Association

[1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539](#) | Map

Toll-free: 800-945-9722

Local: 206-443-9722

Official WSBA communication

All members will receive the following email, which is considered official:

- Licensing and licensing-related materials
- Information about the non-CLE work and activities of the sections to which the member belongs
- Mandatory Continuing Legal Education (MCLE) reporting-related notifications
- Election materials (Board of Governors)
- Selected Executive Director and Board of Governors communications

From: susanne.rodriguez
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Re: proposed consumer LLLT
Date: Wednesday, May 16, 2018 10:52:04 AM
Attachments: image001.png

Looks good. I'm a bankruptcy attorney and I think it's a great idea to have LLLTs available.

thx,
Susanne

On Wed, May 16, 2018 at 8:07 AM, Limited License Legal Technician <LLLT@wsba.org> wrote:

Hi Susanne,

You can read the draft here:

https://www.wsba.org/docs/default-source/legal-community/committees/llt-board/consumer-money-and-debt---draft-for-discussion-and-comment.pdf?sfvrsn=a86007f1_4

Laura Sommer | Interim Limited License Legal Technician Program Lead

Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8289 | laura.sommer@wsba.org

1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org

The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact barbarao@wsba.org.

From: susanne rodriguez [mailto:lacamaslegal@gmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2018 2:38 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: proposed consumer LLLT

Is there a link to the draft somewhere?

thanks,
Susanne

--

Susanne Ruiz Rodriguez, Esq., M.S.

Attorney & Counselor at Law

532 NE 3rd #101

Camas WA 98607

(360) 835-0457

--

Susanne Ruiz Rodriguez, Esq., M.S.

Attorney & Counselor at Law
532 NE 3rd #101
Camas WA 98607
(360) 835-0457

From: vlaparker@aol.com
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: specific comment
Date: Wednesday, May 16, 2018 8:40:01 AM

As stated in the documents regarding the specific expansion, people do not know about existing services. So, why not advertise those existing services. They were designed to help.

Also, the research is biased. The groups used to gather information have incomplete information and are looking to reduce their load and not truly serve people (see first paragraph).

Vicki Lee Anne Parker,
Attorney at Law

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: The information and documents in this electronic mailing contains confidential information belonging to the sender which is legally privileged. The information is intended only for the use of the individual(s) or entity stated herein. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, distribution or the taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this transmission in error, please immediately notify VICKI LEE ANNE PARKER by telephone at 360-491-2757 to arrange for disposition of the original documents.

Creditor/Debtor Section
Executive Committee
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, Washington 98101

August 13, 2018

LLLT Board
Attn: Stephen Crossland, Chair
LLLT@wsba.org

Re: Expansion of Services by LLLTs

Dear Stephen:

The undersigned are the Chair and the Chair-Elect of the Creditor-Debtor Section of the Washington State Bar Association (“CD”). We are writing with regards to concerns CD has with the proposed expansion of the Limited License Legal Technician (“LLLT”) program into the area of Consumer, Money, and Debt law. The proposed expansion was a topic of conversation at a recent CD Executive Board meeting (the “Meeting”) that you attended. This letter is to memorialize our concerns and suggested recommendations with respect to the proposal for expansion of the LLLT program into the creditor/debtor area, as well as several suggestions to better tailor any expansion of the LLLT program into this area from the perspective of practitioners already offering services in this area.

Currently there are 1,045 Washington licensed attorneys who list Creditor-Debtor as an area of practice, 815 attorneys who list consumer law as an area of practice, and 1,094 attorneys who list bankruptcy as an area of practice. These practitioners are on the front line working with low income homes to address the issues that prompted the proposed expansion of the LLLT Program. As the number of attorneys indicates, there is already a substantial number of professionals who stand ready, willing, and able to render assistance the proposed expansion would include. While access for low income families is an important issue, the lack of access to justice does not appear to be an issue stemming from lack of sufficient assistance being available.

CD has formed a subcommittee tasked with responding to the proposed expansion in an effort to help the proposed expansion target the constituencies it purports to assist based on the practical knowledge the day to day practice in these areas entails. The subcommittee was comprised of attorneys who represent both creditors and debtors, a mix of attorneys handling large corporate Creditor-Debtor cases and attorneys handling smaller consumer related cases, from varying firms by both size and location, and a Federal Bankruptcy Judge. The subcommittee is still reviewing the empirical evidence the proposed expansion relies on, and we may be submitting additional comments after the review of the data is complete.

CD is supportive of actions to increase access to legal services for low income individuals. This response refers only to low income individuals as middle income is never defined in the studies relied upon, and that constituency is currently served by consumer creditor or debtor practitioners in the State of Washington. CD believes the proposed expansion will not achieve increased access to legal services for low income individuals because:

1. The proposed expansion fails to address concerns that would arise from existing federal and state regulations of this area of law;
2. The proposed expansion is not tailored to address the identified need for legal services;
3. The proposed expansion fails to acknowledge alternative avenues to address the problems that already exist, or changes that could be made to the existing system to meet the need of the targeted constituency.

THE EXISTING REGULATORY STRUCTURE UNDER STATE AND FEDERAL LAW

Regulations at both the state and federal level make the proposed expansion difficult absent some legislative coordination with the expansion. For example, limitations imposed under federal law as it relates to bankruptcy filings are presumably the reason proposed allowed bankruptcy services from LLLTs are quite limited. However, the Bankruptcy Code is not the only federal law covering the areas the proposed expansion would cover. For example, the Credit Repair Organizations Act, 15 U.S.C. §§1679-1679 would apply to LLLTs practicing in the areas under the proposed expansion, and would prohibit LLLTs from certain actions, compel disclosures, and impose restrictions on a LLLT's ability to enter into contracts with potential clients. Under state law, Debt Adjusting, RCW 18.28.010-900, Collection Agencies, RCW 19.16.100-960, and Credit Services Organizations Act, RCW 19.134.010-900, would all be applicable to LLLTs. The above-referenced statutes would impose additional compliance overhead, and create the potential for exposure to personal liability for failure to comply with the various statutory regimes, for LLLTs working in the proposed expansion areas. This would increase the cost LLLTs would have to charge for their services because they would not have the benefit of the exemption for attorneys created in the various statutes. This is not necessarily an exhaustive list of statutes that are implicated in the proposed expansion, and there are additional federal and state regulations that are potentially implicated as well.

While the LLLT Board considered some regulator schemes, such as the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, it does not appear to have addressed the impact of several of the various statutory regimes that would be applicable, absent a statutory exception similar to the exemption for attorneys. In order to address these issues, the LLLT Workgroup needs to consider further refinements to the authorized scope, and the need for legislative enactments before proceeding with the proposed expansion to avoid unintended consequences for LLLTs.

SCOPE OF PROPOSAL TOO BROAD

While the asserted aim of the proposed expansion embraces a goal all interested parties would like to accomplish (increasing access to justice for low income individuals), the proposal is unlikely to meet this need based on the potential problems identified in this letter. CD also believes the proposed expansion will have unintended consequences harming attorneys because of a lack of a system to pre-qualify individuals seeking to utilize these services, and the use of an inflated cap on the amount that can be in controversy for an LLLT to assist.

One concern that was addressed at the Meeting was the lack of any means testing to qualify individuals for representation by LLLTs in order to justify the proposed expansion of the LLLT practice areas. Without a means testing requirement, the stated goal of the proposed expansion rings hollow. LLLTs will simply be a lower cost alternative to lawyers for anyone seeking legal guidance, not just low income individuals who is supposed to be the targeted population.

Another concern raised at the Meeting was the proposed dollar limitation of $100,000.00. This amount is, in almost all situations, well over the dollar amount low income individuals have in a single obligation (student loans and mortgages notwithstanding). A more workable limitation would be to utilize the $5,000.00 jurisdiction amount of small claims courts or an amount that is at least close to that amount.

Furthermore, the method of determining what the “value” of a debt is should be clearly delineated. The proposed expansion does not indicate whether this amount is based on the principal, a combination of principal with accrued unpaid interest and fees, or the amount in controversy (which may include additional amounts for attorney’s fees and costs) or for each debt or the total multiple debts for which assistance is being sought. Any finalized proposal must contain explicit instructions on calculating the dollar cap LLLTs can assist with. It is also important to note that on the creditors’ side, debt collection is more complex than many would think. LLLTs acting to collect debt would, like lawyers, be subject to provisions of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and state consumer protections in these areas. Compliance with these legal requirements is fraught with perils even for seasoned lawyers.

ALTERNATIVES ALREADY EXIST TO MEET THE IDENTIFIED NEED

As described in the empirical evidence in the proposed expansion, and discussed at the Meeting, there are already services available to low income individuals for services in this area. For example, the Washington State Bar Association (Low Bono Section) and the King County Bar Association already provide moderate means programs for low income individuals. For example, the King County Bar Association already operates legal clinics to address the concerns used to justify the LLLT expansion. The Spokane County Bar Association has a volunteer lawyers program that can provide many of the services proposed to be provided by LLLTs, without cost. There are also several federal and state government agencies and approved non-profit agencies that will assist consumers in loan modifications and budgeting services at no charge. These services are in addition to the services the LLLT Board identifies in the proposed expansion, and the legal clinics at all three of the ABA approved law schools in Washington State. While there is no disputing the need for additional access to justice for low income individuals, there is no evidence or analysis to support the conclusion that expanding the LLLTs practice to include services that are already available would provide any meaningful additional relief for the issues the proposed expansion alleges to target. This conclusion is buttressed by the conclusion by the LLLT proposal identifying that one of the largest hurdles to individuals seeking legal assistance with consumer related issues are either not knowing services exist or lack of trust in the entities providing such services. Nothing in the proposed expansion adequately addresses why LLLTs would be any different than those services already available.

Additionally, the limitations on LLLTs ability to consult in various areas of law that may be related to the issues a client is facing raises the specter that LLLTs would be unwilling or unable to effectively refer matters to attorneys if the attorney could provide better assistance to the LLLT's client.

Furthermore, consumer creditor-debtor attorneys have the ability to serve the need the proposed expansion seeks to address. Most consumer bankruptcy attorneys, for example, provide free initial consultations of between 30 minutes and an hour for prospective clients, and all have relatively modest hourly rates, and reasonably priced flat fee products for more routine matters. These practitioners could also assist in achieving the goal of expanding access to justice for low income individuals if WSBA focused on revising the Rules of Professional Conduct ("RPC") regulations for advertising of services to bring costs down for practitioners and clients. The RPC limitations on advertising their services is nearly identical to LLLT Rules of Professional Conduct (LLLT RPC"), as noted in official comment [1] to LLLT RPB 7.1. These very limitations on advertising are part of the identified issue with low income individuals' ignorance of available assistance which call into doubt the efficacy of the proposed expansion.

Another change to the RPCs that would allow attorneys in this area the ability to more cost-effectively assist in this area is more leeway in "unbundling" services under the RPCs. While the LLLT RPCs explicitly limit the scope of representation to specific areas, the RPCs applicable to attorneys take a different approach by limiting what services an attorney can unbundle from representation. By affording additional latitude for attorneys to unbundle service, the identified need for low income individuals could better be met by decreasing the cost of services attorneys could offer for simple cases, while ensuring a client has the same quality of representation, without the interim step of retaining the LLLT.

With respect to the area of bankruptcy, the primary service proposed to be provided by LLLTs would be initial counseling and then referral to a bankruptcy attorney. Currently, the vast majority of debtors' attorneys provide the initial counseling free of charge. Thus, the LLLTs would be charging clients for services that the clients could receive free of charge. This is antithetical to the goals of the Board's proposal. More education of consumers regarding bankruptcy services that are already available would seem to be more effective. Furthermore, practice in the area of bankruptcy by non-lawyers is specifically addressed in the Bankruptcy Code, and would therefore preempt any authorization by the WSBA for LLLTs to practice in the bankruptcy area.

RECOMMENDED REVISIONS TO PROPOSAL

While CD has significant reservations about the expansion of the LLLT program into the Consumer, Money, and Debt Law, we recognize the need for additional access to justice for low income individuals. If LLLTs are going to be authorized to practice in this area of law, for the reasons set forth above, CD recommends the following be incorporated into any final rules permitting such practice:

1. Potential clients should be subject to some form of means testing to ensure the goal of the expansion is met. CD believes the appropriate amount is 200% of the poverty level.
2. LLLTs should only be authorized to assist with debts within the same dollar limitations applicable to claims in small claims court or an amount close to that.
3. LLLTs should only be authorized to represent natural persons, and not business entities.
4. LLLTs representation should be limited only to debtors.
5. Undertake a review of the RPC to consider changes that would allow more flexibility for attorneys to address the identified needs through the relaxation of rules on the unbundling of services and/or advertising to enact changes in concert with the potential expansion of the LLLT program.
6. Revision of the proposal, in consultation with CD, to address the various statutory and regulatory regimes applicable to the proposed expansion practice area.
7. Removal of the Bankruptcy Awareness and Advice area from proposal in any final proposed expansion.

In addition to the matters cited above, there are some practice areas included in the Board's proposal that do not neatly mesh with the money and debt areas proposed. For instance, the proposal includes personal restraint matters and the like. Most creditor debtor attorneys do not also practice in these areas, and thus, the Board's proposal would create LLLT practitioners engaged in incongruent practices. We have concerns about the breadth of practice by individuals who do not have formal law school training. It seems to us that the more focused the LLLTs can be, the more value they will have to their clients.

/s/ Thomas S. Linde
Thomas S. Linde; Chair
WSBA Creditor-Debtor Executive Committee

/s/ Kevin D. O'Rourke
Kevin D. O'Rourke; Chair-Elect
WSBA Creditor-Debtor Executive
Committee

Cc: WSBA Board of Governors
c/o Margaret Shane margarets@wsba.org

Draft for Discussion and Comment:

Consumer, Money, and Debt Law Proposed New Practice Area for Limited License Legal Technicians

Summary

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board invites comment on a proposed new practice area: Consumer, Money, and Debt Law. This new practice area is designed to provide economic protection for the public and to provide legal assistance for certain financial matters, with a focus on consumer debt issues and other problems which contribute to consumer credit problems. For example, LLLTs licensed in this practice area would be able to assist clients with issues related to legal financial obligations, debt collection and garnishment defense, identity theft, preparing for small claims court, and filing protection orders.

Introduction

The practice area was developed by a New Practice Area Committee of the LLLT Board in a workgroup chaired by LLLT Board member Nancy Ivarinen. The workgroup is requesting input from other interested parties prior to formalizing the request to the Supreme Court.

While researching new practice areas for LLLTs, the workgroup considered:

- whether the new practice area would increase access to justice for potential clients with moderate or low incomes;
- whether there is a demonstrable unmet legal need in that area;
- whether it's possible to include consumer/client protection for those who use LLLTs;
- whether the new area would provide a viable practice so LLLTs can afford to maintain a business;
- whether the substantive practice area classes can be developed and taught by the law schools in a three-class series, one per quarter, for five credits each; and
- whether there are experts available to help develop the curriculum and teach the classes.

In order to appropriately vet the potential new practice areas, the workgroup considered:

- statistics and reports discussing the legal need;
- comments by invited subject matter experts who explained what the practice areas entail;
- comments by these experts on what the LLLT could potentially do;
- committee discussion about the LLLT being properly trained in a limited scope within the practice area; and
- whether the practice area could be regulated appropriately so that the needs of the clients would be met, while also assuring that the clients would be protected.

The Better Business Bureau (BBB), the Attorney General’s Consumer Protection Division, the Federal Trade Commission, and some organizations funded by United Way offer services related to consumer debt, such as debt management, debt renegotiation; and changing the behavior of businesses that prey upon low and moderate income consumers.

These services have been in existence for decades, and yet the demonstrated need in the Civil Legal Needs Study clearly shows that consumers with debt related legal issues are unaware of these services, do not believe these organizations can or will help them, have not been helped when using these services, or have needs that exceed the scope of the services these organizations can provide.

The proposed practice area is intended to help meet these significant unmet legal needs while giving LLLTs additional practice area options for expanding their businesses.

Evidence of Unmet Need

The starting point of the workgroup’s analysis was identifying the unmet need that could be addressed by LLLTs licensed in a consumer law practice area. The workgroup found convincing evidence supporting the existing legal need for consumer law assistance in studies conducted at both the state and national levels. The workgroup also looked at statistics received from county-based volunteer legal services providers and the statewide Moderate Means Program, which demonstrated a consistent legal need in the consumer law area among low and moderate income people.

Statistics from State and Federal Studies

- The 2003 (Statewide 0-400% of Federal Poverty Level) and 2015 (Statewide, 0-200% of Federal Poverty Level) Civil Legal Needs Studies identified Consumer, Financial Services, and Credit among the three most prevalent problems that people experience and seek legal help to address. There was an increase in legal need in this area from 27% to 37.6% between 2003 and 2014.
- The Legal Services Corporation June 2017 Report: The Justice Gap (National, 0-125% of Federal Poverty Level) identified consumer issues as the second highest problem area for people at this income level.

Moderate Means Program Data

- The WSBA Moderate Means Program (Statewide, 200-400% of Federal Poverty Level) identified consumer issues as the second highest problem area. In addition, data provided by the program showed that consumer law represented 10% of the 2,321 requests for service from October 26, 2016 to October 27, 2017. Of the 233 consumer law requests, 74 related to bankruptcy or debtor relief and 71 were in collections, repossession, and garnishment.
- Data from the Moderate Means Program on requests for service from January 1, 2015 through May 1, 2017, show 523 of 3,062 requests for service in consumer law matters, about 17% of the total requests over that 28 month period.

Statistics from Volunteer Legal Service Providers

- The King County Bar Association's Neighborhood Legal Clinics 2016 data showed that 15% (1,298 of 8,259) of legal issues addressed at the clinic were consumer law related.
- From 2012-2017 the King County based Northwest Consumer Law Center received 2,499 requests for service, all directly related to consumer law needs.
- Over the last three years, the Tacoma-Pierce County Bar Association Volunteer Legal Services had an average of 160 clients per year visit their Bankruptcy Clinic and an average of about 43 clients per year attend the Foreclosure – Home Justice Clinic.

How LLLTs Can Meet the Legal Need

When reviewing the Civil Legal Needs Studies, the workgroup noted that it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems the subjects were reporting, and if so, whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer.

The workgroup discussed many examples of consumer legal problems that may not have a legal remedy, such as a debt collection lawsuit where the money is owed. While discussing each example, the workgroup saw advantages to providing the consumer with legal advice, even if there did not appear to be a legal resolution to the issue. For example, in a debt collection lawsuit, the statute of limitations on collection of the debt may have passed, so the debtor may not be obligated to pay even though the debt is owed. For those debtors who do have defenses or where collection agencies are attempting to collect a legitimate debt in an unfair or illegal manner, a LLLT could be a valuable consumer protection tool. Even for consumers who have no defense to a lawfully pursued debt collection lawsuit, having the assistance of a LLLT throughout the process of responding to a lawsuit would speed judicial efficiency, as the defendant would understand the procedures and be able to respond in an appropriate and strategic way.

The extensive collection of self-help resources offered on washingtonlawhelp.org regarding consumer debt confirms that many consumers already face this issue pro se, and would undoubtedly benefit from consulting with an affordable provider of legal services in this area.

The workgroup enlisted the advice of practitioners and other experts in the various areas of law to identify the legal work which could be effectively performed by LLLTs and provide an economically sustainable practice area. The workgroup identified that Consumer, Money and Debt Law LLLTs should be able to:

- offer advice regarding all identified topics
- fill out certain forms
- engage in limited negotiation in regard to particular issues
- attend specific hearings to advise the client and assist in answering procedural questions

- attend depositions
- prepare paperwork for mediation, and
- attend any administrative proceeding related to the practice area.

The workgroup carefully weighed the pros and cons of each of the above actions and determined that allowing this range of actions would greatly increase the quality of service that LLLTs could provide to their clients.

Target Clients and Scope

The target clients of this practice area are moderate and low income people with consumer debt or credit problems, or those to whom a small amount of debt is owed. The workgroup narrowly prescribed the focus of the recommended scope in order to provide a maximum benefit to these clients. The workgroup also identified limitations designed to ensure that LLLTs will provide service to consumers who currently do not have resources in this area.

The 2015 Civil Legal Needs Study noted that the average number of legal problems per household has increased from 3.3 in 2003 to 9.3 in 2014. In addition, the legal problems that low-income people experience are interconnected in complex ways. Consumer debt, for example, can be exacerbated by landlord/tenant issues, divorce, identity theft, lack of access to benefits, problems with an employer, lack of exposure to options such as bankruptcy, and domestic violence and other protection orders.

The workgroup thought holistically about this range of issues which often go hand in hand with consumer debt and credit problems and identified a range of actions which could appropriately be performed by a LLLT in the areas of protection orders, bankruptcy education, wage theft, and identity theft. Including these areas as part of the consumer law relief a LLLT will be able to provide will allow LLLTs to proactively help their clients to break the cycle of debt creation.

Proposed Consumer, Money, and Debt Law LLLT Practice Area

Scope	Proposed Permitted Actions & Proposed Limitations
Legal Financial Obligations (LFOs)	Proposed Permitted Actions: Assistance filling out forms (e.g., Motion for Order Waiving or Reducing Interest on LFO, Order to Waive or Reduce Interest on LFO)
Small Claims	Proposed Permitted Actions: Assistance preparing the Notice of Small Claim, Certificate of Service, Response to Small Claim, Small Claims Orders, Small Claims Judgment, and counterclaims Preparation for mediation and trial Obtaining and organizing exhibits

Student Loans	Proposed Permitted Actions: Negotiation of debt or payment plans Modifications, loan forgiveness and debt relief Discharge
Debt Collection Defense and Assistance	Proposed Permitted Actions: Negotiation of debt Assistance filling out Complaints, Answers and Counterclaims Affirmative Defenses including Statute of Limitations defenses Reporting Fair Debt Collection Act violations, including statute of limitations and state collection agency statute violations Reporting to Regulatory Agencies Proposed Limitations: LLTs can assist only with debts valued at less than the jurisdictional limits set by the District Court ($100,000)
Garnishment	Proposed Permitted Actions: Negotiation Voluntary Wage Assignments Assistance filling out forms (Application for Writ of Garnishment, Continuing Lien on Earnings, Return of Service, Notice Exemption Claim, Release of Writ of Garnishment, Motion and Cert. for Default Answer to Writ of Garnishment, Application for Judgment, Motion/Order Discharging Garnishee, Satisfaction of Judgment) Exemption Claims, including assistance at court hearings Proposed Limitations: LLTs can assist only with debts valued at less than the jurisdictional limits set by the District Court (usually $100,000) LLTs may render legal services for debt collection only when there is a direct relationship with the original creditor and may not act as or render legal services for collection agencies or debt buyers as defined under RCW 19.16. No prejudgment attachments No executions on judgments

Identity Theft	Proposed Permitted Actions: Advise regarding identity theft Best practices for protecting information Contacting credit bureaus Reporting to law enforcement and other agencies such as Federal Trade Commission
Wage complaints and Defenses	Proposed Permitted Actions: Representation in negotiations or hearings with Labor and Industries Accompany and assist in court Advice and reporting regarding Minimum Wage Act Advice and reporting regarding Fair Labor Standards Act Actions permitted under RCW 49.48 (Wages-Payment-Collection) Actions permitted under RCW 49.52 (Wages-Deductions-Contributions-Rebates) Proposed Limitations: LLLTs may not represent clients in wage claims which exceed the jurisdictional limit set by the District Court ($100,000)
Loan Modification & Foreclosure Defense and Assistance	Proposed Permitted Actions: Accompany and advise in mandatory mediation process Assist with non-judicial foreclosure actions and defenses under RCW 61.24.040 Advise regarding power of sale clauses and the Notice of Sale Right of Redemption Proposed Limitations: LLLTs would be prohibited from assisting with non-judicial foreclosures if the LLLT does not meet the requirements of RCW 61.24.010. No judicial foreclosures
Protection Orders	Proposed Actions: Selecting and completing pleadings for Protection Orders for domestic violence, stalking, sexual assault, extreme risk, adult protection, harassment, and no contact orders in criminal cases
Bankruptcy Awareness and Advice	Proposed Actions: Explain the options, alternatives, and procedures as well as advantages and disadvantages Refer to budget & counseling agency Refer to bankruptcy attorney Proposed Limitation: No assistance with bankruptcy filing in court

The LLLT Board will coordinate with the Washington law schools in the development of the practice area curriculum and ensure that appropriate faculty is available to teach the curriculum. The LLLT Board may modify the proposed practice area based on:

1. consideration of public comments;
2. issues discovered during the drafting of new practice area regulations; and
3. issues that arise during the law schools' development of the practice area curriculum.

Please provide comments to the LLLT Board via email to LLL@wsba.org by July 16, 2018.

Jaimie Patneau

From: Damian Mendez <mendezlaw@gmail.com>
Sent: Tuesday, August 07, 2018 7:54 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Comment on proposed LLT practice area of wage Complaints and Defenses

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Dear LLT Board,

On July's issue of NW Lawyer I was surprised to find out that the LLLT Board is planning to create a practice area for Licensed Technicians to practice in the area of wage complaints. My understanding is that the Board was identifying areas of the law where people were underserved because attorneys did not take those cases. The area of wage claims, especially wage claims with values of less than $100,000, is an area in which I have for years routinely represented people that were not paid what they were owed. Many times I have represented several employees at the same time. The cases are hard fought and I have taken them all the way to jury trial. I know several attorneys that practice in this area and with cases that fall in the $100,000 range. Wage claims are a complex area of the law that involves strategies that need an attorney to also have knowledge of other areas of the law to ensure that his/her clients are paid.

Many of these cases that appear to have small value are also litigated as class actions. I know of many attorneys that also practice in that area.

I don't believe that many of the WSBA member that practice in this area are aware of the proposal. I myself only found out by chance while browsing NW lawyer. I oppose the creating of an LLLT in that area and would like to have the opportunity to give a live presentation to the Board and perhaps talk to other attorneys that share my opinion. If the WSBA has identified a large underserved population perhaps is a matter of advising people that there are attorneys that can represent people with small wage cases, not to create a situation where technicians, without in depth knowledge of collateral areas of the law, are practicing at a substandard level and competing with WSBA members. Furthermore, I was for years part of the King Count Bar referral service and I never received referrals for small wage cases. I would like to see what specific wage cases were identified as being part of an underserved area of the law.

Please let me know about how I can attend a meeting of the board that I can expand on my view of the proposal.

Thank you.

--

Damian Mendez
Attorney
Mendez Law Group, PLLC
PLEASE NOTE NEW ADDRESS:**
811 1st Ave. Suite 340

Seattle, WA 98104

Phone (206)290-5148 Fax (206)260-9010

damianmendezlaw.com

dmendezlaw.com

Jaimie Patneau

From: Jonathan Baner <jonathan@banerbaner.com>
Sent: Tuesday, August 14, 2018 2:20 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Expanded practice area LLT for consumer/debt law

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

I note that there is an ongoing discussion.

About me:

I represent hundreds of consumer debtors at a firm I am of-counsel with. Mostly we look for errors from creditor counsel and try to settle the debts. Lots of client counseling. On the other side of it I represent individual and corporate creditors in collection matters including post-judgment enforcement. Routinely other attorneys hire me to assist in judgment enforcement.

My concern about LLT for or against collection is the FDCPA, FCRA, Bankruptcy, and state collection law all interact in not at all clear ways. Many an LLT can find themselves subject to FDCPA as collectors. That's some training that LLT should need.

As far as state collection go in the form of garnishment: it isn't complicated. I don't know that attorneys are charging high rates for doing them as it isn't really complicated and the statute provides for award of $300 in attorney fees (thus I think most of us just charge $300 flat). A garnishment often leads to motion to vacate when a default judgment is involved (and it frequently is). Such a motion will come up quickly, so my only real concern would be that a LLT might end up having a client trusting them to handle interest or defenses when they probably cannot do so.

I believe there is some discussion about LLT handling BK advice. This is just a no-go. This is federal law of immense complexity with more pitfalls than coherent paths.

--

Jonathan Baner
Baner and Baner Law Firm
724 S. Yakima Ave.
Tacoma, WA 98405

Ph. (253) 212-0353
www.BanerBaner.com

Jaimie Patneau

From: Vanessa Zink <vanessa.zink@gmail.com>
Sent: Tuesday, August 14, 2018 3:23 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: LLLT Practice Areas for Consumer, Money & Debt law

I fully support the Creditor/Debtor Section Executive Committee's response and proposal regarding proposed expanded practice areas for LLT's in the area of Consumer, Money & Debt Law. In particular, I feel that any areas that touch on federal law would be sorely under-represented by an LLT potentially leaving the most vulnerable clients unprotected/facing unforeseen liabilities. Personally I believe allowing such representation by LLT's would be grossly negligent and far from the best interest of the consumer.

Vanessa Zink
Attorney at Law

Zink Law Offices, PLLC
(509) 464-2884

Jaimie Patneau

From: Barry Meyers <barry@elderlaw-nw.com>
Sent: Thursday, August 09, 2018 12:42 PM
To: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Proposed Consumer, Money and Debt Law LLLT Practice Area

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

My comments are directed to adult protection orders under the Proposed Actions for Protection Orders of this proposal.

First, you need to distinguish who is the petitioner: the victim or an interested third party. Will an LLLT represent either? Do Court Facilitators already offer some assistance with these orders?

I have participated in numerous contested adult protection order matters under RCW 74.34 and other sections of the code. Most of these are initiated by interested third parties. Many of these matters require numerous court hearings, gathering of evidence, calling lay or professional witnesses and examining them (or cross examining witnesses) before a judge or commissioner, and, crafting orders or relief (to name a few) that require expertise that an LLLT may not have.

I would be very careful in allowing LLLTs to undertake such representation. Good intentions may result in bad outcomes.

Barry M. Meyers, CELA
Elder Law Offices of Barry M. Meyers, P.S.
Certified since 2003 as an Elder Law Attorney
by the National Elder Law Foundation
2828 Northwest Avenue
Bellingham, WA 98225
Tel: 360-647-8846
Fax: 360-647-8854
barry@elderlaw-nw.com

2006 to 2017 SuperLawyer

Rated "Superb" by avvo.com

Accredited by the Veterans Administration

CONFIDENTIAL AND/OR PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION

This communication may contain information that is confidential and/or protected by attorney-client privilege. It was intended only for the named recipient. If you have received this communication in error, please delete it immediately and contact the sender to advise them of improper delivery. Thank you.

TAX ADVICE DISCLOSURE

To ensure compliance with requirements imposed by the IRS under Circular 230, we inform you that any U.S. federal tax advice contained in this communication (including any attachments), unless otherwise specifically stated, was not intended or written to be used, and cannot be used, for the purpose of (1) avoiding penalties under the Internal Revenue Code or (2) promoting, marketing or recommending to another party any matters addressed herein.

SERVICE

We do not accept service of any kind by e-mail unless expressly authorized in writing by the attorney of record. Acceptance of service of process by e-mail for one pleading does not authorize service of process by e-mail of any other pleading. Each must be authorized separately.

Jaimie Patneau

From: Edgar Hall <edgar@wadebtlaw.com>
Sent: Tuesday, August 14, 2018 9:20 AM
To: Creditor Debtor Section
Cc: Limited License Legal Technician
Subject: Request for comments on new LLLT practice area for Consumer, Money, & Debt Law

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Listmates,

If you have an opportunity, please submit any comments (for or against) regarding this new LLLT practice area for Consumer, Money, and Debt Law. The email for comments is:

llt@wsba.org

There are numerous areas that are state law specific, low chance for serious malpractice, and low levels of controversy that (in my opinion) absolutely make sense as proposed. I sincerely hope that if this practice area is approved, that Washington residents can get help in these areas as it is desperately needed.

- Assistance on LFO's (particularly reduction of interest)
- Small Claims
- Garnishment
- ID Theft
- Protection Orders

There are, though, numerous areas so integrated with federal law or so tightly intertwined as a mix of state and federal law, that I do not believe the LLLT program limitations can provide for the proper advice and representation of Washington citizens. This includes:

- Bankruptcy Awareness & Advice (How can you advise about something you cannot advise about? The best here is a handout without analysis, this is dangerous at best)
- Debt Collection Defense (could not advise on federal claims like FDCPA, FCRA, TCPA, etc, bankruptcy options, etc)
- Foreclosure Defense (an area ripe with federal issues, securitization issues, FDCPA, bankruptcy, etc).
- Loan Modifications (same as foreclosure)
- Student Loans (could not advise on bankruptcy options, hardship discharge options, issues under the Higher Education Act, FDCPA actions, FCRA actions, servicing violation, securitization issues, etc)
- Wage Complaints (I lack the knowledge of this area personally, but I am fairly certain a good amount of federal claims are involved potentially)

As a debt defense attorney (and I mean more than bankruptcy but actually filing RCW 19.16, FDCPA, and other claims), I know debt defense is far more than state law allows and if properly done is an amalgam of knowing bankruptcy options, threat of federal and state litigation, using those threats as leverage in a settlement, and knowledge of other options.

My issue is the LLLT program and WA state have the right to authorize whoever they want to practice state law. But the inability to practice federal law is near fatal and given the nature of compulsory counterclaims, tight statutes of limitation windows on most federal claims, and the sheer amount on the line of the value of houses or large debts, it is an almost impermissibly high risk of malpractice. I am concerned that the solution may cause more harm than good.

There are other ways to assist.

- Require debt collectors to prove up their debt much like eviction show cause hearings do that you have a prima facie case. Just saying John Doe owes $5k is at the absolute outer boundary of notice pleading. I cannot count the number of clients who call to make sure the complaint is real and not a scam.
- Enhanced service of process requirements on debt collection or statutory penalties for sewer service and higher bond for process servers. About 80% of my clients claim to have not been served. I frequently see ancient addresses from date of application rather than a realistic address derived from a proper skip trace being used. The problem typically is a combo of sewer service and the difficulty/expense of vacating a default judgment. Throwing a horde of LLLT's doesn't solve the problem, it just grinds the sausage meat even faster.
- More pro bono dollars and programs, like NWJP or NWCLC, neighborhood legal clinics, etc.

I know as a former creditor attorney, I would be salivating that this would pass as two thirds of the defenses I would fear most (FDCPA claims and bankruptcy discharge) would be off the table and outside of the toolbox for advice or representation of a LLLT opposing.

In any case, you don't have to agree with me and feel free to tell me off if you don't. Just get the WSBA your comments so hopefully concerns (or praise) are heard from those who actually practice in this area. I have a sense that in an echo chamber, this new practice area seems fantastic. In reality, I do not believe that some aspects of this can be pulled off without the ability to advise on federal law or practice in federal courts. This does not even address malpractice concerns for LLLT's operating in this area.

-Edgar

Edgar I. Hall, Attorney
Washington Debt Law, PLLC
2611 NE 113th St Suite 300A
Seattle, WA 98125
Phone: (206) 535-2559
Fax: (206) 374-2749
www.wadebtlaw.com

NANCY HAWKINS
ATTORNEY AT LAW

6814 GREENWOOD AVE. N.
SEATTLE WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
FAX (206) 781-7014

July 16, 2018

Cindy Phillips
Judicial Administrative Assistant to
Chief Justice Mary E. Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court

Re: LLLT Expansion Proposal

Dear Ms. Phillips:

Please provide this letter to the Justices of the Washington Supreme Court for their consideration.

At the time that I started to be active in the Family Law section and started attending meetings of the WSBA Board of Governors, the Family Law section's opposition to the LLLT program was well-known. Detailed comments had been submitted by individuals and the section executive committee for several years. Nonetheless, I approached the subject with an open mind. I write today as an individual member and not as a representative of the Family Law Section. It is a continuing concern that issues are raised without adequate time for Section Executive Committee's to discuss and formulate detailed responses. This letter has not been reviewed nor approved by the Family Law section; I speak only for myself.

I comment today against the proposed expansion of the LLLT program into debt issues or any other subject area. The presently considered expansion seems truly ill-advised. As another attorney stated in a listserv email recently "the fact that many lawyers don't know how to do this stuff and/or do it badly is not an argument that other people who don't have a law school education should be taught it so they can represent people." Another said with regard to the LLLT program, "the cost was incredibly high for the number of people who are licensed, and I can't believe that anyone would want to replicate that result with other disciplines...FDCPA stuff is so insanely complicated that very few lawyers really understand it..."

While there are consumer and/or debt issues that the low income public struggles with, the LLLT program that is being considered is clearly headed for failure. The LLLT Board itself said that "it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems ... and whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer." The LLLT Board also reported that significant advice already exists through the Northwest Justice Project site washingtonlawhelp.org. Yet the recommendation continued to be pushed forward.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs be able to assist with RCW 10.82 Motions re Interest in LFOs. These apply to convicts trying to integrate into society. I didn't see that the LLLT Board provided any number of the people seeking help in this matter. There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with small claims court matters. There are numerous websites and materials available to help pro se parties with these small claims. Certainly paying a LLLT is not a likely priority when a person is trying to get someone to pay them $500 that is owed. The recommendation is that LLLTs can help with debt collection not involving collection agencies. In fact, in this day and age, most collection actions involve collection agencies. There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with garnishments. Very few consumers initiate garnishment actions and there are limits on reimbursable "legal" fees. There are rarely court hearings. Packets of forms and instructions are generally available in every county and are also part of the legal forms available through the Administrator of the Courts. The recommendation regarding identity theft is also ill-advised. This information is available through the Attorney General's office at no cost. The recommendation regarding loan modifications is also somewhat laughable. These programs are very complicated and there are attorneys that specialize in it. These loan modifications are rarely granted and adding LLLTs to the mix will not improve that. LLLTs are not needed with regard to protection orders since each county is required to have people at the courthouse to help provide forms. It is not explained how they would help get no contact orders in criminal cases; this is routinely done by prosecutors at initial criminal hearings. LLLTs cannot provide meaningful help in bankruptcy issues since federal laws govern the debt counseling that consumers must obtain. The program is simply designed for failure; hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent and any LLLT eventually trained will have few clients, if any, able to pay his/her fees.

The LLLT program is not being forthright with the WSBA membership and, perhaps, the Washington Supreme Court. The program seems to be exploring expansion into numerous fields and, is now doing so without any meaningful oversight. I have reviewed the LLLT Board meeting minutes, as much as are available. This can be difficult since I have sometimes had to prompt staff to get the minutes online. Of course, I do not know if the LLLT board is not providing their minutes to the staff on a timely basis. Most recently, the LLLT Board cancelled its April and June 2018 meetings so no minutes are available. The May 2018 draft minutes are not available either. See attached email of July 9, 2018 from Renata Garcia.

The minutes of the New Practice Area sub-committee which explores subject expansion used to be on-line. That is no longer the case. In fact, I was informed this morning that I would have to submit a public records request to get them. See the attached email of July 16, 2018 from Margaret Shane.

My review of LLLT board minutes and the New Practice Area Committee have been revealing and startling, particularly with regard to a previously planned expansion into immigration law. The April 2018 minutes state that the LLLT program is expanding into immigration law and that they had already contacted Governor Inslee to get his support for legislation to try and “preempt” the federal law to allow local LLLTs to practice in the immigration field. This action by the LLLT program seems to have been done without the permission of the Washington Supreme Court or the WSBA Board of Governors. This attempted expansion is ill-advised and should not be encouraged or permitted. The Washington State Immigration Services page on the Attorney General website calls immigration law “one of the most complicated areas in the legal field.” ... [and] specialized training” is required...[and] the lawyer/expert must be “authorized under federal law to provide immigration services.” While it seems that this attempted expansion has been dropped, the LLLT board seemed to have acted improperly by going to the Washington State Governor without the support of the BOG or the Supreme Court.

I also ask the Washington Supreme Court to demand some answers from the LLLT board. Such answers should be in writing and made available to WSBA members. How many LLLTs are presently in practice and whom are they representing? What are they charging? While their fees may not be controlled under anti-trust considerations, the fees can certainly be used to determine whether this program is meeting the needs of low-income people. What is the goal of the LLLT program?

I am concerned that the LLLT program seems to be operating without true and objective oversight or administration. The meeting with the Governor’s office involving the Executive Director, Paula Littlewood, is a prime example. It is troubling that this action was not disclosed in her monthly activity reports. She apparently had two BOG members with her but this action was not reported in their monthly activity reports provided to the BOG and the membership. The Executive Director report of January 12, 2018 makes no mention of LLLT issues at all. Steve Crossland’s report to the Board of Governors of January 4, 2018 discusses proposed expansion of the LLLT Family Law work and needed amendments to APR 28 and RPCs but no mention of immigration or consumer debt expansion.

How was it acceptable for these people to go to the Governor to lobby for changes in the law? Sections are not allowed to make any public statements without approval of the WSBA yet a meeting was apparently conducted with the Governor of this state without any such prior approval. Making public statements on the LLLT program and potential expansion without any report of the meeting to the BOG means that the BOG and the membership is being denied information that it should have.

I have another concern about the LLLT program and its administration. The program is marketed enthusiastically by Paula Littlewood and Steve Crossland. It is an open secret that they are involved in a personal relationship. This is a delicate issue that seems to be ignored. I do not easily raise this issue; it should be personal and private. But, it cannot be ignored in this circumstance. I do not see how the program can be administered by the WSBA appropriately under those circumstances. Paula and Steve travel to various other states and countries together “wearing WSBA hats” to talk up the LLLT program concept. I am concerned about the direct and indirect costs of their joint travel to various locales, including Hawaii and Canada. I am concerned about the appearance to the membership. It would certainly seem that the WSBA and the WSC are leaving themselves open to public criticism.

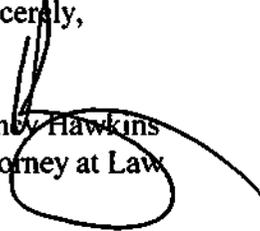

The lack of independent and objective analysis and administration by Littlewood is also clear if the WSBA website is reviewed. The website lauds the LLLT program as a way to practice law without going to law school. It is excited and enthusiastic about the program. Contrast this with the website with regard to lawyers. There is no reference to the long and distinguished role of lawyers in civil rights, or in helping people access the justice system. There is instead a dry description of the costs and burdens of becoming an attorney (fees, testing, etc.) The legal directory now lists LLLTs and lawyers in the same directory. Not only are the lines being blurred, the preference for LLLTs by the Executive Director is obvious.

It also seems that the LLLT program is described by Crossland and Littlewood in their various travels as a “success.” This seems to be an inaccurate description of the program. After years of funding, the program continues to operate at a substantial loss and has very few people working in the field. There is no proof that the program is truly meeting the needs of low-income people and, in fact, the anecdotal information conveyed at meetings is that LLLTs are charging significant rates for their work, generally comparable to attorneys. The Washington Supreme Court should require that Crossland and Littlewood provide transcripts of any speeches and copies of any written materials that either has provided with regard to the LLLT program. Their representations must be accurate and complete so that the reputation of this state bar association and the Washington Supreme Court is not harmed.

Washington Supreme Court
LLLT Expansion Program
July 16, 2018
Page 5

I think it is time for the Washington Supreme Court to take another good hard look at the LLLT program and its purpose and structure. It is time for a plan for reasonable administration. It is also time for the Washington Supreme Court to demand that the WSBA administration enthusiastically support and applaud the work of lawyers.

Sincerely,

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law

cc. LLLT Board

Nancy Hawkins

From: Margaret Shane <Margarets@wsba.org>
Sent: Monday, July 16, 2018 11:10 AM
To: Nancy Hawkins
Subject: RE: LLLT New Practice Area Committee minutes

Hi Nancy –

Since minutes for LLLT committee and work group meetings are not posted on the website, it has been determined that the information you are looking for needs to be obtained through a Public Records Request. To request Bar records, please send your request to WSBA's public records officer at PublicRecords@wsba.org. Under Washington General Rule 12.4(e)(1), requests must be made in writing to WSBA's public records officer, and may not be made to other Bar staff.

Best,
Margaret

Margaret Shane | Executive Assistant

Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8244 | fax 206-727.8316 | margarets@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact karar@wsba.org.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 13, 2018 2:10 PM
To: Margaret Shane
Subject: LLLT New Practice Area Committee minutes

These used to be on the website. Are they somewhere else now?

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

Nancy Hawkins

From: Renata Garcia <renatag@wsba.org>
Sent: Monday, July 09, 2018 2:55 PM
To: Margaret Shane; Nancy Hawkins
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

Hi Nancy –

The LLLT Board April meeting was cancelled. The June meeting was also cancelled which means that the May meeting minutes have not yet been approved.

The meeting materials are posted on the website. Here is one way to access them:

1. <https://www.wsba.org/Legal-Community/Committees-Boards-and-Other-Groups/LLLT-board>
2. Click on WSBA Event Calendar

Meeting Materials

NB: Starting October 2017 meeting materials are linked to the meeting event item in the WSBA Event Calendar. This static list will not be updated.

January 2017
February 2017
March 2017

3. Select Limited License Legal Technician Board

HOME | EVENTS CALENDAR

Updated: June 9, 2018

Enter Email

Today	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30	31	Agenda
Sunday	Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday

4. Select the month and click on the event
5. Click on the link under "Agenda"

Add to:

- Outlook
- iCal
- Google Calendar

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board

Agenda:

LLLT Board Meeting Materials - March 2018

Let me know if you have any other questions.

Thank you,
Renata

Renata de Carvalho Garcia | Innovative Licensing Programs Manager
Washington State Bar Association | 206.733.5912 | renatag@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact barbarao@wsba.org.

From: Margaret Shane
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 1:49 PM
To: Nancy Hawkins
Cc: Renata Garcia
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

Hi Nancy –

Renata Garcia is the person to contact for LLLT matters, but she is out of the office today. I have copied her on this email so she can contact you when she returns to the office next week.

Please let me know if you need anything further at this time.

Best,
Margaret

Margaret Shane | Executive Assistant
Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8244 | fax 206-727.8316 | margarets@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact karar@wsba.org.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 10:32 AM
To: Margaret Shane
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

I also don't see any board meeting materials for the past year or so on the website.

Nancy

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 10:30 AM
To: 'Margaret Shane'
Subject: LLLT Board minutes

Do you have minutes for their April, May and June board meetings?
Nancy

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

NANCY HAWKINS
ATTORNEY AT LAW

6814 GREENWOOD AVE. N.
SEATTLE WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
FAX (206) 781-7014

September 14, 2018

Cindy Phillips
Judicial Administrative Assistant to
Chief Justice Mary E. Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court

Re: LLLT Expansion Proposal

Dear Ms. Phillips:

Please provide this letter to the Justices of the Washington Supreme Court for their consideration.

I am a 36 year member of the Washington State Bar Association. I am a proud family law attorney. I practice law in Seattle, Washington, and am a sole practitioner. Almost all of my practice is family law.

I graduated from the University of Puget Sound Law School in 1981 and was admitted to the Washington State Bar in 1982. I am also admitted to practice in the Federal courts in the State of Washington. In addition to being a member of the family law sections of the Washington State Bar Association and the King County Bar Association, I am a former chair of the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section's Legislative Committee and a former chair of the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section. I have spoken at numerous continuing legal education seminars on the subject of family law. I am a chapter author for the Washington State Bar Association's Family Law Deskbook. I have received awards for my work from the Greater Seattle Business Association as well as the King County Bar Association Access to Justice Award, and the WSBA Family Law Section Attorney of the Year award for 2017. I coordinate a neighborhood family law clinic in King County and have performed hundreds of hours of pro bono work.

Over the past two years, I have studied the LLLT situation and I write today after learning more disturbing information about the program. I urge the Washington Supreme Court to reject any expansion of the program in Consumer, Money and Debt Law, reject any expansion of the Family Law Program and, instead, examine this entire program in detail and determine its future.

Program training.

The training provided to prospective LLLTs is clearly inadequate since, according to information provided at the July WSBA Board of Governors meeting, more than 50% of the persons taking the test fail. No information was given as to the results of those who passed. It would be appropriate to know how many barely pass, solidly pass or sail through with flying colors. It appears that the training is not being improved but, instead, the qualifications of the trainers is being reduced down. There is no indication that the LLLT Board is concerned in any way about the low passage rate and the apparent inadequacy of the training provided to date.

With such a poor passage rate, it is inconceivable to me that it would be appropriate that there would be an increase in the curriculum/program in the areas of family law to be taught. As has been demonstrated by prior submissions from the Family Law Section, family law is an extremely complex area covering a broad gamut of legal issues. Adding subjects is far more likely to further reduce the passage rate. This seems grossly ill-advised at this time.

There has been no objective determination that the LLLT program is a success in family law. After years of efforts and hundreds of thousands of dollars, there are a minimal number of independently practicing LLLTs. There has been no determination of the number of low income people actually helped by the program. In fact, it seems that most of the LLLTs work as paralegals just as they were doing prior to any certification or licensing at a LLLT. With the poor passage rate and the lack of success of the LLLT program with regard to family law, it seems further ill-advised to add any new subject area or any expansion of the existing subject area. Without objective analysis and determination of the flaws in the curriculum design, teaching methods and training overall in the family law program, the flaws are likely to be repeated in a new or expanded subject area. Expansion into a new subject area is premature, at best.

The choice of Consumer, Money and Debt Law for expansion is particularly ill-advised.

Expansion into Consumer, Money and Debt Law.

I comment again against the proposed expansion of the LLLT program into debt issues or any other subject area. The presently considered expansion seems truly inappropriate. As another attorney stated in a list serve email recently “the fact that many lawyers don’t know how to do this stuff and/or do it badly is not an argument that other people who don’t have a law school education should be taught it so they can represent people.” Another said with regard to the LLLT program, “the cost was incredibly high for the number of people who are licensed, and I can’t believe that anyone would want to replicate that result with other disciplines...FDCPA stuff is so insanely complicated that very few lawyers really understand it....”

While there are certainly consumer and/or debt issues that the low income public struggles with, the LLLT program that is being considered is clearly knowingly headed for failure. The LLLT Board itself said that “it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems ... and whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer.” The LLLT Board also reported that significant advice already exists through the Northwest Justice Project site washingtonlawhelp.org. Yet the expansion recommendation continued to be pushed forward.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs be able to assist with RCW 10.82 Motions re Interest in LFOs. These motions apply to convicts trying to integrate into society. I didn't see that the LLLT Board provided any number of the people actually seeking help in this matter. In my 36 years of practice, including work with convicted criminals, no one has ever sought help with this kind of matter. I wouldn't think that this is a population with the funds to hire a LLLT.

There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with small claims court matters. There are numerous websites and materials available to help pro se parties with these small claims. Certainly paying a LLLT is not a likely priority when a person is trying to get someone to pay them $500.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs can help with debt collection not involving collection agencies. In fact, in this day and age, most collection actions involve collection agencies. If they don't initially, they surely will shortly.

There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with garnishments. Very few consumers initiate garnishment actions and there are limits on reimbursable "legal" fees. Packets of forms and instructions are generally available in every county and are also part of the legal forms available through the Administrator of the Courts.

The recommendation regarding identity theft is also ill-advised. This information is available through the Attorney General's office at no cost.

The recommendation regarding loan modifications is also somewhat laughable. These programs are very complicated and there are attorneys that specialize in it. These loan modifications are rarely granted and adding LLLTs to the mix will not improve that.

LLLTs are not needed with regard to protection orders since each county is required to have people at the courthouse to help provide forms. It is not explained how LLLTs would help get no contact orders in criminal cases; this is routinely done by prosecutors at initial criminal hearings.

LLLTs cannot provide meaningful help in bankruptcy issues since federal laws govern the debt counseling that consumers must obtain.

This proposed expansion of the LLLT program is simply designed for failure. If it is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent by the WSBA and any LLLT eventually trained and licenses will have few clients, if any, able to pay his/her fees.

LLLT family law program costs.

The Washington Supreme Court mandated the existing LLLT program and required the Washington State Bar Association to pay its costs. But, the Court also anticipated that the program would be self-sufficient in a reasonable period of time. In fact, the Court required that it do so in its Order: "[t]he Court is confident that the WSBA and the Practice of Law Board, in consultation with this Court, will be able to develop a fee-based system that ensures that the licensing and ongoing regulation of limited license legal technicians will be cost-neutral to the WSBA and its membership." June 15, 2012 Order by the Washington Supreme Court, page 11. Despite the Court's good intentions, this confidence has not been borne out.

At this point, it is six years since that order by the Court. Not only is the program not self-sufficient, it is operating at a greater loss year after year. In 2017, the program sustained a loss of $189,508.00. It was budgeted to lose $262,022 in 2018. The draft budget for 2019 projects a loss of $240,000 but this figure is misleading in that it does not reflect the total cost of the program. It is my understanding that many of the costs for the program are now included in other portions of the WSBA budget so this $240,000 appears to be artificially lowered. See page 48 of the materials for the July 2018 BOG meeting, attached hereto. I am making a request for the data necessary to determine the cost of those other line items not included in the $240,000 (see the footnote to that same page 48). It is concerning to note that the LLLT Board claimed that its expenses, direct and indirect, for 2018 were $17,000 and $92,636 (see page 433 of the materials for the July 2018 BOG meeting, attached hereto.) These significant costs seem to be in addition to the $240,000. Additional data for those expenses has also been requested.

Time for a limit.

The lawyers of Washington State pay a significant sum in license fees. Many object to the amount of fees. Many sought to hold a referendum on the amount of fees but were not allowed to do so when the Court issued an order that the fee increase that had been imposed was "reasonable." Unhappiness with the fee increase and the inability to register an opinion with the referendum still resonates with many. This is made more concerning to many when the fees paid are used to pay for unpopular and unsuccessful programs such as the LLLT program. The BOG seems to feel that they are powerless to control costs in this program since the Court has mandated the program. But, the Court did not mandate a program that would be funded at the present extent by the lawyers of the WSBA or that the program would operate at such a loss. At this point, it seems this annual substantial financial loss seems to be permanent. This concern is not abated by the July 2018 fee development. As the Court likely knows, at its July 2018 meeting, the Board of Governors recommended that the LLLT license fees be increased to that of lawyers. That increase, even if approved by the Washington Supreme Court, would not make the present program self-sufficient. There would need to be over 500 LLLTs to even come close to paying for the program for one year. There is no realistic expectation that this will ever happen, let alone happen before another $2,000,000-$3,000,000 in WSBA losses occur.

The LLLT program simply shows no promise whatsoever that it will EVER be self-sufficient. Its budgeted costs are approximately 35% higher for 2019 than for 2018. This cannot be sustained for even another year or two without hurting other more successful WSBA programs, a further increase in fees or staff reductions. Yet the LLLT Board and the Executive Director do not seem to be concerned about this in any way.

In the June 15, 2012 order which established the program, it was clear that the program was not necessarily permanent but that it would be "a sound opportunity to determine whether and, if so, to what degree the involvement of effectively trained, licensed and regulated non-attorneys may help expand access to necessary legal help in what that serve the justice system and protect the public. June 15, 2012 Order by the Washington Supreme Court, page 11-12. That objective analysis has never been done.

Time for a program assessment.

The LLLT program was designed to meeting the needs of low income Washingtonians. The program has provided no substantive analysis demonstrating that this goal has been met. The hourly rate charged by LLLTs is, quite simply, beyond the ability of low income people. The rates are also beyond the ability of almost all moderate income people.

After over five years of work, there are only 38 active LLLTs. I have reviewed the information available via the internet and/or the WSBA website. Most work in law firms and it is reasonable to assume that their work is little changed from that of an employed paralegal. It is likely that each of those LLLTs are being billed out at a significant rate. My review concludes that about half or less of the LLLTs are independently employed.

The needed type of assessment of the LLLT program must be done objectively. It is not reasonable to expect the Executive Director or staff under her control to conduct this objective analysis since, in fact, they have not done so. In the past several years, there have been no flags raised over the low number of active LLLTs given the funds spent and the hours of work, no flags raised over the increasing cost of the program, no flags raised over the dismal passage rate, etc. If the LLLT Board or the Executive Director have not done so by now, and given the conflict of interest posed by the personal relationship between the LLLT Board President and the WSBA Executive Director, the Court must provide a mechanism for this kind of objective analysis. Frankly, I believe that the available information should be sufficient to determine that the program is an utter failure already without any further analysis.

Lack of transparency.

I am also concerned about the large gaps in transparency about this program. The April, June, July and September 2018 LLLT Board meetings were cancelled. Without minutes from meetings, it is not possible to review the work of that Board during that time. The meetings of the sub-committee that considers new subject areas used to be announced on the WSBA website with minutes available for review but are not any longer. My request for the minutes of the sub-committee working on new subject areas was denied. I was told I needed to make a public records request. This lack of transparency is quite troubling, particularly given the funds being expended and the demonstrably poor decision-making by the Board and the Sub-Committee from my perspective (and that of many others).

My review of the materials for the August LLLT Board meeting were troubling. The Board supposedly was given all of the comments about the program expansion but, upon review, my own prior comments were not included in the material provided. I don't know how many comments from others were withheld from the Board. The Board also commented about a letter favorable to the expansion and suggested that the author be invited to a meeting to elaborate. There seems to be little concern that the majority of responses were negative to the expansion idea.

It was also disturbing to see that the LLLT Board seems to be planning on offering scholarships to LLLTs. With a program operating hundreds of thousands of dollars in the red, even consideration of a program scholarship is inappropriate.

My review of the available LLLT board minutes and the New Practice Area Committee raise more concerns, particularly with regard to a previously planned expansion into immigration law. The April 2018 minutes state that the LLLT program is expanding into immigration law and that they had already contacted Governor Inslee to get his support for legislation to try and, in effect, "preempt" the federal law to allow local LLLTs to practice in the immigration field. This action by the LLLT program seems to have been done without the permission of the Washington Supreme Court or the WSBA Board of Governors. That attempted expansion was also ill-advised and should not be encouraged or permitted. The Washington State Immigration Services page on the Attorney General website calls immigration law "one of the most complicated areas in the legal field." ... [and] specialized training" is required...[and] the lawyer/expert must be "authorized under federal law to provide immigration services." While it seems that this attempted expansion is not presently being pursued, the LLLT board seemed to have acted improperly by going to the Washington State Governor without the support of the BOG or the Supreme Court.

The Washington Supreme Court should demand some answers from the LLLT board and the Executive Director. Such answers should be in writing and made available to WSBA members. How many LLLTs are presently in practice and whom are they representing? What are they charging? While their fees may not be controlled under anti-trust considerations, the fees can certainly be analyzed to determine whether this program is meeting the needs of low-income or moderate means people. After all, this was the intent of the LLLT program. It is odd that the Executive Director and the LLLT Board are quick to say that they cannot/will not look at the fees charged by LLLTs while allowing LLLTs to advertise that they charge one-third of that of a lawyer. How do they make that assertion without a factual basis for it?

I am concerned that the LLLT program seems to be operating without true and objective oversight or administration. The meeting with the Governor's office involving the Executive Director, Paula Littlewood, is a prime example. It is troubling that this action was not disclosed in her monthly activity reports. She apparently had two BOG members with her but this action was not reported in their monthly activity reports either. The Executive Director report of January 12, 2018 makes no mention of LLLT issues at all. Steve Crossland's report to the Board of Governors of January 4, 2018 discusses proposed expansion of the LLLT Family Law work and needed amendments to APR 28 and RPCs but no mention of immigration or consumer debt expansion.

How was it acceptable for these people to go to the Governor to lobby for changes in the law? Sections are supposedly not allowed to make any public statements without approval of the WSBA yet a meeting was apparently conducted with the Governor of this state without any such prior approval. Making public statements on the LLLT program and potential expansion without any advance consideration of the BOG or a subsequent report of the meeting to the BOG means that the BOG and the membership is being denied information that it should have.

Promotion of the program as a success.

I am particularly concerned about the promotion of the LLLT program to other states as a success. This program has 35 people working in the field, only some of which work independently. The others work in law firms and it seems that their work is that of a normal paralegal.

This program has cost the WSBA over $1,000,000 since its inception. It operates at a considerable loss and that loss is increasing each year. This is not a success. The program should not be "sold" to other states as a success. Doing so will only serve to lower our standing with those states when they, too, suffer such losses and failures. It is distressing that our funds are being spent by Paula Underwood and Steve Crossland to visit various other states and countries "wearing WSBA hats" to talk up the LLLT program concept. I am concerned about the direct and indirect costs of their joint travel to various locales, including Hawaii and Canada. While I have been told that their "travel costs" are not paid by the WSBA, I do not know the status of their other costs. But, even if the costs are out of the picture, I am concerned about the appearance to the membership of this joint travel. It would certainly seem that the WSBA and the Washington Supreme Court are leaving themselves open to public criticism.

WSBA approach to LLLT program.

The present Executive Director's unbalanced and unobjective support for the LLLT program compared with her tepid or non-existent support for actual lawyers is disturbingly clear

Washington Supreme Court
LLLT Expansion Program
September 14, 2018
Page 8

when the new website is examined. I am proud to be a lawyer. From my childhood spent reading and watching Perry Mason and other legal shows, I have always wanted to be a lawyer. This was solidified as I became an active feminist starting at age 16 or so and has continuing for the last 46 years. I followed and studied a civil rights movement that included landmark legal cases regarding education, public facilities, marriage (interracial and gay), sexuality, privacy and many others. None of that glorious history is reflected in the WSBA website, not even a reference to Thurgood Marshall, Ruth Bader Ginsburg or, even, our own William O. Douglas. Not a mention of any landmark cases which have resulted in improved lives for millions of Americans. In fact, the website page which describes becoming a lawyer is a dry recitation of the costs and burdens of being a lawyer.

By contrast, the website pages which describe becoming a LLLT is enthusiastic and glowing and makes broad promises about a career as a LLLT.

Conclusion.

I think it is time for the Washington Supreme Court to take another good hard look at the LLLT program and its purpose and structure. If it is to continue, it is time for reasonable and unbiased administration. It is also time for the Washington Supreme Court to demand that the WSBA administration enthusiastically support and applaud the work of lawyers.

If the Court agrees with my concerns, it is likely time to end this failed program. The 35 people that are presently licensed would likely just continue as well-paid paralegals.

Sincerely,

Nancy Hawkins, a proud lawyer.

cc. LLLT Board (with enclosures)

Washington State Bar Association
Budget Comparison Report
For the Period from October 1, 2018 to September 30, 2019

LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN	FISCAL 2018 BUDGET	FISCAL 2019 BUDGET	$ CHANGE IN BUDGET	% CHANGE IN BUDGET
REVENUE:
TOTAL REVENUE:	-	-	-
DIRECT EXPENSES:
LLT BOARD	17,000.00	17,000.00	-	0%
LLT OUTREACH	8,000.00	8,000.00	-
STAFF TRAVEL/PARKING	600.00	600.00	-	0%
TOTAL DIRECT EXPENSES:	25,600.00	25,600.00	-	0%
INDIRECT EXPENSES:
FTE	1.70	1.55	(0.15)	-9%
SALARY EXPENSE	142,602.00	135,526.00	(7,076.00)	-5%
BENEFIT EXPENSE	49,304.00	41,592.00	(7,712.00)	-16%
OVERHEAD	42,495.00	38,095.00	(4,400.00)	-10%
TOTAL INDIRECT EXPENSES:	234,401.00	215,213.00	(19,188.00)	-8%
TOTAL ALL EXPENSES:	260,001.00	240,813.00	(19,188.00)	-7%
NET INCOME (LOSS):	(260,001.00)	(240,813.00)	19,188.00

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) license type (APR 28), was created by the Supreme Court and delegated to WSBA in 2012. In the past, this cost center was used to track all revenues and expenses associated with the "LLLT Program". LLLTs are now WSBA members, and consistent with the WSBA Bylaws and the Washington Supreme Court Admission and Practice Rules, the administration and regulation of these member license types has been consolidated within existing work groups and cost centers that already perform these functions for lawyers, including Admissions, License and Membership Records, and MCLE (although it continues to be possible to determine these costs separately by member type if needed). For FY19, this cost center is used primarily to track staffing and expenses related to the LLLT Board, which by court rule oversees the license.

WSBA COMMITTEE/BOARD ANNUAL REPORT – FY18

Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board Chair: Steve Crossland Staff Liaison: Renata Garcia BOG Liaison: Dan Clark	Size of Committee: 15 Number of FY19 Applicants: 6 FY18 direct expenses: $17,000 FY18 indirect expenses: $92,636
FY18 Demographics: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Gender (Female: Male: Not Listed): 12:2:0 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified with a racial/ethnic under-represented group: 3 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified as having a disability: 2 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified as LGBT: 2 (0 did not answer)
Background & Purpose: The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board derives its authority from the Washington Supreme Court under Rule 28 of the Admission to Practice Rules (APR), adopted effective September 1, 2012. By order of the Court, the WSBA is to administer and fund the LLLT Board and the program. APR 28 authorizes persons who meet certain educational and licensing requirements to advise clients on specific areas of law. The only currently approved practice area is domestic relations. The Supreme Court established the LLLT Board to oversee the LLLT license.
Strategy to Fulfill Purpose: From 2013-2016, the LLLT Board concentrated on creating the operational details for the LLLT license; the LLLT Board is now focusing on the promotion, expansion, and development of the license.
2017-2018 Accomplishments and Work in Progress: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1) In February 2018, the LLLT Board submitted suggested amendments to APR 28, the LLLT RPC and the RPC for lawyers for consideration by the Washington Supreme Court. These amendments would enhance the scope of the current family law practice area. The Court recently published the suggested amendments for comment. Comments are due by no later than September 14, 2018. 2) The LLLT Board is currently circulating a new proposed practice area, Consumer, Money, and Debt, for comment before taking further action, i.e., developing curriculum requirements, seeking approval by the Court, etc. The LLLT Board hopes to engage as many subject matter experts as possible in the development of this and any future proposed practice areas.

- 3) The LLLT Board recently approved the University of Washington Continuum College Paralegal Studies Program to teach the LLLT core curriculum.
- 4) The LLLT Board has been engaging in discussions to explore ways in which LLLT students may qualify for financial aid.

2018-2019 Goals:

- 1) The LLLT Board will continue to consider and recommend new practice areas for approval by Supreme Court.
- 2) If the family law enhancements are approved by the Court, the LLLT Board will develop the required training for currently licensed LLLTs.
- 3) The LLLT Board also plans to expand the accessibility of the LLLT core curriculum across the state by continuing to approve core class programs at additional community colleges.
- 4) The LLLT Board will continue to engage in outreach efforts, including working with the WSBA communication team to expand outreach to a diverse pool of LLLT candidates, including college and high school students.
- 5) The LLLT Board also plans to advance its efforts to provide access to financial aid for students in the LLLT practice area classes.

Please report how this committee/board is addressing diversity:

1) Are you using any of the tools provided by WSBA and if so, how? 2) Have you sought out training or consultation from the Inclusion and Equity Specialist? 3) How have you elicited input from a variety of perspectives in your decision-making? 4) What have you done to promote a culture of inclusion within the board or committee? 5) What has your committee/board done to promote equitable conditions for members from historically underrepresented backgrounds to enter, stay, thrive, and eventually lead the profession? 6) Other?

- 1) The LLLT Board seeks members from different backgrounds and experiences who work together to foster a positive work environment in concert with WSBA's commitment to diversity and inclusion.
- 2) The LLLT Board will schedule training with WSBA's Inclusion and Equity Specialist.
- 3) The LLLT Board seeks input from all WSBA members as well as the legal community in general when making important decisions such as developing a new practice area.
- 4) APR 28 has been amended at the request of the LLLT Board to allow LLLTs and LPOs as well as attorneys with judicial and emeritus pro bono status to serve as Board members.
- 5) The core curriculum educational approval process reflects the LLLT Board's commitment to diversity in that it requires any institution offering the core curriculum to have diversity, inclusion, and equal access policies and practices in place. The LLLT Board also sought to increase diversity within the LLLT profession by extending the limited time waiver (see APR 28 Regulation 4) to 2023 in order to allow a group of candidates qualified by work experience rather than by education to enroll in the practice area classes. The ongoing effort to provide a pathway to financial aid for the practice area classes also aims to provide more opportunities to join the LLLT profession to prospective applicants from diverse socio-economic backgrounds.
- 6) N/A

Please report how this committee/board is addressing professionalism:

- 1) Does the committee/board's work promote respect and civility within the legal community?
- 2) Does it seek to improve relationships between and among lawyers, judges, staff and clients?
- 3) Does it raise awareness about the causes and/or consequences of unprofessional behavior?
- 4) Other?

- 1) The LLLT Board has set up rules of professional conduct and a disciplinary system for LLLTs, as well as requiring LLLTs to carry malpractice insurance and conform to the same rules as lawyers regarding IOLTA accounts.
- 2) The LLLT Board has worked to promote LLLTs in the legal community and educate all legal professionals about the permitted scope and models for LLLT practice, as well as highlighting the ways in which collaboration with LLLTs can contribute to the efficiency and accessibility of any legal practice.
- 3) N/A
- 4) N/A

Please report how this committee/board is integrating new and young lawyers into its work:

- 1) How have you brought new and young lawyers into your decision making process? 2) Has the committee/board supported new and young lawyers by (for example) helping to find and prepare them for employment, assisting with debt management, building community, and providing leadership opportunities? 3) Other?

- 1) All WSBA members are invited to provide comments on rules and new practice area suggestions and development, including new and young lawyers.
- 2) N/A
- 3) N/A

September 7, 2018

Supreme Court of the State of Washington
Temple of Justice
P.O. Box 40929
Olympia, WA 98504-0929

Transmitted via email

Re: Comment on Proposal Regarding Addition of Practice Area for Limited License Legal Technicians

Dear Justices of the Washington Supreme Court:

I am writing to support the addition of Consumer, Money & Debt as the next practice area available in the Limited License Legal Technician program. I am commenting in my personal capacity, not as a representative of my employer, LAW Advocates, the volunteer lawyer program for Whatcom County. However, my opinion is informed by my three years of experience as full-time executive director of that organization as well as my prior 24 years as a private practice civil lawyer in this community.

I am surprised to hear comments that sufficient resources already exist to assist individuals with legal difficulties involving finances. That is certainly not the case in our community. Although our county's population now exceeds 200,000, we have perhaps a half-dozen private attorneys in the county who handle consumer debt cases. And those practitioners' practices are geared mostly toward bankruptcy filings, where assets usually exist to support an attorney fee. Obviously, it is economically unfeasible for attorneys to take cases where clients have so few assets that attorney fees are out of the question. This leaves most of this work to someone other than experienced creditor/debtor attorneys.

A few for-profit and nonprofit organizations provide various levels of education and general advice on debt and credit issues, but they do not provide legal representation. Ours is the only organization in our county that provides that service. (Northwest Justice Project has an office in Bellingham, but it does virtually no creditor/debtor work other than occasionally as a supplemental service to an existing client.) But while we accept consumer debt cases, all we are able to do in most instances is refer the clients to one particular attorney who has agreed to take a limited number of such cases pro bono. We have been unable to find an attorney to provide a more comprehensive debt clinic as we have done at times in the past. Also, the cases we take must meet our financial qualifications, which restrict our services to those whose income is less than 200 percent of the federal poverty guideline. Individuals with income above that—who often are still low-income by any reasonable definition--have nowhere to turn for legal assistance. Sadly, if we see those individuals again it is usually after they have become entirely indigent and show up in our Homeless Disability or Street Law programs.

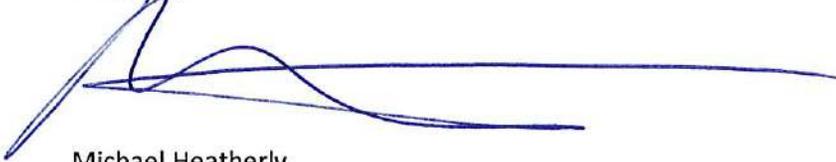

We have only one licensed LLLT in our community. Fortunately, she has provided considerable volunteer work for us. She regularly serves at our Street Law clinic, where she is able to answer family law questions within the authority of her license. She sometimes supplements the work of a family law attorney at the clinic and other times is the only family law specialist available. As our community also faces a dramatic shortage of family law attorneys, having a LLLT available in that legal field is extremely valuable for our organization. A LLLT who was licensed to do similar work in the Consumer, Money & Debt field would be a godsend.

Even before I became executive director of a legal aid organization I believed that innovations such as the LLLT program were essential in providing legal assistance to the vast number of individuals who cannot afford to hire a lawyer in the conventional fashion. I am even more convinced of that from what I see every day at LAW Advocates, where we serve over 1,000 clients per year but are unable to help many times more who need it. We constantly field questions from elderly people struggling with medical debt, young families with exorbitant credit card balances because of home or auto repair, and recent college graduates unable to keep up with student loans. Consumer, Money & Debt is one of the highest areas of demand for services and one of the areas with the lowest supply of attorneys. That is undoubtedly true in our county and I suspect it is true statewide, especially in more rural areas that have even fewer attorneys and other social services available.

I enthusiastically encourage the court to approve Consumer, Money & Debt as the next practice area for the LLLT program.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in blue ink, appearing to read "Michael Heatherly", with a long horizontal flourish extending to the right.

Michael Heatherly
WSBA #20803

Comment on proposal – p. 2

Signing Authority on Trust Accounts

The Committee on Professional Ethics (CPE) reviewed the LLLT RPCs and has a question about LLLT signing authority on trust accounts. The language in question appears in the lawyer and LLLT RPC 1.15A(h)(9):

Only an LLLT or a lawyer admitted to practice law may be an authorized signatory on the account. If an LLLT is associated in a practice with one or more lawyers, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.

The CPE notes this language 1) makes it so a LLLT who is a member of a law firm cannot sign a trust account check for that firm, however, 2) a LLLT who is not a member of a law firm could be a signatory on the firm's trust account. This could happen if a solo practitioner wanted to have an independent LLLT be a signatory on the lawyer's trust account as a "back-up" in the event the lawyer became disabled or died. The CPE wonders if this result was intended.

Doug Ende reviewed the question and noted that the LLLT Board's RPC Committee drafted this provision with the first in mind but not necessarily the second. On point 1, the Committee considered that a LLLT should not be the sole signatory on a trust account at a firm jointly owned with a lawyer because the LLLT could become responsible for disposition of funds in situations requiring the delivery of legal services beyond the scope of the LLLT license. There was also a concern that it could put the LLLT in the position of being assigned to administer the trust account in order for the ethical risk of trust account errors to be borne by the LLLT alone rather than lawyers at a firm.

The intent was not to permit a non-firm LLLT to be a signatory on an otherwise lawyer-only trust account.

If the LLLT Board wants to revisit the language and allow a LLLT to be the sole signatory on trust accounts for firms that include lawyers, 1.15A(h)(9) can be deleted. If the LLLT Board wants to retain the prohibition, the language could be amended to make clear that a LLLT, whether associated in practice with a lawyer or not, cannot be the sole signatory on a trust account for a firm that includes lawyers. Amended language could read:

Only an LLLT or a lawyer admitted to practice law may be an authorized signatory on the account. If an LLLT is associated in a practice with one or more lawyers, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.

A LLLT cannot be the sole signatory on a trust account for a firm that includes lawyers.

Background

July 31, 2017 – Memo from the CPE to the LLLT Board regarding RPC 1.15A(h)(9) and LLLT RPC 1.15A(h)(9). See attached.

August 28, 2017 – The CPE asked for feedback from the LLLT Board regarding RPC and LLLT RPC language related to signing authority on trust accounts.

March 15, 2018 – Doug Ende attended the LLLT Board meeting and discussed trust account signatory permissions. Doug explained that if a lawyer and an LLLT are in business together, the lawyer must sign all trust account checks. The board discussed concerns about a LLLT's ethical responsibilities being thwarted by a lawyer's delay in action or failure to act. A motion to reconsider this was presented (seven for, four opposed) and passed. The Board also appointed a committee to look at this issue and bring suggestions to the next board meeting (April 19, 2018).

April, June, and July LLLT Board meetings were cancelled.

August 29, 2018 – Jeanne Marie Clavere informed the CPE that she was advised that this topic is on the agenda for the October 8, 2018 meeting.

September 24, 2018 - The Committee sent an email to LLLTs asking for their feedback on the issue.

MEMORANDUM

To: Limited License Legal Technician Board
From: Committee on Professional Ethics
Date: July 31, 2017
Re: RPC 1.15A(h)(9) and LLLT RPC 1.15A(h)(9)

The Committee on Professional Ethics received an inquiry about whether a lawyer who is not on active status may sign trust account checks. In considering this inquiry, the subcommittee noticed what appears to be a mistake in the second sentence of RPC 1.15A(h)(9). That sentence states, "If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLT's, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm." This means that if a law firm has an LLLT who is not part of the firm as a signatory on its trust account, the LLLT would be able to sign a check alone, while an LLLT who is part of that firm would not be permitted to do so. Although it would be uncommon for a firm to have an LLLT who is not part of the firm as a signatory on its trust account, it is conceivable that a sole practitioner might do so to have someone available to sign trust account checks in the event of death or disability. We were informed by Doug Ende that this was not the intent of that sentence.

Because fixing that sentence affects LLLTs, we would like to obtain feedback from the LLLT Board. The subcommittee has recommended that the sentence be stricken for the reasons noted in the attached memo. We welcome your comments on that proposal.

Attachment: Trust Account Signatory Subcommittee Memo dated April 14, 2017

FROM Trust Account Signatory Subcommittee (Colin Folawn, Anne Seidel, Ted Stiles)
TO: CPE
RE: Retired lawyer signing trust account checks (proposed rule change)
DATE: April 14, 2017

As discussed in our August 18, 2016 memo, our subcommittee concluded that the RPCs are not clear about whether a lawyer who is not on active status can sign a trust account check. We are therefore proposing a rule change to clarify this. We are also proposing a rule change to address an incongruity in the second sentence of RPC 1.15A(h)(9) regarding LLLTs.

Background of RPC 1.15A(h)(9)

RPC 1.15A(h)(9) states:

(h) A lawyer must comply with the following for all trust accounts:

...

(9) Only a lawyer admitted to practice law or an LLLT may be an authorized signatory on the account. If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLTs, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.

Before the 2006 RPC amendments, anyone could be a signatory on a trust account and law firms frequently had bookkeepers or other nonlawyer staff as signatories. Ethics 2003 proposed that RPC 1.15A restrict signatories to lawyers to protect against theft by nonlawyers employed at a law firm. There is no discussion in the legislative history of what is meant by “lawyer admitted to practice.”

Proposed rule change regarding lawyers as signatories on trust accounts

The following proposal simply removes the requirement that a lawyer be “admitted to practice law” to be a signatory on a trust account. The proposal would make RPC 1.15A consistent with ELC 14.2. That rule prohibits suspended and disbarred lawyers, as well as those who have resigned in lieu or been transferred to disability inactive status, from continuing to practice law. However, ELC 14.2(b) states that the prohibition “does not preclude [such a lawyer] from disbursing assets held by the lawyer to clients.” If the ELC does not preclude a suspended or disbarred lawyer from disbursing trust account funds to clients, RPC 1.15A should similarly permit lawyers not on active status to sign trust account checks.

This change would mean that lawyers and LLLTs are treated the same as far as their ability to be signatories on a trust account. As currently written, an LLLT does not need to be “admitted” to be a signatory on a trust account.

The proposed change is as follows:

(h) A lawyer must comply with the following for all trust accounts:

...

(9) Only a lawyer ~~admitted to practice law~~ or an LLLT may be an authorized signatory on the account. . . .

Additional comment:

Only a lawyer or LLLT on active status may open a trust account. A lawyer or LLLT may continue to be an authorized signatory on a trust account even if no longer on active status. However, a lawyer who is not on active status may not engage in the unauthorized practice of law and may not use the trust account if under the particular circumstances doing so would imply that the lawyer is authorized to practice law. See RPC 5.5(a), (b)(2).

Ted has the following concerns about the second sentence of the proposed comment, which he would like the full committee to discuss at the next meeting:

As drafted, the comment would appear to permit an inactive lawyer to maintain a trust account for an indefinite period of time. In the case of an L&I attorney who collects contingent fees from periodic payments, and who retires while the payment stream is running, the comment would allow the inactive lawyer to continue to maintain the account for years, if not a decade or more, considering that a pension award may run for the life of the pensioner, and in some circumstances for the life of the pensioner's spouse. The Association apparently is not set up to monitor or audit trust accounts after a lawyer becomes inactive. Should we endorse the type of situation in which an inactive lawyer is handling funds belonging to others, but is free from Association audit oversight? Also questions regarding the IOLTA requirements—applicable to inactive lawyers? Will banks agree to let inactive lawyers maintain IOLTA accounts?

Proposed rule change regarding LLLTs as signatories on trust accounts

The second sentence of RPC 1.15A(h)(9) reads, "If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLT's, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm." This means that an LLLT who is not part of a law firm would be able to sign a check alone, while an LLLT who is part of that firm would not be permitted to do so. According to Doug Ende, this was not the intent of that sentence.

Our subcommittee considered whether to propose rewording this provision to prevent all LLLTs from signing trust account checks without a lawyer's additional signature. We do not believe that is necessary. LLLTs are licensed law professionals, so an LLLT who stole from a trust account would be subject to discipline. We therefore do not believe permitting LLLTs to sign trust account checks presents the same risk as permitting nonlawyers to do so.

In addition, banks process checks electronically, so it is extremely unlikely that a bank would be able to enforce a two-signature requirement. So if an LLLT is listed as a signatory, the bank would process a check signed by the LLLT alone. The two signature requirement is only an internal control. As such, it would not prevent an LLLT from stealing from the trust account.

Our subcommittee considered whether to limit an LLLT's authority to sign trust account checks to those relating to cases within the LLLT's license. We do not believe such a limitation would be helpful. First, as mentioned above, a bank would not be able to enforce such a restriction so it would not prevent theft from the account. Second, if the LLLT did not handle the trust account appropriately, the LLLT could be subject to discipline (although the current LLLT RPCs could be clearer in that regard if the misconduct is merely recordkeeping). Third, permitting LLLTs to be signatories on lawyer trust accounts will make LLLTs more attractive to law firms and help integrate them into the profession. Finally, allowing LLLTs to issue trust account checks for all matters is consistent with RPC 5.9(a)(1), which permits LLLTs to share fees from cases that are outside their limited licenses.

We recommend that the second sentence of RPC 1.15A(h)(9) be struck. With the two proposed changes, that subsection would read as follows:

(9) Only a lawyer admitted to practice law or an LLLT may be an authorized signatory on the account. ~~If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLTs, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.~~

Courthouse Facilitator Requirement

Issue Summary

It was brought to our attention that, in some counties, pro se litigants are being asked to go through the court facilitator's office to have their paperwork reviewed before presenting final orders to the court (even if they were prepared by an LLLT). It was also mentioned that they charge a small fee. It looks like in King County the fee to meet with a facilitator is $30. We couldn't find anything in the King County local rules so maybe it is not a formal requirement but rather a preference. We are doing some research and will provide an update at the next LLLT Board meeting.

Question regarding courthouse facilitator requirement (email received on 8/9/2017):

"When parties are going through their divorce pro se, they are required to meet with a Family Law Facilitator to ensure their papers are in order. If a LLLT has prepared the documents for them, are they still required to do this?"

LLLT Board Decision (9/21/2017 meeting):

The LLLT Board reviewed the question above at its meeting on September 21, 2017 and determined that it needed additional information in order to provide direction. The Board requested that WSBA staff look into how court facilitators work across the counties and what the various local rules say.

Research in progress. Staff will provide an update at the LLLT Board meeting.

Questions regarding courthouse facilitator requirement (email received on 8/28/2018):

A LLLT emailed WSBA after receiving a call from her client who was unable to enter final documents because the commissioner required her to schedule an appointment with the courthouse facilitator to have the documents reviewed. The concern is that courthouse facilitators, who are not licensed to practice law, are reviewing documents prepared by LLLTs. The LLLT also mentioned that there might be a small fee involved.

Questions raised in the email:

- Is there anything that can be done about the requirement in Snohomish County? (King County was also mentioned)
- Is there a way to bring this to the courts' attention?
- Should a LLLT send a letter to the Court Administrator?

Comments submitted to the Washington
Supreme Court
regarding APR 28 and
APR 28 Appendix Regs
2 and 3

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 8:08 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comment Regarding Legal Technician Changes

From: Alicia Kelly [mailto:alicia.kelly9@gmail.com]
Sent: Thursday, September 13, 2018 9:32 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Cc: LTDivision Admin <admin@ltdivision.com>
Subject: Comment Regarding Legal Technician Changes

Re: Regarding Important Changes that permit Legal Technicians to Assist Their Clients

To the Supreme Court,

I am receiving assistance from an LLLT division regarding a revision in my parenting plan and child support.

I have already gone through the process of mediation. I was not able to have the LLLT who was assisting me come to mediation. I had to call and ask questions, and the LLLT was not there to speak or negotiate for me. My ex-husband had brought an attorney to represent and speak for him.

I had to do my best in this negotiation process without legal representation physically present, and had to make phone calls to my LLLT to ask for advice. I had to decide what to do while his lawyer was pressuring me to settle on certain terms, when it would have been very helpful to have my LLLT right there to speak for me.

Legal technicians have passed the Bar exam for attorneys in order to practice. They have much knowledge and could well represent their clients. They should be able to communicate on behalf of their clients, negotiate for them, appear in varying court proceedings and at mediation for them. With their knowledge and expertise, they should be able to assist with major parenting plan modifications, and up to adequate cause hearings.

We should allow LLLTs these rights to practice under. If it weren't for this new field, my husband and I wouldn't be able to afford any legal help. We would have to face my ex-husband with his attorney, and try to navigate the legal world without any help.

Lawyers are extremely expensive, and many cannot afford to hire one. Many citizens who can't afford them often suffer without any legal representation. The LLLT is a wonderful, more affordable solution. They are very competent, knowledgeable, and well able to assist clients in varying legal issues.

I am asking the Supreme Court to allow these changes as it will benefit many who could otherwise not afford legal assistance and representation.

Sincerely,

Alicia Kelly

GOLDBERG & JONES, PLLC
1200 WESTLAKE AVE. N. SUITE 700 SEATTLE, WA 98109
206 448 1010 Tel 206 448 0736 Fax
WWW.GOLDBERGJONES-WA.COM

September 14, 2018

Washington Supreme Court
415 12th Street W
Olympia, WA 98504

RE: Proposed Expansion of LLLT Program

Dear Honorable Justices,

As we are all well aware the typical lawyer answer is, "it depends". However, the pending issue before the Court is easy. The answer is no. It is disappointing to know the Washington State Bar Association is attacking their own. It is equally frustrating to know that the Bar Association would be so willing to abdicate its responsibility to its members and the public. The inevitable result of the decision to expand the LLLT scope would be disastrous for the following reasons:

1. LLLTs are only required to have an associate's degree. There is a reason why attorneys attend law school. It provides a rigorous and demanding curriculum designed to rewire an individual's brain, so they know how to properly analyze the law and identify important issues; among other important skills. The minimal education that LLLTs have received is no substitute for the education of an attorney. It is a disservice to the public to enable less qualified individuals to assist them in important legal matters that will have serious ramifications upon their lives.
2. Other state bar associations have already rejected similar proposals. The primary reasoning is that more information is needed to determine the efficacy of the LLLT program. That is the situation in Washington. Rather than jump right into expanding the LLLT scope, more data should be required to determine the impact to the public and attorneys in the state.
3. If the concern is improved access to the legal system for low income individuals, there are better options beyond giving LLLTs de facto attorney status. Compulsory pro bono work may be an option, as would increasing funding for legal aid associations.

The WSBA should be an organization that supports attorneys while protecting the public through licensing and discipline, versus an association that protects the public from attorneys. The bottom line is that this is a half-baked idea that will have potentially disastrous consequences for the public and licensed attorneys in this state.

Sincerely,

Amanda N. Gamble
WSBA #52982

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 4:47 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Expansion of LLLT Program
Attachments: Signed LLLT Letter .pdf

From: Amanda Gamble [mailto:agamble@goldbergjones.com]
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 4:42 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Expansion of LLLT Program

Honorable Justices,

Please see my attached letter in response to the comment period for the expansion of the LLLT program.

Thank you.

Amanda N. Gamble
ATTORNEY AT LAW

1200 Westlake Ave. N. Suite 700
Seattle, WA 98109
Phone: (206) 448 -1010
Fax: (206) 448-0736

www.goldbergjones-wa.com

Confidentiality Notice: This message is sent by a law firm and may contain information that is privileged or confidential. If you received this transmission in error, please notify the sender by reply e-mail and delete the message and any attachments.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Wednesday, September 12, 2018 3:29 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Enhancements to APR 28

From: Ann Vetter-Hansen [mailto:ann@whatcomfamilylaw.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 12, 2018 2:57 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Enhancements to APR 28

Good afternoon:

My name is Ann Vetter-Hansen and I am a Bellingham, Washington family law attorney. I have also been fortunate to serve a term on the Practice of Law Board.

The GR 9 Cover Sheet provides ample justification for the proposed enhancements to APR 28, the LLLT rule. Many of the proposed enhancements were recommended by the law professors who teach the family law class to the LLLTs and who have followed up on the implementation of the program.

The LLLT rule is the result of GR 25. The concept of a legal technician was developed by the Practice of Law Board, organized in 2002. The members of the POLB and the LLLT Board are thoughtful volunteers, like me, who have donated thousands of uncompensated hours to the vision and implementation of the program. The Court gave these good thoughtful people a task and the Court should trust their monumental effort and approve the enhancements as proposed by LLLT Board. This is a necessary step to make a modest but meaningful improvement to access to justice in our state.

Ann Vetter-Hansen

Philip Vetter-Hansen, PLLC
1200 Old Fairhaven Pkwy., Suite 203
Bellingham, WA 98225
(360) 392-3988

Tracy, Mary

From: Jennings, Cindy
Sent: Wednesday, September 5, 2018 2:29 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Subject: FW: N. Hawkins Letter of July 16, 2018 Re LLLT Expansion

From: Bill Pickett [mailto:Bill@wdpickett-law.com]
Sent: Tuesday, July 17, 2018 8:16 PM
To: Fairhurst, Justice Mary <Mary.Fairhurst@courts.wa.gov>; Madsen, Justice Barbara A. <J_B.Madsen@courts.wa.gov>; Johnson, Justice Charles W. <Charles.Johnson@courts.wa.gov>; Wiggins, Justice Charles <Charles.Wiggins@courts.wa.gov>; Stephens, Justice Debra L. <Debra.Stephens@courts.wa.gov>; Fairhurst, Justice Mary <Mary.Fairhurst@courts.wa.gov>; Yu, Justice Mary <Mary.Yu@courts.wa.gov>; Gonzalez, Steve <J_S.Gonzalez@courts.wa.gov>; Owens, Justice Susan <Susan.Owens@courts.wa.gov>; Gordon McCloud, Justice Sheryl <J_S.GordonMcCloud@courts.wa.gov>
Cc: Paula Littlewood <PaulaL@wsba.org>; Steve Crossland <steve@crosslandlaw.net>; Nancy Hawkins <nhawkins@seanet.com>
Subject: N. Hawkins Letter of July 16, 2018 Re LLLT Expansion

Dear Chief Justice and Justices of the Washington Supreme Court,

I am compelled to respond to attorney Nancy Hawkins' letter to you regarding enhancements for the Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) license, dated July 16, 2018. While much of the letter is based on Ms. Hawkins' personal opinion about the enhancements, I want to set the record straight on several points:

- The March 7 meeting with Governor Inslee was the annual meeting that the Executive Director, WSBA President, and WSBA President-Elect hold with the Governor in conjunction with the board's yearly meeting in Olympia. The full board is informed about the meeting and what is discussed. The first issue Gov. Inslee raised this year was immigration and the legal profession's role in finding solutions; as the Court is aware, immigration has been discussed as a possible practice area for LLLTs since the early 2000s.
- With respect to Executive Director Littlewood and Washington Supreme Court LLLT Board Chair Steve Crossland, travel to other jurisdictions and organizations to speak about the LLLT license were by invitation, and no WSBA funds were used to pay for travel.

Please let me know if you would like additional information on anything noted in Ms. Hawkins' letter.

Peace,
Bill Pickett, WSBA President

Bill Pickett
Trial Lawyer
The Pickett Law Firm
917 Triple Crown Way, Suite 100
Yakima, WA. 98908
Phone: 509-972-1825
Fax: 509-972-1826

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE

This message and any attachments are confidential, may contain privileged information, and are intended solely for the recipient named above. If you are not the intended recipient, or an authorized agent for the recipient, you are notified that any review, distribution, dissemination or copying is prohibited. If you have received this message in error, you should notify the sender by return email and delete the message from your computer system.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Thursday, August 30, 2018 4:37 PM
To: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comment on APR 28 - Limited Practice Rule Suggested Amendments

Forwarding

From: Rachel Brooks [mailto:rachel@guardianship-law.com]
Sent: Thursday, August 30, 2018 4:33 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Comment on APR 28 - Limited Practice Rule Suggested Amendments

I am writing to comment on the suggested amendment to enhance the scope of the LLLT domestic relations practice area.

I support this amendment.

I do not practice family law. However, I am on the Board of the Clark County Law Library, and our librarians frequently field questions from unrepresented persons seeking information on family law questions. Fortunately, Clark County has a Family Law Facilitator which can assist many low-income clients, but our Clerk's Office has proposed to eliminate the facilitator program. Even if it preserved, it is inadequate to meet the needs of the public.

The proposed amendment will be useful to our community and helpful to our court system.

Thank you for allowing me to comment.

Rachel Brooks

I accept service by email from Guardians ad Litem.

This message is sent from an attorney's office and may be subject to the attorney-client privilege and/or attorney confidentiality rules. If you have received this message by mistake, please notify the sender and delete all copies of this message. If this message relates to taxes, it is not intended to be used and may not be used for the purpose of avoiding tax penalties or for the purpose of promoting, marketing, or recommending to another party any tax-related matter.

Rachel Anne Brooks

Attorney at Law

1014 Franklin Street, Library Suite

Vancouver, WA 98660

Tel. (360) 699-5801

Fax. (360) 699-5802

rachel@guardianship-law.com

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Wednesday, August 29, 2018 12:33 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon; Jennings, Cindy
Subject: FW: LLLT Rule changes comments

Forwarding

From: Cameron Fleury [mailto:CJF@mcgavick.com]
Sent: Wednesday, August 29, 2018 12:31 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: LLLT Rule changes comments

Justices,

I am writing to ask that you do not further expand any LLLT rights to represent parties. I have been a Family Law practitioner since admitted to the WSBA in December 1993. I was a member of the FLEC of the WSBA when the LLLT program was being championed by Ms. Littlewood and Mr. Crossland. I resigned from the FLEC, in part, over the manner that program was being pursued and implemented, over the crystal clear and virtually unanimous voice of the attorneys in Washington. In fact, the only attorneys that supported were in support because the program was being touted as "Access to Justice" for low income parties. Further, it was to be "an experiment" and only expanded after data supported such an expansion. As you will recall, before the program was even implemented the income limit was removed and virtually immediately the program was expanded and it continuing to be expanded despite NO DATA supporting an expansion.

I believe it is clear that the Justices only supported the program because they were not made aware of the vast amount of negative input all across the State during Paula and Steve's "Town Hall style meetings". In fact, I believe a major reason for the WSBA Membership's current anti-WSBA (see the recent "reform" movement to take the BOG back over, etc.) is the unethical and egregious manner in which the WSBA has created the LLLT program, the "dues rollback Petition" that received the requisite number of signatures to put it to the membership for a vote, but that being refused by the Supreme Court's Order after Ex Parte input from Paula making the referendum "moot", and the recent Bylaw Amendment debacle.

Before considering expanding the LLLT program, I urge you each to contact some (attorney) members of the Bar and hear their feelings and opinions and NOT take what the ED of the WSBA tells you at face value.

Respectfully,
Cameron J. Fleury
WSBA 23422

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 12:54 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Enhancements to LLLT License

From: Camille Walton [mailto:camillew1092@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 12:48 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Enhancements to LLLT License

To whom it may concern,

I am writing regarding the possible enhancements to the LLLT license. Personally when faced with my divorce I wasn't sure how I could afford a lawyer to help me. When I learned about what a LLLT could offer I was very pleased I would be able to afford my divorce more easily. While working with an LLLT I feel as though they are just as knowledgeable as a lawyer would be. I am so glad I went this route but the only drawback for me is that if I do end up having to go to court my LLLT will not be there with me to represent me. The prospect of facing court and my ex and his lawyer without anyone there representing me is very terrifying. I have no legal background and it would mean so much to me if a LLLT would be able to be there with me so I wouldn't have to go through it alone. Please consider adding to the scope of the LLLT license. I know it would positively impact myself and many others as well.

Thank you for your time

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Monday, August 27, 2018 8:16 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon; Jennings, Cindy
Subject: FW: Family Law Enhancements - LLLT Rule, Statement in support of suggested amendments

Forwarding

From: Deborah Ellen Baker [mailto:Bakerwa1@outlook.com]
Sent: Saturday, August 25, 2018 1:08 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: RE: Family Law Enhancements - LLLT Rule, Statement in support of suggested amendments

August 25, 2018

Washington Supreme Court
P.O. Box 40929
Olympia, WA 98504-0929

Subject: Family Law Enhancements
Statement in Support of LLLT Rule, Suggested Amendments
ADMISSION AND PRACTICE RULES (APR) 28
Sections C, D, and Regulation 3

Dear Reviewer(s),

I live in rural Whatcom County and I see that not having enough money to hire a lawyer has a disparate impact on women. Often the men in the rural areas have jobs that pay very well – refineries, logging, heavy equipment operator, construction; while women are either stay-at-home moms or work for minimum wage in service industry jobs. Access to the legal system is impaired by the economics of gender and obstructed by a person's lack of sophistication and disabilities.

The proposed enhancements to the LLLT practice would expand the ability of the LLLTs to provide better access to the courts. I support adding the ability to divide real estate. Frequently the only asset of any value (besides the pickup truck) is some minimal amount of equity in the family home. Many people do not know how to understand and write up the division of equity in the home or to provide remedies when the agreed division is not followed.

I also support the idea that a LLLT can go to court with the client. Even with the proper paperwork, self-represented litigants are terrified of going to court. People have mental health problems, literacy issues or cognitive impairments but still need a divorce. Having a support person who is also a legal resource will make the court experience better for everyone.

Thank you for your consideration of these amendments with significant potential to tangibly improve equitable access to the legal system.

Very truly yours,

D. Ellen Baker

P.O. Box 5149
Glacier, WA 98244-5149
(360) 599-2544

Cc: 42nd District Representatives Vincent Buys and Luanne VanWerven, State Sen. Doug Ericksen

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 8:04 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: LLLT Consideration

From: David Brown [mailto:david@neo1seo.com]
Sent: Thursday, September 13, 2018 5:13 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: LLLT Consideration

Hi there,

I'd like to drop a quick note to let you know how much my LLLT has helped me these last few months. My divorce came at me from out of the blue and I definitely did not have an extra 10k sitting around for a retainer. It would be extremely helpful if my LLLT was able to accompany me to mediation and even talk to my wife via phone, email, or some other medium. I'd like to say thanks for the LLLT's in the first place, as I'd be out of luck otherwise.

Best,

DB

--

David Brown - @neoblog | db Consulting
"I can rank you, or your competition... Your call!"

Confidentiality Notice: This e-mail message is for the sole use of the intended recipient(s) and may contain confidential and privileged information exempt from disclosure under applicable law. Unauthorized review, use, disclosure, or distribution is strictly prohibited. If you are not the intended recipient, please contact the sender by reply e-mail and destroy all original copies of the message. Thank you.

Please consider the environment before printing this email or any attachments.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 7, 2018 2:42 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Do Not Expand the LLLT Program

From: Dayna Ducey [mailto:dayna.ducey@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, September 7, 2018 2:40 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: re: Do Not Expand the LLLT Program

Good Afternoon,

As a WSBA attorney (who previously practiced in Canada), I have serious concerns about the proposed expansions to the LLLT program (and the LLLT program as a whole).

I am a family law attorney and executive committee member of the Low Bono Section. Along with the majority of family law attorneys in the state, I am disappointed that unqualified practitioners are being invited to assist the most vulnerable of populations. Family law practitioners are so frustrated that many of them are distancing themselves from the WSBA. In fact, some 500 family law attorneys joined the non-WSBA affiliated and attorney only DRAW group (Domestic Relations Attorneys of Washington).

WSBA's website says, "The Washington Supreme Court directed the WSBA to develop and administer the LLLT license as part of the effort to make legal services more available for people with low or moderate incomes." What low bono attorneys are seeing is that many LLLTs charge close to (or more!) than what we as low bono attorneys charge.

I'm concerned that we are supporting LLLTs to the detriment of new and young lawyers. As a young attorney, I know of many peers (attorneys) who are struggling to find employment. All while they must pay off student debt. We should be supporting young attorneys, not unqualified LLLTs. It is also frustrating that attorneys are paying for the LLLT program.

I urge you to think of the clients who are being poorly served by unqualified LLLTs. Family law is not an area to be dabbled in by inexperienced, unqualified non-lawyers.

Dayna Ducey
51533

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Monday, September 10, 2018 8:03 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Proposed changes to the LLLT practice areas

From: Genissa Richardson [mailto:Genissa@lawadvocates.org]
Sent: Sunday, September 9, 2018 6:25 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Cc: Jen Petersen <jen@saalawoffice.com>
Subject: Proposed changes to the LLLT practice areas

To: Washington State Supreme Court
From: Genissa Richardson, APR 6 Law Clerk and Licensed Legal Intern, LAW Advocates, Bellingham, WA

September 9, 2018

Dear Honorable Justices of the Washington State Supreme Court,

I am contacting you regarding the proposed changes to the LLLT practice area. Next July, I will complete the APR 6 Law Clerk Program. I have worked at LAW Advocates, in Bellingham, since October of last year. Much of my work involves helping clients in our Dissolution and Parenting Plan clinic – designed specifically to assist victims of domestic violence. I also counsel tenants on a weekly basis at our Landlord-Tenant Clinic. The issues I assist with range from unlawful detainers to orders of limited dissemination, and more minor issues that never go to court, such as damage deposits.

All of our clients are indigent, and a good portion of them are homeless. I see firsthand how many civil legal issues the citizens of Whatcom County have – issues that most cannot afford to retain an attorney for. My family law clients have concerns about their housing, their employment rights, and their debts. And my tenant law clients have concerns about keeping their housing and employment, or clearing their rental history and money judgments against them, so they can regain housing.

I, our staff attorney, David Henken, and our contract family law attorney, Catherine O’Connell, cannot meet the needs of nearly everyone who seeks our assistance. We have many additional programs, including Street Law, yet we turn away potential clients, who qualify for our services, every day.

We have a nationwide access to justice crisis on our hands. This is evident from the day to day experiences of legal professionals such as myself, and from in-depth studies, such as the Office of Civil Legal Aid’s 2015 Civil Legal Needs Study Update.

The answer to this crisis is to empower more legal professionals to assist those who are low income and indigent. Access to legal services must not continue to be available only for the affluent. Kirsten Barron, a colleague whom I have much respect for, regularly reminds our local bar that “it’s not justice if it’s not equal.” I couldn’t agree more. I have the means to hire an attorney if need be. The vast majority of Washington State residents do not have the means to do so.

I am at a loss for why so many people oppose the proposed changes to the LLLT practice areas. The volunteer lawyer programs and other non-profit agencies cannot meet the demand for free or reduced-cost legal services. There is no harm in expanding the LLLT Family Law practice area to include allocation of retirement accounts. The exclusion of QDRO's is understandable. These are so complicated that experienced attorneys shudder at the mere mention of a QDRO. There is no harm in allowing LLLTs to attend court with their clients, with the caveat that they only answer questions of fact from the bench. Any potential risks of expanding the LLLT practice areas are overshadowed by the benefits that will result and by the Bar's regulation of the profession.

Another concern I have is the claims being made that LLLTs are not volunteering and/or providing reduced cost services. These claims are false. Our local LLLT, Jen Peterson, regularly volunteers at Street Law, and her services are provided at a very reasonable rate. I have heard from colleagues in other parts of the state that they know LLLTs who also are committed to volunteerism.

The arguments against expanding the LLLT Family Law practice area and against licensing LLLTs in the area of Consumer, Money & Debt fail to recognize the fragile state of justice in Washington. We have a local attorney, Lee Grochmal, who graciously volunteers her time to assist many of our clients with bankruptcy matters. Yet, we have no attorneys who assist with creditor/debtor issues before bankruptcy is necessary. The lack of available legal advice further perpetuates poverty. Licensing LLLTs for this practice area can bring nothing but positive results to this crisis.

Many attorneys are not willing to work pro bono or at a reduced rate. Yet many attorneys seem to think that LLLTs will take all of their clients. This is ridiculous. There is no shortage of clients to go around. In Whatcom County, someone who can afford to pay full-price for an attorney can scarcely find a family law attorney to take a case right now. There aren't enough attorneys practicing family law. How does someone in a low-income bracket stand a chance at retaining legal counsel? The reality is that not everyone can pay $200-300 an hour for an attorney. LLLTs can play a large role in solving this crisis. We need more regulated and educated legal professionals who are dedicated to serving the public – including the lower and middle classes.

I sincerely hope the proposed changes to the LLLT Family Law practice area are approved, and that the practice area continues to expand with time. I also sincerely hope the Consumer, Money and Debt practice area is approved. These changes alone will not solve our State's access to justice problem. They signal significant progress, however, and bring hope for a more just and balanced future for all of our citizens.

Sincerely,

Genissa Sygitowicz Richardson

APR 6 Law Clerk, APR 9 Licensed Legal Intern #9281085

LAW Advocates in partnership with the Volunteer Lawyer Program of Island County

Phone (360)-671-6079 Ext. 14 / Fax (360)-671-6082

Genissa@LAWadvocates.org

www.lawadvocates.org

www.facebook.com/LAW-Advocates-154954291280272/

<https://www.instagram.com/lawadvocates1987/>

Statement of Confidentiality

The contents of this e-mail message and any attachments are confidential and are intended solely for addressee. The information may also be legally privileged. This transmission is sent in trust, for the sole purpose of delivery to the intended recipient. If you have received this transmission in error, any use, reproduction or dissemination of this transmission is strictly prohibited. If you are not the intended recipient, please immediately notify the sender by reply e-mail or phone and delete this message and its attachments, if any.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Wednesday, September 5, 2018 1:48 PM
To: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comment re: Expansion of LLLT Program

For you?

From: Denise Diskin [mailto:Denise@stellerlaw.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 5, 2018 1:47 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Comment re: Expansion of LLLT Program

Dear Justices:

I am writing to express my support for limiting the reach of WSBA's existing LLLT Program to advising and undisputed matters, and to ask that the Court oppose any expansion of the program, for a period of time measured in years, to allow its current iteration to be tested.

I appreciate the need for low-cost legal assistance more than most, having served as a volunteer legal clinic attorney, Moderate Means attorney, and solo/small firm attorney for the entirety of my career. I am familiar with the statistics regarding the dire need low-income people have for attorneys. However, I do not believe an expansion of the LLLT program is the answer that the public in Washington need. While I have no doubt that LLLTs are smart, dedicated, and careful people who have every desire to serve their clients well, there is no substitute for the intense legal training, and bar exam study and passage, held by lawyers.

While introduction of LLLTs into areas of law where there is particular need, such as family law, is no doubt helpful, allowing LLLTs to represent family law clients in court hearings and disputed matters reflects a lack of understanding on WSBA's part as to how complicated that area of law is. As a solo attorney almost 10 years ago, I began taking on family cases thinking they would be emotionally complicated but procedurally and legally simple. How complicated can it be to calculate child support when all those forms exist to help pro se parties, right? Wrong. Family law has proven to be more complicated by far than any other area of law I have learned, and it is made only more complicated by the web of rules and procedures (including both the state and local court rules) meant to account for the large number of pro se parties trying to navigate the court system. These are not simply ten-minute child custody or parenting plan hearings – they are legal proceedings which touch on every aspect of a family's logistical and financial life and which can carry serious consequences if orders are not followed. I regret now the cavalier attitude I began taking these cases with, and I cannot imagine leaving these cases in the hands of people lacking a complete legal education.

There is no doubt that legal services need to get cheaper. I think most attorneys would agree. But they are expensive for reasons that are tied to the complexity of the work and the industry's reliance on price points fitting large corporate law firms, not a shortage of people willing to do the work. If my firm could charge our clients less, but still pay office rent, staff and attorney salaries (which are modest, particularly for Seattle – I am eligible for income-based repayment of my six-figure student loans, for example), bar dues, CLE fees, Westlaw accounts, and other necessary overhead costs, we would. If I could afford to still be a solo attorney and still pay my student loans, my child's daycare, my health insurance, and my rent, I likely would. But the economics of our industry are such that firms like mine cannot stay afloat if we only charged what our clients could pay. We have to bridge that gap – but sending non-attorneys out to the public to provide those services is not the answer. Being an attorney is a humbling, challenging job, and WSBA needs to spend its energy making our industry more affordable so that the public has equal access, regardless of class, to trained and skilled and certified attorneys.

Thank you for your consideration.

Respectfully,

J. Denise Diskin, Attorney
Teller and Associates, PLLC
1139 34th Avenue, Suite B
Seattle, WA 98122
206-324-8969 fax 206-860-3172
www.stellerlaw.com

This communication is confidential
ATTORNEY CLIENT &/OR WORK PRODUCT PRIVILEGED

This e-mail is sent by a law firm and contains information that may be privileged and confidential. If you are not the intended recipient, please delete the email and notify us immediately. If this message contains advice relating to federal taxes, it is not intended or written to be used, and cannot be used, for the purpose of avoiding penalties that may be imposed under federal tax law.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Wednesday, September 12, 2018 3:33 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: APR 28 LLLT enhancements

From: jujupotterwa@gmail.com [mailto:jujupotterwa@gmail.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 12, 2018 3:33 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: APR 28 LLLT enhancements

Dear Supreme Court:

I am a concerned citizen for those who do not have access to affordable legal help.

The proposed enhancements to APR 28 should be enacted. Self-represented clients do not have the money to hire attorneys. The local pro bono attorneys and Northwest Justice Project take on very few divorce clients. The courthouse facilitators help with forms, but cannot give legal advice. People are confused and overwhelmed by the forms and the process. Having the LLLT help them and go with them to court would be welcome by the clients and assist the judges if they have questions.

There is a critical need for having LLLTs provide assistance with non-parental custody actions - either as agreed by the parties or through the adequate cause hearing. Most often it is grandparents, relatives and friends who take on the task of caring for children when the parents cannot. Often the child's caregiver has limited means and cannot navigate the legal system. It is critically important to have someone help the caregivers get legal status to obtain medical and educational decision making for the children in their care.

The court should implement all of the proposed LLLT enhancements.

Thank you for your consideration regarding a solution for this important issue.

Judith Potter

August 31, 2018

Clerk of the Supreme Court
PO Box 40929
Olympia, WA 98504-0929

RE: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment
RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1
APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix
LLLT RPCs

Dear Supreme Court Justices:

We, the undersigned, hereby submit this letter to support the proposed changes to the rules mentioned above (hereafter "LLLT rule changes"). We do so on behalf of the University of Washington School of Law, which has developed and taught the LLLT Family Law curriculum for the last five years, and on behalf of ourselves, two members of the Family Law advisory committee that spent 18 months developing these rule changes.

The Limited License Legal Technician program has been a grand and successful experiment in Washington State. Contrary to the fears that it would somehow topple the provision of family law services to clients, it has in fact provided more competent providers than the typical law school curriculum can provide, where students may take one or two courses in family law, but not nearly at the level of detail that a practitioner would need. The LLLT students take 3 courses solely on family law practice. Our students have been extremely engaged and somewhere between 35 and 40 are now licensed.

The issue that the LLLT rule changes seeks to address is to re-balance some of the initial trade-offs when the program was first created. In order to balance the authority given to LLLTs and the supervision by attorneys, the rules were initially drawn narrowly. We have learned over these five years that the rules are actually too narrow, that they do not allow for the LLLTs to develop a full breadth of the family law practice, and hence, will not lead to a sustainable business model. The LLLT rule changes will allow for expanded authority by the practitioners but still within very defined limits. They will, appropriately, allow for the LLLTs to handle the fullness of their clients' matters.

As you may be aware, the Legislature this year passed and the Governor signed SB 5213, which will permit the court to order respondents to pay LLLTs fees in domestic violence cases. What is notable about this bill is that there was no negative testimony. That the bill sailed through with no amendments and no controversy demonstrates how LLLTs have become integral and accepted in the family law practice field.

We have seen over these five years that the program is working, the training is working, and most importantly, the civil legal needs of the clients are getting met. The LLLT rule changes will make some well considered changes to the scope of practice. We encourage the Court to adopt these changes.

Please feel free to contact us if we can answer any questions or provide additional information.

Sincerely,

Professor Patricia Kuszler
Charles I. Stone Professor of Law

Terry J. Price
Director, LLLT Education

Comments on Suggested Amendments to
Admission and Practice Rules (APR) 28 and
Limited Practice Rules for Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLTs)

Comment: There seems to be discord between proposed changes to APR 28(G)(4) and LLLT RPC 1.16.

The amendment to APR 28(G)(4) would preserve LLLTs' obligation to sign documents and pleadings they prepare while allowing an exception for LLLTs assisting a client or a third party in preparing a declaration or sworn statement.

However, the amendment to LLLT RPC 1.16, Declining or Termination Representation, clarifies that LLLTs represent pro se clients and, accordingly, LLLTs would not file a notice of appearance.

How would the court know an LLLT should have signed documents if the court doesn't know the LLLT represents the client?

Comment: The proposed changes are a step in the right direction, but they fall short when it comes to case-type restrictions. Restrictions on Major Modifications and Non-Parental Custody cases only through Adequate Cause have the effect of requiring LLLTs to withdraw all assistance at the most crucial steps in the court process.

From my experience as a supervising attorney, LLLTs do not need additional training or education to assist with Major Modifications cases. In contrast, Non-Parental Custody cases would require a CLE to provide LLLTs the necessary training. This is a small hurdle LLLTs would gladly leap in order to eliminate the restriction.

General Comment: The current restrictions on LLLTs' license to practice continue to limit, not level, the playing field for LLLTs' pro se clients. The burdens are disproportionate on LLLTs compared to attorneys when attempting to provide meaningful representation without running afoul of court rules or the law.

WSBA asks LLLTs to accomplish a nearly impossible task: Provide representation without much ability to represent the client when the client needs it the most, in court and at depositions.

WSBA and the attorney population must embrace LLLTs for the gaps they fill and the services they can and want to provide. Just as physician assistants and advanced registered nurse practitioners have become indispensable in the medical field, so will LLLTs. Washington could and should be a progressive leader in this field.

General Comment: Doesn't it make sense to extend LLLTs' representation to clients wanting adoptions, since the WSBA already intends to let LLLTs handle non-parental custody actions?

Comments submitted by:

Lori Preuss
WSBA #33045
1554 Amethyst St SE
Olympia, WA 98501

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 8:06 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comments on proposed amendments
Attachments: LLLT comments 9.13.18.docx

From: Lori PREUSS [mailto:lori012@msn.com]
Sent: Thursday, September 13, 2018 8:43 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Comments on proposed amendments

Hello. Attached are my comments to proposed amendments to Admission and Practice Rules (APR) 28 and Limited Practice Rules for Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLTs).

Thank you.

Lori Preuss
WSBA #33045
Lori012@mns.com

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Monday, July 23, 2018 4:04 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon; Jennings, Cindy
Subject: FW: Expansion of LLLT functions

Forwarding.

From: Lynn Clare [mailto:lynncclare@clarelawfirm.com]
Sent: Monday, July 23, 2018 3:54 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Expansion of LLLT functions

To the members of the Washington Supreme Court:

Regarding the recent proposal to extend the practices of LLLT's to negotiating procedural matters, I wish to strenuously object to ANY addition to the substantive legal work LLLT's may perform.

LLLT's are not attorneys. They do not have a legal education. They do not have licenses to practice law. Their ostensible reason for existing was to provide scrivener-like services to modest-means clients. When it was presented in that way, I was actually a fan of the idea.

No more, for I now wish that the problematic LLLT program had never been authorized. The LLLT license has mushroomed into something very different from how it was originally presented to us, and I foresee substantial potential for harm to clients and my profession. Allowing "negotiation of procedural issues" creeps uncomfortably close to practicing law without a license. I urge the Court not to approve this change to the license.

Lynn Clare
Clare Law Firm, PLLC
WSBA #47867

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Thursday, August 30, 2018 9:28 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon; Jennings, Cindy
Subject: FW: Expansion of LLLT functions

Forwarding

From: Lynn Clare [mailto:lynnclare@clarelawfirm.com]
Sent: Thursday, August 30, 2018 9:26 AM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Expansion of LLLT functions

To the members of the Washington Supreme Court:

I was just informed that my previous comment on this issue might not receive attention as it may not have been received during the official comment period. In an abundance of caution, and because I want my opinion in this matter to count, I am re-sending my previous comment.

Regarding the recent proposal to extend the practices of LLLT's to negotiating procedural matters, I wish to strenuously object to ANY addition to the substantive legal work LLLT's may perform.

LLLT's are not attorneys. They do not have a legal education. They do not have licenses to practice law. Their ostensible reason for existing was to provide scrivener-like services to modest-means clients. When it was presented in that way, I was a fan of the idea.

No more, for I now wish that the problematic LLLT program had never been authorized. The LLLT license has mushroomed into something very different from how it was originally presented to us, and I foresee substantial potential for harm to clients and my profession. Allowing "negotiation of procedural issues" creeps uncomfortably close to practicing law without a license. I urge the Court not to approve this change to the license.

Lynn C. Clare
Clare Law Firm, PLLC
Office: 206-223-8591
Direct: 253-444-4058

September 4, 2018

Clerk of the Supreme Court
PO Box 40929
Olympia, WA 98504-0929

RE: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment
RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1
APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix
LLLT RPCs

Dear Supreme Court Justices:

I write to echo the letter from two of our faculty members that support adoption of the June 2018 proposed rules (RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1; APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix LLLT RPCs). These rules clarify and slightly expand the scope of practice for Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT).

The University of Washington School of Law has worked in cooperation with the Washington State Bar Association on the LLLT program since its inception. Several of our faculty members have been involved in the educational components of the program, from design of the curriculum through actual teaching of the material. We wholeheartedly support the aim of the LLLT program, which is to provide underserved populations better access to family law assistance.

Our experience with the program suggests that a number of areas were prescribed too narrowly to allow for both practicality and a viable practice arena. As detailed in the letter from our faculty members, the proposed changes will remedy and clarify the scope of practice, while maintaining the overall restricted scope of practice for LLLTs.

Although I am new to University of Washington School of Law, I am fully committed to the access to justice aims that are a hallmark of our law school's culture. The LLLT program is fully consistent with those aims. We fully support the proposed limited expansion to the LLLT scope of practice and urge the Court to adopt the proposed changes.

Thank you for your consideration,

Sincerely,

Mario L. Barnes
Toni Rembe Dean & Professor of Law

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Thursday, September 6, 2018 12:07 PM
To: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment/RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1/APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix/LLLT RPCs
Attachments: LLT LTR 2018_Supreme Court Justices.pdf

From: Dawn M. Bell [mailto:belld3@uw.edu]
Sent: Thursday, September 6, 2018 12:06 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: RE: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment/RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1/APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix/LLLT RPCs

Dear Clerk of the Washington Supreme,

I am sending you this letter on behalf of Dean Mario Barnes. Kindly let me know if you have any questions.

Best,
Dawn

Dawn Bell

Pronouns: She/Her

Assistant to the Dean
Washington Leadership Institute Coordinator
William H. Gates Hall | 371
Box 353020 | Seattle, WA | 98195
P: 206.543.2586 F: 206.616.5305
belld3@uw.edu

W SCHOOL OF LAW
UNIVERSITY of WASHINGTON
Leaders for the Global Common Good™

The track record of the Limited License Legal Technician Program does not warrant expansion at this point. While the program was motivated by good intentions, the program does not appreciably help those with low income, the costs outweigh the benefits, and interest is dwindling.

Although the stated objective of the LLLT program is to increase access to justice for low and moderate-income persons¹, no requirement limits their fees nor their clients' incomes. The savings due to reduced hourly fees have long been available through appropriate use of paralegals, who at least are subject to the supervision of an attorney.

At the 2/15/17 WSBA town hall meeting, one of the first questions raised from the floor was from a Superior Court judge, who asked how the LLLT program can be evaluated. LLLT Board Chair Stephen Crossland said that an evaluation was being conducted, and that its preliminary findings were very positive and that steps were being taken to address the shortcomings. The evaluation was published in March 2017, after evidently being circulated earlier to the LLLT Board, judging by Mr. Crossland's reference to it a month before.

The March 2017 Preliminary Evaluation of the Washington State Limited License Legal Technician Program, funded by the American Bar Foundation, is available online.² It appears that its primary sources for information were the LLLT Board and the WSBA Executive Director. The LLLT Board Chair and WSBA Executive Director have stumped the country to paint glowing pictures of the LLLT program's success in self-justifying efforts to have other jurisdictions adopt similar programs.

Mr. Crossland's 9/15/17 letter responding to Chief Justice Fairhurst's 4/3/17 concerns (If there are no additional subject matter areas, can the program continue?) stated:

As the LLLT profession has evolved, four realities are presented. While they are not determinative of the continuance of the profession, they cannot be ignored. First, the LLLT Board's outreach to community colleges reveals that those students who are not interested in Family Law may be interested in other practice areas. Second, classes taught through the University of Washington Law School must reach a sustainable level in order for the School to financially afford to teach LLLT classes. Third, the Washington State Bar Association is currently underwriting the LLLT profession in its initial stages. In order to offset the start-up costs and continuing costs of the license, the population of LLLT practitioners must expand. Fourth, and most importantly, there is a significant unmet need in areas beyond Family Law. We simply can't put off trying to meet the painful and significant unmet needs in other areas of the practice of law.

¹ The first line on the WSBA website about LLLTs still claims: "Washington is the first state in the country to offer an affordable legal services option to help meet the needs of those unable to afford the services of a lawyer."

² Clarke, Thomas M. and Sandefur, Rebecca L., Preliminary Evaluation of the Washington State Limited License Legal Technician Program, March 2017, available online at https://www.google.com/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=1&ved=0ahUKEwits_6rIoDWAhVkwVQKHZoNDAsQFggoMAA&url=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.americanbarfoundation.org%2Fuploads%2Fcms%2Fdocuments%2Fpreliminary_evaluation_of_the_washington_state_limited_license_legal_technician_program_032117.pdf&usg=AFQjCNFkkXtoM5aRpojT2nXXNUa4VO3NTw, p. 3. Note: the role of LLLTs surveyed didn't include the pending amendments to APR 28, which would allow LLLTs to help their clients in court, to negotiate with opposing parties and counsel, and to appear at mediations and arbitrations.

Fallacies:

- A. The statement that community college students who are not interested in family law "may be" interested in other practice areas is speculation.
- B. There is no indication whether such students are interested in the areas of greatest unmet need.
- C. The fees which LLLTs can charge are not regulated and probably can't be, due to antitrust issues, so there is no showing that low income needs will be met.
- D. Nothing indicates that their numbers would be sufficient to make the LLLT Program economically viable.

The program costs outweigh the benefits. For fiscal year 2016, the LLLT Program deficit was $216,358. For fiscal year 2017, the budgeted deficit was $221,664. Subsequent costs are more difficult to identify, because WSBA combined LLLT program costs with other WSBA costs starting in FY 2018. The March 2017 evaluation findings noted that the UW law school must subsidize the LLLT program at current student levels, while Seattle University and Gonzaga law schools are struggling financially and felt unable to subsidize a new program like the LLLTs (though Gonzaga contributed faculty to the courses at UW law school.) The study further found that, though it's not clear how much student levels would need to increase for the law school to break even on the program, rough estimates ranged from 30 to 60 students per year.³

I attended the LLLT Board's 4/4/18 annual meeting with the Supreme Court, and heard Mr. Crossland assure the court that the LLLT program had an estimated 100-200 "in the pipeline". That phrase rang a bell. I remember him using similar words over a year earlier at the WSBA town hall meeting on 2/15/17. After six years (four years of exams), there are only 35 active LLLTs since the Washington Supreme Court authorized LLLT practice through APR 28 on June 15, 2012. Many of that number essentially grandfathered in, using their multiple years of family law paralegal experience. The numbers aren't escalating. Despite the glowing reports and predictions to the Supreme Court, only 3 passed the February 2018 LLLT exam, mirroring the 3 in spring 2017.

So where are those hundreds "in the pipeline"? The ABA Foundation's Findings in the March 2017 Preliminary Report found that:

³ Clarke and Sandefur, at p. 8

While it may be difficult to estimate what number of new licensed practitioners per year would be required to achieve a breakeven point for operating the program with precision, presumably the WSBA could do so for various enrollment and certification scenarios.

The WSBA estimates that such a breakeven point may be achieved in five to seven years, which would include paying back the startup costs, but does not indicate what level of licenses would be needed to do so. It does estimate that up to 200 people may be currently enrolled in its core programs. If so, the WSBA can determine when the breakeven point will be achieved at least approximately. Community colleges know how many students are in their paralegal programs, but not how many of those students might go on to become licensed LLLTs. Previous estimates of LLLT cohorts have consistently proven to be too optimistic, but that may change as the program becomes better known and gathers momentum with a track record. (p. 10)(emphasis added)

Apart from the LLLT Program's generally failing to serve low income needs, costs outweighing benefits, and minimal interest, the proposed APR 28 rule changes were not appreciably altered in response to the detailed criticism provided by the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section and others. In Mr. Crossland's summary of input efforts, notable by its absence was any reference to WSBA's Family Law Section, the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers, or the Domestic Relations Attorneys of Washington.

There should be no expansion ("enhancement" is marketing spin), either to new areas of family law or to new legal fields. Before embarking on areas of new practice, the court should wait and determine whether the unmet legal needs of the public are being significantly met by this program, and whether the benefits justify the costs. Rather than continuing the LLLT Board as a large standing committee of the Supreme Court, incurring triple-digit deficits annually, it makes more sense to have it convene only periodically to evaluate progress and identify whether expansion is warranted.⁴

The foregoing represents my opinion, and not that of any bar association or section.

Mark Alexander

⁴ For example, the Child Support Schedule Workgroup convenes every four years to make recommended changes to the Legislature.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Thursday, September 6, 2018 4:29 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comments on APR 28 changes re: LLLTs
Attachments: LLLT ltr Supreme Ct 2018-09-06-1535.docx

From: Mark [mailto:mark@seattledivorceservices.com]
Sent: Thursday, September 6, 2018 4:27 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Comments on APR 28 changes re: LLLTs

I respectfully submit my attached comments about the proposed rule changes to APR 28.

Mark Alexander
Seattle Divorce Services
2317 NW Market Street
Seattle, WA 98107
(206) 784-3049

NANCY HAWKINS
ATTORNEY AT LAW

6814 GREENWOOD AVE. N.
SEATTLE WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
FAX (206) 781-7014

July 16, 2018

Cindy Phillips
Judicial Administrative Assistant to
Chief Justice Mary E. Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court

Re: LLLT Expansion Proposal

Dear Ms. Phillips:

Please provide this letter to the Justices of the Washington Supreme Court for their consideration.

At the time that I started to be active in the Family Law section and started attending meetings of the WSBA Board of Governors, the Family Law section's opposition to the LLLT program was well-known. Detailed comments had been submitted by individuals and the section executive committee for several years. Nonetheless, I approached the subject with an open mind. I write today as an individual member and not as a representative of the Family Law Section. It is a continuing concern that issues are raised without adequate time for Section Executive Committee's to discuss and formulate detailed responses. This letter has not been reviewed nor approved by the Family Law section; I speak only for myself.

I comment today against the proposed expansion of the LLLT program into debt issues or any other subject area. The presently considered expansion seems truly ill-advised. As another attorney stated in a listserv email recently "the fact that many lawyers don't know how to do this stuff and/or do it badly is not an argument that other people who don't have a law school education should be taught it so they can represent people." Another said with regard to the LLLT program, "the cost was incredibly high for the number of people who are licensed, and I can't believe that anyone would want to replicate that result with other disciplines...FDCPA stuff is so insanely complicated that very few lawyers really understand it..."

While there are consumer and/or debt issues that the low income public struggles with, the LLLT program that is being considered is clearly headed for failure. The LLLT Board itself said that "it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems ... and whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer." The LLLT Board also reported that significant advice already exists through the Northwest Justice Project site washingtonlawhelp.org. Yet the recommendation continued to be pushed forward.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs be able to assist with RCW 10.82 Motions re Interest in LFOs. These apply to convicts trying to integrate into society. I didn't see that the LLLT Board provided any number of the people seeking help in this matter. There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with small claims court matters. There are numerous websites and materials available to help pro se parties with these small claims. Certainly paying a LLLT is not a likely priority when a person is trying to get someone to pay them $500 that is owed. The recommendation is that LLLTs can help with debt collection not involving collection agencies. In fact, in this day and age, most collection actions involve collection agencies. There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with garnishments. Very few consumers initiate garnishment actions and there are limits on reimbursable "legal" fees. There are rarely court hearings. Packets of forms and instructions are generally available in every county and are also part of the legal forms available through the Administrator of the Courts. The recommendation regarding identity theft is also ill-advised. This information is available through the Attorney General's office at no cost. The recommendation regarding loan modifications is also somewhat laughable. These programs are very complicated and there are attorneys that specialize in it. These loan modifications are rarely granted and adding LLLTs to the mix will not improve that. LLLTs are not needed with regard to protection orders since each county is required to have people at the courthouse to help provide forms. It is not explained how they would help get no contact orders in criminal cases; this is routinely done by prosecutors at initial criminal hearings. LLLTs cannot provide meaningful help in bankruptcy issues since federal laws govern the debt counseling that consumers must obtain. The program is simply designed for failure; hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent and any LLLT eventually trained will have few clients, if any, able to pay his/her fees.

The LLLT program is not being forthright with the WSBA membership and, perhaps, the Washington Supreme Court. The program seems to be exploring expansion into numerous fields and, is now doing so without any meaningful oversight. I have reviewed the LLLT Board meeting minutes, as much as are available. This can be difficult since I have sometimes had to prompt staff to get the minutes online. Of course, I do not know if the LLLT board is not providing their minutes to the staff on a timely basis. Most recently, the LLLT Board cancelled its April and June 2018 meetings so no minutes are available. The May 2018 draft minutes are not available either. See attached email of July 9, 2018 from Renata Garcia.

The minutes of the New Practice Area sub-committee which explores subject expansion used to be on-line. That is no longer the case. In fact, I was informed this morning that I would have to submit a public records request to get them. See the attached email of July 16, 2018 from Margaret Shane.

My review of LLLT board minutes and the New Practice Area Committee have been revealing and startling, particularly with regard to a previously planned expansion into immigration law. The April 2018 minutes state that the LLLT program is expanding into immigration law and that they had already contacted Governor Inslee to get his support for legislation to try and “preempt” the federal law to allow local LLLTs to practice in the immigration field. This action by the LLLT program seems to have been done without the permission of the Washington Supreme Court or the WSBA Board of Governors. This attempted expansion is ill-advised and should not be encouraged or permitted. The Washington State Immigration Services page on the Attorney General website calls immigration law “one of the most complicated areas in the legal field.” ... [and] specialized training” is required...[and] the lawyer/expert must be “authorized under federal law to provide immigration services.” While it seems that this attempted expansion has been dropped, the LLLT board seemed to have acted improperly by going to the Washington State Governor without the support of the BOG or the Supreme Court.

I also ask the Washington Supreme Court to demand some answers from the LLLT board. Such answers should be in writing and made available to WSBA members. How many LLLTs are presently in practice and whom are they representing? What are they charging? While their fees may not be controlled under anti-trust considerations, the fees can certainly be used to determine whether this program is meeting the needs of low-income people. What is the goal of the LLLT program?

I am concerned that the LLLT program seems to be operating without true and objective oversight or administration. The meeting with the Governor’s office involving the Executive Director, Paula Littlewood, is a prime example. It is troubling that this action was not disclosed in her monthly activity reports. She apparently had two BOG members with her but this action was not reported in their monthly activity reports provided to the BOG and the membership. The Executive Director report of January 12, 2018 makes no mention of LLLT issues at all. Steve Crossland’s report to the Board of Governors of January 4, 2018 discusses proposed expansion of the LLLT Family Law work and needed amendments to APR 28 and RPCs but no mention of immigration or consumer debt expansion.

How was it acceptable for these people to go to the Governor to lobby for changes in the law? Sections are not allowed to make any public statements without approval of the WSBA yet a meeting was apparently conducted with the Governor of this state without any such prior approval. Making public statements on the LLLT program and potential expansion without any report of the meeting to the BOG means that the BOG and the membership is being denied information that it should have.

I have another concern about the LLLT program and its administration. The program is marketed enthusiastically by Paula Littlewood and Steve Crossland. It is an open secret that they are involved in a personal relationship. This is a delicate issue that seems to be ignored. I do not easily raise this issue; it should be personal and private. But, it cannot be ignored in this circumstance. I do not see how the program can be administered by the WSBA appropriately under those circumstances. Paula and Steve travel to various other states and countries together “wearing WSBA hats” to talk up the LLLT program concept. I am concerned about the direct and indirect costs of their joint travel to various locales, including Hawaii and Canada. I am concerned about the appearance to the membership. It would certainly seem that the WSBA and the WSC are leaving themselves open to public criticism.

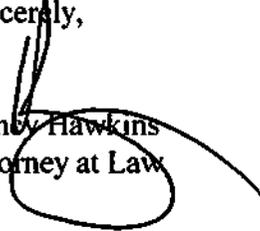

The lack of independent and objective analysis and administration by Littlewood is also clear if the WSBA website is reviewed. The website lauds the LLLT program as a way to practice law without going to law school. It is excited and enthusiastic about the program. Contrast this with the website with regard to lawyers. There is no reference to the long and distinguished role of lawyers in civil rights, or in helping people access the justice system. There is instead a dry description of the costs and burdens of becoming an attorney (fees, testing, etc.) The legal directory now lists LLLTs and lawyers in the same directory. Not only are the lines being blurred, the preference for LLLTs by the Executive Director is obvious.

It also seems that the LLLT program is described by Crossland and Littlewood in their various travels as a “success.” This seems to be an inaccurate description of the program. After years of funding, the program continues to operate at a substantial loss and has very few people working in the field. There is no proof that the program is truly meeting the needs of low-income people and, in fact, the anecdotal information conveyed at meetings is that LLLTs are charging significant rates for their work, generally comparable to attorneys. The Washington Supreme Court should require that Crossland and Littlewood provide transcripts of any speeches and copies of any written materials that either has provided with regard to the LLLT program. Their representations must be accurate and complete so that the reputation of this state bar association and the Washington Supreme Court is not harmed.

Washington Supreme Court
LLLT Expansion Program
July 16, 2018
Page 5

I think it is time for the Washington Supreme Court to take another good hard look at the LLLT program and its purpose and structure. It is time for a plan for reasonable administration. It is also time for the Washington Supreme Court to demand that the WSBA administration enthusiastically support and applaud the work of lawyers.

Sincerely,

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law

cc. LLLT Board

Nancy Hawkins

From: Margaret Shane <Margarets@wsba.org>
Sent: Monday, July 16, 2018 11:10 AM
To: Nancy Hawkins
Subject: RE: LLLT New Practice Area Committee minutes

Hi Nancy –

Since minutes for LLLT committee and work group meetings are not posted on the website, it has been determined that the information you are looking for needs to be obtained through a Public Records Request. To request Bar records, please send your request to WSBA's public records officer at PublicRecords@wsba.org. Under Washington General Rule 12.4(e)(1), requests must be made in writing to WSBA's public records officer, and may not be made to other Bar staff.

Best,
Margaret

Margaret Shane | Executive Assistant

Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8244 | fax 206-727.8316 | margarets@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact karar@wsba.org.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 13, 2018 2:10 PM
To: Margaret Shane
Subject: LLLT New Practice Area Committee minutes

These used to be on the website. Are they somewhere else now?

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

Nancy Hawkins

From: Renata Garcia <renatag@wsba.org>
Sent: Monday, July 09, 2018 2:55 PM
To: Margaret Shane; Nancy Hawkins
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

Hi Nancy –

The LLLT Board April meeting was cancelled. The June meeting was also cancelled which means that the May meeting minutes have not yet been approved.

The meeting materials are posted on the website. Here is one way to access them:

1. <https://www.wsba.org/Legal-Community/Committees-Boards-and-Other-Groups/LLLT-board>
2. Click on WSBA Event Calendar

Meeting Materials

WSBA Event Calendar Meeting Materials including agendas meeting minutes
NB: Starting October 2017 meeting materials are linked to the meeting event item in the WSBA Event Calendar. This static list will not be updated.

January 2017
February 2017
March 2017

3. Select Limited License Legal Technician Board

Home | EVENTS CALENDAR

Updated: June 9, 2018

Enter Email

Today	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30	31	Agenda
Sunday	Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday

4. Select the month and click on the event
5. Click on the link under "Agenda"

Add to:

- Outlook
- iCal
- Google Calendar

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board

Agenda:

LLLT Board Meeting Materials - March 2018

Let me know if you have any other questions.

Thank you,
Renata

Renata de Carvalho Garcia | Innovative Licensing Programs Manager
Washington State Bar Association | 206.733.5912 | renatag@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact barbarao@wsba.org.

From: Margaret Shane
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 1:49 PM
To: Nancy Hawkins
Cc: Renata Garcia
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

Hi Nancy –

Renata Garcia is the person to contact for LLLT matters, but she is out of the office today. I have copied her on this email so she can contact you when she returns to the office next week.

Please let me know if you need anything further at this time.

Best,
Margaret

Margaret Shane | Executive Assistant
Washington State Bar Association | 206.727.8244 | fax 206-727.8316 | margarets@wsba.org
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600 | Seattle, WA 98101-2539 | www.wsba.org
The WSBA is committed to full access and participation by persons with disabilities. If you have questions about accessibility or require accommodation please contact karar@wsba.org.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 10:32 AM
To: Margaret Shane
Subject: RE: LLLT Board minutes

I also don't see any board meeting materials for the past year or so on the website.

Nancy

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

From: Nancy Hawkins [<mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com>]
Sent: Friday, July 06, 2018 10:30 AM
To: 'Margaret Shane'
Subject: LLLT Board minutes

Do you have minutes for their April, May and June board meetings?
Nancy

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

NANCY HAWKINS
ATTORNEY AT LAW
6814 GREENWOOD AVE. N.
SEATTLE WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
FAX (206) 781-7014

September 14, 2018

Cindy Phillips
Judicial Administrative Assistant to
Chief Justice Mary E. Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court

Re: LLLT Expansion Proposal

Dear Ms. Phillips:

Please provide this letter to the Justices of the Washington Supreme Court for their consideration.

I am a 36 year member of the Washington State Bar Association. I am a proud family law attorney. I practice law in Seattle, Washington, and am a sole practitioner. Almost all of my practice is family law.

I graduated from the University of Puget Sound Law School in 1981 and was admitted to the Washington State Bar in 1982. I am also admitted to practice in the Federal courts in the State of Washington. In addition to being a member of the family law sections of the Washington State Bar Association and the King County Bar Association, I am a former chair of the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section's Legislative Committee and a former chair of the King County Bar Association's Family Law Section. I have spoken at numerous continuing legal education seminars on the subject of family law. I am a chapter author for the Washington State Bar Association's Family Law Deskbook. I have received awards for my work from the Greater Seattle Business Association as well as the King County Bar Association Access to Justice Award, and the WSBA Family Law Section Attorney of the Year award for 2017. I coordinate a neighborhood family law clinic in King County and have performed hundreds of hours of pro bono work.

Over the past two years, I have studied the LLLT situation and I write today after learning more disturbing information about the program. I urge the Washington Supreme Court to reject any expansion of the program in Consumer, Money and Debt Law, reject any expansion of the Family Law Program and, instead, examine this entire program in detail and determine its future.

Program training.

The training provided to prospective LLLTs is clearly inadequate since, according to information provided at the July WSBA Board of Governors meeting, more than 50% of the persons taking the test fail. No information was given as to the results of those who passed. It would be appropriate to know how many barely pass, solidly pass or sail through with flying colors. It appears that the training is not being improved but, instead, the qualifications of the trainers is being reduced down. There is no indication that the LLLT Board is concerned in any way about the low passage rate and the apparent inadequacy of the training provided to date.

With such a poor passage rate, it is inconceivable to me that it would be appropriate that there would be an increase in the curriculum/program in the areas of family law to be taught. As has been demonstrated by prior submissions from the Family Law Section, family law is an extremely complex area covering a broad gamut of legal issues. Adding subjects is far more likely to further reduce the passage rate. This seems grossly ill-advised at this time.

There has been no objective determination that the LLLT program is a success in family law. After years of efforts and hundreds of thousands of dollars, there are a minimal number of independently practicing LLLTs. There has been no determination of the number of low income people actually helped by the program. In fact, it seems that most of the LLLTs work as paralegals just as they were doing prior to any certification or licensing at a LLLT. With the poor passage rate and the lack of success of the LLLT program with regard to family law, it seems further ill-advised to add any new subject area or any expansion of the existing subject area. Without objective analysis and determination of the flaws in the curriculum design, teaching methods and training overall in the family law program, the flaws are likely to be repeated in a new or expanded subject area. Expansion into a new subject area is premature, at best.

The choice of Consumer, Money and Debt Law for expansion is particularly ill-advised.

Expansion into Consumer, Money and Debt Law.

I comment again against the proposed expansion of the LLLT program into debt issues or any other subject area. The presently considered expansion seems truly inappropriate. As another attorney stated in a list serve email recently "the fact that many lawyers don't know how to do this stuff and/or do it badly is not an argument that other people who don't have a law school education should be taught it so they can represent people." Another said with regard to the LLLT program, "the cost was incredibly high for the number of people who are licensed, and I can't believe that anyone would want to replicate that result with other disciplines...FDCPA stuff is so insanely complicated that very few lawyers really understand it..."

While there are certainly consumer and/or debt issues that the low income public struggles with, the LLLT program that is being considered is clearly knowingly headed for failure. The LLLT Board itself said that "it was unclear whether or not legal assistance would materially address the consumer law problems ... and whether that assistance could be provided through some method other than direct representation exclusively by a lawyer." The LLLT Board also reported that significant advice already exists through the Northwest Justice Project site washingtonlawhelp.org. Yet the expansion recommendation continued to be pushed forward.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs be able to assist with RCW 10.82 Motions re Interest in LFOs. These motions apply to convicts trying to integrate into society. I didn't see that the LLLT Board provided any number of the people actually seeking help in this matter. In my 36 years of practice, including work with convicted criminals, no one has ever sought help with this kind of matter. I wouldn't think that this is a population with the funds to hire a LLLT.

There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with small claims court matters. There are numerous websites and materials available to help pro se parties with these small claims. Certainly paying a LLLT is not a likely priority when a person is trying to get someone to pay them $500.

The LLLT Board recommendation is that LLLTs can help with debt collection not involving collection agencies. In fact, in this day and age, most collection actions involve collection agencies. If they don't initially, they surely will shortly.

There is a recommendation that LLLTs help with garnishments. Very few consumers initiate garnishment actions and there are limits on reimbursable "legal" fees. Packets of forms and instructions are generally available in every county and are also part of the legal forms available through the Administrator of the Courts.

The recommendation regarding identity theft is also ill-advised. This information is available through the Attorney General's office at no cost.

The recommendation regarding loan modifications is also somewhat laughable. These programs are very complicated and there are attorneys that specialize in it. These loan modifications are rarely granted and adding LLLTs to the mix will not improve that.

LLLTs are not needed with regard to protection orders since each county is required to have people at the courthouse to help provide forms. It is not explained how LLLTs would help get no contact orders in criminal cases; this is routinely done by prosecutors at initial criminal hearings.

LLLTs cannot provide meaningful help in bankruptcy issues since federal laws govern the debt counseling that consumers must obtain.

This proposed expansion of the LLLT program is simply designed for failure. If it is approved by the Washington Supreme Court, hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent by the WSBA and any LLLT eventually trained and licenses will have few clients, if any, able to pay his/her fees.

LLLT family law program costs.

The Washington Supreme Court mandated the existing LLLT program and required the Washington State Bar Association to pay its costs. But, the Court also anticipated that the program would be self-sufficient in a reasonable period of time. In fact, the Court required that it do so in its Order: "[t]he Court is confident that the WSBA and the Practice of Law Board, in consultation with this Court, will be able to develop a fee-based system that ensures that the licensing and ongoing regulation of limited license legal technicians will be cost-neutral to the WSBA and its membership." June 15, 2012 Order by the Washington Supreme Court, page 11. Despite the Court's good intentions, this confidence has not been borne out.

At this point, it is six years since that order by the Court. Not only is the program not self-sufficient, it is operating at a greater loss year after year. In 2017, the program sustained a loss of $189,508.00. It was budgeted to lose $262,022 in 2018. The draft budget for 2019 projects a loss of $240,000 but this figure is misleading in that it does not reflect the total cost of the program. It is my understanding that many of the costs for the program are now included in other portions of the WSBA budget so this $240,000 appears to be artificially lowered. See page 48 of the materials for the July 2018 BOG meeting, attached hereto. I am making a request for the data necessary to determine the cost of those other line items not included in the $240,000 (see the footnote to that same page 48). It is concerning to note that the LLLT Board claimed that its expenses, direct and indirect, for 2018 were $17,000 and $92,636 (see page 433 of the materials for the July 2018 BOG meeting, attached hereto.) These significant costs seem to be in addition to the $240,000. Additional data for those expenses has also been requested.

Time for a limit.

The lawyers of Washington State pay a significant sum in license fees. Many object to the amount of fees. Many sought to hold a referendum on the amount of fees but were not allowed to do so when the Court issued an order that the fee increase that had been imposed was "reasonable." Unhappiness with the fee increase and the inability to register an opinion with the referendum still resonates with many. This is made more concerning to many when the fees paid are used to pay for unpopular and unsuccessful programs such as the LLLT program. The BOG seems to feel that they are powerless to control costs in this program since the Court has mandated the program. But, the Court did not mandate a program that would be funded at the present extent by the lawyers of the WSBA or that the program would operate at such a loss. At this point, it seems this annual substantial financial loss seems to be permanent. This concern is not abated by the July 2018 fee development. As the Court likely knows, at its July 2018 meeting, the Board of Governors recommended that the LLLT license fees be increased to that of lawyers. That increase, even if approved by the Washington Supreme Court, would not make the present program self-sufficient. There would need to be over 500 LLLTs to even come close to paying for the program for one year. There is no realistic expectation that this will ever happen, let alone happen before another $2,000,000-$3,000,000 in WSBA losses occur.

The LLLT program simply shows no promise whatsoever that it will EVER be self-sufficient. Its budgeted costs are approximately 35% higher for 2019 than for 2018. This cannot be sustained for even another year or two without hurting other more successful WSBA programs, a further increase in fees or staff reductions. Yet the LLLT Board and the Executive Director do not seem to be concerned about this in any way.

In the June 15, 2012 order which established the program, it was clear that the program was not necessarily permanent but that it would be "a sound opportunity to determine whether and, if so, to what degree the involvement of effectively trained, licensed and regulated non-attorneys may help expand access to necessary legal help in what that serve the justice system and protect the public. June 15, 2012 Order by the Washington Supreme Court, page 11-12. That objective analysis has never been done.

Time for a program assessment.

The LLLT program was designed to meeting the needs of low income Washingtonians. The program has provided no substantive analysis demonstrating that this goal has been met. The hourly rate charged by LLLTs is, quite simply, beyond the ability of low income people. The rates are also beyond the ability of almost all moderate income people.

After over five years of work, there are only 38 active LLLTs. I have reviewed the information available via the internet and/or the WSBA website. Most work in law firms and it is reasonable to assume that their work is little changed from that of an employed paralegal. It is likely that each of those LLLTs are being billed out at a significant rate. My review concludes that about half or less of the LLLTs are independently employed.

The needed type of assessment of the LLLT program must be done objectively. It is not reasonable to expect the Executive Director or staff under her control to conduct this objective analysis since, in fact, they have not done so. In the past several years, there have been no flags raised over the low number of active LLLTs given the funds spent and the hours of work, no flags raised over the increasing cost of the program, no flags raised over the dismal passage rate, etc. If the LLLT Board or the Executive Director have not done so by now, and given the conflict of interest posed by the personal relationship between the LLLT Board President and the WSBA Executive Director, the Court must provide a mechanism for this kind of objective analysis. Frankly, I believe that the available information should be sufficient to determine that the program is an utter failure already without any further analysis.

Lack of transparency.

I am also concerned about the large gaps in transparency about this program. The April, June, July and September 2018 LLLT Board meetings were cancelled. Without minutes from meetings, it is not possible to review the work of that Board during that time. The meetings of the sub-committee that considers new subject areas used to be announced on the WSBA website with minutes available for review but are not any longer. My request for the minutes of the sub-committee working on new subject areas was denied. I was told I needed to make a public records request. This lack of transparency is quite troubling, particularly given the funds being expended and the demonstrably poor decision-making by the Board and the Sub-Committee from my perspective (and that of many others).

My review of the materials for the August LLLT Board meeting were troubling. The Board supposedly was given all of the comments about the program expansion but, upon review, my own prior comments were not included in the material provided. I don't know how many comments from others were withheld from the Board. The Board also commented about a letter favorable to the expansion and suggested that the author be invited to a meeting to elaborate. There seems to be little concern that the majority of responses were negative to the expansion idea.

It was also disturbing to see that the LLLT Board seems to be planning on offering scholarships to LLLTs. With a program operating hundreds of thousands of dollars in the red, even consideration of a program scholarship is inappropriate.

My review of the available LLLT board minutes and the New Practice Area Committee raise more concerns, particularly with regard to a previously planned expansion into immigration law. The April 2018 minutes state that the LLLT program is expanding into immigration law and that they had already contacted Governor Inslee to get his support for legislation to try and, in effect, "preempt" the federal law to allow local LLLTs to practice in the immigration field. This action by the LLLT program seems to have been done without the permission of the Washington Supreme Court or the WSBA Board of Governors. That attempted expansion was also ill-advised and should not be encouraged or permitted. The Washington State Immigration Services page on the Attorney General website calls immigration law "one of the most complicated areas in the legal field." ... [and] specialized training" is required...[and] the lawyer/expert must be "authorized under federal law to provide immigration services." While it seems that this attempted expansion is not presently being pursued, the LLLT board seemed to have acted improperly by going to the Washington State Governor without the support of the BOG or the Supreme Court.

The Washington Supreme Court should demand some answers from the LLLT board and the Executive Director. Such answers should be in writing and made available to WSBA members. How many LLLTs are presently in practice and whom are they representing? What are they charging? While their fees may not be controlled under anti-trust considerations, the fees can certainly be analyzed to determine whether this program is meeting the needs of low-income or moderate means people. After all, this was the intent of the LLLT program. It is odd that the Executive Director and the LLLT Board are quick to say that they cannot/will not look at the fees charged by LLLTs while allowing LLLTs to advertise that they charge one-third of that of a lawyer. How do they make that assertion without a factual basis for it?

I am concerned that the LLLT program seems to be operating without true and objective oversight or administration. The meeting with the Governor's office involving the Executive Director, Paula Littlewood, is a prime example. It is troubling that this action was not disclosed in her monthly activity reports. She apparently had two BOG members with her but this action was not reported in their monthly activity reports either. The Executive Director report of January 12, 2018 makes no mention of LLLT issues at all. Steve Crossland's report to the Board of Governors of January 4, 2018 discusses proposed expansion of the LLLT Family Law work and needed amendments to APR 28 and RPCs but no mention of immigration or consumer debt expansion.

How was it acceptable for these people to go to the Governor to lobby for changes in the law? Sections are supposedly not allowed to make any public statements without approval of the WSBA yet a meeting was apparently conducted with the Governor of this state without any such prior approval. Making public statements on the LLLT program and potential expansion without any advance consideration of the BOG or a subsequent report of the meeting to the BOG means that the BOG and the membership is being denied information that it should have.

Promotion of the program as a success.

I am particularly concerned about the promotion of the LLLT program to other states as a success. This program has 35 people working in the field, only some of which work independently. The others work in law firms and it seems that their work is that of a normal paralegal.

This program has cost the WSBA over $1,000,000 since its inception. It operates at a considerable loss and that loss is increasing each year. This is not a success. The program should not be "sold" to other states as a success. Doing so will only serve to lower our standing with those states when they, too, suffer such losses and failures. It is distressing that our funds are being spent by Paula Underwood and Steve Crossland to visit various other states and countries "wearing WSBA hats" to talk up the LLLT program concept. I am concerned about the direct and indirect costs of their joint travel to various locales, including Hawaii and Canada. While I have been told that their "travel costs" are not paid by the WSBA, I do not know the status of their other costs. But, even if the costs are out of the picture, I am concerned about the appearance to the membership of this joint travel. It would certainly seem that the WSBA and the Washington Supreme Court are leaving themselves open to public criticism.

WSBA approach to LLLT program.

The present Executive Director's unbalanced and unobjective support for the LLLT program compared with her tepid or non-existent support for actual lawyers is disturbingly clear

Washington Supreme Court
LLLT Expansion Program
September 14, 2018
Page 8

when the new website is examined. I am proud to be a lawyer. From my childhood spent reading and watching Perry Mason and other legal shows, I have always wanted to be a lawyer. This was solidified as I became an active feminist starting at age 16 or so and has continuing for the last 46 years. I followed and studied a civil rights movement that included landmark legal cases regarding education, public facilities, marriage (interracial and gay), sexuality, privacy and many others. None of that glorious history is reflected in the WSBA website, not even a reference to Thurgood Marshall, Ruth Bader Ginsburg or, even, our own William O. Douglas. Not a mention of any landmark cases which have resulted in improved lives for millions of Americans. In fact, the website page which describes becoming a lawyer is a dry recitation of the costs and burdens of being a lawyer.

By contrast, the website pages which describe becoming a LLLT is enthusiastic and glowing and makes broad promises about a career as a LLLT.

Conclusion.

I think it is time for the Washington Supreme Court to take another good hard look at the LLLT program and its purpose and structure. If it is to continue, it is time for reasonable and unbiased administration. It is also time for the Washington Supreme Court to demand that the WSBA administration enthusiastically support and applaud the work of lawyers.

If the Court agrees with my concerns, it is likely time to end this failed program. The 35 people that are presently licensed would likely just continue as well-paid paralegals.

Sincerely,

Nancy Hawkins, a proud lawyer.

cc. LLLT Board (with enclosures)

Washington State Bar Association
Budget Comparison Report
For the Period from October 1, 2018 to September 30, 2019

LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN	FISCAL 2018 BUDGET	FISCAL 2019 BUDGET	$ CHANGE IN BUDGET	% CHANGE IN BUDGET
REVENUE:
TOTAL REVENUE:	-	-	-
DIRECT EXPENSES:
LLT BOARD	17,000.00	17,000.00	-	0%
LLT OUTREACH	8,000.00	8,000.00	-
STAFF TRAVEL/PARKING	600.00	600.00	-	0%
TOTAL DIRECT EXPENSES:	25,600.00	25,600.00	-	0%
INDIRECT EXPENSES:
FTE	1.70	1.55	(0.15)	-9%
SALARY EXPENSE	142,602.00	135,526.00	(7,076.00)	-5%
BENEFIT EXPENSE	49,304.00	41,592.00	(7,712.00)	-16%
OVERHEAD	42,495.00	38,095.00	(4,400.00)	-10%
TOTAL INDIRECT EXPENSES:	234,401.00	215,213.00	(19,188.00)	-8%
TOTAL ALL EXPENSES:	260,001.00	240,813.00	(19,188.00)	-7%
NET INCOME (LOSS):	(260,001.00)	(240,813.00)	19,188.00

The Limited License Legal Technician (LLT) license type (APR 28), was created by the Supreme Court and delegated to WSBA in 2012. In the past, this cost center was used to track all revenues and expenses associated with the "LLT Program". LLTs are now WSBA members, and consistent with the WSBA Bylaws and the Washington Supreme Court Admission and Practice Rules, the administration and regulation of these member license types has been consolidated within existing work groups and cost centers that already perform these functions for lawyers, including Admissions, License and Membership Records, and MCLE (although it continues to be possible to determine these costs separately by member type if needed). For FY19, this cost center is used primarily to track staffing and expenses related to the LLT Board, which by court rule oversees the license.

WSBA COMMITTEE/BOARD ANNUAL REPORT – FY18

Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board Chair: Steve Crossland Staff Liaison: Renata Garcia BOG Liaison: Dan Clark	Size of Committee: 15 Number of FY19 Applicants: 6 FY18 direct expenses: $17,000 FY18 Indirect expenses: $92,636
FY18 Demographics: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Gender (Female: Male: Not Listed): 12:2:0 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified with a racial/ethnic under-represented group: 3 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified as having a disability: 2 (0 did not answer) • Number of members self-identified as LGBT: 2 (0 did not answer)
Background & Purpose: The Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Board derives its authority from the Washington Supreme Court under Rule 28 of the Admission to Practice Rules (APR), adopted effective September 1, 2012. By order of the Court, the WSBA is to administer and fund the LLLT Board and the program. APR 28 authorizes persons who meet certain educational and licensing requirements to advise clients on specific areas of law. The only currently approved practice area is domestic relations. The Supreme Court established the LLLT Board to oversee the LLLT license.
Strategy to Fulfill Purpose: From 2013-2016, the LLLT Board concentrated on creating the operational details for the LLLT license; the LLLT Board is now focusing on the promotion, expansion, and development of the license.
2017-2018 Accomplishments and Work in Progress: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1) In February 2018, the LLLT Board submitted suggested amendments to APR 28, the LLLT RPC and the RPC for lawyers for consideration by the Washington Supreme Court. These amendments would enhance the scope of the current family law practice area. The Court recently published the suggested amendments for comment. Comments are due by no later than September 14, 2018. 2) The LLLT Board is currently circulating a new proposed practice area, Consumer, Money, and Debt, for comment before taking further action, i.e., developing curriculum requirements, seeking approval by the Court, etc. The LLLT Board hopes to engage as many subject matter experts as possible in the development of this and any future proposed practice areas.

- 3) The LLLT Board recently approved the University of Washington Continuum College Paralegal Studies Program to teach the LLLT core curriculum.
- 4) The LLLT Board has been engaging in discussions to explore ways in which LLLT students may qualify for financial aid.

2018-2019 Goals:

- 1) The LLLT Board will continue to consider and recommend new practice areas for approval by Supreme Court.
- 2) If the family law enhancements are approved by the Court, the LLLT Board will develop the required training for currently licensed LLLTs.
- 3) The LLLT Board also plans to expand the accessibility of the LLLT core curriculum across the state by continuing to approve core class programs at additional community colleges.
- 4) The LLLT Board will continue to engage in outreach efforts, including working with the WSBA communication team to expand outreach to a diverse pool of LLLT candidates, including college and high school students.
- 5) The LLLT Board also plans to advance its efforts to provide access to financial aid for students in the LLLT practice area classes.

Please report how this committee/board is addressing diversity:

1) Are you using any of the tools provided by WSBA and if so, how? 2) Have you sought out training or consultation from the Inclusion and Equity Specialist? 3) How have you elicited input from a variety of perspectives in your decision-making? 4) What have you done to promote a culture of inclusion within the board or committee? 5) What has your committee/board done to promote equitable conditions for members from historically underrepresented backgrounds to enter, stay, thrive, and eventually lead the profession? 6) Other?

- 1) The LLLT Board seeks members from different backgrounds and experiences who work together to foster a positive work environment in concert with WSBA's commitment to diversity and inclusion.
- 2) The LLLT Board will schedule training with WSBA's Inclusion and Equity Specialist.
- 3) The LLLT Board seeks input from all WSBA members as well as the legal community in general when making important decisions such as developing a new practice area.
- 4) APR 28 has been amended at the request of the LLLT Board to allow LLLTs and LPOs as well as attorneys with judicial and emeritus pro bono status to serve as Board members.
- 5) The core curriculum educational approval process reflects the LLLT Board's commitment to diversity in that it requires any institution offering the core curriculum to have diversity, inclusion, and equal access policies and practices in place. The LLLT Board also sought to increase diversity within the LLLT profession by extending the limited time waiver (see APR 28 Regulation 4) to 2023 in order to allow a group of candidates qualified by work experience rather than by education to enroll in the practice area classes. The ongoing effort to provide a pathway to financial aid for the practice area classes also aims to provide more opportunities to join the LLLT profession to prospective applicants from diverse socio-economic backgrounds.
- 6) N/A

Please report how this committee/board is addressing professionalism:

- 1) Does the committee/board's work promote respect and civility within the legal community?
- 2) Does it seek to improve relationships between and among lawyers, judges, staff and clients?
- 3) Does it raise awareness about the causes and/or consequences of unprofessional behavior?
- 4) Other?

1) The LLLT Board has set up rules of professional conduct and a disciplinary system for LLLTs, as well as requiring LLLTs to carry malpractice insurance and conform to the same rules as lawyers regarding IOLTA accounts.

2) The LLLT Board has worked to promote LLLTs in the legal community and educate all legal professionals about the permitted scope and models for LLLT practice, as well as highlighting the ways in which collaboration with LLLTs can contribute to the efficiency and accessibility of any legal practice.

3) N/A

4) N/A

Please report how this committee/board is integrating new and young lawyers into its work:

- 1) How have you brought new and young lawyers into your decision making process?
- 2) Has the committee/board supported new and young lawyers by (for example) helping to find and prepare them for employment, assisting with debt management, building community, and providing leadership opportunities?
- 3) Other?

1) All WSBA members are invited to provide comments on rules and new practice area suggestions and development, including new and young lawyers.

2) N/A

3) N/A

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 4:26 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: LLLT program
Attachments: 9-14-18 Phillips Letter.pdf

From: Nancy Hawkins [mailto:nhawkins@seanet.com]
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 4:08 PM
To: Phillips, Cindy <Cindy.Phillips@courts.wa.gov>; OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>;
LLL@wsba.org
Subject: LLLT program

See attached. Hard copy to follow by mail to the Washington Supreme Court.
Nancy Hawkins

Nancy Hawkins
Attorney at Law
6814 Greenwood Avenue North
Seattle, WA 98103
(206) 781-2570
Fax: (206) 781-7014
nhawkins@seanet.com

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTICE: This e-mail transmission contains information from the Law Office of Nancy Hawkins, which may be confidential and/or legally privileged. This information is intended only for use by the individual or entity named. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, forwarding and/or distribution of or taking action in reliance on this information is hereby prohibited. If you have received this e-mail in error, please notify me immediately by reply and delete all occurrences of this record. Thank You.

GOLDBERG & JONES, PLLC
1200 WESTLAKE AVE. N. SUITE 700 SEATTLE, WA 98109
206 448 1010 Tel 206 448 0736 Fax
WWW.GOLDBERGJONES-WA.COM

September 14, 2018

Washington Supreme Court
415 12th Street W
Olympia, WA 98504

RE: Proposed LLLT Rule Change

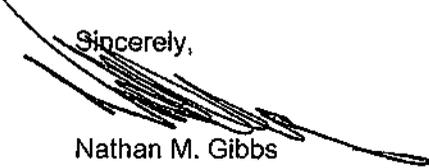

Dear Justices,

I was shocked and disappointed when I heard that the WSBA was considering changes to expand the scope of LLLTs. It is frustrating to know that the Bar Association would be so willing to abdicate its responsibility to its members and the public. The inevitable result of the decision to expand the LLLT scope would be disastrous for the following reasons:

1. LLLTs are only required to have a college degree. There is a reason why attorneys attend law school. It provides a rigorous and demanding curriculum designed to rewire an individual's brain so they know how to properly analyze the law and identify important issues; among other important skills. The minimal education that LLLTs have received is no substitute for the education of an attorney. It is a disservice to the public to enable less qualified individuals to assist them in important legal matters that will have serious ramifications upon their lives.
2. Other state bar associations have already rejected similar proposals. The primary reasoning is that more information is needed to determine the efficacy of the LLLT program. That is the situation in Washington. Rather than jump right into expanding the LLLT scope, more study should be authorized to determine the impact to the public and attorneys in the state.
3. If the concern is improved access to the legal system for low income individuals, there are better options beyond giving LLLTs de facto attorney status. Compulsory pro bono work may be an option, as would increased funding for legal aid societies.

The bottom line is that this is a half baked idea that will have potentially disastrous consequences for the public and licensed attorneys in this state. At a minimum, more study is needed before the Bar decides to expand the LLLT scope.

Sincerely,

Nathan M. Gibbs
WSBA #43594

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 3:10 PM
To: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comment on LLLT Proposal
Attachments: Against LLLT Proposal.pdf

From: Nathan Gibbs [mailto:ngibbs@goldbergjones.com]
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 3:02 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Comment on LLLT Proposal

Please see attached. Thank you.

Nathan M. Gibbs
ATTORNEY AT LAW

1200 Westlake Ave. N. Suite 700
Seattle, WA 98109
Phone: (206) 448 -1010
Fax: (206) 448-0736

www.goldbergjones-wa.com

Confidentiality Notice: This message is sent by a law firm and may contain information that is privileged or confidential. If you received this transmission in error, please notify the sender by reply e-mail and delete the message and any attachments.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, August 17, 2018 3:55 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy
Subject: FW: LLLT changes

Forwarding.

-----Original Message-----

From: Nicole Gitts [mailto:ms.nicolegitts@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, August 17, 2018 3:53 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: LLLT changes

Hello,

The proposed LLLT enhancements are needed and appropriate. Family law clients cannot find good reasonably priced attorneys for their family law cases. There are on-line and unlicensed paralegals providing expensive and wrong advice and form preparation. Going to court alone is scary. Having a LLLT to accompany a self-represented person is not much different than having a domestic violence advocate or even just a friend to offer support. Please enact the proposed expansion to the rules.

Nicole Gitts spaur
360-318-6687

Sent from my iPhone

August 23, 2018

Chief Justice Mary Fairhurst
Washington State Supreme Court
415 12th Street W.
Olympia, WA 98504

Dear Chief Justice Fairhurst,

I have enclosed a Resolution unanimously adopted by the Practice of Law Board at its August 16, 2018 meeting. The Resolution expresses the Board's strong support for the LLLT license adopted by the Court to protect the public and expand access to legal services and the legal system. The Resolution also expresses the Board's strong support for Court action directing the WSBA Board of Governors to expeditiously comply with the Court's January 4, 2018 order adding an LLLT/LPO member and two community representatives to the Board of Governors. Please share this letter and the enclosed Resolution with all of the Supreme Court Justices.

Very Truly Yours,

Hon. Paul Bastine (ret.)
Practice of Law Board Chair

Enclosure

cc: William D. Pickett, President, WSBA
Paula C. Littlewood, Executive Director, WSBA
Steven Crossland, Chair, LLLT Board
Governor Dan Bridges, Co-Chair, Addition of New Governors Work Group
Governor Alec Stephens, Co-Chair, Addition of New Governors Work Group

RESOLUTION

Adopted unanimously by the Practice of Law Board
August 16, 2018

WHEREAS the Washington Supreme Court has stated that the purposes of the Practice of Law Board include “to promote expanded access to affordable and reliable legal and law-related services, expand public confidence in the administration of justice, and make recommendations regarding the circumstances under which nonlawyers may be involved in the delivery of certain types of legal and law-related services”; and

WHEREAS, in the course of performing its functions, the Practice of Law Board recommended the development of what is now called the Limited License Legal Technician license in order to expand access to legal services and the legal system through the licensing of people other than lawyers to offer some legal services; and

WHEREAS the LLLT license has been developed and is currently being administered by the WSBA and LLLTs currently are providing legal services within the scope of their licenses; and

WHEREAS the Board of Governors in September 2016 amended the WSBA Bylaws to add a seat to the BOG specifically for either an LLLT or an LPO member, as well as to add two seats to the BOG for “public” members; and

WHEREAS the Washington Supreme Court entered an order on January 4, 2018, directing the BOG to add the additional seats to the BOG as described in the WSBA Bylaws; and

WHEREAS the Practice of Law Board believes that adding these seats to the BOG would be beneficial to expanding access to affordable and reliable legal and law-related services and would expand public confidence in the administration of justice;

The Practice of Law Board hereby RESOLVES

- 1) That it strongly supports the administration of the LLLT license in a manner that allows for the robust development of this type of legal services provider; and
- 2) That it strongly supports LLLTs in their provision of legal services to the public in order to expand access to legal services and the legal system; and

- 3) That it strongly supports the lifting by the BOG of any BOG "stay" on filling the three new seats; and
- 4) That it strongly supports the Supreme Court taking action to direct the BOG to expeditiously comply with the Court's January 4, 2018 order as issued.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Tuesday, August 28, 2018 2:56 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon; Jennings, Cindy
Subject: FW: LLLT proposed enhancements/rules

Forwarding

From: Penny Henderson [mailto:pennyhenderson2008@gmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, August 28, 2018 2:55 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: LLLT proposed enhancements/rules

Dear Ms./Sir:

I write to you regarding the LLLT program and recently proposed enhancements. As an attorney working a monthly clinic for kinship caregivers, I have worked closely with our resident LLLT, Jennifer Petersen, and I have heard and seen what she has been able to accomplish, not only in our clinic but in other areas.

I lend my support to LLLTs being able to draft retirement provisions in final dissolution documents, save the actual preparation of a QDRO. Frankly, I don't know any attorney doing a QDRO in-house anymore, and there are reasons for that. Allowing the LLLT to designate proportions of benefits in a decree make sense to me, and would be a great benefit. Otherwise, would that portion of the paperwork be farmed out to an attorney? Why?

As to appearing in court, I agree that LLLTs should not be arguing cases in the place of a client, but to appear in court as an advocate or support is not only reasonable but assures access to justice for these folks in a palpable, understandable way. DV advocates are able to appear in court, why not LLLTs? In addition, if the Court has basic factual questions about the documents, the LLLT is there to answer them.

In my experience, many middle-income folks are not served by pro bono or low bono programs, and fall through the cracks. The demand for self-help or moderately priced legal help is great and largely unaddressed. It has been my honor and privilege to help develop programs in my community to address some of these needs, and those clinics are wildly successful.

Please feel free to contact me if you would like further information.

Thank you,
Penny Henderson
Guardian ad Litem/Attorney
WSBA 28408
103 E. Holly, Suite 509
Bellingham, WA 98225
360.733.8180

The information contained in this transmission is attorney privileged and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the individual or entity named herein. IF THIS MESSAGE IS NOT ADDRESSED TO YOU, YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED THAT YOU ARE NOT AUTHORIZED TO REVIEW THE ATTACHED PAGES AND THAT ANY DISSEMINATION, DISTRIBUTION OR COPY OF THIS COMMUNICATION IS STRICTLY PROHIBITED. If you have received this communication in error, please notify me immediately by telephone collect at 1-360-733-8180, and return the original message (and/or delete from email). Thank you.

GOLDBERG & JONES, PLLC
1200 WESTLAKE AVE. N. SUITE 700 SEATTLE, WA 98109
206 448 1010 Tel 206 448 0736 Fax
WWW.GOLDBERGJONES-WA.COM

September 14, 2018

Washington Supreme Court
415 12th Street W
Olympia, WA 98504

RE: Proposed LLLT Rule Changes

Dear Justices,

I was nonplussed when I heard that the WSBA is considering expanding the scope of LLLT practice. The WSBA should not abdicate responsibility to its members and the public in this way. The inevitable result would be undesirable for the following reasons:

1. LLLTs would be authorized to talk about the facts in court but not the law. That makes no sense, particularly if court rules are law, e.g. the rules of evidence. Confronted with an LLLT in court, I could simply object to everything he says and he could not argue the objections because he cannot talk about evidence rules. What is more, how would the LLLT know what facts are relevant to the extent that the law determines the same?
2. Even a lousy family lawyer will have an outsized advantage against any LLLT, and the LLLTs' clients will bear the cost of that advantage. That equates to access to justice with guaranteed bad results. To put it differently, you get what you pay for.

Other state bar associations have already rejected similar proposals. Their reasoning is that more information is needed to determine the efficacy of an LLLT program. I doubt this because the call can be made at first blush – “No way.” The bottom line is that this is a half baked idea that will have undesirable consequences for the public and some of my clients who have to pay me to clean up LLLT messes.

Sincerely,

Robert C. Bennett
WSBA #28385

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Wednesday, September 5, 2018 3:38 PM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon; Jennings, Cindy
Cc: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Objection to LLLT program & non-elected additions to the BOG

Forwarding

From: Sandra E. Johnston [mailto:sej@tacomatrialwarrior.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 5, 2018 3:31 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Objection to LLLT program & non-elected additions to the BOG

Dear Honorable Justices;

I am writing to you as a 20+ year family law, criminal defense, and general trial practice lawyer. I have had a solo practice since 1997. The reason for this email is to share my strong objections to the LLLT program and any expansion thereof. I feel like what started out as a sincere idea to provide greater legal coverage to the general population has morphed into a program that does far more harm than good. It is my understanding that this program was to be "an experiment" to see if it would work. Yet the reality is that the LLLTs are charging the same amount for legal advice that a new lawyer would charge. The same overhead remains, but the person giving the advice has woefully less education for how the law works.

Often I have had occasion in my practice to have litigants call me for help after "We the People" (a group of paralegals providing "guidance" for do-it-yourself divorces) had made a complete mess of things. It is very difficult to undo these scenarios after they are already a mess. I cannot imagine this bloodbath being imposed on other areas of practice. Shall they draft wills? I don't even do that because I have done probate litigation and it is not an uncomplicated area of the law. Would you have a LLLT draft a will for your loved one? Not only is an expansion a horrible idea from a knowledge perspective, this program is consuming a lot of Bar resources. Why are attorneys being made to pay for LLLTs. This makes no sense to me. Further, because of all this upheaval in how the Bar is running itself, the Family Law Section has broken off of the Bar and formed its own organization. It saddens me that such draconian measures are necessary. It seems like the Bar Association is dissolving before my eyes, even if the original premise was well meaning.

As for Family Law cases, those are largely decided at a motion for temporary orders. Not because the facts are so compelling early on, but because most litigants do not have the time or inclination to go to trial. I have had several occasions where the trial results were quite different from the orders entered after a quick look by a Commissioner, but it is the rare client that can hang in for what is often years of litigation. Temporary Orders is such a crucial stage of litigation, you really need an actual Family Law practitioner advise the clients before, during and after this stage. Giving a parent more time with a child, does not make that parent a better parent to the child. On more than one occasion, I have had the Court give more time to a parent (usually the mom) than that which the parent had ever actually spent with the child during the marriage. Unfortunately, not all moms are good moms. Knowing what to present to a Commissioner is often key in getting a sensible outcome, that eventually leads to settlement in most cases. I submit to you that LLLTs will never be able to practice at this level, not to mention what legal work must be done to get a case ready for trial.

As for the proposed non-elected non-lawyer additions to the BOG, I offer you this. (I was in Commissioner's Court in Ex Parte the other day and mentioned, "did you know that the Bar wants to put regular citizens and an LLLT on the BOG?" The response was a big eye roll. That's pretty much the reaction from every lawyer with whom I have spoken. America's regular citizenry has spoken out in an unprecedented manner in the age of Trump and what they have to say is pretty scary. I am absolutely against non-lawyers being made a part of our BOG and would like to see the Executive Director take a much less active role in our governance than elected members of the BOG. This is our Bar Association. Let's please keep it that way.

Warm Regards,

Sandra E. Johnston

Attorney At Law

The Law Office of Sandra E. Johnston

705 S. 9th Street, Suite #104

Tacoma, Washington 98405

Office: 253-272-0566

Fax: 253-572-4137

The information contained in this e-mail message may be privileged, confidential and protected from disclosure. It may also be subject to the attorney-client privilege or be privileged work product or proprietary information. If you are not the intended recipient, any dissemination, distribution or copying of the contents of this message is strictly prohibited. If you think you received this message in error, please delete the message and e-mail the sender regarding your receipt of the message at legal.johnstonlaw@gmail.com.

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 9:43 AM
To: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Proposed Amendments to APR 28 - Comments

From: Virginia Tucker [mailto:virginia.tucker@sjsu.edu]
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 9:43 AM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Proposed Amendments to APR 28 - Comments

To: Washington State Supreme Court Rules Committee (supreme@courts.wa.gov)
Re: Proposed Amendments to APR 28

The court should amend APR 28 as requested by the LLLT Board and the University of Washington law professors. The suggested enhancements are well researched and reasoned, and they will provide better access to justice for people of moderate means.

My support for the APR 28 amendments is based on my experiences working directly with people representing themselves in civil matters due to the inability to hire legal representation. For eleven years, I was the County Law Librarian for Whatcom County in Bellingham, WA. Over 75 percent of the inquiries I helped with were from private citizens with no legal experience who were pro se out of economic necessity. I was able to help them with their legal questions by assisting them through the basic processes of legal research and teaching them about legal resources and the processes of the court system. I also did much to alleviate anxiety and the paralysis of where-to-begin, because a person facing a legal matter who is wracked with legal questions typically needs the guidance of an information professional to formulate the question itself. However, because, as a non-attorney I was prohibited from providing legal advice, I regularly recommended to library patrons that they sit in and observe in court hearings that were open to the public before their own hearings were held. In this way, they could fully listen and observe, without the angst of being a party in the case being heard, and could learn how matters are conducted in the courtroom, even with the variations from one case to the next. People often came back to the Law Library to thank me, both for the help with legal research and court forms and also for what they had learned about courtroom processes. I often wished they could have someone in the courtroom with them to explain in real time the questions that arose for their specific case and, at the same time, to help streamline the court's efforts for justice.

I know that the LLLTs for family law are making immense contributions to these goals. Now this same contribution can be made for non-parental custody matters through the proposed amendments to APR 28. Non-parental custody actions can be critical to children with dysfunctional parents. Frequently it is grandparents or other relatives stepping in to help the parents who are unable or unwilling to care for the children. And, complicating the situation for these uprooted children, the relatives caring for the children often do not have enough money to afford an attorney. Very few attorneys will take on non-parental custody cases, and if they do, the retainers are over $3,000 in our local community, an amount out of reach for most families, particularly when at the same time taking additional children into their homes. Having the LLLT to provide the initial paperwork and to accompany people to court would be a great help and would improve the lives of many children.

To sum up, I believe the Court should implement all of the proposed LLLT enhancements, including non-parental custody, major modifications, the proposed limited division of retirement assets and real estate, and allowing LLLTs to accompany a client in negotiations, alternative dispute resolution, and court.

Sincerely,

Virginia Tucker, PhD, MLS

Former County Law Librarian, Whatcom County, Bellingham WA

Author, Finding the Answers to Legal Questions, 2nd edition (ALA Editions, 2018)

"Highly recommended for public, academic, and law libraries" --Booklist *Starred Review

Virginia M. Tucker, PhD, MLS Assistant Professor
Associate Coordinator, Gateway PhD Program
School of Information, San José State University
<http://ischoolapps.sjsu.edu/facultypages/view.php?fac=tuckerv>

Comments submitted
to the Washington
Supreme Court
regarding LLLT RPCs

August 31, 2018

Clerk of the Supreme Court
PO Box 40929
Olympia, WA 98504-0929

RE: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment
RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1
APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix
LLLT RPCs

Dear Supreme Court Justices:

We, the undersigned, hereby submit this letter to support the proposed changes to the rules mentioned above (hereafter "LLLT rule changes"). We do so on behalf of the University of Washington School of Law, which has developed and taught the LLLT Family Law curriculum for the last five years, and on behalf of ourselves, two members of the Family Law advisory committee that spent 18 months developing these rule changes.

The Limited License Legal Technician program has been a grand and successful experiment in Washington State. Contrary to the fears that it would somehow topple the provision of family law services to clients, it has in fact provided more competent providers than the typical law school curriculum can provide, where students may take one or two courses in family law, but not nearly at the level of detail that a practitioner would need. The LLLT students take 3 courses solely on family law practice. Our students have been extremely engaged and somewhere between 35 and 40 are now licensed.

The issue that the LLLT rule changes seeks to address is to re-balance some of the initial trade-offs when the program was first created. In order to balance the authority given to LLLTs and the supervision by attorneys, the rules were initially drawn narrowly. We have learned over these five years that the rules are actually too narrow, that they do not allow for the LLLTs to develop a full breadth of the family law practice, and hence, will not lead to a sustainable business model. The LLLT rule changes will allow for expanded authority by the practitioners but still within very defined limits. They will, appropriately, allow for the LLLTs to handle the fullness of their clients' matters.

As you may be aware, the Legislature this year passed and the Governor signed SB 5213, which will permit the court to order respondents to pay LLLTs fees in domestic violence cases. What is notable about this bill is that there was no negative testimony. That the bill sailed through with no amendments and no controversy demonstrates how LLLTs have become integral and accepted in the family law practice field.

We have seen over these five years that the program is working, the training is working, and most importantly, the civil legal needs of the clients are getting met. The LLLT rule changes will make some well considered changes to the scope of practice. We encourage the Court to adopt these changes.

Please feel free to contact us if we can answer any questions or provide additional information.

Sincerely,

Professor Patricia Kuszler
Charles I. Stone Professor of Law

Terry J. Price
Director, LLLT Education

Comments on Suggested Amendments to
Admission and Practice Rules (APR) 28 and
Limited Practice Rules for Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLTs)

Comment: There seems to be discord between proposed changes to APR 28(G)(4) and LLLT RPC 1.16.

The amendment to APR 28(G)(4) would preserve LLLTs' obligation to sign documents and pleadings they prepare while allowing an exception for LLLTs assisting a client or a third party in preparing a declaration or sworn statement.

However, the amendment to LLLT RPC 1.16, Declining or Termination Representation, clarifies that LLLTs represent pro se clients and, accordingly, LLLTs would not file a notice of appearance.

How would the court know an LLLT should have signed documents if the court doesn't know the LLLT represents the client?

Comment: The proposed changes are a step in the right direction, but they fall short when it comes to case-type restrictions. Restrictions on Major Modifications and Non-Parental Custody cases only through Adequate Cause have the effect of requiring LLLTs to withdraw all assistance at the most crucial steps in the court process.

From my experience as a supervising attorney, LLLTs do not need additional training or education to assist with Major Modifications cases. In contrast, Non-Parental Custody cases would require a CLE to provide LLLTs the necessary training. This is a small hurdle LLLTs would gladly leap in order to eliminate the restriction.

General Comment: The current restrictions on LLLTs' license to practice continue to limit, not level, the playing field for LLLTs' pro se clients. The burdens are disproportionate on LLLTs compared to attorneys when attempting to provide meaningful representation without running afoul of court rules or the law.

WSBA asks LLLTs to accomplish a nearly impossible task: Provide representation without much ability to represent the client when the client needs it the most, in court and at depositions.

WSBA and the attorney population must embrace LLLTs for the gaps they fill and the services they can and want to provide. Just as physician assistants and advanced registered nurse practitioners have become indispensable in the medical field, so will LLLTs. Washington could and should be a progressive leader in this field.

General Comment: Doesn't it make sense to extend LLLTs' representation to clients wanting adoptions, since the WSBA already intends to let LLLTs handle non-parental custody actions?

Comments submitted by:

Lori Preuss
WSBA #33045
1554 Amethyst St SE
Olympia, WA 98501

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Friday, September 14, 2018 8:06 AM
To: Hinchcliffe, Shannon
Cc: Jennings, Cindy; Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: Comments on proposed amendments
Attachments: LLLT comments 9.13.18.docx

From: Lori PREUSS [mailto:lori012@msn.com]
Sent: Thursday, September 13, 2018 8:43 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: Comments on proposed amendments

Hello. Attached are my comments to proposed amendments to Admission and Practice Rules (APR) 28 and Limited Practice Rules for Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLTs).

Thank you.

Lori Preuss
WSBA #33045
Lori012@mns.com

September 4, 2018

Clerk of the Supreme Court
PO Box 40929
Olympia, WA 98504-0929

RE: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment
RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1
APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix
LLLT RPCs

Dear Supreme Court Justices:

I write to echo the letter from two of our faculty members that support adoption of the June 2018 proposed rules (RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1; APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix LLLT RPCs). These rules clarify and slightly expand the scope of practice for Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT).

The University of Washington School of Law has worked in cooperation with the Washington State Bar Association on the LLLT program since its inception. Several of our faculty members have been involved in the educational components of the program, from design of the curriculum through actual teaching of the material. We wholeheartedly support the aim of the LLLT program, which is to provide underserved populations better access to family law assistance.

Our experience with the program suggests that a number of areas were prescribed too narrowly to allow for both practicality and a viable practice arena. As detailed in the letter from our faculty members, the proposed changes will remedy and clarify the scope of practice, while maintaining the overall restricted scope of practice for LLLTs.

Although I am new to University of Washington School of Law, I am fully committed to the access to justice aims that are a hallmark of our law school's culture. The LLLT program is fully consistent with those aims. We fully support the proposed limited expansion to the LLLT scope of practice and urge the Court to adopt the proposed changes.

Thank you for your consideration,

Sincerely,

Mario L. Barnes
Toni Rembe Dean & Professor of Law

Tracy, Mary

From: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK
Sent: Thursday, September 6, 2018 12:07 PM
To: Tracy, Mary
Subject: FW: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment/RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1/APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix/LLLT RPCs
Attachments: LLT LTR 2018_Supreme Court Justices.pdf

From: Dawn M. Bell [mailto:belld3@uw.edu]
Sent: Thursday, September 6, 2018 12:06 PM
To: OFFICE RECEPTIONIST, CLERK <SUPREME@COURTS.WA.GOV>
Subject: RE: June 2018 Proposed Rules Published for Comment/RPC 1.0B, 1.17, 4.3, 5.8, 8.1/APR 28 and APR 28 Appendix/LLLT RPCs

Dear Clerk of the Washington Supreme,

I am sending you this letter on behalf of Dean Mario Barnes. Kindly let me know if you have any questions.

Best,
Dawn

Dawn Bell

Pronouns: She/Her

Assistant to the Dean
Washington Leadership Institute Coordinator
William H. Gates Hall | 371
Box 353020 | Seattle, WA | 98195
P: 206.543.2586 F: 206.616.5305
belld3@uw.edu

W SCHOOL OF LAW
UNIVERSITY of WASHINGTON
Leaders for the Global Common Good™

Consumer, Money, and Debt FAQ

What do Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLTs) do?

Like lawyers, LLLTs can provide clients with legal advice and complete court documents, but their scope of practice is limited. Think of them as being similar to a nurse practitioner who can treat patients and prescribe medication independently but do not do everything a doctor can. LLLTs currently practice in family law only.

Why was the LLLT license created?

The Washington Supreme Court approved the LLLT license in 2012 in response to a Civil Legal Needs Study showing the overwhelming amount of legal needs of the consuming public are currently not being met. WSBA operates under the delegated authority of the Court to oversee the license and develop new practice areas.

What type of education and training do LLLTs have?

LLLTs receive extensive education and training, including:

- An associate's degree or higher;
- 45 credits at an ABA or LLLT Board-approved school;
- Three quarters of practice area education (currently being taught at the University of Washington School of Law);
- Three examinations (Paralegal Core Competency Exam, practice area and professional responsibility exams); and
- At least 3,000 hours of substantive law-related work experience as a paralegal or legal assistant supervised by a lawyer.

How much do LLLTs charge?

The Bar does not ask, suggest, or control how much licensed legal professionals (LLLTs, lawyers, and LPOs) charge for their services. Anecdotally, LLLTs charge between a quarter to one-third of what lawyers charge.

Why is the LLLT Board pursuing Consumer Law as the potential new practice area for LLLTs?

The Court has determined that unmet legal need is one of the primary thresholds for developing new practice areas for the LLLT license. The new practice area workgroup reviewed statistics from county-based volunteer legal-services providers and the statewide Moderate Means Program as well as studies such as the Civil Legal Needs Study, and found significant unmet legal need in the consumer-law area among low- and moderate-income people. The 2003 (Statewide 0-400% of Federal Poverty Level) and 2015 (Statewide, 0-200% of Federal Poverty Level) Civil Legal Needs Studies identified Consumer, Financial Services, and Credit among the three most prevalent problems that people experience and seek legal help to address. There was an increase in legal need in this area from 27% to 37.6% between 2003 and 2014. The Legal Services Corporation June 2017 Report: The Justice Gap (National, 0-125% of Federal Poverty Level) identified consumer issues as the second highest problem area for people at this income level.

What happens next?

The LLLT Board is in the process of carefully reviewing all comments and input received so far. The LLLT Board has also extended invitations to people who have provided substantive comments to attend future committee meetings and participate in the development process. LLLT Board members may modify the proposed practice area based on the comments, issues discovered during the drafting of regulations, and issues that arise during the law schools' development of the curriculum.

Jaimie Patneau

From: Sarah Bove <sarah@ltdivision.com>
Sent: Monday, October 08, 2018 1:04 PM
To: Jaimie Patneau
Subject: Fwd: LLLT Board Subcommittee - Request for Comment

----- Forwarded message -----

From: Sarah Bove <sarah@ltdivision.com>
Date: Mon, Sep 24, 2018 at 3:41 PM
Subject: LLLT Board Subcommittee - Request for Comment
To: <washingtonllts@googlegroups.com>

Dear LLLTs:

A subcommittee of the LLLT Board is making a recommendation regarding the signing of trust account checks when LLLTs and attorneys associate in a practice. Here is the current rule:

RPC 1.15A(h)(9)/LLLT RPC 1.15A(h)(9)

Only a lawyer admitted to practice law or an LLLT may be an authorized signatory on the [IOLTA] account. If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLTs, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.

A question about the rule was brought to the LLLT Board's by the Committee on Professional Responsibility (CPE) during a review of attorney RPCs. The LLLT Board discussed issues regarding clarity, enforceability, and intent, as banks do not recognize 2-signature restrictions any more.

The LLLT Board originally drafted the rule to protect LLLTs. The concern was that LLLTs could be pressured by lawyers into signing trust account checks for matters they were not involved in, or familiar with; thus increasing the potential for trust account mismanagement and theft.

The Board thought the rule requiring a lawyer's signature in addition to the LLLT's signature would protect the LLLT from such pressure.

Some board members believe the rule should be changed to allow LLLTs associated in a practice with a lawyer to sign trust account checks (without the associated lawyer's signature) in matters in which the LLLT is licensed. Other board members don't agree, and think there should be a flat restriction from LLLTs signing trust account checks when the LLLT is associated with lawyers.

This subcommittee would like to get your feedback as to whether/how this rule should be changed. Please know this would require a rule change, a lengthy process including review by multiple bodies at the WSBA, before it is presented to the Supreme Court.

This subcommittee is comprised of Jeanne Dawes, Sarah Bové and Andrea Jarmon, and they will be making a recommendation to the LLLT Board on 10/8/2018.

LLLTs can email their feedback directly to committee members with the subject line Trust Account Subcommittee, but it would be most helpful if the LLLTs as a group come up with a consensus about how this matter should be resolved and email the collective position to the subcommittee.

Deadline for comments is Friday, September 28th at 4:00 pm.

Subcommittee email addresses: jjdawes@goregrewe.com, andrea@jarmonlawgroup.com, sarah@ltdivision.com

Thank you for your consideration.

Jeanne Dawes, Trust Account Subcommittee Chair

Andrea Jarmon, Trust Account Subcommittee Member

Sarah Bové, Trust Account Subcommittee Member

--

Sarah Cates Bové, LLLT | Legal Technician Division, PLLC

sarah@LTDivision.com | P: (866) 432-6529 ext. 700

Family Law Legal Technicians (LLLTs) are licensed and trained to counsel and assist people going through divorce, child custody and other family-law matters in Washington.

Confidentiality Notice: This email message, including any attachments, is for the sole use of the intended recipient(s) and may contain confidential and privileged information. Any unauthorized review, use, disclosure or distribution is prohibited. If you are not the intended recipient, please contact the sender by reply e-mail and destroy all copies of the original message.

--

Sarah Cates Bové, LLLT | Legal Technician Division, PLLC

sarah@LTDivision.com | P: (866) 432-6529 ext. 700

Family Law Legal Technicians (LLLTs) are licensed and trained to counsel and assist people going through divorce, child custody and other family-law matters in Washington.

Confidentiality Notice: This email message, including any attachments, is for the sole use of the intended recipient(s) and may contain confidential and privileged information. Any unauthorized review, use, disclosure or distribution is prohibited. If you are not the intended recipient, please contact the sender by reply e-mail and destroy all copies of the original message.

Comments from LLLTs

I don't have a recommendation for your subcommittee. I defer to those LLLTs who are in practice with attorneys.

Kim Lancaster

I agree that "... the rule should be changed to allow LLLTs associated in a practice with a lawyer to sign trust account checks (without the associated lawyer's signature) in matters in which the LLLT is licensed. "

Without such a rule, an LLLT is potentially subject to malpractice for mismanagement of client funds. For example, a client requests the return of funds held in trust, but, because the attorney associated with the LLLT is unavailable for an extended period, the LLLT does not return those funds to the client in a timely manner. Because a LLLT is responsible for the management of her/his client funds, it is important the LLLT maintains control over those funds, regardless of whether an attorney is associated in practice with the LLLT or not.

I firmly believe the LLLT must retain the ability to sign checks for funds held in trust for the LLLT's client regardless of the structure of the LLLT's practice.

Jennifer Ortega

I agree with Jennifer Ortega. LLLT is not protected with the current rule. The LLLT should be able to manage their client's funds, solely.

Sherri Farr

Sorry - I haven't had the opportunity to weigh in but as an LT in this exact position, I completely agree with Jennifer's statement. I think I voiced this pretty clearly at a Board meeting but if I need to write something up beyond I completely concur w/ Jennifer - I can tomorrow (I hope - not for lack you of interest just time)!

Jen Peterson

I agree with Jennifer & Jen.

Angela Wright

Proposed changes to RPC 1.15A (h)(9)

(9) Only a lawyer admitted to practice law or an LLLT may be an authorized signatory on the account. If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLT's, any check or other instrument requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.

(9) Only a lawyer admitted to practice law or an LLLT may be an authorized signatory on the account. If a lawyer is associated in a practice with one or more LLLT's, or an LLLT is associated with one or more LLLT's, the LLLT is only authorized to sign ~~any~~ checks or other instruments involving practice areas for which they are licensed. requiring a signature must be signed by a signatory lawyer in the firm.

MEMORANDUM

To: WSBA LLLT Board
From: Christy Carpenter, LLLT
Date: October 8, 2018
RE: Reporting of LLLT Client and Practice Information to WA State Supreme Court

The Limited License Legal Technician profession was authorized by the Washington State Supreme Court with the intent that the LLLT profession would expand “access to justice” by permitting the provision of legal services by legal professionals other than attorneys. Given that goal, I propose that the LLLT Board consider how to go about reporting LLLT client demographics and LLLT practice information to the Supreme Court that would help to show how the profession has successfully expanded access to justice.

I have spoken with Danna Moore, a researcher who worked on the Civil Legal Needs Study. She is the Associate Director of the Social and Economic Sciences Research Center at WSU. I also spoke with Jim Bamberger of the Office of Civil Legal Aid. Some information I gleaned from these conversations were:

- 1) Where the data is “housed” is extremely important. An individual name should not be attached to where the data is as there would be too much liability on that person. An organization should store and present the data. The data should be stored as encrypted files, and access should be limited.
- 2) There should be a policy on how long the data will be stored, and when it will be destroyed.
- 3) The biggest risk in collecting the data is if we use “personal identifiers” such as names, birth dates, social security numbers, etc. We are not doing that, however the more data we collect per each survey, the easier it would be to figure out who that person is, so it is advisable to identify the information that is important for our reporting, and not gather any more. “Need to know” vs. “nice to know.” For every survey question, what purpose does it serve?
- 4) She advised to never use a service like Survey Monkey, because there is no control over where that data is stored. She also advised to not transmit survey information by email. The best option would be to go to a link, where the data input would be housed on an encrypted server.
- 5) There needs to be disclosure to and voluntary agreement by the client that their personal data may be collected, the purpose of the collection, the benefit of the collection, and what will happen to the info (stored, compiled into reports, deleted at the time the annual report is complete). I have added a checkbox on my LSA with this information, and have the client check it and initial if they agree.

Some questions to consider:

- How to get funding (WSBF?)
- What questions will provide relevant information to Supreme Court?
- Length of study?
- How to get highest participate rate - survey LLLTs, or survey clients directly
- Should we convene a workgroup?
- Anything else?

SUGGESTED QUESTIONS (WITH DROPDOWN MENUS)

Gender:

- Female
- Male
- Other

Age:

- 18-24 years old
- 25-34 years old
- 35-44 years old
- 45-54 years old
- 55-64 years old
- 65-74 years old
- 75 years or older

Number of Members in your Household:

- 1
- 2
- 3
- 4
- 5
- 6
- 7
- 8
- 8+

Gross Monthly Household Income Per Number of Household Members:

- Less than 100% of Federal Poverty Level
- 100% - 200% of FPL
- 200% - 400% of FPL
- Over 400% of FPL

1 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $1,005 • $1,006 - $2,010 • $2,011 - $4,020 • Over $4,020 	2 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $1,353 • $1,354 - $2,707 • $2,708 - $5,413 • Over $5,413 	3 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $1,702 • $1,703 - $3,403 • $3,404 - $6,807 • Over $6,807 	4 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $2,050 • $2,051 - $4,100 • $4,101 - $8,200 • Over $8,200
5 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $2,398 • $2,399 - $4,797 • $4,798 - $9,594 • Over $9,594 	6 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $2,747 • $2,748 - $5,493 • $5,494 - $10,987 • Over $10,987 	7 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $3,095 • $3,096 - $6,190 • $6,191 - $12,380 • Over $12,380 	8 <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less than $3,443 • $3,444 - $6,887 • $6,888 - $13,773 • Over $13,773

Ethnicity:

- White /Caucasian
- Hispanic / Latino
- Black / African American
- Native American
- Asian / Pacific Islander
- African
- Arabic
- Other

Primary language:

- English
- Spanish
- Russian/Ukrainian
- Chinese
- Korean
- Vietnamese
- Somali
- Tagalog
- Arabic
- Other

Are you a US citizen?

- Yes
- No

Education Level:

- No schooling completed
- Nursery school to 8th grade

- Some high school, no diploma
- High school graduate, diploma or the equivalent (for example: GED)
- Some college credit, no degree
- Trade/technical/vocational training
- Associate degree
- Bachelor's degree
- Master's degree
- Professional degree
- Doctorate degree

Employment status:

- Employed for wages
- Self-employed
- Out of work and looking for work
- Out of work but not currently looking for work
- Homemaker / Stay-at-home mother
- Student
- Military
- Retired
- Unable to work / Disabled

Type of case:

- Divorce with children
- Divorce without children
- Child support modification
- Minor parenting plan modification
- Relocation notice
- Motion - Moving party or responding party
 - Immediate restraining order/temporary order
 - Temporary order
 - Contempt of child support or parenting plan
 - Reconsideration or revision of a commissioner's order
 - Adjust child support
 - Modify or vacate order
 - Other: _____
- Consultation to review completed papers/seek advice on same
- Discovery (Propound or Respond)
- Mediation Preparation
- Trial Preparation
- Other: _____

Amount paid for LLLT services, not including court fees and other costs:

- Less than $400
- $400 - $800

- $800 - $1,200
- $1,200 - $1,600
- $1,600 - $2,000
- Over $2,000

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 17

April 14, 2018

Contact: Jennifer Olegario, WSBA Communications Manager
206-727-8212; jennifero@wsba.org

156 Candidates Pass 2018 Winter Bar Exam

SEATTLE — The Washington State Bar Association is pleased to announce that 156 candidates passed the Uniform Bar Exam administered in February 2018. Administered over a two-day period, the exam is a substantive law exam for those interested in becoming licensed in Washington to practice law as a lawyer.

The exam includes multiple choice, essay, and performance questions. The other required component of the Washington Bar Exam is an exam on professional responsibility known as the Multistate Professional Responsibility Exam. Completion of a separate online educational component with accompanying online exam addressing specific areas of Washington law (the Washington Law Component) is also required to qualify for admission.

The WSBA will recommend successful candidates who also have passed a character and fitness review and completed other pre-licensing requirements to the Washington Supreme Court for entry of an order admitting them to the practice of law in Washington as a lawyer.

See the full pass list on our website at www.wsba.org/bar-exam-results

Winter 2018 Washington State Bar Exam Statistics

Overall Pass Rates

Applicant Type	Pass	Fail	Total	Pass Rate
ABA-JD	110	109	219	50.2%
APR 6 Law Clerk	2	9	11	18.2%
U.S. Attorneys	30	4	34	88.2%
Foreign/LLM Graduate	12	28	40	30.0%
Foreign Common Law Attorney	1	7	8	12.5%
Non-ABA JD/ABA LLM	1	4	5	20.0%
Total	156	161	317	49.2%

First Time

Applicant Type	Pass	Fail	Total	Pass Rate
ABA-JD	65	39	104	62.5%
APR 6 Law Clerk	2	1	3	66.7%
U.S. Attorneys	24	2	26	92.3%
Foreign/LLM Graduate	10	13	23	43.5%
Foreign Common Law Attorney	1	0	1	100.0%
Non-ABA JD/ABA LLM	1	3	4	25.0%
Total	103	59	161	64.0%

Repeaters

Applicant Type	Pass	Fail	Total	Pass Rate
ABA-JD	45	70	115	39.1%
APR 6 Law Clerk	0	8	8	0.0%
U.S. Attorneys	6	2	8	75.0%
Foreign/LLM Graduate	2	15	17	11.8%
Foreign Common Law Attorney	0	7	7	0.0%
Non-ABA JD/ABA LLM	0	1	1	0.0%
Total	53	103	156	34.0%

The average UBE score total was 270.16; the required passing score was 270.

About the Washington State Bar Association

The WSBA is part of the judicial branch and is authorized by the Washington Supreme Court to license the state's 38,739 lawyers and over 1,000 other legal professionals. In furtherance of its obligation to protect and serve the public, the WSBA both regulates lawyers and other licensed legal professionals under the authority of the Court and serves its members as a professional association — all without public funding. The WSBA's mission is to serve the public and the members of the Bar, to ensure the integrity of the legal profession, and to champion justice.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 18

The Supreme Court
State of Washington

BARBARA A. MADSEN
JUSTICE
TEMPLE OF JUSTICE
POST OFFICE BOX 40929
OLYMPIA, WASHINGTON
98504-0929

(360) 357-2037
FAX (360) 357-2103
E-MAIL J_B.MADSEN@COURTS.WA.GOV

June 5, 2020

Stephen R. Crossland, Chair
Limited License Legal Technician Board
1325 Fourth Ave., Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Rajeev Majumdar, President
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Terra Nevitt, Interim Executive Director
Washington State Bar Association
1325 Fourth Avenue, Suite 600
Seattle, WA 98101-2539

Re: Washington Supreme Court Votes to Sunset the Limited License Legal Technicians Program

Dear Mr. Crossland, Mr. Majumdar, and Ms. Nevitt:

Today, the court issued a letter announcing its vote to “sunset” the Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) “program.” Despite these benign words, let there be no mistake about the nature of the court’s action: the elimination of an independent legal license. What’s more, the court did so at a single meeting, without question or comment from LLLT license holders, legal practitioners, or the public at large. What took over a decade of toil to create, this court erased in an afternoon. I passionately disagree with the court’s vote as well as the way in which it was carried out.

Unlike the opaque process governing the court’s June 4, 2020 vote, I believe it is useful to review the history of the LLLT “program”—to use the court’s preferred terminology—before opining on its future. First, as a matter of definitions, limited legal technicians are those qualified by education, training, and work experience who are authorized to engage in the limited practice of law in specific subject areas. APR 28(B)(4). Turning to history, the LLLT license did not spring fully formed from the head of Zeus. Rather, it is the work of thousands upon thousands of hours dedicated to rectifying a simple truth: that access to justice in this country is not equal. The Civil Legal Needs Survey of 2003 confirmed that almost 80 percent of low income and nearly 50 percent of moderate income Americans cannot access or afford legal services.^[1] Critically important to addressing this disparity was protecting the public from the unauthorized practice of law. The solution to both was expanding the options for providing legal services. Thus, APR 28 was approved and the limited legal technician license was born.

The creation of the LLLT was by no means the end of our labors. In many ways it was only the beginning. Since 2012, stakeholders have crafted and this court has approved the contours of the LLLT license: educational requirements, scope of practice, and governing ethical rules. E.g., APR 28; Order (July 12, 2013) (setting out educational requirements and scope of practice for LLLT, among other things); Order (Aug. 8, 2013) (establishing the admission and licensing requirements for LLLT applicants); Order (March 23, 2015) (adopting changes to Rules of Professional Conduct for Lawyers to coordinate those rules with the LLLT Rules of Professional Conduct); WASHINGTON LLLT EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM APPROVAL STANDARDS, WASHINGTON STATE BAR ASS'N (June 10, 2019). Throughout this rule-making process, we have heard from interested parties, students, legal professionals, and members of the public. The questions and comments from all sides have formed and shaped the LLLT from an ambitious plan into a concrete professional license. Make no mistake, LLLT is a new professional license.

2014 marked the first class of LLLT candidates and more have added to these ranks. THOMAS M. CLARKE & REBECCA L. SANDEFUR, PRELIMINARY EVALUATION OF THE WASHINGTON STATE LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN PROGRAM 5 (March 2017), http://www.americanbarfoundation.org/uploads/cms/documents/preliminary_evaluation_of_the_washington_state_limited_license_legal_technician_program_032117.pdf. The Public Welfare Foundation studied this new legal practice after its creation and found it was significant in helping create access to justice and was replicable. See id. at 14. As a testament to this, other states are considering adopting similar licenses: efforts are underway in states such as Utah, California, Oregon, Colorado, New Mexico, Minnesota, Massachusetts, and Connecticut; and in Canada, British Columbia. Simply put, countless individuals have contributed

^[1] The dire need for affordable legal services has not decreased. In 2017, 86 percent of litigants in civil cases received inadequate or no legal help. 2017 Justice Gap Report: Measuring the Civil Legal Needs of Low-income Americans, Legal Services Corporation, June 2017, <https://www.lsc.gov/media-center/publications/2017-justice-gap-report>.

thousands of hours of their time and energy to devise, bring about, grow, and support the LLLT practice. Not to mention the men and women who have taken on the challenge of trailblazing this innovative, new profession in our state.

I recall this history in order to illustrate the depth of the court's misunderstanding in eliminating the LLLT license. Not only is the LLLT not simply a "program" that was easily created, and just as easily paused and canceled as budgets—or attitudes—permit, the LLLT is an independent legal license. As such, it warrants the respect of time and consideration before alteration, let alone total elimination. With yesterday's vote, the court sua sponte ended a completely viable licensing category that the public can draw on. There was no process. No questions. No comments. The public was not consulted. This is not how an institution should go about changing or dismantling such a bold initiative. In no other professional area would a regulated license be so summarily erased with so little thought given to those who will be most affected.

Not only was yesterday's vote a disservice to the stakeholders, current and aspiring LLLT license holders, and to the people of Washington, it stands in stark contrast to the way in which the LLLT license was crafted and directed for over a decade. The primary reason offered by the Washington State Bar Association Board of Governors for eliminating the LLLT "program" is cost: it is too expensive to maintain and lawyers should not have to underwrite the cost. This ignores the fact that the cost of growing and maintaining this group of licensed professionals is less than 1 percent of the Association's budget. It also ignores the many thousands of dollars the Bar expends every year investigating lawyer misconduct and does not acknowledge the lack of grievances against LLLT practitioners. I find the Board of Governors' cost rationale a hollow one. While current LLLT license holders are "grandfathered in" and allowed to continue practicing, there has been no evaluation offered about the cost of this decision and whether there would be any appreciable change in the cost of administering the LLLT license. As a fiscal matter, the silence on this point speaks loudly, as does the lack of deliberation on other options to address concerns expressed by the Bar while maintaining this professional license and the valuable services it provides in the pursuit of access to justice.

Today's decision also resonates on another level, both abstract and imminently tangible. Just this week, my colleagues and I authored a letter examining the systemic racism that has plagued our country since its inception. We accepted the role judges and the legal community at large have played in maintaining this reality, and recommitted our efforts to ending racial disparity in our governmental, community, and social institutions. The elimination of the

Dissent to Sunset of LLLT

June 5, 2020

Page 4

LLLT license, which was created to address access to justice across income and race, is a step backward in this critical work. It is not the time for closing the doors to justice but, instead, for opening them wider.

With these considerations in mind, I respectfully dissent.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "Barbara Madsen". The signature is written in a cursive, flowing style.

Barbara A. Madsen
Justice

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 19

Preliminary Evaluation of the Washington State
Limited License Legal Technician Program

March 2017

*Prepared by Thomas M. Clarke, National Center for State Courts, and Rebecca L. Sandefur, American Bar Foundation, with support from the
Public Welfare Foundation*

Public Welfare
Foundation

ABF American Bar Foundation
EXPANDING KNOWLEDGE • ADVANCING JUSTICE

© Rebecca L. Sandefur and Thomas M. Clarke

2017

Executive Summary

The Washington State Supreme Court and the Washington State Bar Association created an innovative program to expand the provision of legal services. Limited Licensed Legal Technicians (LLLTs) represent a new legal role that builds on the capabilities of traditional paralegals and operates without supervision by lawyers. LLLTs primarily help customers fill out legal forms and understand legal procedures. The program started with the family law practice area, but Washington State plans to expand to additional practice areas in the near future. A small number of LLLTs have been certified and are currently practicing.

The evaluation shows that the program has been appropriately designed to provide legal services to those who cannot afford a lawyer but still wish or need assistance. The training program prepares LLLTs to perform their role competently while keeping within the legal scope of that role. Customers have found their legal assistance to be valuable and well worth the cost. The legitimacy of the role appears to be widely accepted in spite of its short track record.

There are some questions about how best to scale up the program. The biggest current bottleneck is the required year of training with the University of Washington (UW) Law School. Washington State is actively pursuing other ways to mitigate that constraint. The regulatory costs of the program are not yet close to breaking even, but scaling up the program significantly would resolve that issue. LLLTs would greatly benefit from additional training on business management and marketing, but several of the first LLLTs are successfully running a full-time LLLT practice.

The example of the LLLT program in Washington State has already encouraged a second state to create a similar program. Utah is currently designing its Paralegal Practitioner program along the lines of the Washington State program. Several of the recently approved program changes in Washington State were incorporated immediately into the Utah program design.

The LLLT program suggests that new legal roles with costs lower than traditional lawyers are a potentially significant strategy for meeting the legal needs of many people who now are dealing with their legal problems unassisted. Creating similar programs in other states would clearly improve access to justice for a broad section of the public.

Table of Contents

Executive Summary	3
Research Summary and Recommendations	5
Introduction.....	5
Evaluation Approach	5
Program Appropriateness.....	6
Program Efficacy.....	8
Program Sustainability.....	9
Conclusions.....	14
Recommendations	14
The Bottom Line.....	15
Appendix A. Acknowledgments.....	16

Research Summary and Recommendations

Introduction

The Washington Supreme Court's Practice of Law Board started considering the possibility of creating new legal roles almost fifteen years ago. After many years of debate and discussion, the Washington Supreme Court adopted Admission and Practice Rule (APR) 28 authorizing the creation of the Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) role in June 2012. APR 28 created the Limited License Legal Technician Board, which was tasked with developing and implementing the new license. The Washington State Bar Association (WSBA) staffs and funds the LLLT Board and regulates the LLLTs under delegated authority from the Washington Supreme Court.

After several years of work to create the regulations, training, and administrative mechanisms to do so, the first LLLT candidates entered their practice-area education classes in 2014. Three further classes have begun the practice-area courses since then with many more students completing their core education requirements at the community college level. In 2015, the first LLLTs were licensed by the Washington Supreme Court. At the time research for this evaluation was conducted, there were fifteen (15) licensed LLLTs. Since then, that number has slowly continued to grow.¹

A number of other states have expressed interest in the possibility of starting similar programs. Given that interest, the Public Welfare Foundation (PWF) decided to fund an independent academic evaluation of the LLLT program. Because of its more general interest in new legal roles, the PWF also funded an evaluation of the New York City Navigator program by the same research team.

Evaluation Approach

Since it was likely that states would create both similar new roles and other kinds of new legal roles, the research team first created an evaluation framework that was flexible enough to encompass a broad range of possible new legal roles.² The framework was also intended to support a variety of performance and evaluation measures. Given different program objectives, a particular program evaluation might utilize only a subset of the available evaluation dimensions, but at least the approach would be roughly consistent across program types and evaluator teams.

The framework identifies three broad evaluation categories at the highest level: appropriateness, efficacy, and sustainability. Essentially, researchers want to know if a program does the right thing, does it effectively, and is capable of doing it into the future. To know if the program is doing the right thing, it is necessary to see if the tasks performed by the new role align with the problems that are to be solved or the desired new services. It is also necessary to determine if the persons in the new role will be trained to perform those tasks.

¹ For an excellent summary of the history, scope, and current status of the LLLT program, see "Report of the Limited License Legal Technician Program to the Washington Supreme Court: the first three years," February 2016, Washington State Bar Association.

² INCREASING ACCESS TO JUSTICE THROUGH EXPANDED 'ROLES BEYOND LAWYERS': PRELIMINARY EVALUATION AND CLASSIFICATION FRAMEWORKS, Rebecca L. Sandefur and Thomas M. Clarke, American Bar Foundation and National Center for State Courts, Chicago, IL and Williamsburg, VA, March 2015.

To be effective, researchers must see if the identified tasks are being performed competently by those in the new role and that, when they do so, the impacts on the targeted problems are positive and beneficial.

Finally, the sustainability of the program requires positive answers to three different kinds of questions. Does the regulatory regime, including training, have a stable basis? Does the business model for the new role have a stable basis? Do customers, clients, and colleagues of the new role attribute to it enough legitimacy to provide a stable clientele?

At the time of this evaluation the LLLT program was about 15 months old. The small number of certified LLLTs did not permit a rigorous statistical evaluation. As a result, the researchers opted for a more ethnographic approach using structured interviews. Thus, this evaluation must be considered preliminary and provides first impressions of how the program is progressing. More definitive results must await a larger number of certified LLLTs.

The researchers interviewed 13 of the 15 then certified LLLTs, mostly by telephone.³ They also interviewed four clients, several colleagues of various types, and representatives of both the regulatory office at the WSBA and the training schools at several state community colleges and the UW School of Law.

Program Appropriateness

The stated objective of the LLLT program is to increase access to justice for low and moderate-income persons while protecting the public by ensuring the provision of quality legal services. This broad objective could not be pursued all at once. Instead the LLLT Board and the WSBA envisioned a more incremental approach to the new role. APR 28 was designed to have LLLTs licensed in specific practice areas, with the number of practice areas approved by the Supreme Court to grow over time. Prospective LLLTs would meet the qualifications and become licensed in each practice area separately. As practice areas were added, already licensed LLLTs could decide in which of any additional practice areas they wanted to become licensed.

The scope of the LLLT's authority was limited to be consistent with the training and testing requisite of a limited license. For example, LLLTs were barred from representing clients in talks or negotiations with lawyers or other parties. They also could not go into court hearings with their clients and assist them there. These restrictions still enabled LLLTs to provide process assistance and forms assistance. In the first practice area of family law, LLLTs can assist in these ways on a wide range of family law matters.

Training on these tasks followed a three-pronged approach. First, candidates had to receive, at a minimum, an associate level degree with 45 of the credits defined in the LLLT regulations. The courses were to be completed in an ABA-approved paralegal program. Upon the completion of this "core education," candidates then complete 15 credits in family law through a curriculum developed by an ABA-approved law school. Currently, the courses are offered through the UW School of Law, with Gonzaga University law professors helping to teach the courses. Concurrent with the education, candidates spend 3,000 hours working under the supervision of a licensed lawyer. In addition to these requirements, candidates must pass three exams: one at the completion of the core education (the ³ The researchers interviewed LLLTs, WSBA staff, lawyers, clients, and educators.

Paralegal Core Competency (PCC) Exam), an exam on the LLLT Rules of Professional Conduct, and a subject area exam.⁴

In order to facilitate a faster “ramp up” of the new program, the Court approved a waiver path to the license recommended by the LLLT Board. The waiver is allowed for existing paralegals who have spent at least ten years performing substantive legal work under the supervision of an attorney and have current national certification with one of the national paralegal association. If these requirements are met, the LLLT candidate can proceed directly to the practice-area education and the requisite exams required for licensure. This waiver was initially put in place until the end of 2016, but the LLLT Board was considering an extension as this study was being done. In fact, most of the current LLLTs satisfied their core education requirement in this way, while a few of the newest LLLTs went through the complete education cycle.

Discussion:

Although most of the waived LLLTs gained most of their experience in family law, the experience requirement does not require practice in family law matters. This suggests that the experience requirement is intended to provide general familiarity with legal procedures and processes, rather than specific expertise in family law. This means that the formal training curriculum must provide all required content for the family law practice area.

Not all of the community colleges in Washington State that provide paralegal programs are ABA-approved. That means that certain areas of the state are not conveniently served for that portion of the training requirements. The Supreme Court subsequently approved teaching the core courses at all LLLT Board approved community colleges, mitigating the problem of geographical access significantly. In contrast to the community college approach, the law school year of training is done entirely online, making it easy for candidates from all areas of the state to participate.

The law school had no precedent for this kind of training, so essentially it had to create both a new business process and a new business model for the LLLT program. The new process is able to take advantage of some of the services offered to regular law students, but not others. In particular, prospective LLLTs cannot avail themselves of any financial aid opportunities at the law school.

The UW School of Law originally expected much larger numbers of prospective LLLTs to matriculate. The much smaller initial numbers of students enabled the University of Washington law school to more easily revise its original approach as it learned what worked best. The annual cohorts of students will still need to increase significantly if the university is to achieve a breakeven point on the economics of the program and provide appropriate management. Estimates of the desired cohort size were rough and ranged from 25 to 100 students. It is also not clear if the law school can provide enough faculty to support student cohorts of this size. In short, the economics of the law school training business model are still somewhat uncertain.

Representatives of the community colleges with non-ABA-approved paralegal programs expressed a strong interest in becoming approved LLLT training programs. More broadly, representatives of the community colleges expressed a strong interest in the possibility of teaching the entire training curriculum, including the year that is now taught at the law school.

⁴ The 2016 WSBA report describes these education requirements as: “At a minimum possess an associate level degree; complete 45 credits of core curriculum in paralegal studies as defined in the regulations; complete 15 credits of practice area course work; have 3,000 hours of work experience under the supervision of a licensed Washington attorney; pass a rigorous core curriculum examination; pass a rigorous practice area examination; and pass a rigorous professional responsibility examination.”

Findings:

- The law school must subsidize the LLLT program at current student levels.
- It is not clear how much the student levels would need to increase for the law school to break even on the program. Rough estimates ranged from 30 to 60 students per year. Upcoming cohorts from the community colleges may be growing already, but if so it will not be visible yet.
- It is not clear to what extent staffing and other bottlenecks at the law school would constrain student numbers if they increased significantly.
- Participating community colleges are currently unable to reliably identify which of their paralegal students intend to become LLLTs.
- Teaching the practice area classes at community colleges using remote law professors, community college professors, or adjunct faculty would be one way to mitigate the possible bottleneck at the law school.
- The Seattle University and Gonzaga University law schools are struggling financially and felt unable to subsidize a new program like the LLLTs. Gonzaga University has contributed faculty to the courses at the UW School of Law.
- The inability of the UW School of Law to provide any kind of financial aid is a significant economic deterrent to prospective students.
- Allowing non-ABA-approved paralegal programs to qualify as part of the LLLT training program would significantly improve geographical convenience for students. [A recommendation to make this change has been subsequently proposed and approved by the Washington State Supreme Court.]

Program Efficacy

The LLLT program is designed to provide assistance with the legal process and the preparation of legal forms. Program designers believe that consumers find these kinds of processes to be significant barriers to access when they cannot afford the assistance of a full-service lawyer. Thus, it was hoped that LLLTs would competently provide such services at a significantly lower cost to consumers and by doing so constitute an effective solution to this access problem.

If LLLTs are to benefit consumers in this way, it must be true that they can competently help with these kinds of tasks. It must also be true that consumers trust LLLTs to perform these tasks for them. Finally, competent assistance should result in better legal outcomes and may also improve perceived procedural justice.

Discussion:

Licensed LLLTs with education waivers uniformly felt competent to provide appropriate assistance in family law matters according to the defined scope of the role. This opinion was partly supported by LLLTs without family law experience, who did not feel they could provide assistance efficiently enough to charge their desired prices until they had more experience. It will be interesting to see how these opinions and perceptions change as more LLLTs go through the program without the long years of prior family experience as paralegals.

Clients were sometimes confused about exactly what LLLTs could and could not do. Because the line between allowable and forbidden types of assistance followed the complexity of legal tasks and not the typical tasks in types of family law actions, clients were sometimes forced to do things by themselves that they wanted LLLTs to do or were required to contract with lawyers for unbundled assistance when it was available. These distinctions made no sense to them as lay persons.

From a process viewpoint, LLLTs walked clients through the engagement agreement and explained their scope in detail. Some LLLTs made referrals to lawyers when they were unable to perform a task that a client needed. Conversely, some lawyers made referrals to LLLTs when tasks were within their scope and clients could not afford a lawyer.

Findings:

- Family law task competence was strongly ascribed to specific family law experience as a paralegal.
- At the same time, the training curriculum was deemed appropriate and adequate for the family law practice area.
- LLLTs suggested that the current training program be expanded to include a greater emphasis on practical completion of forms.
- LLLTs thought the 3,000 hours of experience required was about right.
- LLLTs also suggested that a subset of the experience hours should be dedicated to family law matters. Proposed ranges of dedicated experience hours ranged 500 to 1,000 hours out of a total of 3,000 hours.
- Some, but not all, of the small group of licensed LLLTs that went through the entire training sequence felt that they lacked enough specific family law experience to be fully competent at the beginning of their practice.
- Clients uniformly reported that LLLTs provided competent assistance.
- Clients reported that their legal outcomes were improved by utilizing the services of LLLTs.
- Clients were unable to articulate in what way procedural justice was improved for them, but they did frequently report reductions in stress, fear, and confusion.
- Some clients expressed a desire for LLLTs to provide similar assistance for excluded family law matters.
- Some clients expressed a desire for LLLTs to be able to represent them in conversations or negotiations with opposing lawyers and parties.
- Some clients expressed a desire for LLLTs to accompany them into court and at least assist them in answering questions during court hearings.
- Clients often did not understand the legal nuances of what tasks a LLLT could perform, even though LLLTs provided correct and detailed explanations.
- Clients did follow the advice of LLLTs on what legal assistance they could provide and when they needed to seek the help of an attorney.

Program Sustainability

Sustainability requires the program business models to work for both the participants in the new role and the organizations providing training and regulation. Separately, the new role must be performed well enough for the public to view it as legitimate and effective in an on-going way. Both of these aspects of sustainability are critical to the long-term success of the program and the new role.

As noted in the LLLT Board's report to the Supreme Court, the typical total cost of all education required to become certified is $14,440.⁵ Licensed LLLTs must discover and attract sufficient numbers of clients and revenue to make an operational profit that provides a livable income and amortize the initial investment over a reasonable period of time. At the time of this evaluation, most LLLTs were not practicing full-time. Instead, they worked part-time as traditional paralegals or solely as a part-time job.

A couple of LLLTs did work full-time. These LLLTs understood very well the costs of specific tasks and managed the scope of their cases carefully. They had analyzed their tasks in enough detail to charge fees for discrete tasks, rather than charging hourly rates. They understood their business models well enough to know if they were achieving a practical standard of living or not.

Also per the LLLT Board report, the regulatory costs to date total $473,405 and the fees collected in 2015 total $11,188.⁶ So, the WSBA has provided a large subsidy to date to operate the program. Many of the regulatory costs are relatively fixed startup costs that will not be incurred to the same extent as the number of participants increases. Startup costs should be smaller as new practice areas are added, since several aspects of the regulatory machinery will not need significant modification. Unfortunately, the WSBA does not break out one-time startup costs and on-going operating costs, but they should not be significantly different from the current operating costs in that regulatory area. It also has not estimated the cost of adding new practice areas, but they may be minimized by mostly using the current LLLT Board and committee members. While it may be difficult to estimate what number of new licensed practitioners per year would be required to achieve a breakeven point for operating the program with precision, presumably the WSBA could do so for various enrollment and certification scenarios.

The WSBA estimates that such a breakeven point may be achieved in five to seven years, which would include paying back the startup costs, but does not indicate what level of licenses would be needed to do so. It does estimate that up to 200 people may be currently enrolled in its core programs. If so, the WSBA can determine when the breakeven point will be achieved at least approximately. Community colleges know how many students are in their paralegal programs, but not how many of those students might go on to become licensed LLLTs. Previous estimates of LLLT cohorts have consistently proven to be too optimistic, but that may change as the program becomes better known and gathers momentum with a track record.

If the Supreme Court decides to accept training provided by community colleges with programs that are not ABA-certified, it appears that the community colleges collectively provide enough throughput to support a much larger number of LLLTs. No special subsidies would be required, since paralegal students train within the standard business model of the community colleges. The number of classes can be ramped up or down according to demand without significant disruption or change to the usual business processes.

As previously mentioned, the same is not true for the law schools. Although attempts have been made to actively involve all three law schools in the state, only the University of Washington had the resources to support the required training cycles. Gonzaga University contributed faculty in a small way, but nothing else. Even then, the University of Washington law school currently loses money on the program and must subsidize it. The first three cohorts through the law school curriculum were 17, 23, and 19 students respectively. The law school was initially expecting significantly larger cohorts, and they would still like to scale up cohort sizes significantly to make the program more economic. In particular, the law school wants a full-time administrator for the program, which would require cohorts of at least 25 to 28 students consistently. Larger cohorts might make the establishment of special financial aid and scholarship funds possible from an administrative funding point of view, but rules regarding financial aid would still have to be changed or finessed. On the other hand, larger cohorts might also create a faculty bottleneck according to the law school staff.

⁵ See 2016 WSBA report.

⁶ See 2016 WSBA report.

Aside from these issues, the law school supports the addition of business management and marketing content to the curriculum, but that would almost certainly lengthen the period of training and the associated costs for LLLTs. More positively, the law school thinks it could support revisions of the curriculum on court appearances and negotiations if the LLLT Board and the Supreme Court were to support those changes in LLLT scope. Washington State should know very soon if the Supreme Court is supportive. History suggests that it will be.

The law school still operates the year of LLLT training using a special and abnormal business process, because their normal process is uneconomic for LLLT training. It is run as a Continuing Legal Education (CLE) program with a large tuition break. That avoids $480 a quarter in fees and reduces the cost per quarter to $1,250. The law school and the LLLT Board are still working creatively with the community colleges to overcome the inability of the law school to offer financial aid to LLLTs. Because of the special process, LLLTs also do not have access to on-site university services, disability services, or career development services. Of those issues, the availability of financial aid is most important for prospective LLLTs.

It is also the only law school program that uses a synchronous online training method. Although not originally planned, that approach has worked well for LLLTs and the law school has been able to provide a quality educational experience. Both the law school teaching staff and the current group of licensed LLLTs consider the curriculum to be generally good, although the LLLTs consistently expressed a preference for additional practical training on forms. On the other hand, synchronous training is harder to scale and may experience problems attracting sufficient faculty in the future. An asynchronous approach would scale more easily. Perhaps a training model based on a broader provision of services by community colleges could overcome some of these issues.

The community colleges would definitely welcome an expansion of the program beyond the current ABA-certified colleges (and it has subsequently been approved). This expansion would definitely help expand the annual cohorts of LLLTs, since students noted both travel constraints and a desire to access the curriculum online when possible (which the ABA partially restricts now for certification). Providing online training is still a relatively new approach for most community colleges and not yet a core part of their education approach, but they expressed a willingness to expand those capabilities in the future.

Finally, the community colleges would agree to take on the entire curriculum, including the year that is currently provided only through the law school, if the LLLT Board and the Supreme Court would allow them to do so. That change in program design would potentially improve the sustainability of the LLLT program by solving a number of issues with the economic viability of the training program, including the financial aid issue.

The experience of licensed LLLTs to date has not been especially encouraging in terms of viable business models when operating as a pure full-time LLLT practice, but the evidence suggests that viable business models are possible under the right conditions. Two Yale University researchers describe three conceptual business models that LLLTs might implement: solo practice, semi-solo practice, and firm employee.⁷ Of the currently licensed LLLTs, most are using either the semi-solo practice or the firm employee. Only a couple of LLLTs are attempting a true solo practice at this point, but that is very likely to change as the program grows.

⁷ "Pathway to Success," Jie Min and Bethany Hill, unpublished.

The few LLLTs practicing full-time had very carefully analyzed their services and their related costs. They conducted their practices according to well-structured business models. The part-time LLLTs approached their businesses in a more unstructured way and charged hourly rates instead of fixed fees. Working for law firms as paralegals provided an economic safety net that made it less necessary to work out a more explicit and detailed business plan. Partly because the services offered by LLLTs are so new and limited in ways that are not obvious to the public, marketing and public education are important issues for attracting a viable volume of clients. Support by local bars and law firms clearly helped by providing cross referrals of clients, but more attention to fundamental business marketing is clearly needed. A growing number of county bars are accepting LLLTs as members and the WSBA made LLLTs members in January 2017.

Many of the practicing LLLTs cited revenue uncertainties as their motivation for selecting the semi-solo or firm employee business models. In most cases, both models took the form of relationships with existing law firms. In several cases the LLLTs had previously worked for those firms as paralegals and simply continued those relationships in a different way. Aside from revenue concerns, a close connection to a law firm also supported appropriate referrals both to and from the LLLT, which was beneficial for both business parties.

The Yale paper goes on to lay out in simple terms a standard approach to writing a good business plan. Like many new small businesses, LLLTs often lack basic skills in business management and are at high risk of business failure if they attempt a solo practice. That risk is not reduced by the obvious value that LLLTs provide to their clients. It is rather a normal function of being a new small business. Those risks include being under-capitalized and lacking an effective marketing plan. Again, the WSBA and LLLT Board are working to mitigate these issues.⁸ Several of the Yale paper recommendations parallel recommendations made later in this evaluation.

Discussion:

Both the regulatory oversight and the law school training use unsustainable business models right now. With increased volumes of LLLTs both could potentially become sustainable, but the likelihood of sufficient volumes is an open question. Similarly, only a couple of the currently licensed LLLTs appear to be making a living solely as LLLTs. The rest are using mixed business models and working significant amounts as traditional paralegals for law firms to ensure sufficient incomes.

Effective marketing is perhaps the critical link for business success at this point. Many LLLTs are unable to attract a sufficient number of clients to run a viable business even though the evidence for a sufficient pool of potential clients is strong. With any new service that is not well known or understood by the public, it is difficult for potential clients to literally discover the existence of the new role and understand when it might make sense to use the services of a LLLT. When local law firms support the LLLT role and provide appropriate referrals, that behavior partially mitigates these concerns. Conversely, when the local bar is actively hostile, it makes the marketing issue much more difficult to solve. Fortunately, this problem seems to be dwindling as county bars gain experience working with LLLTs.

Findings:

⁸ “Suggestions for the LLLT Program,” Jie Min and Bethany Hill, unpublished.

- The regulatory business model requires significant subsidies to operate to date.
- The law school business model also requires a subsidy to operate at current volumes.
- Most licensed paralegals work at least part-time for law firms as traditional paralegals.
- Even when LLLTs work for law firms as LLLTs, they sometimes receive a fixed salary rather than a proportion of the revenue they earn.
- Most LLLTs struggle to attract enough clients to sustain a viable business.
- When LLLTs understand their business well enough to charge flat fees without undue risk, they are better able to manage their business and market to potential clients.
- Many LLLTs could benefit from targeted training on business management and marketing.
- A hypothetical business model that charges fees between those of a paralegal and a lawyer seems viable, but current actual fees are mostly the same as a traditional paralegal. Where the LLLTs are operating a pure LLLT practice, their fees tend to be moderately higher than that of paralegals.
- Limited scope fixed fees can be charged for most or all current tasks, but most current LLLTs prefer to charge by the hour to mitigate risk.

Conclusions

In many ways the current LLLT program is a success. It is appropriate, efficacious, and at least potentially sustainable. It meets a significant need and is viewed as a legitimate legal role. For a new kind of program designed “from scratch” to be so successful is quite impressive. Clearly a lot of careful thought went into program design.

Several of the concerns identified in this evaluation report may be mitigated or eliminated by program modifications being considered by the LLLT Board (and several of them have now been approved by the Board). These proposals include the addition of a new practice area that targets a broad and known need, the ability to draft legal letters, and the ability to help clients fill out legal forms not in the approved practice areas.⁹ The Board considered and approved proposals to permit appearances in court, participation in legal negotiations, partial elimination of the real property exclusion from the family practice area, and an indefinite extension of the time waiver. These proposals are now before the state supreme court, except for the last one which has already been approved by that body.

The WSBA regulates the LLLT program very much after the model of the traditional bar with lawyers. This model is a fairly costly regulatory approach that is viable with lawyers because of the scale at which it operates. Fortunately, the bulk of the regulatory costs are incurred at the beginning of the program. Still, the use of LLLTs will either have to scale up significantly or a more lightweight regulatory approach will be needed. Balancing consumer protection with regulatory costs may require innovative strategies.¹⁰

Recommendations

Several of the recommendations mirror proposed changes to the current LLLT program and the LLLT Board is already acting to implement several other recommendations.

- 1. Require a dedicated subset of the experience hours to be in the specific practice area.*
- 2. Expand the training devoted to practical document assembly tasks.*
- 3. Allow community colleges without ABA certification to qualify as trainers (now approved).*
- 4. Consider shifting the law school training to the community colleges.*
- 5. Provide more training and practical advice on business management.*
- 6. Provide practical advice and assistance on marketing.*

⁹ In late 2016 the WSBA Board of Governors (BOG) passed a resolution supporting the exploration of a new practice area, expanding the tools LLLTs may use with clients, and voted to make LLLTs (and LPOs) members of the bar and be allocated one seat (either a LLLT or a Limited Practice Officer or LPO) on the BOG.

¹⁰ For a discussion of other possible regulatory approaches, see “How to Regulate Legal Services to Promote Access, Innovation, and the Quality of Lawyering,” Gillian Hadfield and Deborah Rhode, Hastings Law Review Vol. 67 (June 2016): pgs. 1191-1223.

7. Accelerate adoption of the scope modifications for the current practice area.
 - a. Allow LLLTs to interact with opposing parties and their legal representatives.
 - b. Allow LLLTs to appear in court with their clients and clarify matters of fact during hearings.
8. Accelerate provision of new practice areas for future and existing LLLTs.
9. Consider the use of innovative regulatory approaches to reduce regulatory costs while continuing to adequately protect consumers.

The Bottom Line

The LLLT program offers an innovative way to extend affordable legal services to a potentially large segment of the public that cannot afford traditional lawyers. While the scope of the role is limited and will not be the answer for every legal problem, LLLTs definitely can provide quality legal services to those who need it and also significantly reduce the stress of navigating a foreign process that is complex and daunting.

The LLLT program also offers the possibility of improving the quality of filings in court cases involving self-represented litigants and thus reducing the time and cost required for courts to deal with such cases. The Washington State example suggests that LLLTs and lawyers may form mutually advantageous business relationships, making referrals to each other as appropriate. Since LLLTs appear to assist customers who could not afford lawyers, they do not compete directly with lawyers.

This program should be replicated in other states to improve access to justice. As experience is gained and its program design is optimized, affordable legal services should become widely available to those with needs in areas where the public typically must now use self-representation. By offering low cost legal services, state bar associations will be able to compete directly with for profit businesses operating outside the regulatory umbrella of state justice systems. By doing so, they can ensure that the public has access to quality legal services.

Appendix A. Acknowledgments

The National Center for State Courts and the American Bar Foundation would like to thank the Public Welfare Foundation for sponsoring and funding this project as part of its on-going efforts to improve access to justice.

The Washington State Bar Association provided very generous support to this project and assisted in many ways.

Any errors or omissions that remain are the sole responsibility of the study's authors.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 20

LIMITED PRACTICE RULE FOR LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIANS

A. Purpose. The Civil Legal Needs Study (2003), commissioned by the Supreme Court, clearly established that the legal needs of the consuming public are not currently being met. The public is entitled to be assured that legal services are rendered only by qualified trained legal practitioners. Only the legal profession is authorized to provide such services. The purpose of this rule is to authorize certain persons to render limited legal assistance or advice in approved practice areas of law. This rule shall prescribe the conditions of and limitations upon the provision of such services in order to protect the public and ensure that only trained and qualified legal practitioners may provide the same. This rule is intended to permit trained Limited License Legal Technicians to provide limited legal assistance under carefully regulated circumstances in ways that expand the affordability of quality legal assistance which protects the public interest.

B. Definitions. For purposes of this rule, the following definitions will apply:

- (1) “APR” means the Supreme Court’s Admission to Practice Rules.
- (2) “LLLT Board” means the Limited License Legal Technician Board.
- (3) “Lawyer” means a person licensed as a lawyer and eligible to practice law in any United States jurisdiction.
- (4) “Limited License Legal Technician” (LLLT) means a person qualified by education, training, and work experience who is authorized to engage in the limited practice of law in approved practice areas of law as specified by this rule and related regulations.
- (5) “Paralegal/legal assistant” means a person qualified by education, training, or work experience; who is employed or retained by a lawyer, law office, corporation, governmental agency, or other entity; and who performs specifically delegated substantive law-related work for which a lawyer is responsible.
- (6) “Reviewed and approved by a Washington lawyer” means that a Washington lawyer has personally supervised the legal work and documented that supervision by the Washington lawyer’s signature and bar number.
- (7) “Substantive law-related work” means work that requires knowledge of legal concepts and is customarily, but not necessarily, performed by a lawyer.
- (8) “Supervised” means a lawyer personally directs, approves, and has responsibility for work performed by the Limited License Legal Technician.
- (9) “Washington lawyer” means a person licensed and eligible to practice law in Washington and who is an active or emeritus pro bono lawyer member of the Bar.
- (10) Words of authority:
 - (a) “May” means “has discretion to,” “has a right to,” or “is permitted to.”
 - (b) “Must” or “shall” means “is required to.”
 - (c) “Should” means “recommended but not required.”

C. Limited License Legal Technician Board

(1) Establishment. There is hereby established a Limited License Legal Technician Board (LLLT Board). The LLLT Board shall consist of 15 voting members appointed by the Supreme Court, and one nonvoting ex officio member who is a representative of the Washington State Board of Community and Technical Colleges. At least 11 members shall be Washington lawyers, LLLTs, or LPOs. Of those 11 members, at least 9 shall be active lawyers or LLLTs, and no more than 2 may be LPOs, or judicial or emeritus pro bono lawyers or LLLTs. Four members of the LLLT Board shall be Washington residents who do not have a license to practice law. Appointments shall be for staggered three year terms. No member may serve more than two consecutive full three year terms. The validity of the Board's actions is not affected if the Board's makeup differs from the stated constitution due to a temporary vacancy in any of the specified positions.

(2) LLLTT Board Responsibilities. The LLLT Board shall be responsible for the following:

(a) Recommending practice areas of law for LLLTs, subject to approval by the Supreme Court;

(b) Working with the Bar and other appropriate entities to select, create, maintain, and grade the examinations required under this rule which shall, at a minimum, cover the rules of professional conduct applicable to LLLTs, rules relating to the attorney-client privilege, procedural rules, and substantive law issues related to approved practice areas;

(c) Approving education and experience requirements for licensure in approved practice areas;

(d) Establishing and overseeing committees and tenure of members;

(e) Establishing and maintaining criteria for approval of educational programs that offer LLLT core curriculum; and

(f) Such other activities and functions as are expressly provided for in this rule.

(3) Rules and Regulations. The LLLT Board shall propose rules, regulations and amendments to these rules and regulations, to implement and carry out the provisions of this rule, for adoption by the Supreme Court.

(4) Administration. The Bar shall provide reasonably necessary administrative support for the LLLT Board. All notices and filings required by these Rules, including applications for admission as an LLLT, shall be sent to the headquarters of the Bar.

(5) Expenses of the LLLT Board. Members of the LLLT Board shall not be compensated for their services but shall be reimbursed for actual reasonable and necessary expenses incurred in the performance of their duties according to the Bar's expense policies.

D. [Reserved.]

E. [Reserved.]

F. Scope of Practice Authorized by Limited Practice Rule. The Limited License Legal Technician shall ascertain whether the issue is within the defined practice area for which the LLLT is licensed. If it is not, the LLLT shall not render any legal assistance on this issue and shall advise the client to seek the services of a lawyer. If the issue is within the defined practice area, the LLLT may render the following limited legal assistance to a pro se client:

(1) Obtain relevant facts, and explain the relevancy of such information to the client;

(2) Inform the client of applicable procedures, including deadlines, documents which must be filed, and the anticipated course of the legal proceeding;

(3) Inform the client of and assist with applicable procedures for proper service of process and filing of legal documents;

(4) Provide the client with self-help materials prepared by a Washington lawyer or approved by the LLLT Board, which contain information about relevant legal requirements, case law basis for the client's claim, and venue and jurisdiction requirements;

(5) Review documents or exhibits that the client has received and explain them to the client;

(6) Select, complete, file, and effect service of forms that have been approved by the State of Washington, either through a governmental agency or by the Administrative Office of the Courts or the content of which is specified by statute; federal forms; forms prepared by a Washington lawyer; or forms approved by the LLLT Board; and advise the client of the significance of the selected forms to the client's case;

(7) Perform legal research;

(8) Draft letters setting forth legal opinions that are intended to be read by persons other than the client;

(9) Draft documents beyond what is permitted in paragraph (6), if the work is reviewed and approved by a Washington lawyer;

(10) Advise the client as to other documents that may be necessary to the client's case, and explain how such additional documents or pleadings may affect the client's case;

(11) Assist the client in obtaining necessary records, such as birth, death, or marriage certificates.

(12) Communicate and negotiate with the opposing party or the party's representative regarding procedural matters, such as setting court hearings or other ministerial or civil procedure matters;

(13) Negotiate the client's legal rights or responsibilities, provided that the client has given written consent defining the parameters of the negotiation prior to the onset of the negotiation; and

(14) Render other types of legal assistance when specifically authorized by the scope of practice regulations for the approved practice area in which the LLLT is licensed.

G. Conditions Under Which A Limited License Legal Technician May Provide Services

(1) A Limited License Legal Technician must personally perform the authorized services for the client and may not delegate these to a nonlicensed person. Nothing in this prohibition shall prevent a person who is not a licensed LLLT from performing translation services;

(2) Prior to the performance of the services for a fee, the Limited License Legal Technician shall enter into a written contract with the client, signed by both the client and the Limited License Legal Technician that includes the following provisions:

(a) An explanation of the services to be performed, including a conspicuous statement that the Limited License Legal Technician may not represent the client in court, formal administrative adjudicative proceedings, or other formal dispute resolution process or negotiate the client's legal rights or responsibilities, unless permitted under GR 24(b) or specifically authorized by the scope of practice regulations for the approved practice area in which the LLLT is licensed;

(b) Identification of all fees and costs to be charged to the client for the services to be performed;

(c) A statement that upon the client's request, the LLLT shall provide to the client any documents submitted by the client to the Limited License Legal Technician;

(d) A statement that the Limited License Legal Technician is not a lawyer and may only perform limited legal services. This statement shall be on the first page of the contract in minimum twelve-point bold type print;

(e) A statement describing the Limited License Legal Technician's duty to protect the confidentiality of information provided by the client and the Limited License Legal Technician's work product associated with the services sought or provided by the Limited License Legal Technician;

(f) A statement that the client has the right to rescind the contract at any time and receive a full refund of unearned fees. This statement shall be conspicuously set forth in the contract; and

(g) Any other conditions required by the rules and regulations of the LLLT Board.

(3) A Limited License Legal Technician may not provide services that exceed the scope of practice authorized by this rule, and shall inform the client, in such instance, that the client should seek the services of a lawyer.

(4) A document prepared by an LLLT shall include the LLLT's name, signature, and license number beneath the signature of the client. LLLTs do not need to sign sworn statements or declarations of the client or a third party, and do not need to sign documents that do not require a signature by the client, such as information sheets.

H. Prohibited Acts. In the course of dealing with clients or prospective clients, a Limited License Legal Technician shall not:

(1) Make any statement that the Limited License Legal Technician can or will obtain special favors from or has special influence with any court or governmental agency;

(2) Retain any fees or costs for services not performed;

(3) Refuse to return documents supplied by, prepared by, or paid for by the client, upon the request of the client. These documents must be returned upon request even if there is a fee dispute between the Limited License Legal Technician and the client;

(4) Represent or advertise, in connection with the provision of services, other legal titles or credentials that could cause a client to believe that the Limited License Legal Technician possesses professional legal skills beyond those authorized by the license held by the Limited License Legal Technician;

(5) Represent a client in court proceedings, formal administrative adjudicative proceedings, or other formal dispute resolution process, unless permitted by GR 24 or specifically authorized by the scope of practice regulations for the approved practice area in which the LLLT is licensed;

(6) Provide services to a client in connection with a legal matter in another state, unless permitted by the laws of that state to perform such services for the client;

(7) Represent or otherwise provide legal or law related services to a client, except as permitted by law, this rule or associated rules and regulations;

(8) Conduct or defend a deposition;

(9) Initiate or respond to an appeal to an appellate court; and

(10) Otherwise violate the Limited License Legal Technician Rules of Professional Conduct.

I. Continuing Licensing Requirements

(1) Continuing Education Requirements. Each active Limited License Legal Technician must complete a minimum number of credit hours of approved or accredited education, as prescribed by APR 11.

(2) Financial Responsibility. Each LLLT shall show proof of ability to respond in damages resulting from his or her acts or omissions in the performance of services permitted under APR 28 by:

(a) submitting an individual professional liability insurance policy in the amount of at least $100,000 per claim and a $300,000 annual aggregate limit;

(b) submitting a professional liability insurance policy of the employer or the parent company of the employer who has agreed to provide coverage for the LLLT's ability to respond in damages in the amount of at least $100,000 per claim and a $300,000 annual aggregate limit; or

(c) submitting proof of indemnification by the LLLT's government employer.

(3) License Fees and Assessments. Each Limited License Legal Technician must pay the annual license fee established by the Board of Governors, subject to review by the Supreme Court, and any mandatory assessments as ordered by the Supreme Court. Provisions in the Bar's Bylaws regarding procedures for assessing and collecting lawyer license fees and late fees, and regarding deadlines, rebates, apportionment, fee reductions, and exemptions, and any other issues relating to fees and assessments, shall also apply to LLLT license fees and late fees. Failure to pay may result in suspension from practice pursuant to APR 17.

(4) Trust Account. Each active Limited License Legal Technician shall annually certify compliance with Rules 1.15A and 1.15B of the LLLT Rules of Professional Conduct. Such certification shall be filed in a form and manner as prescribed by the Bar and shall include the bank where each account is held and the account number. Failure to certify may result in suspension from practice pursuant to APR 17.

J. Existing Law Unchanged. This rule shall in no way modify existing law prohibiting the unauthorized practice of law.

K. Professional Responsibility and Limited License Legal Technician-Client Relationship

(1) Limited License Legal Technicians acting within the scope of authority set forth in this rule shall be held to the standard of care of a Washington lawyer.

(2) Limited License Legal Technicians shall be held to the ethical standards of the Limited License Legal Technician Rules of Professional Conduct, which shall create an LLLT IOLTA program for the proper handling of funds coming into the possession of the Limited License Legal Technician.

(3) The Washington law of attorney-client privilege and law of a lawyer's fiduciary responsibility to the client shall apply to the Limited License Legal Technician-client relationship to the same extent as it would apply to an attorney-client relationship.

L. Confidentiality and Public Records. GR 12.4 shall apply to access to LLLT Board records.

M. Inactive Status. An LLLT may request transfer to inactive status after being admitted. An LLLT on inactive status is required to pay an annual license fee as established by the Board of Governors and approved by the Supreme Court.

N. Reinstatement to Active Status. An LLLT on inactive status may return to active status by filing an application and complying with the procedures set forth for lawyer members of the Bar in the Bar's Bylaws.

O. Voluntary Resignation. Any Limited License Legal Technician may request to voluntarily resign the LLLT license by notifying the Bar in such form and manner as the Bar may prescribe. If there is a disciplinary investigation or proceeding then pending against the LLLT, or if the LLLT has knowledge that the filing of a grievance of substance against such LLLT is imminent, resignation is permitted only under the provisions of the applicable disciplinary rules. An LLLT who resigns the LLLT license cannot practice law in Washington in any manner, unless they are otherwise licensed or authorized to do so by the Supreme Court.

[Adopted effective September 1, 2012; Amended effective August 20, 2013; February 3, 2015; June 21, 2016; September 1, 2017, June 4, 2019.]

REGULATION 1. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 2. APPROVED PRACTICE AREAS—SCOPE OF PRACTICE AUTHORIZED BY LIMITED LICENSE LEGAL TECHNICIAN RULE

In each practice area in which an LLLT is licensed, the LLLT shall comply with the provisions defining the scope of practice as found in APR 28 and as described herein.

A. Issues Beyond the Scope of Authorized Practice.

An LLLT has an affirmative duty under APR 28(F) to inform clients when issues arise that are beyond the authorized scope of the LLLT's practice. When an affirmative duty under APR 28(F) arises, then the LLLT shall inform the client in writing that:

1. the issue may exist, describing in general terms the nature of the issue;
2. the LLLT is not authorized to advise or assist on this issue;
3. the failure to obtain a lawyer's advice could be adverse to the client's interests; and
4. the client should consult with a lawyer to obtain appropriate advice and documents necessary to protect the client's interests.

After an issue beyond the LLLT's scope of practice has been identified, if the client engages a lawyer with respect to the issue, then an LLLT may prepare a document related to the issue only if a lawyer acting on behalf of the client has provided appropriate documents and written instructions for the LLLT as to whether and how to proceed with respect to the issue. If the client does not engage a lawyer with respect to the issue, then the LLLT may prepare documents that relate to the issue if the client informs the LLLT how the issue is to be determined and instructs the LLLT how to complete the relevant portions of the document, and above the LLLT's signature at the end of the document, the LLLT inserts a statement to the effect that the LLLT did not advise the client with respect to any issue outside of the LLLT's scope of practice and completed any portions of the document with respect to any such issues at the direction of the client.

B. Domestic Relations.

1. Domestic Relations, Defined. For the purposes of these Regulations, domestic relations shall include only the following actions: (a) divorce and dissolution, (b) parenting and support, (c) parentage or paternity, (d) child support modification, (e) parenting plan modification, (f) domestic violence protection orders, (g) committed intimate relationships only as they pertain to parenting and support issues, (h) legal separation, (i) nonparental and third party custody, (j) other protection or restraining orders arising from a domestic relations case, and (k) relocation.

2. Scope of Practice for LLLT's—Domestic Relations. LLLTs licensed in domestic relations may render legal services to clients as provided in APR 28(F) and this regulation, except as prohibited by APR 28(H) and Regulation 2(B).

(a) Unless an issue beyond the scope arises or a prohibited act would be required, LLLTs may advise and assist clients with initiating and responding to actions and related motions, discovery, trial preparation, temporary and final orders, and modifications of orders.

(b) LLLT legal services regarding the division of real property shall be limited to matters where the real property is a single family residential dwelling with owner equity less than or equal to twice the homestead exemption (see RCW 6.13.030). LLLTs shall use the form for real property division as approved by the LLLT Board.

(c) LLLTs may advise as to the allocation of retirement assets for defined contribution plans with a value less than the homestead exemption, and as provided in United States Internal Revenue Code (IRC) sections 401a; 401k; 403b; 457; and Individual Retirement Accounts as set forth in IRC section 408.

(d) LLLTs may include language in a decree of dissolution awarding retirement assets as described in APR 28 Regulation 2(B)(2)(c) when the respondent defaults, when the parties agree on the award, or when the court awards the assets following trial. The award language in the decree shall identify (1) the party responsible for having the qualified domestic relations order (QDRO) or supplemental order prepared and by whom, (2) how the cost of the QDRO or supplemental order preparation is to be paid, (3) by what date the QDRO or supplemental order must be prepared, and (4) the remedy for failure to follow through with preparation of the QDRO or supplemental order.

(e) LLLTs may prepare paper work and accompany and assist clients in dispute resolution proceedings including mediation, arbitration, and settlement conferences where not prohibited by the rules and procedures of the forum.

(f) LLLTs, when accompanying their clients, may assist and confer with their pro se clients at depositions.

(g) LLLTs may present to a court agreed orders, uncontested orders, default orders, and accompanying documents.

(h) LLLTs, when accompanying their clients, may assist and confer with their pro se clients and respond to direct questions from the court or tribunal regarding factual and procedural issues at the hearings listed below:

i. domestic violence protection orders and other protection or restraining orders arising from a domestic relations case;

ii. motions for temporary orders, including but not limited to temporary parenting plans, child support, maintenance, and orders to show cause;

iii. enforcement of domestic relations orders;

iv. administrative child support;

v. modification of child support;

vi. adequate cause hearings for nonparental custody or parenting plan modifications;

vii. reconsiderations or revisions;

viii. trial setting calendar proceedings with or without the client when the LLLT has confirmed the available dates of the client in writing in advance of the proceeding.

3. Prohibited Acts. In addition to the prohibitions set forth in APR 28(H), in the course of rendering legal services to clients or prospective clients, LLLTs licensed to practice in domestic relations:

a. shall not render legal services to more than one party in any domestic relations matter;

b. shall not render legal services in:

i. defacto parentage actions;

ii. actions that involve 25 U.S.C. chapter 21, the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, or chapter 13.38 RCW, the Washington State Indian Child Welfare Act;

iii. division or conveyance of formal business entities, commercial property, or residential real property except as permitted by Regulation 2(B);

iv. preparation of QDROs and supplemental orders dividing retirement assets beyond what is prescribed in Regulation 2(B)(2)(d);

v. any retirement assets whereby the decree effectuates the division or the implementation of the division of the asset;

vi. bankruptcy, including obtaining a stay from bankruptcy;

vii. disposition of debts and assets, if one party is in bankruptcy or files a bankruptcy during the pendency of the proceeding, unless: (a) the LLLT's client has retained a lawyer to represent him/her in the bankruptcy, (b) the client has consulted with a lawyer and the lawyer has provided written instructions for the LLLT as to whether and how to proceed regarding the division of debts and assets in the domestic relations proceeding, or (c) the bankruptcy has been discharged;

viii. property issues in committed intimate relationship actions;

ix. major parenting plan modifications and nonparental custody actions beyond the adequate cause hearing unless the terms are agreed to by the parties or one party defaults;

x. the determination of Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act issues under chapter 26.27 RCW or Uniform Interstate Family Support Act issues under chapter 26.21A RCW unless and until jurisdiction has been resolved;

xi. objections or responses in contested relocation actions; and

xii. final revised parenting plans in relocation actions except in the event of default or where the terms have been agreed to by the parties.

REGULATION 3. EDUCATION REQUIREMENTS FOR LLLT APPLICANTS AND APPROVAL OF EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS

An applicant for admission as an LLLT shall satisfy the following education requirements:

A. Core Curriculum.

1. Credit Requirements. An applicant for licensure shall have earned 45 credit hours as required by APR 3. The core curriculum must include the following required subject matters with minimum credit hours earned as indicated:

1. Civil Procedure, minimum 8 credit hours;
2. Contracts, minimum 3 credit hours;
3. Interviewing and Investigation Techniques, minimum 3 credit hours;
4. Introduction to Law and Legal Process, minimum 3 credit hours;
5. Law Office Procedures and Technology, minimum 3 credit hours;
6. Legal Research, Writing and Analysis, minimum 8 credit hours; and
7. Professional Responsibility, minimum 3 credit hours.

The core curriculum courses in which credit for the foregoing subject matters is earned shall satisfy the curricular requirements approved by the LLLT Board and published by the Bar. If the required courses completed by the applicant do not total 45 credit hours, then the applicant may earn the remaining credit hours by taking legal or paralegal elective courses. All core curriculum course credit hours must be earned at an ABA approved law school, an educational institution with an ABA approved paralegal program, or at an educational institution with an LLLT core curriculum program approved by the LLLT Board under the Washington State LLLT Educational Program Approval Standards.

For purposes of satisfying APR 3(e)(2), one credit hour shall be equivalent to 450 minutes of instruction.

2. LLLT Educational Program Approval Requirements for Programs Not Approved by the ABA. The LLLT Board shall be responsible for establishing and maintaining standards, to be published by the Association, for approving LLLT educational programs that are not otherwise approved by the ABA. Educational programs complying with the LLLT Board's standards shall be approved by the LLLT Board and qualified to teach the LLLT core curriculum.

B. Practice Area Curriculum. An applicant for licensure in a defined practice area shall have completed the prescribed curriculum and earned course credits for that defined practice area, as set forth below and in APR 3(e). Each practice area curriculum course shall satisfy the curricular requirements approved by the LLLT Board and published by the Bar.

1. Domestic Relations.

a. Prerequisites: Prior to enrolling in the domestic relations practice area courses, applicants shall complete the following core courses: Civil Procedure; Interviewing and Investigation Techniques; Introduction to Law and Legal Process; Legal Research, Writing, and Analysis; and Professional Responsibility.

b. Credit Requirements: Applicants shall complete 5 credit hours in basic domestic relations subjects and 10 credit hours in advanced and Washington specific domestic relations subjects.

C. Required Supplemental Education. The LLLT Board has discretion to require all LLLTs to complete supplemental education in order to maintain their licenses due to changes in the permitted scope of practice for LLLTs. The LLLT Board shall provide notice to LLLTs of the supplemental education requirement and the deadline for completion of the requirement, allowing at least 12 months to complete the required supplemental education. LLLTs may be administratively suspended pursuant to the procedures set forth in APR 17 if they fail to comply with the supplemental education requirements by the stated deadline.

REGULATION 4. LIMITED TIME WAIVERS

A. Limited Time Waiver, Defined. For the limited time between the date the Board begins to accept applications and December 31, 2023, the LLLT Board shall grant a waiver of the minimum associate-level degree requirement and/or the core curriculum education requirement set forth in APR 3 if an applicant meets the requirements set forth in Regulation 4(B). The LLLT Board shall not grant waivers for applications filed after December 31, 2023. The LLLT Board shall not waive the practice area curriculum requirement. The limited time waiver application will be separate from the application process for admission set forth in these regulations.

B. Waiver Requirements and Applications. To qualify for the limited time waiver, an applicant shall pay the required fee, submit the required waiver application form and, provide proof, in such form and manner as the Bar requires, that he/she has:

1. Passed an LLLT Board approved national paralegal certification examination;
2. Active certification from an LLLT Board approved national paralegal certification organization; and
3. Completed 10 years of substantive law-related experience supervised by a licensed lawyer within the 15 years preceding the application for the waiver. Proof of 10 years of substantive-law related experience supervised by a licensed lawyer shall include the following:
 - a. the name and bar number of the supervising lawyer(s),
 - b. certification by the lawyer that the work experience meets the definition of substantive law-related work experience as defined in APR 28, and
 - c. the dates of employment or service.

C. Review of Limited Time Waiver Application. The Bar shall review each limited time waiver application to determine if the application meets the waiver requirements. Any application that does not meet the limited time waiver requirements as established by this Regulation shall be denied by the Bar on administrative grounds, with a written statement of the reason(s) for denial.

D. Review of Denial. An applicant whose application for waiver has been denied by the Bar may request review by the LLLT Board chair. Such request shall be filed with the Bar within 14 days of the date of the notification of denial. The applicant shall be provided with written notification of the chair's decision, which is not subject to review.

E. Expiration of Limited Time Waiver Approval. Approval of the limited time waiver application shall expire December 31, 2025. After expiration of the approval, any subsequent application for licensure by the applicant shall meet all of the standard requirements for admission without waiver.

REGULATION 5. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 6. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 7. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 8. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 9. SUBSTANTIVE LAW-RELATED WORK EXPERIENCE REQUIREMENT

Each applicant for licensure as a limited license legal technician shall show proof of having completed 3,000 hours of substantive law-related work experience supervised by a licensed lawyer as required by APR 5(c). The experience requirement shall be completed no more than three years before and 40 months after the date of the LLLT practice area examination that the applicant passed. The proof shall be provided in such form as the Bar requires, but shall include at a minimum:

1. the name and bar number of the supervising lawyer;
2. certification that the work experience meets the definition of substantive law-related work experience as defined in APR 28;
3. the total number of hours of substantive law-related work experience performed under the supervising lawyer; and
4. certification that the requisite work experience was acquired within the time period required by this regulation.

REGULATION 10. ADDITIONAL PRACTICE AREAS

A. Application for Additional Practice Area. An LLLT seeking admission in an additional practice area must complete and file with the Bar:

1. a completed practice area application in a form and manner prescribed by the Bar;
2. evidence in a form and manner prescribed by the Bar demonstrating completion of the practice area curriculum required under Regulation 3(B); and
3. a signed and notarized Authorization, Release, and Affidavit of Applicant.

B. Additional Practice Area Prelicensure Requirements. An LLLT who is seeking licensure in an additional practice area shall:

1. take and pass the additional practice area examination;
2. pay the annual license fee as stated in the fee schedule; and
3. file any and all licensing forms required for active LLLTs.

The requirements above shall be completed within one year of the date the applicant is notified of the practice area examination results. If an LLLT fails to satisfy all the requirements for licensure in an additional practice area within this period, the LLLT shall not be eligible for licensure in the additional practice area without submitting a new application and retaking the practice area examination.

C. Order Admitting LLLT to Limited Practice in Additional Practice Area. After examining the recommendation and accompanying documents transmitted by the Bar, the Supreme Court may enter such order in each case as it deems advisable. For those LLLTs it deems qualified, the Supreme Court shall enter an order admitting them to limited practice in the additional practice area.

D. Voluntary Termination of Single Practice Area License. An LLLT licensed in two or more practice areas may request to voluntarily terminate a single practice area by notifying the Bar in writing. After terminating the practice area license, the LLLT shall not accept any new clients or engage in work as an LLLT in any matter in the terminated practice area. The Bar will notify the LLLT of the effective date of the termination.

REGULATION 11. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 12. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 13. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 14. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 15. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 16. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 17. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 18. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 19. [Reserved.]

REGULATION 20. AMENDMENT AND BOARD POLICIES

These Regulations may be altered, amended, or repealed by vote of the LLLT Board on approval of the Supreme Court. The LLLT Board has ongoing authority to adopt policies for the administration of the LLLT program consistent with APR 28 and these Regulations.

[Adopted effective August 20, 2013; Amended effective September 3, 2013; March 31, 2015; June 21, 2016; November 22, 2016; September 1, 2017; June 4, 2019.]

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 21

Rule 14-802. Authorization to practice law.

(a) Application. Except as set forth in paragraphs (c) and (d), only persons who are active, licensed Bar members in good standing may engage in the practice of law in Utah.

(b) Definitions. For purposes of this rule:

(1) "Practice of law" means representing the interests of another person by informing, counseling, advising, assisting, advocating for, or drafting documents for that person through applying the law and associated legal principles to that person's facts and circumstances.

(2) "Law" means the collective body of declarations by governmental authorities that establish a person's rights, duties, constraints, and freedoms and includes:

(A) constitutional provisions, treaties, statutes, ordinances, rules, regulations, and similarly enacted declarations; and

(B) decisions, orders, and deliberations of adjudicative, legislative, and executive bodies of government that have authority to interpret, prescribe, and determine a person's rights, duties, constraints, and freedoms.

(3) "Person" includes the plural as well as the singular and legal entities as well as natural persons.

(c) Licensed Paralegal Practitioners. A person may be licensed to engage in the limited practice of law in the area or areas of (1) temporary separation, divorce, parentage, cohabitant abuse, civil stalking, and custody and support; (2) forcible entry and detainer; and (3) debt collection matters in which the dollar amount in issue does not exceed the statutory limit for small claims cases.

(1) Within a practice area or areas in which a Licensed Paralegal Practitioner is licensed, a Licensed Paralegal Practitioner who is in good standing may represent the interests of a natural person who is not represented by a lawyer unaffiliated with the Licensed Paralegal Practitioner by:

(A) establishing a contractual relationship with the client;

(B) interviewing the client to understand the client's objectives and obtaining facts relevant to achieving that objective;

- (C) completing forms approved by the Judicial Council;
- (D) informing, counseling, advising, and assisting in determining which form to use and giving advice on how to complete the form;
- (E) signing, filing, and completing service of the form;
- (F) obtaining, explaining, and filing any document needed to support the form;
- (G) reviewing documents of another party and explaining them;
- (H) informing, counseling, assisting and advocating for a client in mediated negotiations;
- (I) filling in, signing, filing, and completing service of a written settlement agreement form in conformity with the negotiated agreement;
- (J) communicating with another party or the party's representative regarding the relevant form and matters reasonably related thereto; and
- (K) explaining a court order that affects the client's rights and obligations.

(d) Exceptions and Exclusions. Whether or not it constitutes the practice of law, the following activity by a nonlawyer, who is not otherwise claiming to be a lawyer or to be able to practice law, is permitted:

- (1) Making legal forms available to the general public, whether by sale or otherwise, or publishing legal self-help information by print or electronic media.
- (2) Providing general legal information, opinions, or recommendations about possible legal rights, remedies, defenses, procedures, options, or strategies, but not specific advice related to another person's facts or circumstances.
- (3) Providing clerical assistance to another to complete a form provided by a municipal, state, or federal court located in Utah when no fee is charged to do so.
- (4) When expressly permitted by the court after having found it clearly to be in the best interests of the child or ward, assisting one's minor child or ward in a juvenile court proceeding.

- (5) Representing a party in small claims court as permitted by Rule of Small Claims Procedure 13.
- (6) Representing without compensation a natural person or representing a legal entity as an employee representative of that entity in an arbitration proceeding, where the amount in controversy does not exceed the jurisdictional limit of the small claims court set by the Utah Legislature.
- (7) Representing a party in any mediation proceeding.
- (8) Acting as a representative before administrative tribunals or agencies as authorized by tribunal or agency rule or practice.
- (9) Serving in a neutral capacity as a mediator, arbitrator, or conciliator.
- (10) Participating in labor negotiations, arbitrations, or conciliations arising under collective bargaining rights or agreements or as otherwise allowed by law.
- (11) Lobbying governmental bodies as an agent or representative of others.
- (12) Advising or preparing documents for others in the following described circumstances and by the following described persons:
 - (A) A real estate agent or broker licensed in Utah may complete state-approved forms including sales and associated contracts directly related to the sale of real estate and personal property for their customers.
 - (B) An abstractor or title insurance agent licensed in Utah may issue real estate title opinions and title reports and prepare deeds for customers.
 - (C) Financial institutions and securities brokers and dealers licensed in Utah may inform customers with respect to their options for titles of securities, bank accounts, annuities, and other investments.
 - (D) Insurance companies and agents licensed in Utah may recommend coverage, inform customers with respect to their options for titling of ownership of insurance and annuity contracts, the naming of beneficiaries, and the adjustment of claims under the company's insurance coverage outside of litigation.
 - (E) Health care providers may provide clerical assistance to patients in completing and executing durable powers of attorney for health care and natural death declarations when no fee is charged to do so.

(F) Certified Public Accountants, enrolled IRS agents, public accountants, public bookkeepers, and tax preparers may prepare tax returns.

(13) Representing an Indian tribe that has formally intervened in a proceeding subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. sections 1901–63. Before a nonlawyer may represent a tribe, the tribe must designate the nonlawyer representative by filing a written authorization. If the tribe changes its designated representative or if the representative withdraws, the tribe must file a written substitution of representation or withdrawal.

(14) Providing legal services under Utah Supreme Court Standing Order No. 15.

Effective September 1, 2020

Advisory Committee Comment:

Paragraph (a).

“Active” in this paragraph refers to the formal status of a lawyer, as determined by the Bar. Among other things, an active lawyer must comply with the Bar’s requirements for continuing legal education.

Paragraph (b).

The practice of law defined in paragraph (b)(1) includes: giving advice or counsel to another person as to that person’s legal rights or responsibilities with respect to that person’s facts and circumstances; selecting, drafting, or completing legal documents that affect the legal rights or responsibilities of another person; representing another person before an adjudicative, legislative, or executive body, including preparing or filing documents and conducting discovery; and negotiating legal rights or responsibilities on behalf of another person.

Because representing oneself does not involve another person, it is not technically the “practice of law.” Thus, any natural person may represent oneself as an individual in any legal context. To the same effect is Article 1, Rule 14-111 Integration and Management: “Nothing in this article shall prohibit a person who is unlicensed as an attorney at law or a foreign legal consultant from personally representing that person’s own interests in a cause to which the person is a party in his or her own right and not as assignee.”

Similarly, an employee of a business entity is not engaged in “the representation of the interest of another person” when activities involving the law are a part of the employee’s duties solely in connection with the internal business operations of the entity and do not involve providing legal advice to another person. Further, a person acting in an official capacity as an employee of a government agency that has administrative authority to determine the rights of persons under the law is also not representing the interests of another person.

As defined in paragraph (b)(2), “the law” is a comprehensive term that includes not only the black-letter law set forth in constitutions, treaties, statutes, ordinances, administrative and court rules and regulations, and similar enactments of governmental authorities, but the entire fabric of its development, enforcement, application, and interpretation.

Laws duly enacted by the electorate by initiative and referendum under constitutional authority are included under paragraph (b)(2)(A).

Paragraph (b)(2)(B) is intended to incorporate the breadth of decisional law, as well as the background, such as committee hearings, floor discussions, and other legislative history, that often accompanies the written law of legislatures and other law- and rule-making bodies. Reference to adjudicative bodies in this paragraph includes courts and similar tribunals, arbitrators, administrative agencies, and other bodies that render judgments or opinions involving a person’s interests.

Paragraph (c).

The exceptions for Licensed Paralegal Practitioners arise from the November 18, 2015 Report and Recommendation of the Utah Supreme Court Task Force to Examine Limited Legal Licensing. The Task Force was created to make recommendations to address the large number of litigants who are unrepresented or forgo access to the Utah judicial system because of the high cost of retaining a lawyer. The Task Force recommended that the Utah Supreme Court exercise its constitutional authority to govern the practice of law to create a subset of discreet legal services in the practice areas of: (1) temporary separation, divorce, parentage, cohabitant abuse, civil stalking, and custody and support; (2) unlawful detainer and forcible entry and detainer; and (3) debt collection matters in which the dollar amount in issue does not exceed the statutory limit for small claims cases. The Task Force determined that these three practice areas have the highest number of unrepresented litigants in need of low-cost legal assistance. Based on the Task Force’s recommendations, the Utah

Supreme Court authorized Licensed Paralegal Practitioners to provide limited legal services as prescribed in this rule and in accordance with the Supreme Court Rules of Professional Practice.

Paragraph (c)(1)(E).

A Licensed Paralegal Practitioner may complete forms that are approved by the Judicial Council and that are related to the limited scope of practice of law described in paragraph (c). The Judicial Council approves forms for the Online Consumer Assistance Program and for use by the public. The forms approved by the Judicial Council may be found at <https://www.utcourts.gov/ocap/> and <https://www.utcourts.gov/selfhelp/>.

Paragraph (d).

To the extent not already addressed by the requirement that the practice of law involves the representation of others, paragraph (d)(2) permits the direct and indirect dissemination of legal information in an educational context, such as legal teaching and lectures.

Paragraph (d)(3) permits assistance provided by employees of the courts and legal-aid and similar organizations that do not charge for providing these services.

Paragraph (d)(7) applies only to the procedures directly related to parties' involvement before a neutral third-party mediator; it does not extend to any related judicial proceedings unless otherwise provided for under this rule (e.g., under paragraph (d)(5)).

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 22

Rule 15-703. Qualifications for Licensure as a Licensed Paralegal Practitioner.

(a) Requirements of Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Applicants. The burden of proof is on the Applicant to establish by clear and convincing evidence that she or he:

(a)(1) has paid the prescribed application fees;

(a)(2) has either been granted a Limited Time Waiver under Rule 15-705 or has timely filed the required Complete Application for a Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Applicant in accordance with Rule 15-707;

(a)(3) is at least 21 years old;

(a)(4) has graduated with either:

(a)(4)(A) a First Professional Degree in law from an Approved Law School; or,

(a)(4)(B) an Associate Degree in paralegal studies from an Accredited School or Accredited Program; or

(a)(4)(C) a Bachelor's Degree in paralegal studies from an Accredited School or Accredited Program; or

(a)(4)(D) a Bachelor's Degree in any field from an Accredited School, plus a Paralegal Certificate or 15 credit hours of paralegal studies from an Accredited Program;

(a)(5) if the applicant does not have a First Professional Degree from an Approved Law School, the applicant must have 1500 hours of Substantive Law-Related Experience within the last 3 years, including 500 hours of Substantive Law-Related Experience in temporary separation, divorce, parentage, cohabitant abuse, civil stalking, custody and support, and name change if the Applicant is to be licensed in that area, or 100 hours of Substantive Law-Related Experience in forcible entry and detainer or debt collection if the Applicant is to be licensed in those areas.

(a)(6) has successfully passed the Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Ethics Examination;

(a)(7) has successfully passed the Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Examination(s) for the practice area(s) in which the Applicant seeks licensure;

(a)(8) is of good moral character and satisfies the requirements of Rule 15-708;

(a)(9) has a proven record of ethical, civil and professional behavior; and

- (a)(10) complies with the provisions of Rule 15-716 concerning licensing and enrollment fees.
- (b) If the Applicant has not graduated with a First Professional Degree in law from an approved law school, the Applicant must:
- (b)(1) have taken a specialized course of instruction approved by the Board in professional ethics for Licensed Paralegal Practitioners;
 - (b)(2) have taken a specialized course of instruction approved by the Board in each specialty area in which the Applicant seeks to be licensed; and
 - (b)(3) have obtained either the Certified Paralegal (CP or CLA) credential from the National Association of Legal Assistants (NALA); the Professional Paralegal (PP) credential from the National Association of Legal Professionals (NALS); or the Registered Paralegal (RP) credential from the National Federation of Paralegal Associations (NFPA).
- (c) An individual who has been disbarred or suspended in any jurisdiction may not apply for licensure as a Paralegal Practitioner.

Effective December 18, 2019

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 23

Rule 15-705. Limited time waiver.

(a) Limited Time Waiver. For the limited time of three years from the date the Bar initially begins to accept LPP applications for licensure, the Bar may grant a waiver of the minimum educational requirements set forth in Rule 15-703 if, within two years from the time the waiver request is submitted, an applicant has established by clear and convincing evidence that the applicant:

(a)(1) has paid the prescribed fees and filed the required Application for a Limited Time Waiver;

(a)(2) is at least 21 years old;

(a)(3) has completed 7 years of Full-time Substantive Law-Related Experience as a Paralegal within the 10 years preceding the application for the waiver, including experience for the practice area in which the Applicant seeks licensure, including 500 hours of Substantive Law-Related Experience in temporary separation, divorce, parentage, cohabitant abuse, civil stalking, and custody and support if the Applicant is to be licensed in that area, or 100 hours of Substantive Law-Related Experience in forcible entry and detainer and unlawful detainer or debt collection if the Applicant is to be licensed in those areas. Proof of 7 years of Full-time Substantive Law-Related Experience and the required number of hours in the practice area in which the Applicant seeks licensure shall be certified by the supervising lawyer(s) and shall include the following:

(a)(3)(A) the name and Bar number of the supervising lawyer(s) or supervising Licensed Paralegal Practitioner(s);

(a)(3)(B) certification by the lawyer or Licensed Paralegal Practitioner that the work experience meets the definition of Substantive Law-Related Experience in the practice area in which Applicant will be licensed as defined in Rule 15-701; and

(a)(3)(C) the dates of the applicant's employment by or service with the lawyer(s) or Licensed Paralegal Practitioner(s);

(a)(4) has successfully passed the Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Ethics Examination approved by the Board;

(a)(5) has successfully passed the Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Examination(s) for the practice area(s) in which the Applicant will be licensed;

(a)(6) is of good moral character and satisfies the requirements of Rule 15-708; and

(a)(7) has a proven record of ethical, civil and professional behavior.

Effective November 1, 2018

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 24

2018

Access to Justice Through Limited Legal Assistance

Deborah L. Rhode

Kevin Eaton

Anna Porto

Follow this and additional works at: <https://scholarlycommons.law.northwestern.edu/njihr>

Part of the Family Law Commons, Human Rights Law Commons, and the Social Welfare Law Commons

Recommended Citation

Deborah L. Rhode, Kevin Eaton, and Anna Porto, Access to Justice Through Limited Legal Assistance, 16 NW. J. HUM. RTS. 1 (2018).
<https://scholarlycommons.law.northwestern.edu/njihr/vol16/iss1/1>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Northwestern Pritzker School of Law Scholarly Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Northwestern Journal of Human Rights by an authorized editor of Northwestern Pritzker School of Law Scholarly Commons.

Access to Justice Through Limited Legal Assistance

Deborah L. Rhode,^{*} Kevin Eaton,^{} and Anna Porto^{}

This article describes an empirical survey of a limited legal assistance program designed to assist low-income individuals with family law matters. It begins by exploring the need for such research, given the nation's shameful level of unmet legal needs, and the lack of rigorous evaluation of strategies designed to address those needs. The article discussion then describes the methodology of a survey of Alaska Legal Services' limited legal assistance program, and the survey's major findings. Among the most critical conclusions are that limited assistance is a cost-effective use of resources, but that more effort should center on provision of hands-on assistance in form completion. A final section of the article places these findings in the context of broader strategies to increase access to justice for those who need it most.

^{*} Ernest W. McFarland Professor of Law and Director of the Center on the Legal Profession, Stanford University. The authors gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Luciana Herman, Nikole Nelson, Lucy Buford Ricca, and James Sandman, who made this project possible.

^{} J.D., Stanford Law School (2017)

^{} J.D., Stanford Law School (2017)

INTRODUCTION

For a nation with one of the world's highest concentrations of lawyers, the United States does a shamefully inadequate job of making legal services available to individuals who need those services most.¹ According to the World Justice Project, the United States ranks 94th of 113 countries in the accessibility and affordability of civil justice.² One response to this justice gap has been limited legal assistance programs, which provide services to individuals short of full representation. Although such programs have become the dominant form of civil aid to the poor in the United States, relatively little research has assessed their effectiveness. The study described in this article aims to add to that literature. At the request of the federal Legal Services Corporation [LSC], Stanford law school researchers evaluated the limited legal assistance program for family law cases at one of the legal services offices that the LSC funded. The discussion that follows details the study's findings and recommendations, and places them in the context of other research on limited legal assistance.

That discussion proceeds in four parts. Part I explores the challenges of securing access to justice in the United States, and limited legal assistance as one commonly proposed response. Part II describes the methodology of the survey that we conducted to evaluate one representative limited legal assistance program for the poor. Part III summarizes findings from that survey. Among the most important findings are that limited legal assistance programs can often be cost-effective means by which to secure legal services for low-income individuals, and that some forms of assistance, such as hands-on help with form completion, are more successful than others. Based on these results, Part IV concludes with recommendations for the structure of limited legal assistance initiatives and for further research on their effectiveness.

I. THE CHALLENGE OF ACCESS TO JUSTICE AND THE ROLE OF LIMITED LEGAL ASSISTANCE

A. The Justice Gap

The exact extent of unmet legal need in the United States is unknown, but estimates suggest that the numbers are staggering. A 2013 American Bar Foundation survey found that two-thirds of adults had experienced at least one "civil justice situation" in the previous eighteen months.³ These situations included basic human needs, such as those involving debt, housing, and children, and they resulted in significant negative consequences nearly half the time.⁴ Unsurprisingly, poor people were the most likely group to report these situations and their ¹DEBORAH L. RHODE, THE TROUBLE WITH LAWYERS 30 (2015). The United States has the world's second highest per capita number of lawyers, second only to Israel. The American per capita count is created by comparing the ABA's lawyer count with the census count for U.S. citizens. See 'Lawyer Population Survey' (n.1); United States Census Bureau, 'Population Estimates' <www.census.gov/popest/data/historical/>. On Israel, see Drew Combs, The Global Legal Market: By the Numbers, AM. LAW., Oct. 23, 2014, at 2, LEXISNEXIS LNSDUID-ALM-AMLAWR-1202671042330).

²U.S. Rank On Access To Civil Justice In Rule Of Law Index Drops To 94th Out Of 113 Countries, NATIONAL COALITION FOR A CIVIL RIGHT TO COUNSEL (Oct. 27, 2016), http://civilrighttocounsel.org/major_developments/217; See AGRAST ET AL., THE WORLD JUSTICE PROJECT, RULE OF LAW INDEX 175 (2016).

³REBECCA L. SANDEFUR, AM. BAR FOUND., ACCESSING JUSTICE IN THE CONTEMPORARY USA: FINDINGS FROM THE COMMUNITY NEEDS AND SERVICES STUDY 3, 7 (2014).

⁴*Id.*

accompanying negative consequences but the least likely to resolve them through the legal system.⁵ Of course, just because a problem has not been resolved legally does not mean it has gone unaddressed.⁶ However, other data paint a sobering portrait. Surveys by the federal Legal Services Corporation, for example, have suggested that over four-fifths of the poor's legal needs are unmet, a number that has held steady for more than a decade.⁷ These unresolved legal issues often result in severe hardship to individuals and negative consequences to society at large.⁸ In the context of family law alone, which is the focus of our empirical research here, failure to address unmet legal needs may put at lives at risk through domestic violence, and result in loss of child custody by deserving parents, children left in physically dangerous, psychologically traumatic, or financially inadequate family settings, and related problems.⁹ Taxpayers also pay a price for these broken lives through increased crime, incarceration, emergency medical care and so forth. It is a dispiriting irony that a country that prides itself on its rule of law does so little to make it accessible to those who need it the most.

Part of the problem is that most individuals who encounter the legal system either by choice or by necessity lack legal representation. In state courts, at least one party is without an attorney in more than two thirds of cases.¹⁰ For family law matters, the focus of our study, this number is much higher, with at least one party appearing pro se almost eighty percent of the time.¹¹ A variety of factors have contributed to the spike in self-represented litigants. Federal funding for legal services has dramatically decreased over the past three decades, while the availability and need for self-help assistance has dramatically increased.¹² Increased divorce rates, and individuals' desire to maintain control over sensitive personal issues have also

⁵ Russell Engler, And Justice For All—Including the Unrepresented Poor: Revisiting the Roles of the Judges, Mediators, and Clerks, 67 FORDHAM L. REV. 1987, 2047 n.263 (1999); Sarah Sternberg Greene, Race, Class and Access to Civil Justice, 101 IOWA L. REV. 1263, 1266 (2016) (citing surveys).

⁶ See Rebecca L. Sandefur, What We Know and Need to Know About the Legal Needs of the Public, 67 S.C. L. REV. 443, 451 (2016) (“People are perfectly capable of handling some situations on their own without understanding the legal aspects of those problems, in the sense that the problem is resolved in a way that is roughly consistent with the law but without reference to it or contact with it.”).

⁷ LEGAL SERVICES CORP., THE JUSTICE GAP: MEASURING THE UNMET CIVIL LEGAL NEEDS OF LOW INCOME AMERICANS 6 (estimating that eighty-six percent of the civil legal problems reported by low –income Americans in the past year received inadequate or no legal help); See also LSC Releases Report On Justice Gap In America, Legal Services Corp., <https://www.lsc.gov/media-center/press-releases/2011/lsc-releases-report-justice-gap-america> (Oct. 17, 2005) (“[A]t least 80% of the civil legal needs of low-income Americans are not being met.”).

⁸ See PASCOE PLEASANCE ET AL., Mounting Problems: Further Evidence of the Social, Economic and Health Consequences of Civil Justice Problems, in TRANSFORMING LIVES: LAW AND SOCIAL PROCESS 67, 79, 83-85 (2006); Sandefur, supra note 6, at 457; Deborah L. Rhode & Scott L. Cummings, Access to Justice: Looking Back, Thinking Ahead, 30 GEO. J LEG. ETHICS 485, 488 (2017); PASCOE PLEASANCE ET AL., supra note 8 at 79, 83-85; Sandefur, supra note 6, at 457.

⁹ See DEBORAH L. RHODE, ACCESS TO JUSTICE 3 (2004).

¹⁰ Jessica K. Steinberg, In Pursuit of Justice? Case Outcomes and the Delivery of Unbundled Legal Services, 18 GEO. J. POVERTY L. & POL'Y 453, 459 (2011); Jed S. Rakoff, Why You Won't Get Your Day in Court, N. Y. REV. BOOKS, Nov. 24, 2016, at 4.

¹¹ See Michele N. Struffolino, Taking Limited Representation to the Limits: The Efficacy of Using Unbundled Legal Services in Domestic-Relations Matters Involving Litigation, 2 ST. MARY'S J. LEGAL MALPRACTICE & ETHICS 166, 203 (2012) (“In some states, as many as 80% of cases in family court involve at least one unrepresented party.”).

¹² The federal legal services budget has declined almost 40% over the last three decades. The 1986 budget for the Legal Services Corporation was, in 2014 dollars, $631,504. LEGAL SERVICES CORP., LSC BY THE NUMBERS: THE DATA UNDERLYING LEGAL AID PROGRAMS 3 (2014). The 2016 budget was $385 million. LEGAL SERVICES CORP., FISCAL YEAR 2017 BUDGET REQUEST 1. For access to self-help materials, see BENJAMIN H. BARTON, GLASS HALF FULL: THE DECLINE AND REBIRTH OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION 88-103 (2015).

contributed to the increase in unrepresented parties.¹³ Predictably, a disproportionate number of these family-law litigants are poor people and people of color.¹⁴ Although commentators have labeled the influx of unrepresented litigants a “pro se crisis,” it is in fact the new “reality in today’s justice system.”¹⁵

In our view, the appropriate response to these unmet needs is not necessarily to increase the number of lawyers available to provide full legal representation to people of limited means. Rather, the solution lies in finding the most cost-effective way to address their underlying problems. As we will argue later, limited legal assistance, whether available through licensed members of the bar, or other non-law providers and online information services, is part of the answer. But we need additional research to determine what strategies are most effective and efficient in addressing particular needs. This article aims to supply some of the data that are necessary.

B. Strategies for Increasing Access to Justice and the Potential of Limited Legal Assistance

Strategies for addressing the justice gap are not in short supply. They include:

- recognition of a right to counsel in civil cases where fundamental interests are at issue and a lawyer’s assistance is critical to ensure basic fairness (Civil Gideon);¹⁶
- increased pro bono representation by private lawyers;¹⁷
- increased requirements of pro bono services for applicants to the bar;¹⁸
- increased reliance on trained non-lawyers to provide routine legal services;¹⁹

¹³ See, e.g., Russell Engler, Pursuing Access to Justice and Civil Right to Counsel in a Time of Economic Crisis, 15 ROGER WILLIAMS U. L. REV. 472 (2010).

¹⁴ Russell Engler, Reflections On A Civil Right To Counsel And Drawing Lines: When Does Access To Justice Mean Full Representation By Counsel, And When Might Less Assistance Suffice? 9 SEATTLE J. SOC. JUST. 97, 99 (2011).

¹⁵ Marsha M. Mansfield, Litigants Without Lawyers: Measuring Success in Family Court, 67 HASTINGS L.J. 1389, 1392 (2016). Indeed, legal aid offices and pro bono organizations recognized the prevalence of pro se litigants “decades ago.” D. James Greiner, Cassandra Wolos Pattanayak & Jonathan Philip Hennessy, The Limits of Unbundled Legal Assistance: A Randomized Study in a Massachusetts District Court and Prospects for the Future, 126 HARV. L. REV. 901, 911 (2013). In 2000, the Conference of State Court Administrators concluded that “the recent surge in self-represented litigation is unprecedented and shows no signs of abating.”

¹⁶ For discussion of the origins of and limitations of a right to counsel, see Rhode, supra note 1, at 51; see also Russell Engler, Connecting Self-Representation to Civil Gideon: What Existing Data Reveal About When Counsel is Most Needed, 37 FORDHAM URB. L.J. 37, 43 (2010). The American Bar Association has supported a resolution in favor of appointing counsel in areas of “basic human need,” defined as shelter, sustenance, safety, health, and child custody. AM. BAR ASS’N, REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES 13 (2006).

¹⁷ Only a third of lawyers report meeting the ABA’s aspirational standard of 50 hours a year. AM. BAR ASS’N, SUPPORTING JUSTICE III: A REPORT ON THE PRO BONO WORK OF AMERICA’S LAWYERS VI (2013); MODEL RULES OF PROF’L CONDUCT r. 6.1 (AM. BAR ASS’N 2015). See also Deborah L. Rhode, Equal Justice Under Law: Connecting Principle to Practice, 12 WASH. U. J.L. & POL’Y 47, 62 (2003) (“It is a professional disgrace that pro bono service occupies less than one percent of lawyers’ working hours.”).

¹⁸ For instance, New York currently requires applicants for admission to the New York bar to have completed 50 hours of pro bono services. 22 NYCRR 520.16 (2015) (Pro bono requirement for bar admission). California has considered adding a similar requirement.

www.abajournal.com/news/article/following_new_yorks_lead_california_bar_officials_plan_to_require_pro_bono/.

¹⁹ See RHODE, supra note 1, at 40 (noting that “from the standpoint of the public, the objective is more access to justice, not necessarily to lawyers”).

- technological innovations that enable individuals to more readily access legal forms and assistance online;²⁰ and
- online dispute resolution, which allows litigants to resolve problems outside of the courtroom using web-based programs powered by algorithms.²¹

The organized bar, however, has been hostile to many of the strategies involving technology and non-lawyers that undercut its market for legal services.²²

One critical strategy for increasing access to justice has involved limited “unbundled” legal assistance that provides less than full representation to clients.²³ These services include providing brief advice, drafting letters and complaints, helping complete forms, making telephone calls, or some combination of these. State courts, ethical authorities, and bar associations have generally embraced such assistance as a way not only to help pro se litigants but also to reduce the burden that they place on the judicial system.²⁴ In 2002, the American Bar Association (ABA) amended its Model Rules of Professional Conduct to explicitly authorize unbundled legal services.²⁵ States have also altered other ethical rules to address potential dilemmas arising from limited representation.²⁶

Given the resource constraints facing legal aid offices, and the bar’s growing acceptance of limited legal services, they are now the primary form of assistance at these offices across the country.²⁷ Currently, nearly every state has at least one formal program offering unbundled legal assistance, and limited legal services are also offered at clinics, and through hotlines and websites.²⁸ Most commonly, unbundled pro se assistance is available at court-based self-help centers, which give “in-person advice, document assistance and web-based information” to nearly 3.7 million people each year.²⁹ Family law, child support, and domestic violence cases are the primary cases in which self-help centers offer assistance.³⁰

The LSC, the primary funder of legal services for low-income individuals, has also embraced pro se assistance.³¹ Such assistance is the primary offering at LSC grantee offices. In 2014, LSC attorneys provided “counsel and advice” in sixty percent of cases, but offered

²⁰ RHODE & CUMMINGS, supra note 8, at 490.

²¹ For example, new “apps” help low-income individuals navigate legal proceedings and connect them with free or low-cost lawyers. Joe Dysart, 20 Apps to Help Provide Easier Access to Legal Help, A.B.A. J. (Apr. 1, 2015), http://www.abajournal.com/magazine/article/20_apps_providing_easier_access_to_legal_help.

²² See Benjamin H. Barton & Deborah Rhode, Legal Services Regulation in the United States: A Tale of Two Models, in INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVES ON THE REGULATION OF LAWYERS AND LEGAL SERVICES, 27 (Andrew Boone ed., 2017); Deborah L. Rhode & Lucy Ricca, Unauthorized Practice Enforcement: Protection of the Public or the Profession, 82 FORDHAM L. REV. 2587, 2588 (2014); Richard Zorza & David Udell, New Roles for Non-Lawyers to Increase Access to Justice, 41 FORDHAM URB. L.J. 1259, 1278 (2014).

²³ Pro se assistance may include providing a client advice, drafting a single court document, or representing a client in a specific proceeding. These limited actions comprise the “entire lawyering relationship,” and the client proceeds pro se the rest of the action. See Steinberg, supra note 10, at 461.

²⁴ Greiner et al., supra note 15, at 912.

²⁵ Struffolino, supra note 11, at 215.

²⁶ Greiner et al., supra note 15, at 912.

²⁷ See generally Forrest S. Mosten, Unbundling of Legal Services and the Family Lawyer, 28 FAM. L.Q. 421 (1994).

²⁸ See JOHN M. GREACEN, MICH. ST. BAR FOUND., RESOURCES TO ASSIST SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS: A FIFTY-STATE REVIEW OF THE “STATE OF THE ART” 44 (2011).

²⁹ Mansfield, supra note 15, at 1393-94.

³⁰ AM. BAR ASS’N, THE SELF-HELP CENTER CENSUS: A NATIONAL SURVEY 15 (2014).

³¹ The Legal Services Corporation supports 812 offices across the country. LEGAL SERVICES CORP., LSC BY THE NUMBERS: THE DATA UNDERLYING LEGAL AID PROGRAMS 1 (2015).

“extensive services” in less than four percent of cases.³² LSC hotlines are a common way that this brief advice is available to low-income clients.³³ Operated in nearly every state, these hotlines allow clients to receive answers to legal questions from attorneys and paralegals, and provide referrals to other lawyers for fuller assistance.³⁴

Limited legal services have obvious appeal. Maximizing the numbers of individuals who receive assistance appears to be an efficient way of allocating limited funds. It enabled LSC grant recipients to serve nearly 1.9 million people in 2014 while spending only about $5.40 per eligible client.³⁵ Given that an increase in government funding for legal services appears unlikely in today’s political climate, offering limited services seems better than offering nothing at all to the vast majority of people in need of assistance.³⁶

Yet the proliferation of limited legal services raises important questions about how effectively they address the justice gap. Some criticize limited legal services for low-income people as institutionalizing a system that fails to advance their collective interests and the need for societal reforms.³⁷ Programs that assist individuals in responding to an eviction notice or filling out divorce forms will not bring structural changes that address systemic poverty. A second concern is that limited services institutionalize apartheid justice: partial services for the poor and full representation for those who can afford it.³⁸

These are legitimate concerns. But the question is always, compared to what? The problems to which limited service programs respond involve fundamental, urgent needs. Unrepresented parties in family law cases may forfeit vital resources such as maintenance and child support, and may have difficulty securing essential protection from domestic violence.³⁹ It is by no means clear that the poor would be better off if the resources now invested in limited assistance for hundreds of thousands of individual legal needs were diverted to more social impact litigation. With respect to the second concern involving the effectiveness of such assistance, we lack sufficient well-designed research that speaks to the issue, as the following discussion indicates.

³² Id. at 16.

³³ Id. at i.

³⁴ Steinberg, supra note 10, at 463.

³⁵ LEGAL SERVICES CORP., supra note 7 at 2, 9.

³⁶ Greiner et al., supra note 15, at 912.

³⁷ See, e.g., Colleen F. Shanahan, Anna E. Carpenter & Alyx Mark, Can a Little Representation Be a Dangerous Thing?, 67 HASTINGS L.J. 1367, 1376 (2016).

³⁸ Similar criticisms have been raised about allowing non lawyers to perform legal tasks. See, e.g., Washington Supreme Court Adopts Limited Practice Rule for “Legal Technicians”, ATJ WEB (July 16, 2012), <http://www.atjweb.org/washington-supreme-court-adopts-limited-practice-rule-for-legal-technicians/> (noting that a Washington state rule allowing non-lawyers to provide services “may create a ‘two-tiered’ system of justice, where only people of financial means have access to comprehensive legal assistance, while poorer individuals are ‘relegated to a system that does not provide the full measure of service and justice to which all should be entitled’”); Rita L. Bender & Paul A. Bastine, Legal Technicians: Myths and Facts, 62 WASH. ST. BAR NEWS 23, 25 (June 2008) (arguing non-lawyers would provide “second-class representation” because “they cannot appear in court or negotiate a case”).

³⁹ Mansfield, supra note 15, at 1392; Jane C. Murphy, Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women, 11 AM. U.J. GENDER SOC. POL’Y & L. 499, 511-12 (2003). See the discussion in the text accompanying notes infra.

C. Prior Research on the Effectiveness of Limited Legal Services

Although limited legal services have become increasingly prevalent, research assessing their effectiveness remains sparse. The few studies that have evaluated such assistance for pro se parties have significant methodological limitations. Often, the studies do not randomly assign participants to receive limited legal assistance (rather than full-representation or no representation).⁴⁰ As a result, the research does not control for characteristics that may lead a client to seek assistance and influence its outcome. Moreover, these non-randomized studies do not account for the merits of a client's case, which may affect the likelihood that an individual will seek and secure assistance in the first place.⁴¹ However, despite these limitations, such studies provide some data about parties' objective outcomes and subjective experiences. Accordingly, we review both non-randomized and randomized studies that bear on the effectiveness of legal representation in general and limited services in particular.

Non-randomized studies have reached mixed results, but those involving family law matters suggest that full legal representation significantly improves outcomes.⁴² For example, a 1992 study of California families found that whether a client was represented influenced legal custody arrangements.⁴³ A 2006 Maryland study similarly found that representation affected the type of custody granted, especially in contested cases.⁴⁴ Mothers were awarded sole custody in 54.8% of cases where they were the only represented party, but were awarded sole custody in only 13.4% of cases where the fathers had representation and the mothers did not.⁴⁵ Research on domestic violence cases suggests that representation has an even more extreme impact on outcomes. Women with lawyers had an 83% success rate in obtaining a protective order, while women without lawyers received protective orders only 32% of the time.⁴⁶

Non-randomized studies on the satisfaction of legal aid recipients across multiple substantive areas yield conflicting results. A 2016 study of self-represented family law litigants in Wisconsin compared two groups of family law cases: one where neither party was represented by counsel, and another where self-represented parties received legal assistance from students at a family court clinic.⁴⁷ Litigants who had student-provided aid reported that they were more likely to successfully complete their legal actions and these litigants also expressed greater satisfaction with the legal process.⁴⁸ By contrast, other non-randomized studies have found that ⁴⁰ Engler, supra note 16, at 85-86.

⁴¹ Id.

⁴² Because our empirical study involved family law assistance, our review of research here also focuses on family cases. However, some studies in other substantive areas reach similar results. Non-randomized studies of tenants in housing court, for example, suggest that representation can decrease rates of eviction. See id. at 46-66. In small claims court cases, whether a party was represented was critical to the party's favorable judgment and the size of the award. Id.

⁴³ See generally ELEANOR E. MACCOBY & ROBERT H. MNOOKIN, DIVIDING THE CHILD: SOCIAL AND LEGAL DILEMMAS OF CUSTODY (1992).

⁴⁴ WOMEN'S LAW CTR. OF MD., FAMILIES IN TRANSITION: A FOLLOW-UP STUDY EXPLORING FAMILY LAW ISSUES IN MARYLAND 48 (2006).

⁴⁵ Id.

⁴⁶ Murphy, supra note 39, at 511-12. Presumably the individuals without lawyers did not receive other legal assistance, but the study does not discuss the possibility.

⁴⁷ Mansfield, supra note 15, at 1391.

⁴⁸ Id. at 1416.

limited assistance had no impact on case outcomes.⁴⁹ A UCLA study evaluated the effectiveness of a self-help center in a Los Angeles county courthouse.⁵⁰ The study compared outcomes of tenants who had received limited assistance from the center with tenants who had received no legal assistance. The study found that clients receiving aid “fare[d] no better (and no worse)” than housing court litigants in the general population.⁵¹ A 2009 study in a California county court reached a similar conclusion.⁵² It found that “recipients of unbundled aid fared no better than their unassisted counterparts in ultimate outcomes,” while those who received full representation fared substantially better.⁵³

The few existing randomized studies of full legal representation also have mixed findings but generally suggest that having a lawyer improves outcomes.⁵⁴ One study of New York City’s Housing Court compared a group of low-income tenants who were represented by legal counsel with a control group of tenants who proceeded pro se and found that legal representation had a strong, positive effect on the tenants’ outcomes: only 22% of represented tenants had final judgments entered against them, compared to 51% of unrepresented tenants.⁵⁵ The researchers attributed this discrepancy “solely to the presence of legal counsel,” and because the study was randomized, they concluded the results were “independent of the merits of the case.”⁵⁶

Only two randomized studies have evaluated the effect of limited legal services on client outcomes, and their results are less conclusive. In the first study (“District Court Study”), Massachusetts tenants seeking legal assistance in housing litigation were randomly assigned to two groups. The first group received limited help from a clinic that assisted clients in filling out

⁴⁹ For other examples of observational studies evaluating the effectiveness of unbundled legal assistance, see SHOSHABBA ERLICH & LANAE DAVIS, AARP, LEGAL HOTLINES CLIENT OUTCOME STUDY (2006), available at <http://legalaidresearch.org/wp-content/uploads/aarp-legal-hotlines-client-outcome-study-2006.pdf>; BONNIE ROSE HOUGH, EVALUATION OF INNOVATIONS DESIGNED TO INCREASE ACCESS TO JUSTICE FOR SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGANTS, available at <https://www.srln.org/system/files/attachments/Evaluation%20of%20Innovations%20Designed%20to%20Increase%20Access%20to%20Justice.pdf>; FERN A. FISHER ET AL., VOLUNTEER LAWYER FOR A DAY PROJECT REPORT: A TEST OF UNBUNDLED LEGAL SERVICES IN THE NEW YORK CITY HOUSING COURT (2008), available at https://www.nycourts.gov/courts/nyc/housing/pdfs/vlfdreport_0208.pdf.

⁵⁰ EMPIRICAL RESEARCH GROUP, UCLA SCHOOL OF LAW, EVALUATION OF VAN NUYS LEGAL SELF-HELP CENTER, FINAL REPORT (2001).

⁵¹ Id. at 3.

⁵² Steinberg, supra note 10, at 482.

⁵³ Id. Tenants who received unbundled aid did significantly outperform unassisted tenants in “evading default judgment and in asserting valid, doctrinally cognizable defenses to their eviction,” although this did not ultimately produce better substantive results.

⁵⁴ One study comparing represented and unrepresented individuals in unemployment proceedings found that those who were represented had worse outcomes than those who were not. D. James Greiner & Cassandra Wollos Pattanayak, Randomized Evaluation in Legal Assistance: What Difference Does Representation (Offer and Actual Use) Make?, 121 YALE L.J. 2118, 2125 (2012). A study of attorneys’ impact in American juvenile cases found that in one city, the presence of an attorney had “a profound impact on the outcomes of cases,” while in another city, “no significant differences appear between the adjudicative results reached in the experimental and control groups.” W. VAUGHAN STAPLETON & LEE E. TEITELBAUM, IN DEFENSE OF YOUTH: A STUDY OF THE ROLE OF COUNSEL IN AMERICAN JUVENILE COURTS 67 (1972).

⁵⁵ Carroll Seron et al., The Impact of Legal Counsel on Outcomes for Poor Tenants in New York City’s Housing Court: Results of a Randomized Experiment, 35 L. & SOC’Y REV. 419 (2001).

⁵⁶ Id. at 429. Critics, however, have questioned the extent to which the findings can be generalized, given certain limitations in the study’s methodology. See John Pollock & Michael Greco, It’s not Triage if the Patient Bleeds Out, 161 U. PENN. L.R. 40, 47, n.40 (2012); Jeffrey Selbin et al., Service Delivery, Resource Allocation, and Access to Justice: Greiner and Pattanayak and the Research Imperative, 122 YALE L.J. ONLINE 45, 51 (2012).

answer and discovery request forms, while the second received full legal representation. The study found that the first group fared substantially worse than the fully-represented group, both in terms of retaining possession of their units and achieving positive financial outcomes.⁵⁷

The second study (“Housing Court Study”) randomly divided tenants in a Massachusetts housing court into two groups: one receiving full representation and one receiving limited assistance.⁵⁸ This study found that full representation did not affect the outcome of the case: the individuals who received limited assistance achieved roughly the same results in terms of financial outcome and retaining possession of their housing as those who received full representation.⁵⁹

How to interpret these findings is not self-evident. One possibility is that limited assistance was as effective as full representation. Another possibility is that neither the limited assistance program nor the one offering full representation was particularly effective. This second explanation is bolstered by the fact that the success rate for both groups was far lower than the success rate for the full representation group in the District Court Study.⁶⁰ The authors of the Housing Court Study attribute its low success rate for clients with attorneys to those attorneys’ “non-confrontational style.”⁶¹ This litigation approach may have been insufficiently assertive to protect the clients’ rights.⁶²

The most definitive conclusion from this body of research is the need for more rigorous studies. The conflicting outcomes, methodological limitations, and competing explanations of prior work underscore the need for more data. Even non-randomized studies, however, can provide valuable insights into parties’ experience with limited legal assistance, which affects the legitimacy of the justice system.

II. METHODOLOGY

To gain a better understanding of the effectiveness of limited legal assistance for low-income individuals, we wanted to find a legal services office that operated such a program and was interested in cooperating with researchers. James Sandman, President of the Legal Services Corporation, put us in touch with Alaska Legal Services Corporation (ALSC). ALSC provided an ideal research forum because it was very receptive to our interests and interested in improving the provision of legal services in their state. In addition, Alaska was an ideal forum for our study given that “[it] is the geographically largest, least densely populated, and most ethnically diverse state in the U.S.”⁶³ ALSC’s director, Nikole Nelson, agreed to provide us with contact information for individuals who sought assistance regarding family law matters in 2014 and 2015 and who either received limited services or no services at all. A randomized survey was not possible because ALSC uses merit-related criteria to determine who receives limited legal assistance and who does not. Because of limited resources, ALSC considers not only income, but ⁵⁷ Greiner et al., supra note 15 at 912.

⁵⁸ D. James Greiner et al., How Effective are Limited Legal Assistance Programs? A Randomized Experiment in Massachusetts Housing Court (Sept. 1, 2012) (unpublished manuscript), available at http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1880078.

⁵⁹ Id. at 1.

⁶⁰ John Pollack, Recent Studies Compare Full Representation to Limited Assistance in Eviction Cases, 42 NAT’L HOUSING L. BULL. 72, 75 (2012).

⁶¹ Greiner et. al., supra note 58, at 47.

⁶² Id. at 48.

⁶³ Stacey Marz, Mara Kimmel, & Miguel Willis, Alaska’s Justice Ecosystem, Building a Partnership of Providers, www.courtrecords.alaska.gov/webdocs/jfa/docs/plan.pdf.

also other criteria, including the merits of the case and whether the office has classified the matter at issue as a high, medium, or low priority.⁶⁴

We chose to study family law because it is an area of huge unmet need, often involving concerns of enormous personal significance, and is an area where limited assistance is common. For example, recent statistics from Alaska indicate that family law cases have constituted “nearly 25% of the caseload of judges for a number of years, and over 75% of these cases have involved self-represented litigants.”⁶⁵ The large number of pro se parties helps explain in part why limited assistance is becoming more common in family law cases, and why a focus on this area seemed appropriate.

Between 2015 and 2016, Stanford students enrolled in a policy lab course attempted to conduct telephone interviews with enough individuals to generate a sample of at least one hundred respondents.⁶⁶ Jonathan Berry-Smith, Robert Curran, Kevin Eaton, Akiva Friedlin, Cindy Garcia, Zach Glubiak, Anna Porto, Lauren Schneider, Laura Vittet-Adamson, and Tamar Weinstock succeeded in reaching that goal. The final sample consisted of 112 individuals: 71 had received limited legal assistance (LLA recipients) and 41 received no services.⁶⁷ Seventy-percent were female, 47% were white, 81% had incomes below 150% of the federal poverty line, 32% were American Indian or Native Alaskan, 8% were African-American, 5% were Hispanic, and 4% were Asian/Pacific Islander.⁶⁸

This Stanford study was limited by a number of factors. No interviews were conducted with unrepresented parties who did not receive aid. Nor did the study directly compare individual outcomes of those assisted by the clinic with those that were unrepresented, because some unrepresented litigants opposed represented parties, who were excluded from the data. Furthermore, some individuals that sought the clinic’s assistance did not proceed with a court action, but were simply looking for advice. Still, the study provides useful insights into the effectiveness of limited advice services and strategies that could improve them.

⁶⁴ See Eligibility, ALASKA LEGAL SERV. CORP., <http://www.alsc-law.org/eligibility> (specific office priority checklists, classifying a range of issues as high, medium, or low priority, is available on request) (last visited Mar. 4, 2018).

⁶⁵ Stacey Marz, Early Resolution for Family Law Cases in Alaska’s Courts, 31 ALASKA JUSTI. F. 13 (2014).

⁶⁶ Stanford Law School offers over twenty policy practicums that enable students to work on pressing issues for actual clients in a wide variety of substantive areas. See Law & Policy Lab, STAN. L. SCH., <https://law.stanford.edu/education/only-at-sls/law-policy-lab> (last visited Mar. 4, 2018).

⁶⁷ Deborah Rhode et al., Measuring and Improving Limited Legal Advice (Aug. 2016), available at <https://law.stanford.edu/wp-content/uploads/2017/03/ALSC-Briefing-Paper-Final.pdf> [hereinafter Measuring and Improving Limited Legal Advice Report]. In acquiring the sample pool, students made multiple efforts to reach individuals, and ultimately were able to contact about a quarter of those who had sought aid from ALSC. Of the individuals contacted, 90% agreed to be interviewed.

⁶⁸ Id. at 17. One percent of the sample reported being multiracial and four percent did not report race.

The Nature and Effectiveness of Limited Assistance Programs

As Table 1 indicates, respondents sought assistance on an array of family matters, with custody and visitation constituting almost half (49%) of all of the cases. Many sought aid on multiple issues.

Table 1: Distribution of Case Types

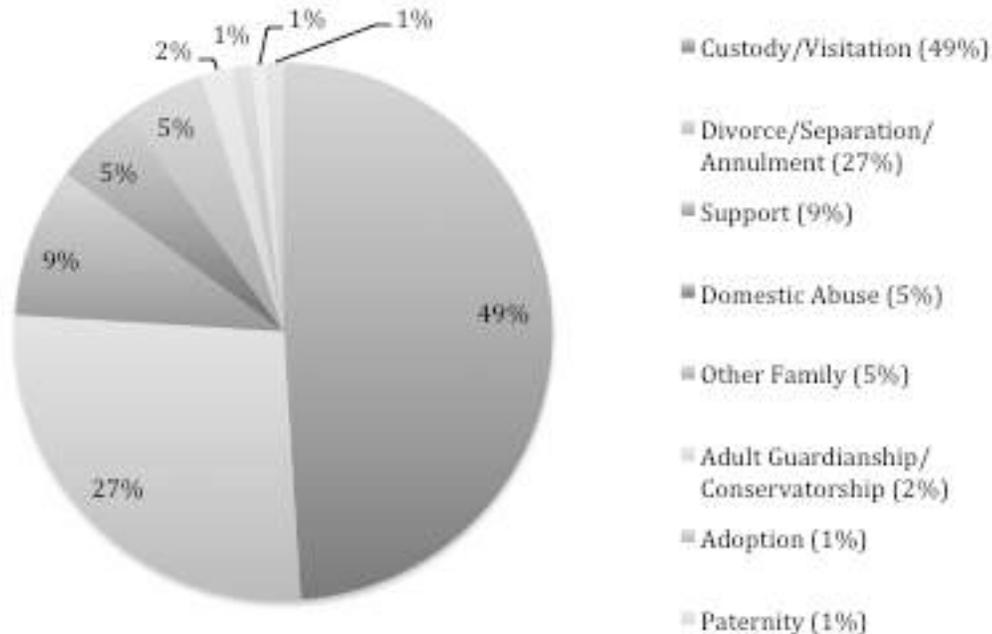

Table 1: Breakdown by type of case: Custody/Visitation (55 cases, 49% of respondents); Divorce/Separation/Annulment (30 cases, 27% of respondents); Support (10 cases, 9% of respondents); Domestic Abuse (6 cases, 5% of respondents); Other Family (6 cases, 5% of respondents); Adult Guardianship/Conservatorship (2 cases, 2% of respondents); Adoption (1 case, 1% of respondents); Paternity (1 case, 1% of respondents); Other (1 case, 1% of respondents).

One-third of respondents did not have any other source of legal help: 29% of those receiving limited legal assistance and 41% of those who received no assistance from Alaska Legal Services Corporation were in this group of no help.⁶⁹ The primary additional or alternative source of assistance was the Internet (21%), followed by another legal services organization (19%), a private lawyer (17%) and the Alaska Family Law Self Help Center (7%).⁷⁰

The most common form of limited legal assistance provided by Alaska Legal Services Corporation was legal advice, which almost three quarters (71%) of LLA respondents indicated receiving, and the other most frequent type of help involved assistance with forms.⁷¹ ALSC lawyers and staff either directed the individual to the correct forms (21%) or helped them complete those forms (18%).⁷² Over 85% of the individuals who received advice understood it and nearly 71% reported following it.⁷³ Some respondents decided to pursue their case despite advice not to. For example, two of these individuals advanced custody claims that ALSC lawyers thought unlikely to succeed. Other respondents failed to follow advice because they became overwhelmed, encountered other difficulties (such as medical problems), or were confused or unable to remember what to do next.⁷⁴

⁶⁹ Id. at 20-21.

⁷⁰ Id. at 22.

⁷¹ Id.

Although most limited assistance involved advice and identification of the right forms, the aid that respondents found most useful was hands-on-help in filling out the forms. Throughout the study, and especially in the divorce and custody cases, respondents consistently rated highly assistance with legal forms (selection, completion, and filing).⁷⁵ Less than a quarter (22%) listed any part of the assistance provided by ALSC as unhelpful, and the vast majority of individuals who did so indicated that their displeasure was not with ALSC itself, but rather with the fact that they ultimately did not achieve the outcome they sought.⁷⁶

By contrast, recipients of other forms of limited assistance, such as oral advice, had nearly double the rate of negative perceptions of the help they received compared with recipients of assistance in form completion (44% versus 22%).⁷⁷ Some respondents expressed frustration because they had followed ALSC advice to retain an attorney, but that individual was unable to resolve their case.⁷⁸

Another striking difference between individuals who received concrete assistance with forms and other limited service recipients was in the rates of follow-through and reported positive outcomes. Tables 2 and 3 show the comparison in these rates between the general population of limited legal assistance respondents and those respondents who received help filling out forms.

⁷² Id. Trained paralegals provided some of this assistance completing forms. However, ALSC only has four paralegals on staff statewide, so most of the assistance in completing forms came from ALSC attorneys.

⁷³ Id. at 24.

⁷⁴ Id. at 38-40.

⁷⁵ Id. at 47.

⁷⁶ See Deborah Rhode et al., Data on Improving Limited Legal Advice, 2015-2016 [hereinafter ALSC Data Set] (unpublished data set) (on file with authors). A number of respondents expressed gratitude for the aid they received in filling out forms that they found complicated; some noted that staff had even helped type the forms. Other respondents reported benefitting from ALSC's periodic group workshops where attorneys guided several individuals through the same process (i.e. filling out an application for a temporary restraining order).

⁷⁷ Id.

⁷⁸ See Measuring and Improving Limited Legal Advice Report, supra note 67, at 45.

Table 2: Correlation between Type of Assistance and Outcome

		Ask client: "It sounds to me from what you are saying that overall, the outcome was ..." [In...]			Total
		Positive	Negative	"Not much has changed"
What did happen when you contacted Alaska Legal Services?	Advice	24	10	15	49
	Gave me forms	18	6	4	28
	Helped complete forms	18	4	2	22
	Wrote letter(s)	2	1	0	3
	Made phone calls	5	2	1	8
	Referral	3	1	0	4
	Other	2	3	4	9
	Total	33	16	19	68

Table 3: Outcome Rates

	Follow-Through on ALSC Advice	Reported Positive Outcome
LLA Respondents (General)	75%	47%
LLA Respondents (Forms)	95%	72%

Comparison of Follow-Through and Case Outcome Rates for General LLA Respondents and LLA Respondents who obtained help in the form of filling out forms.

For many respondents, general legal advice about what to do and what forms to fill out was only minimally helpful. As one individual put it, “legal advice was just advice;” she was hoping for more “hands-on help with filling out the forms.”⁷⁹ Other respondents indicated that merely identifying which form to fill out was not much use because the forms themselves were complicated and involved legal jargon that they could not understand. About 15% could not understand the advice that they received, and about 30% lacked the ability to follow through on advice.⁸⁰ As one respondent explained, Alaska Legal Services staff “did everything they could. But, the issue that they helped most on was just the tip of the iceberg.”⁸¹

The individuals who found legal advice most helpful tended to be those who had experienced domestic violence. Respondents indicated particular appreciation that Alaska Legal ⁷⁹ Telephone Interview with participant (Fall 2015).

⁸⁰ See Measuring and Improving Limited Legal Advice Report, supra note 67, at 25-26.

⁸¹ Telephone Interview with participant (Fall 2015).

Services staff did not “make them feel less than” [others] because of their life experiences,” and one respondent noted that their help “provided a needed level of moral support” and the knowledge that they could “call someone for help.”⁸² Another survivor noted that the aid from ALSC gave her the confidence to “push forward [a claim] for custody at a time when [she] was emotionally vulnerable.”⁸³ For many of those respondents, having an attorney listen to them with compassion and insight provided benefits regardless of the outcome of their legal case.

For other individuals, however, advice was not enough. The disparity between understanding the advice received and following through on that advice was particularly pronounced for certain demographic groups and for certain types of cases. For instance, of those individuals who had been a victim of domestic violence, almost all (96%) reported understanding the advice they received, but just over three quarters of them actually followed through.⁸⁴ Others were hesitant to pursue action out of fear of retaliation.

This disparity between understanding and pursuing advice was also pronounced in divorce cases. Although every respondent seeking a divorce case reported understanding the legal advice provided, only two-thirds followed through on that advice. Of those who did not, almost all explained that they were “not really ready for divorce.”⁸⁵

Alaska’s rural population also encountered particular difficulties when advice only was available. ALSC only has permanent divisions in major population centers such as Fairbanks and Juneau. As a consequence, rural residents had less access to the hands-on form-related assistance that was most likely to be useful. Although rural and non-rural respondents reported receiving general legal advice at similar rates, only 20% of rural respondents reported getting help filling out forms compared to 33% of other LLA recipients.⁸⁶ The vast majority of rural recipients of LLA reported that their primary forms of assistance were information about what the legal process was going to be like and/or what issues would be most important (70%) and what forms to fill out (40%).⁸⁷ Moreover, because of their geographical isolation, rural respondents received most of their assistance by phone, rather than in person, which increased their difficulties in understanding the advice received. Although 89% of non-rural respondents reported understanding the advice they received, only 78% of rural respondents had that same understanding of the advice that they received.⁸⁸

Compounding this problem was the inaccessibility of other forms of reliable legal assistance for rural residents. Table 4 compares the kind of legal help apart from Alaska legal services between rural and non-rural limited legal assistance respondents.

Table 4: Outside Help For Rural and Non-Rural Residents

Source of Outside Help	Non-Rural LLA	Rural LLA
-------------------------------	----------------------	------------------

⁸² Telephone Interview with participant (Fall 2015).

⁸³ Telephone Interview with participant (Fall 2015).

⁸⁴ See ALSC Data Set, supra note 76.

⁸⁵ Telephone Interview with participant (Fall 2015).

⁸⁶ See ALSC Data Set, supra note 76.

⁸⁷ Deborah Rhode et al., Measuring and Improving Limited Legal Advice (Aug. 2016) 29-30, available at <https://law.stanford.edu/wp-content/uploads/2017/03/ALSC-Briefing-Paper-Final.pdf>.

⁸⁸ Id.

Another Legal Services Organization	27%	12.5%
Private Lawyer	22%	12.5%
Internet	22%	25%
Court Officials	11%	25%
Friends or Family	11%	25%
NONE	24%	63%

Comparison of Outside Help Rates between Rural and Non-Rural LLA Respondents. Percentages in each column will exceed 100% because respondents, naturally, indicated in many cases that they received outside help from more than one source.

As Table 4 shows, rural respondents were less likely to seek additional help than their non-rural counterparts and were less likely to get the most reliable forms of assistance, such as aid from another legal service organization or a private attorney.

From the limited data available in our sample, race was generally not a particularly significant factor in determining the effectiveness of limited legal assistance except with respect to the small number of African-Americans in the sample.⁸⁹ As Tables 5 and 6 indicate, whites and non-whites had somewhat different rates of understanding (91% versus 81%) and following advice (66% and 76%). However, the cross-tabulations below were not statistically significant and the disparity that was observed was smaller between whites and non-whites than between other groups such as rural and non-rural respondents.⁹⁰

Table 5: Correlation Between Race and Ethnicity and Comprehension

		Client Ethnicity [As indicated on the intake form]							Total
		Not Reported	Multiple	White	Hispanic	African American	Native American	Pacific Islander
Did you understand the advice you received?	Yes	2	0	29	2	1	19	2	55
	No	0	0	3	0	1	4	0	8
Total		2	0	32	2	2	23	2	63

⁸⁹ Id. at 32. Only four of the respondents were African American.

⁹⁰ Id. at 29-30, 32. Moreover, caution is warranted in reading too much into the disparity observed between whites and non-whites because the non-white sample includes six racial and ethnic groups and is much smaller than the sample of white respondents.

Table 6: Correlation Between Race and Ethnicity and Following Advice

		Client Ethnicity [As indicated on the intake form]							Total
		Not Reported	Multiple	White	Hispanic	African American	Native American	Pacific Islander
Did you follow the advice you received? Did you do what Alaska Legal Services suggested?	Yes	2	0	21	2	1	16	1	43
	No	0	0	11	0	0	6	1	18
	Total	2	0	32	2	1	22	2	61

However, as Table 7 indicates, positive outcomes were somewhat greater for whites than non-whites (52% versus 44%). All African-American respondents reported negative outcomes. Given their small number, it is impossible to generalize about whether the reasons are idiosyncratic or whether this group faces special challenges. Further research will be necessary to clarify this issue.

Table 7: Correlation Between Race and Ethnicity and Outcome

		Client Ethnicity [As indicated on the intake form]							Total
		Not Reported	Multiple	White	Hispanic	African American	Native American	Pacific Islander
Ask client: "It sounds to me from what you are saying that overall, the outcome was..." [In...]	Positive	3	0	17	2	0	10	1	33
	Negative	0	0	5	0	4	6	1	16
	"Not much has changed"	0	0	11	0	0	7	1	19
	Total	3	0	33	2	4	23	3	68

Because the objective of our partnership with Alaska Legal Services Corporation was to help the organization evaluate and improve its limited legal assistance program, we focused most of our attention on respondents who had received such aid. However, we did ask some questions of the respondents who received no services at all, and a brief comparison between the two groups bears mention.

The greatest disparity between the recipients who had received aid and those who had not is the frequency and source of outside help. Table 8 compares the rates of assistance from sources other than Alaska Legal Services Corporation between these respondents.

Table 8: Outside Help for Recipients of Limited Legal Assistance or No Assistance

Source of Outside Help	Limited Assistance	No Assistance
Court Officials	13%	11%
Family or Friends	13%	0%
Another Legal Services Organization	22%	14%
Private Lawyer	20%	14%
Internet	22%	19%
None	29%	41%

Respondents who received no services from Alaska Legal Services were also less likely to receive any additional legal assistance from other sources. Although this was the group presumably most in need of outside help, almost half did not obtain it.

Not surprisingly, the difference in case outcomes between these two groups also varied. Of respondents who received limited legal services from ALSC, 48% reported favorable outcomes, 28% said that not much had changed, and only 27% reported negative outcomes.⁹¹ By comparison, only 23% of respondents who received no services from ALSC reported favorable outcomes.⁹² Even among that group, perceptions of the outcome were not as satisfactory as among those respondents who received limited legal services. For instance, one respondent noted that “other means were expensive, but eventually [the case] was resolved, I guess, after several thousands of dollars and lots of time.”⁹³ Other respondents reported deciding not to pursue the matter, or indicated that their cases were partially resolved or still ongoing. Individuals who had received no help from Alaska Legal Services also expressed more negative perceptions about the legal process (46.3%) than those who had obtained limited legal assistance (8.69%).⁹⁴

Of course, some of these differences may reflect the merit-based criteria used to select who gets limited assistance. As noted earlier, those who have stronger cases are more likely to receive aid, so their more favorable outcomes may purely be due to the skewed nature of the sample rather than the quality of the assistance. More research using randomized samples is necessary to test the degree to which limited legal assistance matters. Still, based on the data here, as well as other studies noted earlier, having access to help will matter to some of those at risk. As one respondent summed up the situation: “I wish that [Alaska Legal Services] had the ⁹¹ Id. at 23.

⁹² See ALSC Data Set, supra note 76.

⁹³ Telephone interview with participant (Spring 2016).

⁹⁴ See ALSC Data Set, supra note 76.

resources to help when people need it. It really sucks that the kids are gone and I don't have any help getting them back. They need to come home, and I can't do it all by myself."⁹⁵

III. RECOMMENDATIONS

Our survey findings suggest several lessons about limited legal assistance programs for poor people. The first is that these programs appear to be a cost-effective use of resources. Most recipients are able to understand and follow the advice received and are more likely to obtain positive outcomes than those who receive no assistance. However, it is clear that advice alone is of limited help, and programs that want to maximize effectiveness should focus more resources on providing direct contact with staff for hands-on assistance in completing forms. Funding constraints will, of course, limit how much individualized attention legal services offices can provide. But workshop settings in which lawyers or trained non-lawyers guide multiple individuals through the process of completing their forms is likely to provide many of the benefits of individualized attention while minimizing the cost.

The same is true of self-help online services and publications that provide examples of correctly filled out forms, explanations of legal processes and deadlines, and/or automated form completion tools.⁹⁶ The most basic level of online help is forms that come with instructions. These are common in almost every state.⁹⁷ For example, Alaska has a selection of forms and instructions online, as well as a toll-free "helpline" for users who need assistance with the forms or procedures.⁹⁸ Other examples for family law matters include the Texas Supreme Court's online E-filing system for divorces⁹⁹ and Los Angeles's JusticeCorps online forms for paternity and custody.¹⁰⁰

Online videos explaining forms and court processes are also becoming more common. For example, California has its own YouTube Channel for legal self-help.¹⁰¹ It provides guided interviews and forms based on A2J Author, a free online platform that State Supreme Courts, Legal Aid Societies, Law School Clinics, Pro Bono Projects, and others have used to automate self-help.¹⁰² A2J Author is online in 38 States and has produced over 3 million legal documents

⁹⁵ Telephone interview with participant (Spring 2016).

⁹⁶ One program, funded through the Legal Services Corporation's LawHelp Interactive, uses "technology to improve the legal form and document preparation process for low-income people and the attorneys who assist them." It is currently in use in 40 states. Technology Initiative Grant Highlights and Impact, LEGAL SERVICES. CORP., <https://www.lsc.gov/grants-grantee-resources/our-grant-programs/technology-initiative-grant-program/technology> (last visited Mar. 4, 2018).

⁹⁷ See Forms and Document Assembly, NAT'L CTR. FOR ST. CTS., <http://www.ncsc.org/sitecore/content/microsites/access-to-justice/home/Topics/Forms-and-Documents-Assembly.aspx> (last visited Mar. 4, 2018) ("Nearly every state has some type of court form online. Some of these forms are combined with instructions, information, or document assembly software that make them more useful to the self-represented litigant. Nearly 40 states have some kind of self-help website that complements the online forms.").

⁹⁸ See Self Help Center: Family Law, ALASKA CT. SYS., <http://www.courts.alaska.gov/shc/family/selfhelp.htm> (last visited Mar. 4, 2018).

⁹⁹ See Interactive Forms – Texas Supreme Court Approved Divorce Form Kit, LAWHELP.ORG, <http://texaslawhelp.org/resource/commonly-used-fill-in-forms-online> (last visited Mar. 4, 2018).

¹⁰⁰ See Forms & Rules, CAL. CTS., <http://www.courts.ca.gov/justicecorps-about.htm> (last visited Mar. 4, 2018).

¹⁰¹ CaliforniaCourts SelfHelp, Introduction to Legal Self Help, YOUTUBE (Mar. 4, 2018), <https://www.youtube.com/californiacourtselfhelp>.

¹⁰² See A2J Author, History of A2J Author, <http://www.a2jauthor.org/content/history-a2j-author> (last visited Jan. 20, 2017).

for unrepresented individuals.¹⁰³

Such online services would be particularly useful for rural populations who lack ready access to workshops and personalized assistance. Efforts by the organized bar to curtail such assistance require reassessment; these efforts serve professional rather than public interests.¹⁰⁴

Courts could also facilitate access to justice by allowing trained non-lawyers to provide limited legal assistance on matters such as routine form preparation. As some of us have argued elsewhere, rules governing unauthorized practice of law should be interpreted to permit such assistance where the benefits to consumers outweigh the risks.¹⁰⁵ Judges should follow the lead of courts that have weighed the public interest in determining whether to ban non-lawyer assistance. For example, the Colorado Supreme Court upheld a system enabling non-lawyers to represent claimants in unemployment proceedings; the Court reasoned that lay representation had been accepted by the public for fifty years and “poses no threat to the People of the State of Colorado. Nor is it interfering with the proper administration of justice. No evidence was presented to the contrary.”¹⁰⁶ Similarly, the Washington State Supreme Court, after considering factors such as cost, availability of services, and consumer convenience, concluded that it was in the public interest to allow licensed real estate brokers to fill in standard form agreements.¹⁰⁷ Such a consumer-oriented approach would make for a more socially defensible regulatory structure than conventional bans on non-lawyer practice irrespective of its quality and cost-effectiveness.

Research on contexts permitting non-lawyers to provide legal advice and assist with routine documents does not suggest that their performance has been inadequate.¹⁰⁸ In a study comparing outcomes for low-income clients in the United Kingdom on matters such as welfare benefits, housing, and employment, non-lawyers generally outperformed lawyers in terms of concrete results and client satisfaction.¹⁰⁹ After reviewing their own and other empirical studies, the authors of that study concluded that “it is specialization, not professional status, which appears to be the best predictor of quality.”¹¹⁰ Ontario also allows licensed paralegals to represent individuals in minor court cases and administrative tribunal proceedings, and a five-year review reported “solid levels of [public] satisfaction with the services received.”¹¹¹ In the United States, research on lay specialists who provide legal representation in bankruptcy and ¹⁰³ Id.

¹⁰⁴ For a critical analysis of the bar’s efforts, see Deborah L. Rhode & Benjamin H. Barton, Legal Services for Routine Needs: AVVO Meets Bar Regulators (unpublished article; on file with law review or SSRN cite); Deborah L. Rhode & Benjamin H. Barton, Rethinking Self-Regulation: Antitrust Perspectives on Bar Governance, 20 CHAP. L. REV. 267, 268 (2017).

¹⁰⁵ RHODE, supra note 1, at 49; Rhode & Ricca, supra note 22 at 2608.

¹⁰⁶ Supreme Court of Colorado v. Emp’rs. Unity, 716 P.2d 460, 463 (Col. 1986).

¹⁰⁷ Cultum v. Heritage House Realtors, 694 P. 2d 630 (Wash. 1985).

¹⁰⁸ See Deborah L. Rhode, Access to Justice: Again, Still, 73 Fordham L. Rev. 1013 (2004); Julian Lonbay, Assessing the European Market for Legal Services: Developments in the Free Movement of Lawyers in the European Union, 33 FORDHAM INT’L L. J. 1629, 1636 (2011) (discussing Swedish legal advice providers); Herbert Kritzer, Rethinking Barriers to Legal Practice, 81 (JUDICATURE 100), (1997) (discussing English Citizen’s Advice Bureaus with trained non lawyer volunteers).

¹⁰⁹ Richard Moorhead, Alan Paterson & Avrom Sherr, Contesting Professionalism: Legal Aid and Nonlawyers in England and Wales, 37 L. & SOC’Y REV. 765, 785-87 (2003). For further discussion, see Deborah J. Cantrell, The Obligation of Legal Aid Lawyers to Champion Practice by Nonlawyers, 73 FORDHAM L. REV. 883, 888-90 (2004).

¹¹⁰ Moorhead, Paterson & Sherr, supra note 109, at 795.

¹¹¹ DAVID B. MORRIS, REPORT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF ONTARIO 12 (Nov. 2012).

administrative agency hearings finds that they generally perform as well or better than attorneys.¹¹² Extensive formal training is less critical than daily experience for effective advocacy.¹¹³

States should build on this research and develop licensing systems that would enable qualified non-lawyers to offer limited legal assistance on routine matters. Consumer protections could be required concerning qualifications, disclaimers, ethical standards, malpractice insurance, and discipline.¹¹⁴ “Under their inherent powers, courts could oversee the development of such licensing systems or could approve legislatively authorized structures as consistent with the public interest.”¹¹⁵ More states should follow the lead of Washington and New York, which have already taken steps in this direction. Washington has developed a system of limited license legal technicians in family law, although overly restrictive qualifications may limit its usefulness in closing the justice gap.¹¹⁶ New York has adopted a pilot program allowing non-lawyer “navigators” to assist pro se litigants in selected courts.¹¹⁷

Finally, we recommend more research focusing on limited legal assistance, particularly to poor people who need help most. Randomized studies across a range of substantive areas could help identify contexts in which limited assistance is most cost effective. Additional research should also target groups for whom positive outcomes appear least likely; our study suggests that African Americans and rural communities merit further inquiry. Finally, researchers should monitor the effectiveness of new limited legal assistance initiatives in terms of recipients’ subjective experiences and objective outcomes. Asking clients what, if anything, staff could have done better given resource constraints may yield illuminating suggestions. It may also remind us all of the grim insight one of our respondents offered: “ALSC could not have improved in any way but . . . they need a lighter caseload because they do things correctly but are simply overwhelmed.”

IV. CONCLUSION

The United States urgently requires more effective systems for delivering legal aid to those who need it most. Limited legal assistance programs are one of the most promising strategies. In the wake of cutbacks in federal support for civil legal aid, many offices have relied on these brief advice and form completion initiatives to assist the vast majority of applicants. Our findings confirm that these efforts are a cost-effective strategy, but suggest that more resources should focus on personalized assistance with completing forms. That assistance need not come from lawyers. Trained non-lawyer providers can provide the same quality services, and judicial doctrine on unauthorized practice of law should recognize as much. Technological improvements in on-line assistance should also be a priority and the bar should be aiding, not obstructing, that effort.¹¹⁸

¹¹² HERBERT KRITZER, LEGAL ADVOCACY: LAWYERS AND NONLAWYERS AT WORK 76, 108, 148, 190, 201 (1998).

¹¹³ Id. at 76, 149, 201; Kritzer, supra note 108, at 101; Emily A. Unger, Solving Immigration Consultant Fraud Through Expanded Federal Accreditation, 29 LAW & INEQ. 425, 448 (2011).

¹¹⁴ Steven Gillers, How to Make Rules for Lawyers, 40 PEPP. L. REV. 365, 417 (2013).

¹¹⁵ Deborah L. Rhode, What We Know and Need to Know About the Delivery of Legal Services by Nonlawyers, 67 S. CAR. L. REV. 429, 438 (2016); RHODE, supra note 1, at 48-51; Zorza & Udell, supra note 22, at 1306.

¹¹⁶ Wash. Ct. APR 28 (2015), For a critique of the unduly restrictive requirements that the state bar developed for these technicians, see Gillian K. Hadfield and Deborah L. Rhode, How to Regulate Legal Services to Promote Access, Innovation, and the Quality of Lawyering, 67 HASTINGS L. J. 1191, 1222 (2016).

¹¹⁷ CHIEF JUDGE’S COMMITTEE ON NONLAWYERS AND THE JUSTICE GAP, NEW YORK STATE COURT NAVIGATOR PROGRAM, NAVIGATOR SNAPSHOT REPORT (Dec. 2014).

¹¹⁸ See Rhode & Barton, supra note 104.

We also urgently need more comprehensive research evaluating these efforts. More partnerships between scholars and service providers will be critical in narrowing the justice gap, particularly given the frequent inability of cash-strapped legal aid programs to evaluate their initiatives without outside support. Only through such collaborations are we likely to reduce barriers to justice that are now a national disgrace.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 25

A 108% Return on Investment:

The Economic Impact to the State of North Carolina of Civil Legal Services in 2012

Acknowledgements

This study was commissioned by the NC Equal Access to Justice Commission.

The legal aid providers who provided the data used in this study were generous with their time and knowledge.

PRIMARY AUTHOR
Mary L. Irvine

EVALUATION TEAM
Heather Hunt, Jennifer Lechner, and Joe Polich.

This report is available at www.ncequalaccesstojustice.org.

Photos on the cover are actual clients of North Carolina legal aid providers.

Table of Contents

- Introduction 4
- Background 5
- Methodology 7
- Limitations of this Report 7
- Summary of Findings..... 8
- Federal Funds 10
 - Supplemental Nutritional Assistance Program (SNAP)
 - Supplemental Security Income/Social Security Disability Insurance (SSI/SSDI)
 - Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF)
 - Tax-related recovery and refunds, including the Earned Income Tax Credit (EITC)
- Other Awards 13
 - Child support awards
 - Housing-related awards
- Cost Savings 14
 - Domestic violence advocacy
 - Homelessness prevention
- Conclusion..... 18

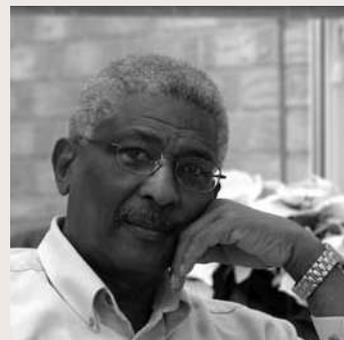

Introduction

THROUGH THEIR CLIENT ADVOCACY, legal aid providers contribute significantly to the North Carolina economy. Legal aid providers offer free legal representation in civil matters to low income North Carolinians who could not otherwise afford such services from a private attorney. Legal assistance is not provided to individuals for the purpose of stimulating the economy but rather to provide access to the civil justice system regardless of ability to pay. However, in serving the civil legal needs of low-income individuals, legal aid providers obtain millions of dollars for their clients. Often these are federal benefits which flow into North Carolina, thus strengthening the state and local economies. In many cases, benefits obtained also reduce the financial burden on the state to provide for the needy and give some modicum of financial stability for households and neighborhoods.

The North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission, a state commission created by the North Carolina Supreme Court with the charge of expanding access to civil legal representation, commissioned a study on the economic impact of free civil legal services in North Carolina. In light of the legislative defunding of nonprofit services broadly as well as specific cuts to the legal services sector, an assessment of the return on investment is timely. This report attempts to better understand the direct and indirect economic impact of the work of three North Carolina legal aid providers: Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC), Legal Services of Southern Piedmont (LSSP), and Pisgah Legal Services (PLS). The three providers compiled data about the economic benefit associated with their representation.

Relying on data compiled by the providers, this report totals the economic benefit of provided legal assistance including: (1) federal dollars obtained in the areas of food stamps, supplemental security and social security disability, temporary welfare assistance, and tax-related awards; (2) other financial awards won in the areas of child support and housing; and (3) cost savings attained in the areas of homelessness and domestic violence prevention.

While the work of legal aid providers has many positive economic impacts, only some of this economic benefit is easily captured. For example, obtaining expunctions for adults with a criminal record, thus better positioning them

This report attempts to better understand the direct and indirect economic impact of the work of three North Carolina legal aid providers: Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC), Legal Services of Southern Piedmont (LSSP), and Pisgah Legal Services (PLS).

to secure self-supporting employment, results in a clear economic benefit to the individual and community, though not one which can be plainly calculated at the completion of representation.

What this report captures is the direct economic impact in a few discrete practice areas to the local and state economies. Additionally, the report provides a projection of the indirect economic impact and costs savings generated by provided legal assistance, presenting an economic perspective on the investment in free legal services. In doing so, this report seeks to inform policymakers, foundations, and other stakeholders of the economic benefit of legal services, not just for low-income individuals but for the entire state of North Carolina.

A family of four with an annual income of $29,437 or less qualifies for legal aid services.

Background

1 Fact Sheet on the Legal Services Corporation, Legal Services Corporation, <http://www.lsc.gov/about/what-is-lsc> (last visited Oct. 16, 2013).

2 National Archives and Records Administration, Federal Register, "Annual Update of the HHS Poverty Guidelines," 2013 Poverty Guidelines for the 48 Contiguous States and District of Columbia 5183 (Jan. 24, 2013), available at <http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/FR-2013-01-24/pdf/2013-01422.pdf>.

3 "Fact Sheet."

4 45 C.F.R. § 1626.10(a) (2011), available at <https://www.federalregister.gov/a/E7-18194>.

5 Legal Services Corporation, "Documenting the Justice Gap in America: The Current Unmet Civil Legal Needs of Low-Income Americans" (Sept. 2009), available at http://www.lsc.gov/sites/default/files/LSC/pdfs/documenting_the_justice_gap_in_america_2009.pdf.

6 Legal Aid of North Carolina, "2011-2012 Annual Report" 4, available at <https://www.legalaidnc.org/public/legal-aid-of-north-carolina-2011-2012-annual-report.pdf>.

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) was formed in 1974 to provide funding and other support to states for the provision of legal services to individuals with incomes at or below 125% of the federal poverty guidelines.¹ In 2013, an individual who makes $14,363 or less each year, or a family of four with an income of $29,437 or less, qualifies for services from local legal aid providers.² LSC-funded programs provide free civil legal services to eligible individuals in a variety of areas including but not limited to housing, consumer, employment, family, and benefits law, particularly gaining access to Medicaid, food stamps, Supplemental Security Income (SSI), and Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI). Programs also serve victims of domestic violence and seniors.³ LSC-funded programs are generally only able to provide representation to natural born or naturalized citizens, although certain non-citizens may be eligible.⁴

While LSC funds provide for legal representation of many individuals who would have otherwise been unable to hire an attorney, the need far surpasses the limited capacity. LSC estimates that for every client served by LSC-funded programs, there is at least one eligible person seeking legal assistance who will be turned away due to insufficient resources.⁵ In 2012, LSC's appropriation from Congress was cut drastically, a reduction of 17% from 2010 appropriations.⁶ Given these federal cuts, pressed state budgets, increasing poverty rates across the country, and other challenges (for example the lack of knowledge of legal services offered or inability to access due to geographic distance), it is quite likely the unmet need is even greater than cited estimates.

In 2012, LSC's appropriation from Congress was cut 17%.

23.8% of the population is eligible for free legal services.

Background

In North Carolina, current Census numbers indicate that 18% of North Carolinians are living below the poverty line.⁷ With an overall population of nearly 9.5 million, this is more than 1,710,000 persons. This includes 10% of seniors or more than 130,000 impoverished people over the age of 65, and 26% of children, more than 580,000 poor young people. Presently, under LSC guidelines, approximately 2,265,242 North Carolinians, 23.8% of the population, are eligible for free legal services.⁸ Additionally, individuals 60 and older, regardless of income, are eligible to receive LSC-funded services.

In North Carolina, LSC funds are distributed to Legal Aid of North Carolina. In 2011–2012, Legal Aid received $10,053,803 from LSC. LANC has 18 offices in locations across the state, as well as seven statewide projects to address legal needs in specific areas of law and other regional projects, including several medical-legal partnerships. In the recent economic climate, LANC has experienced decreasing appropriations from the state despite the increased population of eligible individuals.⁹

Other non-LSC funded organizations also serve state residents in need of legal assistance. Pisgah Legal Services, serving Western North Carolina, has offices in Asheville, Hendersonville, and Spindale. Serving more than 13,000 individuals each year, PLS also has targeted programs focused on representing children, people with disabilities, seniors, families facing impending homelessness, immigrants, and victims of domestic violence. Legal Services of Southern Piedmont (LSSP) is located in Charlotte and serves the Charlotte metropolitan area and Western North Carolina. LSSP provides a range of civil legal assistance, notably serving the elderly, veterans, and immigrants, as well as providing tax assistance to low-income individuals.

⁷ American Community Survey 2012 1-year Estimates, U.S. Census Bureau, www.census.gov (last visited on January 15, 2014).

⁸ Id.

⁹ "2011–2012 Annual Report."

26% of North Carolina's children live below the poverty line.

Methodology

This report analyzes data to calculate the total direct economic benefit resulting from legal services as well as estimates of indirect economic impact and cost savings. The direct economic benefit is the total amount of funds obtained for clients through legal advocacy, for example in new federal benefits or other financial awards. All data used in this calculation was compiled by the three service providers. Each of the providers track the outcomes of all of their cases and any financial awards obtained for their own operational purposes using case management software. Outcomes are inputted upon occurrence or, at the latest, prior to the closure of a case file.

The three providers compiled data in the spring of 2013 for all cases where a financial benefit was obtained during calendar year 2012 in the following areas: Supplemental Nutritional Assistance Program (SNAP), Supplemental Security Income/Social Security Disability Insurance (SSI/SSDI), Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF), tax-related recovery, child support, and housing-related awards. Each also provided additional demographic data about their cases, including the total number of cases in various substantive areas and the frequency of specific outcomes (for example, the numbers of foreclosures prevented and domestic violence protective orders granted).

In each section, the standard method for calculating the benefit obtained is described. The calculation usually includes the sum of back benefits or funds awarded to the client as well as the anticipated future benefit.

The indirect economic impact is an estimate of what occurs when new federal revenue enters and flows through the state and local economies, namely changes in employment, wages, or business outputs within local industries on account of the introduction of new spending into the market. This report uses the total direct benefits obtained from federal sources—funds which likely would not have come into the state absent legal representation—to assess the broader economic impact to the community. In each section, the method of calculating the indirect economic impact is described.

The cost savings is an estimate of the avoided costs to the local and state economies on account of the legal advocacy of the providers. In particular, this report focuses on advocacy in the areas of domestic violence, foreclosure, and eviction. Here, legal representation prevents the expenditure of state and local government funds in response to increased domestic violence and homelessness.

Limitations of this Report

First, at the risk of understating the actual effect of legal representation, the report makes a conscious effort to utilize a conservative approach to calculating the indirect economic impact and cost savings, even where more generous calculators are available. Where available, the report uses economic impact methodology and cost savings calculations offered by federal government agencies. Further, the cost savings calculations err on the side of being cautious by utilizing small multipliers and proportions of impacted populations where more specific data is lacking, necessitating certain assumptions about impact.

Secondly, some important contributions of the providers are not included in the economic impact estimates. In compiling the report, it became clear that certain categories of legal representation did not provide sufficient data for an analysis of economic impact. For example, while legal aid providers do provide representation in Medicaid cases and unemployment law cases and there is a clear economic benefit to the client, this representation is a smaller percentage of overall cases and thus did not provide adequate data.

Lastly, in other practice areas of the providers, the economic benefit is not easily captured. For example, obtaining expunctions for adults with a criminal record better positions them to secure self-supporting employment. This results in a clear economic benefit to the individual and community, though not one which can be plainly calculated at the completion of representation. Similarly, legal aid providers represent children and seniors who require access to health care. This important work results in a direct benefit to the client of improved health care, but it is difficult to quantify the impact on North Carolina's economy.

Because of the data limitations present and conservative approach taken to generating estimates within the report, the full economic impact of the work of legal aid providers across the state is undoubtedly much larger than even the significant figures presented here indicate.

$48,775,276

The total economic impact of legal aid services in North Carolina in 2012 was $48,775,276.

Summary of Findings

This report estimates that the legal representation provided by Legal Aid of North Carolina, Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, and Pisgah Legal Services during 2012 resulted in more than $9.2 million in new federal revenue directed into the state of North Carolina, with an additional $8.8 million from other sources. The overall direct economic impact in these two areas totals $18,024,411.

The indirect economic impact is the economic boost to the state and local economies through increases in employment, wages, and business outputs. The indirect economic impact totals $13,893,362. Additionally, through representation of clients, the legal aid providers generated $16,857,503 in cost savings, including domestic violence prevention, eviction prevention, and foreclosure prevention. The chart below details the amounts in each category.

The total economic impact, including direct, indirect, and cost savings, of the provision of legal services by providers across the state is $48,775,276. That is, for every dollar spent to provide legal services from all funding sources in 2012, $2.08 is put into the economy. More specifically, for every dollar spent by the state to provide legal services, nearly $10 flows into the economy. The return on the state's investment in legal services made to the three providers is 108%.

For every $1 North Carolina spends on legal services, nearly $10 flows into the economy.

The state's ROI on legal aid services is 108%.

The chart below details economic impact in each category analyzed.

FEDERAL BENEFITS OBTAINED IN 2012

Source	Direct Benefit	Indirect Impact ¹⁰
Supplemental Nutritional Assistance Program (SNAP)	$166,536	$299,765
Supplemental Security Income/Social Security Disability Insurance (SSI/SSDI)	$9,034,668	$13,552,002
Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF)	$19,178	$28,767
Tax-related federal refunds including the Earned Income Tax Credit	$8,552	$12,828
Total Federal Benefits	$9,228,934	$13,893,362

OTHER DIRECT AWARDS OBTAINED IN 2012

Source	Direct Benefit
Child support awards	$115,682
Housing-related awards	$8,679,795
Total Other Awards	$8,795,477

COST SAVINGS FROM 2012 REPRESENTATION

Source	Cost Savings
Domestic violence advocacy	$1,004,963
Foreclosure prevention
Cost to local government	$209,840
Cost to neighboring homeowners	$11,297,200
Eviction prevention	$4,345,500
Total Cost Savings	$16,857,503

TOTAL

Direct Economic Benefit	$18,024,411
Indirect Economic Impact	$13,893,362
Cost Savings	$16,857,503
Total	$48,775,276

¹⁰ In the absence of direct research on the economic impact of new federal revenue other than SNAP, namely SSI/SSDI, TANF, and tax-related funds, this report calculates economic impact using the multiplier proposed by the Council of Economic Advisors for the impact of income support payments under the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009, specifically a multiplier of 1.5. Executive Office of the President, Council of Economic Advisors, "The Economic Impact of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 Fifth Quarterly Report," (Nov. 18, 2010), available at http://www.whitehouse.gov/sites/default/files/cea_5th_arra_report.pdf.

$9

For every $5 of new SNAP benefits, community spending of $9 is generated.

Federal Funds

Supplemental Nutritional Assistance Program (SNAP)

Assistance provided by North Carolina's legal services programs resulted in an additional $166,536 of Supplemental Nutritional Assistance Program (SNAP) benefits coming into the state in 2012. Service providers closed 385 cases involving 838 individuals regarding the acquisition or maintenance of SNAP benefits. Providers calculated total SNAP benefits by adding back benefits due to the client plus the monthly benefit obtained in the case multiplied by 12 months, the expected length of the receipt of the benefit over one year.

For many low-income individuals, SNAP benefits, formerly known as food stamps, may serve as a family's only source of income. According to data collected by The New York Times in 2010, 18% of food stamp recipients receive no income in addition to food stamps each month. Approximately six million Americans live in a cashless society, subsisting on SNAP benefits alone.¹¹ Based on this estimate, as many as 304,025 North Carolinians have no other income besides the SNAP benefits they receive.¹²

According to the USDA, every additional dollar's worth of SNAP benefits leads to between 17 and 47 cents of additional spending on food items by families who are receiving SNAP when compared to low-income families not receiving SNAP.¹³ The average benefit received per household via SNAP participation is $290, money which is in turn spent at local retailers that accept SNAP customers like food marts, grocery stores, farmers' markets, and convenience stores.¹⁴ The USDA estimates that for every $5 of new SNAP benefits, community spending of $9 is generated. Other impacts of SNAP participation for local communities include increased worker productivity and fewer missed days of work for SNAP families, as well boosting employment opportunities at local food retailers and farms.¹⁵

Using the USDA's estimate stated above, the $166,536 of new SNAP benefits generated by legal aid providers resulted in $299,765 of additional community spending.

11 Jason DeParle and Robert M. Gebeloff, "Living on Nothing but Food Stamps," N.Y. Times, Jan. 2, 2010, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2010/01/03/us/03foodstamps.html?pagewanted=all&_r=0.

12 Based on the average 2012 North Carolina caseload, 1,689,028. As obtained from monthly participation data provided by the Food Research and Action Center, available at <http://frac.org/reports-and-resources/snapfood-stamp-monthly-participation-data/>.

13 U.S. Department of Agriculture, Food and Nutrition Services, "The Benefits of the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP)" (Aug. 2011), available at http://www.fns.usda.gov/snap/outreach/pdfs/bc_benefits.pdf.

14 Id.

15 Id.

$9 million

More than $9 million is the amount legal aid providers secured in additional SSDI/SSI benefits.

Federal Funds

Supplemental Security Income/ Social Security Disability Insurance (SSI/SSDI)

Advocacy by North Carolina's legal aid providers secured more than $9 million in additional Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI) and Supplemental Security Income (SSI) benefits in 2012. Providers calculated total SSI/SSDI benefits by adding back benefits due to the client plus the monthly benefit obtained in the case multiplied by 120 months, the expected length of the receipt of the benefit.

16 Umar Moulta-Ali, Congressional Research Service, "Primer on Disability Benefits: Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI) and Supplemental Security Income (SSI)" (June 11, 2013), available at http://digital-commons.ilr.cornell.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=2152&context=key_workplace.

17 Anne DeCesaro and Jeff Hemmeter, Social Security Administration, Office of Research, Evaluation and Statistics, "Characteristics of Noninstitutionalized DI and SSI Program Participants, Research and Statistics Note No. 2008-02" (Jan. 2008), available at <http://www.ssa.gov/policy/docs/rsnotes/rsn2008-02.html>.

18 Id.

19 Shawn Fremstad and Rebecca Vallas, Center for American Progress, "The Facts on Social Security Disability Insurance and Supplemental Security Income for Workers with Disabilities" (May 30, 2013), available at <http://www.americanprogress.org/issues/poverty/report/2013/05/30/64681/the-facts-on-social-security-disability-insurance-and-supplemental-security-income-for-workers-with-disabilities/>.

20 Id.

21 Id.

SSDI and SSI provide a monthly cash benefit to individuals who have a physical or mental disability that impairs their ability to work; in some cases, benefits are provided to their dependents as well.¹⁶ SSI is a needs-based program whose eligible recipients must have very limited income. Unlike SSI, eligible SSDI recipients are not required to meet income requirements; however, studies have found that the majority of SSDI recipients have family income below 200% of the poverty threshold.¹⁷

The average monthly SSDI payment for an individual is $1,129.63 and the average monthly SSI payment for an individual is $527.95.¹⁸ For many recipients, disability benefits serve as a major source of income. Seventy-one percent of SSDI beneficiaries receive more than half of their income from disability benefits; more than half of beneficiaries receive 90% of their income from such benefits.¹⁹

The lengthy process of obtaining benefits requires evidence in the form of medical records and other documentation that many poor, disabled individuals may not have on account of poor access to healthcare and other barriers.²⁰ Ultimately only about 40% of applicants receive disability benefits.²¹ Legal aid providers play a crucial role in navigating the process and assisting applicants in meeting the standard necessary to receive benefits.

293,408

293,408 North Carolinians were kept out of poverty by the Earned Income Tax Credit.

Federal Funds

22 North Carolina Department of Health and Human Services, Division of Social Services, "Temporary Assistance for Needy Families State Plan 2010-2013," available at <http://www.ncdhhs.gov/dss/workfirst/docs/NC%20TANF%20State%20Plan%202010-2013%20web%20posting.pdf>.

23 Id.

24 Program Statistics and Reviews, North Carolina Department of Health and Human Services, Division of Social Services, <http://www.ncdhhs.gov/dss/stats/wf.htm> (last visited Oct. 16, 2013).

25 Working Families Kept Out of Poverty by the EITC and CTC, 2009-2011, Tax Credits for Working Families, <http://www.taxcreditsfor-workingfamilies.org/working-families-poverty-eitc-ctc-state/> (last visited on Oct. 18, 2013).

26 Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "Policy Basics: the Earned Income Tax Credit" (February 2013), available at <http://www.cbpp.org/files/policybasics-eitc.pdf>.

27 Executive Office of the President, Council of Economic Advisors, "The Economic Impact of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 Fifth Quarterly Report," (Nov. 18, 2010), available at http://www.whitehouse.gov/sites/default/files/cea_5th_arra_report.pdf.

In the absence of direct research on the economic impact of tax refunds and awards in tax controversies, this report calculates economic impact using the multiplier proposed by the Council of Economic Advisors for the impact of income support payments under the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009, specifically a multiplier of 1.5.

Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF)

In 2012, providers attained $19,178 in Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF) benefits for low-income clients. Providers calculated total TANF benefits by adding back benefits due to the client plus the monthly benefit obtained in the case multiplied by six months, the expected length of the receipt of the benefit.

In order to be eligible for cash assistance under North Carolina's TANF program, Work First, families must be "needy," which North Carolina defines for a family of three as income not exceeding $544 per month.²² The monthly maximum benefit for the same family is $272.²³ In 2012, the number of active Work First cases averaged 22,623, and the number of individuals on active Work First cases averaged 44,671.²⁴

Tax-related recovery and refunds including Earned Income Tax Credit (EITC)

Legal Services of Southern Piedmont (LSSP) is the only program that receives funding from the Internal Revenue Service to provide advocacy to low-income individuals in tax matters. Their assistance includes representation of individuals in tax controversies to reduce their tax liability as well as assistance with preparation of tax returns in order to obtain federal tax refunds, including the Earned Income Tax Credit. In 2012, LSSP obtained $8,552 in federal refunds for taxpayers through their Low-Income Taxpayer Clinic. They also helped reduce clients' tax liability by $366,642.

Reports indicate that 293,408 North Carolinians, including 145,769 children, were kept out of poverty by the Earned Income Tax Credit.²⁵ Perhaps unsurprisingly, most families spend their Earned Income Tax Credit, on average $2,805 for families with children and $282 for families without children, on basic necessities including clothing and home and car repairs.²⁶ Using the multiplier proposed by the Council of Economic Advisors for income support payments, the $8,552 obtained in refunds for clients by the legal aid providers resulted in $12,828 of indirect economic impact.²⁷

$8,679,795 is the amount legal aid providers secured in housing-related awards.

Other Awards

Child support awards

Representation in family law cases by the three providers grossed child support awards to which custodial parents were entitled totaling $115,681.88.²⁸

In addition to providing an economic boost to the local community of funds that custodial parents in turn spend to obtain shelter, food, clothing, and other necessities for their children, child support awards reduce the dependency of low-income families on the state for support.

Housing-related awards

The state's three legal aid providers, in large part due to Legal Aid of North Carolina's extensive housing representation, assisted in ensuring housing benefits, rent abatements, and other awards totaling $8,679,795.15.²⁹

The work of legal aid providers in this area protects low-income families from losing crucial housing subsidies. In North Carolina, more than 136,700 low-income households rely on rental assistance programs, including public housing, vouchers, Section 8 project-based rental assistance, and other federal programs which make access to housing affordable.³⁰ Seventy percent of those with federal rental assistance are considered extremely low-income, meaning their income is below 30% of the Area Median Income limits set by the Department of Housing and Urban Development.³¹

In addition to the federal housing benefits secured or maintained through representation, legal services attorneys also represent low-income households in private landlord/tenant cases and obtain funds or rent abatement owed to the client. In 2011, the median, monthly housing cost for renter-occupied housing units was $744 per month.³² In order to afford $744 per month, an individual must make $14.31 per hour, a figure well above the minimum wage.³³ As 287,600 low-income households in North Carolina spend more than half of their monthly net income on housing costs,³⁴ awards such as rent abatement due to inhabitability, receipt of funds owed like security deposits, and landlord charges avoided allow individuals to put their limited funds toward other basic necessities. Further, housing representation in these cases may allow individuals to stay in their homes, saving the state potential costs due to homelessness, as outlined in more detail below.

28 Providers calculated total child support awards by multiplying the monthly child support amount obtained by 12 months, the expected length of the receipt of the award over a one-year period. Where a specific monthly award was not ordered, the amount was calculated under the child support guidelines.

29 Housing awards may include the amount of rent saved by securing a public housing benefit, rent abatement obtained due to problems with the condition of the housing unit, return of a client's security deposit, or avoided charges by the landlord. Rent saved is calculated using the HUD Fair Market Rent subtracting any amount the client pays multiplied by 12 months.

30 Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "North Carolina: Federal Rental Assistance Facts," (Dec. 19, 2012) available at <http://www.cbpp.org/files/4-13-11hous-NC.pdf>.

31 Id.

32 American Community Survey 2007–2011, U.S. Census Bureau, <http://www.census.gov> (last visited on Sept. 2, 2013).

33 Housing Wage Calculator, National Low Income Housing Coalition, <http://nlihc.org/library/wagecalc> (last visited Oct. 16, 2013).

34 "North Carolina: Federal Rental Assistance Facts."

122

In 2012, 122 domestic violence related homicides occurred in North Carolina.

Cost Savings

Domestic violence advocacy

In 2012, Legal Aid of North Carolina, Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, and Pisgah Legal Services obtained 1,974 protective orders on behalf of clients. Further, in 2012, the agencies closed 4,709 domestic violence cases with household members totaling 12,036 people. Services include assisting victims in obtaining and enforcing protective orders in court, renewing an order entered previously, counseling victims about safety and other concerns, and providing information and/or assistance on a range of other issues including child support, child custody, divorce, division of marital property, and housing and consumer issues.

Nationally, nearly one in three women and one in four men have experienced some form of violence (including rape, physical violence, and stalking) by an intimate partner.³⁵ The impacts of such violence are harmful and vast: being fearful or concerned for safety; sustaining injuries (including severe injuries necessitating medical attention); symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder; needing housing, advocacy, or legal services; and missing work or school, resulting in lost income.³⁶

There is no reason to believe that North Carolina is any exception to national statistics. In 2012, 122 domestic violence related homicides occurred in North Carolina.³⁷ A yearly average of 114 domestic violence related homicides have been committed over the past five years.³⁸ Further, in 2010–2011, the more than 100 domestic violence programs funded by the North Carolina Council for Women served a total of 61,283 clients by providing emergency or transitional housing assistance; offering information, referrals, advocacy, transportation, and counseling; supporting the children of victims; and offering other services.³⁹

While most clients who were provided legal services in a domestic violence case do not receive a direct economic benefit, with the exception of those who are granted child support for their children within the order, indirect economic benefits flow to the state on account of costs saved by preventing violence.

35 Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, "National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey, 2010 Summary Report" 39 (Nov. 2011), available at http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/pdf/nisvs_report2010-a.pdf.

36 Id. at 54.

37 North Carolina Department of Justice, "Report on Domestic Violence Related Homicides Occurring in 2012" 2 (Apr. 9, 2013), available at <http://www.ncdoj.gov/getdoc/4105e22f-f094-4903-89d1-c1354ebc5958/2013DVRReport.aspx>.

38 Id.

39 Cynthia Hess, Institute for Women's Policy Research, "The Status of Women in North Carolina" 55 (Jan. 2013), available at <http://www.iwpr.org/publications/pubs/the-status-of-women-in-north-carolina>.

$1 million

More than $1 million is the annual savings from the prevention of domestic violence in avoided medical costs alone.

Cost Savings

By preventing violence, legal providers can mitigate the high cost of medical and mental health care expenses for victims and families. A study from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found that women who were the victims of physical assault in the past 12 months experienced an average of 3.4 separate assaults.⁴⁰ Victims were injured in 41.5% of assaults⁴¹, and 28.1% of those received some form of medical care.⁴² On average, the cost of medical and mental health services per physical assault was $816 when the study was authored in 2003, a cost of more than $1,000 dollars today.⁴³ In addition to the productivity loss of victims, other potential costs include the cost of sheltering victims and families and the use of police and law enforcement resources in response to continued violence.

If legal representation prevents one assault in half of the cases where domestic violence protective orders were obtained, the annual savings from the prevention of domestic violence by calculating the avoided medical costs alone is $1,004,963.⁴⁴

Homelessness prevention

Each year, the legal aid providers in this study generate cost savings for the state of North Carolina and local government units by preventing homelessness of individuals through their advocacy in foreclosure and eviction proceedings.

In 2012, Legal Aid of North Carolina, Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, and Pisgah Legal Services prevented 488 foreclosures across North Carolina, impacting 1,264 household members.

North Carolina has not been spared in the foreclosure crisis which has plagued the country. In 2012, 54,735 foreclosures were filed across the state, down from the peak of 66,279 filings in 2010.⁴⁵ Families, the surrounding community, and local governments all suffer when foreclosures persist. For families experiencing foreclosure, displacement from their home and lost equity and personal savings

40 Department of Health and Human Services, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, "Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States" 14 (Mar. 2003), available at www.cdc.gov/ncipc/pub-res/ipv_cost/ipvbook-final-feb18.pdf.

41 Id.

42 Id. at 15.

43 CPI Inflation Calculator, Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, http://www.bls.gov/data/inflation_calculator.htm. According to the calculator, $816 in 2003 has the same buying power as $1,018.20 in 2012 (the time period on which this study focuses).

44 Cost savings was calculated by multiplying the 2012 cost of medical services following a domestic violence assault, $1,018.20, by one-half of the total number of domestic violence protective orders obtained, 987.

45 Statistics, The North Carolina Court System, Civil Case with a Home or Business Foreclosure (Fore) Filing by Filing Date, compiled Aug. 12, 2013, <http://www.nccourts.org/Citizens/SR-Planning/Statistics/Default.asp>.

488

488 is the number of foreclosures prevented across North Carolina in 2012.

Cost Savings

46 Debbie Gruenstein Bocian, Peter Smith, and Wei Li, Center for Responsible Lending, "Collateral Damage: The Spillover Costs of Foreclosure" 3 (Oct. 24, 2012), available at <http://www.responsiblelending.org/mortgage-lending/research-analysis/collateral-damage.pdf>.

47 Id.

48 Michael Bess, "Assessing the Impact of Home Foreclosures in Charlotte Neighborhoods," Geography & Public Safety, Volume 1, Issue 3, Oct. 2008, available at <http://www.nij.gov/pubs-sum/gps-bulletin-v1i3.htm>.

49 G. Thomas Kingsley, Robin Smith, and David Price, The Urban Institute, "The Impacts of Foreclosures on Families and Communities" 15–19 (May 2009), available at <http://www.urban.org/publications/411909.html>.

50 Center for Responsible Lending, "2013 Update: The Spillover Effects of Foreclosures" (Aug. 19, 2013), available at <http://www.responsiblelending.org/mortgage-lending/research-analysis/2013-crl-research-update-foreclosure-spillover-effects-final-aug-19-docx.pdf>.

51 Cost savings due to foreclosure prevention in the form of nearby home value which was not impacted by the foreclosure was calculated by multiplying the average loss per homeowner by the number of foreclosures prevented. This estimate conservatively accounts for only one neighboring homeowner that would have been impacted per threatened foreclosure.

52 Kingsley at 19–20.

53 Id.

54 Cost savings due to foreclosure prevention was calculated by multiplying the number of foreclosures prevented by the most conservative estimate of the cost of each foreclosure to the local government.

55 State Home Foreclosure Prevention Project, North Carolina Prevention Fund, <http://ncforeclosureprevention.gov/shfpp.aspx> (last visited Oct. 18, 2013).

take a huge toll on their present stability.⁴⁶ Long term, families struggle with the damage to their credit and inability to access home equity for education or business investment.⁴⁷

Reports estimate the broader economic impact of foreclosure on communities. A study conducted by the Charlotte Police Department found that the rate of violent crime rose consistently in high foreclosure neighborhoods⁴⁸ and was significantly higher than the violent crime rate in low foreclosure neighborhoods. Another economic impact on the community is lost value of other area properties and reduction in tax funding to local governments.⁴⁹ According to the Center for Responsible Lending, homeowners impacted by nearby foreclosures in their community on average experience a loss of $23,150 as a result of their close proximity to foreclosures in their community.⁵⁰ Even if only one such neighboring home had been impacted by each threatened foreclosure, prevention of 488 foreclosures resulted in $11,297,200 of saved home value.⁵¹ In addition to the lost tax funds due to home value decreases, other local government costs may include court costs, unpaid property taxes, unpaid utility taxes and other fees, and cost of fire and police involvement.⁵² Costs to the community range from $430 for a vacant and secured foreclosure to $5,358 if the municipality needs to secure the property to more than $34,000 for an abandoned foreclosure where a fire occurs.⁵³ With the prevention of 488 foreclosures across North Carolina in 2012, under the most conservative estimate, legal providers saved local governments at least $209,840.⁵⁴

The three North Carolina service providers in this report, among others, receive funding through the State Home Foreclosure Prevention Project, a program of the North Carolina Housing Finance Agency that was established by the General Assembly in 2008 to reduce the number of foreclosures by providing resources and assistance to homeowners facing foreclosure.⁵⁵

The three providers studied in this report also halted 895 evictions in 2012, impacting 2,506 household members.

Representation in eviction proceedings which prevent or delay eviction help low-income families avoid homelessness by allowing families to stay in their home and search for new housing if necessary. Advocates assist clients to oppose

$11,297,200

$11,297,200 is the amount of home value saved as a result of prevented foreclosures.

Cost Savings

eviction where landlords have not followed the proper process for lawfully evicting tenants or where they do not have grounds to evict the tenant.

In the absence of advocacy, some clients would undoubtedly become homeless, seeking temporary or extended housing at a homeless shelter or living unsheltered. Further, once individuals have been evicted, finding new housing in the future may be more difficult, leading to a greater chance of becoming or remaining homeless following an initial eviction.

Estimates of the cost of homelessness vary. Research in Los Angeles indicates the average monthly per person cost of homeless persons is $2,897 or $34,764 per year, including the costs of public health, mental health, emergency medical treatment, police, social services, and other public services, compared to the $605 average per month cost for similarly situated persons who are in supportive housing.⁵⁶ The monthly per person cost ranged from $405 to $5,038 based on attributes like disability, age, criminal history, and substance abuse or mental health background.⁵⁷ A more recent study of six locations conducted by the Department of Housing and Urban Development found average costs of sheltering the first-time homeless to be between $1,634 to $2,308 for individuals and between $3,184 to $20,301 for families.⁵⁸

56 Daniel Flaming, Patrick Burns, and Michael Matsunaga, Economic Roundtable, "Where We Sleep: Costs When Homeless and Housed in Los Angeles" 25 (2009), available at http://www.economicrt.org/summaries/Where_We_Sleep.html.

57 Id. at 1.

58 U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, Office of Policy Development and Research, "Costs Associated with First-Time Homelessness for Families and Individuals" ES-7-ES-8 (March 2010), available at http://www.huduser.org/publications/pdf/Costs_Homeless.pdf.

59 Cost savings due to eviction prevention was calculated by multiplying the average monthly per person cost of homeless persons of $2,897 by 12 months by 125 people, or 5% of those who might have been evicted without legal aid representation.

60 Shambhavi Manglik, National Low Income Housing Coalition, "Renters in Foreclosure: A Fresh Look at an Ongoing Problem" 1 (September 2012), available at http://nlihc.org/sites/default/files/Renters_in_Foreclosure_2012.pdf.

In the absence of good estimates of the percentage of people that would likely become homeless following eviction, this cost savings calculation conservatively assumes that only 5% would have become homeless if evicted and calculates the cost for one year of homelessness. Even if only 5% of those who might have been evicted from their housing without legal representation eventually became homeless, the yearly cost savings to the state and local government totals $4,345,500.⁵⁹

Some of the renters experiencing eviction may be impacted due to foreclosure of the property they are renting. According to a report produced by the National Low Income Housing Coalition, 20% of home foreclosures involve rental properties.⁶⁰

Conclusion

In 2012, representation by the three legal aid providers in North Carolina resulted in:

$18,024,411 of direct benefit;

$13,893,362 of indirect estimated economic impact;

$16,857,503 in cost savings; and

A total economic impact of $48,775,276 in our state.

$48,775,276

About The NC Equal Access to Justice Commission

The NC Equal Access to Justice Commission was established in November 2005 by order of the North Carolina Supreme Court and is chaired by Chief Justice Sarah Parker. The Commission was established in recognition of the need to expand civil legal representation for people of low income and modest means in North Carolina. Among the purposes of the commission are unmet legal needs assessment, statewide strategic planning, coordination of efforts between the legal aid organizations and other legal and non-legal organizations, resource development, and expanding civil access to justice.

NC Equal Access to Justice COMMISSION

For more information,
please contact:

Mary Irvine

Access to Justice Coordinator
NC Equal Access to Justice Commission

919.706.4435

irvine@ncequalaccesstojustice.org

P.O. Box 25996
Raleigh, NC 27611-5996

This report is available at www.ncequalaccesstojustice.org.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 26

Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States

Department of Health and Human Services
Centers for Disease Control and Prevention
National Center for Injury Prevention and Control

Atlanta, Georgia

March 2003

Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States is a publication of the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, part of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

Julie L. Gerberding, MD, MPH
Director

National Center for Injury Prevention and Control

Sue Binder, MD
Director

Division of Violence Prevention

W. Rodney Hammond, PhD
Director

Etiology and Surveillance Branch

Ileana Arias, PhD
Chief

Suggested Citation: National Center for Injury Prevention and Control. Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States. Atlanta (GA): Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; 2003.

Contributors

The following individuals contributed to analyses and research efforts that made this report possible:

Ileana Arias, PhD

National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, CDC

Robert Bardwell, PhD

Bardwell Consulting, Ltd.

Eric Finkelstein, PhD

Research Triangle Institute International

Jacqueline Golding, PhD

University of California, San Francisco

Steven Leadbetter, MS

National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, CDC

Wendy Max, PhD

University of California, San Francisco

Howard Pinderhughes, PhD

University of California, San Francisco

Dorothy Rice, ScD (Hon.)

University of California, San Francisco

Linda E. Saltzman, PhD

National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, CDC

Kevin Tate

Research Triangle Institute International

Nancy Thoennes, PhD

Center for Policy Research

Patricia Tjaden, PhD

Center for Policy Research

Intimate Partner Violence

Acknowledgments

We acknowledge and appreciate the contributions of several CDC colleagues: Sujata Desai, PhD, and Martie Thompson, PhD, for assistance with revisions; Joyce McCurdy, MSA, Melinda Williams, and Chester Pogostin, DVM, MPA, for their coordination efforts; James Mercy, PhD, for scientific review; Marcie-jo Kresnow, MS, for statistical guidance; Lynda Doll, PhD, for facilitating the external review; Phaedra Corso, PhD, for economic consultation; Carole Craft for editing; Alida Knuth and Sandra Emrich for layout and design; and Mary Ann Braun for cover design.

In addition, we extend sincere thanks to Sandra N. Howard, Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, Department of Health and Human Services, for her valuable comments and oversight; and to Lois Mock, MA, National Institute of Justice, for coordination efforts.

And we gratefully acknowledge our external peer reviewers:

Elaine Alpert, MD, MPH
Boston University School of Public Health

Jens Ludwig, PhD
Georgetown Public Policy Institute

Anne Menard
Domestic Violence Resource Center

Brian Wiersema
University of Maryland at College Park

Contents

Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States: Executive Summary	1
Introduction	3
Incidence, Prevalence, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States	13
Costs of Intimate Partner Violence in the United States	27
Discussion	43
Appendix A Calculating Lost Productivity and Related Values	51
Appendix B Calculating Age Group-Specific Present Value of Lifetime Earnings Estimates	55

Figures

Figure 1. Percentage Distributions of U.S. Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Rape by Medical Care Service Use, 1995	16
Figure 2. Percentage Distributions of U.S. Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Physical Assault by Medical Care Service Use, 1995	17
Figure 3. Percentage of Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against U.S. Adult Women by Victimization Type, 1995	33
Figure 4. Percentage of Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against U.S. Adult Women by Cost Type, 1995	33

Intimate Partner Violence

Tables

Table 1.	Percentage of NVAWS Respondents and Estimated Number of U.S. Adult Women Nonfatally Victimized by an Intimate Partner in Their Lifetimes and in the Previous 12 Months, by Type of Victimization, 1995	21
Table 2.	Estimated Number of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Victimization Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	21
Table 3.	Estimated Victimization Outcomes and Medical Care Service Use by U.S. Adult Female Victims of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape and Physical Assault, 1995	22
Table 4.	Estimated Average and Total Number of Medical Care Service Uses by U.S. Adult Female Victims of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape and Physical Assault, 1995	23
Table 5.	Estimates of Mental Health Care Service Use by U.S. Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Violence by Victimization Type, 1995	24
Table 6.	Estimated Percentage of Victims and Number of Nonfatal Victimization of Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Against U.S. Adult Women, by Time Lost from Paid Work and Household Chores, 1995	25
Table 7.	Estimated Lost Productivity Among U.S. Adult Female Victims of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Violence, by Victimization Type and by Time Lost from Paid Work and Household Chores, 1995	26
Table 8.	Estimated Medical Care Service Use and Unit Costs for Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	36
Table 9.	Distribution of Primary Source of Payment for Medical Care Resulting from Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape and Physical Assault Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	37
Table 10.	Estimated Medical Care Service Use and Unit Costs for Nonfatal Intimate Partner Physical Assault Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	38
Table 11.	Distribution of Primary Source of Payment for Mental Health Care Resulting from Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	39
Table 12.	Estimated Total Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	40
Table 13.	Estimated Average Health Care Costs per Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Victimization Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995	41
Table 14.	Estimated Lost Productivity Due to Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Against U.S. Adult Women by Victimization Type, 1995	42

Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States: Executive Summary

Background

Although most people believe intimate partner violence (IPV) is a substantial public health problem in the United States, few agree on its magnitude. Recognizing the need to better measure both the scope of the problem of IPV as well as resulting economic costs—in particular, those related to health care—Congress funded the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) to conduct a study to obtain national estimates of the occurrence of IPV-related injuries, to estimate their costs to the health care system, and to recommend strategies to prevent IPV and its consequences.

This report—

- Describes briefly the development of the requested study;
- Presents findings for the estimated incidence, prevalence, and costs of nonfatal and fatal IPV;
- Identifies future research needs;
- Highlights CDC's research priorities for IPV prevention.

Incidence, Prevalence, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States

Data about nonfatal IPV victimizations and resulting health care service use were collected through the National Violence Against Women Survey (NVAWS), funded by the National Institute of Justice and CDC. Based on NVAWS data, an estimated 5.3 million IPV victimizations occur among U.S. women ages 18 and older each year. This violence results in nearly 2.0 million injuries, more than 550,000 of which require medical attention. In addition, IPV victims also lose a total of nearly 8.0 million days of paid work—the equivalent of more than 32,000 full-time jobs—and nearly 5.6 million days of household productivity as a result of the violence.

Data about IPV homicides were obtained from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reports Supplementary Homicide Reports. According to this source, 1,252 women ages 18 and older were killed by an intimate partner in 1995, the same year as incidence data reported in the NVAWS.

Intimate Partner Violence

Costs of Intimate Partner Violence in the United States

The costs of intimate partner rape, physical assault, and stalking exceed $5.8 billion each year, nearly $4.1 billion of which is for direct medical and mental health care services. The total costs of IPV also include nearly $0.9 billion in lost productivity from paid work and household chores for victims of nonfatal IPV and $0.9 billion in lifetime earnings lost by victims of IPV homicide. The largest proportion of the costs is derived from physical assault victimization because that type of IPV is the most prevalent. The largest component of IPV-related costs is health care, which accounts for more than two-thirds of the total costs.

Discussion

Due to exclusions of several cost components about which data were unavailable or insufficient (e.g., certain medical services, social services, criminal justice services), the costs presented in this report likely underestimate the problem of IPV in the U.S. Additionally, because of these omissions, the cost figures here are not comprehensive and should not be used for benefit-cost ratios in analyses of interventions to prevent IPV. However, they can be used to calculate the economic cost savings from reducing IPV and associated injuries, to demonstrate the economic magnitude of IPV, and to evaluate the impact of IPV on a specific sub-sector of the economy, such as consumption of medical resources.

More qualitative and quantitative data are needed to better determine the full magnitude of IPV and associated human and economic costs. There is also a need for primary prevention—preventing IPV from occurring in the first place—rather than focusing only on treating victims and rehabilitating perpetrators after abuse has occurred.

CDC, in its Injury Research Agenda, has identified several key areas of research for IPV prevention. These areas include learning how to change social norms that accept intimate partner violence; developing programs for perpetrators and potential perpetrators; increasing our understanding of how violent behaviors toward intimate partners develop; improving collection of data about IPV and its health effects; developing and evaluating training programs for health professionals; and disseminating strategies that work to prevent IPV.

Significant resources for research are needed to better understand the causes and risk factors for IPV and to develop and disseminate effective primary prevention strategies. Until we reduce the incidence of IPV in the United States, we will not reduce the economic and social burden of this problem.

Introduction

Violence against women is a substantial public health problem in the United States. According to data from the criminal justice system, hospital and medical records, mental health records, social services, and surveys, thousands of women are injured or killed each year as a result of violence, many by someone they are involved with or were involved with intimately. Nearly one-third of female homicide victims reported in police records are killed by an intimate partner (Federal Bureau of Investigation 2001).

Intimate partner violence—or IPV—is violence committed by a spouse, ex-spouse, or current or former boyfriend or girlfriend. It occurs among both heterosexual and same-sex couples and is often a repeated offense. Both men and women are victims of IPV, but the literature indicates that women are much more likely than men to suffer physical, and probably psychological, injuries from IPV (Brush 1990; Gelles 1997; Rand and Strom 1997; Rennison and Welchans 2000).

IPV results in physical injury, psychological trauma, and sometimes death (Gelles 1997; Kernic, Wolf and Holt 2000; Rennison and Welchans 2000; Sorenson and Saftlas 1994). The consequences of IPV can last a lifetime. Abused women experience more physical health problems and have a higher occurrence of depression, drug and alcohol abuse, and suicide attempts than do women who are not abused (Golding 1996; Campbell, Sullivan and Davidson 1995; Kessler et al. 1994; Kaslow et al. 1998; Moscicki 1989). They also use health care services more often (Miller, Cohen and Rossman 1993).

A growing body of evidence demonstrates the health consequences of intimate partner violence against women (Coker, Smith, Bethea, King and McKeown 2000; Kernic, Wolf and Holt 2000). However, the economic costs of IPV remain largely unknown. Previous cost estimates range from $1.7 billion to $10 billion annually (Straus 1986; Gelles and Straus 1990; Meyer 1992), but they are believed to underestimate the true economic impact of this type of violence (Institute for Women's Policy Research 1995). Researchers have recommended developing national cost estimates for IPV-related medical care, mental health care, police services, social services, and legal services (Gelles and Straus 1990; Straus 1986; Straus and Gelles 1987). However, a recent

Intimate Partner Violence

Intimate partner violence—also called domestic violence, battering, or spouse abuse—is violence committed by a spouse, ex-spouse, or current or former boyfriend or girlfriend. It can occur among heterosexual or same-sex couples.

Intimate Partner Violence

literature review (Finlayson, Saltzman, Sheridan and Taylor 1999) found only one U.S. study that derived national cost estimates for violence among intimate partners (Miller, Cohen and Wiersema 1996).

Recognizing the need to better measure the magnitude of IPV and resulting economic costs—in particular, those related to health care—the U.S. Congress funded the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) to conduct a study to obtain national estimates of the incidence of injuries resulting from IPV, to estimate the costs of injuries to health care facilities, and to recommend strategies to reduce IPV-related injuries and associated costs. Language related to this funding was included in the Violence Against Women Act provisions of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 (P.L. 103–322).

Given the greater number of IPV-related injuries that occur among women and the instability of cost estimates based on the small numbers of IPV-related injuries among men, this report focuses only on the costs of IPV against women ages 18 and older. Although Congress called only for costs of IPV-related injuries, it was important to include the costs of lost productivity resulting from IPV and to determine the economic costs of lives lost to IPV homicide. These costs contribute significantly to the economic burden of IPV.

This report describes the development of the requested study; presents findings for the estimated incidence, prevalence, and costs of IPV among U.S. adult women; identifies future research needs; and highlights some of CDC’s activities related to IPV prevention.

The Need to Estimate the Costs of Intimate Partner Violence

Cost estimates can serve important purposes. For example, they help demonstrate the impact a problem has on society and can shape the attitudes of people who develop public policy and allocate limited funds (Miller, Cohen and Wiersema 1996; Phillips 1987; Snively 1994). They can also help assess the benefit or effectiveness of violence intervention strategies or programs (Haddix, Teutsch, Shaffer and Dunet 1996; Teutsch 1992), which may, in turn, lead to resource allocation to specific programs (Mercy and O’Carroll 1988).

The Need for National Estimates of Intimate Partner Violence

To estimate the costs of IPV, one must first estimate its incidence. While most people acknowledge IPV as a substantial public health problem, few seem to agree on its magnitude (Crowell and Burgess 1996). Several surveys (e.g., Bachman and Saltzman 1995; Rennison and Welchans 2000; Straus and Gelles 1990) have attempted to determine the extent of violence against women, but methods and findings vary considerably, arousing some debate. Many people contend that the magnitude of violence against women—including violence by intimate partners—is underestimated, while others believe it is exaggerated.

Why has the scope of intimate partner violence been so difficult to measure?

Lack of consensus about terminology. Researchers have been unable to agree on a definition of intimate partner violence. In some studies, IPV includes only acts that may cause pain or injury, while ignoring behaviors designed to control or intimidate, such as stalking, humiliation, verbal abuse, imprisonment, and denial of access to money, shelter, or services.

Much of the debate about the number of women affected by intimate partner violence results from this lack of consensus. For example, a researcher who defines IPV more broadly—including stalking and other forms of psychological abuse, as well as physical and sexual violence—will produce a larger estimate than a researcher who uses a more narrow definition that includes physical and sexual violence only (DeKeseredy 2000). A definition that separately measures component types of violence—physical, sexual, and emotional—will also likely produce different measurements than one that combines all types of violence (Gordon 2000).

Variations in survey methodology. Sampling strategies and how the purpose of a survey is explained may affect how participants answer survey questions. For example, a respondent on the National Crime Victimization Survey may not acknowledge being the victim of IPV if he or she does not believe IPV is a crime. However, the same respondent might disclose IPV victimization on a survey about family conflict.

Gaps in data collection. Because no national system exists for ongoing collection of data about IPV against women, estimates are often drawn from data gathered for other purposes. For example, hospitals collect information about victims to provide patient care and for billing purposes; they may record few details about the violence itself or about the perpetrator and his or her relationship to the victim. In contrast, police collect data that will aid in apprehending the perpetrator, and thus may collect little information about the victim.

Different time frames. Studies of IPV have used different time frames to study victimization. Some measure lifetime victimization, while others measure annual victimization. These differences are not always well understood and have sometimes resulted in inappropriate comparisons being drawn between studies that are not in fact comparable.

Reluctance to report victimization. Many victims do not want to report IPV because they may fear, love, depend on, or wish to protect the perpetrator. When medical care is required, women may attribute their injuries to other causes.

Intimate Partner Violence

Repetitive nature of IPV. Often, IPV involves repetitive behavior, rather than a single incident. However, reports about IPV do not always clearly indicate whether data refer to the number of IPV incidents or the number of victims.

Limited populations. Previous studies have focused either on married or cohabiting couples or on dating relationships. Although a few studies have looked at violence among same-sex couples, most research has examined only heterosexual relationships. Few studies have examined IPV among the population overall.

Survey limitations. Many data about IPV have been collected through surveys, which rely on self-reports by victims. These self-reports may not accurately reflect the magnitude of the problem, if respondents do not answer questions truthfully or do not accurately recall events. Additionally, despite carefully worded questions and efforts to ensure that participants understand what is being asked, respondents may interpret terms differently.

Because methodological differences such as those described here can affect the findings of a survey or study, researchers must explain the choice of a particular methodology, define terms used, and clearly explain how information was gathered (CDC 2000). This information allows others to examine findings in the context in which data were collected and can help readers understand how the findings compare with those of other surveys or studies. In keeping with this practice, this report specifies the methodology employed and the definitions used.

The National Violence Against Women Survey

When Congress requested a study about the costs of IPV, no existing survey or study had a large enough sample to reliably estimate the occurrence of IPV-related injuries in the U.S. population. Nor did any existing survey or study include enough information about the nature and extent of injuries and their treatment to make the national projections Congress had requested. A new study was needed to fill gaps in knowledge about the magnitude of IPV.

Developing and Implementing the National Violence Against Women Survey

CDC learned that the National Institute of Justice (NIJ), the research arm of the U.S. Department of Justice, had funded Patricia Tjaden and Nancy Thoennes of the Center for Policy Research in Denver to develop the National Violence Against Women Survey—or NVAWS. The NVAWS was to generate information about the incidence, prevalence, characteristics, and consequences of physical assault, rape, and stalking perpetrated against U.S. women ages 18 and older by all types of perpetrators, including intimate partners.

Rather than duplicating efforts, CDC approached NIJ about supplementing its grant to Tjaden and Thoennes to broaden the size and scope of the survey by increasing the sample size, conducting a companion survey of male respondents, and adding questions about violence in same-sex intimate relationships. The broader survey could then be used as the basis for calculating more reliable cost estimates of IPV and other forms of violence. Both NIJ and the Center for Policy Research agreed to delay the survey to accommodate a supplemental award and make CDC's proposed changes.

The supplemental funds expanded the survey population to a number large enough to provide reliable national estimates of the incidence and prevalence of forcible rapes, physical assault, and stalking; related injuries and health care costs, including those for mental health care services; and indirect costs due to lost productivity of paid work and household chores.

CDC and the office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, another component of HHS, contracted with Wendy Max, Dorothy Rice, Jacqueline Golding, and Howard Pinderhughes at the University of California, San Francisco, to use the methodology they had developed earlier (Rice et al. 1996) to review draft survey questions and to recommend changes that would enable cost data to be collected with the NVAWS. The survey questions sought to detail the type of violence; the circumstances surrounding the violence; the relationship between victim and perpetrator; and consequences to the victim, including injuries sustained, use of medical and mental health care services, contact with the criminal justice system, and time lost from usual activities.

From November 1995 to May 1996, a national probability sample of 8,000 women and 8,000 men ages 18 and older were surveyed via telephone using a computer-assisted interviewing system. Female interviewers surveyed female respondents. A Spanish-language version of the survey was used with Spanish-speaking respondents.

In addition to the 8,000 completed interviews, the women's survey contacts included 4,829 ineligible households; 4,608 eligible households that refused to participate; and 351 interviews that were terminated before completion. The women's response rate was 71.0%.

Analyzing NVAWS Data and Estimating the Costs of Intimate Partner Violence

Tjaden and Thoennes (1999) used the NVAWS data and U.S. Census figures for the population of women ages 18 and older to generate national estimates of the incidence and prevalence of IPV-related injuries among women.¹ Cost estimates were to be derived from these estimates. Max and colleagues (1999) applied their previously developed methodology for estimating the costs of intimate partner violence to the NVAWS incidence data and data from other sources (Rice, Max, Golding and Pinderhughes 1996).

¹This report used only the data about violence committed against women by intimate partners. However, NVAWS data have also provided insight into other areas of violence, including a comparison of women's and men's experiences as victims of rape, physical assault, and stalking by all types of perpetrators.

Intimate Partner Violence

CDC funded Research Triangle Institute International (RTI) to derive measures of reliability for the incidence, prevalence, and cost estimates. Additionally, Max and colleagues and RTI developed estimates of the present value of lifetime earnings for fatal IPV by combining economic data with IPV homicide data from the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The report that follows reflects CDC's integration of the work by Tjaden and Thoennes, Max and colleagues, and RTI.

Definitions Used in the NVAWS and this Report

Throughout this report, one will read about intimate partner violence (IPV) and specific types of violent behaviors, as well as about incidence, prevalence, and victimization rates of IPV. As stated earlier, there is a lack of consensus about IPV-related terminology. Therefore, it is important to define those terms as they were used in the NVAWS to ensure that readers have a consistent understanding of what they mean and to allow readers to compare findings presented in this report with those of other studies.

Intimate partner violence (IPV) against women includes rape, physical assault, and stalking perpetrated by a current or former date, boyfriend, husband, or cohabiting partner, with cohabiting meaning living together as a couple. Both same-sex and opposite-sex cohabitants are included in the definition. This definition of IPV resembles the one developed by CDC (Saltzman et al. 1999); however, it also includes stalking because of the high level of fear that stalking generally provokes in women and the associated costs that may result.

Rape is the use of force, without the victim's consent, or threat of force to penetrate the victim's vagina or anus by penis, tongue, fingers, or object, or the victim's mouth by penis. The definition includes both attempted and completed acts. This definition is similar to that used in the National Women's Study (National Victim Center and Crime Victims Research and Treatment Center 1992) and is roughly equivalent to what the justice system refers to as rape or attempted rape.

Physical assault is any behavior that inflicts physical harm or threatens or attempts to do so. Specific behaviors include throwing something at the victim; pushing, grabbing, or shoving; pulling hair; slapping, hitting, kicking, or biting; choking or trying to drown; hitting with an object; beating up the victim; threatening with a gun or knife; and shooting or stabbing the victim. This definition is similar to that used in the National Family Violence Survey (Straus and Gelles 1986) and the Canadian Violence Against Women Survey (Johnson 1996), and it is roughly equivalent to what the justice system refers to as simple and aggravated assault.

Stalking is repeated visual or physical proximity, non-consensual communication, and/or verbal, written, or implied threats directed at a specific individual that would arouse fear in a reasonable person. The stalker need not make a credible threat of violence against the victim, but the victim must experience a high level of fear or feel that they or someone close to them will be harmed or killed by the stalker. This definition is similar to that used in the model anti-stalking legislation developed for states by NIJ (National Criminal Justice Association 1993).

Prevalence is the number of U.S. women ages 18 and older who have been victimized by an intimate partner at some point during their lifetimes (lifetime prevalence) or during the 12 months preceding the NVAWS (past 12 months prevalence). In this report, prevalence refers to past 12 months prevalence unless otherwise specified.

Incidence is the number of separate episodes of IPV that occurred among U.S. women ages 18 and older during the 12 months preceding the survey. For IPV, incidence frequently exceeds prevalence because IPV is often repeated. In other words, one victim (who is counted once under the prevalence definition) may experience several victimizations over the course of 12 months (each of which contributes to the incidence count).

Victimization rate is the number of IPV victimizations involving U.S. women ages 18 and older per 1,000 women in that population. The population estimate used in this report is the U.S. Census Bureau's projection of 100,697,000 women ages 18 and older in 1995.

A Note About Annual Estimates

This report presents annual data about IPV and its costs, generalized from data about the incidence of intimate partner violence in a given year (1995) and the costs associated with those victimizations. CDC acknowledges that the health care costs, value of lost productivity, and present value of lifetime earnings among IPV murder victims may be different today than in 1995. However, this report reflects the most appropriate, reliable data currently available about the costs associated with IPV.

Intimate Partner Violence

References

- Bachman R, Saltzman L. Violence Against Women: Estimates From the Redesigned Survey. U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, NCJ 154348; 1995.
- Brush LD. Violent acts and injurious outcomes in married couples: methodological issues in the National Survey of Families and Households. Gender and Society 1990;4(1):56–67.
- Campbell J, Sullivan CM, Davidson WD. Women who use domestic violence shelters: changes in depression over time. Psychology of Women Quarterly 1995;19:237–55.
- Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Building data systems for monitoring and responding to violence against women: recommendations from a workshop. Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report 2000;49(RR-11):1–16.
- Coker AL, Smith PH, Bethea L, King MR, McKeown RE. Physical health consequences of physical and psychological intimate partner violence. Archives of Family Medicine 2000;9:451–7.
- Crowell N, Burgess A, editors; National Research Council. Understanding Violence Against Women. Washington (DC): National Academy Press; 1996.
- DeKeseredy WS. Current controversies on defining nonlethal violence against women in intimate heterosexual relationships: empirical implications. Violence Against Women 2000;6(7):728–46.
- Federal Bureau of Investigation. Crime in the United States 2000. Uniform Crime Reports. Washington (DC): U.S. Department of Justice; 2001.
- Finlayson TJ, Saltzman LE, Sheridan DJ, Taylor WK. Estimating hospital charges associated with intimate violence. Violence Against Women 1999;5(3):313–35.
- Gelles RJ. Intimate Violence in Families. 3rd ed. Thousand Oaks (CA): Sage Publications; 1997.
- Gelles RJ, Straus MA. The medical and psychological costs of family violence. In: Straus MA, Gelles RJ, editors. Physical Violence in American Families: Risk Factors in Adaptations to Violence in 8,145 Families. New Brunswick (NJ): Transaction Publishers; 1990. p. 425–30.
- Golding JM. Sexual assault history and limitations in physical functioning in two general population samples. Research in Nursing and Health 1996;19:33–44.
- Gordon M. Definitional issues in violence against women: surveillance and research from a violence research perspective. Violence Against Women 2000;6(7):747–83.

Haddix AC, Teutsch SM, Shaffer PA, Dunet DO. Prevention Effectiveness: A Guide to Decision Analysis and Economic Evaluation. New York: Oxford University Press; 1996.

Institute for Women's Policy Research. Measuring the Costs of Domestic Violence and the Cost-Effectiveness of Interventions: An Initial Assessment of the State of the Art and Proposals for Future Research. Victim Services, Inc. Unpublished; 1995.

Johnson H. Dangerous Domains: Violence Against Women in Canada. Toronto: Nelson Canada; 1996.

Kaslow N, Thompson MP, Meadows L, Jacobs D, Chance S, Gibb B, et al. Factors that mediate or moderate the link between partner abuse and suicidal behavior in African American women. Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 1998;66:533–40.

Kernic MA, Wolf ME, Holt VL. Rates and relative risk of hospital admission among women in violent intimate partner relationships. American Journal of Public Health 2000;90(9):1416–20.

Kessler RC, McGonagle KA, Zhao S, Nelson CB, Hughes M, Eshleman S, et al. Lifetime and 12-month prevalence of DSM-III-R psychiatric disorders in the United States: results from the National Comorbidity Survey. Archives of General Psychiatry 1994;51:8–19.

Max W, Rice D, Golding J, Pinderhughes H. The Cost of Intimate Partner Violence in the United States, 1995; 1999. Unpublished report for contract 282-92-0048, funded by the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Mercy JA, O'Carroll P. New directions in violence prediction: the public health arena. Violence and Victims 1988;3:285–301.

Meyer H. The billion dollar epidemic. American Medical News 1992 January 6.

Miller T, Cohen MA, Rossman SB. Victim costs of violent crime and resulting injuries. Health Affairs 1993;12(4):186–97.

Miller TR, Cohen MA, Wiersema B. Victim Costs and Consequences: A New Look. National Institute of Justice Research Report. Washington (DC): National Institute of Justice, U.S. Department of Justice; 1996. NCJ 155282.

Moscicki ED. Epidemiologic surveys as tools for studying suicidal behavior: a review. Suicide and Life-Threatening Behavior 1989;19:131–46.

National Criminal Justice Association. Project to Develop a Model Anti-stalking Code for States. Washington (DC): U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice; 1993.

Intimate Partner Violence

National Victim Center and the Crime Victims Research and Treatment Center. Rape in America: A Report to the Nation. Arlington (VA): The Centers; 1992.

Phillips MA. Why do costings? Health Policy and Planning 1987;2:255–7.

Rand M, Strom K. Violence-Related Injuries Treated in Hospital Emergency Departments. Washington (DC): Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Department of Justice; 1997. NCJ 156921.

Rennison CM, Welchans S. Intimate Partner Violence. Washington (DC): Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Department of Justice; 2000. NCJ 178247.

Rice DP, Max W, Golding J, Pinderhughes H. The Cost of Domestic Violence to the Health Care System; 1996. Final Report for contract 282-92-0048, funded by the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, in consultation with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Saltzman LE, Fanslow JL, McMahon PM, Shelley GA. Intimate Partner Violence Surveillance: Uniform definitions and recommended data elements, Version 1.0. Atlanta: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control; 1999.

Snively S. The New Zealand Economic Cost of Family Violence. Wellington (New Zealand): Family Violence Unit, Department of Social Welfare; 1994.

Straus MA. Medical care costs of intrafamily assault and homicide. Bulletin of the New York Academy of Medicine 1986;62(5):556–61.

Straus MA, Gelles RJ. Societal change and change in family violence from 1975 to 1985 as revealed by two national surveys. Journal of Marriage and the Family 1986;48:465–79.

Straus MA, Gelles RJ. The costs of family violence. Public Health Reports 1987;102:638–41.

Straus MA, Gelles RJ. How violent are American families? Estimates from the National Family Violence Resurvey and other studies. In: Straus MA, Gelles RJ, editors. Physical Violence in American Families: Risk Factors and Adaptations to Violence in 8,145 Families. New Brunswick (NJ): Transaction Publishers; 1990. p. 95–112.

Teutsch SM. A framework for assessing the effectiveness of disease and injury prevention. Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report 1992;41(RR-3);1–13.

Tjaden P, Thoennes N. Prevalence, Incidence, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women: Findings from the National Violence Against Women Survey; 1999. Unpublished report for grant 93-IJ-CX-0012, funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Incidence, Prevalence, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States

Before estimating the costs of intimate partner violence, one needs to know how many women were injured nonfatally as a result of IPV; how many women used medical and mental health care services after IPV victimization; and how many women lost time from paid work and household chores after IPV. The National Violence Against Women Survey (NVAWS) provided that information. One also needs to know how many women died as a result of IPV. This information was obtained from the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports Supplementary Homicide Reports (Fox 2000).

This chapter describes the findings of the NVAWS, along with the national estimates calculated from those findings. It also presents estimates of the number of IPV homicides. The data presented reflect the incidence of IPV and related health care service use in 1995; these data are the most appropriate, reliable data currently available about the health care costs associated with IPV.

Incidence and Prevalence of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking

The NVAWS asked the 8,000 U.S. women ages 18 and older if they had been victims of IPV at any time in their lives or within the 12 months preceding the survey.

Intimate partner rape. Of the female NVAWS respondents, 7.7% had been raped by an intimate partner at some point in their lifetimes; 0.2% reported intimate partner rape in the past 12 months.¹ Extrapolating these percentages to U.S. Census population data, nearly 7.8 million women have been raped by an intimate partner at some time in their lives, and an estimated 201,394 women are raped by an intimate partner each year (Table 1).

Because some respondents reported multiple intimate partner rapes in the 12 months preceding the survey, the incidence of rape exceeded the prevalence. Women who were raped in that year experienced an average of 1.6 victimizations. This calculates to an estimated 322,230 rapes by intimate partners each year, an annual victimization rate of 3.2 intimate partner rapes per 1,000 women [322,230 rapes / 100,697,000 women = 0.0032 or 3.2 per 1000] (Table 2).

¹ Only 16 women participating in the NVAWS reported IPV rape in the 12 months preceding the survey. Estimates based on this small number are marginally stable and should be viewed with caution.

Intimate Partner Violence

Intimate partner physical assault. The NVAWS found that 22.1% of women had been physically assaulted by an intimate partner at some time in their lives, and 1.3% reported such an event in the 12 months preceding the survey. Thus, an estimated 1.3 million women are victims of physical assault by an intimate partner each year (Table 1).

Women who were physically assaulted by an intimate partner in the previous 12 months experienced an average of 3.4 separate assaults. Using these data, an estimated 4.5 million IPV physical assaults occur annually, a victimization rate of 44.2 per 1,000 (Table 2).

Intimate partner stalking. The survey found that 4.8% of women reported being stalked by an intimate partner at some time in their lives. One-half percent of women had been stalked in the 12 months preceding the survey, which equates to an estimated 503,485 women stalked by intimate partners each year (Table 1).

Because stalking, by definition, involves repeated acts of harassment and intimidation, and because no woman in the NVAWS reported being stalked by more than one intimate partner in the 12 months preceding the survey, the incidence and prevalence of intimate partner stalking are identical. Thus, the annual victimization rate for intimate partner stalking among women is 5.0 per 1,000 (Table 2).

Injuries Among Victims of Intimate Partner Violence

To explore the extent and nature of injuries associated with intimate partner violence, respondents disclosing rape or physical assault were asked whether they were injured during their most recent victimization, and if so, what types of injuries they sustained. Victims of stalking were not asked about injuries because the NVAWS definition of stalking does not include behaviors that inflict physical harm.

The NVAWS found that 36.2% of the women who were raped by an intimate partner sustained an injury (other than the rape itself) during their most recent victimization (Figure 1), and 41.5% of physical assault victims were injured (Figure 2). The majority of women who were injured during the most recent IPV episode sustained relatively minor injuries, such as scratches, bruises, and welts. Relatively few women sustained more serious types of injuries, such as lacerations, broken bones, dislocated joints, head or spinal cord injuries, chipped or broken teeth, or internal injuries.²

²For information about specific injuries, see Tjaden P, Thoennes N. Extent, Nature, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence: Findings from the National Violence Against Women Survey. Washington (DC): U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, National Institute of Justice; 2000. NCJ 181867.

Victims' Use of Medical Care Services

Respondents who were injured were asked if they received medical treatment and, if so, what type of care.³

NVAWS Findings

Of the women injured during their most recent intimate partner rape, 31.0% received some type of medical care, such as ambulance/paramedic services, treatment in a hospital emergency department (ED), or physical therapy (Figure 1). A comparable proportion (28.1%) of IPV physical assault victims who were injured received some type of medical care (Figure 2).

More than three-quarters of the rape and physical assault victims who received medical care were treated in a hospital setting (79.6% and 78.6%, respectively). Among women seeking medical care, 51.3% of rape victims and 59.1% of physical assault victims were treated in an ED, while 30.8% of rape victims and 24.2% of physical assault victims received some other type of outpatient service. Of those who were treated in a hospital, 43.6% of rape and 32.6% of physical assault victims were admitted and spent one or more nights in the hospital (Figures 1 and 2).

National Estimates of Medical Care Service Use

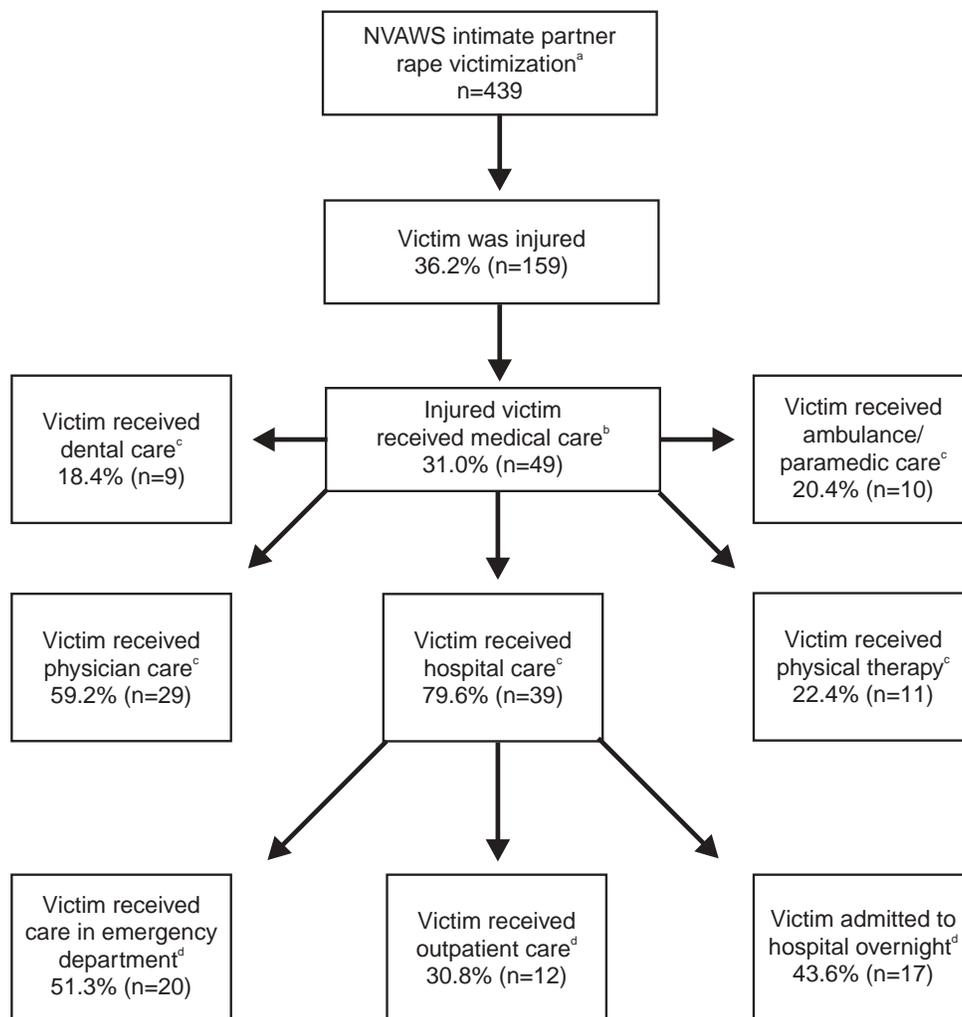

Of the estimated 322,230 intimate partner rapes each year, 116,647 result in injuries (other than the rape itself), 36,161 of which require medical care. And of the nearly 4.5 million physical assault victimizations, more than 1.8 million cause injuries, 519,031 of which require medical care. Nearly 15,000 rape victimizations and more than 240,000 physical assault victimizations result in hospital ED visits (Table 3).

Multiple medical care visits are often required for each IPV victimization. For example, victims of both rape and physical assault averaged 1.9 hospital ED visits per victimization, resulting in an estimated 486,151 visits each year to hospital EDs resulting from rape and physical assault victimizations (Table 4). Consequently, the total number of medical service uses exceeds the total number of victimizations resulting in medical care.

³To yield more reliable estimates for service use, all most-recent IPV victimizations reported in the NVAWS—including those that occurred more than 12 months before the interview—were used to establish use patterns.

Intimate Partner Violence

Figure 1.
Percentage Distributions of U.S. Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Rape by Medical Care Service Use, 1995

^a Estimates are based on the most recent intimate partner victimization since the age of 18.

^b The percentage of victims who received medical care is based on 158 responses from victims who were injured, excluding one "don't know" response.

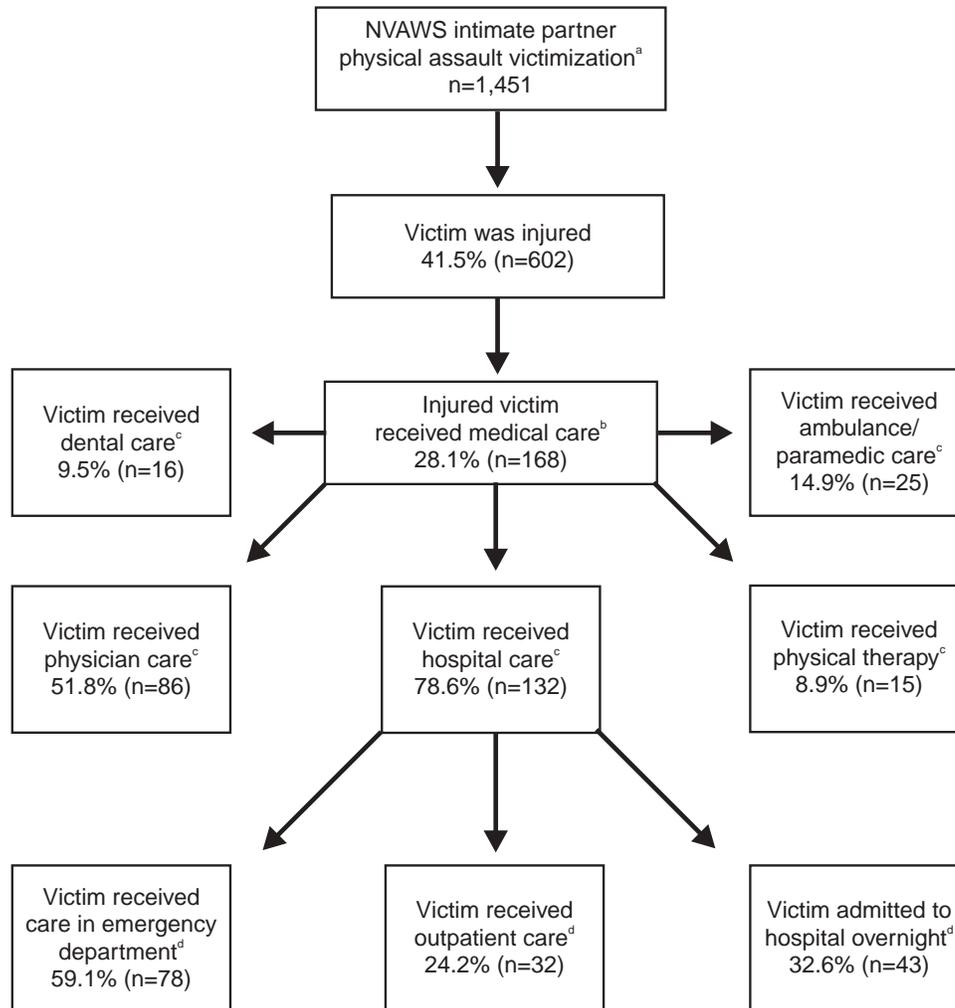

^c Estimates are based on responses from victims who received medical care.

^d Estimates are based on responses from victims who received hospital care.

Note: Total percentages for type of medical and hospital care received exceed 100 because some victims had multiple forms of medical/hospital care.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001.

Figure 2.
Percentage Distributions of U.S. Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Physical Assault by Medical Care Service Use, 1995

^a Estimates are based on the most recent intimate partner victimization since the age of 18.

^b The percentage of victims who received medical care is based on 598 responses from victims who were injured, excluding 4 “don’t know” responses.

^c Estimates are based on 168 responses from victims who received medical care, although the percentage of victims who received physician care is based on 166 respondents, excluding 2 “don’t know” responses.

^d Estimates are based on responses from victims who received hospital care.

Note: Total percentages for type of medical and hospital care received exceed 100 because some victims had multiple forms of medical/hospital care.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001.

Intimate Partner Violence

Victims' Use of Mental Health Care Services

NVAWS respondents who were victimized by an intimate partner were asked whether they talked to a psychologist, psychiatrist, or other type of mental health professional about their most recent victimization, and if so, how many times.

NVAWS Findings

One-third of female rape victims, 26.4% of physical assault victims, and 42.6% of stalking victims said they talked to a mental health professional, most of them multiple times. Among these women, rape victims averaged 12.4 visits, physical assault victims averaged 12.9 visits, and stalking victims averaged 9.6 visits (Table 5).

National Estimates of Mental Health Care Service Use

Of the estimated 5.3 million rapes, physical assaults, or stalking incidents by intimate partners each year, nearly 1.5 million result in some type of mental health counseling. The total number of mental health care visits by female IPV victims each year is estimated to be more than 18.5 million (Table 5).

Victims' Lost Productivity

The NVAWS asked IPV victims whether their most recent victimization caused them to lose time from routine activities, including employment, household chores, and childcare. Victims who lost time from employment and household chores were asked how many days they lost from these activities. This information was then applied to the estimated number of women victimized each year by intimate partners to produce annual estimates of total lost productivity.

NVAWS Findings

Of adult female IPV victims, 35.3% who were stalked, 21.5% who were raped, and 17.5% who were physically assaulted lost time from paid work (Table 6). Women stalked by an intimate partner averaged the largest number of days lost from paid work (10.1). Women raped by an intimate partner lost an average 8.1 days from paid work, and victims of IPV physical assault lost 7.2 days on average per victimization (Table 7).

Among IPV stalking victims, 17.5% lost days from household chores; IPV rape and physical assault victims lost 13.5% and 10.3% respectively (Table 6). Victims of IPV rape lost the largest average number of days from household chores (13.5), followed by stalking (12.7) and physical assault (8.4) victims (Table 7).

National Estimates of Lost Productivity

According to NVAWS estimates, U.S. women lose nearly 8.0 million days of paid work each year because of violence perpetrated against them by current or former husbands, cohabitants, dates, and boyfriends. This is the equivalent of 32,114 full-time jobs each year. An additional 5.6 million days are lost from household chores (Table 7).

Intimate Partner Homicides Among Women

Data about fatal IPV were obtained from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reports (UCR) Supplementary Homicide Reports. Data in the UCR are submitted to the FBI by nearly 17,000 law enforcement agencies nationwide. In 1995, the same year as data from the NVAWS, 1,252 U.S. women ages 18 and older were killed by intimate partners.

Summary

Nearly 5.3 million intimate partner victimizations occur among U.S. women ages 18 and older each year. This violence results in nearly 2.0 million injuries and nearly 1,300 deaths. Of the IPV injuries, more than 555,000 require medical attention, and more than 145,000 are serious enough to warrant hospitalization for one or more nights. IPV also results in more than 18.5 million mental health care visits each year. Add to that the 13.6 million days of lost productivity from paid work and household chores among IPV survivors and the value of IPV murder victims' expected lifetime earnings, and it is clear to see that intimate partner violence against women places a significant burden on society.

References

Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. Unpublished data for task order 0621-15, funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; 2001.

Fox JA. Uniform Crime Reports [United States]: Supplementary Homicide Reports, 1976–1998 [Computer file]. ICPSR version. Boston (MA): Northeastern University, College of Criminal Justice [producer]. 2000. Ann Arbor (MI): Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research [distributor]. 2000. Available from: URL: <http://www.icpsr.umich.edu:8080/ICPSR-STUDY/03000.xml>.

Intimate Partner Violence

Max W, Rice DP, Golding J, Pinderhughes H. Cost of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States, 1995; 1999. Unpublished report for contract 282-92-0048, funded by the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Tjaden P, Thoennes N. Prevalence, Incidence, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women: Findings from the National Violence Against Women Survey; 1999. Unpublished report for grant 93-IJ-CX-0012, funded by the U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice; and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Tjaden P, Thoennes N. Extent, Nature, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence: Findings from the National Violence Against Women Survey. Washington (DC): U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, National Institute of Justice; 2000. NCJ 181867.

Wetrogen SI. Projections of the Population of States by Age, Sex, and Race: 1988 to 2010, Current Population Reports, P25-1017. Washington (DC): U.S. Bureau of the Census; 1988.

Table 1. Percentage of NVAWS Respondents and Estimated Number of U.S. Adult Women Nonfatally Victimized by an Intimate Partner in Their Lifetimes and in the Previous 12 Months, by Type of Victimization, 1995

Type of Victimization	In Lifetime		In Previous 12 Months
	Percent in NVAWS^a	Estimated No. Women^b	Percent in NVAWS^a	Estimated No. Women^b
Rape	7.7	7,753,669	0.2 ^c	201,394
Physical assault	22.1	22,254,037	1.3	1,309,061
Stalking	4.8	4,833,456	0.5	503,485
TOTAL Victimized^d	25.5	25,677,735	1.8	1,812,546

^aPercentage of respondents is based on NVAWS interviews with 8,000 U.S. women ages 18 and older.

^bEstimated number of women is calculated by applying the NVAWS percentage to the 1995 projected population estimate of women ages 18 and older in the U.S. (100,697,000).

^cOnly 16 women participating in the NVAWS reported IPV rape in the 12 months preceding the survey. Estimates based on this small number are marginally stable and should be viewed with caution.

^dThe individual types of victimizations do not sum to the total number of women victimized because some victims reported multiple types of victimization.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Wetrogen 1988.

Table 2. Estimated Number of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Victimization Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Type of Victimization	No. of Victims	Average No. of Victimization Per Victim^a	Total No. of Victimization	Annual Rate of Victimization Per 1,000 Women
Rape	201,394	1.6	322,230 ^b	3.2 ^b
Physical assault	1,309,061	3.4	4,450,807	44.2
Stalking	503,485	1.0	503,485	5.0

^aThe average number of victimizations per victim is based on the previous 12 months. Because stalking by definition means repeated acts, and because no woman was stalked by more than one intimate partner in the 12 months preceding the survey, the number of stalking victimizations was imputed to be the same as the number of stalking victims. Thus, the average number of stalking victimizations per victim is 1.0.

^bRelative standard error exceeds 30 percent. Based on 16 women who reported intimate partner rape in the previous 12 months, this estimate is unstable and used only as part of intermediate calculations to determine the total costs associated with IPV.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 3. Estimated Victimization Outcomes and Medical Care Service Use by U.S. Adult Female Victims of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape and Physical Assault, 1995

Victimization Outcomes and Medical Services Used	Rape	Physical Assault	Total
Victimizations	322,230	4,450,807	4,773,037
Victimization resulting in injury ^a	116,647	1,847,085	1,963,732
Victimization resulting in some type of medical care ^b	36,161	519,031	555,192
Victimization resulting in:
Hospital care ^c	28,784	407,958	436,742
Physician care ^c	21,407	268,858	290,265
Dental care ^c	6,654	49,308	55,962
Ambulance/paramedic care ^c	7,377	77,336	84,713
Physical therapy ^c	8,100	46,194	54,294
Victimization resulting in hospital:
ED care ^d	14,766	241,103	255,869
Outpatient care ^d	8,865	98,726	107,591
Overnight care ^d	12,550	132,994	145,544

^aDerived by applying the injury percentages (Figures 1 and 2) to the total number of victimizations.

^bDerived by applying the medical care percentages (Figures 1 and 2) to the number of victimizations resulting in injury.

^cThe number of victimizations resulting in each particular type of medical care (e.g., physician care) was derived by applying the percentage of victimizations resulting in that particular service (Figures 1 and 2) to the overall number of victimizations resulting in some type of medical care.

^dThe number of victimizations resulting in each particular type of hospital care (e.g., ED care) was derived by applying the percentage of victimizations resulting in that particular type of care (Figures 1 and 2) to the overall number of victimizations resulting in hospital care.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001; Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes (unpublished data) 1999.

Table 4. Estimated Average and Total Number of Medical Care Service Uses by U.S. Adult Female Victims of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape and Physical Assault, 1995

Type of Medical Service	Rape		Physical Assault		Rape and Physical Assault
	Average No. of Uses	Total No. of Uses ^a	Average No. of Uses	Total No. of Uses ^a	Total No. of Uses
ED visits	1.9	28,055	1.9	458,096	486,151
Outpatient visits	1.6	14,184	3.1	306,051	320,235
Hospital overnights	3.9	48,945	5.7	758,066	807,011
Physician visits	5.2	111,316	3.2	860,346	971,662
Dental visits	2.3	15,304	4.4	216,955	232,259
Ambulance/paramedic services	1.3	9,950	1.1	85,070	95,020
Physical therapy visits	13.4	108,540	21.1	974,693	1,083,233

^aThe total number of uses for each type of medical care service for rape and physical assault victimizations was derived by multiplying the total number of victimizations resulting in that medical care service (Table 3) by the average number of uses of that service.

NOTE: Estimates were derived separately for each type of victimization. Overall totals for service use were subsequently derived by summing the respective estimates across victimization types. Consequently, the overall average number of medical care service uses was not derived.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001; Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes (unpublished data) 1999.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 5. Estimates of Mental Health Care Service Use by U.S. Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Violence by Victimization Type, 1995

Victimization and Mental Health Use Estimates	Rape	Physical Assault	Stalking	Total
Total number of victimizations	322,230	4,450,807	503,485	5,276,522
Percent of victimizations resulting in mental health care services	33.0%	26.4%	42.6%	N/A
Number of victimizations resulting in mental health care services	106,336	1,175,013	214,485	1,495,834
Average number of mental health care visits per victimization	12.4	12.9	9.6	N/A
TOTAL number of mental health care visits	1,318,566	15,157,668	2,059,056	18,535,290

NOTE: Estimates were derived separately for each type of victimization. Overall totals for victimizations and mental health care visits were subsequently derived by summing the respective estimates across victimization types. Consequently, the overall percentage receiving mental health care services and overall average number of mental health care visits per victimization were not derived.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes 2000; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001; Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes (unpublished data) 1999.

Table 6. Estimated Percentage of Victims and Number of Nonfatal Victimization of Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Against U.S. Adult Women, by Time Lost from Paid Work and Household Chores, 1995^a

Victimization Type	Activity	Percent Victims	Number of Victimization
Rape	Paid Work	21.5	69,279
	Household Chores	13.5	43,501
Physical assault	Paid Work	17.5	778,891
	Household Chores	10.3	458,433
Stalking	Paid Work	35.3	177,730
	Household Chores	17.5	88,110
TOTAL	Paid Work	N/A	1,025,900
	Household Chores	N/A	590,044

^aEstimates are derived from the NVAWS based on the most recent intimate partner victimization since age 18.

NOTE: Victimization estimates of time lost from both paid work and household chores were derived separately for each victimization type. The total number of victimizations was subsequently derived by summing the respective estimates across victimization types. Consequently, the overall percentages of victims reporting time lost from paid work and household chores were not derived.

NOTE: See Appendix A for calculations of lost productivity and related values.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes (unpublished data) 1999; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 7. Estimated Lost Productivity Among U.S. Adult Female Victims of Nonfatal Intimate Partner Violence, by Victimization Type and by Time Lost from Paid Work and Household Chores, 1995^a

Victimization Type	Activity	Days Lost		Lost Full-Time Job Equivalent ^b
		Average	Total
Rape	Paid Work	8.1	561,160	2,263
	Household Chores	13.5	587,264	N/A
Physical assault	Paid Work	7.2	5,608,015	22,613
	Household Chores	8.4	3,850,837	N/A
Stalking	Paid Work	10.1	1,795,073	7,238
	Household Chores	12.7	1,118,997	N/A
TOTAL	Paid Work	N/A	7,964,248	32,114
	Household Chores	N/A	5,557,098	N/A

^aEstimates are derived from the NVAWS based on the most recent intimate partner victimization since age 18.

^bThe estimates of lost full-time job equivalents for paid work conservatively assume 248 work days per year.

NOTE: Victimization estimates of the average and total number of days lost from both paid work and household chores were derived separately for each victimization type. The overall total number of days lost was subsequently derived by summing the respective estimates across victimization types. Consequently, the overall average number of days lost from paid work and household chores were not derived.

NOTE: See Appendix A for illustrations of calculations of lost productivity and related values.

Sources: Tjaden and Thoennes (unpublished data) 1999; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001.

Costs of Intimate Partner Violence in the United States

Understanding the economic costs of intimate partner violence (IPV) can aid policy-makers in allocating resources more effectively and efficiently. This chapter provides the estimated annual costs of medical care, mental health care, lost productivity, and present value of lifetime earnings associated with IPV against U.S. adult women. The data presented reflect costs associated with IPV victimizations that occurred in 1995; these data are the most appropriate, reliable data currently available. It should be noted, however, that costs related to victimization in a given year are not always incurred in that year. For instance, mental health care visits related to IPV could continue for years after victimization. Therefore, estimated costs for victimization in a given year may underestimate the total costs of an incident of IPV victimization.

Calculating the Costs of Intimate Partner Violence

The economic costs of IPV are divided into two components—direct and indirect costs.

- Direct costs are the actual dollar expenditures related to IPV. They include spending for health care–related services such as emergency department (ED) visits; hospitalizations; outpatient clinic visits; services of physicians, dentists, physical therapists, and mental health professionals; ambulance transport; and paramedic assistance. To calculate the total costs of each medical and mental health care service, the unit cost of a particular service was multiplied by the number of times that service was used (Bardwell 2001).
- Indirect costs of IPV represent the value of lost productivity from both paid work and household chores for injured victims and the present value of lifetime earnings for victims of fatal IPV. Lost productivity was measured by the number of days victims were unable to perform paid work and/or household chores (including household chores and childcare for women not employed outside the home) because of illness, injury, or disability related to IPV victimization. The value of lost productivity was calculated using the mean daily values of work and household production, which are based on data from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics (1996; 1999), Miller (1997), and the U.S. Bureau of the Census (1996). The present value of lifetime earnings was calculated by multiplying the number of IPV homicides for each age group by the average present value of the anticipated future earnings of women in those age groups. These calculations account for differential life expectancy by age group, labor force earning patterns and participation rates at successive ages, and imputed household production values for women in the labor force and women not in the labor force (Rice, Max, Golding and Pinderhughes 1997).

Intimate Partner Violence

To yield more reliable estimates for service use and lost productivity, all most-recent IPV victimizations reported in the NVAWS—including those that occurred more than 12 months before the interview—were used to establish patterns of service use and lost productivity.

Data Sources Used to Calculate Costs of Intimate Partner Violence

As discussed previously, the National Violence Against Women Survey (NVAWS) and Uniform Crime Reports Supplementary Homicide Report were used to measure the incidence of fatal and nonfatal IPV, incidence of IPV-related health care service use among survivors, and lost productivity. Additionally, the following sources were used to calculate the health care costs of IPV:

- Medical Expenditure Panel Survey (MEPS), 1996. This survey by the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality lists expenditures for medical care in the U.S. The MEPS is the main data source for unit costs of health care presented in this report. These unit costs were deflated to 1995 dollars using the appropriate health care components of the Consumer Price Index.
- Medicare 5% Sample Beneficiary Standard Analytic Files. This data source, which reflects physician/supplier claims, was used to calculate expenditures for ambulance and paramedic services, which are not available in MEPS.

Health Care Costs

In this report, service use estimates were restricted to services required as a result of the most recent victimizations by intimate partners, as derived from the NVAWS. In the NVAWS, only women who were injured as a result of IPV were asked about their use of medical care services. In contrast, all women who were victimized, regardless of injury, were asked about their use of mental health care services. Unit costs of medical and mental health care services for rape and physical assault victims were derived from the MEPS using medical and mental health visits related to injuries for women ages 18 and older. The unit costs of mental health care services for stalking victims were based on MEPS using mental health visits for women ages 18 and older who did not also sustain physical injuries.

Medical Care Costs

Medical care costs include ambulance transport and paramedic care; ED care; physician, physical therapy, and dental visits; inpatient hospitalizations; and outpatient clinic visits. Victims seeking medical care often received more than one service. We estimated the medical care costs of rape and physical assault separately. Rapes that involved physical assault were classified as rape only to avoid counting victimizations twice. No medical care costs were associated with stalking.

Rape. According to estimates from the NVAWS, 322,230 IPV rapes occur among women each year. Slightly more than one-third of these rapes (36.2%) result in physical injuries, 31.0% of which require medical care. In all, 36,161 IPV rapes result in women receiving medical care for injuries. Table 8 presents the number of times IPV rape victims use each medical care service, along with the unit costs of those services.

The mean medical care cost per IPV rape is about $516. The mean medical care cost per rape among victims who actually receive treatment is $2,084 per victimization. Not all victims who reported receiving medical care used all types of medical services. Therefore, the average cost of medical care for victims receiving treatment reflects variations in service use; it does not equal the total of each of the individual service costs per rape.

Nearly half of the medical care costs associated with IPV rape are paid by private or group insurance; victims pay more than one-quarter of the costs (Table 9).

Physical Assault. Based on NVAWS estimates, 4,450,807 IPV physical assaults occur against women annually; 41.5% of these assaults cause injuries. Medical care for injuries is required in 519,031 incidents (28.1% of those injured). Table 10 presents the number of times physical assault victims use medical care services and the unit costs of those services.

The mean medical care cost per incident of IPV physical assault is $548. The mean medical care cost per physical assault among victims who actually receive treatment is $2,665. Not all victims who reported receiving medical care used all types of medical services. Therefore, the average cost of medical care for victims receiving treatment reflects variations in service use; it does not equal the total of each of the individual service costs per physical assault.

As with IPV rape, private or group insurance pays for nearly half of medical care costs for IPV physical assaults; victims pay more than one-quarter of the costs (Table 9).

Mental Health Care Costs

All women in the NVAWS who reported IPV were asked if they used mental health care services. Because mental health care often requires multiple visits over a long period of time, the cost of these services is substantial.

Intimate Partner Violence

Rape. According to NVAWS estimates, one-third (33.0%) of IPV rapes result in the victim's speaking with a psychologist, psychiatrist, or other mental health professional about the incident. On average, each incident requires 12.4 mental health care visits, for a total of 1.3 million mental health visits per year, at a mean cost of $78.86 per visit. The mean mental health care cost per incident of IPV rape is $323; the mean cost per IPV rape among victims who actually receive treatment is $978. Victims pay for more than one-third of mental health care services; private health insurers pay only slightly more than victims (Table 11).

Physical Assault. More than one-quarter (26.4%) of IPV physical assaults result in the victim's speaking with a psychologist, psychiatrist, or other mental health professional, according to NVAWS estimates. On average, each incident requires 12.9 visits, for a total of 15.2 million visits annually, at a mean cost of $78.86 per visit. The mean mental health care cost per incident of IPV physical assault, is $269; among victims who actually receive treatment, the mean cost per incident is $1,017. Victims pay for approximately one-third of the costs (Table 11).

Stalking. NVAWS estimates indicate that more than half a million women are stalked by intimate partners each year. Forty-three percent of these victims seek mental health care services, at an average of 9.6 visits per person. That's a total of nearly 2.1 million mental health care visits related to IPV stalking annually at a mean cost of $71.87 per visit. The mean mental health care cost per stalking incident by an intimate partner is $294; the mean cost per stalking incident among victims who actually receive treatment is $690. Private insurance pays for 34.7% of this mental health care; victims pay for 32.0% (Table 11).

Total Health Care Costs

The estimated total health care costs of IPV each year, including medical and mental health care services, is nearly $4.1 billion (Table 12). Of these costs, 89.7% are attributable to intimate partner physical assaults due to the large number of victimizations: 4,450,807 physical assaults compared with 322,230 rapes (6.7% of costs) and 503,485 stalking victimizations (3.7% of costs). The total medical and mental health care cost per victimization by an intimate partner was $838 per rape, $816 per physical assault, and $294 per stalking (Table 13).

Lost Productivity

Victims of IPV lose time from their regular activities due to injury and mental health issues. They may also be at greater risk for other health problems, such as chronic pain and sleep disturbances, which can interfere with or limit daily functioning (McCauley et al. 1995).

Rape. Among IPV rape victims, mean daily earnings lost are $69, and the mean daily value of household chores lost is $19.¹ According to NVAWS estimates, more than one-fifth (21.5%) of the women raped by an intimate partner report losing time from paid work, and 13.5% lose time from household chores (Table 14). Rape victims lose an estimated 1.1 million days of activity each year, which is equivalent to 3,872 person-years.

Physical assault. Among IPV physical assault victims, mean daily earnings lost are $93, and the mean daily value of household chores lost is $24. Approximately one in six (17.5%) victims report time lost from paid work, and 10.3% report lost time from household chores (Table 14). Victims of IPV physical assault lose an estimated 9.5 million days of activity each year; that equals 33,163 person-years of lost productivity.

Stalking. Among IPV stalking victims, mean daily earnings lost are $93, and the mean daily value of household chores lost is $24. More than one-third (35.3%) of stalking victims report time lost from paid work, according to NVAWS estimates; 17.5% report time lost from household chores (Table 14). Stalking victims lose an estimated 2.9 million days of productivity—or 10,304 person-years—annually.

Total Lost Productivity

As shown in Table 12, the estimated total value of days lost from employment and household chores is $858.6 million. The value of lost productivity from employment is $727.8 million, representing 84.8% of the total; the value of lost productivity from household chores is $130.8 million. More than 13.5 million total days are lost from job and housework productivity, which is equivalent to 47,339 person-years. Nearly three-quarters (71.6%) of lost productivity is due to physical assault; 22.6% of lost productivity is due to stalking.

Present Value of Lifetime Earnings

The present value of lifetime earnings (PVLE) measures the expected value of lost earnings that IPV homicide victims would have otherwise contributed to society had they been able to live out their full life expectancies. An estimated 1,252 women are killed by an intimate partner each year. The PVLE for these victims is an estimated $892.7 million—an average of more than $713,000 per fatality. (See Appendix B for PVLE by age group.)

¹See Appendix A for calculations of lost productivity and related values as illustrated for rape estimates.

Intimate Partner Violence

Summary: Total Costs of Intimate Partner Violence

The costs of IPV against women exceed an estimated $5.8 billion (Table 12). These costs include nearly $4.1 billion in the direct costs of medical care and mental health care and nearly $1.8 billion in the indirect costs of lost productivity and PVLE. Statistically, the overall total cost estimate of $5.8 billion varies from more than $3.9 billion to more than $7.6 billion, as indicated by the 95% confidence interval for the total costs (Table 12).

The largest proportion of the costs is derived from physical assault victimizations because that type of IPV is the most prevalent (Figure 3). The largest component of IPV costs is health care, accounting for nearly $4.1 billion—more than two-thirds of the total costs (Figure 4).

Figure 3.
Percentage of Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against U.S. Adult Women by Victimization Type, 1995

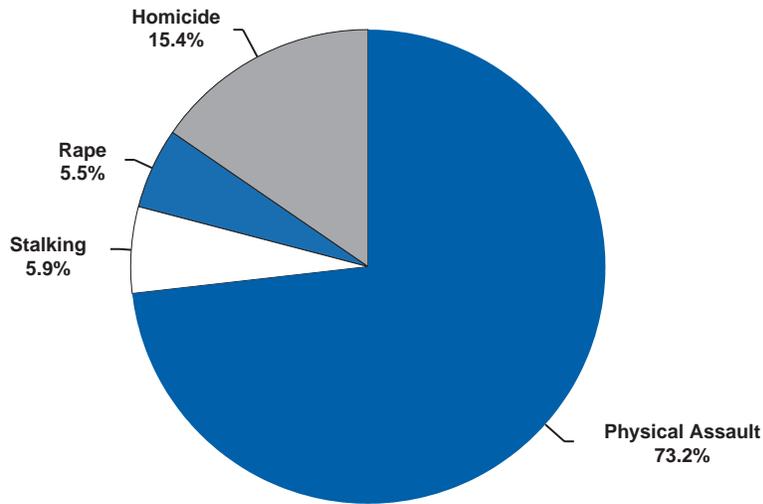

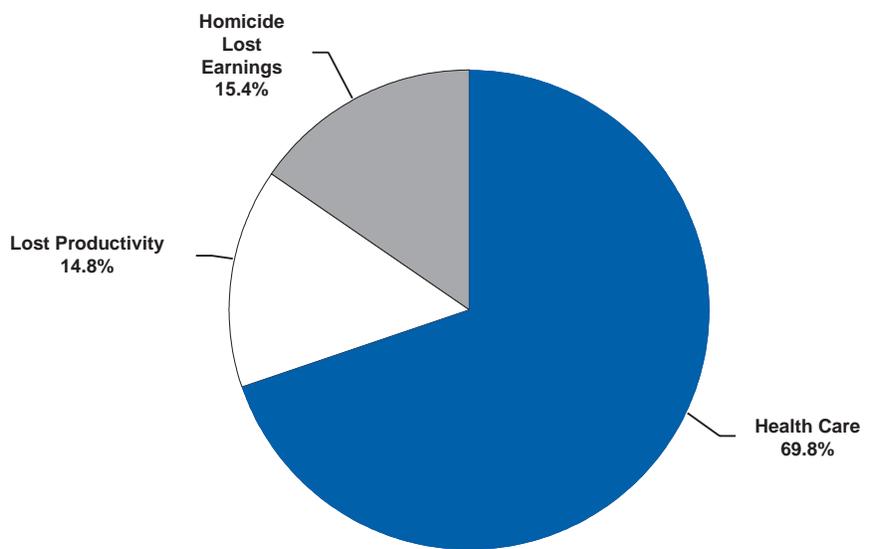

Figure 4.
Percentage of Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against U.S. Adult Women by Cost Type, 1995

Intimate Partner Violence

References

Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. Final Report on Methodology for Computation of Confidence Intervals for Summary-Level Estimates in the Cost Study of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women; July 2001. Final report for task order 0621-15, funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. Unpublished data for task order 0621-15, funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; 2001.

Max W, Rice DP, Golding J, Pinderhughes H. Cost of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States, 1995; 1999. Report for contract 282-92-0048, funded by the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

McCauley J, Kern DK, Kolodner K, Dill L, Schroeder AF, DeChant HK, et al. The “battering syndrome”: prevalence and clinical characteristics of domestic violence in primary care internal medicine practices. Annals of Internal Medicine 1995;123:737–46.

Miller T. Unpublished data on the value of household production. Landover (MD): National Public Services Research Institute; 1997.

Office of Statistics and Programming, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Collapsed total cost summary estimates of intimate partner violence. Unpublished data; 2002.

Research Triangle Institute International. Methodology Used to Produce Select Unit Cost Estimates, Variance Estimates, and Confidence Intervals; 2001. Report for task order 0621-15, funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Rice D, Max W, Golding J, Pinderhughes H. The Cost of Domestic Violence to the Health Care System. Final Report. Report prepared for the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services; 1997.

Tjaden P, Thoennes N. Prevalence, Incidence, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women: Findings from the National Violence Against Women Survey; 1999. Unpublished report for grant 93-IJ-CX-0012, funded by the U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice; and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Tjaden P, Thoennes N. Extent, Nature, and Consequences of Intimate Partner Violence: Findings from the National Violence Against Women Survey, Research Report; 2000. Report for grant 93-IJ-CX-0012, funded by the U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice; and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. NCJ 181867.

U.S. Bureau of the Census, U.S. Department of Commerce. Money Income in the United States: 1995. Current Population Reports, P60-193. Washington (DC): U.S. Government Printing Office; 1996.

U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor. Employment and Earnings, January 1994. Washington (DC): U.S. Government Printing Office; 1996.

U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor. National Compensation Survey: Occupational Wages in the United States, 1997. Washington (DC): U.S. Government Printing Office; 1999.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 8. Estimated Medical Care Service Use and Unit Costs for Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Type of Medical Service	No. of Rapes Requiring Medical Care	Average No. of Uses Per Rape	Total Uses	Unit Cost for Service	Cost Per Rape
					All Rapes ^a	Rapes Requiring Medical Care
ED visits	14,766	1.9	28,055	$ 346.73	$ 30.19	$ 658.79
Outpatient visits	8,865	1.6	14,184	347.59	15.30	556.14
Hospital overnights	12,550	3.9	48,945	2,519.90 ^b	382.76	9,827.61
Physician visits	21,407	5.2	111,316	112.21	38.76	583.49
Dental visits	6,654	2.3	15,304	308.90 ^b	14.67	710.46
Ambulance/paramedic services	7,377	1.3	9,590	121.13	3.60	157.46
Physical therapy visits	8,100	13.4	108,540	89.74	30.23	1,202.52

^aTo determine the cost per rape across all rapes, the total cost associated with each medical care service is divided by the estimated total number of intimate partner rapes (322,230), whether or not the victim was injured.

^bThe unit cost estimates of hospital overnights and dental visits are unstable and are used only as part of intermediate calculations.

Sources: Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes 1999; Research Triangle Institute International 2001; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001; Tjaden and Thoennes 2000.

Table 9. Distribution of Primary Source of Payment for Medical Care Resulting from Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape and Physical Assault Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Payer	Rape Victims (Percent Paid)	Physical Assault Victims (Percent Paid)
Medicare	N/A ^a	3.0
Medicaid	12.5	11.0
Private or group insurance	45.8	48.3
Out of pocket	29.2	28.6
Free or low-income clinics	2.1	1.8
Other public sources	10.4	6.1
Some other source	N/A ^a	1.2
TOTAL	100.0	100.0

^aAmong the reported rape cases in the NVAWS that resulted in injury and medical care, no payments were made by Medicare or “some other source.” However, analysts assume that among the total rapes resulting in injury and treatment in the U.S., these payment categories are not actually 0%. Therefore, the estimates are considered unavailable. To determine the percentage distribution of the remaining payment categories, the categories with unavailable estimates were ignored.

Source: Tjaden and Thoennes (unpublished data) 1999.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 10. Estimated Medical Care Service Use and Unit Costs for Nonfatal Intimate Partner Physical Assault Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Type of Service	No. of Physical Assaults Requiring Medical Care	Average No. of Uses Per Assault	No. of Uses	Unit Cost for Service	Cost Per Physical Assault
					All Physical Assaults ^a	Physical Assaults Requiring Medical Care
ED visits	241,103	1.9	458,096	$ 346.73	$ 35.69	$ 658.79
Outpatient visits	98,726	3.1	306,051	347.59	23.90	1,077.53
Hospital overnights	132,994	5.7	758,066	2,519.90	429.19	14,363.43
Physician visits	268,858	3.2	860,346	112.21	21.69	359.07
Dental visits	49,308	4.4	216,955	308.90	15.06	1,359.16
Ambulance/paramedic services	77,336	1.1	85,070	121.13	2.32	133.24
Physical therapy visits	46,194	21.1	974,693	89.74	19.65	1,893.51

^aTo determine the cost per physical assault across all physical assaults, the total cost associated with each medical care service is divided by the estimated total number of intimate partner physical assault victimizations (4,450,807), whether or not the victim was injured.

Sources: Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes 1999; Research Triangle Institute International 2001; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001; Tjaden and Thoennes 2000.

Table 11. Distribution of Primary Source of Payment for Mental Health Care Resulting from Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Payer	Rape Victims (Percent Paid)	Physical Assault Victims (Percent Paid)	Stalking Victims (Percent Paid)
Medicare	2.1	1.9	2.8
Medicaid	10.5	6.9	11.1
Private or group insurance	37.1	43.1	34.7
Out-of-Pocket	33.6	32.0	32.0
Free or low-income clinics	10.5	11.6	15.3
Some other source	2.8	1.6	N/A ^a
Other public sources	3.5	2.9	4.2
TOTAL^b	100.0	100.0	100.0

^aAmong the victimizations of stalking in the NVAWS that resulted in mental health care, no payments were made by “some other source.” However, analysts assume that among the total stalking victimizations resulting in mental health care in the U.S., this payment category is not actually 0%. Therefore, the estimate is considered unavailable. To determine the percentage distribution of the remaining payment categories, the “some other source” category estimate was ignored.

^bColumns may not sum due to rounding.

Source: Tjaden and Thoennes (unpublished data) 1999.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 12. Estimated Total Costs of intimate Partner Violence Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Type of Cost	Estimated Total Cost (in Thousands)	Total Cost 95% Confidence interval (in Thousands)
		Lower Limit	Upper Limit
Health care ^a	$ 4,050,211	$ 2,207,491	$ 5,892,931
Lost productivity	$ 858,618	$ 596,058	$ 1,121,178
Paid work	$ 727,831	$ 470,435	$ 985,227
Household chores ^b	$ 130,787	$ 78,969	$ 182,605
Present value of lifetime earnings	$ 892,733	$ 839,723	$ 945,743
TOTAL COSTS (Direct + Indirect)	$ 5,801,561	$ 3,939,475	$ 7,633,648

^aHealth care costs include mental health and medical care costs. In turn, medical care costs include outpatient clinic visits; emergency department visits; ambulance transport or paramedic care; physician, physical therapy, and dental visits; and inpatient hospitalization.

^bThe productivity value for household chores was discounted for victims who also worked at a job for pay. Due to the uncertain labor force status of victims who reported only lost productivity from household chores, one cannot assume that these victims were necessarily out of the labor force. Consequently, the value assigned to all lost productivity from household chores was discounted.

NOTE: The Estimated Total Cost column does not sum to Total Costs due to rounding.

Sources: CDC, NCIPC, Office of Statistics and Programming (unpublished data) 2002; Bardwell 2001; Bardwell Consulting, Ltd. (unpublished data) 2001; Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes 1999; Research Triangle Institute International 2001.

Table 13. Estimated Average Health Care Costs per Nonfatal Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Victimization Against U.S. Adult Women, 1995

Health Care Costs	Rape^a	Physical Assault^a	Stalking^a
Medical Care, Total^b	$ 515.51	$ 547.50	N/A
ED visits	30.19	35.69	N/A
Outpatient visits	15.30	23.90	N/A
Hospital overnights	382.76	429.19	N/A
Physician visits	38.76	21.69	N/A
Dental visits	14.67	15.06	N/A
Ambulance/paramedic services	3.60	2.32	N/A
Physical therapy visits	30.23	19.65	N/A
Mental Health Care, Total	$ 322.70	$ 268.57	$ 293.92
TOTAL	$ 838.21	$ 816.07	$ 293.92

^aEstimates are based on 322,230 rapes, 4,450,807 physical assaults, and 503,485 stalking incidents.

^bNo medical care costs are associated with stalking.

Sources: Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes 1999; Research Triangle Institute International 2001; Tjaden and Thoennes 2000.

Intimate Partner Violence

Table 14. Estimated Lost Productivity Due to Intimate Partner Rape, Physical Assault, and Stalking Against U.S. Adult Women by Victimization Type, 1995

Victimization Type	Paid Work	Household Chores	Total
Rape
Percentage of victims reporting days lost	21.5	13.5	N/A
Mean number of days lost per rape ^a	8.1	13.5	N/A
Total Days Lost^a	561,000	587,000	1,148,000
Physical Assault
Percentage of victims reporting days lost	17.5	10.3	N/A
Mean number of days lost per physical assault ^a	7.2	8.4	N/A
Total Days Lost^a	5,608,000	3,851,000	9,459,000
Stalking
Percentage of victims reporting days lost	35.3	17.5	N/A
Mean number of days lost per stalking ^a	10.1	12.7	N/A
Total Days Lost^a	1,795,000	1,119,000	2,914,000

^aAmong victims who returned to the reported activity.

NOTE: The estimated total number of victimizations for rape is 322,230; for physical assault, 4,450,807; and for stalking, 503,485.

NOTE: For each type of victimization, the percentage of victims reporting days lost and the mean number of days lost per victimization differ between those victims who lost time from paid work and those victims who lost time from household chores. Consequently, the number of days lost from paid work and household chores must be determined separately, then totaled to obtain the total of days lost for each victimization type. As a result, the total or overall percentage of victims reporting days lost and the overall mean number of days lost per victimization were not calculated.

NOTE: See Appendix A for illustrations of calculations of lost productivity and related values.

Sources: Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes 1999; Research Triangle Institute International 2001; Tjaden and Thoennes (unpublished data) 1999.

Discussion

This report presents estimates of the incidence, prevalence, and costs of intimate partner violence against U.S. women ages 18 and older. In addition to data about IPV fatalities obtained from existing FBI sources, it uses data from the first large-scale survey to collect information about injuries IPV victims sustained, the medical and mental health care services victims used, and the time victims lost from paid work and household chores. The report reflects the most appropriate, reliable data currently available about the costs associated with IPV. Standard public health methods were applied to recent data on IPV-related injuries to estimate their incidence, estimate resulting health care costs and lost productivity, and to review strategies for reducing the incidence of IPV.

As reported in previous chapters, nearly 5.3 million intimate partner victimizations occur each year among U.S. women ages 18 and older, and nearly 1,300 women lose their lives as a result of IPV. Based on these estimates, such violence costs our nation more than an estimated $5.8 billion dollars annually—nearly $4.1 billion for medical and mental health care, $0.9 billion in lost productivity, and $0.9 billion in homicide lost earnings. These figures are believed to underestimate the problem of IPV for many reasons, and additional efforts are needed to better determine the costs of IPV against women in the U.S.

Using the Cost Figures in this Report

The cost estimates presented in this report can be used to—

- Calculate the economic cost savings from reducing a given number of injuries resulting from IPV;
- Demonstrate the economic magnitude of IPV in the U.S.;
- Evaluate the impact of IPV on a specific sub-sector of the economy, such as consumption of medical resources or effects on employers.

However, because of some limitations in the data—the discussion of which follows—these estimates are not comprehensive. Therefore, the estimates in this report should not be used in direct comparisons with the costs of reducing IPV, namely to produce benefit-cost ratios in analyses of interventions to prevent IPV.

Intimate Partner Violence

Data Limitations

The cost estimates presented in this report have several limitations, the most obvious of which is the fact that 1995 incidence data were used to generate annual estimates. CDC recognizes that direct costs, value of lost productivity, and present value of lifetime earnings resulting from IPV today may differ from that of IPV that occurred in 1995. However, this report reflects the most appropriate, reliable data available to date about the costs associated with IPV. Other limitations involve the exclusion of certain costs potentially associated with IPV and the use of average rather than actual medical care costs.

Excluded Costs

Several cost components were excluded from this report because data were unavailable or insufficient. Perhaps the largest omission is criminal justice costs. NVAWS data indicate that an estimated 1.5 million intimate partner rape, physical assault, or stalking victimizations result in police reports each year; nearly 79,000 of these victimizations result in a jail or prison sentence. While IPV-related criminal justice service use is significant, current data about unit costs do not allow for reliable, nationally representative cost estimates associated with these services.

Some medical care costs, including home care visits, treatment for sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), and terminated pregnancies were excluded because there were too few victimizations resulting in these outcomes reported in the NVAWS to generate reliable cost estimates. Also excluded were cost components for which either no data were available or only incidence data were available: social services such as women's shelters and counseling clinics; shelter, moral support, and financial assistance from IPV victims' friends and family; medical or mental health costs of treating children who witness IPV; foster care for children as a result of IPV; and the value of time lost from volunteer work, school, and social and recreational activities.

Although the mental health care costs associated with IPV were calculated, it was not possible to estimate the intangible costs of pain and suffering associated with IPV that did not result in a mental health care visit, or that did not result in a visit where IPV was identified as associated with the suffering. Because costs of this type may be quite high, this report should be viewed as presenting very conservative estimates, or as the lower limit of the costs related to IPV.

Because the NVAWS reports on the survivors of IPV, data about victims' use of medical and mental health services were collected only for victims of nonfatal IPV. No data were collected about the health care costs associated with treating victims who ultimately die as a result of IPV.

Limitations of the Medical Care Data

Health care service use resulting from IPV is not always readily reported. Therefore, the health care costs in this report are underestimates and should be viewed as lower limits of the magnitude of the problem.

Evidence has shown that victims of IPV manifest a wide range of physical symptoms that are not directly related to abuse. These can include headaches, reproductive health problems, chronic pain, digestive problems, and sleep disturbances (McCauley et al. 1995). To the extent that medical care service use associated with indirect physical symptoms of IPV was not reported by victims, related costs are excluded from the health care estimates in this report.

Limitations of the Mental Health Care Data

Data about mental health–related costs of IPV are limited for several reasons. First, incidence estimates derived from the NVAWS are based on the response to a question about whether or not the victim spoke to a mental health professional. As no definition of mental health professional was given, this question was subject to the interpretation of the respondent. Furthermore, mental health professionals are not the only individuals from whom victims may seek mental health care.

Second, respondents were asked only about mental health care providers with whom they discussed their experience of IPV victimization. Some women may have sought care for mental health problems but not identified that it was related to past experiences of IPV.

Finally, the cost of unmet mental health needs is not estimated. This is a critical gap in IPV research because the violence itself may limit women’s use of needed services. That is, men who physically abuse their partners are also likely to control and coerce them (Wilson, Johnson and Daly 1995), including restricting their access to mental health care (Walker 1984).

Underestimate of a Particular Type of Victimization

Although some incidents involved more than one type of victimization (e.g., a woman whose former husband stalks and then rapes her), the NVAWS counted each incident only once and classified it according to the severity of abuse. Rape was considered more severe than physical assault, and physical assault more severe than stalking. Women who sustained injuries during incidents involving more than one type of victimization were asked to report services used as a result of these injuries for the most severe type of victimization involved in these incidents. They were asked not to report service use for the same injuries when asked about the less severe type(s) of victimization involved in the particular incident. These procedures prevented double-counting of both service use and associated costs resulting from these incidents. However, these procedures likely resulted in an underestimate of health care costs resulting from physical assault, because some costs are included under rape. Likewise, some stalking costs are likely included under physical assault and rape.

Intimate Partner Violence

Conservative Cost Estimation

The cost estimates of IPV in this report are generally conservative for several reasons. First, the NVAWS estimates of IPV victimization among women are lower than estimates in other studies. Second, the estimates presented in this report are based on services that victims of IPV reported using. Some NVAWS respondents may not have reported IPV due to embarrassment or shame. Consequently, any services used as a result of these victimizations also went unreported.

Finally, the estimate of present value of lifetime earnings relies on criminal homicide data that include the relationship between victim and perpetrator and the victim's age. The relationship between victim and perpetrator was not known for all homicide cases, which likely results in an undercounting of IPV homicides. Additionally, about 1% of homicide cases determined to be the result of IPV did not report victim's age. The present value of lifetime earnings could not be calculated for those cases, thus resulting in a conservative estimate.

A Need for More Data

This report is an important step in understanding the current knowledge about intimate partner violence in the U.S. However, it highlights a need for more data to fully appreciate the economic and human costs of this problem. Obtaining these data will involve creating standard definitions of IPV, expanding quantitative data collection efforts, and employing methods to gather qualitative data.

Standardizing the Definition of Intimate Partner Violence

Definitions of intimate partner violence vary among agencies collecting data. For example, some definitions include same sex partners, and some do not. Some consider IPV among both current and former intimate partners, some do not. Because of these variations, survey data also vary, making it difficult to firmly state the magnitude of IPV.

To address problems posed by varying definitions, CDC recently facilitated a national process to develop standard definitions of IPV (Saltzman et al. 1999). At the same time, CDC funded several states to develop IPV surveillance systems that use these definitions to gather data from the health care, social service, and criminal justice systems. This project serves as a pilot test of the IPV definitions and the feasibility of developing statewide public health surveillance to estimate the magnitude of the problem.

Improving Quantitative Data

The information about service use provided in this report includes medical and mental health care obtained from the traditional medical care system. Many survivors of IPV do not seek out these health care providers, especially for mental health care. Instead, they may go to support groups and rape crisis centers or contact crisis hotlines. Researchers should find ways to gather data from such service providers. Additionally, many women experience repeated IPV victimizations, yet little is known about the cumulative effects of such repeat abuse on service use.

One area for which costs of IPV may be substantial is criminal justice services. The NVAWS asked survivors about their involvement with the criminal justice system, but inadequate unit cost data exist to allow for generating unbiased estimates of the costs of those services. In fact, only one county at the time of the survey had unit cost data. Nationally representative data about the costs of individual criminal justice services—police reports, arrests and detainment, legal and judicial services, incarceration, probation—are needed.

While health system data about IPV, primarily derived from hospital discharge and emergency department records, have improved in recent years, future efforts will allow for even better data collection. The clinical modification of ICD-10 (ICD-10 CM) will provide information about abuse, neglect, abandonment, and the perpetrator's relationship to the victim. This will enable better IPV data collection from health sources.

Collecting Qualitative Data

Perhaps more compelling than the economic costs are data about the human costs. But how do you quantify pain, suffering, and decreased quality of life associated with intimate partner violence, both on survivors and on children exposed to such violence? Data are needed to assess the long-term, psychosocial effects of IPV and to demonstrate more clearly the social burden of this problem. Researchers should explore methods for collecting data about indirect or intangible costs of IPV, such as using in-depth interviews with survivors and service providers.

Intimate Partner Violence

A Need for Primary Prevention of Intimate Partner Violence

To reduce both the economic and human costs of intimate partner violence against women, we must focus on primary prevention—finding ways to stop such violence before it ever occurs—rather than only treating victims and rehabilitating perpetrators. To that end, CDC has identified several priorities to address IPV prevention. These priorities, set forth in CDC's Injury Research Agenda, represent the research issues that warrant the greatest attention and extramural and intramural research from CDC for the next three to five years. (The agenda can be viewed online at: www.cdc.gov/ncipc/pub-res/research_agenda/agenda.htm.)

One key area of CDC's IPV research is social norms. Social norms—what a community views as acceptable behaviors for its citizens—can profoundly affect efforts to prevent public health problems. In October 2000, CDC began exploring how social norms affect intimate partner violence. Findings are guiding development of a campaign to change social norms that accept or promote IPV against women. The campaign will target boys in sixth through eighth grades, a population in which strong social norms are developing quickly and in which we can effect lasting changes. It will focus on the characteristics of healthy relationships, in which violence is unacceptable.

CDC is also working to find ways to intervene with individuals, families, and communities in ways that stop violence before it happens. Its research agenda calls for developing programs and policies that provide counseling for batterers and prevent dating violence as means of intervening with perpetrators and potential perpetrators. The agenda also sets a priority to better understand how violent behavior toward intimate partners develops, so that researchers can implement strategies to reduce factors that increase the risk of IPV perpetration.

Other areas of research about preventing intimate partner violence include developing and evaluating training programs about IPV detection and prevention for health professionals, evaluating the health consequences of IPV across the life span, developing and evaluating surveillance methods to better collect data about incidence and prevalence of IPV, and disseminating information about IPV prevention strategies that work.

Conclusion

With an estimated economic cost of $5.8 billion, and the untold intangible costs, intimate partner violence against women is a substantial public health problem that must be addressed. Significant resources for research are needed to better understand the magnitude, causes, and risk factors of IPV and to develop and disseminate effective primary prevention strategies. Until we reduce the incidence of IPV in the United States, we will not reduce the economic and social burden of this problem.

References

McCauley J, Kern DK, Kolodner K, Dill L, Schroeder AF, DeChant HK, et al. The “battering syndrome”: prevalence and clinical characteristics of domestic violence in primary care internal medicine practices. Annals of Internal Medicine 1995;123:737–46.

Saltzman LE, Fanslow JL, McMahon PM, Shelley GA. Intimate Partner Violence Surveillance: Uniform definitions and recommended data elements, Version 1.0. Atlanta: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control; 1999.

Walker LE. The Battered Woman Syndrome. New York: Springer; 1984.

Wilson M, Johnson F, Daly M. Lethal and nonlethal violence against wives. Canadian Journal of Criminology 1995;37:331–61.

Intimate Partner Violence

Appendix A

Calculating Lost Productivity and Related Values

Total Days Lost from Paid Work and Household Chores

To determine the total days lost from paid work and household chores for each victimization type, we first determined the total number of victimizations that resulted in days lost from each of those activities:

$$\frac{\text{Percent victimizations resulting in days lost X}}{\text{Total number of victimizations}} = \text{Total number of victimizations resulting in days lost.}$$

For example, to determine the number IPV rape victimizations that resulted in lost paid work:

$$\begin{aligned} &21.5\% \text{ of rapes resulting in days lost from paid work X} \\ &322,230 \text{ total rape victimizations} = \\ &69,279 \text{ rapes resulting in days lost from paid work.} \end{aligned}$$

Next, multiply the number of victimizations resulting in lost days of a given activity by the mean number of days lost from that activity per victimization. For example, to determine the total number of paid work days lost for rape victimizations:

$$\begin{aligned} &69,279 \text{ rapes resulting in lost paid work days X} \\ &8.1 \text{ mean number of days lost from paid work per rape} = \\ &\text{Approximately } 561,000 \text{ total days lost} \\ &\text{from paid work due to rape victimization.} \end{aligned}$$

Intimate Partner Violence

Person-Years Lost from Paid Work and Household Chores

Total time lost may also be expressed in person-years lost. For paid work, these calculations assumed 248 work days per year; for household chores, 365 days per year. To calculate person-years:

$$\frac{\text{Total number of days lost for a given activity for a given victimization type}}{\text{Number of productivity days per year}} = \text{Total person-years lost for that victimization type.}$$

For example, to calculate person-years of household chores lost for rape victimizations:

$$\frac{561,000 \text{ total days lost}}{365 \text{ days of household chores}} = 2,262 \text{ person-years lost.}$$

NOTE: Total person-years presented here may be slightly different than those presented elsewhere in this report; rounded figures are used here, but unrounded estimates were used elsewhere.

Mean Daily Values and Total Value of Lost Productivity

To estimate the total value of lost productivity for each victimization type, we need to first estimate the respective mean daily value of earnings from work. Mean daily values of earnings are based on the mean age of women at the time of victimization. For rape, the mean age at the time of victimization is 24.5 years; for physical assault, 27.5 years; and for stalking, 26.5 years (Max, Rice, Golding and Pinderhughes 1999). For each victimization type, the mean daily value of earnings is, in turn, based on the respective mean annual earnings for women of the mean victimization age group (U.S. Bureau of Census 1996; U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics 1996).

To calculate the mean daily value of earnings for each victimization type:

$$\frac{\text{Mean annual earnings of the mean victimization age group}}{\text{Number of paid work days per year}} = \text{Mean daily value of earnings.}$$

For example, to calculate the mean daily value of earnings for rape victims:

$$\frac{$17,058 \text{ (mean annual earnings for mean victimization age)}}{248 \text{ paid work days per year}} = $68.78 \text{ daily value.}$$

To calculate the total value of lost days from paid work:

$$\frac{\text{Mean daily value of earnings} \times \text{total days of earnings lost}}{\text{Total value of lost days}} =$$

For example, for rape victimizations:

$$\frac{$68.78 \times 561,000 \text{ total days of earnings lost due to rape}}{\text{Approximately } $38,600,000} =$$

Follow the same calculations to determine the total value of days lost from household chores.

References

Max W, Rice DP, Golding J, Pinderhughes H. Cost of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States, 1995; 1999. Report for contract 282-92-0048, funded by the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

U.S. Bureau of the Census, U.S. Department of Commerce. Money Income in the United States: 1995. Current Population Reports, P60-193. Washington (DC): U.S. Government Printing Office; 1996.

U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor. Employment and Earnings. January 1994. Washington (DC): U.S. Government Printing Office; 1996.

Intimate Partner Violence

Appendix B

Calculating Age Group–Specific Present Value of Lifetime Earnings Estimates

Present Value of Lifetime Earnings (PVLE) Among Adult Female Victims of Intimate Partner Homicide by Age Group, U.S., 1995

Age Group	No. of Homicides	Mean PVLE	Total PVLE
18–19	50	$ 938,545	$ 46,927,268
20–24	176	958,434	168,684,384
25–29	182	924,842	168,321,244
30–34	217	852,312	184,951,704
35–39	207	754,284	156,136,788
40–44	148	637,849	94,401,652
45–49	73	509,876	37,220,948
50–54	58	380,019	22,041,102
55–59	26	257,641	6,698,666
60–64	23	156,178	3,592,094
65–69	24	86,713	2,081,112
70–74	22	45,029	990,638
75–79	25	21,336	533,400
80–84	16	8,682	138,912
85 and older	5	2,557	12,785
OVERALL TOTAL	1,252	N/A	$ 892,732,697

NOTE: The mean PVLE for each age group was multiplied by the number of intimate partner homicides in that age group to arrive at the total PVLE for that group. Then, all age group–specific PVLEs were added to arrive at the overall total PVLE.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 27

Costs Associated With First-Time Homelessness for Families and Individuals

Visit PD&R's website

www.huduser.org

to find this report and others sponsored by HUD's Office of Policy Development and Research (PD&R). Other services of HUD USER, PD&R's research information service, include listservs, special interest reports, bimonthly publications (best practices, significant studies from other sources), access to public use databases, and a hotline (800-245-2691) for help accessing the information you need.

Costs Associated With First-Time Homelessness for Families and Individuals

Prepared for:

U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development
Office of Policy Development and Research
Office of Special Needs Assistance Programs

Prepared by:

Brooke Spellman
Jill Khadduri
Brian Sokol
Josh Leopold
Abt Associates Inc.

March 2010

The contents of this report are the views of the contractor and do not necessarily reflect the views or policies of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development or the U.S. Government.

Preface

This study examines costs associated with the use of homeless and mainstream service delivery systems by families and individuals experiencing homelessness for the first time in six study communities. Assigning costs to public programs is a first step toward developing measures of the value of public interventions compared to the public costs incurred by ignoring or avoiding the problems those interventions are intended to address. The study finds that the experience of homelessness is diverse and the associated costs vary tremendously depending on the pattern of homelessness and family or individual status. It is not, however, a study of either cost-effectiveness or quality of care, but rather a calculation of costs associated with homelessness.

Homeless Program Costs

The study examines average costs per month across sites for emergency shelter, transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing. It finds that:

- For individuals, overnight emergency shelter has the lowest cost per day (and provides the fewest services and often limited hours).
- For individuals, transitional housing proves more expensive than permanent supportive housing, since services for transitional housing were usually offered directly by the homeless system rather than by mainstream service providers.
- For families, emergency shelters are usually equally or more expensive than transitional housing and permanent supportive housing, because families are often given private rooms or apartments. Emergency shelters for families are also likely to be open 24-hours, provide supportive services, and have fewer units, yielding higher fixed costs.
- In almost all cases, the costs associated with providing housing for individuals and families who are homeless within a program exceeds the Fair Market Rent cost of providing rental assistance without supportive services.
- Homeless system and mainstream service costs were difficult to calculate, largely due to challenges in accessing local administrative data.

Costs Associated with First-Time Homelessness

Average homeless system costs for individuals ($1,634 to $2,308) are much lower than those for families ($3,184 to $20,031), who usually have higher daily costs and stay much longer. The 50 percent of individuals with the lowest homeless system costs incurred only 2 to 3 percent of the total system costs; whereas the 10 percent of individuals with the highest daily costs incurred up to 83 percent of total costs. The distribution of costs for families is also quite skewed, though less so than for individuals.

The emergency shelter system may be an “adequate” response to an immediate housing crisis for most individuals, but is an expensive solution to family homelessness. More than half of individuals studied used only emergency shelters, yet the costs of this facility type represent less than one-third of total costs for individuals.

Individuals and families who remain in homeless programs for extended periods incur the highest percentage of costs, presenting the greatest opportunity for homeless system cost savings. Cost savings may be realized if permanent supportive housing were more readily available to these households. Permanent supportive housing tends to be less expensive to the homeless system than transitional housing because most service costs are borne by mainstream systems.

Individuals and families who use homeless programs multiple times with long gaps between stays represent less than one-fifth of those studied. Although costs for this group are proportionately smaller than for those with extended uses of homeless programs, the episodic homelessness of these households indicates that resources currently may not be used effectively. These individuals and families tend to have high levels of interaction with the criminal justice system (though gaps were not explained exclusively by incarceration), and a majority of families with long gaps also experience changes in household composition between stays.

Demographics

Nearly three-quarters of first-time homeless individuals in the communities studied were male. Per-person costs for first-time homeless women are 97 percent higher than for men, due largely to greater privacy arrangements in female emergency shelters and a higher proportion of women in transitional or permanent supportive housing. Women also stay in homeless programs 74 percent longer than men (this is controlled for in the cost differential above). In all sites but one, African-Americans are over-represented among first-time homeless individuals in comparison to the general population of people in poverty.

The first time homeless family in the study most frequently has one adult member (usually female) and an average of 3 to 3.5 members. Homeless families headed by younger persons tend to use less expensive program types, stay for shorter periods, and, consequently, incur lower costs than those headed by older persons.

Patterns of First-Time Homelessness

The majority of households studied, 50 to 65 percent of individuals and 58 to 72 percent of families, stayed in a homeless program only one time during the 18-month period the study covered. Families cycled less in and out of homeless facilities, but remained in programs longer. Extended stays were associated with escalating costs; each additional month in a program is associated with 35 percent higher costs for individuals and 22 percent higher costs for families.

Mainstream System Costs

The question of whether mainstream service costs can be offset by appropriate housing interventions is left open by this study. However, consistent with past research, significant mainstream system cost savings may be achieved by targeting individuals or families with high levels of involvement in mainstream systems prior to homelessness. Most first-time homeless individuals in the study do not have high involvement in mainstream systems, and less than 10 percent received care in these systems during the period of homelessness. At two sites, criminal justice and mental health involvement increased substantially immediately before first-time individual homelessness. This finding suggests a need for discharge planning to ensure that individuals leave mainstream programs, such as inpatient treatment or jails, with adequate housing. In contrast, first-time homeless families had very high enrollment in Medicaid and low to moderate use of other mainstream systems.

Conclusions

The study concludes that communities should explore strategies to:

- Avoid extensive use of high-cost homeless programs (i.e., transitional housing) for individuals or families who primarily need permanent housing without supports or those whose service needs can be met by mainstream systems.
- Alter the way that homeless assistance systems respond to households that are unable to remain stably housed and face repeated instances of homelessness. Communities could consider models such as Homeless Prevention and Rapid Re-Housing.

- Work with mainstream systems (especially criminal justice, mental health, and substance abuse systems) to design appropriate discharge planning strategies and ways to identify clients at-risk of homelessness to prevent homelessness.

Acknowledgments

This study was conducted by Abt Associates Inc. for the Department of Housing and Urban Development under Task Order C-CHI-00838, CHI-T0001 (“The Costs of Homelessness Study”) and CD-TA Cooperative Agreement MAMV-001-06.

The authors of this report wish to acknowledge the assistance provided to the study by many individuals. First, we appreciate the guidance and support of Paul Dornan, the study’s Project Officer in HUD’s Office of Policy Development and Research, who has provided sensible and thoughtful insight, as well as tremendous support, throughout the study. We are also thankful to HUD’s Office of Special Needs Assistance Programs for funding follow-up analysis and writing.

We are especially grateful to the individuals who assisted us in the six study sites: Des Moines, Iowa; Houston, Texas; Jacksonville, Florida; Kalamazoo, Michigan; Upstate South Carolina; and Washington, DC. These individuals—leaders and members of the Continua of Care (CoC); Homeless Management Information System administrators; program and administrative staff of homeless service providers; mainstream agency staff; and other local champions—contributed their time, data and ideas to make this study possible. In particular, we would like to highlight the contributions of Julie Eberbach, Eileen Mitchell, and David Eberbach, Des Moines, Iowa; Tuan Nguyen, Clarissa Stephens, Anthony Love, Cathy Crouch, Julia Thompson, Buddy Grantham, Brandon LeBlanc, Horace Robinson, Houston, Texas; Molly Petersen, Melissa Pociask, Thomas Shull, and David Anderson, Kalamazoo, Michigan and Barbara Ritter, Michigan Coalition for the Homeless; Wanda Lanier, Bob Arnold, Stephen Caravella and Diane Gilbert, Jacksonville, Florida and Dr. Annette Christy and Kristen Turner, University of South Florida; Michael Chesser and Kay Perry, Upstate South Carolina CoC and Diana Tester and Charles Bradberry, State of South Carolina; and Darlene Mathews, Sue Marshall, Steve Cleghorn and Laura Zeilenger, Washington, DC.

We also appreciate the guidance of the leading researchers who participated in a research design expert panel meeting: Martha Burt, Dennis Culhane, Joe Harkness, David Long, Lori Megdal, and Sandra Newman. Denise DiPasquale advised the study team on development of appropriate methods to calculate nightly unit costs associated with capital investments for homeless programs.

At Abt Associates, a number of staff members played important roles in designing the study and in collecting, assembling, analyzing, and interpreting the data and writing the report. The authors of this study are Brooke Spellman, Jill Khadduri, Brian Sokol, and Josh Leopold. Dr. Jill Khadduri was the Principal Investigator, and Brooke Spellman was the Project Director for the study; both were involved in all aspects of the study. Dr. Larry Buron, Project Quality Advisor, provided thoughtful and constructive input throughout all phases of the research. Brian Sokol led the HMIS and mainstream data analysis, with analytical support from Josh Leopold and Evan Volgas. Ken Lam conducted the multivariate cluster analysis of the study cohort and regression analysis of cost and cohort data. Megan Tiano and Nichole Fiore assisted with document review and cross-checking the data. Eileen Fahey and Katheleen Linton provided production support. Jill Khadduri, Josh Leopold, Pedram Mahdavi, Louise Rothschild, Matt White, and Erin Wilson were responsible for collecting the programmatic and cost data on the homeless systems for each of the sites and writing portions of the case studies, with support from subcontractors and consultants, Martha Burt, Kat Freeman, Ann Oliva and Daria Zvetina. Consultants Eric Jahn and Heidi Burbage played significant roles in researching and coordinating access to mainstream data.

Table of Contents

Executive Summary	ES-1
Methodology.....	ES-2
Homeless Program Costs.....	ES-3
Characteristics of First-time Homeless Individuals and Families in this Study and Costs to the Homeless Services System.....	ES-5
Patterns of First-time Homelessness for Individuals and Families in this Study.....	ES-6
Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness.....	ES-7
Costs for Groups of Households with Common Patterns of System Utilization.....	ES-8
Costs Associated with Mainstream System Use By First-time Homeless Individuals and Families.....	ES-12
Conclusion.....	ES-15
1. Introduction	1-1
2. Methodological Framework for Analysis of Costs Associated with Homelessness	2-1
2.1. Research Questions.....	2-1
2.2. Research Domains.....	2-2
2.3. Study Sites, Period, and Population.....	2-3
2.4. Data Sources.....	2-5
2.5. Data Analysis Approach for Case Studies.....	2-8
2.6. Cross-Site Analysis.....	2-17
2.7. Limitations of the Study.....	2-18
3. Homeless Program Costs	3-1
3.1. Homeless Program Costs for Individuals.....	3-2
3.2. Homeless Program Costs for Families.....	3-10
3.3. Policy Implications of Program Costs.....	3-19
4. First-time Homelessness for Individuals and its Associated Costs	4-1
4.1. Existing Research.....	4-2
4.2. Characteristics of First-time Homeless Individuals.....	4-5
4.3. Patterns of First-Time Homelessness and Associated Homeless System Costs.....	4-6
4.4. Costs Associated with Mainstream System Use.....	4-22
4.5. Homeless System and Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals During the Period of Homelessness.....	4-36
4.6. Policy Implications and Recommendations for Further Research.....	4-39
5. First-time Homelessness for Families and its Associated Costs	5-1
5.1. Existing Research.....	5-1
5.2. Characteristics of First-Time Homeless Families.....	5-4
5.3. Patterns of Family Homelessness and Associated Homeless System Costs.....	5-5
5.4. Costs Associated with Mainstream System Use by First-Time Homeless Families.....	5-23
5.5. Policy Implications and Recommendations for Further Research.....	5-30

6. Implications for Policy and Future Research.....	6-1
6.1. Policy Implications Related to Different Patterns of Homeless System Use.....	6-2
6.2. Policy Implications Related to Individuals and Families with Different Demographic Characteristics.....	6-5
6.3. Ideas for Future Research.....	6-8

Appendix A: Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Individuals in Jacksonville, FL	A-1
A.1. Overview	A-1
A.2. The Homeless Services System for Single Adults in Jacksonville-Duval, Clay Counties	A-4
A.3. Homeless System Costs	A-9
A.4. Mainstream System Costs.....	A-14
A.5. Total Homeless and Mainstream Costs.....	A-23
A.6. Implications	A-26
References.....	A-29

Appendix B: Jacksonville Tables.....	B-1
B.1. Demographic Characteristics of Homeless Path Groups.....	B-1
B.2. Homeless Service Utilization by Homeless Path Group.....	B-2
B.3. Multivariate Analysis of Total Costs, Homeless Costs, and Total Mainstream Costs.....	B-3
B.4. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain, with Homeless Utilization as Covariates.....	B-7
B.5. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain, with Path Groups as Covariates	B-9
B.6. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain, with Total Homeless Costs as a Covariate	B-12
B.7. Mainstream Involvement and Per Person Mainstream Costs by Homeless Path Group and Time Period	B-13

Appendix C: Individual Data.....	C-1
C.1. Cohort Summaries.....	C-1
C.2. Cross-Site Individuals Multivariate Analyses.....	C-4
C.3. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain in Houston Individuals	C-7

Appendix D: Family Data.....	D-1
D.1. Family Cohort Summaries.....	D-1
D.2. Cross-Site Family Multivariate Analysis	D-5

Bibliography of Cost of Homelessness Case Studies	R-1
--	------------

References.....	R-3
------------------------	------------

List of Exhibits

Exhibit 1: Average Cost Per Household Per Month for Homeless Program Types.....	ES-4
Exhibit 2: Study Cohort Characteristics	ES-5
Exhibit 3: Homelessness System Utilization	ES-7
Exhibit 4: Average Homeless System Cost per Household.....	ES-8
Exhibit 5: Households that Use Only Emergency Shelter for Brief Periods.....	ES-9
Exhibit 6: Households that Use Homeless Programs for Extended Periods.....	ES-10
Exhibit 7: Households that Use Homeless Programs Multiple Times with Long Gaps Between Stays.....	ES-11
Exhibit 8: Average Mainstream System Costs per Person Incurred “During” Homelessness	ES-13
Exhibit 9: Total Mental Health Encounters Each Month by First-time Homeless Individuals in Houston Shown Relative to First Day of Homelessness	ES-14
Exhibit 10: Rate of Mainstream System Involvement and Costs Per Family Per Month	ES-15
Exhibit 2.1: Research Questions and Outputs for the Study.....	2-2
Exhibit 2.2: Case Study Sites and Study Population	2-3
Exhibit 2.3: Mainstream Domains included in the Study.....	2-8
Exhibit 3.1: Average Cost Per Person Per Day of Homeless Residential Programs Serving Individuals by Program Type and Site a	3-3
Exhibit 3.2: Average Cost Per Person Per Month for each Homeless Program Type for Individuals and FY2006 One-Bedroom Fair Market Rents.....	3-4
Exhibit 3.3: Average Cost Per Day of Emergency Shelter for Homeless Individuals	3-5
Exhibit 3.4: Average Cost Per Day of Transitional Housing for Homeless Individuals.....	3-8
Exhibit 3.5: Average Cost Per Day of Permanent Supportive Housing Programs for Homeless Individuals	3-9
Exhibit 3.6: Average Cost Per Family Per Day of Homeless Residential Programs Serving Families by Program Type and Site.....	3-11
Exhibit 3.7: Average Cost Per Family Per Month for Each Homeless Program Type for Families and FY2006 Two-Bedroom Fair Market Rents.....	3-13
Exhibit 3.8: Average Cost Per Day of Emergency Shelter for Homeless Families	3-15
Exhibit 3.9: Average Cost Per Day of Transitional Housing for Homeless Families.....	3-17
Exhibit 3.10: Average Cost Per Day of Permanent Supportive Housing for Homeless Families	3-19
Exhibit 4.1: NY/NY Cost Study Service Use during Two Year Period prior to Placement in Permanent Supportive Housing	4-3
Exhibit 4.2: Characteristics of the Study Cohort of Individuals Who Became Homeless between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005 as compared with National Estimates	4-6
Exhibit 4.3: Use of the Homeless System by the Study Cohorts of First-Time Homeless Individuals During an 18-Month Period	4-7
Exhibit 4.4: Regression Analysis of Lengths of Stay for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Des Moines, Houston, and Jacksonville	4-8
Exhibit 4.5: Average Homeless System Cost per Individual	4-9

Exhibit 4.6: Regression Analysis of Total Homeless System Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Des Moines, Houston, and Jacksonville.....	4-10
Exhibit 4.7: Path Groups Common to All Three Sites and their Relative Sizes.....	4-13
Exhibit 4.8: Proportion of Study Cohort Represented by Common Path Groups	4-14
Exhibit 4.9: Characteristics of Individuals in Common Path Groups.....	4-15
Exhibit 4.10 Average Homeless System Costs Per Person By Path Group.....	4-21
Exhibit 4.11: 2006 Fair Market Rent for One-bedroom Unit in Individual Study Sites.....	4-22
Exhibit 4.12 Rates of Involvement with Mainstream System Domains Prior to Homelessness, During Homelessness and Overall During the Study Period	4-23
Exhibit 4.13: Average Mainstream System Costs per Person Incurred “During” Homelessness	4-25
Exhibit 4.14: Monthly Mainstream Costs by Domain and Period, Jacksonville and Houston....	4-26
Exhibit 4.15: Jacksonville Jail Stays Relative to Homelessness	4-2
Exhibit 4.16: Houston (Individuals) Jail Stays Relative to Homelessness	4-28
Exhibit 4.17: Houston (Individuals) Mental Health Costs by Month Relative to Homelessness	4-29
Exhibit 4.18: Regression Analysis of Mainstream System Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Jacksonville.....	4-31
Exhibit 4.19: Regression Analysis of Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Houston.....	4-32
Exhibit 4.20: Jacksonville Cohort’s Average Per Person Monthly Mainstream Costs By Path Group and Period.....	4-34
Exhibit 4.21: Modeling Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Jacksonville by Path Groups	4-34
Exhibit 4.22: Homeless and Selected Mainstream System Costs per Person Incurred during Homelessness	4-36
Exhibit 4.23: Comparison of Costs During Homelessness Among Select Jacksonville Path Groups and Costs from the NY/NY Study Cohort Prior to Placement in Permanent Supportive Housing.....	4-37
Exhibit 5.1: Average Cost per Family to the Homeless Services System, based on Lengths of Stay and Shelter Reimbursement Rates for Each Community	5-3
Exhibit 5.2: Characteristics of the Study Cohort of Families Who Became Homeless between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005.....	5-4
Exhibit 5.3: Changes in Household Composition among Homeless Families	5-5
Exhibit 5.4: Use of the Homeless System by the Study Cohorts of First-Time Homeless Families during an 18-Month Period.....	5-6
Exhibit 5.5: Regression Analysis of the Length of Stay for First-Time Homeless Families.....	5-7
Exhibit 5.6: Numbers of First-Time Homeless Families using Basic Types of Residential Programs for Homeless People by the Study Cohorts of First-Time Homeless Families	5-9
Exhibit 5.7: Regression Analysis of Program Types used by First-Time Homeless Families in Kalamazoo, DC, South Carolina, and Houston	5-10
Exhibit 5.8: Average Homeless System Cost per Family	5-11
Exhibit 5.9: Regression Analysis of Total Homeless Costs	5-12
Exhibit 5.10: Common Paths Taken by First-Time Homeless Families.....	5-15
Exhibit 5.11: Selected Characteristics of First-Time Homeless Family Path Groups	5-16

Exhibit 5.12: Average Household Cost to the Homeless Services System for Brief Users of Emergency Shelter.....	5-16
Exhibit 5.13: Cost to the Homeless Services System for Heavy Users of Transitional Housing.....	5-18
Exhibit 5.14: Patterns of Use of the Residential Homeless System for “Long Gapper” First- Time Homeless Families	5-19
Exhibit 5.15: Selected Demographic Characteristics of “Long Gappers”	5-20
Exhibit 5.16: Average Cost Per Family to the Homeless Services System for Repeat Users of the Residential Services System with Long Gaps	5-20
Exhibit 5.17: First-Time Homeless Families Using both Congregate and Apartment-Style Emergency Shelter (and not transitional housing) in Washington DC.....	5-22
Exhibit 5.18: Rates of Utilization of Selected Mainstream Systems by First-Time Homeless Families	5-25
Exhibit 5.19: Average Costs for Selected Mainstream Domains per First-Time Homeless Family during the Entire Study Period	5-26
Exhibit 5.20: Mainstream Costs Per Family Per Month Before, During, and Following Homelessness	5-27
Exhibit 5.21: Mental Health Encounters of First-Time Homeless Families in Houston Compared to Date of First Homeless Entry	5-28

Appendix A:

Exhibit 1: The Jacksonville Cohort.....	A-1
Exhibit 2: Costs While Homeless	A-2
Exhibit 3: Monthly Mainstream Costs in Relation to Homelessness.....	A-3
Exhibit 4: The Jacksonville-Duval/Clay Counties CoC.....	A-4
Exhibit 5: Jacksonville CoC Program Typology	A-5
Exhibit 6: Homeless Costs by Program Type	A-7
Exhibit 7: Homeless Program Utilization.....	A-9
Exhibit 8: Summary of Per Person Homeless System Costs	A-9
Exhibit 9: Distribution of Homeless Costs.....	A-10
Exhibit 10: Homeless Costs by Gender, Race and Age	A-10
Exhibit 11: Jacksonville Homeless Path Groups	A-12
Exhibit 12: Percent of Study Cohort Utilizing Mainstream Systems During the Study Period.	A-14
Exhibit 13: Summary of Total Mainstream System Costs.....	A-15
Exhibit 14: Total Monthly Mainstream Costs for the Study Cohort Before, During, and After Homelessness.....	A-15
Exhibit 15: Jacksonville Jail Stays Relative to Homelessness.....	A-16
Exhibit 16: Multivariate Regression Models for Criminal Justice Costs	A-17
Exhibit 17: Multivariate Regression Models for Income Support Costs.....	A-19
Exhibit 18: Multivariate Regression Models for Substance Abuse Costs.....	A-20
Exhibit 19: Multivariate Regression Models for Mental Health Services Costs	A-21
Exhibit 20: Multivariate Regression Models for Physical Health Care Costs	A-22
Exhibit 21: Summary of Total Costs.....	A-23
Exhibit 22: Distribution of Costs During Homelessness	A-23
Exhibit 23: Average Homeless and Mainstream Costs by Time Period and Path Group	A-23
Exhibit 24: Total Homeless and Mainstream Costs by Age.....	A-25

Executive Summary

This study measures costs associated with first-time homeless families and individuals incurred by homeless and mainstream service delivery systems in six study communities. Unaccompanied individuals were studied in Des Moines, Iowa; Houston, Texas; and Jacksonville, Florida. Families were studied in Houston, Texas; Kalamazoo, Michigan; Upstate South Carolina; and Washington, DC.

Past research has primarily documented costs associated with homelessness for individuals with chronic patterns of homelessness or severe mental illness. Newer work has been published on the costs incurred within the homeless system for families experiencing first-time homelessness. This study provides additional findings that help to improve our understanding of homelessness and its associated costs. It presents ideas about opportunities for cost savings, and it advances an approach for measuring costs that, coupled with other evaluation methods, can help communities understand the cost-effectiveness of different homelessness interventions.

The study demonstrates that the experience of homelessness is diverse and the associated costs vary tremendously depending on the pattern of homelessness. Across the six sites, the study identifies three primary patterns of first-time homelessness. Most first-time individuals and families experience homelessness only once or twice and use emergency shelter for a limited period of time at fairly low cost. Some experience much longer stays, usually in transitional housing, and some have very high associated costs. A third group uses the system sporadically, moving in and out of homeless programs multiple times during long periods. We recommend that communities consider specific responses to homelessness that target the needs of those who use the system in different ways.

We also identified certain demographic characteristics and limited patterns of first-time homelessness that were associated with greater mainstream system involvement, but the analysis did not identify clear opportunities for cost savings in the mainstream systems through the implementation of alternative responses to homelessness. However, the results also do not eliminate the possibility of mainstream system cost savings. Analysis of more comprehensive client-level data may yield more conclusive findings in this area.

The study does not attempt to isolate which of the mainstream costs are attributable to homelessness, and it does not compare the benefits of different programs with the costs of their use. Thus, the study is not a cost-effectiveness study and is most accurately characterized as a study to measure homeless and mainstream costs associated with homelessness.

The findings from these communities are not intended to be nationally representative. In fact, findings presented in this report show that the community in which individuals and families received services frequently had a strong effect on both their length of stay and costs. Thus, local factors and particular Continuum and program-level decisions can have a large effect on patterns of homelessness and associated homeless system costs. Despite these local differences, the study finds trends that cut across communities. We hope that policymakers will review these findings and consider whether similar conclusions can be drawn about their own communities. Policymakers can also use similar methods to help assess: how people who are homeless use homeless and mainstream systems in their communities; whether these patterns of use are appropriate; whether their homelessness systems are efficient in achieving positive outcomes for people who become homeless; and whether there are opportunities for cost savings through alternative program models.

After a brief summary of the methodology used for the study, the remainder of the executive summary highlights the key results and policy implications of this research. All of these findings are discussed in detail in the main body of the report.

Methodology

This study breaks new ground methodologically in homelessness research in the following areas:

- rigorously calculating the costs of providing a family or individual with a day of shelter in specific residential programs for homeless people;
- incorporating distinctions among program types and their housing models (e.g., facility-based transitional housing) into our analysis of both patterns and costs of first-time homelessness; and
- analyzing both individuals and families, as well as vastly different types of communities or geographic areas, using the same research design, facilitating direct comparisons.

For purposes of this study, persons were considered homeless if they used a street outreach or residential homeless program that is represented in the site's homeless management information system (HMIS) data. People were considered first-time homeless if they did not have a recorded encounter with an outreach program or stay in a residential homeless program in the HMIS at any point prior to the study enrollment period. Periods in which persons were precariously housed, doubled up, or staying in a non-participating program are not represented as "during homelessness," with one exception. If study subjects had more than one stay in residential homeless programs during the study period, then the time between stays, referred to in the study as a "gap," is also considered "during homelessness." Homeless system costs are based on the actual days stayed in programs, but mainstream costs incurred during "gaps" are counted in the "during homeless" period.

Homeless systems are limited to programs within a community that are designed and dedicated to providing housing and services to people who are homeless. The homeless programs accounted for in this study are: outreach programs, emergency shelters, transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing. Programs that only provide supportive services to homeless people are not included.

Mainstream service systems are those that are not dedicated exclusively to serving people who are homeless, yet provide services that are needed and often used by them. Mainstream system cost data examined for this study include: Medicaid primary healthcare, mental healthcare and substance abuse treatment; state-funded mental healthcare and substance abuse treatment; law enforcement and criminal justice; and income supports.

Using telephone outreach and in-person site visits, we collected information about the homeless system within each community. From this information we developed a homeless program typology, which sometimes differed from local definitions of homeless program types, as a framework for the study. We also derived daily costs for a sample of homeless programs of each type. The homeless program costs account for operational and agency overhead costs associated with each program, in addition to services that are provided as part of the program. Capital costs of facilities owned by programs or donated to them also are included in daily costs per unit for programs in Jacksonville,

Des Moines, and Upstate South Carolina. To account for programs from which we did not collect costs directly, we calculated weighted averages for each type of homeless program within each site.

For each community, we analyzed Homeless Management Information System (HMIS) data to identify the individuals and families who accessed homeless programs for the first-time during the 12-month period between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005.¹ We also used HMIS data to examine homeless program use for each household in the 18 months (30 months in DC) following the day each household (or a member of the household) first accessed a homeless program. Using multivariate cluster analysis, we analyzed four aspects of each household's pattern of homeless system use to derive "path groups," that is groups of households with similar homeless system use, for each community. The variables used to define path groups are: total number of days each household stayed in homeless programs during the 18-month period in which we analyzed homelessness (across all program stays); number of distinct homeless program stays within the 18-month period; types and sequences of homeless programs used; and total number of days between all homeless program stays, also referred to as total number of "gap" days.

Combining homeless program usage and daily cost data, we calculated estimated homeless system costs for each individual or family household in the study. When possible, we also acquired and analyzed utilization data for mainstream systems in order to measure how mainstream systems interact with people who are homeless and to estimate the costs associated with the use of mainstream systems by first-time homeless people. Finally, we analyzed homeless and mainstream costs, using regression analysis to understand the demographic characteristics, homelessness patterns, and path groups associated with lower and higher costs.

Homeless Program Costs

Among homeless programs serving individuals, overnight emergency shelter for individuals has the lowest costs per day, typically offers the fewest services in the least private settings, and is often open only during evening hours. Transitional housing is the most expensive model for individuals and frequently offers private settings and a range of supportive services. Permanent supportive housing also generally offers private living space and supportive services. Permanent supportive housing providers indicate that residents are offered services equivalent in intensity to or even greater than services offered in transitional housing; however, the types of services provided may differ. In most cases, we found that permanent supportive housing programs arrange for residents to receive the "support" piece of the supportive housing directly from mainstream systems, and in fact many residents of the permanent supportive housing projects we examined are believed to be clients of mainstream programs prior to being placed in the housing.² Services paid directly by permanent supportive housing programs appear to be limited to housing-focused services and basic case management. As a result of this structure, permanent supportive housing programs do not have to secure resources to fund these services directly, and the costs are on average comparable to the less expensive 24-hour emergency shelter programs from the perspective of the homeless system.

¹ In Kalamazoo, we studied families who became homeless for the first-time in calendar year 2005.

² Because these clients receive services that they would otherwise be eligible for and could continue to receive these services if they moved to alternative housing, we did not include this cost as part of the housing program. Services paid for with the program budget and those dedicated to the project are accounted for in the program daily costs, when possible.

In contrast, emergency shelters for families are as expensive, if not more expensive, than transitional housing and permanent supportive housing offered in the four communities in which we studied homeless families. This is because families often get private rooms or apartments in emergency shelter; the programs are small and have few units over which to prorate fixed costs; and emergency shelters for families are likely to be open 24-hours and provide supportive services. Permanent supportive housing for families is generally less expensive than emergency shelter from the perspective of the homeless system.

More expensive programs typically have higher costs across all major budget categories: housing operations, services, agency overhead, and the daily cost equivalent of capital investments. Higher overall costs may reflect more supervision, more services, increased private space, or lower program capacity (e.g., decreased economies of scale).

Exhibit 1 shows the average cost per month incurred by the homeless system for each program type in each community in relation to HUD’s Fair Market Rents (FMRs) for a private market unit in the same community. The FMR is a way to quantify the value of a rental subsidy for a month and therefore to compare the costs associated with providing housing for persons who are homeless within a homeless program with the cost of providing rental assistance without supportive services in the private market. Except for overnight emergency shelters in Jacksonville and permanent supportive housing in Des Moines, the FMR is lower than the average monthly cost of all types of homeless residential programs in all six of the communities in which we studied homelessness.

Exhibit 1: Average Cost Per Household Per Month for Homeless Program Types^a
Individual Sites	Emergency Shelter	Transitional Housing	Permanent Supportive Housing	2006 Fair Market Rent for One-bedroom Unit^b
Des Moines	$581	$1,018 – $1,492	$537	$549
Houston	$853 - $1,817	$1,654	$664 – $1,757	$612
Jacksonville	$408 - $962	$870	$882	$643
Family Sites	Emergency Shelter	Transitional Housing	Permanent Supportive Housing	2006 Fair Market Rent for Two-bedroom Unit^b
District of Columbia	$2,496 - $3,698	$2,146 - $2,188	$1,251	$1,225
Houston	$1,391	$1,940 – $4,482	$799	$743
Kalamazoo	$1,614	$813	$881	$612
Upstate South Carolina	$2,269	$1,209	$661	$599 (Greenville MSA)

Note: All costs reported in 2006 dollars.

^a Costs shown reflect weighted averages by program type. Ranges represent the averages of different housing models within a program type. Costs only represent homeless system costs and do not include the value of mainstream system costs that may be incurred while individuals or families reside in these programs.

^b Source: (HUD, 2005)

Chapter 3 of this report describes each program type, the costs associated with providing each type, and the extent to which programs are providing both shelter and supportive services to clients—in contrast to the Fair Market Rents, which represent only the cost of housing. Since rental subsidies are often permanent or long-term, it may not be realistic to assume that a community would provide a single month of rental assistance; whereas, it is very common for a household to use emergency shelter for only one month. It also would be important to assess whether people using rental subsidies use mainstream systems to a greater or lesser extent and cost than people who use residential programs for homeless people either during or after their period of homelessness. Such an examination is outside the scope of this study..

Characteristics of First-time Homeless Individuals and Families in this Study and Costs to the Homeless Services System

Among the three sites in which we studied single adult homelessness, we identified 7,502 individuals as first-time homeless, with the majority in Houston, Texas. The total number of unduplicated families who experienced first-time homelessness across the four family sites was 1,374 households. Exhibit 2 includes descriptive information about the individuals and families we studied, focusing in particular on demographic characteristics associated with costs.

Exhibit 2: Study Cohort Characteristics ^a
	Individual Sites			Family Sites
	Des Moines	Jacksonville	Houston	Houston	Kalamazoo	Upstate SC	Washington, DC
Total Households	1,124	1,972	4,406	477	342	145	410
Male Adults	73%	81%	74%	13%	15%	10%	18%
African American	21%	48%	57%	65%	60%	49%	97%
Average Age of Adults at First Entry	39 yrs	41 yrs	41 yrs	32 yrs	30 yrs	31 yrs	32 yrs
Adults over 40	47%	54%	53%	16%	12%	12%	20%
Household Size				3.2 people	3.2 people	3.0 people	3.5 people
One Adult Household				88%	89%	88%	80%
Household Change ^b				25%	13%	17%	34%

^a Null demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations.

^b Household change reflects a change in household membership from one program entry to another. Household change usually occurs across multiple program stays. However, household change can also occur when a new member joins a family already staying in a program.

The first-time homeless individuals in the communities we studied were predominantly male (73 to 81 percent) and had an average age of 39 to 41 years at program entry. With the exception of Jacksonville, African-Americans are over-represented among first-time homeless individuals in comparison to the general population of individuals in poverty. Multivariate analysis showed that among individuals, single women had fewer stays but used homeless programs 74 percent longer than single men. And women dominate groups with certain patterns of homelessness, such as those who use more expensive types of programs.³ Even when controlling for length of stay, program type, and other demographic characteristics, multivariate analysis shows that single women have 97 percent higher costs than men. Relatively older adults have longer lengths of stay than younger adults, and when controlling for other factors, costs for individuals older than 40 are 10 percent higher than for those between 31 and 40 years. African-American individuals are more likely to spend longer cumulative periods of time homeless, have a greater number of stays, and to incur 19 percent higher homeless system costs than white individuals.

³ Data from victim service providers, such as domestic violence shelters, were not available for this study, so these findings are for other type of homeless residential services.

The first-time homeless families in the study primarily had only one adult member (80 to 89 percent), were comprised of female adults accompanied by children (82 to 90 percent), and had on average 3 to 3.5 members. On average, adults were 30 to 32 years old when they first used a homeless program, and 41 to 50 percent of the children were 6 years old or younger. While the majority of families in the study cohort at each site had constant membership, a very high percentage of those who used more than one program experienced a change in their household membership from one program stay to another.

Homeless families headed by people between 18 and 24 use less expensive program types, stay for shorter periods, and, consequently, incur costs that are approximately one-third less than those headed by 31 to 40 year olds. Unlike results for individuals, African-American families are likely to spend shorter periods of time in homeless programs and to be associated with lower costs than white families. Families with household change are associated with 35 percent greater homeless system costs than those with stable membership, even when controlling for other factors.

These findings show that different types of first-time homeless individuals and families use homeless system resources differently, which suggests opportunities for communities to develop specific strategies to meet the needs of each of these types of individuals and families. For example, communities may want to reevaluate their systems for serving single women rather than serving them primarily in programs alongside families with children. Communities should also explore prioritizing African-American families for prevention and rapid rehousing interventions that address housing and income issues with less focus on services for non-economic issues, since our analysis suggests that a large portion of African-American families may be homeless primarily due to extreme poverty rather than issues related to mental illness or substance abuse. Finally, we recommend strategies to identify and refer households with greater needs to lower-cost interventions, such as permanent supportive housing for individuals, transitional housing for families, or even alternative program types that have not yet been developed.

Patterns of First-time Homelessness for Individuals and Families in this Study

The majority of households we studied, 50 to 65 percent of the first-time homeless single adults and 58 to 72 percent of families, stayed in a homeless program only one time during the 18-month period in which we studied homelessness (30 months in DC). However, individuals who used homeless programs more than once used them frequently; individuals in the study had an average of three distinct program stays. The average for individuals was more than double the average number of stays for families. Although families had fewer stays, they stayed in programs for longer than individuals. Individuals averaged 5 to 10 weeks in a homeless program, whereas families averaged 3 to 10 months. For both, the median number of days spent in homeless programs was well below the average number of days. This means that half of the individuals and families stayed for much shorter periods than the average, and that a small number of individuals and families had very long stays that substantially increased the average for each group as a whole. Households in the study also had gaps averaging 25 to 75 days between all homeless programs stays. Since the majority of households had only one stay, this statistic really means that those with multiple program stays had quite lengthy gaps between all homeless program stays. Exhibit 3 provides some basic information about the patterns of homelessness for the individuals and families within each community.

Exhibit 3: Homelessness System Utilization
	Individual Sites			Family Sites
	Des Moines	Jacksonville	Houston	Houston	Kalamazoo	Upstate SC	Washington, DC ^a
Households with only one stay	53%	50%	65%	72%	68%	65%	58%
Average Number of Stays	3.0 stays	3.3 stays	3.0 stays	1.4 stays	1.5 stays	1.4 stays	1.2 stays
Average Days In Homeless Programs	73 days	57 days	39 days	113 days	94 days	186 days	309 days
Median Days In Homeless Programs	24 days	10 days	22 days	49 days	31 days	103 days	258 days
Average "Gap" Days Between Stays	63 days	75 days	44 days	31 days	61 days	25 days	73 days

^a Homeless system utilization was analyzed over a 30-month period for the DC case study.

Greater length of time in homeless programs and (to a lesser extent) longer periods between stays in homeless programs are associated with greater homeless costs for first-time homeless individuals and families. Controlling for other household characteristics and for the type of program used, each additional month in a homeless program is associated with 35 percent higher costs for individuals and 22 percent higher costs for families. The type of program used has an even greater impact on homeless system costs, as will be discussed later in this summary.

Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness

The average homeless system costs incurred for individuals and families in the communities are provided in Exhibit 4. The average costs for individuals ($1,634 to $2,308) are much lower than those for families ($3,184 to $20,031). The difference in costs between individuals and families is not surprising, since the average daily costs for programs serving individuals are generally much lower than for those serving families (Exhibit 1), and the average length of stay for first-time homeless individuals is much shorter than for first-time homeless families (Exhibit 3).

Exhibit 4: Average Homeless System Cost per Household

	Individual Sites			Family Sites
	Jacksonville	Houston	Des Moines	Kalamazoo	Upstate South Carolina	Houston	Washington, DC ^a
Average Cost per Household	$1,634	$2,257	$2,308	$3,184	$9,663	$11,627	$20,031

Note: All costs reported in 2006 dollars.

^a The DC cost per family does not include families who used only the Community Care Grants program. Including such families would drop the average cost per family in DC to $17,962.

Average costs offer a general picture of the costs associated with homelessness, but they obscure important information about the wide variation in costs associated with first-time homelessness. Only a small group of households incurred high costs at each site, while the majority had minimal or more moderate costs. For individuals, the 50 percent of individuals with the lowest homeless system costs incurred only 2 to 3 percent of the total homeless system costs; whereas the highest-cost 10 percent of the cohort incurred 62 percent of the homeless system costs in Jacksonville, 70 percent in Des Moines, and 83 percent in Houston. Transitional housing for individuals is more expensive per day on average than other program types, and programmatic factors also encourage longer lengths of stay, which also drive up costs. Thus, it is not surprising that the cost to the homeless services system of the most expensive 10 percent of individuals in the study cohort at each site generally reflects continuous use of expensive transitional housing programs for much or all of the 18-month observation period.

The distribution of costs for families is also quite skewed, but not to the same extent as for individuals. In the four sites in which we studied first-time homeless families, the lowest-cost half of families accounts for less than one-seventh of the total cost incurred by the community for first-time homeless families. The proportion ranges from 13 percent in Upstate South Carolina to 5 percent in Houston. In Upstate South Carolina, the highest-cost 10 percent of the study cohort accounts for 32 percent of the total cost to the system, while in Houston the 10 percent highest-cost group accounts for 57 percent of the total homeless system costs for first-time homeless families.

Costs for Groups of Households with Common Patterns of System Utilization

The study defined “path groups” as a way to group people who use the homeless system in similar ways, that is, those who follow similar “paths” through the homeless system. Although path groups were derived separately for each community in the study, several broad patterns of use were present across all six communities: households that use only emergency shelter for brief periods, households that used homeless programs for extended periods, and households that use homeless programs multiple times with long gaps between stays.

Households that Use Only Emergency Shelters for Brief Periods

Households that use only emergency shelter for brief periods represent the majority of all first-time homeless households in the study, although their costs represent less than one-third of total costs incurred by first-time homeless households, as shown in Exhibit 5. On average, “short-stayer” individuals used emergency shelter programs for only 1 to 3 weeks at an average cost per household of $321 to $686. The stays for families were on average longer than those of the individuals we studied. One group of short-stayer families in South Carolina remained in shelters for only 9 days on average, but other short-stayer families in all four communities stayed an average of one to three months. The average costs per short-stayer family ranged from less than $1,000 to almost $9,000, depending on the average number of days spent in programs and the relative cost of the programs used.

Exhibit 5: Households that Use Only Emergency Shelter for Brief Periods
Population	Utilization description	% of Each Study Cohort^a	Average Homeless System Costs Per Household^b	% of Homeless Costs Represented by Path Group Within Each Site
Individuals	Emergency shelter only, for 1 or 2 brief stays totaling 1 to 3 weeks.	57% - 69%	$321 - $686	8% - 28%
Families	Emergency shelter only, for 1 or 2 brief stays totaling 10 days to 3 months.	33% – 66%	$784 - $8,890	9% - 30%

Note: All costs reported in 2006 dollars.

^a In this table, the universe of individuals excludes individuals in Houston who were only contacted by street outreach. And the universe of families in DC excludes families who participated only in the Community Care Grant program.

^b Ranges in this column represent distinct path groups within each site.

These short-stayers all had much lower costs than other groups of first-time homeless individuals and families. We suggest that the emergency shelter system may be an “adequate” response to an immediate housing crisis for most individuals and a place in which individuals who are not able to quickly resolve their housing crisis can be referred to more intensive interventions. It would be very difficult to fund a prevention response at such low cost, and it would be difficult to identify up front which of the individuals’ homelessness could be prevented with minimal assistance.

In contrast, we found that emergency shelter is an expensive solution to family homelessness, in comparison to transitional housing, permanent supportive housing, and traditional rental subsidies. As an alternative, we suggest that communities consider three approaches: 1) offering shelter diversion or rapid-rehousing interventions that optimize the use of resources to get families back into housing, rather than shelter; 2) examining the cost structure of current emergency shelter programs to determine if the environment and services offered can be scaled back and still meet the needs of those who are using them; and 3) referring more quickly those who need intensive assistance to transitional housing (facility-based or scattered site), permanent supportive housing, or other new interventions.

Households Who Remain in Homeless Programs for Extended Periods

Up to one-quarter of first-time homeless individuals and a larger portion of first-time homeless families used homeless programs for extended periods at substantial cost per household (Exhibit 6). Cumulatively, individuals with extended stays incurred 40 to 73 percent of homeless system costs associated with first-time homelessness for individuals. Families with extended use of homeless programs incurred 47 to 82 percent of costs associated with first-time family homelessness.

Therefore, the greatest opportunities for homeless system cost savings lie with the individuals and families who remain in homeless programs for extended periods. Most often, this long-term, high-cost use of the homeless system reflects extended use of transitional housing either alone or in combination with other programs, which is consistent with the fact that transitional housing is typically designed for long lengths of stay.

For individuals, extended use of homeless programs costs an average of $9,000 to $14,000 per person, with the exception of a group with average costs of $3,103 for use of a low-cost form of shared transitional housing in Des Moines. For families, heavy use of transitional housing costs an average of $15,500 to $38,800 per family, with the exception of costs for families in Kalamazoo, which were $6,574 on average.

Exhibit 6: Households that Use Homeless Programs for Extended Periods
Population	Utilization description	% of Each Study Cohort^a	Average Homeless System Costs Per Household^b	% of Homeless Costs Represented by Path Group Within Each Site
Individuals	Used emergency shelter, transitional housing, or permanent supportive housing exclusively or in combination for average of 4 to 12 months.	7% - 25%	$3,103 – $14,418	40% - 73%
Families	Used transitional housing exclusively or in combination with emergency shelter or permanent supportive housing for average of 8 to 18 months.	24% – 42%	$6,574 - $38,742	47% - 82%

Note: All costs reported in 2006 dollars.

^a The universe of individuals in this table excludes individuals in Houston who were only contacted by street outreach, and the universe of families in DC excludes families who participated only in the Community Care Grant program.

^b Ranges in this column represent distinct path groups within each site.

In all cases, the costs to house individuals and families in homeless programs for extended periods are significantly higher than rental subsidies based on Fair Market Rents for an equivalent period. Strategies for identifying cost-savings, include examining: 1) whether patterns of extended use or transitional housing or other program types are cost-effective and whether there are opportunities to reduce costs without diminishing client outcomes; 2) whether some households are using transitional housing as a form of subsidized permanent housing, in which case actual rent subsidies without extensive services would be a more cost-effective approach; 3) whether some households should be referred more aggressively to permanent supportive housing to address long-term needs at lower costs; and 4) whether the permanent supportive housing model of leveraging services from mainstream systems could be used to deliver transitional housing at lower cost to the homeless system.

Households Who Use Homeless Programs Multiple Times with Long Gaps Between Stays

Our analysis also identified a small group of first-time homeless individuals and families who return multiple times for homeless assistance but have long gaps between stays. Their patterns suggest that the assistance they receive from the homeless system the first and even second or third time is not sufficient to help them regain stable housing. These households sometimes only use emergency shelter and sometimes use a combination of program types. As shown in Exhibit 7, costs for individuals who repeatedly used homeless programs with long gaps between stays averaged approximately $1,000 for groups that only used emergency shelter to as high as $10,705 for a group of individuals in Houston who used a range of program types. Costs for families averaged from $3,295 in Kalamazoo for a group that used only emergency shelter for an average of 38 days across all stays to $17,314 for a group in DC that spent an average of 9 months in a range of program types.

Exhibit 7: Households that Use Homeless Programs Multiple Times with Long Gaps Between Stays

Population	Utilization description	% of Each Study Cohort ^a	Average Homeless System Costs Per Household ^b	% of Homeless Costs Represented by Path Group Within Each Site
Individuals	Used emergency shelter only or used a range of programs, returning to emergency shelter after using transitional or permanent supportive housing. Average gaps between all stays total 6 months to a year.	12% - 18%	$910 - $10,705	14% - 24%
Families	Repeated use of homeless programs with long gaps between stays totaling 4 to 17 months.	5% - 16%	$3,293 - $12,475	2% - 20%

Note: All costs reported in 2006 dollars.

^a The universe of individuals in this table excludes individuals in Houston who were only contacted by street outreach, and the universe of families in DC excludes families who participated only in the Community Care Grant program.

^b Ranges in this column represent distinct path groups within each site.

Although costs are proportionately not as large for these households as for those with extended use of homeless programs, the current system does not appear to be working well and therefore, resources currently used to serve these households may not be used effectively. In addition, our analysis of mainstream costs shows that these individuals and families had high levels of interaction with criminal justice systems. In Jacksonville, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina, rates of arrest or incarceration were above 60 percent for individuals and families with long gaps between homeless stays. The criminal justice involvement occurred across all time periods relative to homelessness - before the first homeless stay, between stays, and in the period following the last homeless stay. By comparing the number of days between homeless stays and the number of days spent in jail during those same times, we know these households are not exclusively staying in jail between homeless stays. We surmise that they spent time in many different types of places, including living on their own, living doubled up with others, staying on the streets, or in other residential facilities. The high rates of arrest and incarceration coupled with high levels of housing instability suggest that the individuals and families in this group would benefit from targeted assistance to secure and maintain housing and reduce criminal justice recidivism.

A significant percentage (53 to 92 percent) of families with long gaps also had changes in household composition from one program stay to the next. These high rates of household change are evidence of household instability and may also suggest high involvement in child welfare systems. This theory is supported by statistics from DC, the only site in which we obtained rates of child welfare involvement, that show that 55 percent of the group with long gaps had child welfare involvement at some point during the study period. The significant housing and family instability experienced by this group suggests that neither homeless nor mainstream systems are addressing sufficiently the needs of these families and that targeted interventions may be needed to achieve positive housing and family-related outcomes. Communities should explore whether funds currently used to serve these households over repeated stays, in addition to resources from the criminal justice and possibly the child welfare system, could be used to fund alternative interventions to meet the specific needs of these households.

Costs Associated with Mainstream System Use By First-time Homeless Individuals and Families

The question of whether mainstream system costs can be offset by appropriate housing interventions is left open by this study. Our analysis suggests that there are few opportunities for mainstream cost reductions when targeting groups based on their patterns of homelessness. However, consistent with past research, significant mainstream system cost reductions may be achievable when targeting individuals or families with high levels of involvement in mainstream systems prior to homelessness.

Most first-time homeless individuals do not have high involvement in mainstream systems. This means that there is only a small group of individuals with the possibility of cost offsets. For instance, only a quarter of individuals in Jacksonville received publicly funded mental healthcare, only 22 percent received substance abuse treatment, and only 20 percent had Medicaid physical healthcare claims at any point in the approximately three-year period for which we collected cost data. And less than 10 percent received healthcare in any of these domains during the period of homelessness. Exhibit 8 shows that the total per person costs of mainstream involvement in each domain during homelessness for first-time homeless individuals, totaling approximately $1,000 in Jacksonville and approximately $500 in Houston. However, when looking only at the costs per person for those who were involved in each mainstream domain, costs increase substantially per person as do opportunities for cost savings. The difference in average costs for mainstream users and the cohort average illustrates why narrowly targeted interventions to reduce or shift use by those who are involved with each system have the greatest potential to yield cost savings, whereas broadly targeted interventions are not likely to realize substantial savings.

Exhibit 8: Average Mainstream System Costs per Person Incurred “During” Homelessness

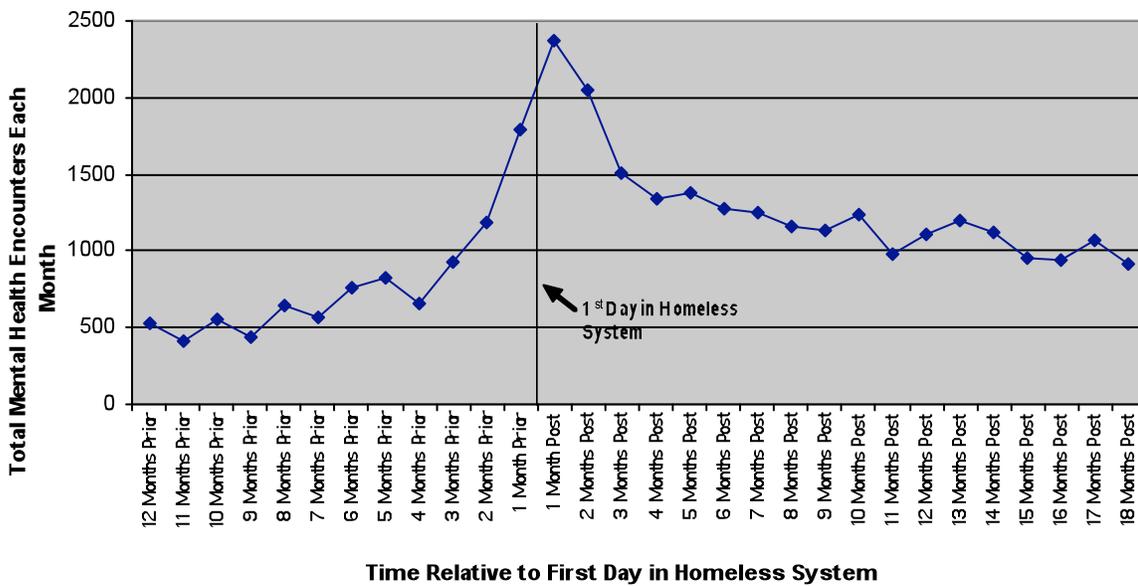

Jacksonville			Houston
% of Cohort involved in this Domain	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person Involved in this Domain	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person in Cohort	% of Cohort involved in this Domain	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person Involved in this Domain	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person in Cohort

Medicaid Primary Health	9%	$2,436	$219
Mental Health	8%	$1,318	$106	9%	$4,157	$391
Substance Abuse	7%	$2,265	$158
Criminal Justice	13%	$3,057	$397	2%	$6,520	$157
Income Supports	22%	$627	$138

We also found that criminal justice and mental health involvement in Jacksonville and Houston increased substantially immediately before first-time homelessness, peaking in the period just after the individual entered the residential homeless system.⁴ Nine percent of the individuals we studied in Houston received services from the mental health system at some time in the 12 months prior to homelessness or the 18 months following the first day the individual entered a homeless program. The total encounters are graphed in Exhibit 9, with the total number of encounters for all of those who received services during each month shown in the y axis and the month relative to the start of homelessness shown on the x-axis. The exhibit shows that the highest number of encounters occurred in the month following the day these individuals became homeless for the first time, followed by the second month after that day. These individuals also had a high number of encounters in the month immediately prior to homelessness. This finding suggests a need for discharge planning to ensure that individuals leave mainstream programs, such as inpatient treatment or jails, with adequate housing. It also suggests that mainstream systems may be able to help identify risk of homelessness for their clients and that targeted alternative interventions could avoid costly homeless system use. We also conclude that homeless systems should use emergency shelter to proactively identify individuals with severe mental illness who would benefit from permanent supportive housing before they experience long-term homelessness.

⁴ Other research analyzing rates of homelessness among ex-offenders found that individuals released from state prisons or jails have a greater risk of homelessness than individuals with similar characteristics who have not been recently incarcerated. In the communities studied, risk of homelessness among ex-offenders was higher for individuals with certain demographic characteristics. The same research also found that longer periods of incarceration were associated with greater risks of homelessness after release. (Graham, D., Locke, G., Bass Rubenstein, D. & Carlson, K., unpublished) This finding supports the conclusion above that discharge planning strategies targeting the ex-offenders most at risk of homelessness, based on gender, race, age, and length of incarceration, may be effective in preventing homelessness for this group.

Exhibit 9: Total Mental Health Encounters Each Month by First-time Homeless Individuals in Houston Shown Relative to First Day of Homelessness

In contrast, first-time homeless families in the communities for which we obtained mainstream data had very high enrollment in Medicaid (over 90 percent) and low to moderate use of other mainstream systems across the entire period for which we collected costs. Medicaid costs across the entire study period totaled $21,770 per family in Kalamazoo and $15,615 per family in Upstate South Carolina, as compared with mental health costs in Houston of $722 per family and criminal justice costs of $175 to $597 per family. Average monthly mainstream costs per family were highest during periods of homelessness, as shown in Exhibit 10.

Exhibit 10: Rate of Mainstream System Involvement and Costs Per Family Per Month

	Mental Health	Medicaid	Criminal Justice	Financial Assistance	Food Stamps
Kalamazoo
Rate of Involvement ^a		94%	42%	> 39% ^b
Pre-Homelessness		$657.58	$13.33	$5.18
During Homelessness		$929.59	$12.99	$22.05
Post-Homelessness		$471.90	$19.36	$21.55
South Carolina
Rate of Involvement ^a		> 90% ^b	34%		92%
Pre-Homelessness		$319.66	$4.65		$187.30
During Homelessness		$433.70	$4.70		$229.34
Post-Homelessness		$493.28	$4.86		$190.78
Houston
Rate of Involvement ^a	16%		8%
Pre-Homelessness	$13.01		$6.55
During Homelessness	$32.87		$1.57
Post-Homelessness	$20.67		$16.36

^a Percentage of the families studied who were involved in the mainstream domain at any point from 12-months prior to the first day of homelessness through December 31, 2006 (June 30, 2007).

^b De-duplicated data across types of involvement with this domain were not available.

As with individuals, we surmise that families interact with mainstream systems on an ongoing basis, but that use rises immediately preceding homelessness and peaks immediately following homelessness. Some of the increased Medicaid costs may reflect health crises related to homelessness or use of expensive acute care systems for routine medical needs during homelessness. Increased coordination between homeless and mainstream systems, and potentially some interventions targeted to specific high-users of mainstream services, could result in more appropriate use of mainstream services and potential cost savings.

Aside from the observations about criminal justice and potential child welfare involvement for households with long gaps between homeless stays, we did not find sufficient relationships between patterns of homelessness for families and mainstream costs to warrant recommendations related to targeting households based on their homeless system use in order to achieve mainstream cost savings. It is possible that more complete data would identify additional cost saving opportunities.

Conclusion

This study does not show which homelessness interventions are cost-effective or indicate whether mainstream systems are appropriately used during periods of homelessness. However, it does illuminate the diverse patterns and costs of homeless and mainstream system use that are essential to answer two critical policy questions. Are high-cost interventions an appropriate response to homelessness for specific subgroups? Are there more efficient and effective ways of meeting people's needs?

In brief, we conclude that communities should explore strategies to 1) prevent homelessness for the majority of families facing first-time homelessness, 2) avoid extensive use of high-cost homeless programs for individuals or families who primarily need permanent housing without supports or those whose service needs can be met by mainstream systems, 3) alter the way their homeless assistance systems respond to households that are unable to remain stably housed and face repeated instances of homelessness, 4) work with mainstream systems to design appropriate discharge planning strategies and ways to identify clients at-risk of homelessness so their homelessness can be prevented.

This research also raises a number of additional questions that should be the focus of new research. These questions center around understanding the cost-effectiveness of different types of homeless programs, identifying program features that drive costs and therefore present opportunities for reducing costs, and identifying client-level indicators associated with high costs that can be used to predict and avoid unnecessary or ineffective high cost system use.

1. Introduction

This study measures costs associated with first-time homeless families and individuals incurred by homeless and mainstream service delivery systems in six study communities. Unaccompanied homeless individuals were studied in Des Moines, Iowa; Houston, Texas, and Jacksonville, Florida. Homeless families were studied in Houston, Texas, Kalamazoo, Michigan; Upstate South Carolina; and Washington, DC.

Past research has primarily documented costs associated with homelessness for individuals with chronic patterns of homelessness or severe mental illness. Newer work has been published on the costs incurred within the homeless system for families experiencing first-time homelessness. The emerging body of research on homelessness piqued the interest of many. It also raised additional questions about the comparability of these findings to individuals and families with different characteristics or patterns of homelessness and about opportunities for savings through alternative responses to homelessness.

This study was designed to allow policy makers at the national and community levels to have a better understanding of:

- the comparative costs of different types of homeless programs;
- the wide-ranging experience of homelessness among individuals and families and the costs associated distinct patterns of homelessness;
- some of the mainstream costs that can be associated with homeless individuals or families during the periods before, during, and after their period of homelessness
- characteristics of first-time homeless individuals and families that are related to higher or lower homeless or mainstream system costs; and
- the implications of these findings for homeless policy and planning.

Homeless systems include programs within a community that are designed and dedicated to providing housing and services to people who are homeless. The homeless programs accounted for in this study are outreach programs, emergency shelters, transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing for homeless people with disabilities. Programs that only provide supportive services to homeless people are not included in this study.

Mainstream service systems are those that are not dedicated exclusively to serving people who are homeless, yet provide services that are needed and often used by them. Mainstream system cost data examined for this study include: Medicaid primary healthcare, mental healthcare and substance abuse treatment; other state-funded behavioral health care; law enforcement and criminal justice; and income supports.

In each site, we examined the system of homeless service provision, patterns of homelessness for a cohort of homeless families or individuals based on analysis of Homeless Management Information System (HMIS) data, and the costs associated with the use of homeless programs by the study cohort based on cost data collected directly from homeless programs. We also acquired and analyzed utilization data for mainstream systems in order to measure how mainstream systems interact with people who are homeless and to estimate the costs associated with the use of mainstream systems by homeless people. Finally, we analyzed homeless and mainstream costs together.

We follow a growing body of literature in identifying groups of people who experience similar patterns of homelessness and analyzing homeless and mainstream service utilization and costs based on these patterns. However, this study breaks new ground methodologically in homelessness research in the following areas:

- rigorously calculating the costs of providing a family or individual with a day of shelter in specific residential programs for homeless people;
- incorporating distinctions among program types and their housing models (e.g., facility-based transitional housing) into our analysis of both patterns and costs of first-time homelessness; and
- analyzing both individuals and families, as well as vastly different types of communities or geographic areas using the same research design, facilitating direct comparisons.

The study does not attempt to isolate which of the mainstream costs are attributable to homelessness, and it does not compare the benefits of different programs with the costs of their use. Thus, the study is not a cost-effectiveness study and is most accurately characterized as a study to measure the costs associated with homelessness, rather than the costs of homelessness.

The study does not attempt to measure the broader costs of homelessness to individuals who become homeless or to society as a whole. For example, we do not attempt to measure the costs of increased morbidity or mortality for individuals who become homeless, nor do we measure the costs to businesses and property owners that may result from concentrations of sheltered or unsheltered homeless individuals in cities or neighborhoods. And to the extent that the data we used are not comprehensive of all homeless program utilization or all relevant mainstream systems, the findings somewhat underrepresent the costs for some first-time individuals and families.

Yet even with its limitations, we anticipate that this information will prompt future research and policy discussions on whether resources are being used efficiently to provide services to people who are homeless and whether better outcomes might be achieved by triaging clients to specific paths or by examining current strategies and designing targeted interventions to serve specific subpopulations.

Chapter 2 of this report continues with an overview of the research questions and methodology used to conduct the study. Chapter 3 discusses the range of unit costs (that is, costs per day for each individual or family) associated with various types of residential homeless programs within each site. Chapter 4 analyzes costs associated with first-time homeless individuals across the three individual study sites, and Chapter 5 analyzes costs associated with first time homeless families across the four family study sites. Chapters 4 and 5 begin with a discussion of previous research and a discussion of the characteristics of the cohort at each site. The chapters continue with an analysis of the patterns and costs of homeless system utilization, followed by a discussion of mainstream system costs. Each of these chapters concludes with a discussion of policy implications and areas for future research. Chapter 6 provides summary conclusions that encompass both families and individuals.

Appendix A is a standalone case study for Jacksonville, which is the site where we obtained and analyzed data covering the most comprehensive set of mainstream programs. Appendix B contains data tables for the Jacksonville case study. Appendix C contains detailed data for the individual study sites. Appendix D contains detailed data for the family study sites. Appendix C and Appendix D both include summary data for each study site and the results of cross-site multivariate regression analyses.

Aside from Jacksonville, complete case studies for each site are not included in this document. However, stand-alone case studies for the six sites are available, along with comprehensive data tables, on www.huduser.org.

2. Methodological Framework for Analysis of Costs Associated with Homelessness

This chapter covers the methodological framework for the Costs of Homelessness study. It presents the research questions for the study, our approach to answering these questions, the key domains of costs that were measured in each community, and some of the methodological challenges that we encountered.¹

2.1. Research Questions

The primary research questions for the study are: What are the combined homeless and mainstream system costs for people who become homeless for the first-time? How do these costs vary across patterns of homeless system use?

We pursued the following six specific research questions to help us understand the primary research questions.

1. How do people who become homeless use homeless and mainstream systems?
2. Are there common patterns of homelessness system utilization (homeless paths) that can be used to group people who access homeless services?
3. Do people who use homeless system resources in similar ways share characteristics that can be used to describe each group?
4. What is the cost of the homeless and mainstream system service use associated with first-time homelessness and the periods immediately before and after it? How do these costs vary by path group?
5. What is the total cost associated with the period of homelessness for the study population?
6. How do mainstream system costs change when a person becomes homeless and in the period after homelessness?

Exhibit 2.1 shows the data that we generated to answer each question.

¹ This methodology applies to this report as well as to each of the six individual case studies.

Exhibit 2.1: Research Questions and Outputs for the Study

Research Questions	What this study reports.
How do people who become homeless use homeless and mainstream systems?	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Number, type, and sequence of homeless and mainstream service encounters and lengths of stay (or number of service units) during the study period. Use of systems is reported separately for types of programs that comprise the residential homeless services system, and for each mainstream system studied.
Are there common patterns of homelessness system utilization (homeless paths) that can be used to group people who access homeless services?	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Description of groups of homeless families or individuals following different paths is based on cluster analysis of the number of homeless program enrollments, the types of programs used, the sequence of program types, the durations of program stays, and the overall length of the period of homelessness. Percent of clients that fall into each path group. Similar path groups generated at the site level are grouped together for overall analysis.
Do people who use homeless system resources in similar ways share characteristics that can be used to define each group?	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Analysis of demographic characteristics and special needs (defined by service use) of persons in each path.
What is the cost of the homeless and mainstream system service use associated with first-time homelessness and the periods immediately before and after it? How do these costs vary by path group?	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Costs incurred by the homeless system for outreach, emergency shelters, transitional programs, and permanent supportive housing Costs incurred by selected mainstream service systems reported separately for time periods before, during, and after homelessness. Analysis of each of these costs for different path groups.
What is the total cost associated with the period of homelessness for the study population?	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Total estimated homeless and mainstream system costs for the study population. Analysis of costs by demographic characteristics and path groups.
How do mainstream system costs change in relation to homelessness?	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Comparison of mainstream system costs for the periods before, during and after homelessness.

2.2. Research Domains

At the start of the study, we convened an expert panel of homelessness researchers and economists to advise us on the design of the study. In preparation for the panel meeting, we conducted a literature review on previous attempts to analyze costs associated with homelessness and methods that have been used to measure costs of homeless and mainstream service systems. We also explored methods to measure indirect costs of homelessness, such as costs associated with premature morbidity and mortality and indirect costs to businesses that are located near spots inhabited by persons living “on the streets.” After discussing extensively the priorities among cost domains, available methods for analyzing different domains, and the feasibility of implementing the methods, we decided to focus this study on the direct costs associated with the homeless system and the following mainstream systems: mental health, substance abuse, and primary health care treatment; criminal justice; child welfare; and Food Stamps and Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF).

2.3. Study Sites, Period, and Population

2.3.1 Site Selection

We based our data collection strategy on administrative records whenever possible. For the homeless services system, this meant using local homeless management information system (HMIS) data to understand the utilization of homeless assistance programs. However, these administrative data sources did not include information on the costs incurred by these programs, so we collected cost data directly from a sample of homeless programs to develop unit costs for various types of homeless programs. For mainstream systems, we used local or state administrative data systems to analyze service utilization and to measure actual tracked costs. When actual tracked costs were not available, we consulted with local officials to derive an average unit cost for each service type within each system. These research design decisions influenced our site selection, as we had to select sites where these sources of data were available.

The criteria used to select sites were: HMIS data coverage of at least 75 percent of homeless system beds serving homeless families or 75 percent of beds serving individuals; high quality HMIS data for client identifiers, basic demographic characteristics, and program utilization or services received; a strong likelihood we could obtain mainstream client data, based on local relationships between the homeless services system and mainstream systems or on the existence of a data repository; and the site's willingness to participate in the study. In addition to these criteria, efforts were also made to select an equal number of sites where we would study families and sites where we would study individuals and to achieve a mix of different community types and geographic locations. Site selection was based on analysis of HUD's Housing Inventory Charts for homeless programs, data on HMIS participation rates and data quality, and telephone interviews with CoC staff and homeless providers in potential study sites.

Through this process, we selected six communities to participate in this study: Des Moines, Iowa; Houston, Texas; Jacksonville, Florida; Kalamazoo, Michigan; Upstate South Carolina; and Washington, DC. We also attempted to include Sacramento, California in the study, but were unable to secure access to the required client-level HMIS data due to local interpretation of California State privacy laws. Based on the availability and quality of HMIS data, we chose to study either homeless individuals or homeless families in each community. In Houston we studied both individuals and families, because the HMIS data met our criteria for both populations. The study population for each site is shown in Exhibit 2.2.

Exhibit 2.2: Case Study Sites and Study Population

#	Case Study Site	Case Study Population
1	Des Moines, Iowa	Single Individuals
2	Jacksonville, Florida	Single Individuals
3	Houston, Texas	Single Individuals Families
4	Kalamazoo, Michigan	Families
5	Upstate South Carolina	Families
6	Washington, D.C.	Families

We first analyzed each site independently and drafted six distinct case studies. We then analyzed overarching patterns as well as distinctions that emerged across each of the six sites. This report provides the overall findings across all six sites. In addition, each of the six distinct case studies produced as a result of this research is available as a stand-alone report.²

2.3.2 Study Period and Study Population

This study examined the costs associated with a cohort of individuals or families (depending on the case study) who became homeless for the first time between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005.³ For purposes of this study, an individual or family was considered homeless if the household stayed in a residential homeless program or was served by a street outreach program. The length of time the household was homeless was also defined based on use of these programs, as documented in local HMIS databases. Individuals and families were considered to be homeless for the first-time if they did not appear in the community's HMIS at any point prior to the study enrollment period.

Periods in which members of the study cohort were precariously housed, doubled up, or staying in a program that did not report to the HMIS are not included in the homeless system costs estimated by this study. However, if the studied family or individual had more than one stay in a residential homeless program during the study period, then the time between stays is also considered “during homelessness” when we analyze patterns of homelessness or analyze time-adjusted costs to the homeless services system. The period of homelessness is considered to begin on the first day of a program entry and to end on the date of the last program exit.

As will be discussed in more detail in Section 2.4, we followed each individual or family's homeless service utilization for eighteen months from the household's point of entry into the homeless system. In Washington, D.C, we followed families for thirty months. To the extent that data were available, we measured the individual or family's mainstream service utilization for twelve months prior to and for at least eighteen months after the household's point of entry into the homeless system.

To identify the study population, a single individual was defined as a homeless adult who was served within our study timeframe and was unaccompanied by any other persons at any point during the study period. A homeless family was defined as at least one adult and at least one child (under 18 years at first program entry) who used residential services together at some point during our study period. If a member of a family also used homeless programs as a single individual, we included those stays as part of the family's homeless utilization patterns and costs.

Because of federal law related to HMIS data, the study was not able to analyze services provided to people who are homeless by providers of services for victims of domestic violence. Since the study aimed to capture the complete costs associated with individuals or families who become homeless, households that included a person who was served by a victim services provider at any point preceding or during the study period, as determined by HMIS records, were excluded from the study population. In addition, unaccompanied youth under age 18 were excluded from the study.

² A “Bibliography of Cost of Homelessness Case Studies” appears at the end of this report.

³ Kalamazoo is the only site for which we used a different study enrollment period. We identified people for the Kalamazoo study cohort based on first entry into the homeless system between January 1, 2005 and December 31, 2005, because homeless system utilization data for 2004 were incomplete.

2.4. Data Sources

The study relies primarily on three types of data:

1. HMIS data maintained by the local Continuum of Care (CoC);
2. Homeless program cost data collected directly by the study team; and
3. Mainstream system administrative data maintained by a data warehouse or by local or state agency administrators.

Each data source and the process for obtaining the data are described in the subsections that follow.

2.4.1 Homeless Management Information Systems Data

HMIS data are longitudinal, client-level data that record demographic details and program utilization for all persons served by agencies participating in the HMIS at each study site. We used HMIS data to identify the study population, to identify each individual or family household's period of homelessness, and to follow each household's homeless system utilization for eighteen months from the date the household's homelessness first began.⁴

HMIS data are maintained by a local HMIS Lead Agency, which acts on behalf of the CoC to manage community data on homelessness. In 2004, HUD published HMIS Data and Technical Standards that outline data collection, privacy and security requirements for HMIS (Housing and Urban Development [HUD], 2004). As a result of the 2004 Standards, HMIS databases across the country store client-level data uniformly, so that we knew the types of data on homeless clients that we would be able to obtain and were able to use a common data analysis strategy across all of our study sites. We purposely selected communities with high levels of residential homeless provider participation in HMIS to ensure that we could get a comprehensive picture of who became homeless within each study site during the study's enrollment period and could understand the types of programs people used and their patterns of use.⁵

As part of site selection, we examined the level of HMIS participation (which is an indicator of how well HMIS data represent the homeless service system) for each community, indicators of data quality, and whether the community had authorized the use and disclosure of client data for research purposes in its privacy policies. We chose only sites with high residential program coverage rates, good quality data, and authority to release their data for research purposes. Thus, we were confident that we could obtain access to the client-level HMIS data for each of our selected study sites. Once sites were selected, we began negotiating with the HMIS Lead Agency to obtain access to the data. We developed data use agreements that were executed between Abt Associates Inc., and each HMIS Lead Agency and that specified the terms of our access, protection, use, and further disclosure of the data. The process and timeline for negotiating access to HMIS data varied by site, depending primarily on the extent to which the process of granting access to data for research purposes already had been defined by local policies and procedures. In most cases, time delays were associated with administrative reviews or approval processes rather than with substantive local concerns. We were able to secure direct access to HMIS data for all six study sites.

⁴ The period was thirty months in Washington, D.C.

⁵ We also attempted to include sites with strong participation from homeless programs that provide supportive services only. As we analyzed the HMIS data, we determined that most such programs did not enter service utilization data sufficient to support a cost analysis; therefore, we did not include costs associated with use of supportive service programs.

2.4.2 Homeless Program Cost Data

This study includes homeless system costs associated with the use of residential homeless programs for all programs that report client utilization data to the HMIS. While HMIS provides information on client use of homeless programs, HMIS does not record costs associated with each program. Within the industry of providers of homeless services, there are no standardized unit costs based on funding reimbursements or other estimates. Therefore, we collected program costs directly from a sample of programs within each community and used these data to derive estimates of daily costs of residential programs (and in some cases costs per outreach encounter) for each program type at each site. The daily costs represent all aspects of each residential program's costs: operating, leasing, services provided as part of the residential program, administration, and, in some cases, the capital costs of the program's facility. This process is described in detail in Section 2.5.2. Chapter 3 contains a detailed discussion of our findings related to homeless program costs

2.4.3 Mainstream System Administrative Data

The third primary data source used for this study was administrative data from mainstream service systems. Mainstream systems are those that do not exclusively target people who are homeless. The primary mainstream systems that we attempted to include in the study were:

- primary health care;
- mental health care;
- substance abuse treatment;
- law enforcement and criminal justice;
- child welfare (including financial support, foster care, and protective services); and
- Food Stamps and TANF entitlements.

We were able to obtain mainstream cost data from at least one site for each of these systems, except child welfare. However, in Washington, D.C., we obtained and used data on whether each family in the study cohort had at least one encounter with the child welfare system over a five-year period.

We used the mainstream administrative data to track mainstream utilization and estimate the costs associated with that utilization for the twelve months prior to each household's homelessness, for each household's period of homelessness, and for the period following homelessness through December 31, 2006 (or June 30, 2007 for Kalamazoo).

In contrast to homeless services, mainstream system administrative data can be used to estimate both utilization and costs. Mainstream services, such as those funded by Medicaid or state health resources, are frequently funded based on standard state reimbursement rates. Mainstream income support systems such as Food Stamps or TANF provide assistance that is quantified at the household level. Other systems, such as local jails, track actual utilization, and their administrators have estimated nightly costs or arrest costs for budgetary or reimbursement purposes, so that the estimated costs of these mainstream systems can be estimated. We also determined through discussions with the expert panel that obtaining data on mainstream utilization from client case files or self-reports would not be as accurate or comprehensive as administrative data and that using administrative data would be much less expensive than primary data collection.

We found that the largest challenge inherent in using mainstream administrative data systems was negotiating access to them. First, we had to identify all of the appropriate local or state administering agencies that maintained data on primary healthcare, mental healthcare, substance abuse treatment, police and/or sheriff arrests, police and/or sheriff jail incarcerations, Food Stamps benefits, TANF benefits, and other relevant mainstream assistance provided to the individuals or families studied at each site.

Once we identified the agencies and began discussions with appropriate staff, we had to convince the agencies to provide data for the study. We offered numerous analytical methods to ease the burden of participation, ranging from the agency sending us their complete identifiable client-level dataset for the study period to the agency conducting all of the analysis and sending only aggregate, tabulated data in table shells defined by the study team. While a formal commitment to participate in the study was an important benchmark, we experienced many delays after that point—for example, in securing formal legal approval to exchange client-level data. Therefore, agreement to obtain the necessary data was not considered complete until we had a signed, data use agreement in hand. Once we had such an agreement, we worked with the information technology staff at the mainstream agency to link records and analyze the utilization data according to our study specifications. This phase of the process was the least complicated, but still yielded many opportunities for project delays.

These steps had to occur for each separate mainstream administering agency within each community. We tried to achieve economies of scale by approaching state agencies that consolidated data across multiple service providers within a community, but in many cases we were not able to penetrate the appropriate bureaucracy at the state level. To support this process, we prepared a Mainstream Data Analysis Guide that we shared with mainstream administrators in advance to explain the process, options, and final table shells. At all sites, the success of accessing mainstream data depended on the motivation of our CoC and mainstream agency contacts. In communities where the mainstream contact was motivated and invested in the study, we had much greater responsiveness.

For each mainstream domain, Exhibit 2.3 lists the case study sites in which we were able to successfully access and incorporate cost data.

Exhibit 2.3: Mainstream Domains included in the Study

Mainstream Domains	Jacksonville	South Carolina	Kalamazoo	Houston (Individuals and Families)	Washington DC	Des Moines
Primary health care	✓	✓	✓		**
Mental health care	✓	*	*	✓	**
Substance abuse treatment	✓	*	*		**
Law enforcement and criminal justice	✓	✓	✓	✓
Child welfare					**
Food Stamps and TANF	✓	✓ (FS)
Other mainstream data			✓		**

* Included if funded by Medicaid.

 Data on whether there was any system utilization, but not types of services, extent of utilization, or costs.

2.5. Data Analysis Approach for Case Studies

The data analysis repeated for each distinct case study had five major components:

1. analyzing HMIS data to identify the study population and measure the use of homeless services;
2. developing homeless program typologies, calculating homeless unit costs for each program type, and deriving homeless system costs for each person;
3. identifying common groups of homeless system users, i.e. those with common “paths”;
4. extracting mainstream service data to measure mainstream costs associated with the study population; and
5. analyzing homeless and mainstream costs by path groups and other variables.

Each of these components is described below. Each section provides a discussion of the data sources, filtering and analysis that occurred, and the output that was used as a basis for the case study findings.

Analyzing HMIS Data to Identify the Study Population and Measure Homeless Service Use (HMIS Analysis)

Measurement of homeless service utilization was based on analysis of HMIS data to determine each homeless individual or family’s length of stay within each program. In some cases, we were able to obtain data on program utilization maintained outside of the HMIS by specific agencies and to merge it with the HMIS data. We also attempted to measure costs associated with supportive services that were provided outside a residential program. However, these unit costs were difficult to quantify, and we determined that most service programs reported only partial information on service utilization to the HMIS. Therefore, the estimates of total homeless program costs do not reflect stand-alone homeless supportive service program utilization unless otherwise noted.

The three steps in the process of analyzing HMIS data to identify the study population and measure homeless service use were:

1. de-duplicate client records and create a Master Household ID;
2. identify the study population; and
3. calculate the length of each program stay.

Each step is detailed below.

Step One: De-duplicate client records and create master household ID

First, we compiled personal identifiers and basic demographic characteristics, such as HMIS Client ID, first, middle, and last names, social security number, date of birth, gender, ethnicity, race, and household IDs. We used The-Link-King software⁶ to de-duplicate client records within the HMIS and merged client records if the same individual was associated with multiple HMIS Client IDs. We did not rely on the de-duplication procedures of the HMIS itself.

Most HMIS databases allow persons to be associated with multiple household IDs. This reflects the reality that people sometimes enter a program for homeless people alone and sometimes enter a program with various combinations of other adults and children. This phenomenon made it very challenging to count the number of distinct households served within the study sites during the study period and to follow particular households over time. We defined our study population according to household composition: for example, a single adult must never be accompanied by other persons; a person in a family is sometimes if not always accompanied by at least one other person and must at some point be accompanied by a child. Therefore, we had to be able to determine each household's composition throughout the study period and, once categorized as a single member household or a family household, to measure its total utilization of homeless services and patterns of use over time. For family households that changed composition during the period of homelessness, this meant that we had to identify utilization of homeless programs (and associated costs) by each member of the household at any time during the study period.

To accomplish this goal, we created master household IDs—one Master Household ID for each household—that are shared by all persons who were ever in the same household or had a household member in common in any program within our study period.⁷ For example, if a mother and two children entered a program together, in the HMIS they may have been referred to as HMIS Household ID 1. For purposes of this study, we assigned them Master Household 1. If they later went to another program and were joined by a third child, they may have been assigned HMIS Household ID 2. By contrast, for this study, all four persons (the mother and all three children) were then considered part of Master Household 1. If two of the children left and joined their father in a different program, the children and their father were then also considered part of Master Household 1. The master household approach may in some sense undercount the number of households or merge costs of households that purposely separated. However, other options would have over-counted households and suggested lower costs per household. Also, our approach allowed us to track change in household composition over time, which turned out to be an important variable in the study.

⁶ The Link King tool is designed for de-duplication and matching of client data for research purposes using both probabilistic and deterministic record linkage algorithms.

⁷ For single individuals, the Master Household ID is the same as the Client ID.

Step Two: Identify the study population

The selection criteria for the study population required the member of the study cohort (individual or family) to be served by a residential homeless program for the first time during the study “enrollment” period. After examining household associations to group persons by Master Household IDs and select only individuals or groups of people that met our definition of family, we analyzed program entry dates to determine whether the individual or any family member had been in the homeless services system before the enrollment period. Households were excluded if any member of the household was ever homeless prior to the enrollment period.

For family sites, once a Master Household was determined to be part of the study cohort, then all members of the family who were housed in a residential homeless program at any time during the complete study period, including after the one year-enrollment period, were included as part of the family cohort for analyzing use of homeless programs and measuring costs.

Step Three: Calculate Length of each Program Stay

A key building block of homeless system costs is homeless program utilization, which can be described in terms of the number of days stayed in a residential program.

We calculated the length of each program stay, chronologically sequenced and tallied program stays for each household, cleaned the program stay data to merge concurrent stays and truncate overlapping stays, and assigned Program Stay IDs. We defined all program stays associated with a master household and the gaps in time between these stays as that household’s homeless “path.” The first program entry date for each household’s first program stay was designated as that household’s “Household Start Date,” and the program exit date of the household’s last program stay was designated as that household’s “Household Exit Date.” For program stays that did not have valid exit dates, we assumed that the household exited a residential program on the day it started another residential program. In cases where there was no exit date for the final stay, we imputed exit dates using a “hot deck” imputation approach based on the length of stay for other client records within the same program type. Finally, if a household was still enrolled in a program as of the end of the eighteen-month follow-up period, the length of stay was truncated to the maximum client end date based on 548 days (18 months)⁸ from the household start date. These lengths of stay were used to calculate homeless program costs for each household and to group individuals or families into similar patterns of homeless system use.

Developing Homeless Program Typologies and Deriving Homeless Unit Costs for Each Program Type

To determine the unit cost for each program used by a member of the study cohort (usually a cost per day), we inventoried all homeless programs within the system at each site (HUD-funded and not HUD-funded), interviewed CoC and program staff to learn more about each program, and developed homeless program typologies for each site. The typology’s primary purpose was to identify like programs for which unit costs derived from a sample of the group would reasonably represent the costs of the full group. Thus, the typology was based on key cost drivers, including: whether a residential program was operated in a facility or scattered-site environment, the extent of privacy afforded, the level of supervision, and the nature and intensity of services provided as part of the program. In addition to these cost drivers, we also considered the role of the program within the homeless assistance system and time limits for participants. The resulting typologies were tailored to each site. This means that some program types appear in more than one case study, and some appear in only one.

⁸ The period was thirty months (913 days) in Washington, D.C.

To derive homeless unit costs by program type within each site, we:

1. selected a sample of programs within each type from which to collect unit costs directly;
2. used on-site interviews, review of financial documentation, and extensive follow-up to document total costs for each program, calculated separately for housing operations (including rent, where applicable), supportive services provided as part of the program, administration, and the capital costs associated with facilities owned by the program or donated to the program rather than rented;
3. calculated unit costs (household nightly costs for family programs and bed night costs for single programs) for each program, with and without capital costs included;
4. calculated average unit costs for each program type, weighted by the number of occupied units or beds, and assigned a cost code to each program designating whether its unit costs should be represented by its own actual costs, the costs of another program within the same type that was substantially similar, or the weighted average unit costs of the program type.

Cost Data Collection Strategy

During visits to each of the study sites, we attempted to collect all costs for each sampled homeless program and, sometimes, all homeless programs of a particular type. Costs were collected using a standard data collection instrument that guided probes for information in various cost categories to ensure that all aspects of program operations, services provided as part of the residential program, and program administration were included. We collected information on sources of funding and made sure that the sources and costs balanced, as a check on the total costs. As described in more detail in the section that follows, we also spent extensive effort collecting costs on capital expenditures for program facilities that were paid for or donated to the agency and, therefore, do not appear in the program's operating budget. All homeless costs are based on 2006 program budgets or actual expenses; therefore all homeless program costs are expressed in 2006 dollars.

We collected comprehensive data on costs of programs providing supportive services only while we were on site. We intended to divide the total program figures by appropriate units to derive average unit costs that could be multiplied by each person's actual program utilization. This effort was confounded by two issues—our ability to accurately define units that represented the various types of services offered by each program, and our ability to accurately track individual client-level utilization of service units.

- We found that programs that offered a uniform type of service, such as outreach services, could generally be valued in terms of a contact or hour of client-staff interaction. But multi-service programs, such as drop-in centers, might provide a $2 bus token, utility assistance, case management, healthcare, medication, employment support, or a shower.

Therefore, it was virtually impossible to estimate the value of administering each service type without conducting a thorough time-study of the program.

- Even when we could define units of service and measure their costs, we found that most programs providing only social services did not accurately record service utilization in the community HMIS.

Ultimately, we included only the costs of outreach contacts and only for two case studies, Jacksonville and Houston. Thus, the homeless system costs reported in the case studies should be interpreted as residential homeless program costs. Fortunately, the work we did to inventory programs and collect their costs at each site suggests that there are very few non-residential service programs targeted to homeless people at our study sites and that many of the programs provide modest levels of service. In each case study, we provide information about the extent of missing costs to the homeless services system that may result from not including stand-alone homeless supportive services programs.

Capital Costs

We consider it important to include capital costs for the buildings in which the homeless programs operate as part of the total cost of providing residential services to homeless individuals and families. When facilities are leased in the private market, we can assume that the costs associated with prior or future capital investments are included as part of the lease rate. If the agencies own or are donated the use of the facility, operating costs do not include rent and, therefore, we would capture only part of the facility cost if we did not find another sources of capital cost information.

We collected two types of information on capital costs:

- Costs incurred to construct and rehabilitate buildings, based on administrative records and interviews. We found it very difficult to find complete information, as many of the facilities did not have the records associated with a mortgage loan (e.g., a pro forma). Some were built several decades ago, some were government property, and some were gifts from individuals. In addition to the difficulty of determining original development costs, we found that records of property rehabilitation not reflected in annual operating budgets were difficult for many providers to assemble.
- 2006 property values from tax assessment data. We decided that this was a more consistent and comprehensive way of determining capital costs than historical data on capital expenditures. However, not all communities systematically record the values of tax-exempt properties. We converted all costs to 2006 dollars using the Consumer Price Index less Shelter for the MSA or appropriate region and amortized the total investment over a 30-year period with a three percent inflation rate.

We prorated the resulting capital values to calculate a daily per unit capital cost. However, we found some property values and resulting estimates of daily costs that were not easily explained by the property's size, location, and other characteristics. The scope of the study did not accommodate further econometric analysis to explain and validate the reasonableness of the capital cost component of estimates of daily unit costs.

In this report, we have included capital costs in the daily unit costs for the three sites for which we are most confident about the validity of the cost estimates, either because many of the programs pay market rents for the facilities they use or because of the quality of the tax assessment data. For Jacksonville, Upstate South Carolina, and Des Moines, our cost analysis incorporates estimates of all capital costs in the costs reported for the homeless services system.

Homeless System Costs for Each Household in the Study

Homeless system costs were calculated for each household in the study sample based on the following formula, where LOS represents that household’s length of stay in the specified program:

$$\begin{array}{l}
 \text{Homeless System Costs for} \\ \text{each Household} =
 \end{array}
 \begin{array}{r}
 \text{Program Stay 1 LOS} \times \text{Program 1 Unit Cost} \\
 + \\
 \text{Program Stay 2 LOS} \times \text{Program 2 Unit Cost} \\
 + \\
 \text{Program Stay n LOS} \times \text{Program n Unit Cost}
 \end{array}$$

We calculated utilization statistics and total, mean, and percentile values of homeless system costs for the study cohort and for selected subgroups within the cohort. Thus, these costs reflect the actual costs associated with participation of the study cohort in residential homeless programs. The costs are represented in the case studies as homeless system costs “during homelessness,” although it is important to note that the costs may be spread across an extended period in which there are days or months during which the individual or family was not being served by residential homeless programs, which we refer to as “gaps.” Some of these gaps may result from incomplete HMIS data, but, since we deliberately targeted communities with high rates of HMIS participation, they most probably represent the intermittent use of homeless residential services by many individuals and families. More extensive discussion on the time periods used to present the findings is provided in Section 2.5.4.

Identifying Common Groups of Homeless System Users (Path Groups) and Calculating their Costs and Characteristics

Analysis of “path” groups, or groups of users who share similar patterns of homelessness, is an area in which this study breaks new ground. For each of the case studies, we analyzed the pattern of program stays for individual households and used cluster analysis to group households with similar patterns of homeless system utilization. We refer to this process as the path group analysis.

We based the path group analysis on four types of information about the person’s homeless system use:

- types and sequence of homeless programs used (sequence categories);
- number of program stays;
- duration of Program Stays (cumulative days across all stays); and
- gaps between programs stays (cumulative days across all gaps).

To develop the sequence categories we created a sequence analysis file, which reports the program type sequences used by each client and aggregates like sequences. Three or four members of the study team independently grouped the sequences into similar “sequence categories” and then worked together to develop consensus sequence categories. The sequence categories became one variable used in the multivariate cluster analysis. We then applied multivariate cluster analysis to derive the path groups based on the four variables listed above.⁹ We did not determine in advance the number of path groups desired. For each site, we reviewed various analytical outputs, and chose the model that resulted in the most coherent clusters with sufficiently sized path groups. Thus, the number of clusters varied across sites. Finally, we assigned a Path Group ID to each of the client records in our research database to make possible the analysis of costs and demographics by path group.

Extracting Mainstream Service Utilization Data for the Study Population

We used the mainstream data to estimate the mainstream system costs associated with our study population that were incurred anytime from 12 months prior to each household's homelessness (Household Start Date) through December 31, 2006. In Kalamazoo, the study period began and ended six months later, so mainstream data collection ended on June 30, 2007. We analyzed mainstream costs for three time periods:

- Prior to Homelessness: 12 months prior to Household Start Date through Household End Date
- During Homelessness: Household Start Date through Household End Date
- Following Homelessness: Household End Date through December 31, 2006 (June 30, 2007, in Kalamazoo).

For example, if someone experienced homelessness from July 15, 2004 through November 30, 2004, the time periods for the mainstream service utilization were:

- Prior to homelessness: July 15, 2003 – July 14, 2004
- During homelessness: July 15, 2004 – November 30, 2004
- Following homelessness: December 1, 2004 – December 31, 2006
- Full period: July 15, 2003 – December 31, 2006

Costs following homelessness represent mainstream costs incurred after the household's last exit from the homeless system during the 18-month period in which we tracked homelessness and any costs incurred after the 18-month period. Mainstream costs were calculated for each timeframe for each individual and summed into master household totals.¹⁰

The steps used to match HMIS data with mainstream service data and calculate mainstream costs were:

1. Finder File. We produced a finder file for each study site that we provided to each agency to use to identify people in our study who used the mainstream system.
2. Agency Services Information. We worked with the mainstream system administrator or mainstream agency contacts to document general agency information, types of agency services provided, and the unit or costs of client services and allocated client benefits.

⁹ The study team used a cluster analysis algorithm that can handle both continuous and categorical variables (Chiu, Fang, Chen, Wang & Jeris, 2001; Zhang, Ramakrishnon & Livny, 1996).

¹⁰ In Washington, D.C. we only received information on whether households received any services in specified domains at any time. The time period for these results was from July 2003 through July 2008.

3. Matching Client Records. Either Abt or the mainstream system administrator matched client records in the mainstream database(s) to clients in the finder file. Once shared records were identified, mainstream records associated with these individuals were extracted for the full study period.
4. Client Service Utilization. Depending on whether client-level data could be released to Abt, either Abt or the mainstream system administrator analyzed mainstream service utilization data and generated standard mainstream table shells for pre-, during, and post-homelessness and the full study period by path group and by specified demographics and household variables. These were used as the basis for the case study reports.

Analyzing Homeless and Mainstream Costs

To calculate total costs associated with homelessness in each site, we started by summing homeless and mainstream costs for each individual or family for each period and then aggregated the costs across time periods and households to convey the costs associated with a particular group of homeless individuals or families in the study cohort.

Costs associated with Homelessness =

*Total Costs incurred by the Homeless System
+
Total Costs incurred by Mainstream Systems*

Most of the analysis reported in the case studies shows household medians and averages and total costs for specific domains during the periods before, during, and following homelessness. However, members of the study cohorts spent varying amounts of time homeless and, therefore, had shorter or longer periods following homelessness, as well as varying amounts of time homeless, and this can make the cost estimates misleading. For example, if Medicaid costs are lower for the study population during homelessness than after homelessness, one might assume that people become disconnected with mainstream medical care during homelessness. However, if the period of homelessness averages three months and the period after homelessness averages fifteen months, the difference in costs may just reflect that the households had longer time period in which to incur costs following homelessness. We addressed this issue by calculating time-adjusted average monthly household costs for each period and group to allow for meaningful comparison of costs associated with different time periods and across groups that may have varying lengths of homelessness.

Multivariate Analysis of Determinants of Costs

To examine how demographic characteristics and patterns of homelessness are related to costs, the study team used a multivariate analysis technique called multiple regressions. Multivariate analysis is useful because it allows us to identify the independent impact or effect of each variable of interest on costs, while holding all other variables constant. This analysis helps us to answer questions, such as:

- Which demographic factors are associated with higher costs, after controlling for the duration of homelessness and path groups?
- Everything else being equal, what is the relationship between the duration of homelessness and total costs incurred? What is the relationship between the duration of homelessness and total mainstream costs?

- Which path group tends to incur the highest costs, holding the demographic variables constant? Which path group tends to incur the lowest costs?
- Is there a correlation between mainstream system costs and homeless costs?

To conduct the multivariate analysis, we developed regression models to explain homeless system costs. The explanatory variables used in the models included:

- homeless path group or path group constituent variables (length of stay, number of stays, and length of gaps);
- gender (individuals sites only);
- race (individuals sites only);
- age (individuals sites only);
- number of adults (family sites only);
- number of children (family sites only); and
- changes in household composition (family sites only).

A central research question for this study is the relationship between homeless paths (e.g. groups of people who use the system in similar ways) and costs. Thus, homeless path group was used as an explanatory variable. However, we were also interested in gaining a more nuanced understanding of the impact of cumulative length of homeless stays, number of homeless stays, length of gaps between stays, and types of programs used. These two analyses could not be done in the same model, since the path group variable was derived from the variables on homeless patterns. Thus we ran two families of models related to homeless costs, one set using the path group variable itself, and another using the three independent variables related to patterns of homelessness.¹¹ Within each family of models, we layered different combinations of the independent variables to understand their relative influence.

For Houston and Jacksonville, the sites in which we had access to client-level mainstream data, regression models were also developed to explain the variations in total homeless system and mainstream costs per household. Separate models were estimated for the following categories of costs:¹²

- total costs (total homeless costs + total mainstream costs);
- total homeless costs;
- total mainstream costs;
- specific mainstream costs

¹¹ A fourth variable used in the cluster analysis, program sequences, was not included.

¹² The study team used the logarithm (log) scale of the costs as the dependent variable. The log specification is commonly used in the cost modeling literature. It has a number of appealing characteristics. First, the estimated model coefficients can be interpreted as percentage changes in the dependent variable for a 1-unit change in the explanatory variable. Second, it implies non-linearity and joint determination of the cost level by all the explanatory variables in the model. Third, the specification mitigates a common form of heteroskedasticity in the model's error term (Wooldridge, 2001). One exception is that, for regression models developed for the mainstream domain costs in Jacksonville, we used the cost amounts in their original metric.

To measure the relationship between these categories of costs and homelessness, three families of models were developed to separately test independent variables for 1) homeless path group, 2) the four variables related to patterns of homelessness, and 3) homeless system costs as an independent variable and excluding path group variable and the four variables related to patterns of homelessness. The models also included versions with and without covariates for involvement in mainstream domains. For instance, the model for criminal justice measured whether people who had received mental health treatment (as well as the other mainstream systems) were associated with higher criminal justice costs, when controlling for the other independent variables.

2.6. Cross-Site Analysis

The cross-site findings presented in this report are the result of two analytical approaches. First, we synthesized the findings from the separate case studies and identified common themes as well as salient differences that emerged among the various sites. Second, we integrated data across sites into a combined cross-site cohort dataset and analyzed the records using multivariate regression analysis, adding a dummy site variable to model the influence of site differences. In some cases, we also had to standardize the variables that diverged across sites prior to creating the cross-site dataset. The latter analytical approach was only possible for analysis of the homeless system patterns and costs, which were gathered consistently across all sites. It was not possible to conduct a similar analysis of mainstream costs, since we were unable to collect client-level mainstream costs in most sites and since the mainstream domains obtained differed from one site to another.

The steps for the cross-site multivariate analysis are described in more detail below.

Standardization of Variables

While an important part of the case studies was to generate both program and path typologies that were tailored to the site and household type, for the cross-site analysis, we re-categorized these typologies using the generic groupings of emergency shelter, transitional housing, permanent supportive housing, and non-residential program types. For example, in Houston, we originally categorized individual emergency shelters as either short-term shelter or extended stay shelters. In Jacksonville, the distinction between overnight shelters and 24-hour shelters was a more important typological distinction. For the cross-site analysis, these programs were all re-categorized as “Emergency Shelter.” The “non-residential type included outreach programs as well as programs that were involved in direct placement of clients into mainstream housing with a short rental subsidy and case management.

For each individual or family, we then created a program type use variable, based solely on which of these general program types the household used. The basic groupings created were as follows:

- cohort members using emergency shelter only;
- cohort members using transitional housing only;
- cohort members using emergency shelter and transitional housing only; and
- cohort members using any other combination of program types.

The last combination included households that were served by non-residential programs as well as those served by permanent supportive housing. Unlike the path groups used in the case studies, these groupings were not based on cluster analysis and did not account for length of stay, number of stays, or gaps, or the sequence in which households used the particular programs. However, these other factors (except sequence) were re-introduced as variables in the cross-site multivariate regressions.

Finally, we ensured that the data were comparable across sites. This was particularly necessary for Washington D.C., which used a 30-month study period instead of an 18-month study period. In order to compare Washington, D.C. data directly to the other sites, we re-analyzed the patterns of the Washington, D.C. cohort, and incorporated only the data on costs, length of stay, number of stays, and gaps that were incurred during each family's first 18-months.¹³ In addition, the Washington D.C. cohort included 87 families that only used a program that placed families into mainstream housing. These families were excluded from the cross-site analysis, since they were never literally homeless, and this program did not have equivalents in other sites.

Cross-site Multivariate Analysis

We conducted two sets of additional regressions to support the cross-site analysis. One set of analyses was conducted for the four family sites, and another set of analyses was conducted for the three individual sites. Models were developed to explain two outcome variables: length of homelessness and homeless system costs.

These regressions used the same variables that were used to understand site-specific correlations (see section 2.5.5), with the exception of homeless path group, which was not comparable across sites. Instead, the models included the new program type use variable, as well as the length of stay, number of stays, and gap days. Each model in the cross-site regressions also included a variable for the site to control for differences in program costs across communities. Also, the family sites incorporated demographic data that were not used on the case study level, including gender of adults in households, race of head of household, age of head of household, and age of youngest child. Follow-up analyses were also conducted to address additional questions that arose:

- For families, we modeled the relative risks of households falling into one or other of our program type use categories, based on the explanatory variables.
- For individuals, we modeled the impact of the explanatory variables on number of stays, and another model to explain the cumulative length of gaps between homeless stays.

2.7. Limitations of the Study

Although this study of the costs associated with homelessness paves new ground and provides important findings in many areas, the results of this study also have several limitations.

Perhaps most importantly, the study does not attempt to isolate which of the mainstream costs are caused by homelessness, and it does not compare the benefits of different programs with the costs of their use. Thus, the study is not a cost-effectiveness study and is most accurately characterized as a study to measure the costs associated with homelessness, rather than the costs of homelessness.

¹³ We did not re-generate information on changes in household composition, which might have occurred after the first 18 months.

Specific limitations of our methodology include the following:

1. The study does not include homeless or mainstream system costs associated with individuals or families who may have experienced homelessness but who were not entered into the HMIS.
2. The study explicitly excludes households that were served by residential domestic violence providers at any point during their homelessness.
3. The estimates of costs to the homeless system do not reflect costs associated with the programs that do not report data to the HMIS.
4. Some capital costs are missing, as noted in Section 2.5.2.
5. Mainstream costs are limited to the domains for each case study listed in Section 2.4.3.

For all of these reasons, the estimates in this study may underrepresent costs associated with homelessness in our study sites.

Further, real world data is “messy.” The reliance on administrative data rather than direct data collection requires both trusting in the validity of the data entered by local system users and confronting inevitable gaps in data completeness. The actual data includes numerous data fields that were left blank and others that were inaccurate. Missing or inaccurate information in identifying fields, such as name, social security number and date of birth, inhibited our ability to match records within the HMIS itself in order to construct a complete homeless path or even to determine whether a client met the basic criteria for inclusion in the cohort. It also hampered our ability to match data with mainstream domains. Missing program exit dates was a frequent occurrence and affected our ability to precisely calculate length of stay, which is a critical part of determining homeless system costs as well as establishing the period of homelessness itself.

While we used state-of-the-art tools and statistical techniques to compensate for data entry shortcomings, such as using probabilistic record matching to link client records and hot-deck imputation to fill in missing exit dates, these techniques are only as accurate as the original input and decline in validity as the proportion of available data declines in relation to the missing data. Finally, not all of the data administrators of mainstream systems were able to use Link-King, which supports advance record-matching algorithm. In these cases, a more direct, deterministic record matching approach was used, which may have led to an undercount in the number of matches found.

3. Homeless Program Costs

This chapter reports on the costs of residential programs for homeless people across the six study communities. Little has been documented nationally about the program budgets or daily costs of providing different types of homeless programs. Estimates for homeless programs used in other studies of the costs of homelessness have been based primarily on levels of reimbursement available from public agencies. For this study, homeless program costs are based on actual budgets collected from examples of different types of residential programs in each of the case study sites.¹ Using actual program costs provides a more detailed understanding of the variation in costs across homeless programs. It also provides insight on the main cost components of homeless residential programs: operations, services, administration, and in some cases capital investments in facilities owned by programs.²

This chapter discusses daily program costs by program type within our study sites, starting with program costs for individuals and followed by a discussion of program costs for families. Within each section, the costs per person per day are discussed in two different ways:

1. Community costs: average daily costs for all programs types in the community for which we collected cost data, weighted by program size; and
2. Cohort costs: average daily costs for the program types as they were used by the study cohort.

The distinction is subtle but important. The average costs per day weighted by program size represent the costs of the sample of programs for which we collected costs at each site weighted by the typical number of individuals or families using the program each day.³ These average costs fulfill the interest in the field in understanding the cost per day of different types of homeless programs. They also allow us to compare the variability of costs from one community to another. However, community weighted averages do not reflect the way the study cohort used the various programs. Averages weighted by program size assume that households use each program in proportion to its size.⁴ In contrast, the average cost per day for members of the study cohort reflects the actual levels of use of each program by the cohort. For example, if the study cohort used more expensive

¹ Daily unit costs were calculated by taking a program's 2006 annual budget, divided by 365 days to get the average daily cost of the program and then divided by the average number of occupied units per day to arrive at the average daily cost per unit. See Section 2.5.2 for a detailed discussion of the methodology. Homeless program costs are expressed in 2006 dollars.

² To explore the relative value and influence of capital costs for programs that owned their own properties (and therefore invested real or in-kind resources to build, acquire and/or rehabilitate them), capital daily cost estimates were developed for the Des Moines, Jacksonville, and Upstate South Carolina case studies.

³ The sample was selected to achieve an understanding of the costs of each homeless program type operated in each community; however, the average costs are not statistically representative of all homeless programs within each the community.

⁴ For example, assume that a community has one 10-unit and one 90-unit emergency shelter. The weighted average assumes that if the cohort spends ten days in emergency shelter, one day will be spent in the 10-unit program and nine days will be spent in the 90-unit program. In practice, members of the study cohorts did not use programs according to these proportions.

emergency shelter programs extensively, then the cohort’s average costs per day are higher than the weighted averages for all programs for which we collected data, and vice-versa.⁵

As we discuss throughout this report, the cost findings illustrate the powerful influence of variation in costs among particular programs, as well as variations in costs among types of programs.

3.1. Homeless Program Costs for Individuals

We identified three primary types of homeless residential programs for individuals in Des Moines, Houston, and Jacksonville: emergency shelter, transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing. Sometimes we went beyond this three-part classification and created further categorizations based on the “housing model”—the type of residential space provided or amount of time an individual was expected to spend in the program.

The average cost per day is shown for each program type within each site in Exhibit 3.1. Overnight emergency shelter has the lowest cost per day, typically offers the fewest services in the least private settings, and is often open only during evening and nighttime hours. Transitional housing is generally an expensive model and frequently offers individual room or apartment settings and a range of supportive services. In Houston, Extended Stay Emergency Shelter, in many respects very similar to transitional housing but with shorter intended lengths of stay, has slightly higher costs than transitional housing. Permanent supportive housing also generally offers private living space and supportive services. Providers who operate it indicate that residents are offered services equivalent in intensity to or even greater than services offered in transitional housing; however, in most cases, we found that permanent housing programs arrange for residents to receive services directly from mainstream systems.⁶ Services paid for by permanent supportive housing programs directly appear to be limited to housing-focused services and basic case management. As a result of this structure, permanent supportive housing programs do not have to secure resources to fund these services directly, and the costs are on average comparable to the less expensive 24-hour emergency shelter programs from the perspective of the homeless system. Scattered Site Permanent Supportive Housing has higher costs than transitional housing in Houston primarily due to the costs of leasing private apartments.⁷

⁵ If we did not directly collect costs from a program, we used the costs of another program within the same type that was substantially similar. If there was no substantially similar program, we used the weighted average costs of the program type.

⁶ Because these clients receive services that they would otherwise be eligible for and could continue to receive these services if they moved to alternative housing, we did not include this cost as part of the housing program. Although the resident may be enrolled in this service as a direct result of being accepted into the housing, anecdotally we heard that clients moving into PSH are already enrolled in mainstream care and may even be referred to the permanent supportive housing by their mainstream providers. Our analysis of PSH client enrollment in mainstream services, reported in Chapter 4, is consistent with this assertion. Services paid for with the program budget and those dedicated to the project are accounted for in the program daily costs, when possible.

⁷ The Houston site does not include the daily equivalent value of capital investments. Therefore, the daily costs of facility-based programs may under-represent the housing operations costs in comparison to programs that lease space in the private market.

Exhibit 3.1 also presents the proportion of costs spent for housing operations, services, agency overhead, and the daily cost equivalent of capital investments for programs that are operated in a facility owned by the agency. When facilities or individual housing units are leased, the capital costs are reflected in the housing operations budget.

Exhibit 3.1: Average Cost Per Person Per Day of Homeless Residential Programs Serving Individuals by Program Type and Site^a
Site – Program Type	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day^b	Housing Operations	Supportive Services	Agency Overhead	Capital Costs^c
Des Moines
Emergency Shelter	Congregate	$19	$8 (42%)	$9 (44%)	$2 (9%)	$1 (5%)
Transitional Housing	Shared Rooms	$34	$11 (33%)	$14 (43%)	$7 (20%)	$1 (4%)
Transitional Housing	Individual Rooms	$50	$17 (34%)	$11 (21%)	$7 (13%)	$16 (31%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Shelter Plus Care	$18	$17 (94%)	< $1 (2%)	< $1 (4%)	$0 (0%)
Houston
Emergency Shelter	Short Stay	$28	$7 (25%)	$17 (60%)	$4 (15%)
Emergency Shelter	Extended Stay	$61	$14 (23%)	$27 (44%)	$20 (33%)
Transitional Housing	Facility-based	$55	$16 (29%)	$30 (55%)	$9 (16%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Facility-based	$22	$14 (64%)	$5 (25%)	$3 (12%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Scattered Site	$59	$31 (52%)	$18 (31%)	$10 (17%)
Jacksonville
Emergency Shelter	Overnight	$14	$7 (54%)	$3 (25%)	$1 (8%)	$2 (13%)
Emergency Shelter	24-hour Shelter	$32	$22 (70%)	$5 (16%)	$5 (14%)	$0 (0%)
Transitional Housing	Facility-based and Scattered Site	$29	$13 (46%)	$11 (37%)	$4 (15%)	< $1 (2%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	SRO, Facility-based and Scattered Site	$29	$14 (48%)	$9 (30%)	$2 (7%)	$4 (14%)

^a Costs represent the average across programs within each type, weighted by the typical number of individuals served in each program each day. Costs only represent homeless system costs and do not include the value of mainstream system costs that may be incurred while individuals or families reside in these programs.

^b Total weighted daily unit cost may not equal the sum of the budget component estimates due to rounding.

^c Capital costs were available for Jacksonville and Des Moines, but not for Houston.

More expensive programs generally have higher costs across all budget categories. Higher costs of housing operations may reflect more supervision when comparing an overnight program to a 24-hour program, or increased private space and smaller program capacity (i.e., decreased economies of scale) when comparing transitional and permanent supportive housing programs to emergency shelters. Often more expensive programs provide more services to clients, in the form of either lower case loads or a broader range of services. Agency overhead costs frequently are higher in more expensive programs, again in part due to smaller program capacity and associated decreases in economies of scale. It also appears that many of the more costly programs have higher management and overhead expenses and may be operated by agencies that have a professional management structure. As the break-down of costs in Exhibit 3.1 shows, the higher cost of transitional housing is generally driven by higher costs across all areas: housing operations, services, overhead, and capital costs.

Often cost differences reflect idiosyncratic features of particular programs. Nonetheless, there are trends in costs by program type that appear to be tied to the programmatic and physical requirements of the different program types. As we discuss in Chapter 4, transitional housing that is used by the study cohort of homeless individuals is consistently more expensive than emergency shelter used by the cohort. Multivariate analysis that controls for other cost drivers shows that individuals who use transitional housing, or transitional housing in combination with emergency shelter, have costs more than double costs of individuals who only use emergency shelters.

3.1.1 Monthly Program Costs and Local Costs of Housing

Exhibit 3.2 shows the average costs per month for each program type in each community compared to HUD’s Fair Market Rents (FMRs) for a one-bedroom unit in the same community. The FMR is one way to quantify the value of a rental subsidy for a month.

Exhibit 3.2: Average Cost Per Person Per Month for each Homeless Program Type for Individuals and FY2006 One-Bedroom Fair Market Rents^a
	Emergency Shelter	Transitional Housing	Permanent Supportive Housing	2006 Fair Market Rent for One-bedroom Unit^b
Des Moines	$581	$1,018 – $1,492	$537	$549
Houston	$853 - $1,817	$1,654	$664 – $1,757	$612
Jacksonville	$408 - $962	$870	$882	$643

^a Costs shown reflect weighted averages by program type. Ranges represent the averages of different housing models within a program type, also shown as daily costs in Exhibit 3.1.

^b FMR Source: HUD, 2005. The FMR does not include the monthly fee paid to a public housing agency for administering the voucher program, which was approximately $58 per unit per month in these three communities. (HUD, 2007)

In Chapter 4 we discuss average and median lengths of homeless program stays and report that the majority of individuals who become homeless in each of the three study sites use homeless programs for considerably less than one month. However, for individuals who do use homeless programs for longer than one month, the monthly figures provide a way to compare the cost of the assistance that is being provided by these programs to a rent subsidy. The FMRs are much more similar across the three sites than the average homeless program costs per month, reflecting in part the great variability from site to site in what is provided within each homeless program type and how it is provided. Except for overnight emergency shelters in Jacksonville and permanent supportive housing in Des Moines, the FMR is lower than the monthly costs of all types of homeless residential programs in these communities. The sections below describe each program type, the costs associated with providing it, and the extent to which programs are providing both shelter and supportive services to clients—in contrast to the Fair Market Rents, which represent only the cost of housing.

3.1.2 Emergency Shelters for Individuals

All three sites provide emergency shelter for individuals, primarily in large facilities with congregate sleeping arrangements, communal meals, and short expected lengths of stay. Jacksonville has two models of shelter: overnight shelter and 24-hour shelter. The overnight facilities offer minimal assistance (a hot meal, a cot, and chapel services) and often limit the number of consecutive nights clients can stay. For example, one overnight shelter allows three free nights per month and then charges $5 per night. Although overnight shelters are not very large, they serve more people than other program types because they have the highest turnover rates. Jacksonville’s 24-hour emergency shelter has continual supervision, on-site supportive services, and no explicit limits on length of stay. Des Moines’ emergency shelter beds are similar to Jacksonville’s 24-hour shelter model. Houston also has two models of shelter, referred to in this study as Short-Stay Emergency Shelter and Extended Stay Emergency Shelter. The short-stay programs serve either single men only or single women alongside women with children. Short-stay shelters offer beds, food, and assistance in moving clients back into housing as quickly as possible. The shelters for men are overnight shelters. One of them allows clients to stay for free for up to 8 nights a month and then begins charging a nightly fee. The women’s short-stay shelters have 24-hour staffing and allow stays of up to 90 days.

The category that we refer to as Extended Stay Emergency Shelters offers a rich variety of supportive services and accommodates stays of 3 to 6 months. Extended stay shelters provide clients a greater level of privacy and have a wider array of services than the shorter-stay model, in many ways paralleling the environment and programming provided at a transitional housing program but with the expectation of shorter stays. Programs in this category are primarily targeted to women with a history of substance abuse.

Exhibit 3.3 reports the average cost per person per day, the range of costs per day across programs within each program type at each site, and the average cost per day of each program type as it was actually used by the study cohort.

Exhibit 3.3: Average Cost Per Day of Emergency Shelter for Homeless Individuals
Site	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day	Range of Costs Per Person Per Day^a	Average Cost Per Day As Used By The Cohort
Des Moines	Congregate	$19	$19	$19
Houston	Short Stay	$28	$19 - $73	$36
Houston	Extended Stay	$61	$31 - $85	$67
Jacksonville	Overnight	$14	$14	$14
Jacksonville	24-hour	$32	$32	$32

^a If only one number is provided, costs were only collected from one program.

While emergency shelter costs are generally low, they are quite varied. Overnight and short-term emergency shelters have relatively low daily costs. In Jacksonville, the overnight emergency shelter has a cost of only $14 per day. Des Moines’ congregate shelter program is provided for $19 per day. Jacksonville’s 24-hour shelter serves both singles and families and has a daily cost more than double the cost of the overnight emergency shelter, $32. Houston’s short-stay programs have a similar average daily cost, $28, although costs ranged from $19 per day to $73 per day depending on the program. Houston’s extended stay shelter model has a cost almost triple the daily cost of the short-stay shelters, $82. The lower cost emergency shelter programs all have high capacity (more than 100 beds) and are able to achieve significant economies of scale that are not achievable with programs that have only 20 to 40 beds.

Single women are frequently served in shelter programs that also serve families and that also have much higher daily costs.⁸ A single agency in Houston operates a short-stay program for single men and another program for families and single women. The shelter for men, a large facility with more than 300 beds, operates at a daily cost per person of only $19, compared with $73 for the program for families and single women. Half (51 percent) of the $54 difference in cost can be attributed to services, for which the agency spends $40 per single woman compared with $13 per single man. But the program also spends $26 more per night for single women on housing operations and agency overhead, since the women and families program provides more privacy and individual space and there are fewer units in the facility over which to prorate fixed housing operations and agency overhead costs.

Exhibit 3.3 also shows that the average daily cost of emergency shelter in Houston as it was actually used by members of the study cohort is higher than the cost per person per day weighted by program capacity. This means that individuals in the study cohort of first-time homeless individuals used the expensive programs slightly more than the less expensive programs within each category.

3.1.3 Transitional Housing Programs for Individuals

Transitional housing programs serving single adults in our study sites are offered in both facility-based and scattered site settings. Of the programs we examined, those designed exclusively for single adults use a facility-based model, whereas programs that serve families with children or both families and single women use both models. In the facility-based model, clients are housed in a single building or a campus of buildings owned or leased by the program. In the scattered site model, households are placed in independent apartments located in larger complexes where most of the buildings' tenants are not homeless. The difference in privacy and independence associated with scattered site transitional housing (which was offered for single women but not for single men in our study sites) may contribute to longer lengths of stay for single women. And since single women were often served in more expensive programs that were designed to accommodate families, their associated costs were also higher when compared with single men in the study cohort, as we discuss in Chapter 4.

Most transitional housing programs offer supportive services, including case management, assistance in securing benefits, and job training. In Jacksonville, many of the transitional programs screen out persons who are actively using drugs or alcohol and cite employment, sobriety, and obtaining permanent housing as their primary program goals. By contrast, most programs in Houston target persons with substance abuse histories. One large program targets tuberculosis patients who are in recovery, and another serves persons with HIV/AIDS. Several transitional programs in Houston serve only women.

Des Moines has two models of transitional housing: one with individual rooms or apartments and another with shared rooms. The facilities used by the programs with individual rooms are large buildings in downtown Des Moines, some of which are valuable properties. This has implications for the programs' daily costs per person, since we included a daily cost equivalent of capital infrastructure in the estimates for Des Moines. Programs providing transitional housing with shared rooms generally are group homes and have a completely different housing and capital cost structure. They target homeless people with particular types of need. Three of the five programs in this category serve people who are homeless and have a history of incarceration and, therefore, a need for specialized services that help to address barriers imposed by a criminal history and to mitigate behavior that may lead to reincarceration. Another is a program for veterans operating within an emergency shelter building but with more privacy, longer lengths of stay, and extensive client services funded by the Veterans Administration. The final program is targeted to homeless men recovering from substance abuse.

⁸ This is an important point that is discussed in more depth in Chapter 4, since we find that, even when patterns of homelessness such as lengths of stay are controlled for, single women are associated with substantially higher costs than single men, implying that women use more expensive programs.

Exhibit 3.4 shows the range of daily program costs for transitional housing within each site and compares average program costs per day overall with the costs of the programs as they were used by the study cohort.

Transitional housing has the highest program cost per person per day across the three residential program types in Des Moines ($46) and Houston ($55). In Jacksonville, the cost of transitional housing ($29 per person per day) is comparable to the cost of the 24-hour model of emergency shelter. As shown earlier in Exhibit 3.1, approximately half of the costs of transitional housing are expended for housing operations and agency overhead, ranging from 45 percent in Houston, to 57 percent in Des Moines, to 61 percent in Jacksonville. In Houston, where we are unable to include the daily cost equivalent of capital investments, services account for 55 percent of costs, whereas services represent only 26 percent in Des Moines and 37 percent in Jacksonville. The remaining 2 percent in Jacksonville and 25 percent in Des Moines represent the daily equivalent capital costs of transitional housing facilities owned by the agencies. Since many of the transitional housing programs identified in Houston were facility-based, the proportion of costs for both housing and services would be lower if capital costs were included.

In Des Moines, the two types of transitional housing have quite different cost structures due to their different models and locations. The combined housing and capital daily equivalent cost of the private room model ($32.62) is more than 2.5 times that of the shared model ($12.58), primarily due to the high value of the properties in which the private room model operates. The supportive services cost for the shared room model, which targets special populations, is 37 percent higher ($14.46 versus $10.55), offsetting some of the differences in facility-related costs. The cost of administration (~$7) is approximately the same for both models. The net cost of the private room model is 47 percent higher than the shared room model, a result that affects the average cost of transitional housing as used by the study cohort in Des Moines, since the private room transitional housing model was used for 35 percent more total days than the shared room model. (The number of days used is not shown in the exhibit.)

Within each type of transitional housing program in Des Moines, the study cohort used lower cost programs somewhat more extensively than higher-cost programs. Since many programs in Des Moines were targeted to special needs populations, the actual program use and resulting costs may reflect the extent to which the study cohort met various eligibility requirements. In Houston and Jacksonville, the study cohort used the more expensive transitional housing programs more often than the less expensive ones. This could reflect the fact that higher cost units often offer more privacy and are more attractive to residents, thereby resulting in longer lengths of stay and higher utilization.

Exhibit 3.4: Average Cost Per Day of Transitional Housing for Homeless Individuals

Site	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day	Range of Costs Per Person Per Day	Average Cost Per Day As Used By The Cohort
Des Moines	Shared Room Transitional Housing	$34	$10 - $80	$28
Des Moines	Individual Room Transitional Housing	$50	$22 - $204	$43
Houston	Transitional Housing	$55	$19 - $144	$65
Jacksonville	Transitional Housing	$29	$13 - $46	$31

3.1.4 Permanent Supportive Housing for Individuals

Permanent supportive housing provides indefinite housing assistance and supportive services to residents, directly or guaranteed based on formal relationships with mainstream providers. Permanent supportive housing in the three study sites is commonly offered in both facility-based and scattered site models. Houston has made a considerable investment in permanent supportive housing. These units are almost evenly split between facility-based and scattered-site programs. The biggest provider of supportive housing units targets persons with HIV/AIDS. Houston also has large permanent supportive housing programs for disabled veterans and individuals with severe mental illness. The only permanent supportive housing program serving individuals in Des Moines is a Shelter Plus Care (S+C) program providing subsidies for homeless people with disabilities who rent private market units. Under agreements with several providers of mental health and substance abuse services, a local non-profit sponsor of affordable housing make slots in the S+C program available to clients referred by those agencies.

While permanent supportive housing is generally limited to persons with a chronic disability that inhibits independent living, the majority of permanent housing units considered part of the residential system for homeless individuals in Jacksonville are Section 8 Moderate Rehabilitation Single Room Occupancies (SROs). Unlike permanent supportive housing, these programs do not exclusively serve persons with disabilities, although local providers said that most residents do have disabilities. Aside from meals, these permanent housing SROs do not include on-site supportive services. Services are provided through formal relationships with mainstream service providers and by referral. Jacksonville also has some permanent supportive housing programs that offer more intensive on-site supportive services.

In all three of the study sites for individuals, the cost per person per day of permanent supportive housing is less than or equal to the cost of transitional housing, with the exception of the scattered site permanent supportive housing model in Houston, which has slightly higher average costs per day (Exhibit 3.1). The cost of permanent supportive housing averages $18 per day in Des Moines and $29 per day in Jacksonville. In Houston, the cost is $22 per day for facility-based housing and $59 per day for scattered site housing. Because most services are delivered by mainstream agencies that residents are otherwise eligible for (and would be eligible to continue to receive if they moved to alternative housing), we did not include the costs of mainstream services as part of the permanent supportive housing program cost estimates. Although the resident may be enrolled in this service as a direct result of being accepted into the housing, anecdotally we heard that clients moving into permanent supportive housing already are enrolled in mainstream care and may even be referred to the housing by their mainstream providers. Our analysis of enrollment of users of permanent supportive housing in mainstream services (reported in Chapter 4) is consistent with this premise. Services paid for within the program budget or otherwise dedicated to the project are accounted for in the program daily costs to the extent possible.

Martha Burt conducted two self-report surveys (2004 and 2007) of more than 90 permanent supportive housing providers that enable us to place these costs in context. The surveys were part of a multi-year study of the Taking Health Care Home evaluation for the Corporation of Supportive Housing (Corporation for Supportive Housing [CSH], 2005; CSH, 2008).⁹ These programs housed primarily individuals with chronic patterns of homelessness and used mainly facility-based models. From the 2007 survey, Burt reports costs averaging $46 per unit per day, with housing costs of $27 and services costs from all sources of $19. These costs are higher than the estimates of the average cost per person per day presented in Exhibit 3.5 for permanent supportive housing in Des Moines and Jacksonville, and for facility-based permanent supportive housing in Houston. These lower overall costs in the study sites reflect lower services costs, but also lower housing operations costs, as shown in Exhibit 3.1. Perhaps the programs surveyed in the Burt study are more comparable to properties in this study with costs at the higher end of the ranges shown in Exhibit 3.5.

Exhibit 3.5: Average Cost Per Day of Permanent Supportive Housing Programs for Homeless Individuals
Site	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day	Range of Costs Per Person Per Day^a	Average Cost Per Day As Used By The Cohort
Des Moines	Scattered Site	$18	$18	$18
Houston	Facility-based	$22	$13 - $69	$54
Houston	Scattered Site	$59	$35 - $80	$47
Jacksonville	Scattered Site and Facility-based	$29	$21 - $41	$24

^a If only one number is provided, costs were only collected from one program.

Another analysis, conducted by Abt Associates Inc. (2005) for HUD, reviewed the costs of permanent supportive housing projects serving individuals with a history of chronic homelessness. That cost review also found lower costs than the Burt survey. The Abt Associates analysis was based on program budget data collected on-site and included costs of services unless we concluded that they were mainstream costs readily available to all people with qualifying conditions regardless of their homelessness. That study found average daily costs per person of $21 for older facility-based models (62 percent for housing, 38 percent for services), $22 for newly developed properties (46 percent for housing, 54 percent for services), and $40 for scattered site models (57 percent for housing, 43 percent for services).¹⁰

⁹ This information was self-reported in response to a survey and not based on direct examination of program budget documents. Some survey respondents reported that they were unable to include costs reimbursed by certain mainstream systems, such as Medicaid.

The comparison of average costs per day with the costs per day actually incurred by the study cohort within each site (Exhibit 3.5) again illustrates how client-specific or systemic decisions that determine who uses which particular program can make a significant difference in costs incurred by the homeless services system. This is most clear for Houston. On average, the scattered-site permanent supportive housing model in Houston costs almost three times as much as the facility-based model. However, the individuals we studied who used facility-based models generally used the more expensive programs, whereas those who used scattered site housing used less expensive programs than the community average. As a result, the average cost per day for members of the Houston cohort using facility-based housing was greater than the average cost per day for those who used scattered site housing, exactly opposite what we would have surmised from the overall averages for the program types.

Des Moines has only one permanent supportive housing program, so there is no difference between the two average costs. In Jacksonville, the difference between the average cohort cost and the community-wide average cost shows that members of the Jacksonville study cohort used less expensive programs more heavily than more expensive models.

Very few individuals in our study cohort used permanent supportive housing at any time during the study's 18-month tracking period. For example in Des Moines, we found only four individuals in the Shelter Plus Care program from among the 1,124 who became homeless for the first time between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005. Across all three sites, this phenomenon may be a result of two patterns. First, most people using permanent supportive housing programs were not included in this study because they had been housed in a homeless residential program before July 1, 2004. Second, some individuals in our study cohorts who used permanent supportive housing were not placed there until well into the 18-month observation period, so some permanent supportive housing stays may have been truncated. Regardless, costs associated with permanent supportive housing are not a major part of the costs associated with homelessness for our study cohort.

3.2. Homeless Program Costs for Families

As we did for individuals, we identified three primary types of homeless residential programs for families in our four family study sites—emergency shelter, transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing—and also made further distinctions among “housing models” for some program types in some communities. The average cost per person per day is shown for each program type in Exhibit 3.6 for DC, Houston, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina. The exhibit also shows the proportion of costs spent for housing operations, services, agency overhead, and—only for Upstate South Carolina--the daily cost equivalent of capital investments for programs that are operated in a facility owned by the agency. (Rental or leasing costs for facilities not owned by the agency are factored into housing operations.) These are the average costs per day for the programs for which we collected cost data, weighted by program capacity. Costs for the programs as used by the study cohorts of first-time homeless families are presented later.

¹⁰ These figures do not include daily equivalent costs for capital investments.

Exhibit 3.6: Average Cost Per Family Per Day of Homeless Residential Programs Serving Families by Program Type and Site^a

Site – Program Type	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Family Per Day ^b	Housing Operations	Supportive Services	Agency Overhead	Capital Costs ^c
District of Columbia
Emergency Shelter	Congregate	$123	$67 (54%)	$41 (33%)	$16 (13%)
Emergency Shelter	Apartment-style	$83	$45 (55%)	$30 (36%)	$8 (10%)
Transitional Housing	Facility-based	$73	$19 (26%)	$32 (45%)	$21 (29%)
Transitional Housing	Scattered Site	$72	$33 (47%)	$27 (38%)	$11 (16%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Shelter Plus Care ^d	$42	$39 (94%)	$0 (0%)	$3 (6%)
Houston
Emergency Shelter	Congregate and Apartment-Style	$46	$9 (19%)	$31 (66%)	$7 (15%)
Transitional Housing	Facility-based	$149	$37 (25%)	$82 (55%)	$30 (20%)
Transitional Housing	Scattered Site	$65	$22 (34%)	$30 (46%)	$13 (20%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Shelter Plus Care and Facility-based	$27	$13 (48%)	$7 (27%)	$7 (25%)
Kalamazoo
Emergency Shelter	Congregate	$54	$27 (50%)	$25 (46%)	$2 (4%)
Transitional Housing	Facility-based and Scattered Site	$27	$16 (58%)	$8 (31%)	$3 (11%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Shelter Plus Care	$29	$19 (65%)	$0 (0%)	$10 (35%)
Upstate South Carolina
Emergency Shelter	Congregate and Single Family	$76	$26 (34%)	$32 (43%)	$13 (17%)	$5 (6%)
Emergency Shelter	Church Hospitality	$297	$68 (23%)	$194 (65%)	$35 (12%)	$0 (0%)
Transitional Housing	Scattered Site	$40	$20 (50%)	$15 (37%)	$5 (12%)	< $1 (<1%)
Permanent Supportive Housing	Shelter Plus Care	$22	$21 (96%)	$0 (0%)	$1 (4%)	$0 (0%)

^a Costs represent the average across programs within each type, weighted by the typical number of families served in each program each day.

^b Total weighted daily unit cost may not equal the sum of the budget component estimates due to rounding.

^c Capital costs are included for Upstate South Carolina only. Capital costs are only applicable to programs that own their own facilities.

^d The District has both scattered site and facility-based programs, but costs were only collected from the City-funded scattered site program.

As we found for programs for individuals, the more expensive family program types tend to have higher costs across all budget categories. That is, cost differences among programs are not explained by only one budget category. For example, in Houston, facility-based transitional housing costs more than 3 times as much as emergency shelter ($149.39 vs. $46.37). The housing operations cost is 4.2 times higher ($37.35 vs. $8.87 per family per day), and the services cost is 2.7 times higher ($82.11 vs. $30.62 per family per day). The higher cost of housing operations probably reflects both increased private space and lower program capacity, which decreases economies of scale. The higher cost of services probably reflects more intensive services, as would be expected for transitional housing.

In DC, apartment-style emergency shelter is more expensive than scattered site transitional housing ($83 vs. $72). The housing operations cost is one-third higher ($45 vs. $33), and the services cost is one-tenth higher ($30 vs. $27). The apartment-style emergency shelter is facility-based, with 24-hour staffing, and the higher cost of housing operations may reflect this additional on-site supervision.

Often more expensive programs provide more services to clients, in the form of either lower case loads or a broader range of services. Agency overhead costs frequently are higher in more expensive programs, again in part due to smaller program capacity and decreased economies of scale. Cost differences also reflect idiosyncratic features of particular programs, such as program, size, amount of private space per family, level of volunteer or in-kind services, or the value of the physical location.

Unlike transitional housing for individuals, transitional housing for families is not consistently more expensive than emergency shelter. Emergency shelters are more expensive on average than transitional housing programs in DC, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina. One reason is that families often get private rooms or apartments in emergency shelter, in contrast to emergency shelter programs for individuals. Emergency shelters that serve families also are small and therefore have few units over which to prorate fixed costs, such as on-site supervision. Emergency shelter programs for families are likely to be open 24 hours a day and often provide fairly intensive supportive services. In Upstate South Carolina, the church-based shelter programs have particularly high in-kind costs associated with volunteer labor and donated materials. We counted the value of these contributions as costs since the program could not be operated without them. Thus, the physical and programmatic differences between family shelters and family transitional programs are not as great as they are between these program types for individuals. At the same time, there usually are very different philosophies, program goals, and intended lengths of stay between family emergency shelters and family transitional housing programs.

The characteristics of specific programs have more influence on costs for each program type within the family sites compared with the individual sites, because most communities had only a few family programs. Thus, the average program costs reflect heavily the costs of specific programs, such as a high-cost publicly-operated congregate shelter in the District of Columbia,¹¹ the small church-based shelters in South Carolina, a large and service-rich facility-based transitional housing program in Houston, and a particularly low-cost transitional housing program in Kalamazoo.

Despite the lower average cost per day for family transitional housing compared with family emergency shelter, we found that families in our study cohort who use transitional housing programs have higher costs than families who only use emergency shelter, as will be discussed in Chapter 5. Families in the study cohort who used only emergency shelter used less expensive shelter programs more heavily, while those who used transitional housing only or in combination with shelter used transitional housing programs higher-cost shelter programs more heavily.

¹¹ This program has subsequently been closed and the DC system has shifted entirely to an apartment-based emergency system.

As we found for individuals, permanent supportive housing was the least expensive program type from the perspective of the homeless system. In most cases, we found that permanent housing programs arranged for residents to receive services directly from mainstream systems rather than from the permanent supportive housing programs directly, so permanent housing programs did not have to secure resources to fund these services directly and the services costs are not accounted for in these estimates. However, even setting aside the issue of services, permanent supportive housing for families usually has equivalent or lower housing operations costs than the emergency shelter or transitional housing programs in the same site. Having said that, the cost of permanent supportive housing plays only a small role in the cost of homelessness for the study cohort of first-time homeless families. Very few families in the study cohort used it, because of a combination of capacity constraints and lack of families qualifying for permanent supportive housing on the basis of a disability.

3.2.1 Monthly Program Costs and Local Costs of Housing

Exhibit 3.7 shows the average costs per month for each program type in each community along with the average 2006 HUD Fair Market Rents for a two-bedroom unit in the same community.

Exhibit 3.7: Average Cost Per Family Per Month for Each Homeless Program Type for Families and FY2006 Two-Bedroom Fair Market Rents^a
	Emergency Shelter	Transitional Housing	Permanent Supportive Housing	2006 Fair Market Rent for Two-bedroom Unit^b
District of Columbia	$2,496 - $3,698	$2,146 - $2,188	$1,251	$1,225
Houston	$1,391	$1,940 – $4,482	$799	$743
Kalamazoo	$1,614	$813	$881	$612
Upstate South Carolina	$2,269	$1,209	$661	$599 (Greenville MSA)

^a Costs shown reflect weighted averages by program type. Ranges represent the averages for different programs within a program type.

^b FMR Source: HUD, 2005. The FMR does not include the monthly fee paid to a public housing agency for administering the voucher program, which ranged from $50 to $90 per unit per month in these four communities. (HUD, 2007)

In Chapter 5 we discuss the total homeless system costs incurred for each first-time homeless family over an 18-month tracking period. Many families remain in homeless programs for a month or more. In most cases, a month of assistance provided within the homeless system exceeds the local Fair Market Rent—that is, the maximum subsidy cost of providing a housing voucher to the family. The sections below describe each program type, the costs associated with providing it, and the extent to which programs are providing both housing assistance and supportive services—in contrast to the Fair Market Rents, which only represent housing assistance.

3.2.2 Emergency Shelters for Families

All four study sites provide emergency shelter for families, but shelter for homeless families looks quite different from shelter for homeless single adults.¹² Two types of shelter are offered in the District of Columbia: congregate emergency shelter and apartment-style emergency shelter. Congregate Emergency Shelters have communal eating and bathing facilities and little privacy. Families may share rooms, depending on the size of the family and the space available at the facility. During our study period, the largest of the congregate programs, DC Village, was the main point of entry into the emergency shelter system for families in DC. DC Village closed in October 2007, just before the end of the period during which we tracked families. Policy-makers were aware of the high daily cost of DC Village, and advocates for homeless people objected to its remote location and its lack of privacy. The factor that precipitated the facility's closing was the DC government's need to use the property for another purpose.¹³

The District of Columbia also houses families in Apartment-Style Emergency Shelters in which each family has a private apartment. However, there is 24-hour supervision, and access by visitors is restricted. During the study period, entry into these facilities usually was by referral from DC Village. The programs are funded by the DC government, and they must take any family referred to fill a vacancy.¹⁴ Emergency shelters for families have fairly high per family costs (Exhibit 3.6). In DC congregate shelter is the most expensive homeless program type, averaging $123 per family per day. Apartment-style shelter costs two-thirds as much ($83) per day in comparison, with the savings relatively evenly distributed across housing, services, and administration.

In Houston, emergency shelter programs for families provide both dormitory-style shelter units with shared kitchen and bath facilities and individual apartments that provide families more privacy and autonomy over their daily routines. Services include basic emergency support services such as food, immediate crisis intervention and de-escalation, and referral to more intensive services at other programs. The length of stay in congregate dormitory programs is intended to be shorter than in individual apartment emergency shelters, with an emphasis on referring families into more intensive service programs such as apartment-based shelters or transitional housing. Apartment-Style Emergency Shelter programs are structured as 90-day shelters with a level of service and linkage that is intended to be more intensive than congregate dorm emergency shelters. These programs focus on placing families directly into permanent housing. Exhibit 3.8 presents the costs of these two program types together. The average cost of emergency shelter for families in Houston is $46 per family per day, with the services budget 66 percent of that total.

In Kalamazoo, families are served primarily by two shelter programs. One is a large house that is shared by up to six families. The other is operated for both families and single women in a large facility with shared common areas and private sleeping rooms. This facility also has a transitional housing program for families on another floor. Across the two programs, the average cost is $54 per family per day, but the program operated in the single-family home is significantly more expensive due to lower economies of scale for housing and overhead and substantially more supportive services.

¹² Except when single women are served alongside families in a women and families program.

¹³ After the closing of DC Village, another congregate program, DC Hypothermia, remained open but with plans to close. The number of apartment-style shelters was expanded to offset the loss of beds at DC Village.

¹⁴ The only exception is that the program can refuse to accept a family that would threaten the safety of other residents.

South Carolina provides three types of emergency shelters: congregate shelters, single family homes, and church hospitality networks. Congregate Facilities have open bed space or small sleeping rooms with shared living space and bathrooms. Occupancy is often fluid between families and single women based on need that day. Length of stay typically is less than six weeks. Single Family Houses are shared by multiple families, but offer private space for each family and have somewhat longer lengths of stay. Church Hospitality Networks provide housing sponsored by various congregations around the 13-county area covered by the Upstate South Carolina Continuum of Care. The actual shelter space rotates weekly in church rooms, and the programs are heavily staffed by volunteers. Lengths of stay typically are short but can last several months. The cost per family per day for the church-based program type is very high ($297), in part reflecting actual paid costs and in part reflecting the estimated value of volunteer hours and donated space and supplies.¹⁵ Together the congregate and single family shelters cost an average of $76 per family per day, of which 43 percent funds services.

Exhibit 3.8 reports the average cost per family per day, the range of costs per day across programs within each program type at each site, and the average cost per day of each program type as it was actually used by the study cohort.

Exhibit 3.8: Average Cost Per Day of Emergency Shelter for Homeless Families
Site	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day	Range of Costs Per Person Per Day^a	Average Cost Per Day As Used By the Cohort
District of Columbia	Congregate	$123	$123 ^b	$123
District of Columbia	Apartment-style	$83	$67 - $102	$80
Houston	Congregate and Apartment-style	$46	$23 - $175	$61
Kalamazoo	Congregate	$54	$32 - $179	$75
Upstate South Carolina	Congregate and Single Family	$76	$37 - $135	$82
Upstate South Carolina	Church Hospitality	$297	$229 - $348	$229

^a If only one number is provided, costs were only collected from one program.

^b Costs were also collected for DC Hypothermia overflow shelter, which has daily costs of $28 per family; however, these costs were not included in the program type average, since the Hypothermia shelter serves only a limited purpose. Members of the study cohort also used shelters for single individuals at times, whose costs are included in the DC case study and analysis reported in Chapter 5. They are not reported here, since this section discusses costs associated with family programs.

¹⁵ Many emergency shelter programs rely on substantial volunteer support to operate. Our cost calculation methodology shows the costs that would be required to replicate the level of effort provided by these programs.

Emergency shelter programs for families have huge variations in costs, ranging from $23 per day on the low end to $348 on the high end, as shown on Exhibit 3.8. The range of costs reflects differences in both the housing model and the type and level of services provided. Exhibit 3.8 also illustrates the influence of the specific programs used by the study cohort on the costs of homelessness reported in this study. The average costs per family per day for members of the cohort are slightly higher than the overall average daily costs of emergency shelter in Houston and for congregate and single-family shelters in Upstate South Carolina, meaning that the cohort spend a greater number of nights in more expensive programs than the lower cost ones. No one in the study cohort in Upstate South Carolina used the more expensive of the two church hospitality programs, so the cohort's costs represent only the relatively lower cost church program. The Kalamazoo cohort's daily costs for emergency shelter are almost 40 percent higher than the overall program average, since one-third of the cohort's shelter nights were spent at the more expensive shelter program. In DC the cohort used less expensive programs slightly more than higher cost programs within the Apartment-Style Emergency Shelter program type.

3.2.3 Transitional Housing Programs for Families

The four family study sites have transitional housing programs that aim to help the head of household become stably employed, maintain sobriety, and move to market-rate housing with or without the assistance of a Housing Choice Voucher. Facility-based programs are operated in a building owned by or rented exclusively for the program, while scattered site programs are provided in individual apartments that are rented on behalf of the program's clients. In some programs, families must find and move into different permanent housing units at the end of the transitional period. Other scattered-site programs allow families to remain in the same housing unit after graduating from the transitional program, assuming the families can assume the lease payments. Some housing units in a scattered-site program may be in the same larger rental development or may be located in particular neighborhood and serve families with ties to that neighborhood.

The District of Columbia, Houston, and Kalamazoo all offer both facility-based and scattered site transitional housing models. In Kalamazoo, one of the transitional programs is operated within the same facility as an emergency shelter, and almost all participants have graduated from the shelter program. One transitional housing program that was heavily used by the study cohort in Kalamazoo is facility-based and has very low housing operations costs. All transitional housing programs for families in Upstate South Carolina use a scattered-site housing approach.

The cost to operate transitional housing programs varies widely from one program to another, within and across sites, ranging from a weighted average cost per day of $27 for the transitional housing programs in Kalamazoo to a weighted average of $107 per day in Houston (Exhibit 3.9). The structure of the housing (e.g., facility-based vs. scattered site) does not seem to drive costs up or down consistently. On average, housing operations consumes a greater proportion of the program cost and services a lower proportion of the cost in scattered site models than it does in facility-based models. However, for the three sites that have both types of transitional housing, we were not able to include an estimate of capital costs for transitional housing programs that owned their facilities. Had we done this, it would reduce the percentage of total cost represented by services for these programs. The absolute dollar value of the average cost per day used to fund services is higher for facility-based programs than for scattered site programs in DC and much higher in Houston (Exhibit 3.6). It is possible that facility-based programs provide more living-support services, such as child care or informal resident mediation, while the case management and self-sufficiency related services on average are comparable in intensity for facility-based and scattered-site transitional housing. It is also possible that scattered site programs provide more of their services through referral to mainstream employment or treatment programs, and that these services costs do not show up in their direct budgets.¹⁶ In interviews conducted for the study, program staff described similar levels of services across the two housing models.

Exhibit 3.9 reports the average cost per family per day, the range of costs per day across programs within each housing model at each site, and the average cost per day of each program type as it was actually used by the study cohort.¹⁷

Exhibit 3.9: Average Cost Per Day of Transitional Housing for Homeless Families
Site	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day	Range of Costs Per Person Per Day	Average Cost Per Day As Used By the Cohort
District of Columbia	Facility-based	$73	$30 - $109	$77
District of Columbia	Scattered Site	$72	$40 - $112	$68
Houston	Facility-based and Scattered Site	$107	$52 - $177	$134
Kalamazoo	Facility-based and Scattered Site	$27	$14 - $66	$22
Upstate South Carolina	Scattered Site	$40	$26 - $44	$40

In addition to the considerable range of program costs per day within each site, there is huge variation among sites, with the most expensive transitional housing program in Kalamazoo comparable in cost to some of the least expensive programs in Houston. These site differences have a substantial impact on the overall costs associated with first-time homeless families from one community to another. (See further discussion in Chapter 5.) The exhibit also shows that families in the study cohort who use transitional housing in Houston and families who use facility-based transitional housing in the District of Columbia make relatively heavy use of the more expensive transitional housing programs. The difference is most notable in Houston, where the study cohort used a high-cost, service-rich transitional program more heavily than other programs. This Houston program provides very high-levels of services ($100 per day), including extensive services for the children of families enrolled in the program. In contrast, in Kalamazoo, families in the study cohort used the least expensive transitional housing program two-thirds of the time, increasing the differences in costs for first-time homeless families among the four communities.

¹⁶ For homeless system costs, we recorded costs of all housing and services provided directly by the program. The homeless system costs do not include costs of services provided by mainstream systems if the services were also available to other people who were not enrolled in the homeless program. To the extent that families received services from mainstream programs that were included in the mainstream system cost analysis for that site, these costs would be reflected in the mainstream system cost analysis for that site. Some mainstream services such as employment and training were not included in either the homeless system or mainstream system costs, whereas services such as mental health and substance abuse treatment services were included more frequently.

¹⁷ If only one number is provided in the Range column, costs were only collected from one program.

3.2.4 Permanent Supportive Housing Programs for Families

For families, permanent supportive housing is most commonly provided using a Shelter Plus Care, scattered-site model, and services are primarily brokered through mainstream agencies. Most target families have severe and persistent mental illness or chronic substance abuse, although some programs also target families with HIV/AIDS. Kalamazoo and Upstate South Carolina both use only a scattered-site model and target families with mental illness. The District of Columbia also uses mainly Shelter Plus Care, making units available to the clients of agencies serving homeless families with various types of qualifying disabilities. The few small facility-based supportive housing programs for homeless families in DC are privately funded, not integrated into the homeless services system, and not included in this study.

Houston provides both facility-based and scattered-site permanent supportive housing. Under agreements with providers of mental health and substance abuse services, slots in permanent housing are made available to homeless clients referred by those agencies. The referring agencies commit to providing case management while their clients are living in the housing and provide or link their clients to behavioral and physical health care and to other services such as job training and job support.

In all four of the family study sites, the cost of permanent supportive housing per family per day is less than the cost of any other program type in the residential system for homeless families (Exhibit 3.6), with an average cost of $22 in Upstate South Carolina, $27 in Houston, $29 in Kalamazoo, and $42 in the District of Columbia. The costs of operating the housing (i.e., for renting the housing units) and for managing the program (i.e. for administering the program) constitute all of the costs recorded in DC, Kalamazoo and Upstate South Carolina, and represent 73 percent of the cost of permanent supportive housing in Houston. Service costs explain the other 27 percent in Houston. This does not mean families in Shelter Plus Care or other scattered-site permanent supportive housing programs do not receive services. Rather, most services are delivered by mainstream agencies, and residents were eligible to receive them before they moved into permanent supportive housing and will continue to receive if they move to alternative housing. Anecdotally we heard that clients moving into permanent supportive housing already are enrolled in mainstream care and may even be referred to the housing by their mainstream providers. Analysis of Medicaid records in Kalamazoo, discussed later in Chapter 5, supports this hypothesis, since 89 percent of families in the group who used permanent supportive housing were enrolled in Medicaid in the period prior to homelessness.

Exhibit 3.10 reports the average cost per family per day, the range of costs per day across programs within each housing model at each site, and the average cost per day of each program type as it was actually used by the study cohort.

Exhibit 3.10: Average Cost Per Day of Permanent Supportive Housing for Homeless Families

Site	Housing Model	Average Cost Per Person Per Day	Range of Costs Per Person Per Day ^a	Average Cost Per Day As Used By The Cohort
District of Columbia	Scattered Site	$42	$42	$42
Houston	Scattered-Site and Facility-based	$27	$16 - $59	$38
Kalamazoo	Scattered Site	$29	$19 - $58	$20
Upstate South Carolina	Scattered Site	$22	$22	$0 ^b

^a If only one number is provided in the Range column, costs were only collected from one program.

^b None of the families in the Upstate South Carolina cohort used permanent supportive housing.

Only a small percentage of permanent supportive housing units in most communities are dedicated to families, and an even smaller percentage of families in our study cohorts used permanent supportive housing during our study period. None of the families in the South Carolina cohort used permanent housing, so while the average cost per day of permanent supportive housing is $22, the cost for the cohort shown on Exhibit 3.10 is $0. Low utilization occurred across all of the family sites. In Houston, the cohort spent only two percent of its total days in residential homeless programs in permanent supportive housing. In DC, five percent of the cohort’s days were spent in permanent supportive housing programs. The higher percentage for DC is affected by the 30-month observation period, which is one year longer than in the other sites. While the Kalamazoo study cohort spent 8 percent of its days in homeless programs in permanent supportive housing; these stays represent only 11 families or 3 percent of the cohort. These 11 families were in permanent supportive housing for most of the observation period.

The relatively low use of permanent supportive housing by first-time homeless families is related to a number of factors. Most families do not have a disability sufficient to qualify them for the program. Furthermore, many communities do not have many permanent supportive housing units for families, and the low turnover among those housed within them limits opportunities for families who are eligible to be housed in permanent supportive housing. Finally, other families in our study cohort may eventually have been housed in permanent supportive housing, but the 18-month observation period for three of the four communities in this study may not have been long enough to include these stays.

3.3. Policy Implications of Program Costs

This chapter summarized the wide-ranging costs of providing residential homeless programs to individuals and families. Several key policy considerations emerged related to the costs of different types of homeless programs, as well as individual programs within a community.

Emergency shelters for families are generally similar in cost and sometimes even more expensive than transitional housing programs, whereas transitional housing for individuals is generally more expensive than shelter. This broad finding has several policy and planning implications. First, given the low daily cost of emergency shelter for individuals, it would be very difficult to fund a prevention response that would yield cost savings. However, the higher costs of emergency shelter for families may make homelessness prevention programs more cost-effective than emergency shelter for some families. Communities could also look at the cost structure of current emergency shelter programs for families to determine if the environment and services offered are appropriate to the needs of those who are using them. If shelter is intended to house families only briefly, it may not be necessary or cost-effective to provide non-crisis-related services within shelter. Therefore, it may be possible to reduce daily costs of shelter programs for families by scaling back on the therapeutic resources offered to families on-site. For those with greater needs who need longer stays or more intensive services, it may be more cost effective to quickly move them into transitional housing (facility-based or scattered site), permanent supportive housing, or permanent housing with mainstream supportive services.

Given, the high costs of transitional housing for both individuals and families, communities may want to consider whether alternative interventions or combinations of rent subsidies and standalone supportive services could achieve similar outcomes at lower costs. Permanent supportive housing is generally less expensive from the perspective of the homeless system than other types of residential homeless programs for families, often similar in cost to a deep rental subsidy. To the extent that individuals or families have disabilities that qualify them for permanent supportive housing, communities should expedite their placement into these units. The low cost of permanent supportive housing is largely attributable to lower homeless system service costs made possible by formally linking clients to mainstream services. Communities could also explore creating transitional housing modeled like permanent supportive housing with housing and limited housing-focused services provided by the homeless system and non-housing services intentionally provided by mainstream systems.

In general, communities may want to examine program costs to determine if there are less expensive ways of delivering comparable interventions. The huge range of costs within program types—for example among transitional housing programs for families—may or may not reflect differences in the quality of services delivered or in the outcomes for families.

Individual program features can also have substantial impacts on the costs of delivering homeless assistance. For instance, we discussed the substantially higher costs of an extended stay emergency shelter program in Houston for single women compared with an extended stay shelter program serving single men. The women’s shelter provided more services and more privacy and also had higher per-person administrative costs due to its smaller size. The study did not explore whether programs with higher costs also have better outcomes. Nonetheless, the agency operating both of these may want to consider whether it would be more cost-effective to develop a program for single women with housing costs and administrative overhead more similar to those of the program for single men. Compounding the variability of daily costs from one program to another, homeless families and individuals do not use homeless programs evenly. Communities will be able to reduce homeless system costs the most by reducing costs of programs used most heavily by homeless individuals and families. The converse is also true: adding a program feature that raises the cost of a heavily used program will have a disproportionate effect on the costs associated with homelessness in that community.

The differences between community average costs for each program type and the costs associated with each study cohort discussed in this chapter illustrate the point that costs are driven by actual program utilization. Further, utilization varies for people with different demographic characteristics and needs. For instance, first-time homeless individuals may use a different set of programs than individuals with chronic medical needs. Local efforts to shift costs to create a more effective response to homelessness must be conducted within the context of the programs serving the group of greatest interest to the community.

None of this is to suggest that communities should always seek to lower program costs. Strong outcomes may require a sizable investment; however, policymakers should understand what drives costs in their communities, so they can consider cost implications as part of the decision-making.

Cost per day is only one dimension of the costs of homelessness to the homeless services system. Lengths of stay, or the number of days an individual or a family uses residential programs for homeless people, also have a powerful influence on costs. The next two chapters combine information on costs per day and on patterns of utilization of the homeless services system, first for individuals (Chapter 4) and then for families (Chapter 5).

4. First-time Homelessness for Individuals and its Associated Costs

This study confirms the findings of some prior research on homelessness for individuals and presents new findings about first-time homelessness for individuals and its associated costs. The most important themes about costs of first-time homelessness for individuals that emerged from the study are that:

- The overall experience of homelessness, program utilization, and associated costs vary widely from one subpopulation of first-time homeless individuals to another, with only a small subgroup incurring substantial costs. The half of the cohort with the lowest homeless system costs—individuals who only briefly use emergency shelter—incur only 2 to 3 percent of the total homeless system costs. The highest-cost 10 percent of the cohort incurred 62 percent of the homeless system costs in Jacksonville, 70 percent in Des Moines, and 83 percent in Houston.
- The type of program used by individuals who are homeless appears to have the greatest influence on costs and certain program types and specific programs within those types are more expensive than others. The cost to the homeless services system of the most expensive 10 percent of individuals in the study cohort at each site generally reflects continuous use of expensive transitional housing programs for much or all of the 18-month observation period.
- For some subgroups, total homeless system costs incurred per person exceed the cost of an annual direct housing subsidy. Communities may want to consider whether housing assistance (without supportive services) would be a lower cost and potentially equally effective intervention for some of these groups.
- Single women are associated with statistically significant higher homeless system costs, even when controlling for their longer stays and the types of programs they use. Combining all of these factors, single women over 40 years old frequently have high system costs in the current system structure and may benefit from alternative interventions designed specifically to meet their needs. Other demographic groups, such as African-Americans and older adults are also associated with statistically significant higher costs.
- Cost savings may be achievable within the homeless system for first-time long-stayers based on providing housing assistance in different ways. However, the relationship between intensive use of the homeless system and high-cost mainstream use is not strong enough to expect significant cost savings within mainstream systems by ending homelessness for long-stayers as a whole.
- Higher mainstream costs in some domains were associated with individuals who had multiple episodes of homelessness. Communities could target individuals who return to shelter for a second (or third) non-consecutive program stay. This group may particularly benefit from intentional prevention-oriented discharge planning strategies.
- Mainstream system utilization and associated costs spike during homelessness, but costs also increase substantially immediately before first-time homelessness. Thus, costs peak in the period just after the individual enters the residential homeless system. This finding suggests a need for discharge planning to ensure that individuals leave mainstream programs, such as inpatient treatment or jails, with adequate housing.

This chapter begins with a discussion of existing research, presents the findings of this study and then discusses the findings within the context of existing research.

4.1. Existing Research

4.1.1 Patterns of Homelessness among Individuals

Analysis of longitudinal shelter administrative data conducted a decade ago by Kuhn and Culhane (1998) in New York and Philadelphia provided a new typology of patterns of homelessness: transitional homelessness, episodic homelessness, and chronic homelessness. Although there had been prior research and discussion of typologies of homelessness, Kuhn and Culhane's framework was popularized by the National Alliance to End Homelessness (NAEH, 2000) and by the federal government when it adopted a ten-year goal to end chronic homelessness as part of its FY2003 budget (OMB, 2002). Transitional homelessness was characterized by short, single episodes of homelessness and described the pattern experienced by 80 percent of homeless individuals. Episodic homelessness described repeated short episodes of homelessness experienced over the course of years, often by younger individuals with chronic addictions. Chronic homelessness described a pattern of continuous stay in shelters extending over a year or more, generally by older individuals with mental illness. Ten percent of the individuals in Kuhn and Culhane's dataset experienced episodic homelessness, and the remaining ten percent were chronically homeless. The ten percent who experienced chronic homelessness consumed close to half of the emergency shelter bed nights, since they were present almost every night of the year, whereas other homeless individuals moved in and out of the system relatively quickly. While their study did not quantify the costs associated with each of these patterns of homelessness, the findings gave rise to a view among policymakers that communities could free shelter space and homeless system resources by identifying and addressing homelessness for the 10 to 20 percent of individuals who experienced episodic and chronic homelessness.

4.1.2 Mainstream Service Use by Homeless Individuals

Culhane, Metraux & Hadley (2002) also contributed to the literature on homelessness with a study of formerly homeless individuals with severe mental illness housed in permanent supportive housing in New York City, ("the NY/NY Cost Study"). Almost three-quarters of these individuals had used city-funded shelters within the two-year period prior to placement in permanent supportive housing, with an average shelter use of 137 days.¹ The study also found that these individuals experienced very high use of mainstream service systems (such as emergency rooms, inpatient psychiatric hospitals, and jails) in the two-year period prior to placement in permanent housing. The NY/NY study cohort incurred an average cost of $40,500 per year (Exhibit 4.1). In the absence of other research covering multiple mainstream programs used by homeless individuals, the costs associated with the two-years prior to placement in permanent supportive housing have become for many a proxy of the costs of chronic homelessness.

¹ A history of homelessness was an eligibility requirement for the study, so the other quarter of the study sample presumably had some type of homeless episode in non city-funded shelters prior to placement or spent time on the "streets".

Exhibit 4.1: NY/NY Cost Study Service Use during Two Year Period prior to Placement in Permanent Supportive Housing
	Average days during 2 yr period prior to placement	Per Diem	Cost for 2 Year Period prior to placement	Annualized Cost
City Homeless Services	137	$68	$9,316	$4,658
State Inpatient Psychiatric Hospitals	57.3	$437	$25,040	$12,520
City Inpatient Public Hospitals	16.5	$755	$12,458	$6,229
Medicaid (inpatient)	35.3	$657	$23,192	$11,596
Medicaid (outpatient)	62.2	$84	$5,225	$2,613
Veterans Affairs	7.8	$467	$3,643	$1,822
State Corrections	9.3	$79	$735	$368
City Corrections	10.0	$129	$1,290	$645
TOTAL			$80,899	$40,451

Source: Culhane et al., 2002

Other studies have shown that homeless people use emergency rooms at a much higher rate than the general population, attributing this greater use to many different factors, including a higher rate of assault-related and unintentional injuries, general poor health status, barriers to accessing routine healthcare, and a high rate of substance abuse and mental illness among homeless people (D'Amore, Hung, Chiang, & Goldfrank, 2001; Kushel, Vittinghoff & Haas, 2001; Mandelberg, Kuhn & Kohn, 2000; Padgett, Struening, Andrews, & Pittman, 1995). Kushel, Perry, Bangsberg, Clark and Moss (2002) analyzed a sample of 2,500 homeless and marginally housed adults in San Francisco and found that the 40 percent who went to the emergency room were more likely to be homeless rather than marginally housed, after controlling for other characteristics of study sample members. Kushel et al. (2002) also found that 8 percent of the study cohort visited emergency rooms four or more times within a year, accounting for 54.5 percent of all emergency room visits by the study sample. These high users also were more likely to be homeless than marginally housed. A 1998 study by Salit, Kuhn, Hartz, Vu and Mosso found that, after controlling for co-occurring substance abuse disorder or psychiatric disability and other patient characteristics, homeless patients had hospital stays 4.1 days (36 percent) longer than non-homeless patients. Folsom et al. (2005) found similar patterns of inpatient and crisis service use within the public mental health system. All of these findings suggest that homelessness is likely to be associated with high mainstream health costs.

Other studies have found a correlation between homelessness and involvement with the criminal justice system. Caton, Wilkins and Anderson (2007) cite findings of high rates of criminal history among individuals who experience long-term homelessness and suggest that the criminal justice system may be a safety net of sorts for individuals with severe mental illness who lack sufficient housing and treatment.

4.1.3 Opportunities for Cost Savings

With a growing body of research correlating costly mainstream system utilization with the chronic homelessness of people with significant levels of disability, policymakers and advocates became interested in understanding which interventions reduce the costs of mainstream system use associated with homelessness.

The NY/NY Cost Study concluded that placement in permanent supportive housing significantly reduced homeless and mainstream expenditures for formerly homeless, severely mentally ill individuals. This finding suggests that permanent supportive housing is an effective strategy to address chronic homelessness for persons with severe mental illness at little additional cost.² An experimental study of the cost-effectiveness of HUD-VA sponsored permanent supportive housing (VASH) for homeless veterans with severe mental illness (Rosenheck, Kaspro, Frisman, & Liu-Mares, 2003) found that the costs of permanent supportive housing were approximately 18 percent higher ($2,067 annually) than the costs of standard care. Higher costs were largely attributable to the additional intensive case management costs and increased outpatient treatment costs incurred by this group. Rosenheck et al. did not observe differences between the intervention groups (VASH intervention, case management only, and standard care) in VA or other system costs significant enough to achieve cost offsets; however, the housing outcomes were greater for supported housing study participants so the study concludes that the intervention was most likely cost-effective.³ Different methodologies between the Rosenheck et al. and Culhane et al. studies limit the ability to compare results.

In a paper synthesizing findings on cost effectiveness—Rosenheck (2000) observes that while mainstream service use is frequently positively associated with homelessness, not all persons who are homeless and mentally ill have high service use. Interventions that target directly those individuals with high service use can more easily show cost-effectiveness than those that serve a broad group of homeless mentally ill persons. Rosenheck points out that in the evaluation of two programs targeting persons who were homeless and mentally ill but not necessarily high service users, only 10 percent of participants had annual inpatient costs sufficient to offset the costs of the intervention.⁴ He concludes that, while cost offsets are achievable, resource-intensive interventions must be narrowly targeted to high service users to realize the savings.

These studies are just a few among a growing body of research on costs associated with individuals who are homeless with severe mental illness. In addition, many localities have conducted, with varying degrees of rigor, their own cost studies of individuals who are chronically homeless or individuals who are identified as frequent high-cost users. (See Culhane, Metraux, Park, Schretzman & Valente, 2007 for examples.) In many cases, this research has been used to build support and secure funding for interventions to assist individuals who may benefit from permanent supportive housing. The research has also left policymakers and advocates eager for parallel research on other populations.

² The NY/NY Cost Study found that the cost reductions in mainstream and homeless systems resulting from placement in permanent supportive housing were almost equal to the costs of providing the permanent supportive housing itself. This finding has fueled substantial investment in developing permanent supportive housing for chronically disabled homeless individuals around the country.

³ Cost-effectiveness is defined relative to societal value. In the absence of an established societal value for housing, Rosenheck reports cost-effectiveness for various monetary values.

⁴ The study evaluated the VA's Chronically Mentally Ill Veterans Program and the Access to Community Care and Effective Supportive Services Program evaluations. Rosenheck et al. measured fewer mainstream domains than Culhane et al. (2002) in the NY/NY Cost Study. With more comprehensive data, it is possible that more than 10 percent of participants would have realized cost savings equal or greater than the costs of the intervention.

Our study is intended to expand the base of knowledge on costs associated with other populations who experience homelessness, besides those with chronic patterns of homelessness or severe mental illness. Kuhn and Culhane (1998) noted that most other populations have relatively short episodes of homelessness and therefore can be expected to have much lower costs than those measured for homeless individuals with severe mental illness, but there has been little work to quantify the level and nature of those costs. This study examines first-time homelessness for individuals and the level of resources associated with their use of the homeless and mainstream systems in Jacksonville, Florida; Houston, Texas; and Des Moines, Iowa.⁵ While these results are not representative of the nation as a whole, they can help build our understanding of costs associated with homelessness to inform national and local policymaking.

4.2. Characteristics of First-time Homeless Individuals

We studied first-time homelessness among single adults in three study communities: Jacksonville, Florida; Houston, Texas; and Des Moines, Iowa.⁶ Across the three sites, we identified 7,502 individuals who became homeless for the first time between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005. More than half the study population was homeless in Houston, Texas. The characteristics of the study cohort in each site are shown in Exhibit 4.2.

Individuals who experienced first-time homelessness in the study communities were predominantly male, 73 to 81 percent across the three sites. On average, first-time homeless individuals were between 39 and 41 years of age at first program entry; only 15 to 18 percent were older than 50. In comparison to the national estimates in HUD's 2007 Annual Homeless Assessment Report (AHAR) (HUD, 2008), first-time homeless individuals in our three study sites were more likely to be male and somewhat younger. The AHAR estimates that the single adult homeless population who used emergency shelter or transitional housing is 69 percent male and that 24 percent are older than 50. The proportion of the study cohort that was African-American varied across the three communities, from 21 percent in Des Moines to 48 percent in Jacksonville to 57 percent in Houston.⁷

⁵ Past research has also found wide regional variations in costs of both homeless and mainstream services (Culhane et al., 2007).

⁶ Any adult who was served as part of a family at any time during the study period was not considered a single adult and was excluded from the study cohort. In Houston, these persons were studied as part of the family study cohort.

⁷ Information on ethnicity was missing from a high percentage of the HMIS records at our study sites. Therefore, ethnicity is not included in our demographic analysis. People who identified themselves as white and Hispanic were simply categorized as white.

Exhibit 4.2: Characteristics of the Study Cohort of Individuals Who Became Homeless between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005 as compared with National Estimates^a

	Size of Study Cohort	Women	African-American	Average Age	Age over 50 years
Jacksonville	1,972 persons	19%	48%	41 yrs	18%
Houston	4,406 persons	26%	57%	41 yrs	16%
Des Moines	1,124 persons	27%	21%	39 yrs	15%
National estimate ^b		31%	33%	N/A	24%

^a Percentages are based on sample members for whom we have data for the characteristic.

^b AHAR estimate for individuals who used emergency shelter or transitional housing between October 2006 and September 2007 (HUD, 2008).

Some of the differences between our study population and national estimates of the characteristics of homeless individuals may reflect differences among the three study sites and other communities or the fact that our study includes some individuals who used only outreach and some who used only permanent supportive housing programs, neither of which are included in the AHAR. However, the comparison with the AHAR estimates may also suggest differences between first-time homeless individuals (our study) and all homeless individuals (AHAR). In addition to describing the study cohort and placing it in a national context, demographic data about the study cohorts also were used to understand relationships between demographic characteristics and costs. Findings from multivariate regression analysis presented later in Section 4.3.2 show that higher homeless system costs are associated with being female, African-American, or older, even when controlling for homeless utilization patterns such as lengths of stay.

Section 4.3 focuses on utilization and costs of the homeless system itself; costs of mainstream services are discussed in Section 4.4.

4.3. Patterns of First-Time Homelessness and Associated Homeless System Costs

4.3.1 Homeless System Utilization

As shown in Exhibit 4.3, we found that more than half of the study cohort experiencing homelessness stayed “in the system” for substantially less than one month. The median length of time spent in homeless residential programs was 2 days in Houston, 10 days in Jacksonville, and just over 3 weeks in Des Moines. Average lengths of stay are longer than these medians: almost 6 weeks in Houston, 8 weeks in Jacksonville, and just over 10 weeks in Des Moines. The differences between the median and average lengths of stay reflect the skewed distribution of the homeless experience for individuals. While half of the first-time homeless population in Houston spends only a couple of days in homeless programs over an 18-month period, a sizable population has very long lengths of stay that substantially increase the average. As we show in the next section, costs for individuals in our study communities are similarly skewed. This finding on patterns of homelessness confirms the research by Kuhn and Culhane (1998) on patterns of homeless service utilization, extends those conclusions to communities other than New York and Philadelphia, and provides an important context for understanding the costs associated with homeless individuals. Local communities, such as Columbus

Ohio, have analyzed their own HMIS data and found similarly skewed patterns of use of the homeless services system.

Exhibit 4.3: Use of the Homeless System by the Study Cohorts of First-Time Homeless Individuals During an 18-Month Period
	Average Days in Homeless Programs	Median Days in Homeless Programs	% of Cohort with One Program Stay	Average Number of Program Stays	Average “Gap Days” Between Stays
Jacksonville	57 days	10 days	50%	3 Stays	75 days
Houston	39 days	2 days	65%	3 Stays	44 days
Des Moines	73 days	24 days	53%	3 Stays	63 days

In addition to lengths of stay, other patterns also show a dramatically skewed distribution of the homeless experience. The average number of program stays (continuous days in a particular program) across the sites was three, as shown by Exhibit 4.3, but at least 50 percent of the cohort had only one stay, and the remainder of the cohort in each site averaged five or more stays.⁸ The “gap days” shown in the exhibit (days during the entire period of homelessness when an individual was not in a residential homeless program) are, by definition, associated with individuals with more than one stay and show that those with more than one stay were not just bouncing among residential homeless programs from one day to the next. In many cases, months elapsed between when an individual exited one program and when he entered another program. We cannot tell whether any particular individual was homeless on the streets during “gap,” living in his own housing unit, unstably housed with friends or family, or in an inpatient or institutional program.⁹

Multivariate regression analysis with covariates for demographic characteristics, program type, and sites was used to understand the factors that drive longer cumulative lengths of stay in homeless residential programs for the 7,502 individuals in the study cohort. The model’s results are presented in Exhibit 4.4.¹⁰ When multiplied by 100, the coefficients for the covariates can be interpreted as percentage differences in the number of days spent in homeless programs from the reference category because the outcome variable is in logarithm scale.

⁸ For purposes of this study, a stay is defined by continuous residence in a specific program. A new stay is counted each time the person enrolls in a new program. A “stay” is not to be confused with an “episode” as defined by Kuhn and Culhane (1998) as residence in homeless programs with gaps no longer than 30 days.

⁹ Some of these “gaps” may also represent incomplete data, since not every homeless program enters data about their clients in the HMIS.

¹⁰ See Appendix C.2.1, Model 2, for more detailed multivariate regression analysis results, including a model without the program type variable.

Individuals using both emergency shelter and transitional housing stayed more than 3 times longer than people who used only emergency shelter, the omitted category.¹¹ Individuals using only transitional housing stayed about 3 times longer. People served by outreach¹² or permanent supportive housing programs alone or in combination with emergency shelter or transitional housing stayed more than twice as long as those who used only emergency shelter. The shorter lengths of stays for people who use only emergency shelters likely reflect both the shorter-term nature of their need for residential assistance and the environment and design of most emergency programs, which encourage shorter stays or have explicit limits on days that can be spent in shelter. Shorter stays result in lower costs, as will be detailed in the next section.

The model results also highlight the influence of the nature and composition of the homeless services system at each site. After controlling for the program type used and demographics, individuals in Des Moines stayed 23 percent longer in homeless programs than individuals in Jacksonville (the reference category). Many members of the study cohort in Des Moines used a form of transitional housing in which residents have private living space and lengths of stay that suggest that outplacements to mainstream permanent housing are not a high priority for the programs. Everything else being equal, individuals in Houston stayed 47 percent fewer days in homeless programs

Exhibit 4.4. Regression Analysis of Lengths of Stay for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Des Moines, Houston, and Jacksonville

Explanatory Variables	Total Days Spent in Homeless Programs (log scale)
Types of Homeless Programs Used+
Only Used TH Programs	2.029 (0.063)
Used both ES and TH Programs	2.294 (0.088)
Used Other Program Types or Combinations ^a	1.261 (0.067)
Site Variables+
Iowa	0.227 (0.061)
Houston	-0.465 (0.046)
Demographics+
Age 18 – 24	-0.232 (0.075)
Age 25 – 30	-0.043 (0.070)
Age 41 – 50	0.190 (0.051)
Age 51 and over	0.261 (0.062)
Female	0.735 (0.047)
African-American	0.300 (0.040)
Other Races	0.100 (0.080)
Constant	1.685 (0.054)
Observations	7502
R-squared	0.36

+ Reference categories are: Used ES Only, Jacksonville, Age 31 – 40, Male, White.

Standard errors in parentheses. * significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%

Definitions: ES is emergency shelter, TH is transitional housing, and PSH is permanent supportive housing.

^aUsed Outreach Alone, Used PSH Alone, Used Outreach or PSH in Combination with ES or TH

¹¹ The coefficient of 2.294 indicates that these individuals spend 2.3 additional days for each reference day, or 3.3 times the reference category.

¹² In an attempt to capture the period of time that people experienced homelessness on the streets as part of length of homelessness calculations, each contact with a street outreach team was counted as one-day of homelessness—equivalent to a one-day program stay in a residential program—unless the contact was made on a day that the individual stayed in a residential homeless program, in which case the outreach contact was disregarded for length of stay calculations.

than individuals in Jacksonville. This probably reflects the time limits imposed on individuals in some of the emergency shelters and the fact that many individuals who were identified on the street did not use residential programs. Thus, individual program environments and rules may substantially influence lengths of stay. It is important to recall that this study does not measure the benefits of stays in the homeless services system, so we cannot say whether shorter or longer lengths of stay are positive or negative or whether the costs associated with these stays are worth the investment.

Ways in which the utilization of homeless programs varies by gender and race also are shown in Exhibit 4.4 and discussed below, along with cost variations by gender and race, in Section 4.3.3.

4.3.2 Costs to Homeless System of First-time Homelessness

The cost to the homeless services system for serving each first-time homeless individual is the sum of the costs of each program stay. The cost of each stay is the daily cost of the particular program used by the individual times the number of days in the stay. Daily costs varied tremendously from one program to the next. Differences in daily costs of programs used by members of the cohort generally explain differences in homeless costs from one person to another for individuals with otherwise similar patterns of homeless system use. (See Chapter 3 for a discussion of variations in the costs of homeless programs by site and program type.)

On average, individuals incurred $2,101 in homeless system costs across the three study sites. The average homeless system cost incurred for each individual homeless person in the study cohort is similar in Houston and Des Moines ($2,257 and $2,308) and somewhat lower in Jacksonville ($1,634).

Exhibit 4.5: Average Homeless System Cost per Individual
	Jacksonville	Houston	Des Moines
Average Cost per Individual	$1,634	$2,257	$2,308

Houston and Des Moines have similar average costs per first-time homeless individuals, despite having very different lengths of stay. Houston’s shorter lengths of stay than Des Moines are offset by the higher daily program costs of the program types used by the Houston study cohort. Though average lengths of stay in Jacksonville were only slightly lower than the average for Des Moines, the Jacksonville cohort spent over half of its days in emergency shelter at an average cost of $29 per day; whereas the Des Moines cohort spent over half of its days in transitional housing with individual rooms at an average daily cost of $43 per day.

Average costs offer a general picture of the costs associated with homelessness, but they obscure important information about the wide variation in costs associated with first-time homelessness. Only a small group of homeless individuals incurred high costs at each site, while the majority had minimal costs. The half of the cohort with the lowest homeless system costs incurred only 2 to 3 percent of the total homeless system costs; whereas the highest-cost 10 percent of the cohort incurred 62 percent of the homeless system costs in Jacksonville, 70 percent in Des Moines, and 83 percent in Houston. As was discussed extensively in Chapter 3, transitional housing for individuals is more expensive on average than other program types, and programmatic factors also encourage longer lengths of stay, also driving up the costs for individuals who use transitional housing. Thus, it is not surprising that the cost to the homeless services system of the most expensive 10 percent of individuals in the study cohort at each site generally reflects continuous use of expensive transitional housing programs for much or all of the 18-month observation period.

A multivariate regression model was also used to identify the relationship of different factors, including length of stay, to total homeless system costs per person (Exhibit 4.6) to better understand what is underlying the wide distribution of costs. The model R-squared statistics of 0.68, meaning that the set of explanatory variables used in the model was able to account for 68 percent of the variation in costs.

The model results suggest that, for these study cohorts of first-time homeless individuals, the influence on total cost per individual of the program type used is much greater than the influence of staying in the program for an additional month. Each additional month adds only 35 percent to the cost per individual, whereas using transitional housing (alone or in combination with emergency shelter) more than doubles an individual's total cost. Once both length of stay and program type are taken into account, the community in which the individual becomes homeless has no significant effect on the total cost per individual.

In addition to the length of stay and the type of program used, additional stays and the greater lengths of time between stays were both also associated with increased costs, but only with small increases.

4.3.3 Variations in Homeless System Utilization and Costs by Gender, Race, and Age

The multivariate analysis that predicts lengths of stay (Exhibit 4.4) shows that women stay in homeless programs 74 percent longer than single men. An alternative model specification excluding the program type covariate shows that women have 38 percent fewer distinct

Exhibit 4.6. Regression Analysis of Total Homeless System Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Des Moines, Houston, and Jacksonville

Explanatory Variables	Total Homeless Costs (log scale)
Type of Homeless Program Used+
Only Used TH	1.299 (0.049)
Only Used ES and TH Programs	1.114 (0.067)
Used Other Program Types or Combinations ^a	0.793 (0.051)
Site Variables+
Iowa	0.068 (0.045)
Houston	0.012 (0.033)
Homeless System Utilization
Number of Homeless Program Stays	0.037 (0.003)
Length of Stay (in months)	0.351 (0.005)
Homeless Gap Days (in months)	0.073 (0.004)
Demographics+
Age 18 – 24	0.074 (0.055)
Age 25 – 30	0.105 (0.051)
Age 41 – 50	0.098 (0.037)
Age 51 and over	0.098 (0.046)
Female	0.974 (0.035)
African-American	0.192 (0.030)
Other Races	0.051 (0.059)
Constant	3.953 (0.041)
Observations	7,502
R-squared	0.68

+ Reference categories are: Used ES Only, Jacksonville, Age 31 – 40, Male, White.

Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

^aUsed Outreach Alone, Used PSH Alone, Used Outreach or PSH in Combination with ES or TH

stays.¹³ This may reflect the different causes of homelessness for men and women. Men may be more likely to be asked to leave housing shared with family or friends due to disputes than women, resulting in short-term but repeated shelter stays. Or, alternatively, men may be more willing to leave unappealing shelter conditions for the streets. With longer lengths of stay, it is not surprising that women are also associated with higher homeless system costs. However even controlling for length of stay, being female is associated with 97 percent greater homeless system costs than being male, as shown in the model in Exhibit 4.6. Both the longer lengths of stay and higher costs are most likely a reflection of the specific homeless programs used by females.

As was discussed in Chapter 3, emergency shelters that serve women are more likely to be 24-hour, full-service shelters rather than overnight shelters, which have much lower daily costs. In addition, some women stay in service-intensive programs that also serve families. These programs have higher costs per day on average than those that exclusively serve single adult populations. Like single women, families tend to have fewer distinct stays, but their cumulative lengths of stay are longer on average than those of men. These similarities may be a reflection of the program influences, if single women and families are frequently served within the same setting, or they may reflect that the needs and decisions of single women are more similar to women with children than they are to single men.

Less dramatic, although still statistically significant, the models presented in Exhibits 4.4 and 4.6 also show that African-Americans have 30 percent longer stays than whites and 19 percent greater costs than whites after controlling for lengths of stay and program types. Again, the higher costs after controlling for lengths of stay probably reflect the fact that African-Americans used programs with more expensive daily costs than those used by whites within each program type. Nothing from our review of homeless programs suggests that certain programs encourage those who are African-American to stay in programs longer or that the homeless services system encourages African-Americans to use more expensive programs. However, African-Americans also have 14 percent more stays than Whites, which may also contribute to the greater cumulative number of days in homeless programs. Reasons related to the circumstances that led to homelessness, reduced housing stability after exit from a residential program for homeless people, more limited access to informal or formal supports, and greater involvement with criminal justice or other mainstream systems may help to explain the longer lengths of stay and more frequent stays for African American individuals.

Finally, the length-of-stay model (Exhibit 4.4) shows that relatively older individuals have longer stays than younger persons.¹⁴ For example, relative to the 31 to 40 year olds in the study population, individuals between the ages of 18 and 24 have stays 23 percent shorter, 41 to 50 years olds stay 19 percent longer, and individuals 51 and older stay 26 percent longer. Although this study examined only individuals who experienced homelessness for the first-time, the finding that longer lengths of stay are associated with older individuals is consistent with Kuhn and Culhane's (1998) research, which found that individuals who were chronically homeless were older than other homeless groups. The longer lengths of stay for older adults may be a function of age-related disabilities and associated barriers to housing stability, barriers to employment, or more fractured family relationships. Conversely, younger adults may have shorter lengths of stay related to the circumstances that led to their homelessness (e.g., if they became homeless due to family conflict or temporary income loss), have fewer employment barriers, have fewer long-term disabilities, or have greater access to family and other support networks that may be able to help resolve their homelessness. Older adults also have 10 percent greater costs than the 31 to 40 year old group after controlling for length of stay and program type, potentially attributable to residence in relatively more expensive programs within the transitional or permanent supportive housing program types. Somewhat counter-intuitively, the slightly younger group of 25 to 30 year olds was also associated with 11 percent higher costs. Again, this is likely a reflection of the specific programs used by this group. For instance, in Des Moines individuals who used only the more expensive form of transitional housing were younger than those who used other program types.

¹³ For details of the models that predict numbers of stays and gap days, see Appendix C.2.2.

¹⁴ In this study cohort, as in the homeless population in general (HUD, 2008), few people are elderly, that is, 62 or older.

4.3.4 Costs for “Path” Groups: Individuals Who Use the Homeless System in Similar Ways

To better understand the heterogeneity of the homeless experience and its associated costs, we used multivariate cluster analysis to categorize individuals into “path groups” based on their lengths of stay, number of stays, length of gaps between stays, and the types and sequences of programs used. Cluster analysis was conducted independently for each site.

The following path groups emerged that described similar patterns of use across all three sites, representing 79 to 94 percent of the study cohort in each site:

- Emergency Shelter Short Stayers
- Emergency Shelter Long Gappers
- Sequential Program Users
- Circling Program Users

Exhibit 4.7 briefly describes each of these four common patterns of use of the homeless services system by first-time homeless individuals and shows the relative size of each group within each site.¹⁵ Each of the path groups making up these common patterns is discussed in more depth in the text that follows, followed by discussion of path groups unique to particular sites. Data on all path groups for each of the three sites are provided in Appendix 4.7.

¹⁵ For purposes of this section, the universe of individuals in the Houston study cohort is 3,535 adults. The full Houston study cohort of 4,406 individuals included 871 adults who were only found on the streets; who have been excluded from the discussion of path groups. The HMIS lacked identifiers for a large percentage of these individuals, and, therefore, it was not possible to determine if any of these people also used other programs.

Exhibit 4.7: Path Groups Common to All Three Sites and their Relative Sizes

Common Path Groups	Brief Description	Jacksonville (% of Study Cohort)	Houston (% of Study Cohort)^a	Des Moines (% of Study Cohort)
Emergency Shelter Short Stayers	Used only emergency shelter, 1 or 2 brief stays totaling 1 to 3 weeks.	66%	65%	57%
Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	Used emergency shelter only, 7 to 40 times over 13 months, though only 1 to 5 months actually spent in shelter.	10%	10%	14%
Sequential Program Users	Used at least 2 program types (in this sequence): emergency shelter, transitional housing, and/or permanent housing.	12%	3%	4%
Circling Program Users	Used transitional housing or permanent supportive housing and later returned to emergency shelter.	7%	2%	4%
Total % of Study Cohort represented by these Common Path Groups in each Site		95%	80%	79%

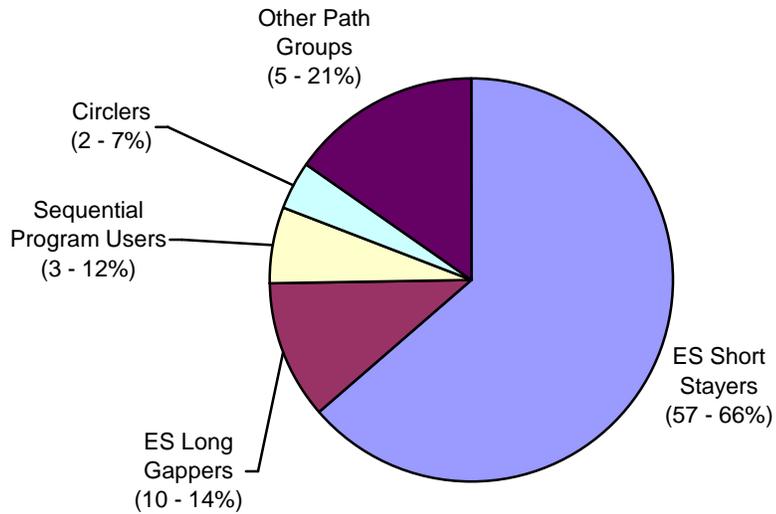

^aPercentages exclude the portion of the Houston Study Cohort that was only found on the streets.

The Emergency Shelter (ES) Short Stayers path group represents the majority of the study cohort of first-time homeless individuals in each site. The Sequential Program Users and Circling Program Users are the only two path groups that involve use of multiple program types, including those not combined into these common path groups. This means that 81 percent of individuals in Jacksonville, 92 percent of individuals in Des Moines, and 95 percent of individuals in Houston used only one type of homeless program over an 18-month period.

Very few individuals in our study cohort ever used permanent supportive housing. This may be because most people using permanent supportive housing programs were excluded from this study since they were homeless prior to the start of the study. Also, capacity of permanent supportive housing may be limited enough that turnover may not be sufficient to accommodate continued demand from individuals with chronic disabilities who become newly homeless.

The common path groups are shown graphically in Exhibit 4.8.¹⁶

Exhibit 4.8: Proportion of Study Cohort Represented by Common Path Groups

The groups are characterized by differences in their patterns of use of the homeless services system, but analysis of their demographic characteristics and mainstream program involvement¹⁷ help to describe further the differences among these common path groups. (Exhibit 4.9)

¹⁶ The pie chart is intended only to illustrate the relative size of each path group and should not be interpreted literally. The size of pie chart represents the size of the path group averaged across the three sites.

¹⁷ Based on mainstream domains collected in Jacksonville (Medicaid, mental health, substance abuse, entitlements, and jail) and Houston (mental health, City and County jail).

Exhibit 4.9: Characteristics of Individuals in Common Path Groups

Common Path Groups	Jacksonville	Houston	Des Moines
ES Short Stayers	Relatively fewer women Slightly fewer African Americans Relatively younger Average healthcare use Less substance abuse and criminal justice involvement	Very few women Fewer African-Americans Relatively younger adults Lowest rates of mental health care Lowest rates of criminal justice involvement	Not demographically distinct from other common path groups
ES Long Gappers	Almost no women More likely to be African-American Lowest rates of Medicaid managed care Highest criminal justice involvement	Very few women Slightly more African-Americans Slightly older (Frequent ES Longer Gappers much older) Fairly high mental health use High rates of criminal justice involvement	Not distinct from other path groups in percent women and African American Younger than other common path groups
Sequential Program Users	Relatively more women Fewer African-Americans Slightly older High use of Food Stamps Highest rates of mental health and substance abuse treatment prior to homelessness Low criminal justice involvement	Relatively more women Slightly more African-Americans Slightly older Moderate rates of mental health care Moderate criminal justice involvement	Relatively fewer women Oldest path group
Circlers	More likely to be African-American Slightly older Moderate use of mental health care, lower use of other healthcare High criminal justice involvement	Predominately women Slightly more African-Americans Slightly younger Highest rates of mental health care and State mental health Inpatient hospitalization Highest rates of criminal justice involvement	Very few women Older adults

Path Groups Using Only Emergency Shelter

Two of the common path groups describe individuals who only use emergency shelter: Short Stayers and Long Gappers. These two groups represent roughly three-quarters of each homeless individual study cohort.

Emergency Shelter Short Stayers are by far the largest path group in each of the three sites, representing 57 to 68 percent of each study cohort (Exhibit 4.7). Emergency Shelter Short Stayers use only emergency shelter and have one or two brief stays, totaling one to three weeks. In Des Moines, the demographic characteristics of this group do not appear substantially different from those of the other path groups, but in Jacksonville and Houston this group is younger (20 to 23 percent of the group are 30 years or younger), has fewer women, and has a slightly higher proportion of whites than other groups. In Jacksonville, this group had the lowest rates of substance abuse; in Houston, this group had the lowest rate of mental health system involvement and criminal justice involvement. Not surprisingly, this group incurs minimal homeless system costs, averaging only $321 to $686 total per person over the 18-month period (Exhibit 4.10). Despite the large size of this path group, the total homeless system costs associated with Emergency Shelter Short Stayers is disproportionately small, representing only 8 percent of the total homeless costs for the cohort in Des Moines and in Houston and 28 percent in Jacksonville.

All three sites had a sizable group, 10 to 14 percent, that stayed in emergency shelter an average of 7 to 11 times over the course of a year, but spent an average of only 23 to 124 cumulative nights in shelter (Exhibit 4.7).¹⁸ These are referred to as Emergency Shelter Long Gappers because of the long gaps between shelter stays. A small number of individuals within this group in Houston had a huge number of stays (more than 40 brief stays with gaps averaging less than a week between stays), and this group is much older than the study cohort as a whole or the other Houston Long Gapper Groups (Appendix C.1.2). Emergency Shelter Long Gappers are almost entirely male (95 percent in Jacksonville, 90 percent in Houston, and 72 percent in Des Moines), and slightly more likely than members of other path groups to be African-American. In Houston, more than a third of this group had mental health involvement, and more than a quarter had criminal justice involvement. In Jacksonville, this group had very high criminal justice involvement (62 percent). These individuals also had involvement in substance abuse and mental health treatment (26 and 21 percent), although other path groups had similar treatment rates. Even though individuals in this group experienced homelessness on and off for a full year, their total homeless system costs averaged only $910 to $2,494 per person since most of that time was not spent in shelter (Exhibit 4.10).

The cost variations for these two groups, all of whom used emergency shelter exclusively, relate primarily to the sheer differences in lengths of stay. However, another key cost driver is the cost per day of the programs used by each group. The total homeless system costs for Emergency Shelter Long Gappers represent 5 to 10 percent of the each study cohort's costs, slightly lower than the proportion of the study cohort they represent.

¹⁸ Although this study examined first-time homeless individuals, a number of individuals we studied such as members of this path group experienced patterns of chronic homelessness over time.

Path Groups Using Multiple Program Types

The other two common path groups describe individuals who used multiple types of programs either sequentially or in a circling fashion, using transitional or permanent housing and later circling back to emergency shelter.

Sequential Users, 3 to 12 percent of the study cohort at each site, used a combination of emergency shelter, transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing programs. Not all individuals used all three program types, but those they used were accessed in the emergency-transitional-permanent sequence. Jacksonville had two groups of Sequential Users: short stayers with an average of two stays totaling two months, and long stayers with an average of six stays totaling more than a year. In Houston and Des Moines, Sequential Users stayed an average of six and nine months over three and four stays respectively. Individuals generally had cumulative gaps of more than one month between stays (Appendix C.1 tables). In all three sites, more than half of this group's days in homeless programs were spent in transitional housing.

In Jacksonville, the combined Sequential Users groups were almost one-third female. The Sequential Long Stayers group had an average age of 47 years—the oldest of all of the path groups, although similar to Permanent Housing Long Stayers. More than 30 percent of Jacksonville's Sequential Users were shown by the match with mainstream data to have received substance abuse treatment, compared with an average of 22 percent for the Jacksonville cohort as a whole.

In Houston, almost half of Sequential Users were female, and almost 20 percent were over 50 years of age, compared with a cohort average of 12 percent. The Houston transitional housing system offers many possibilities for single women, including access to much of the scattered site transitional stock offered in conjunction with family programs. This helps explain the high percentage of women in Houston path groups that used programs other than emergency shelter.

The average homeless system cost in Jacksonville for Sequential Users was $1,585 for Sequential User Short Stayers and $10,416 for Sequential User Long Stayers. The figure for Long Stayers can be compared with the average total cost per person of $8,539 for Sequential Users in Des Moines and $14,418 in Houston. The costs for Sequential User Long Stayers were the highest of all path groups in Jacksonville and Houston, and in Des Moines the costs for Sequential Users were outpaced only by a path group that used only transitional housing (Exhibit 4.10). The total costs for Sequential Users represents 13 to 22 percent of the cohort's total homeless costs, two to four times higher than the proportion of the cohort they represent.

The high costs for the Sequential Users were driven both by the long lengths of stay and by the high percentage of nights (59 percent to 84 percent) that this group spends in transitional housing programs. Transitional housing for individuals has high costs in all sites compared with other program types (see Chapter 3 for further discussion), although particular programs of other types used by this path group are also expensive: for example, extended stay emergency shelter and permanent supportive housing with intensive services.

Circlers, 2 to 7 percent of the study cohort in each site, are individuals who used transitional housing or permanent supportive housing and later returned to emergency shelter. By definition, individuals in this group used more than one program type and, therefore had multiple stays. On average, each person had three stays in Houston, seven in Des Moines, and eight in Jacksonville. The cumulative length of gaps between stays is similar to the length of time actually spent in programs (Appendix 5.x). Circlers do not appear have distinguishing demographic characteristics that might help to identify them when they first enter the homeless services system. In Houston they were predominately women and slightly younger, while in Des Moines very few were women and they were relatively older than other path groups. In Jacksonville, Circlers had low rates of access to medical care (15 percent), high mental health involvement (30 percent), and high criminal justice involvement (44 percent). For Houston, Circlers had the highest rates of mental health (48 percent) and criminal justice (27 percent) involvement of all path groups. We do not have enough information to draw conclusions about why these individuals returned to shelter. For instance, the individuals may have been terminated from a transitional or permanent housing program without finding sustainable long-term housing or may have experienced barriers accessing appropriate permanent housing related to their mental health or criminal history. Alternatively, they may have had involvement with inpatient treatment or jail that disrupted housing and resulted in repeat homelessness.

The group had average homeless system costs of $3,987 in Jacksonville, $6,374 in Des Moines, and $10,705 in Houston (Exhibit 4.10). In Jacksonville, the Circlers represented 18 percent of total cohort costs though the path group only comprised 7 percent of the cohort's population. The Des Moines Circlers represent only 4 percent of the cohort but incurred 12 percent of the cohort's total costs, and the Houston Circlers represent only 2 percent of the cohort but incurred 9 percent of the total costs.

Length of stay is a key factor driving this group's costs, but it does not explain the difference in costs across the sites. Houston's costs were significantly higher than Jacksonville's, in large part because the daily costs of the specific programs used by the individuals in this path group were higher and partly because the Houston group spent 89 percent of nights in extended emergency shelter, transitional housing and higher cost permanent supportive housing programs, whereas Jacksonville's cohort spent only 59 percent of nights in more expensive transitional or permanent programs. Des Moines Circlers' costs were higher than Jacksonville's in part because this path group spent 76 percent of its sheltered homeless days in transitional programs and more than half of its transitional housing days in the more expensive of the two transitional housing program models. (More detail about the costs of these models can be found in Chapter 3.)

Other Path Groups

The remaining portion of each site's study cohort was represented by path groups with other patterns. These groups all represent individuals who used a single program type for extended periods, and as a result, most are fairly high cost groups. However, the types of programs each group used differed, so they are described individually for each site. Very few individuals in this study used permanent supportive housing, either immediately upon entering the homeless services system or after a stay in emergency shelter or transitional housing.

Jacksonville Emergency Shelter Long Stayers. This group represents only 2 percent of the Jacksonville cohort, but they had almost year-long continuous stays in emergency shelter. The Emergency Shelter Long Stayers are the only path group across all three sites with patterns of homelessness consistent with Kuhn and Culhane's original chronically homeless group (Kuhn & Culhane, 1998), though not all members of this group would meet HUD's current definition of chronically homeless which has a disability component.¹⁹ While the size of this group is smaller than the percent identified by Kuhn and Culhane, the Jacksonville cohort only includes first-time homeless individuals; thus, one would not expect to find a sizable chronically homeless population. Rather, the small size of this path group may provide an indication of the proportion of first-time homeless individuals who may continuously use emergency shelters without an appropriate re-housing intervention.

¹⁹ HUD's definition of chronic homelessness also incorporates Kuhn and Culhane's episodically homeless, which is more parallel to the Emergency Shelter Long Gappers.

In contrast to the study cohort as a whole, 54 percent of emergency shelter long stayers were female, and the group had the highest percentage of African Americans, 73 percent, compared with 47 percent for the Jacksonville study cohort as a whole. Compared with other first-time homeless individuals in Jacksonville, members of this group were more likely to receive income support from the Food Stamps program prior to homelessness (48 percent) or during their long stays in shelter (77 percent), but this does not appear to have helped them avoid homelessness or leave it quickly. Their use of mainstream systems suggests that medical illness may have contributed to their extended homelessness. Their rate of involvement with the criminal justice system was low (Appendix C.1.1).

The cost to the homeless system to house these individuals was very high, $9,756 per person (Exhibit 4.10). Yet, due to the small size of the group, their total cost to the homeless services system was modest, representing 13 percent of the cohort's total costs. The average cost per Emergency Shelter Long Stayer is equivalent to 15 months of maximum rent subsidy at the FY2006 Fair Market Rent of $643 per month for a one-bedroom unit (HUD, 2005) (Exhibit 4.11). Given the pattern of long-term homelessness that emerged over the 18-month observation period and the high costs associated with individuals in this group, an alternative permanent housing intervention may be a more appropriate intervention for this group than shelter.

Jacksonville Permanent Supportive Housing Long Stayers spent an average of one year in residential homeless programs, primarily in permanent supportive housing. This group was about one-third female, compared to 20 percent for the study cohort as a whole, and a similar percentage was more than 50 years old, much higher than in any other path group in Jacksonville. Not surprisingly, for a group that used mainly programs available only to persons with disabilities, their rates of use of mental health and substance abuse treatment were high (Appendix C.1.1). The homeless services system incurred approximately $8,500 per person for this group (Exhibit 4.10), slightly greater than a maximum annual rent subsidy based on the Fair Market Rent. Permanent Supportive Housing Long Stayers represent 15 percent of the total Jacksonville cohort's homeless system costs, though these individuals represent only 3 percent of the overall cohort. Most of these expenses were incurred for project-based SRO housing or Shelter Plus Care vouchers, so conceptually these costs to the residential system for homeless people are essentially equivalent to paying rent in the private market and therefore are quite different from the residential homeless system costs incurred on behalf of other path groups. Most of the services associated with these units were provided through relationships with mainstream providers and may be reflected in the mainstream service system costs incurred for this path group or may not be fully captured.

Houston Users of Extended Stay Emergency Shelter. In Houston, 3 percent of the study cohort used extended stay emergency shelter programs for an average of 158 days, slightly more than 5 months. This subset had average per person homeless system costs of $10,540. Extended stay programs are a hybrid model that provide clients a greater level of privacy and have a wider array of services than the shorter-stay model, in many ways paralleling the environment and programming provided at a transitional housing program. They are more expensive than less service-rich emergency shelters. The Extended Stay programs are primarily targeted to women with a history of substance abuse. Fifty-five percent of the people in this group were women, and 69 percent were African American.

Houston Users of Transitional or Permanent Supportive Housing Only. In Houston, 16 percent of the study cohort went directly to transitional housing or to permanent supportive housing. These individuals were mainly women (77 percent), in sharp contrast to the users of transitional or permanent supportive housing programs who arrived there sequentially or who used them and then “circled” back to emergency shelter. This group is somewhat less likely to be African American than the study cohort as a whole. Their use of mental health care and encounters with the criminal justice system were not different from the study cohort as a whole. Their lengths of stay in the residential system for homeless people were slightly lower than Sequential Users or Circlers in Houston, and their costs to the homeless services system were slightly lower, $8,799 on average (Exhibit 4.10). Nonetheless the average costs per person are still very high compared with the average cost per person of $2,257 for the cohort overall. This path group represented the majority (52 percent) of homeless costs within Houston, substantially larger than the proportion of the cohort (16 percent) they represent.

Des Moines Transitional Housing Only, Shared Rooms. In Des Moines, 13 percent of the study cohort used transitional housing provided in shared rooms and, therefore, with relatively little privacy. This group was 42 percent female (compared with 27 percent for the study cohort as a whole) and less likely to be African American (12 vs. 21 percent). They were somewhat younger than the study cohort as a whole and stayed an average of just over 4 months (133 days), substantially less than Sequential Users, Circlers, or those who used only Transitional Housing provided in independent rooms, described below. We have no mainstream data for Des Moines from which to speculate further on the possible causes of their homelessness or the way in which they were served by transitional housing. However, one of the shared room transitional housing programs in Des Moines serves women who have recently been incarcerated. The average total cost to the homeless services system for members of this group is only $3,103 (Exhibit 4.10), reflecting their use of a relatively low cost model for transitional housing for a relatively short period of time. Because of the relatively low costs per person, this group was associated with only 18 percent of the homeless system costs incurred by the cohort, a proportion only slightly higher than the size of the path group.

Des Moines Transitional Housing Only, Independent Rooms. Eight (8) percent of the study cohort in Des Moines used only a form of transitional housing that provides private rooms to clients. This group had lengths of stay averaging almost 8 months (237 days), perhaps due to the higher levels of privacy and relative independence provided to this group. Members of this path group were predominately male (85 percent compared to 73 percent of the study cohort as a whole), but similar to the rest of the study cohort in other respects. Given the long lengths of stay for this group and their use of an expensive type of transitional housing (see Chapter 3), they had the highest cost per person of any path group in Des Moines, $11,731 (Exhibit 4.10). Cumulatively, they incurred 42 percent of the total homeless costs for the Des Moines cohort even though the group comprised only 8 percent of the cohort.

The average per person costs for individuals in each path group are shown in Exhibit 4.10.

Exhibit 4.10 Average Homeless System Costs Per Person By Path Group
	ES Short Stayers	ES Long Gappers	Sequential Users	Circling Users	Other Path Groups	Average for Overall Cohort
Jacksonville	$686	$910	$1,585 Short Stayers	$3,987	$8,493 PSH Long Stayers	$1,634
			$10,416 Long Stayers		$9,756 ES Long Stayers
Houston	$353	$880 ES Long Gappers	$14,418	$10,705	$8,799 TH or PSH Only	$2,257
		$2,494 Frequent ES Long Gappers
Des Moines	$321	$1,224	$8,539	$6,374	$3,103 TH – Shared Rm	$2,308
					$11,731 TH – Indiv Rm

Exhibit 4.10 clearly illustrates the range of average homeless system costs per person for each of the path groups, as discussed in the previous section. The highest cost path groups (long stayers in expensive programs) in each of the three sites had average costs per person 15 to 41 times the average costs per person of the lowest cost path group, Emergency Shelter Short Stayers. Since path groups correspond strongly with costs, policymakers could use information like this to determine how much they could invest in alternative interventions for different path groups while staying cost-neutral. This could be as simple as assessing whether there are less expensive ways of delivering similar services to single women, who are frequently served in a higher-cost family program environment.

For higher cost path groups, the CoC could also assess the level of housing and service assistance currently provided to long stayers relative to alternative interventions. Fair Market Rents (Exhibit 4.11) represent the equivalent of funding a deep rental subsidy for an individual for a month. For example, Jacksonville could fund a rental subsidy for 16 months with the resources currently spent on average to house a Sequential Long Stayer in homeless programs for one year. To determine the relative cost-effectiveness of the current strategy to alternative interventions, policymakers can compare the costs and long-term outcomes of the housing assistance and services provided to Sequential Long Stayers in these programs with the costs and outcomes that might be achieved by using these funds to support alternative interventions, such as a rental subsidy.

Exhibit 4.11: 2006 Fair Market Rent for One-bedroom Unit in Individual Study Sites

	Jacksonville MSA	Houston MSA	Des Moines MSA
2006 Fair Market Rents: monthly rent for one-bedroom ^a	$643	$612	$549

^a FMR Source: HUD, 2005. The FMR does not include the monthly fee paid to a public housing agency for administering the voucher program, which was about $58 per unit per month in these three communities. (HUD, 2007)

Thus, an important policy question is whether there is alternative prevention, housing, or other homeless interventions that could be offered at similar or lower costs that would achieve improved outcomes or be preferable for other moral, programmatic, or policy reasons? If the response is affirmative, then in addition to developing the alternative interventions, the CoC would also need to identify the individuals that need to be assisted differently. The path group analysis provided in this section provides some clues about what to look for in an assessment process, though more research in this area is needed.

A related finding is that all program types and all programs within each type do not have equal costs; thus, long-stayers do not have universally high-costs. For example, Jacksonville’s Emergency Shelter Long Stayers (the group with homeless system use most comparable to Kuhn and Culhane’s chronically homeless cluster) have lower average per person costs than the Sequential Long Stayers in Jacksonville who used transitional housing extensively. Setting aside ethical or programmatic reasons, Jacksonville may benefit more financially by seeking an alternative intervention for the Sequential Program Users than for other path groups. Similarly, if stakeholders in Houston undertake efforts to reduce lengths of stays in Houston’s standard emergency shelters, they will not achieve cost-savings remotely approaching those that could be realized from efforts to reduce lengths of stays in the higher-cost extended stay emergency shelters. Again, that is not to say the extra investments in more expensive programs are not warranted based on additional benefits or outcomes for program clients. This cost analysis may help to identify programs about which cost-effectiveness analysis would be helpful.

4.4. Costs Associated with Mainstream System Use

In contrast to homeless residential system costs, mainstream system costs can occur before or after an individual’s period of homelessness and there may or may not be a relationship between homelessness and increased or decreased involvement in mainstream systems. As described in section 4.1, prior research suggested that periods of homelessness are related to increased costs across most mainstream domains and that certain interventions may reduce acute care costs and other mainstream costs associated with crises that lead to homelessness. This research also assumes that reduced costs over time reflect positive client outcomes brought about by the intervention. At least theoretically, the cost reductions can be used to fund the homelessness interventions. This study was not designed to understand the client outcomes or cost-effectiveness of specified homelessness interventions. However, the study attempts to measure the study cohort’s mainstream system involvement and associated costs incurred to serve these individuals before, during, and following first-time homelessness. This information may help policy makers assess the extent of potential mainstream cost savings possible or recognize the limited opportunities for them.

For Jacksonville, we were able to obtain mainstream utilization and cost data for the Medicaid primary health care, Medicaid and State-funded mental health and substance abuse treatment, food stamps, and Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) systems aggregated by path group for the periods before, during and following homelessness. We also received client-level total mainstream costs for each domain and each study period. We were not able to obtain access to individual client encounter data, so we do not know the exact dates of the mainstream involvement or costs of individual services within these domains. The limitations of data aggregated by time period will be discussed later in this section. We were able to obtain client-level data documenting each arrest and jail stay throughout the full study period. In Houston, we were able to obtain client-level service utilization and cost data for City and County jails, mental health treatment, and inpatient stays in the state psychiatric hospital. For Des Moines, we were not able to obtain any data on any mainstream systems; therefore, this section discusses costs only for Jacksonville and Houston.

This section presents estimates of mainstream costs for the study cohorts in Jacksonville and Houston and also compares them with the results of previous research. Like past cost studies, these results may understate mainstream costs since we have not accounted for all mainstream domains.

4.4.1 Rates of Mainstream System Involvement

As it is for homeless system costs, utilization of mainstream systems is an essential building block for estimating costs. Examining rates of interaction with mainstream systems also yields a better understanding of the characteristics of the individuals in the study cohorts—at least the minimum percentage of the cohort with certain needs or experiences, since it is likely some members of the cohort have needs for services but did not access them during the study timeframe. Some individuals also may have used non-publicly funded services that were not captured in the datasets we analyzed. Exhibit 4.12 shows rates of cohort involvement with mainstream systems in Jacksonville and Houston across the study period. Use during the 12 months prior to homelessness can help show needs that were present during that period. It can also be compared to the patterns of use after the start of homelessness to suggest how homelessness or involvement with homeless programs may have affected mainstream use.

Exhibit 4.12 Rates of Involvement with Mainstream System Domains Prior to Homelessness, During Homelessness and Overall During the Study Period
	Jacksonville				Houston
	Prior	During	After	Overall	Prior	During	After	Overall
Average days in period	365	132	599	1096	365	83	689	1137
Medicaid Primary Health	13%	9%	16%	20%
Mental Health	13%	8%	18%	25%	11%	9%	12%	18%
Substance Abuse	9%	7%	15%	22%
Criminal Justice	19%	13%	22%	38%	6%	2%	9%	13%
Income Support	29%	22%	43%	52%

In Jacksonville, almost one-third of individuals were receiving income support (mainly food stamps) in the 12-months prior to homelessness, and 13, 13 and 9 percent respectively had accessed publicly funded medical, mental health and substance abuse treatment. Almost one-fifth had been in arrested or in jail.

A relatively smaller percentage of individuals interacted with these systems during homelessness, providing a fairly small group of individuals for policymakers to target for potential cost offsets. The smaller percentage with service encounters primarily reflects the shorter period of time homeless for most of the study cohort, compared with the periods of time before and after homelessness. The average length of each period is shown in the first row of Exhibit 4.12. Food stamps eligibility may have dropped during homelessness for people in programs supplying meals. Nonetheless, as later sections on mainstream costs will show, these small percentages of individuals can incur substantial costs per person.

Use of mainstream systems rises following the end of homelessness. This may be primarily due to the longer period of time in which we tracked people following homelessness. In some cases— income support, Medicaid primary health care, and perhaps mental health and substance abuse services—the increased rates may also reflect the success of the homeless services system in linking homeless individuals to needed mainstream services. In other cases—criminal justice, and again perhaps mental health and substance abuse services—the higher rates of use following homelessness could indicate that spending time in the residential services system for homeless people does not change—and may even exacerbate—the negative behavior of individual homeless people. There clearly are cost implications associated with increased use of mainstream systems following homelessness.

The next section details the costs incurred by certain mainstream systems and sets the stage for the next step of analysis that a community can take: exploring whether the costs are positive or negative, and whether there are opportunities to reduce costs for the percentage of clients who interact with these systems through homeless interventions.

4.4.2 Costs to Mainstream Systems During Homelessness

First we present costs incurred during the study cohort’s period of homelessness (Exhibit 4.13),²⁰ the primary costs that we assume to be influenced by homelessness. The costs shown in the exhibit reflect only the domains for which we were able to obtain data, so they are minimum costs associated with our cohort of first-time homeless individuals.

²⁰ “During” homelessness is used to describe the period from the first day of the first stay in a residential program to the last day in the last stay within the 18-month study period. For individuals with more than one homeless program stay, during homelessness also includes gaps or periods of time between homeless stays when the individual may be housed.

Exhibit 4.13: Average Mainstream System Costs per Person Incurred “During” Homelessness

	Jacksonville		Houston
	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person Involved in this Domain	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person in Cohort	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person Involved in this Domain	Average Costs During Homelessness Per Person in Cohort
Medicaid Primary Health	$2,436	$219
Mental Health	$1,318	$106	$4,157	$391
Substance Abuse	$2,265	$158
Criminal Justice	$3,057	$397	$6,520	$157
Income Supports	$627	$138
Average Total Per Person Costs for these Domains		$1,018		$547
Total Incurred During Homelessness by the Cohort for these Domains	$2,006,539		$2,412,227

For each mainstream domain, Exhibit 4.13 shows the average costs per person for those who were served or interacted with that mainstream system and average per person costs when considering all individuals in the cohort. Per person costs for those who actually interacted with each system were relatively high, ranging from $627 for food stamps and TANF to $3,057 for those arrested or jailed during homelessness. The criminal justice expenses are high in part due to the large number of people who were involved with criminal justice (13 percent of the cohort, Exhibit 4.12). And those who were jailed, stayed in jail a long time—an average of 40 days each. When spread across the entire Jacksonville cohort, the costs are diluted.²¹

Therefore when considering the average mainstream cost per person in the overall cohort, costs during homelessness were relatively low, because most people spent only a brief time homeless and because only a portion of the cohort actually incurred costs in each of the domains. In Houston, average criminal justice costs are much lower than average mental health costs (Exhibit 4.13) for each cohort member, in part because only 2 percent of the study cohort had criminal justice costs during homelessness, compared with 9 percent who received mental health services (Exhibit 4.12). In fact, average costs per person for those who interacted with each system were higher for those involved with criminal justice than for those who received mental health care. As with Jacksonville, the average per person costs for both domains is diluted by the large percentage of individuals (more than 90 percent) who were not involved with either the mental health or the criminal justice system. Thus this further illustrates the point that an intervention can most easily achieve cost savings if it is targeted to those with high use (or any use). Conversely, interventions targeted to subgroups of homeless individuals that are not heavily involved in mainstream systems, and probably interventions targeting all first-time homeless individuals, are unlikely to achieve cost savings sufficient to fund them.

²¹ The Jacksonville case study Appendix provides greater detail on these mainstream costs.

4.4.3 Mainstream Costs Before, During, and After Homelessness

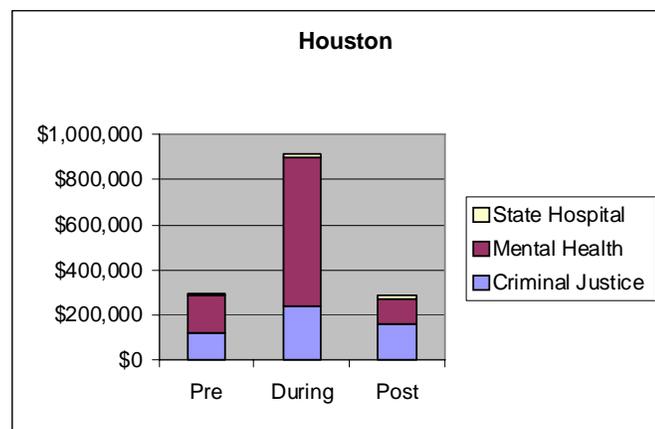

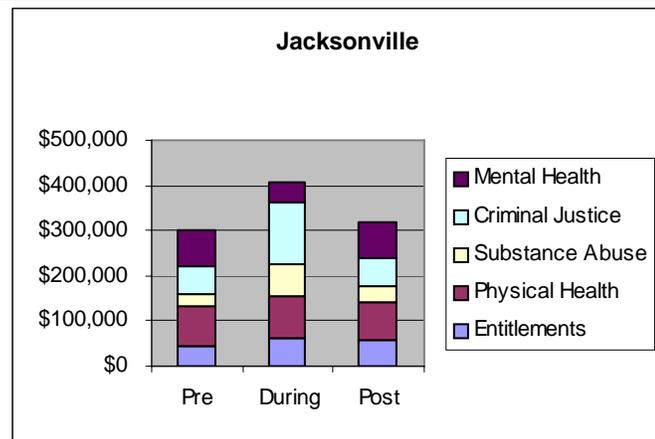

Although utilization rates for the study cohort go down during homelessness, as shown on Exhibit 4.12, this is largely a reflection of shorter time periods. Costs, expressed as one-month costs to control for the different lengths of the time periods before, during and following homelessness, go up during homelessness for most domains, as shown on Exhibit 4.14. In Jacksonville, the total monthly mainstream costs incurred by the study cohort increased from an average of $161 per month per person to $231 per month (43 percent increase) during homelessness and went back down to an average of $166 per month per person following homelessness. (See the Jacksonville case study in Appendix A for more detail.) In Houston, mainstream costs increased from an average of $67 per month per person to $197 per month during homelessness (194 percent increase) and then reduced back to an average of $65 per month per person following homelessness.²²

A smaller portion of the cohort interacts with each system during homelessness, so the increase in average monthly costs reflects concentrated usage of services by these users within a relatively brief period of time. In the periods before and after homelessness, more people interacted with the systems but the interactions were spread over longer periods and therefore the adjusted monthly cost is lower. More on the relationship of these costs before homelessness is provided in the next section. The lower rates of involvement with mainstream service systems may also reflect that some individuals may have received alternative services from homeless programs alleviating their need for mainstream care, and that those who did not have their needs met by the program internally may have needed higher cost clinical or acute care. However, not all of the change is explained by concentrated service use.

In some cases, individuals used, on average, more expensive services during homelessness. For instance, in

Jacksonville, the average cost per unit of physical health care covered by the Medicaid fee-for service

Exhibit 4.14: Monthly Mainstream Costs by Domain and Period, Jacksonville and Houston

²² See the Houston case study (Sokol, Leopold, Spellman, & Khadduri, 2009) for more detail.

plan was $100 per unit during the period prior to homelessness, $117 during homelessness, decreasing slightly to $110 following homelessness. More dramatic is the change in the Jacksonville cohort's Medicaid-funded mental health average cost per unit: $87 prior, $129 during, and $98 following homelessness. However, for Medicaid substance abuse treatment, the average cost per unit during homelessness was lowest ($426) compared with $471 per unit before and $508 per unit following homelessness. In Houston, the mental health treatment cost per unit was highest ($218) in the period preceding homelessness, dropping to an average cost per unit of $154 during homelessness and $141 per unit following homelessness. While bearing in mind that the average costs could reflect high-cost use by a handful of individuals and limited use by others, the higher cost per unit during homelessness for some domains is consistent with the theory raised in prior research that some people may receive more expensive acute care during periods of homelessness, but this pattern is not universal.

4.4.4 Mainstream Costs Immediately before Homelessness

While total mainstream costs increased during homelessness compared to the period prior to homelessness, suggesting more intensive mainstream use by particular individuals during homelessness, we come to a slightly different conclusion about the pattern by graphing mainstream utilization month by month, as shown in Exhibit 4.15 for jail stays in Jacksonville. The number of jail stays increases substantially immediately before first-time homelessness and peaks in the period immediately following first entry into a homeless program.²³ We see similar patterns for criminal justice involvement and mental health treatment costs in Houston, shown in Exhibits 4.16 and 4.17. The patterns graphed in these exhibits are very similar to those found in analysis of inpatient hospitalizations by homeless individuals in Philadelphia conducted by Culhane, Averyt and Hadley (1997). This pattern is not apparent when the cost analysis relies on average total monthly costs for the time periods before, during, and after homelessness shown in Exhibits 4.14.²⁴ This examination of data by month requires client-level service utilization data with actual dates of service, which we were not able to obtain from any of the Jacksonville mainstream systems except criminal justice.²⁵

²³ Other research analyzing rates of homelessness among ex-offenders found that individuals released from state prisons or jails have a greater risk of homelessness than individuals with similar characteristics who have not been recently incarcerated. In the communities studied, risk of homelessness among ex-offenders was higher for individuals with certain demographic characteristics. The same research also found that longer periods of incarceration were associated with greater risks of homelessness after release. (Graham, D., Locke, G., Bass Rubenstein, D. & Carlson, K., unpublished)

²⁴ These findings also corroborate those of Scully and Shank (2007), presented at the Summer 2007 National Alliance to End Homelessness conference. Scully's presentation prompted us to analyze data in this way to better understand patterns of use relative to homelessness

²⁵ The three period analysis was specified in the original data request to mainstream agencies who were not authorized to disclose client-level data. Now that this spike has emerged consistently for multiple domains, in the future we would explore alternate data specifications to capture this phenomenon more comprehensively.

Exhibit 4.15: Jacksonville Jail Stays Relative to Homelessness

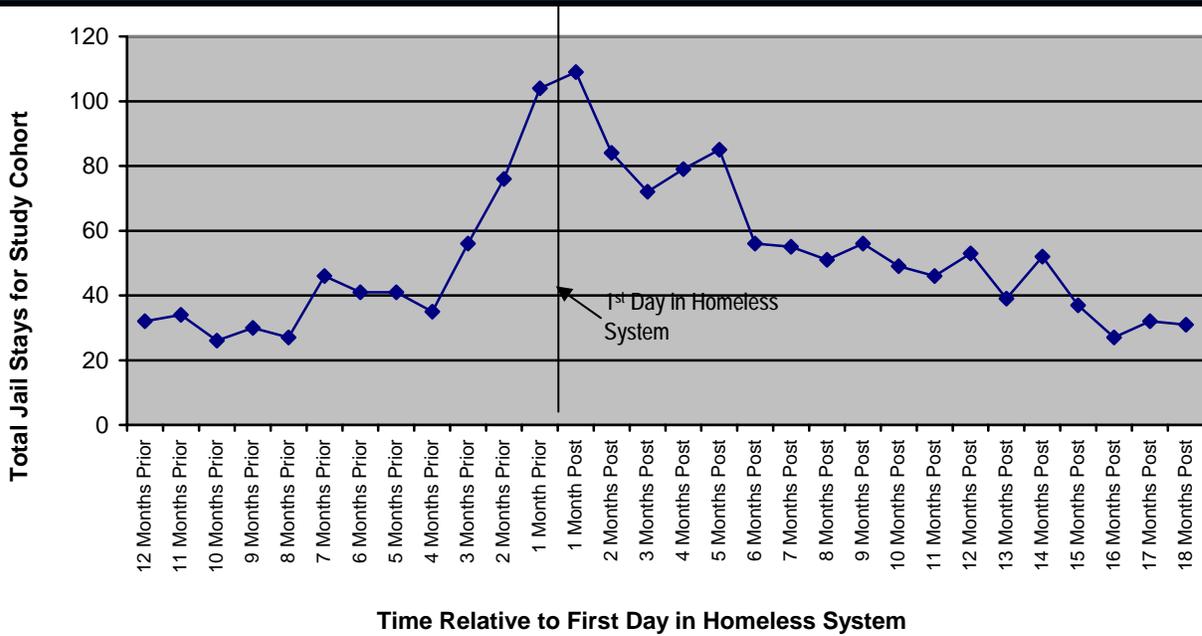

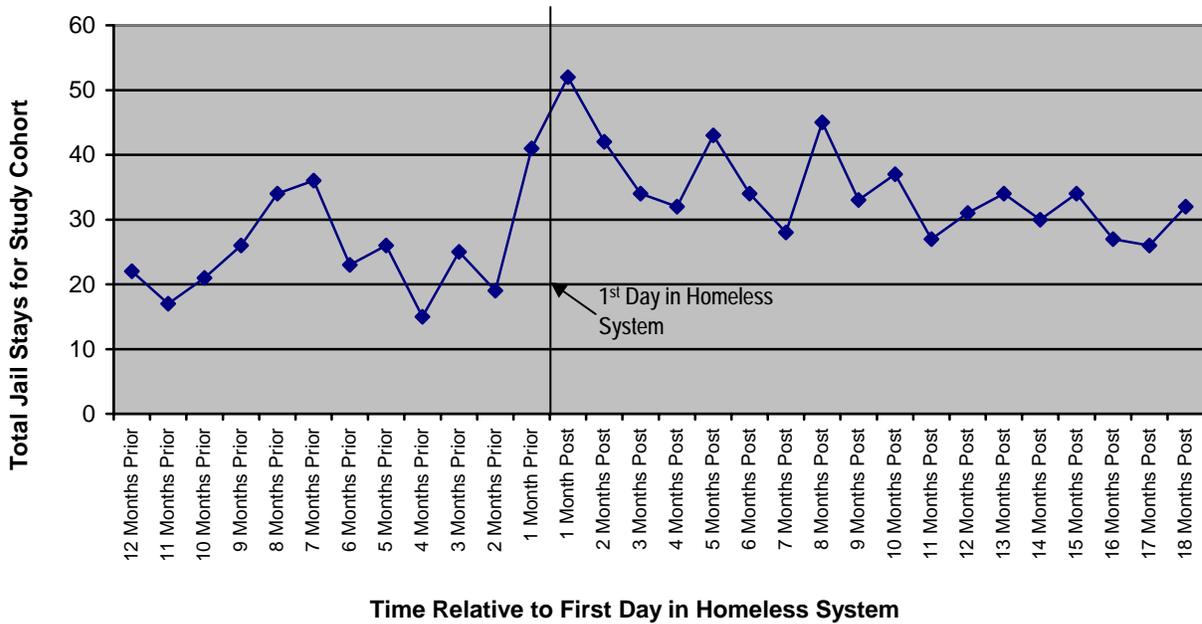

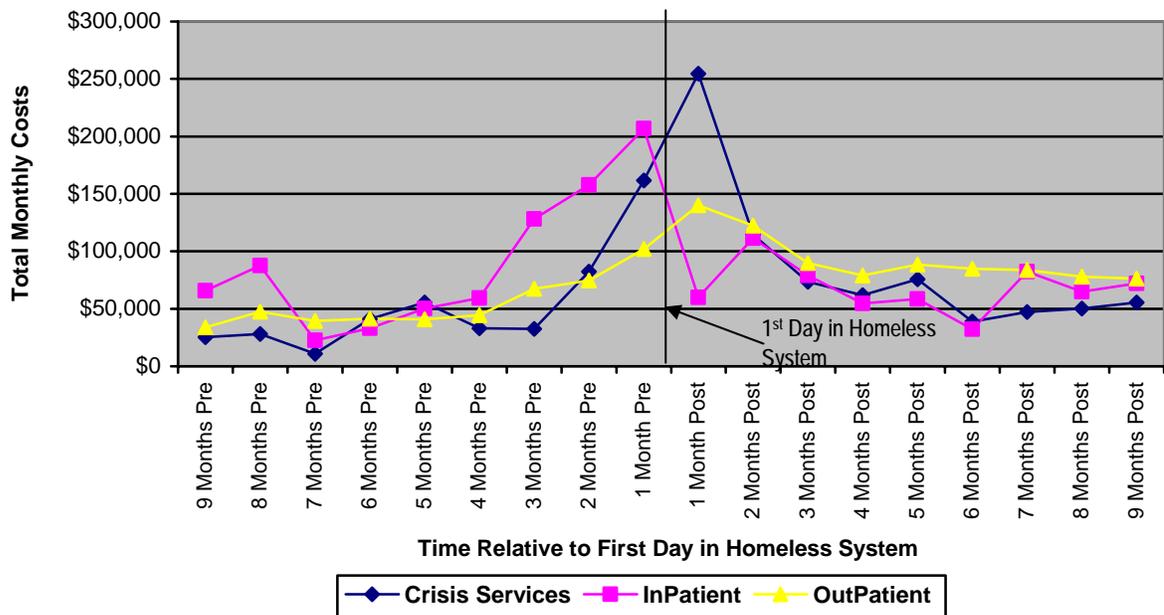

Exhibit 4.16: Houston (Individuals) Jail Stays Relative to Homelessness

Adding another layer of detail to the analysis, Exhibit 4.17 graphs mental health system costs separately for crisis services, inpatient treatment and outpatient treatment in Houston. The exhibit shows a dramatic increase in costs for inpatient and crisis treatment and a slight increase in outpatient treatment immediately before homelessness. Particularly interesting is the fact that inpatient treatment costs peak in the month prior to homelessness and then decline sharply in the month following the start of homelessness, whereas crisis and outpatient service costs peak in the month following the start of homelessness and then drop to levels slightly higher than the period before homelessness. It is logical that inpatient costs would decline once someone enters a residential homeless program, since a person cannot be staying in an inpatient facility at the same time he is in a homeless facility. However, the dramatic increase in use immediately prior to homelessness suggests that individuals may be exiting inpatient programs with inadequate housing placement services or that the mental health crisis that necessitated inpatient care is related to housing instability and homelessness in some other way.

The images are compelling and suggest a strong relationship between mainstream involvement and the start of homelessness. However, the current analysis has several important limitations. These exhibits depict total numbers of jail stays and total mental health costs for the cohort. We would need much more analysis to determine whether the individuals experiencing the crises before homelessness are the same people who later are shifting to outpatient mental health use. Furthermore, the analysis is built up from each individual's service utilization relative to his or her actual first day in the homeless system. The first month in the homeless system is roughly equivalent for all persons in the cohort and exactly the same for the 12 months prior to entry into the homeless system, so the pattern of progressively increasing mainstream costs is defensible for those timeframes. However, following the first day some people in the cohort quickly exit homeless programs, while others stay homeless for long time periods or later return to homeless programs. Subsequent episodes of homelessness may also be related to increased mainstream involvement, but later increases are muted in these graphs, since the costs of those who have subsequent episodes in month 6, for example, are summed with those in the cohort who are no longer homeless.

Exhibit 4.17: Houston (Individuals) Mental Health Costs by Month Relative to Homelessness

We did not collect and structure data in ways that facilitate conducting time-series analysis of mainstream system use relative to the end of homeless residential stays or subsequent episodes of homelessness. However, we believe that these interesting exploratory findings suggest opportunities for further research.

4.4.5 Characteristics Associated with Mainstream System Costs

A regression model was used to explain mainstream costs for different systems using covariates for demographic characteristics and homeless system utilization (Exhibit 4.18). Unlike the previous models presented in this chapter, we did not use a logarithm specification for the outcome variable for this analysis. These regression coefficients thus represent the differences in dollar costs between individuals with and without a particular characteristic.

Findings on the relationship between homeless utilization patterns and mainstream system costs over the total study period (before, during, and after homelessness) were somewhat inconsistent between the two sites.²⁶ In Jacksonville, multivariate analysis controlling for demographics and homeless experience showed a statistically significant relationship between length of stay in homeless residential programs and most mainstream costs (Exhibit 4.18). For each additional 30 days spent in homeless programs, physical healthcare costs increase by about $199, costs for food stamps and TANF increased by $80, and costs for substance abuse treatment increased by $61. In contrast, criminal justice costs dropped slightly for individuals in the Jacksonville study cohort who spent more time in homeless residential programs. Criminal justice costs increased by $150 for every 30 “gap” days spent between homeless program stays, which suggests a possible link between engagement with the criminal justice system and homeless recidivism.

The multivariate analysis for Jacksonville did not show a statistically significant relationship between mental health costs and lengths of stay in homeless programs. This may mean that homeless programs, especially those that encourage longer lengths of stay, link mentally ill clients with routine outpatient treatment or otherwise stabilize clients sufficiently to reduce their need for more expensive crisis or in-patient psychiatric treatment. Alternatively, it is possible that more expensive service-rich programs provide mental health services themselves, offsetting the need for mainstream mental health services. Or perhaps persons who successfully stay in transitional housing or permanent supportive housing are not the individuals with the greatest or most severe mental health needs, therefore suggesting that those with higher needs and associated treatment costs leave earlier or never enroll in the first place.²⁷ Many other explanations are possible, but the relationship between homeless system and mental health costs is notable.

²⁶ We were not able to analyze changes in mainstream costs from one period to another using regression analysis, since we did not have access to client-level data by domain and period in Jacksonville.

²⁷ A 2006 HUD study of leavers and stayers in permanent supportive housing indicates that higher use of mainstream mental health systems such as inpatient mental hospital admissions and emergency services during residence in permanent supportive housing is a strong predictor of leaving permanent supportive housing rather than staying long-term. (HUD, 2006) This finding supports the idea that people with greater mental health needs or less stable routine mental health treatment may have shorter lengths of stay in some homeless program types.

Exhibit 4.18. Regression Analysis of Mainstream System Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Jacksonville

Outcome Variable: Costs of Mainstream Domains	Physical Health Costs	Mental Health Tx Costs	Substance Abuse Tx Costs	Income Supports Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Homeless System Utilization
Number of Homeless Program Stays	-74.742 (36.628)	-15.781 (37.545)	-15.465 (14.559)	-5.599 (10.013)	-34.855 (21.201)
Homeless Length of Stay (in months)	198.681 (47.651)	-47.273 (48.844)	60.639 (18.941)	80.128 (13.027)	11.861 (27.582)
Homeless Gap Days (in months)	13.062 (43.528)	-18.746 (44.618)	40.846 (17.302)	0.982 (11.900)	149.972 (25.196)
Demographics+
Female	2,170.849 (430.825)	1,663.730 (441.617)	257.364 (171.251)	1,770.719 (117.779)	-992.334 (249.377)
Black	560.360* (337.435)	-907.569 (345.888)	-378.032 (134.129)	280.946 (92.248)	380.364* (195.320)
Other race	209.352 (925.260)	575.892 (948.438)	-745.892 (367.788)	-174.340 (252.948)	814.333 (535.575)
Age: 18-24	646.639 (656.886)	1,237.724* (673.342)	-192.726 (261.110)	416.656 (179.580)	91.847 (380.230)
Age: 25-30	128.096 (589.908)	636.365 (604.686)	-196.469 (234.486)	248.953 (161.269)	-59.916 (341.461)
Age: 41-50	47.339 (416.223)	237.133 (426.649)	15.568 (165.447)	-152.958 (113.787)	-639.606 (240.925)
Age: 51 or above	912.642* (503.089)	1,065.059 (515.691)	-43.218 (199.976)	-104.207 (137.534)	-1,094.955 (291.206)
Constant	477.218 (380.681)	1,183.239 (390.217)	727.681 (151.319)	394.947 (104.071)	1,820.685 (220.352)
Observations	1972	1972	1972	1972	1972
R-squared	0.04	0.02	0.02	0.16	0.04

+ Reference categories are Males, Whites, and Ages 31 – 40.

Covariates for missing gender, race, and age were included in the full models (Appendix B).

Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

In Houston, unlike Jacksonville, a positive and statistically significant relationship was found between homeless program lengths of stay and mental health costs (Exhibit 4.19), as well as between homeless system costs and mental health costs (Appendix C.3). Among persons who received mental health treatment, on average each additional month spent in homeless programs was associated with an increase of $136 in mental health costs. The Mental Health and Mental Retardation Authority of Harris County offers numerous mental health programs targeting people who are homeless, including mental health programs that work in conjunction with local law enforcement officials and hospitals to divert individuals who are homeless from jail and inpatient hospitals. The higher mental health costs associated with long periods of sheltered homelessness likely reflect this local system of care. Alternatively, higher costs could reflect that individuals with mental illness are more likely to stay longer in the homeless system because their mental illness affects their ability to secure and maintain permanent housing outside the homeless services system.

Exhibit 4.19. Regression Analysis of Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Houston

Outcome Variable	Mental Health Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Homeless System Utilization
Number of Homeless Program Stays	2.035	-23.043*
	(15.330)	(12.658)
Homeless Length of Stay (in months)	135.568	-33.204
	(31.638)	(26.123)
Homeless Gap Days (in months)	207.498	136.029
	(28.694)	(23.693)
Demographics+
Females	408.504*	-174.216
	(233.006)	(192.393)
African-Americans	-281.174	62.298
	(216.820)	(179.028)
Other Races	-671.700	-813.770
	(308.407)	(254.652)
Ages 18 – 24	-625.156	-388.749
	(414.834)	(342.528)
Ages 25 – 30	-28.563	-321.642
	(369.645)	(305.216)
Ages 41 – 50	-797.297	-1,250.060
	(268.755)	(221.911)
Age 51 and Above	-1,498.154	-1,635.552
	(334.779)	(276.428)
Another covariate was also included for mainstream system involvement.
Constant	1,990.985	2,520.263
	(262.855)	(217.039)
Observations	4,404	4,404
R-squared	0.04	0.04

+ Reference categories are Males, Whites, and Ages 31 – 40.

Standard errors in parentheses *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

In addition, individuals in Houston who have gaps between homeless program stays have even higher mental health costs. For each additional 30 days of time spent between homeless stays, mental health costs increase by $207. This correlation suggests that in addition to facing challenges remaining in permanent housing, individuals with mental illness may also have a difficult time staying in homelessness programs.

Like the Jacksonville results, criminal justice costs in Houston are associated with gaps between homelessness. For each additional 30 days spent between various homeless program stays, criminal justice costs for individuals in Houston increase by $136.²⁸ Data were not available for Medicaid, substance abuse services, or entitlement programs in Houston.

The regression models also included covariates for gender, age, and race (Exhibits 4.18 and 4.19). Controlling for homeless system use, single women are associated with much higher mainstream costs in most domains than men. In Jacksonville, first-time homeless women are associated with $2,171 more in physical health costs, $1,664 in mental health costs, and $1,771 in food stamps and TANF than first-time homeless men in Jacksonville. Women are also associated with $992 less in criminal justice costs. Similarly, first-time homeless women in Houston have higher mental health costs of $409. The cost differences for criminal justice expenses are not statistically significant.

Older age is also associated with statistically significant cost differences. Individuals in Jacksonville and Houston over 40 are associated with lower criminal justice costs, $640 to $1,250 less for individuals between 41 and 50 years of age and $1,095 to $1,635 less for individuals over 50. In Jacksonville, individuals over 50 have $913 higher physical health costs and $1,065 higher mental health system costs. In Houston, older adults are associated with lower mental health costs, $800 for individuals between 41 and 50 years of age and $1,498 for individuals over 50.

Race is also associated with statistically significant cost differences (Exhibits 4.18 and 4.19). In Jacksonville, African-Americans are associated with $560 more in physical health costs, $281 more in food stamps and TANF, and $380 more in criminal justice costs, but $907 less in mental health treatment costs and $378 less in substance abuse treatment costs. These results provide a mixed picture, since they suggest that African-Americans are better connected to income support programs and may have fewer behavioral health needs, but have greater involvement with criminal justice. From this analysis, we cannot tell when the costs occurred in relation to homelessness. In Houston, individuals of “other” races had significantly lower mental health and criminal justice costs, but the results for African-Americans are not statistically significant.

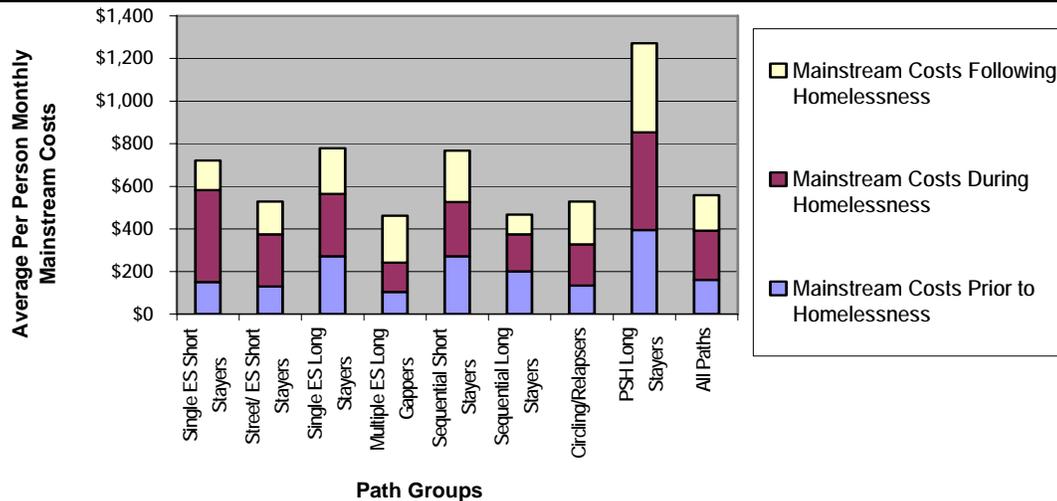

The results for cost differences associated with gender, age, and race are very interesting considering that women, African-Americans, and relatively older individuals are all associated with higher homeless system costs.

4.4.6 Mainstream Costs Associated with Different Path Groups of First-Time Homeless Individuals

The average per person mainstream system costs for each of Jacksonville’s path groups in the periods before, during, and following homelessness are shown in Exhibit 4.20. This exhibit illustrates the wide-range of mainstream costs for different subgroups of the study cohort defined by ways in which they use the homeless services system. Permanent Supportive Housing Long-Stayers incur the most mainstream costs when compared with other path groups. For this group, the period during homelessness refers almost entirely to the time individuals spent in permanent supportive housing programs that were part of the homeless system. Since eligibility for permanent supportive housing is contingent upon having a chronic disability, it is not surprising that this group has high mainstream costs across all three periods.

²⁸ The multivariate regression analysis for criminal justice may be affected by missing identifiers for the street only path group. The matching algorithm and process used for mental health records was more comprehensive.

Exhibit 4.20: Jacksonville Cohort's Average Per Person Monthly Mainstream Costs By Path Group and Period

We conducted multivariate analysis to show the extent to which mainstream costs for the total study period are greater for certain subgroups defined by the paths they take through the homeless services system. An extract of the regression models for each mainstream domain in Jacksonville is shown in Exhibit 4.21, and the complete model is provided in the Jacksonville case study Appendix B. Descriptions of the path groups were presented in Section 4.3.4.

Exhibit 4.21: Modeling Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals in Jacksonville by Path Groups

Mainstream System Costs	Medicaid Costs	Mental Health Tx Costs	Substance Abuse Tx Costs	Entitlement Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Emergency Shelter Short Stayers	Omitted: reference category
Emergency Shelter Long Stayers	1,629.965 (1,118.827)	-1,238.011 (1,158.049)	-12.359 (448.596)	2,326.988 (306.924)	47.142 (656.299)
Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	-540.835 (576.914)	-163.468 (597.138)	349.426 (231.315)	-93.135 (158.263)	1,677.589 (338.415)
Street/ES Short Stayers	-134.925 (400.498)	-2.881 (414.539)	312.461* (160.581)	-4.741 (109.867)	541.743 (234.931)
PSH Long Stayers	7,562.911 (1,005.047)	-177.606 (1,040.280)	1,174.122 (402.976)	439.888 (275.711)	839.736 (589.556)
Sequential Program Users (Short Stayers)	910.630 (577.251)	1,306.901 (597.487)	883.603 (231.450)	-247.596 (158.355)	43.786 (338.613)
Sequential Program Users (Long Stayers)	-634.893 (1,233.235)	-716.680 (1,276.468)	1,345.077 (494.468)	43.305 (338.309)	42.512 (723.410)
Circling Program Users	-342.969 (658.072)	-501.256 (681.141)	491.023* (263.855)	325.064* (180.526)	1,099.228 (386.022)
Model also included covariates for Gender, Race, and Age
Constant	476.466 (410.918)	978.383 (425.323)	587.542 (164.758)	467.889 (112.726)	1,682.568 (241.042)
Observations	1972	1972	1972	1972	1972
R-squared	0.06	0.02	0.02	0.18	0.04

Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

The model shows that those who go directly to permanent supportive housing and stay there for relatively long periods have on average Medicaid costs $7,563 higher and substance abuse costs $1,174 higher than short-stayers in emergency shelter, the reference category. Surprisingly, long stayers in permanent supportive housing do not have higher mental health costs than short stayers in emergency shelter. This may be because some of the permanent supportive housing programs target individuals with chronic addictions who may have fewer mental health treatment needs. Another possible explanation is that permanent supportive housing programs may be serving as caretakers for individuals with less severe mental health needs rather than a therapeutic model for those with acute needs. However, the model that predicts mental health costs has R-squared statistics of only .02, so patterns of homelessness and demographic characteristics may not be most relevant covariates for explaining results.

The two path groups who move in sequence from emergency shelter to transitional housing or permanent supportive housing and do not come back to emergency shelter have high substance abuse costs and (for one of the path groups) high mental health costs. Sequential Users (Short Stayers) were associated with over $1,300 in additional mental health costs, and an additional $884 in additional substance abuse costs on average, compared with Emergency Shelter Short Stayers. Sequential Users (Long Stayers) were associated with an additional $1,345 in substance abuse costs, but did not have higher mental health costs. As we discussed earlier in this chapter, the Sequential Users spend a long time in transitional housing, in which program staff may play a role in facilitating access to intensive substance abuse treatment. It is not clear whether the higher costs for this path group reflect greater service needs of these individuals or whether they merely had greater access to services.

Three path groups had high criminal justice costs: those who had long gaps between emergency shelter stays; those who spent time on the streets; and those who circled back and forth between program types. This finding clearly links the criminal justice system to those individuals whose needs are not fully met by the homeless residential system. Individuals whose criminal justice costs are rooted in jail time served prior to homelessness may be more likely to follow one of these three paths. At the same time, those who have long gaps between stays are often incarcerated during these gaps.

A similar model, shown in Appendix C.3, predicts which of the path groups in Houston have particularly intensive use of mental health services and the criminal justice system. Four path groups are associated with higher mental health costs. Individuals with long gaps between stays had on average $2,300 to $3,000 more in mental health costs than individuals with brief stays in emergency shelter. These higher mental health costs may reflect recurring stays in in-patient treatment programs prior to and during homelessness. The Sequential Users with long stay in homeless programs, primarily in transitional housing, also have mental health treatment costs $2,085 higher than brief users of emergency shelter. These costs may be related to inpatient treatment prior to homelessness or during, but may also be a reflection of service linkages with mental health programs established as a result of staying in certain types of homeless programs. Two of the groups with multiple homeless stays and long gaps between stays were associated with higher criminal justice costs than emergency shelter short-stayers. Emergency Shelter Long Gappers had $1,179 in higher jail and arrest costs, and Circlers had $1,943 more in criminal justice costs. Individuals who used transitional or permanent supportive housing only were also associated with $791 more in criminal justice costs.

4.5. Homeless System and Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Individuals During the Period of Homelessness

Exhibit 4.22 compares the costs per person for the homeless services system and selected mainstream systems in Jacksonville and Houston and shows that the homeless system costs were much higher. It is important to note that this study was not able to collect utilization and cost information for some high-cost mainstream domains, such as locally funded emergency room care or emergency medical transport. The ratio of homeless to mainstream costs to some degree reflects the relatively low levels of involvement with mainstream systems during homelessness for most in the cohort and the fact that the majority of costs are concentrated among a smaller percentage of the study cohort. This suggests that while there may be limited opportunities for cost offsets in mainstream systems for most of the first-time homeless cohort, there may be opportunities within the homeless system to allocate resources to support better outcomes for homeless individuals. There continue to be opportunities to identify cost-effective interventions targeting individuals with intensive or high-cost use of mainstream systems.

In Section 4.1, we discussed past research on patterns of homelessness and the growing body of research that has been completed on costs associated with homeless individuals who are severely mentally ill or individuals who are identified as frequent users of inpatient or high-cost mainstream systems. Past research on homeless individuals has recognized that costs can be assumed to be quite low for the majority of homeless individuals, but has not quantified them. This study shows that the

Exhibit 4.22: Homeless and Selected Mainstream System Costs per Person Incurred during Homelessness

	Jacksonville		Houston
	Costs	% of Total	Costs	% of Total ^a
Homeless System	$1,634	62%	$2,257	80%
Selected Mainstream Systems	$1,018	38%	$547	20%

^aThis percentage is not very meaningful, since the Houston case study includes such limited mainstream domains.

overall Jacksonville study cohort incurred an average total cost of just over $2,600 per person during homelessness (totaling homeless and mainstream systems costs shown on Exhibit 4.22), substantially lower than the annual estimates of $40,500 per person from the NY/NY Cost Study (Culhane et al., 2002).²⁹ However, examining the average costs of the full cohort is not nearly as meaningful for policy purposes as focusing on costs associated with more specific subgroups that could be targeted with alternative interventions.

Exhibit 4.23 presents the costs of five of the eight path groups from the Jacksonville case study (our most comprehensive findings) to illustrate the range of costs that have been identified for different homeless single adult populations in comparison with the NY/NY Cost Study.³⁰ This discussion assumes that local stakeholders have a mechanism to predict future patterns of homelessness as the basis for targeting various interventions—presumably the subject of future research.

²⁹ Note that these figures are provided for discussion purposes only. The two studies are not directly comparable because of the differences in the research objectives and designs, study populations, geographic locations, and timeframes for analysis.

Emergency Shelter Short Stayers represent more than half of the first-time homeless study cohort in Jacksonville. Individuals in this group have average stays of less than one month and could theoretically be targeted for prevention strategies. Thus, a major policy question is whether resources currently used to house these individuals in shelter could be allocated differently to fund a prevention approach. The exhibit shows that, because of their short stays in shelter, the group is associated with only $686 per person in homeless system costs and incurs only $452 in mainstream system costs per person while homeless. While prevention strategies might hope to decrease some of the mainstream costs such as criminal justice involvement ($138), other mainstream use is desirable, such as receipt of food stamps/TANF ($69) and Medicaid Managed Care ($19). Therefore, to be cost-neutral, stakeholders in Jacksonville would need to limit a prevention intervention to an average per person cost of $1,000 if cost offsets from both mainstream and homeless systems were used. Given the difficulty of reprogramming mainstream resources, only the $686 under the control of the homeless system might be available.

Exhibit 4.23: Comparison of Costs During Homelessness Among Select Jacksonville Path Groups and Costs from the NY/NY Study Cohort Prior to Placement in Permanent Supportive Housing

	Jacksonville ES Short Stayers	Jacksonville ES Long Stayers	Jacksonville Circlers	Jacksonville PSH Long Stayers	NY/NY Cost Study SMI Cohort
Path Group Description	Less than one month spent in ES; 43% also had contact with street outreach teams	Continuous stay in ES averaging 10 months	Average 5 months (8 distinct stays) in homeless programs, returning to ES after TH or PSH; spread over 10 months	Average one year in homeless programs across 3 stays, primarily in PSH. Evidence of disability criteria for PSH.	4½ months in shelter over 2 yr period All psychiatrically disabled with severe mental illness
Homeless System	$686	$9,756	$3,987	$8,493	$4,658
Medicaid (Primary Health, Mental Health, Substance Abuse)	$126	$829	$282	$3,716	$14,208
Local Hospitals					$6,229
State Mental Health Treatment	$57	$126	$40	$467	$12,520
State Substance Abuse Treatment	$62	$164	$92	$786	-
Criminal Justice	$138	$57	$1,400	$561	$1,012
Income Supports	$69	$1,777	$243	$667
Veterans Affairs					$1,822
Total Per Person	$1,138	$12,709	$6,044	$14,691	$40,451

Total may not reflect the sum of the domains due to rounding.

³⁰ Emergency Shelter Short Stayers combines Jacksonville’s ES Short Stayers and Street/ES Short Stayers; therefore, five of the eight Jacksonville path groups are represented by the four groups discussed in this section.

Emergency Shelter Long Stayers represent a small percentage of the Jacksonville cohort, but they had almost year-long continuous stays in emergency shelter and were associated with substantial costs. More than one-third of these individuals received Medicaid-funded primary health care (average $829 per person), so it is possible that medical conditions contributed to their long lengths of stay. If a locality wanted to target these individuals, they could flag individuals with stays longer than a specified length. Three-quarters of the costs associated with this group were incurred within the homeless system itself, an average of $9,756 per person. These costs were equivalent to 15 months of rent subsidy at the FY2006 Fair Market Rent of $643 per month (HUD, 2005). Mainstream costs were substantial, but mainly because 77 percent of the group received food stamps during homelessness with an average total benefit of $1,551 per person. Future research would be required to know if an alternate housing intervention could achieve cost offsets through reductions of primary or behavioral healthcare expenses.

Circlers, 7 percent of the Jacksonville study cohort, spent almost 5 months in residential homeless programs spread over the course of more than 10 months. Individuals in this path group were characterized by a pattern of returning to emergency shelter at some point after an earlier stay in transitional or permanent housing. Because this group had frequent gaps when individuals were not staying in homeless programs, the homeless costs (almost $4,000 per person) were not as high as some other groups. About one-third of this group received mental health care at some time during the study period, but a smaller portion accessed primary health care than in other groups. More than 40 percent were involved with criminal justice at an average cost of $1,400 per person, more than two-thirds of all mainstream costs incurred by this group during homelessness. Arrests and jail sentences may have occurred between homeless stays, or may have caused the disruption in program usage resulting in the return to shelter. Criminal justice agencies may be interested in partnering to design an intervention to target this group.

Permanent Supportive Housing Long Stayers were associated with the highest costs per person, an average of almost $15,000 per person for homeless and mainstream services. The individuals in this group spent an average of one year staying in residential homeless programs, primarily in permanent supportive housing. Thus, rather than identifying costs associated with homelessness, data for this path group essentially illustrates the homeless and mainstream costs that were incurred when the homeless system stably housed disabled individuals who experienced first-time homelessness. Most of the $8,500 in homeless system costs per person in this group was incurred for permanent housing, so conceptually these costs are quite different from costs for the other path groups. These individuals each received an average of $6,200 in mainstream services while in homeless programs, most for primary health care ($3,452) and substance abuse treatment ($950). This group also had a fairly high-level of criminal involvement ($561 per person) during this period. It is somewhat surprising that the individuals in permanent supportive housing did not receive higher levels of mental health treatment, though several of these projects targeted individuals with chronic addictions, rather than persons with severe mental illness. These data would need to be parsed further to understand how homeless and mainstream costs varied when the individuals were in shelters or transitional housing as compared with permanent housing, but most of the mainstream costs were incurred while in permanent housing.

The final column of the Exhibit displays the costs incurred by the NY/NY Cost Study cohort in the two years prior to placement in supported housing. This group averaged close to five months in shelter during this period and incurred high levels of mainstream services during this timeframe. The differences in costs between the NY/NY cohort and the Jacksonville path groups reflect several factors. The most significant is that all members of the NY/NY cohort were severely mentally ill and presumably had greater treatment needs and service utilization than any of the Jacksonville path groups. The figures also reflect significant differences in costs in different parts of the country, as well as state-to-state and city-to-city differences in service levels and access to services.³¹ Therefore, communities have varying opportunities to achieve cost offsets when employing alternative interventions. This comparison clearly illustrates the point made by Rosenheck (2000) that high-cost interventions must be targeted to individuals with high-cost service utilization in order to be cost-neutral. That is not to suggest that other populations should not be targeted with high-cost interventions for ethical, social and other reasons.

4.6. Policy Implications and Recommendations for Further Research

This chapter documents the patterns and costs associated with first-time homelessness for individuals, and perhaps most importantly, the wide range of costs incurred by individuals with different patterns of using homeless residential programs. For the majority, stays in homeless programs are a single brief occurrence, and costs are minimal. For a small percentage, stays are long, and costs are significant. High homeless system costs frequently reflect extended use of higher cost transitional housing. Average homeless system costs per person appear to overshadow average mainstream costs per person for most during homelessness, since a relatively small percentage of individuals interact with mainstream systems during homelessness. And those with extended periods of homelessness are not consistently associated with intensive or high-cost mainstream use. Further, while average monthly mainstream costs peak during homelessness, when graphed based on the month-by-month utilization, mainstream system costs actually increase dramatically immediately before homelessness and peak immediately after the individual enters the homeless residential system. Thus, while cost savings may be achievable within the homeless system for long-stayers, the data from these three sites do not suggest significant cost savings within mainstream systems can be achieved by ending homelessness for first-time long-stayers as a whole.

4.6.1 Opportunities for Cost Savings

From a policy perspective, this study affirms past research and emphasizes that communities should be cautious when extending per person averages to a broad group of homeless individuals. The greatest costs and the greatest potential for cost savings are found among the very small percentage of individuals who stay the longest in the homeless system or who have intensive involvement in high cost mainstream systems. Policymakers seeking cost-effective interventions for homelessness will need to appropriately target strategies to each group.

Communities can use this type of cost analysis to explore in much more detail how individuals use homeless residential programs, the associated costs, and the potential for cost offsets. But communities must recognize that cost offsets may not be possible for some of the largest groups of individuals who become homeless, and saving money is not the only reason to deliver housing and services differently. The majority of individuals who experienced first-time homelessness in this study had very short stays with low associated homeless system costs. Nonetheless, communities could consider whether the average shelter cost per person for this subgroup could be reprogrammed (and potentially augmented) to support prevention and shelter diversion strategies.

³¹ For instance, in 2006, New York was ranked first with $2,316 in per-capita Medicaid spending for 2006, whereas Florida was ranked 46th with $706 per-capita spending (Public Policy Institute of New York State, n.d.).

Other policy considerations and cost saving possibilities are raised or affirmed by this research.

- Emergency shelter has low costs for short stayers, but is expensive and presumably an inappropriate intervention for longer stayers. Although the idea of prevention is appealing, the emergency shelters seem to provide an immediate, low-cost response to homelessness for the majority of individuals. It would be very difficult to fund a prevention response at such low cost, particularly since it may be challenging to identify up front which of the individuals' homelessness could be prevented with minimal assistance. Perhaps the emergency shelter system is an "adequate" response to an immediate housing crisis for most individuals, and a place in which individuals who are not able to quickly resolve their housing crisis can be more deliberately assisted or referred to more intensive interventions. For instance, emergency shelters could target case management or specialized assistance to individuals who have been in shelter for 30 days or more.
- Higher mainstream costs in some domains were associated with individuals with multiple episodes of homelessness (Long Gappers). Communities could target individuals who return to shelter for a second (or third) non-consecutive program stay. This group (and others) may also particularly benefit from intentional prevention-oriented discharge planning strategies and other strategies implemented in conjunction with criminal justice systems to reduce repeat incarceration.
- For some subgroups, total homeless system costs incurred per person exceed the cost of an annual direct housing subsidy. Communities may want to consider whether housing assistance would be a lower cost and potentially equally effective intervention for some of these groups.
- Transitional housing is generally one of the most expensive homeless program models. While this study does not look at long-term efficacy of this program model or its overall cost-effectiveness, communities may want to consider whether it is possible, and still consistent with program objectives, to shorten lengths of stay in transitional housing through more rapid out-placement, to target transitional housing more specifically to those who are less stable or more likely to interact inappropriately with mainstream systems and therefore need longer term housing support with intensive services, or to reduce the costs of the most expensive transitional housing programs.
- We surmise that one reason individual women cost more than individual men is that they may be more likely to be housed in programs that also serve families and therefore have a higher cost structure. Communities that are advancing a transitional housing solution may want to develop transitional housing for single women that can take advantage of a lower cost structure for individuals.
- Very few individuals in this study used permanent supportive housing, either immediately upon entering the homeless services system or after a stay in emergency shelter or transitional housing. We did not examine whether a larger percentage were eligible or appropriate for this model, but communities may want to assess whether capacity constraints in permanent supportive housing may be contributing to episodic homeless behavior or longer stays in shelter or transitional housing for others.

- Any local system that attempts to change how individuals experience homelessness must presume that there are valid strategies to identify and triage people based on their predicted use of system resources. This study suggests that certain groups, such as single women over 40 years old, have higher costs than others; lower cost strategies may be able to be developed to house these subgroups more effectively. In this case, age and gender could be coupled with other basic screening criteria to triage potential high cost users to alternative interventions. More work is needed to understand both predictors and interventions that may be more effective for various subgroups.
- Some individual homeless programs used by first-time homeless individuals were extremely expensive, as shown in this chapter by the high costs of the homeless services system for particular groups of individuals even when lengths of stay are controlled for. (See Chapter 3 for more detail on program costs.) Communities should examine homeless program cost outliers for possible efficiency gains.

In identifying these ideas, we hope to increase understanding of how diverse the patterns of first-time homelessness are, as are presumably the needs of those who experience it, and the strategies and resources that are deployed to address it. These possibilities for cost-savings are offered to spark discussion about ways to identify opportunities to use existing resources to improve local homeless systems. However, to reiterate, this study did not examine cost-effectiveness and therefore, we do not mean to imply that lower cost assistance is better. This study measured only costs associated with homelessness. Although the methods we use may be useful in other circumstances to measure costs of alternative interventions, any effort to alter current programs or to create new interventions should be conducted with a comparable understanding of their relative effectiveness for different groups.

4.6.2 Methodological Lessons

An important methodological finding of the study is that analysts should be cautious using averages to calculate costs for a group of homeless individuals. Not all people incur the same level of costs, nor do they present an opportunity to achieve the same level of cost savings. If a community intends to target all people who are homeless, then applying an average to understand costs or cost savings is less of a concern, but a community planning a targeted intervention should recognize that most of the cost savings will be achieved for a small minority of homeless individuals and that they must use appropriate subgroup data to estimate the savings for the individuals they are targeting. For instance, if Jacksonville were to develop a prevention initiative for individuals who would otherwise spend less than a week in shelter, analysts in Jacksonville must assume that the homeless system cost offset is approximately $600, not the average homeless cost of $1,600 incurred by the complete Jacksonville study cohort.

Client-level data allowed us to: understand and graph the distribution of costs to the homeless system and some select mainstream systems; conduct multivariate analysis to understand whether costs were associated with certain demographic characteristics or homeless patterns that may be able to be used by communities to predict costs or target interventions; and avoid misusing averages for service utilization, costs, and misleading average costs calculated for broad time periods. Future studies should attempt to collect and analyze client-level data whenever possible.

4.6.3 Recommendations for Future Research

In numerous places throughout this chapter, we have cited limitations of our findings. Future research could examine several areas to further our understanding of costs of homelessness for first-time homeless individuals. One of the most important findings on mainstream data was the pattern of costs peaking around the first day of homelessness. These patterns need more analysis to understand how costs taper off after homelessness, teasing out the associations with subsequent episodes of homelessness. This study also defined the period during homelessness broadly as the period between the first day in a homeless program and the last, inclusive of gaps between stays. More analysis could be conducted on mainstream system costs to understand the frequency and types of service use relative to the times when individuals were staying in homeless programs and gaps between stays, and whether use varied by the type of homeless program used.

Additional data could also be gathered on other mainstream domains (or all of the mainstream domains for the Des Moines case study) to build a more comprehensive understanding of costs. To address methodological limitations, client-level service utilization data should be collected, if at all possible, for all (new and existing) mainstream domains to enable communities to more closely examine trends relative to periods before and immediately following the start of homelessness. With more complete client-level data, additional multivariate regression analysis could also be conducted to further understand the factors that are associated with higher costs for various path groups.

Finally, these methodologies could be employed as part of broader research examining the cost-effectiveness of various interventions for different subgroups—arguably, one of the most important policy question facing communities today.

5. First-time Homelessness for Families and its Associated Costs

This chapter examines the patterns of sheltered homelessness for families and associated costs to the homeless services and mainstream systems. The most important themes about costs associated with first-time homelessness for families that emerged are that the study:

- Confirms earlier research that long stays in the homeless services system are very expensive and makes explicit that most families with long periods of sheltered homelessness use transitional housing, either exclusively or in combination with emergency shelter.
- Shows that housing vouchers are less expensive than transitional housing per day or per month. Whether the cost of transitional housing is ultimately lower than the cost of a permanent voucher--because transitional housing is temporary—is an open question.
- Identifies a group of highly troubled families that cycle in and out of the homeless services system and have very unstable household composition, often including men for part of the total period of homelessness. Unlike heavy users of transitional housing, the outcomes of the use of the homeless services system by these highly unstable families are unambiguously negative in that they are never stably housed. An alternative treatment model for these families that focuses on their family instability rather than their housing instability may be needed.
- Shows that African-American families, shown by other research to be homeless at higher rates than other poor families, are associated with lower average costs per family in comparison to white families.
- Shows that, among the domains for which we were able to collect data, the highest rates of utilization and costs for homeless families are the medical costs reimbursed by Medicaid.
- Concludes that short-term costs to the criminal justice system, while troubling, do not appear high enough to suggest opportunities for offsets. We were not able to collect cost data for the use of the child welfare and foster care systems by homeless families in any of the study communities. This is an area in which additional research might find opportunities for cost offsets.
- Suggests—on the basis of the limited information collected for this study—that local policies designed to prevent families from becoming homeless and divert those on the brink of homelessness can succeed.

5.1. Existing Research

The 2007 Annual Homeless Assessment Report (AHAR) describes some salient characteristics of sheltered homeless families across the nation (HUD, 2008). Most adults who become homeless with their children are women (82 percent), a higher percentage than the two-thirds of adults in all poor families who are women. More than half of sheltered homeless families are African American. Homeless families are particularly likely to include children younger than age six.

Like the AHAR estimates based on HMIS data from a nationally representative sample of communities, most previous research on homeless families describes their characteristics. The literature has focused on trying to predict which poor families are at greatest risk of becoming homeless, given that few families become homeless even among the very poor. Rog, Holupka and Patton (2007) found that only 8.7 percent of a study sample of “fragile families”—recent mothers with incomes below 50 percent of the poverty level—became homeless during a three-year follow up period. Various studies have shown that mental health, substance abuse, and domestic violence are factors that put parents at risk of becoming homeless, but researchers have not been able to predict which families with these risk factors will become homeless (Rog and Buckner, 2007; Shinn, Rog, and Culhane, 2005).

5.1.1 Patterns and Costs of Family Homelessness

Based on a literature review, an expert panel, and some reanalysis of data, Rog, Holupka and Patton (2007) developed a framework for a typology of homeless families, but not a typology itself. They concluded that two typologies of homeless families are needed: a “prevention” typology that would help communities focus their resources on families at highest risk of becoming homeless, and a “resource allocation” typology that would help communities assist families who become homeless in cost-effective ways.

Culhane, Metraux, Min Park, Schretzman and Valente (2007) began to develop a resource allocation typology, based on cluster analysis of administrative data, conducted separately for New York City, Philadelphia, Columbus OH, and Massachusetts. Generalizing across the results of cluster analysis based on number of shelter stays and cumulative days of shelter use over a three year period in New York and Philadelphia and a two-year period in Columbus and Massachusetts, they identify three groups of first-time homeless families:

- Temporary: Families who use shelters or transitional housing for a single, relatively short, period of time and do not return to the residential system for homeless people after leaving it;
- Episodic: Families who cycle in and out of programs for homeless people, with relatively short stays for each homeless episode; and
- Long-Stayer: Families who stay for long periods of time in shelters, transitional housing, or both.

Culhane and his co-authors (2007) find that “Long-Stayer” families are by far the most expensive for the homeless services system. The average lengths of stay for this group ranged from six months (187 days) in Columbus to more than a year (444 days) in New York City, costing $21, 692 per family in Columbus, $30,812 in Philadelphia, $48,440 in Massachusetts, and $55,200 in New York (Exhibit 5.1). They question whether this is a cost-effective use of resources, given that these “Long Stayers,” who make up about a fifth of all sheltered homeless families, are not more intensive users of targeted social services than other groups of homeless families. They base this assessment on the rates at which families use such social services as mental health and substance abuse treatment and the foster care system.

Exhibit 5.1: Average Cost per Family to the Homeless Services System, based on Lengths of Stay and Shelter Reimbursement Rates for Each Community

	Columbus, OH	Philadelphia	Massachusetts	New York City
Temporary	$3,828	$4,900	$11,550	$13,900
Episodic	$17,168	$19,043	$21,450	$38,500
Long Stayer	$21,692	$30,812	$48,440	$55,200

Source: Culhane, Metraux, Park, Schretzman, and Valente, 2007.

Culhane et al. (2007) match families in their study sample to selected mainstream systems for which they were able to obtain data. However, they do not report the costs of mainstream system use or suggest whether these costs could be reduced by preventing or ending homelessness for particular families. Such analysis of cost offsets has been confined to the individual homeless population and is discussed in Chapter 4.

As far as we know, this is the only previous analysis of the costs of homelessness for families. Other studies have been program evaluations that have reported on the outcomes of interventions for homeless families, but not systematically on their costs.¹

5.1.2 This Study and Previous Research on Costs of Family Homelessness

This study of family homelessness in four additional communities—Kalamazoo, MI, Houston, TX, Upstate South Carolina, and Washington, D.C.—builds on and differs from Culhane et al. (2007) in the following ways:

- Like Culhane et al., we use cluster analysis, conducted separately for each of our four communities, to identify groups of first-time homeless families who follow different patterns or “paths” of use of the homeless services system. However, we use additional dimensions—type of program used, sequences of program use, and the lengths of “gaps” during which families are not in a residential program for homeless people—to create these clusters.
- Like Culhane et al., we use data from selected mainstream systems to which we were able to gain access to interpret the relative neediness of families and also to infer what caused them to become homeless.
- Instead of standard reimbursement rates for public funding of residential programs for homeless people, we use actual costs of programs collected from program budgets. This enables us to explore the influence of different types of programs on homeless costs.
- For three of the four communities, we are able to report data on the costs of the use of mainstream systems by homeless families and to make some inferences about potential cost savings and offsets.

¹ For a summary of this literature, see Locke, Khadduri, and O’Hara, 2007.

5.2. Characteristics of First-Time Homeless Families

We studied first-time homelessness among families in Houston, Washington DC, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina.² Across the four sites, we identified 1,374 families as first-time homeless between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005.³ Although Houston is by far the largest community in the study in terms of general population, only 35 percent of the study population is in Houston and Washington DC had almost as many first-time homeless families as Houston (Exhibit 5.2).

The characteristics of the families in the study cohort in each site are shown in Exhibit 5.2. At all sites, most were single-parent families, and most adults were female. However, all sites included some adult men. The percentages of family members identified as black or African American reflect differences among the four communities. At the same time, as is the case for the AHAR national estimate, homeless families at these sites were disproportionately African American, compared with the African American percentage of the poverty population in the same communities. Nevertheless, all sites except for DC have many white families. Because of limitations of the HMIS data for these four communities, we were not able to determine the percentage of families who identified themselves as Hispanic or Latino. The AHAR estimate is that, nationally, 22 percent of homeless families identify themselves as Hispanic (all races), considerably lower than the percentage of all poor families who are Hispanic (HUD 2008). In each of the communities and especially Houston, the percentage of first-time homeless families who are minorities, including families identifying themselves as Hispanic, doubtless is somewhat higher than the percentage who are African American.

Exhibit 5.2: Characteristics of the Study Cohort of Families Who Became Homeless between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005

	Number of families	Adults who are male	African American	Average Age of Adults	Average Family Size
Houston	477	13%	61%	32	3.2
DC	410	17%	93%	32	3.5
Kalamazoo	342	15%	61%	30	3.2
Upstate SC	145	11%	53%	31	3.0

The age of adults and average family size for the study cohorts in the four communities are very similar to those characteristics for homeless families nationally, as estimated by the AHAR (HUD 2008). Nationally, adult men are somewhat more common among adults in homeless families (18 percent), compared to the first-time homeless study cohorts in the study communities except for Washington, DC.

² A family was defined as a group of people who were served together at any time during the study period and who, at any time during the study period, included at least one adult (18 or older) and one child (17 or younger) when served by a program for homeless people. As a result, members of homeless families sometimes were found in programs serving homeless individuals at the study sites. “Stays” in individual programs were considered part of the overall period of homelessness, and their costs were included in the costs of serving homeless families.

³ In Kalamazoo, we identified families for the study cohort based on first entry into the homeless system between January 1, 2005 and December 31, 2005.

We followed all members of each family in the study cohort for 18 months after the family (or one of its members) first appeared in the homeless services system. For DC, we were able to follow the study cohort for 30 months following the beginning of homelessness, and we decided to take advantage of this longer observation period because we found few families in the study cohort in transitional housing or permanent supportive housing when we followed them just for the first 18 months after their first entry into the homeless residential services system for homeless people.

When a family had more than one “stay” in a homeless program during the observation period, we often found that the composition of the household changed over the family’s total period of homelessness. Change took a variety of forms: different adults appeared together with children; different children appeared together with adults; adults appeared without children during some program stays and with children in others; two adults were present at some times and not at others. Exhibit 5.3 shows the percentage of families with more than one program stay in each of the sites and also the extent of change in household composition.

Exhibit 5.3: Changes in Household Composition among Homeless Families
	Families with change in composition (entire study cohort)	Families with more than one program stay	Families changing composition among those with more than one program stay
Houston	25%	28%	65%
Washington, DC	34%	42%	76%
Kalamazoo	13%	32%	35%
Upstate SC	17%	35%	43%

At every site, at least one quarter of the families had more than one program stay, and a substantial fraction of those changed household composition when comparing household membership at the start of one program stay to the next. In the District of Columbia, which has the highest rates of composition change, more than a third of the study families changed in composition between stays during their period of sheltered homelessness.

Multivariate analysis presented later in this chapter will show that, after controlling for many other potential cost drivers including total days spent in homeless programs, families that changed composition had substantially higher costs to the homeless services system than those that did not.

5.3. Patterns of Family Homelessness and Associated Homeless System Costs

5.3.1 Homeless System Utilization

Central to costs to the homeless services system is how the system is used and, in particular, how many days a family spends in residential programs for homeless people. As shown in Exhibit 5.4, we found that the average total time that families spent in homeless programs during their period of homelessness varied dramatically across the four communities in the study, from just over 3 months in Kalamazoo to more than 9 months in DC.

The exhibit does not reflect lengths of stay for families in DC who used only a program--Community Care Grants—that places families directly from a central intake system into permanent housing and provides them with case management and short-term rental assistance. The “stays” reported to the HMIS for Community Care Grants reflect long periods of program enrollment during which families may receive case management provided by the homeless system but are not in the residential system for homeless families. Such lengths of stay are not comparable to lengths of stay within emergency shelter, transitional housing, or permanent supportive housing. The observation period in DC was longer—30 months rather than 18 months. The figures in parentheses on Exhibit 5.4 show lengths of stay and other patterns for the DC families for the first 18 months after they became homeless and show that DC still has the longest lengths of stay of any of the four communities.

The communities with relatively shorter lengths of stay, Kalamazoo and Houston, had a more skewed distribution, as shown by the difference between the average days spent in homeless programs and the medians and lowest quartiles (Exhibit 5.4). In Houston, half the study sample spent fewer than two months in homeless residential programs, and a quarter of the families were sheltered for 15 days or less. In Kalamazoo, half the study sample was in a program for a month or less, and a quarter of the families stayed 5 or fewer days. In DC, by contrast, the quarter of the sample with the briefest periods of sheltered homelessness still was in the system for more than a month.

Long periods spent by families in residential programs for homeless people may reflect housing market characteristics—for example a tight and expensive housing market and long waiting lists for assisted housing in Washington, DC—but may also reflect the way the homeless services system is organized and the relative attractiveness of the emergency and transitional housing facilities available in the community. Other factors that may affect long stays in DC include a central intake and screening process that may divert some families who otherwise would be short-stayers. In addition, DC had both congregate emergency shelters and “second stage” emergency shelters that provided private apartments without the time limits imposed by federal law on many transitional housing programs. Kalamazoo and Houston’s systems may be structured to move families out faster.

Exhibit 5.4: Use of the Homeless System by the Study Cohorts of First-Time Homeless Families during an 18-Month Period^a

	Average days in homeless programs	Median days in homeless programs	25th percentile days in homeless programs	Average number of program stays	Average “Gap Days” between stays ^b
Houston	114	50	15	1.4	29
DC	289 (223)	168 (129)	46 (38)	2.6 (2.1)	92 (35)
Kalamazoo	94	31	5	1.5	61
Upstate SC	186	103	27	1.4	25

^aFor DC, the figures outside the parentheses are for the full 30-month observation period. The figures inside the parentheses show utilization patterns by the same families for the first 18 months following their entry into the homeless services system.

^bIncludes the total of all days during entire period of homelessness when no family members were in residential programs for homeless people. If a family had only one program stay or consecutive stays, the gap would be 0 days.

Families in the homeless services system experienced between 25 and 92 “gap days” on average—that is, days during the family’s entire period of homelessness when no family members were in a residential program for homeless people. We cannot tell whether families were living in their own housing units or unstably housed with family or friends during these periods. It is unlikely that all family members were homeless on the street (DC, for example reports to HUD that there are no families with children among its street homeless population) or that all members of the family were incarcerated or in hospitals or other inpatient programs.⁴

Multivariate analysis shows that, even after controlling for other factors that may influence lengths of stay, such as the type of program used (emergency shelter, transitional housing, or a combination of the two) and a large number of family demographic characteristics, the community in which a family was homeless had a powerful effect on its length of stay. Exhibit 5.5 reports the results of the multivariate analysis. When multiplied by 100, the coefficients for the covariates can be interpreted as percentage differences from the reference category, since the outcome variable is in logarithm scale. Compared with Kalamazoo (the reference category), DC families were sheltered 91 percent longer, Upstate South Carolina families 71 percent longer, and Houston families 45 percent longer.

Not unexpectedly, the most powerful factor for determining families’ lengths of stay in the homeless services system was the type of program they used. (Again, this analysis does not include families who used only the Community Care Grants program in DC, for which lengths of stay reflect a period

Exhibit 5.5: Regression Analysis of the Length of Stay for First-Time Homeless Families

Total length of stay (log scale)
Site
Families in DC ^a	0.913 (0.115)
Families in South Carolina	0.714 (0.135)
Families in Houston	0.449 (0.098)
Household Characteristics
Total number of adults in household	-0.045 (0.183)
Total number of children in household	0.077 (0.032)
Any change in household composition during the study period	0.443 (0.104)
Program Types Used
Transitional Housing-only program type	2.436 (0.100)
Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing-only program type	1.988 (0.137)
Other program type	1.921 (0.164)
Demographics
Male adult-only household type	-0.127 (0.271)
Female adult-only household type	-0.361* (0.210)
African American household head	-0.132 (0.097)
Household head of other race	-0.182 (0.191)
Household head ages 18-24	-0.269 (0.113)
Household head ages 25-30	-0.057 (0.105)
Household head ages 41-50	0.145 (0.123)
Household head ages 51 or above	0.538* (0.281)
Household with youngest child born after study entry	0.224 (0.238)
Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.103 (0.101)
Household youngest child ages 13-17	0.176 (0.162)
Household head race missing	-0.312 (0.245)
Household head age missing	-0.522 (0.634)
Youngest child age missing	-0.183 (0.299)
Constant	2.812 (0.407)
Observations	1285
R-squared	0.48

Reference categories are: clients in Kalamazoo, Emergency Shelter-only program type, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31-40, household youngest child ages 0-5

^a Excluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

Standard errors in parentheses.

significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

⁴ Some of these “gaps” may represent incomplete HMIS data. Not every provider in these communities contributes data to the HMIS.

of case management rather than shelter within the homeless services system.) Controlling for other factors, including the community in which the family was served, those using only transitional housing spent 3.4⁵ times as many days in the homeless services system, and those using both emergency shelter and transitional housing spent approximately three times as many days as those who were only in emergency shelters. This model and others for which results are reported in this chapter were quite successful in explaining patterns and costs of family homelessness, as demonstrated by their large R-squared statistics.

Among the demographic characteristics tested, having more children had a small but statistically significant positive effect on length of stay, and changing household composition during the period of homelessness led to a 44 percent longer length of stay, after controlling for study site and type of program used. Race was not found to have a statistically significant effect on lengths of stay among study cohort families. This is an interesting finding, as the 2007 AHAR found that long-stayers in emergency shelter (among all families, not just first-time homeless families) were disproportionately African American (HUD, 2008).

Additional multivariate analysis predicting lengths of stay for first-time homeless families can be found in Appendix D.2.5.

Even controlling for length of stay, the program type a family uses is a powerful determinant of costs to the homeless services. Exhibit 5.6 shows the number of families in the study cohort using each type of residential program for homeless people across the four study sites. In every community, more families used emergency shelter than transitional housing. The numbers of families shown in the exhibit to have used each type of program sum to more families than the study cohort because some families used both emergency shelter and transitional housing or some other combination of programs

As shown in Chapter 3, emergency shelter and transitional programs have roughly equivalent daily costs when congregate shelters are compared with facility-based transitional models and apartment-based shelters are compared with scattered-site transitional models (See Exhibit 3.6). However, the costs of particular programs within each type of emergency shelter and transitional housing varied widely at each site. In addition, the first-time homeless families in our study cohort sometimes used particular programs that were either more expensive or less expensive than the typical emergency or transitional program serving families in that community. For example, in Houston the study cohort used extensively the most expensive transitional program, more costly in part because it offers many on-site services. In DC, use of the least expensive emergency shelter program by the study cohort was relatively rare. Whereas in Kalamazoo, the study cohort tended to use a particularly inexpensive transitional housing program;⁶ in Upstate South Carolina, first-time homeless families often used a relatively expensive emergency shelter program with a high ratio of staff to families served.⁷

⁵ The coefficient of 2.4 indicates that these families spent 2.4 additional days for each reference day, or 3.4 times the reference category.

⁶ One of the property-based transitional housing programs in Kalamazoo has very low housing operating costs, moderate service costs, and very low administrative overhead. The property also has very low market value, and adding an estimate for capital costs would have increased the daily cost by only $1.

⁷ The program is heavily staffed by volunteers, and we included an estimate of the value of their time in the program cost.

Exhibit 5.6: Numbers of First-Time Homeless Families using Basic Types of Residential Programs for Homeless People by the Study Cohorts of First-Time Homeless Families

	Houston	DC	Kalamazoo	Upstate SC
Emergency shelter	400	317	271	109
Transitional housing	131	107	91	63
Permanent supportive housing	16	26	11	0
Other program types ^a	6	119	n/a	1

^aOther types include outreach (Houston) and the Community Care Grants program (DC). We have not included families who used only these programs in the multivariate analysis of the determinants of the use of program types or in the multivariate analysis of the determinants of total program costs per family. Among other reasons, the meaning of a “day” is ambiguous for these programs

As shown in the exhibit, few first-time homeless families in any community used permanent supportive housing (PSH). Permanent supportive housing is available only to families with a disabled adult. However, an examination of overall usage of permanent supportive housing during the study period also suggests a capacity constraint. Most PSH units available for families were already occupied by families who had become homeless before the start of our study period.

We conducted multivariate analysis (Multinomial Logit model) to determine which types of families are most likely to use which types of residential program for homeless people. In this analysis, families who used Permanent Supportive Housing were grouped with the “other” category. Families that used only the Community Care Grants program in DC were not included in the model, so across the four study communities the “other” category usually means permanent supportive housing, either alone or in combination with emergency shelter or transitional housing. The results are reported in Exhibit 5.7. The regression coefficients for the model are expressed in odds ratio format, with values greater than one showing that a particular type of household is more likely to use a program type than the reference group. The coefficients for the community in which a family is homeless show that families in Upstate South Carolina are more likely to use transitional housing in combination with emergency shelter than families in other communities, which may reflect a stronger pattern of referrals from emergency shelter to transitional housing in that community compared with others. Families in DC are relatively more likely than those in other communities to use an “other” program type, which reflects the relatively greater availability of permanent supportive housing units for families in that community.

The model shows that families with only adult women are not more likely to use transitional housing (alone or in combination with emergency shelter) than the small number of families in the study sample that have only adult men or that have both men and women. The odds ratio for families with only adult women is greater than one, but the result is not statistically significant. The only demographic characteristic that helps explain which families use transitional housing, is whether the family has a child born during the family’s period of homelessness. Such families are eight times as likely as those without a child born homeless to use both emergency shelter and transitional housing, suggesting that these vulnerable families often get referred from emergency shelter to transitional housing and pass whatever screening criteria transitional programs may use.

Finally, the model shows that African American families and families with a younger head of household (18 to 24 years) are only about a quarter as likely to use the “other” program type (basically permanent supportive housing) as white families or relatively older families. This suggests that young families and African American families who become homeless for the first time are relatively less likely than other first-time homeless families to have a disabling condition that made them vulnerable to becoming homeless. Having an adult household member with a disability condition is a requirement for receiving permanent supportive housing.

Exhibit 5.7: Regression Analysis of Program Types used by First-Time Homeless Families in Kalamazoo, DC, South Carolina, and Houston

Program type Category (ES only; TH only; ES and TH only; Other)	Multinomial Logit Model
	Base category = Emergency Shelter Only
	Transitional Housing Only		Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing Only		Other
Clients in DC ^d	0.852	(0.201)	1.346	(0.414)	9.246	(3.822)
Clients in South Carolina	1.622	(0.404)	3.433	(1.080)	0.224	(0.237)
Clients in Houston	0.990	(0.186)	0.984	(0.283)	1.433	(0.562)
Total number of adults in household	1.102	(0.445)	1.220	(0.603)	2.156	(0.849)
Total number of children in household	0.972	(0.064)	0.890	(0.080)	1.127	(0.096)
Male adult-only household type	0.965	(0.579)	0.899	(0.643)	1.732	(1.190)
Female adult-only household type	1.512	(0.705)	0.925	(0.509)	1.369	(0.688)
African American household head	0.934	(0.173)	1.155	(0.302)	0.286	(0.101)
Household head of other race	0.713	(0.268)	0.164	(0.171)	0.000	(0.000)
Household head ages 18-24	0.747	(0.168)	1.009	(0.316)	0.265	(0.118)
Household head ages 25-30	0.961	(0.199)	1.370	(0.395)	0.925	(0.290)
Household head ages 41-50	1.034	(0.261)	1.829	(0.585)	1.319	(0.424)
Household head ages 51 or above	0.780	(0.465)	1.391	(0.948)	0.553	(0.451)
Household with youngest child born after study entry	1.376	(0.745)	7.974	(3.403)	1.124	(0.703)
Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.763	(0.158)	1.013	(0.274)	1.016	(0.303)
Household youngest child ages 13-17	1.164	(0.365)	1.035	(0.440)	1.454	(0.640)
Household head race missing	0.432	(0.247)	0.290	(0.306)	0.198	(0.215)
Household head age missing	0.575	(0.757)	0.000	(0.000)	0.000	(0.000)
Youngest child age missing	3.324*	(1.685)	0.912	(0.987)	3.284	(2.813)
Constant	0.222	(0.197)	0.086*	(0.094)	0.029	(0.028)
Observations	1285
Log likelihood	-1109.4261

Reference categories are: clients in Kalamazoo, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31-40, household youngest child ages 0-5. Coefficients for households with missing values are included in the full model in Appendix Sections D.2.3 and D.2.4.

Coefficients in relative risk ratio format

Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

^d Excluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

Additional multivariate analysis predicting the type of program used by first-time homeless families can be found in Appendix Sections D.2.3 and D.2.4.

5.3.2 Costs to Homeless System of First-Time Family Homelessness

The cost for serving each first-time homeless family is the sum of the costs of each program stay by one or more family members. The cost of each stay is the daily cost of the particular program used by the family times the number of days in the stay. The average cost to the homeless services system for each family in the study cohort ranges from only $3,184 in Kalamazoo, to $9,663 in Upstate South Carolina, to $11,627 in Houston, to $20,031 in Washington DC, as shown in Exhibit 5.8. The cost per family in DC drops to $16,205 if we consider only costs for program stays that occurred during the first 18 months after a family enters the residential system, but is still much higher than any of the other study communities.

Exhibit 5.8: Average Homeless System Cost per Family
	Kalamazoo	Upstate South Carolina	Houston	Washington, DC^a
Average Cost per Family	$3,184	$9,663	$11,627	$20,031

^aThe DC cost per family does not include families who used only the Community Care Grants program. Including such families would drop the average cost per family in DC to $17,962.

With the exception of DC, these costs are substantially lower than the average costs identified by Culhane et al. in their study of homelessness in four other communities.⁸ However, like patterns of utilization, the distribution of costs for each family in our study cohort is quite skewed, more so in some communities than in others. In Upstate South Carolina, the highest-cost 10 percent of the study cohort accounts for 32 percent of the total cost to the system, while in Houston the 10 percent highest-cost group accounts for 57 percent of the total system cost. In every study site, the lowest-cost half of the families accounts for less than one-seventh of the total cost incurred by the community for serving first-time homeless families, although this ranges from 13 percent in Upstate South Carolina to 5 percent in Houston.

The multivariate analysis of homeless costs includes covariates for sites, length of stay, program types used and other variables that reflect program use patterns, including number of stays, and number of “gap days.” We also included whether the family changed composition during the period of homelessness, and the following basic family demographic characteristics: age of adults, age of children, number of adults, number of children, gender of head of household and race of head of household. Exhibit 5.9 presents the results of this analysis. Since the outcome variable is in logarithm scale, the coefficients for the covariates can be interpreted as percentage differences from the reference category when multiplied by 100.

Appendixes D.2.1 and D.2.2 show how we arrived at this final model specification, using two different model construction approaches. Approach 1 starts with the basic building block of costs per family, first adding length of stay (Model 1) to dummy variables controlling for site differences.

⁸ Culhane et al. (2007) found average costs per family to be $24,000 in New York City over three years and $19,690 in Massachusetts over two years.

Model 2 adds program type to site dummy variables and length of stay. Models 3 and 4 add program use, number of stays, number of gap days between stays, and whether the family changed composition between homeless stays. The final models (5 and 6) add basic family demographic characteristics. See Appendix D.2.1 for detailed results for all 6 models in Approach 1.

Exhibit 5.9: Regression Analysis of Total Homeless Costs
	Total homeless costs (log scale)	(cont.)	Total homeless costs (log scale)
Site		Demographics
Washington, DC ^a	0.836 (0.103)	African American household head	-0.290 (0.084)
Upstate South Carolina	0.693 (0.119)	Household head of other race	-0.042 (0.166)
Houston, TX	0.862 (0.086)	Household head ages 18-24	-0.038 (0.099)
Homeless System Utilization and Program Types
Length of stay (in days) divided by 30	0.219 (0.008)	Household head ages 25-30	0.020 (0.091)
Transitional Housing-only program type	0.475 (0.111)	Household head ages 41-50	0.086 (0.107)
Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing-only program type	0.437 (0.133)	Household head ages 51 or above	0.156 (0.245)
Other program type	-0.427 (0.158)	Household with youngest child born after study entry	-0.465 (0.209)
Total number of stays	0.031 (0.024)	Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.205 (0.088)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	0.028 (0.009)	Household youngest child ages 13-17	0.195 (0.141)
Household Composition
Any change in household composition during the study period	0.350 (0.099)	Household head race missing	-0.191 (0.213)
Total number of adults in household	-0.024 (0.160)	Household head age missing	-0.802 (0.551)
Total number of children in household	0.055 (0.028)	Youngest child age missing	-0.061 (0.260)
Male adult-only household type	-0.230 (0.236)	Constant	6.283 (0.355)
Female adult-only household type	-0.245 (0.183)	Observations	1285
		R-squared	0.64

Reference categories are: Kalamazoo, MI, Emergency Shelter-only program type, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31 - 40, household youngest child ages 0-5.

Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

^aExcluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

Approach 2 (Appendix D.2.2) starts with site dummies and basic family demographics (Model 1) and then adds program type (Model 3), length of stay (Model 4), and then numbers of stays and gap days (Model 5). Models 2 and 6 also add the variable that reflects whether the household changed composition. See Appendix D.2.2 for detailed results for all 6 models in Approach 2. These alternative model specifications enable us to grasp the interactions among the variables in the full model.

The analysis shows that DC, Upstate South Carolina, and Houston all have costs per family 70-90 percent higher than Kalamazoo (the reference category). The lower cost per family in Kalamazoo reflects the use by first-time homeless families of particular emergency shelter and transitional housing programs that have low costs. For example, the average daily cost of the transitional housing programs used by the study cohort in Kalamazoo is only $22, much lower than the daily cost of transitional housing used by the study cohorts in the other three communities. Kalamazoo has several transitional housing programs, with a wide range of daily costs per unit, as described in Chapter 3.

The differences in total cost per family among the other three communities are not very large when controlling for type of program used and patterns of use such as lengths of stay. Coefficients range from .693 to .862 and show that the study cohort in Houston used slightly more expensive programs within particular program types compared with the study cohorts in DC and Upstate South Carolina. Houston has a transitional housing program with very high operating and services costs, totaling $177 per day.

Overall, the regression results show that each additional 30 days spent in residential homeless programs compared to the mean length of stay of 144 days adds about 22 percent to the cross-site average total family cost to the homeless services system of $10,311. The effect of long lengths of stay in DC and Upstate South Carolina compound the already high costs in these communities. A model that does not control either for length of stay or for program type (Approach 2, Model 1) shows that first-time homeless families in DC and Upstate South Carolina cost the homeless services system more than twice as much as families in Kalamazoo. The coefficients are 1.630 for DC and 1.442 for Upstate South Carolina. Families in Houston cost twice as much as families in Kalamazoo. (The coefficient is 1.016).

Families who used emergency shelter together with transitional housing and no other programs (8 percent of the study cohort across the three sites) cost 44 percent more than families that use just emergency shelter, whereas families that use just transitional housing (13 percent of the study cohort) cost 48 percent more than families that use just emergency shelter. Those who used “other” combinations of programs beyond emergency shelter and transitional housing incurred 43 percent lower costs than those who used only emergency shelter. These lower costs reflect the relatively low cost of permanent supportive housing for the small number of families in the study cohorts that used it.⁹ As detailed in Chapter 3, the cost of permanent supportive housing to the homeless services system is low compared with both emergency shelter and transitional housing since services are primarily provided by mainstream systems, rather than directly by the homeless services system.

The model results also revealed some differences in total cost per family related to family characteristics. Families that change composition during their period of homelessness have costs about 35 percent higher than families that do not change. Despite the correlation between “gap days” spent in between program stays and changes in family composition, gaps (measured in 30-day increments) also have a statistically significant, although small, positive effect on costs per family to the homeless services system. Given that length of stay and program types are also controlled, these results suggest that families with unstable housing and unstable family composition on average use more expensive programs within each program type.

⁹ This model did not include families in DC who used only the Congregate Care Grants or SAFAH programs. SAFAH provides housing placement assistance. Congregate Care Grants provides short-term rental assistance and longer-term case management for families who never enter the residential system for homeless families. The resulting costs are extremely low for each day that the HMIS counts a family as being in the program.

African-American families (70 percent of the study cohort across the four communities) have costs 29 percent lower on average than white families. The implication is that, within each site and each program type, African American families are using relatively less expensive homeless services programs. This could be because African-American families, shown by other research to be homeless at higher rates than other poor families, have fewer service needs and are homeless related to poverty and limited social supports that do not require intensive social services to address. Use of less expensive programs could also reflect an informal or clinical bias that results in fewer referrals or admissions for African-American families into more intensive programs.

In the full model, there is no significant difference in cost between families headed by people between the ages of 18 and 24 those headed by 31 to 40 year olds. Without controls for program types and length of stay, those between 18 and 24 cost about a third less than those between 31-40 (Approach 2, Models 1 and 2). Adding a control for program type reduces this difference to 25 percent (Model 3). The difference disappears when the control for length of stay is added (Model 4). Thus, younger families are using less expensive types of programs and using them for shorter periods of time than relatively older families.

Larger families (those with additional adults or additional children) cost the homeless services system little more than smaller families. An additional child (compared to the mean of 2.12 children) produces a modest 6 percent increase in costs. Additional adults or adults of different genders have no discernable effect on costs, and this result holds for models with and without a control for whether the composition of the family changed. To some extent, these results may stem from the way we collected program costs. We did not distinguish between the costs of different amounts of space needed for different families (e.g., numbers of beds or bedrooms) or for other costs that might vary by family size such as the number of meals provided. We simply assumed that a particular program incurs on average the same cost for each family using the program. As a whole, larger families do not use programs that, across all families served, have higher costs than the programs used by smaller families.

We did find a relationship between the age of a family's children and its costs to the homeless services system. Families whose youngest child is grade school age (6 to 12 years) cost 21 percent more than families with younger children. Families with children in that age range may choose to use programs—or be directed to programs—with more costly housing types or with additional services, compared with other first-time homeless families.

5.3.3 Costs to the Homeless System for “Path Groups” of Families Who Use the System in Similar Ways

To understand better the heterogeneity of the homeless experience and its associated costs among first-time homeless families, we used multivariate cluster analysis to categorize families into “path groups,” based on their total lengths of stay, number of discrete stays, total number of “gap days,” and types and sequences of programs used. Cluster analysis was conducted independently for each site, and each of the communities was found to have paths that were not replicated precisely at the others.

However, the following broad categories of path groups emerged in each of the four study sites.

- Brief users of emergency shelter
- Heavy users of transitional housing
- Repeat users of residential homeless programs with long gaps

Exhibit 5.10: Common Paths Taken by First-Time Homeless Families
	Brief users of emergency shelter (% of study cohort)	Heavy users of transitional housing (% of study cohort)	Repeat users of one or more program types with long gaps (% of study cohort)
Houston	66%	29%	5%
DC ^a	33%	30%	16%
Kalamazoo	61%	24%	16%
Upstate South Carolina	49%	42%	10%

Percentages within each site may sum to greater than 100 percent due to rounding.

^aDC percentages exclude those who were served exclusively by the Community Care Grants program. In addition, eleven percent of families in DC followed paths not found in other sites, See Section 5.3.4.

Exhibit 5.10 shows the size of these groups across the four communities. Brief users of emergency shelter make up roughly two-thirds of the families in Houston and Kalamazoo, almost half of the families in Upstate South Carolina, and one-third of the families in DC. Heavy users of transitional housing are more than a quarter of the study cohort in Houston, DC, and Kalamazoo, and 42 percent in Upstate South Carolina. “Long gappers,” families with multiple program stays and long cumulative periods in between stays, make up a relatively small portion of all first-time homeless families. They are most common in DC and Kalamazoo.

The path groups are characterized by their shelter use patterns, but analysis of demographic characteristics and mainstream program involvement helps to describe further the differences among the groups. Exhibit 5.11 summarizes some of the ways in which families who followed particular path groups differ from other first-time homeless families in the study cohort.

Brief Users of Emergency Shelter have one or two stays in emergency shelters, spend a few days to a few months there, and then do not return to the residential system for homeless people.¹⁰ Across our four study communities, they had relatively younger and smaller households and, based on their use of mainstream systems, had relatively lower needs than other families in the study cohort (Exhibit 5.11).

¹⁰ This pattern held in DC, where we were able to follow families over a 30-month period after their first appearance in the homeless services system.

Exhibit 5.11: Selected Characteristics of First-Time Homeless Family Path Groups

	Brief users of emergency shelter	Heavy users of transitional housing	Repeat users of one or more program types with long gaps
Compared with other First-Time Homeless Family Path Groups at each site:
Houston	Younger adults and children Least involvement with mental health treatment and criminal justice systems	Fewer men More likely to be white Heavy users of mental health system	More men More likely to be "other" race 68% experienced household change High arrest rates
DC	Demographics not distinct from rest of cohort Lower use of substance abuse services	Fewer men Somewhat younger adults and children Among highest use of substance abuse and mental health services	More men 92% experienced household change High rates of involvement with child welfare High use of substance abuse services
Kalamazoo	Younger adults, smaller households Lower arrest rates Lower use of Medicaid	More men More likely to be white	58% experienced household change High arrest rates
Upstate South Carolina	Younger adults and children, smaller households Lower use of Medicaid	Demographics not distinct from rest of cohort	More men More likely to be white 64% household change High arrest rates

Across the four study sites, this group represented between 33 percent and 66 percent of each cohort, but accounted for only 9 percent to 30 percent of total homeless system cost. Exhibit 5.12 shows the average household cost to the homeless services system for the path groups in each community following this pattern. They range from under $1000 to almost $9,000, depending on a combination of the average number of days spent in programs (shown on the Exhibit) and the relative cost of programs used. For example, costs in Upstate South Carolina are relatively high for its brief-user families compared with the number of days spent in programs, because many first-time homeless families used a very expensive type of emergency shelter.

Exhibit 5.12: Average Household Cost to the Homeless Services System for Brief Users of Emergency Shelter

	Average Total Length of Stay	Average Total Cost per Family
Houston Emergency Shelter Short Stayers	37 days	$2,321
Houston Emergency Shelter Repeat Users	101 days	$5,748
DC Congregate Emergency Shelter Short Stayers	67 days	$5,098
Kalamazoo Emergency Shelter Single Use Short Stayers	15 days	$1,172
Kalamazoo Emergency Shelter Repeat Users	48 days	$2,977
SC One-Week Single Stayers	9 days	$784
SC One-Month Returners	31 days	$2,508
SC Three-Month Single Stayers	88 days	$8,890

Heavy Users of Transitional Housing use transitional housing exclusively, in combination with emergency shelter, or (in a few cases) together with permanent supportive housing. Their average length of stay ranges from 8 to 18 months, depending on the community and the specific path revealed by the cluster analysis for that community (Exhibit 5.13).

Across the four communities, heavy users of transitional housing were somewhat more likely to be white and had a smaller percentage of men. However, in Kalamazoo this group includes more men, probably because one of the primary transitional housing programs in Kalamazoo accommodates two-adult families. In DC, heavy users of transitional housing are on average somewhat younger families than other path groups.

Unlike Culhane et al., (2007) we did not find that these “long stayers” in the residential services system for homeless families were less likely to be heavy users of mainstream behavioral health services than the study cohort as a whole. In Houston, they were heavy users of the mental health system, and in DC they had among the highest rates of use of mental health and substance abuse services of the path groups.¹¹ However, Culhane et al. (2007) looked only for use of intensive behavioral health services such as inpatient or acute care (in Philadelphia and Massachusetts), whereas we recorded any contact with the mental health system (in Houston and DC) or the substance abuse agency (in DC).

Like Culhane et al. (2007), we found that the long periods of time spent in the homeless services system made this by far the most costly group of families. Exhibit 5.13 shows that the average cost per family to the homeless services system for heavy users of transitional housing ranged from $6,474 in Kalamazoo, a community with the relatively small percentage of such families and frequent use of a particularly inexpensive transitional housing program by first-time homeless families,¹² to $38,742 in Washington DC for a group that first used emergency shelter and then moved to transitional housing, with an average total length of stay of 551 days. Heavy users of transitional housing represented only 24 percent to 42 percent of the families in each community, but incurred between 47 percent and 82 percent of total homeless system costs.

¹¹ Culhane et al.’s “long stayers” group does not distinguish between long stayers in emergency shelter and long stayers in transitional housing. Our most comparable group may be a path group in DC (discussed below in Section 5.3.4) that uses apartment-style emergency shelters as well as congregate emergency shelters and has long stays. The homeless services system in DC may be more similar to New York City and Philadelphia than the systems in our other study communities, in which we did not find a path group of long-term users of emergency shelter. This path group in DC has rates of involvement with the behavior health systems similar to rates for heavy users of transitional housing and a higher rate of involvement with the child welfare agency.

¹² One of the property-based transitional housing programs in Kalamazoo has very low housing operating costs, moderate service costs, and very low administrative overhead. The property also has very low market value, and while we did not record capital costs for any of the programs in Kalamazoo, Houston, or DC, adding an estimate for capital costs would have increased the daily cost by only $1. In contrast, one of the transitional housing programs that was heavily used by the Houston family study cohort, representing 47 percent of the transitional housing stays by families in Houston, has high operating costs and extremely high service costs. The overall program costs are two to seven times higher than other transitional programs in Houston, and the services alone are almost triple those of the other family facility-based transitional housing programs for which we collected costs.

Exhibit 5.13: Cost to the Homeless Services System for Heavy Users of Transitional Housing

	Average Total Length of Stay	Average Total Cost per Family	Average Monthly Cost Per Family (including gap days)	Local Two-Bedroom Fair Market Rent FY 2006 ^b
Houston Multi-Program Users	236 days	$26,913	$2,544
Houston Housing-Program Users	284 days	$35,344	$3,584	$743
DC Progressing Long-Stayers ^a	551 days	$38,742	$1,960
DC Transitional Housing Only ^a	477 days	$31,822	$2,001	$1,225
Kalamazoo Long Stayers	289 days	$6,574	$664	$612
SC Progressing Long-Stayers	329 days	$16,036	$1,358
SC Transitional Housing Only	375 days	$15,478	$1,226	$599

^aIf only the first 18 months following the family’s first entry into the homeless services system are counted, the average cost per family for DC is $31,951 for progressing long-stayers and $25,771 for those who use only transitional housing.

^bFY2006 FMR is provided for Greenville, SC MSA, which is part of the Upstate South Carolina CoC geography and appears to have the highest FMR in the CoC (HUD, 2005) The FMR does not include the monthly fee paid to a public housing agency for administering the voucher program, which ranged from $50 to $90 per unit per month in these four communities. (HUD, 2007)

The exhibit also shows the cost per family standardized to a one-month cost and compares it to the cost of housing a family similar in size to most homeless families with a Housing Choice Voucher, assuming that the family’s share of the rent would be the same in both cases—that is, that transitional housing, like the voucher program, would require a family rent payment of 30 percent of income. The far greater cost of transitional housing in every community except for Kalamazoo to some extent may reflect the use of more expensive residential structures by transitional housing programs, but probably mainly reflects higher costs associated with on-site supervision for some programs and case management and other services for all transitional housing programs.

Whether the additional cost of transitional housing produces offsetting benefits, compared with placing a homeless family directly into permanent housing with a voucher, is beyond the scope of this study. For example, the services provided in connection with transitional housing might enable a parent to become economically self-sufficient and pay the cost of a private market rent from earned income. The short-term cost of transitional housing then might offset the cost of a longer-term voucher rent subsidy. The evidence we have to date suggests that is not the case. Burt (forthcoming 2009) interviewed former users of transitional housing deemed by program staff to have left successfully. She found that longer stays in transitional housing were associated with some positive outcomes, but that the most successful leavers of transitional housing did so with a voucher.

Repeat Users of Residential Homeless Programs with Long Gaps may use just emergency shelter or may use a combination of emergency shelter and transitional housing. What distinguishes this relatively small group of families (5 to 16 percent of the study cohort) is that they leave the residential homeless services system and then return—not a few days later, but after long absences. The cumulative “gaps” in service during their entire periods of homelessness range from 134 days for the path group in South Carolina (where the “gapper” pattern was less pronounced than in other communities) to 515 days for families following this path in the District of Columbia, who have an average of 7.2 discrete program stays and on average remain in a residential program for only 38 days at a time. Their average gap ranges from two and a half months in DC to six months for one of the groups in Kalamazoo (Exhibit 5.14).

Exhibit 5.14: Patterns of Use of the Residential Homeless System for “Long Gapper” First-Time Homeless Families
	Average Number of Program Stays	Average Days per Program Stay	Average Cumulative gap days	Average gap between each stay
Houston Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	3.4 stays	19 days	346 days	144 days
DC Long Gappers	7.2 stays	38 days	515 days	79 days
Kalamazoo Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	3.1 stays	12 days	378 days	180 days
Kalamazoo Multi-Program Long Gappers	3.3 stays	44 days	275 days	120 days
Upstate South Carolina Six-Month Returners	2.3 stays	77 days	134 days	103 days

Note: The average gap is average cumulative gap days divided by one fewer than the average number of stays, since gaps have to take place between stays.

We do not know the extent to which these “long gappers” attempt to establish themselves as leaseholders between homeless program stays or how frequently they temporarily move in with family or friends. Suggestive characteristics of these families are that they experience very high rates of change in household composition and often include men at some point during their periods of sheltered homelessness (Exhibit 5.15). Thus, their housing instability may be linked to unstable situations involving family conflict or, in some cases, arrests and jail time.

Families with long gaps had high arrest rates in Houston, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina. In Upstate South Carolina, 71 percent of this group of families had a family member arrested at some point during the study period. We did not obtain criminal justice data for DC. In Washington, DC, the only community for which we were able to obtain any data at all from the child welfare system, we found that 55 percent of this group of families had a service record with the child welfare agency during the year before homelessness or following the start of homelessness.

Compared with all first-time homeless families in the community, families in the long-gapper group in Upstate South Carolina were relatively more likely to be white rather than African American. In Kalamazoo, they were somewhat more likely to be African American than the cohort overall (Exhibit 5.15). In DC, where almost the entire study cohort is African American, the long gapper group includes more families identifying their race as white, Asian, or “other.” In Houston, where the long-gapper group makes up only 5 percent of the study cohort, this group is slightly more likely to be African American than the study cohort as a whole. At the same time, a relatively high percentage of long gappers in Houston (23 percent) reported their race as “other” or refused to identify their race.

Exhibit 5.15: Selected Demographic Characteristics of “Long Gappers”

	Change in Household Composition	Percent of Adults who are Men	Percentage African American: Gappers/ study cohort
Houston Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	68%	28%	67% / 61%
DC Long Gappers	92%	24%	89% / 93%
Kalamazoo Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	61%	16%	67% / 61%
Kalamazoo Multi-Program Long Gappers	53%	10%	68% / 61%
Upstate South Carolina Six-Month Returners	64%	18%	35% / 53%

Because of the relatively small number of days spent in the homeless services system, the cost to the system for this group of highly unstable families is relatively low. Across the four sites, the group represented only between 5 percent and 16 percent of each cohort and incurred between 1.5 percent and 20 percent of total costs. As shown in Exhibit 5.16, cost per family ranges from $3,295 for a group in Kalamazoo that used only emergency shelter to $17,314 for a group in Washington DC that spent a relatively long time in residential programs, despite being out of the system for long periods as well over their total period of homelessness.

Exhibit 5.16: Average Cost Per Family to the Homeless Services System for Repeat Users of the Residential Services System with Long Gaps

	Average Total Length of Stay	Average Total Cost per Family
Houston Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	63 days	$3,885
DC Long Gappers	273 days	$17,314
Kalamazoo Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	38 days	$3,295
Kalamazoo Multi-Program Long Gappers	144 days	$5,925
Upstate South Carolina Six-Month Returners	176 days	$12,475

Opportunities for cost savings to the homeless services system through helping these families to achieve stable rather than unstable housing when they leave shelter seem to be largest in Washington DC and in Upstate South Carolina. In DC we tracked families for a longer period after they first became homeless, 30 months instead of 18 months, and this is reflected in the relatively large number of days spent in homeless programs, almost 10 months on average and the large number of stays, 7.2.¹³ The high cost in DC reflects both this relatively long length of stay for a “gapper” group and the high cost of the particular programs used. In DC and perhaps in other communities as well, cost offsets may be possible within the homeless services system, as well as for mainstream public systems, if costs over a period of many years are considered.

¹³ If only the first 18 months following the family’s first entry into the homeless services system are counted, the average number of stays per family for DC long gappers is 4.7 and the average total length of stay is 164 days. The average total cost per family is $10,462.

The group most similar to long gappers in the Culhane et al. (2007) study of New York City, Philadelphia, Columbus OH, and Massachusetts is “Episodic” users of the shelter system, but this group has longer lengths of stay, ranging from 148 days in Columbus to 385 days in New York. The “Episodic” group has considerably higher homeless system costs than the costs of the “long-gapper” groups in Houston, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina: $17,168 in Columbus, $19,043 in Philadelphia, $21,450 in Massachusetts, and $38,500 in New York. Only in Washington DC are the costs for “long gappers” similar to the costs of “Episodic” users in the Culhane et al. study.

The longer stays and higher cost measured by Culhane et al. (2007) may be in part a result of how total days in the homeless service system are measured (they ignore program exits if the family returns to shelter within 30 days) and also a three-year observation period in New York and Philadelphia. At the same time, the costs per day of shelter used by Culhane, based on “jurisdictional reimbursement rates” are high compared with the cost per day for many of the programs for which we collected cost data directly from financial records. Columbus reimburses programs at $116 per day, Massachusetts at $110 per day, Philadelphia at $94 per day, and New York City at $100 per day. By comparison, we found the average cost of congregate emergency shelters used by our study cohort was $71 per day in Houston, $85 per day in DC, $75 per day in Kalamazoo, and $81 per day in Upstate South Carolina.

Unlike heavy users of transitional housing, the outcomes of long-gapper families’ use of the homeless services system as it currently is constituted are unambiguously negative. An alternative treatment model for these families that focuses on their family instability rather than their housing instability may be needed.

5.3.4 Costs to the Homeless System of Other Patterns of First-time Homelessness in Washington DC

Washington DC has two program types not found at the other sites, and families using those programs are not included in the path groups discussed in Section 5.3.3.

Apartment-style Emergency Shelters in DC are considered emergency shelters because, unlike transitional housing programs, they do not have admission requirements other than homelessness and because they are not subject to the two-year time limit for federally funded transitional housing. During the period in which we conducted the study, almost all families using the three facilities that comprised this program type went there after an initial stay in a congregate emergency shelter.¹⁴ Apartment-style emergency shelters had a cost per day for first-time homeless families in the study cohort of $79.80, slightly lower than the average cost of congregate shelters (despite providing each family with a self-contained apartment) and slightly higher than the daily cost of transitional housing.

We identified a separate path group in DC consisting of families who used both congregate and apartment-style emergency shelters and no other type of residential program, 9 percent of the study cohort of first-time homeless families.¹⁵ Selected characteristics of this path group are shown in Exhibit 5.17 and compared with the characteristics of the path groups that used transitional housing. In many ways this path group is similar to the group that used both emergency shelter and transitional housing. Lengths of stay are similar, and the total cost per family to the homeless services system is similar. The only notable demographic characteristics for the group using both types of emergency shelter but not transitional housing are the high percentage that have five or more persons in the household and the high percentage of male adults. Other demographic characteristics, not shown on the exhibit, are similar to those of other path groups. This path group also had the highest rate of service encounters with the child welfare agency of any of the DC path groups, 56 percent. These family characteristics may help explain the long stays within what is supposed to be an emergency shelter system: large families and families that include adult men may be hard to place into transitional housing programs or into permanent housing in the private market.

¹⁴ Subsequently, DC’s main congregate emergency shelter for families was closed down, and the central intake center for homeless families began sending families directly to apartment-style emergency shelters.

Other factors that may influence the long lengths of stay for families using both congregate and apartment-style emergency shelter may be the fairly rich services available in the apartment-style programs¹⁶ and the relative attractiveness of these apartments that come with some restrictions on privacy and independence but are rent free in a housing market with high rents and long waiting lists for assisted housing.

Exhibit 5.17: First-Time Homeless Families Using both Congregate and Apartment-Style Emergency Shelter (and not transitional housing) in Washington DC

	Total cost per family	Average length of stay	Families with 5 or more persons	Percent of adults who are men
DC Congregate and Apartment ES	$38,444	513 days	42%	23%
DC Progressing Long-Stayers	$38,742	551 days	29%	16%
DC Transitional Housing Only	$31,822	477 days	13%	4%

The Community Care Grants program in Washington, DC, places qualifying families in mainstream permanent housing immediately after intake, without a shelter stay. The Continuum of Care considers this diversion program a key element in its homeless services system. The central intake center first determines that a family qualifies as homeless because the family cannot be stabilized in its own housing unit or someone else’s for more than a month—that is, that the alternative to the CCG program would be a placement into emergency shelter. A further assessment determines whether the family should be admitted to emergency shelter or could become a successful leaseholder immediately. Factors in the assessment are whether the family head has ever been a leaseholder, head of household's employment history, and whether the family has a current problem with substance abuse or untreated mental illness.

¹⁵ The small size of this group is somewhat surprising, given the capacity of this type of shelter to serve 93 families at a time. However, the long lengths of stay for families using apartment-style emergency shelter in DC meant that many families occupying those units had already become homeless before the start of our study period.

¹⁶ The average daily services cost for apartment-style emergency shelter is $42.32, slightly higher than the services cost for scattered-site transitional housing ($29.59) and only slightly lower than the services cost for facility-based transitional housing ($44.69).

Ninety-six families in the DC study cohort of first-time homeless families were placed directly into mainstream permanent housing the Community Care Grants program, and only eight of these families subsequently entered either emergency shelter or transitional housing during the 30-month follow-up period for DC. Thus, the program appears to be successful in diverting families away from the residential system for homeless families, though it is not clear how many of these families would have become homeless without assistance.

The average cost for each family reimbursed by the DC government was $10,677, which includes some combination of move-in expenses, short-term rental assistance (typically for one or two months), and case management provided on an as-needed basis for a year on average. Not surprisingly given the screening criteria for the Community Care Grants program, the path group that is dominated by these families had by far the lowest rates of any path group of service contacts with DC's mental health and substance abuse agencies, less than 14 percent for mental health and only 1 percent for the substance abuse agency. The rate of involvement with the child welfare agency was also low, although still almost 29 percent.¹⁷ Because of the program's screening, had these families been placed into emergency shelter, they likely would have stayed relatively short periods of time. Whether they would have had short lengths of stay in the residential services system as a whole is unclear, because these families may have been considered good candidates for DC's transitional housing programs.

5.4. Costs Associated with Mainstream System Use by First-Time Homeless Families

The literature on individual homeless persons, particularly those with chronic patterns of homelessness, suggests that the costs of providing certain homeless individuals with stable permanent housing may be offset by savings from reduced use of mainstream public systems such as emergency rooms and hospitals by people no longer homeless.¹⁸ No similar claim has been made about cost offsets that might be produced by ending homelessness for families. In this study, we attempted to collect data on the use of mainstream systems and associated costs incurred on behalf of homeless families before, during, and after their periods of homelessness. This data collection had three purposes:

- Helping to characterize the families that follow different patterns of use of the homeless services system, as described in Sections 5.3.3 and 5.3.4;
- Understanding the extent to which homeless families are connected to mainstream income and other supports that might avert or soften financial or health crises that lead to homelessness; and ¹⁷ More information on these programs patterns of program use is available in a separate case study on the study's findings for Washington DC. See Khadduri, J., Spellman, B., Sokol, B., Leopold, J., & Rothschild, L. (2009a).

¹⁸ See the discussion in Chapter 4.

- Exploring whether savings in mainstream costs might result from reducing family homelessness.

As has been true for other studies that have attempted to match data on users of homeless services systems to mainstream data, we were not able to obtain data for all mainstream systems in each community. For DC, we were able to learn which members of the study cohort of first-time homeless families had service records with the Medicaid, child welfare, mental health, and substance abuse systems between July 2003 and June 2008, but we did not obtain cost data, and we do not know the timing of those service encounters in relation to the family's period of homelessness.

For Houston, we obtained client-level service utilization and cost data for City and Harris County arrests and jail stays, and we imputed associated court costs. We also obtained data on mental health treatment, and stays in the state psychiatric hospital, but we did not obtain data on Medicaid, income supports such as Food Stamps and Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), or on service encounters with the child welfare system.

For Kalamazoo, we obtained data on the use and costs of Medicaid managed care payments, Medicaid fee-for-service care, and state emergency financial assistance, aggregated by path groups of families and by the periods before, during, and following homelessness, on both program utilization and costs. We obtained client-level data from local law enforcement agencies on arrests and jail costs. Here again, we have no data on Food Stamps, TANF, or the child welfare system.

For Upstate South Carolina, we obtained data aggregated by path groups of families and by the periods before, during, and following homelessness on both program utilization and costs for Medicaid, Food Stamps, and the criminal justice system, but not for TANF or the child welfare system.

Thus, for the mainstream domain which may have the greatest potential for cost offsets for a family homeless population—child welfare—we have data only for DC and only evidence of some encounter with the system, not how serious or how costly the encounter was.

5.4.1 Rates of Mainstream System Involvement by First-Time Homeless Families

Exhibit 5.18 shows the rates at which families in the study cohort were involved with the mainstream systems for which we were able to collect data. Use of Medicaid and Food Stamps is high, more than 90 percent in the three places for which we have Medicaid data and 92 percent for Food Stamps in Upstate South Carolina. Earlier studies have shown that homeless families are able to access the income supports available in general to poor families with children (Burt, Aron, and Lee, 2001). We have no data on TANF, other than a statement from the South Carolina data warehouse administrator that the match rate to TANF records for the study cohort was low.¹⁹ Without information on the timing of receipt of TANF by the families in the Upstate South Carolina study cohort, we cannot infer whether the low rate reflects families being sanctioned or exhausting their time limit for TANF assistance before becoming homeless. The match rate would be expected to vary by state because of the flexibility in state administration of TANF, and the low match rate for a study cohort in Upstate South Carolina may not be typical.

¹⁹ The small number of matches and associated privacy concerns was stated as the reason for not providing TANF data even in aggregate tables.

Exhibit 5.18: Rates of Utilization of Selected Mainstream Systems by First-Time Homeless Families

	DC	Houston	Kalamazoo	Upstate SC
Medicaid	95%		94%	>90% ^a
Food Stamps				92%
Child Welfare	43%
Criminal Justice		8%	42%	34%
Mental Health	36%	16%
Substance Abuse	9%
Emergency financial assistance			>39% ^b

^a More than 90 percent of the cohort received both Medicaid Managed Care and Medicaid Fee For Service treatment. A de-duplicated rate of involvement was not provided by the State.

^b De-duplicated data across types of financial assistance types was not provided. Thirty-nine percent of families received rental assistance, which was the greatest proportion for each type. Thirty-three percent of families received cash assistance and 17 percent received food assistance. Only one family received mortgage assistance and four families received security or utility-deposit assistance.

The emergency financial assistance program used by at least 39 percent of the study cohort in Kalamazoo is a state-funded program operated through local non-profits and intended to help families through financial crises that can lead to homelessness by providing them with cash, food assistance, mortgage payments, rental payments, or security and utilities deposits.

The high rate of service encounters with the child welfare system in DC is interesting, although we do not know the extent to which they happened in response to immediate threats to children’s well being and we do not know the extent to which they led to out-of-home placement of children. While we have no information about service encounters with the child welfare system in our other study communities, considered together with the high rates of involvement with the criminal justice systems in Kalamazoo and Upstate South Carolina, we might infer that rates of involvement with child welfare among first-time homeless families would be high in those communities as well.

In Upstate South Carolina, 53 percent of family members between the ages of 18 and 24 had at least one arrest during the study period, which extended from a year before the start of homelessness for each family through December 2006. Fifty-four percent of families that changed composition during their period of homelessness had a family member who was arrested, as did 71 percent of the Upstate South Carolina families we have identified as “long gappers.” White families were more than twice as likely to have a member arrested as African-American families. This could be a geographic effect (Upstate South Carolina covers a large area), or it could suggest that black families in Upstate South Carolina become homeless as a result of extreme poverty,²⁰ while white families are more likely to experience a domestic crisis that triggers both extreme housing instability and an encounter with the criminal justice system. Across the three communities for which we were able to obtain data on involvement with the local criminal justice system, we found that many adult women were arrested, but arrest rates were higher for adult men than for adult women.

²⁰ Suggested also by the fact that a higher percentage of brief users of emergency shelter in Upstate South Carolina are black, compared to families following other patterns of use of the homeless services system.

The relatively lower involvement with the criminal justice system among first-time homeless families in Houston is difficult to interpret, but consistent with the relatively smaller percentage of families in Houston with a “long-gapper” pattern of homelessness (5 percent, vs. 10 percent in Upstate South Carolina and 16 percent in Kalamazoo).

5.4.2 Costs to Mainstream Systems of First-Time Family Homelessness

The fragmentary nature of our data on mainstream system costs for the three communities for which we have cost information—Houston, Kalamazoo, and Upstate South Carolina—makes it difficult to assess the potential opportunities for cost savings through reducing family homelessness. Exhibit 5.19 shows what we know about the magnitude of costs to the mainstream systems. The exhibit shows average costs for each family over the entire study period, which extended from one year before the start of homelessness to an average of three years after the beginning of homelessness.

Across the study cohorts, most costs were incurred for basic social safety net programs, Medicaid and food stamps. For those at the income levels of most homeless families, reducing food stamps costs does not make sense. Food stamps benefit levels are set by formula based on family size and income, and there is little potential for “excess” or inefficient use of the program by homeless families.²¹ Some residential homeless programs, especially emergency shelters, may provide food, and families may be less likely to use Food Stamps during their period of literal homelessness.

Exhibit 5.19: Average Costs for Selected Mainstream Domains per First-Time Homeless Family during the Entire Study Period

	Houston	Kalamazoo	Upstate South Carolina
Medicaid		$21,770	$15,615
Food Stamps			$7,248
Criminal Justice	$409	$597	$175
Mental Health	$722

Note: The study period varies for each family, depending on when the family became homeless compared to the last date for which mainstream costs were collected. Patterns change little when costs are measured over a uniform period, such as one year, for each family.

Homeless families might use Medicaid in ways that are more costly than other families participating in the program—for example, by using emergency room visits in place of routine outpatient care. The evidence we have from the two communities for which we have Medicaid costs is mixed. In Kalamazoo, Medicaid costs for the children in the study cohort of homeless families were 26 percent higher than statewide average Medicaid costs for children. Medicaid costs for adults were 78 percent higher than the statewide average (Kaiser Family Foundation, n.d.). The data only distinguish between services covered by managed care and services covered by fee-for-service, and the distribution of costs across these types is the same as for other Medicaid recipients in Michigan. Without more detail on types of services received, we cannot tell whether homeless family members have higher medical needs or whether homeless families are using the system inefficiently.

²¹ This is not to say that fraudulent use of the program is non-existent, but Food Stamps fraud is unlikely to vary based on whether a family is homeless or housed.

In Upstate South Carolina, Medicaid costs for the cohort of homeless families are similar to statewide averages for children who do not have disabilities and for adults who are neither elderly nor disabled. The type of services used by the study cohort compared with the general Medicaid population shows that homeless families were more likely to use standard medical services such as visits to doctors' offices and less likely to use outpatient hospital care (Kaiser Family Foundation, n.d.).

Exhibit 5.20 shows costs per family for each of the mainstream domains, during the periods before, during, and following homelessness. The costs are standardized to a one-month period to take into account the different lengths of the three periods—in particular, the relatively short period during homelessness for most families.²² In both Kalamazoo and Upstate South Carolina, the use of Medicaid-reimbursed services rose during the family's period of homelessness, which could suggest that health crises contributed to homelessness or could reflect the success of the homeless services system in referring family members to needed medical care.

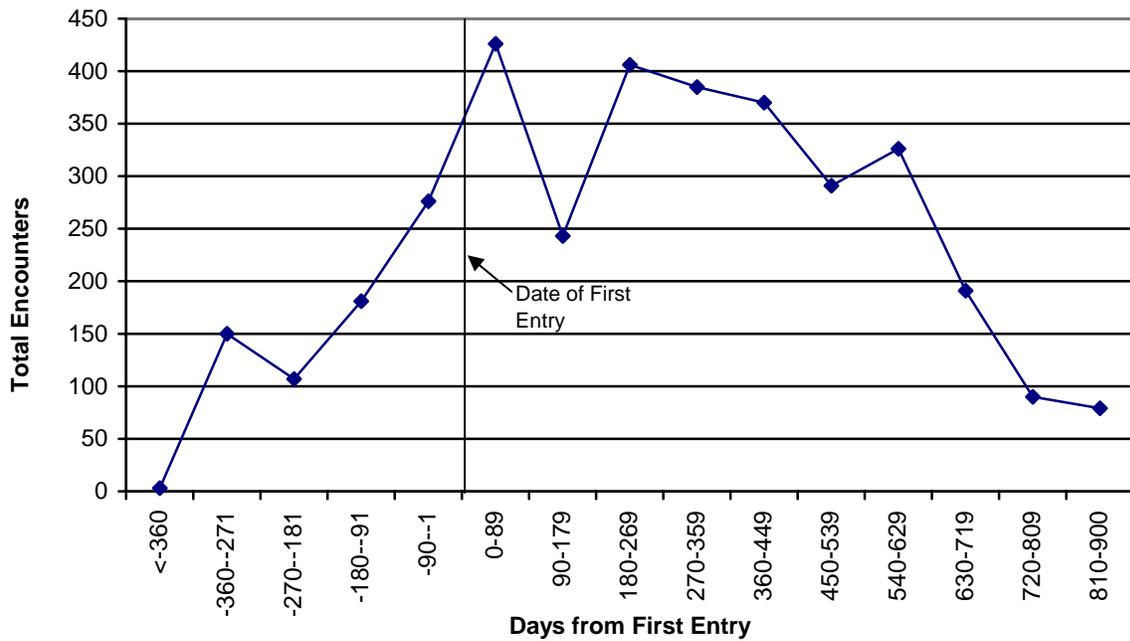

While the high rate of arrests for family members in Kalamazoo and Upstate South Carolina is troubling, the relatively brief interactions with criminal justice and low costs for this domain do not seem to provide major opportunities for cost offsets for first-time homeless families. Criminal justice costs, adjusted for differences in time periods, dropped during the period of homelessness in Houston and Kalamazoo and then rose to higher levels following homelessness (Exhibit 5.20). In Upstate South Carolina, after adjusting for differences in the lengths of time periods, the number of arrests of members of the study cohort was very similar before, during, and following homelessness. Neither homelessness nor stable housing seems to have reduced the likelihood of criminal justice encounters. That said, criminal justice costs are incomplete at each study site. For Kalamazoo, we have arrest and jail costs, but not court costs. For Upstate South Carolina, we have only arrest records, and we imputed a cost of $200 per arrest, based on arrest costs for other study sites. For no community do we have costs to state or federal criminal justice systems. It is possible that more complete data would identify additional cost saving opportunities.

Exhibit 5.20: Mainstream Costs Per Family Per Month Before, During, and Following Homelessness
	Mental Health	Medicaid	Criminal Justice	Financial Assistance	Food Stamps	State Hospital
Kalamazoo
Pre-Homelessness		$657.58	$13.33	$5.18
During Homelessness		$929.59	$12.99	$22.05
Post-Homelessness		$471.90	$19.36	$21.55
South Carolina
Pre-Homelessness		$319.66	$4.65		$187.30
During Homelessness		$433.70	$4.70		$229.34
Post-Homelessness		$493.28	$4.86		$190.78
Houston
Pre-Homelessness	$13.01		$6.55			$0.00
During Homelessness	$32.87		$1.57			$0.00
Post-Homelessness	$20.67		$16.36			$3.02

²² The period following homelessness depends on when during the tracking period the family's homelessness ended and also may be different from the period preceding homelessness, which is one year for all families.

Mental health costs in Houston averaged only $409 per family but were much higher, $4594, for the 16 percent of families that received at least one mental health service. The use of mental health services by first-time homeless families in Houston rose during the period just before first entry into a residential homeless program, peaked in the first 90 days after the start of homelessness, remained high for 18 months and then began to decline, as shown in Exhibit 5.21. This suggests that homelessness, or the crisis leading to it, exacerbates mental health issues or, alternatively, that a mental health crisis leads to housing instability and homelessness. The higher mental health costs following entry into a homeless residential program may reflect needed engagement in ongoing mental health care and, therefore, may not represent an opportunity for cost saving. However, it is also possible that alternative housing and mental health interventions could provide more cost-effective assistance.

Exhibit 5.21: Mental Health Encounters of First-Time Homeless Families in Houston Compared to Date of First Homeless Entry

Monthly costs per family of the state-funded financial assistance used by many families in the study cohort in Kalamazoo were very low in the period before homelessness (Exhibit 5.20), as were the number of families using financial assistance during the pre-homelessness period (not shown on the exhibit).²³ This pattern suggests that most families receiving prevention funds prior to becoming homeless did not in fact become homeless and provides evidence for the success of efforts to prevent homelessness through short-term financial assistance.

²³ For more detail, see the separate case study on Kalamazoo (Sokol, B., Spellman, B., Khadduri, J., & Leopold, J., 2009a).

5.4.3 Mainstream Costs for First-Time Homeless Families by Path Group

The costs and patterns just described for the entire study cohorts of first-time homeless in each community do not suggest opportunities for cost savings, with the possible exception of Medicaid costs in Kalamazoo and mental health in Houston. The literature on individual homeless people has focused on potential cost offsets among subsets of the homeless population—for example, individuals with chronic patterns of homelessness or homeless individuals with mental illness.²⁴ We examined patterns of use of mainstream services for homeless families following particular paths when using the homeless services system to determine if one of these path groups has patterns of use of mainstream services that could provide opportunities for cost savings or offsets.

In Kalamazoo, the “long gapper” groups had the highest Medicaid costs. The average Medicaid cost for families in these groups was $31,177 compared to the cohort average of $21,770. In Upstate South Carolina, Medicaid costs were fairly consistent across the path groups, but twenty percent of families whose composition changed during homelessness had a family member with an in-patient hospitalization during the period of homelessness. These findings suggest that further study of patterns of homelessness and medical costs for families with unstable membership might reveal opportunities for savings in medical costs.

Heavy users of transitional housing in Kalamazoo had similarly high Medicaid costs before and during the period of homelessness, but costs dropped following homelessness. Possibly, families in this group addressed pre-existing health issues during their stays in the homeless system. Or, they may have learned to sustain their ongoing healthcare needs after homelessness by using relatively lower-cost medical services.

Criminal justice costs were highest for the “long-gapper” groups in Kalamazoo, $1,153 per household, nearly twice the overall average for the study cohort of $597. As noted, this does not include court costs. Similarly, in Upstate South Carolina, criminal justice costs were particularly high for the “long-gapper” groups. In Houston, however, the highest criminal justice costs were for a group of heavy users of transitional housing, possibly incurred by one member of multi-adult households while others are in transitional housing.

Overall, families who have repeat episodes of homelessness, difficulty maintaining stable housing, and frequent changes in family composition probably incur, over time, substantial costs to public systems that could be reduced by appropriate interventions. This might be more obvious if we had been able to obtain consistent mainstream system data across all four sites or cost information from the child welfare system at one or more of our study communities. However, the appropriate interventions for these families are not as obvious as placing chronically homeless, mentally ill individuals in permanent supportive housing. A long-term rent subsidy to stabilize the family in mainstream permanent housing might help, but it likely is not sufficient to address the problems associated with unstable household composition, which may include domestic violence, other family conflict, problems with substance abuse, or chronic health problems.

²⁴ See Chapter 4 for a discussion of this literature.

5.5. Policy Implications and Recommendations for Further Research

This study of the patterns and costs associated with first-time homeless families in four communities:

- Confirms earlier research that long stays in the homeless services system are very expensive and makes explicit that most families with long periods of sheltered homelessness use transitional housing, either exclusively or in combination with emergency shelter. Groups of families that we identified as heavy users of transitional housing typically cost the homeless services system at least $15,000 dollars. In some communities, these costs were in the $30,000-40,000 range, which was similar to the costs for “long-stayer” families found by Dennis Culhane and his colleagues in other communities. Unlike Culhane’s research, this study found some indication that families used transitional housing for extended periods had high needs, based on their heavy involvement with mainstream behavioral health systems.
- Shows that housing vouchers typically are less expensive than transitional housing per day or per month. This is most pronounced in Houston, where the monthly cost of a two-bedroom voucher during our study period was $743, while the average monthly cost of transitional housing was over $4,000. The voucher cost in the high-cost DC housing market was much higher, $1,225 per month for a two-bedroom Fair Market Rent, but the cost of transitional housing was still higher. In Upstate South Carolina, cost of transitional housing was about double the cost of a voucher. Whether the cost of transitional housing is ultimately lower than the cost of a permanent voucher—because transitional housing is temporary—is an open question.
- Identifies a group of highly troubled families that cycle in and out of the homeless services system and have very unstable household composition, often including men for part of the total period of homelessness. Their rates of involvement with the criminal justice system are high. Their repeat episodes of homelessness are comprised of relatively short stays in the residential homeless system separated by “gaps” of several months during which they evidently are unable to become stably housed in their own or someone else’s housing unit. These families are not particularly costly to the homeless services system because of their relatively small number of days in the system. The public system costs of their housing instability may be high, and over time savings in mainstream costs might offset the cost of stabilizing these families in permanent housing. We do not have enough mainstream system data over a long enough period of time to determine this. Unlike heavy users of transitional housing, the outcomes of “long-gapper” families’ use of the homeless services system as it currently is constituted are unambiguously negative. An alternative treatment model for these families that focuses on their family instability rather than their housing instability may be needed.
- Shows that African-American families, shown by other research to be homeless at higher rates than other poor families, have generally brief stays in the homeless service system and, because they use less expensive programs within each program type, they have relatively low costs to the homeless services system. In some communities African American families are less likely than other families to follow the “long gapper” pattern of homelessness. All of these factors suggest that they may become homeless mainly because of extreme poverty and limited social supports, and that more complex interventions—beyond income and housing supports—may not be needed to prevent or end homelessness for many of these families. However, the use of less expensive programs could also be the result of fewer referrals or admissions to higher-cost programs, which may warrant follow-up to ensure that informal discrimination is not preventing access to important homeless system resources.

- Shows that, among the domains for which we were able to collect data, homeless families are well-connected to Medicaid and Food Stamps prior to homelessness and that the highest rates of mainstream utilization and costs for homeless families are the medical costs reimbursed by Medicaid. Our data do not permit us to determine whether homeless families use the health care system in inefficient ways or whether Medicaid costs might be reduced by preventing or ending homelessness. The limited information we have from Kalamazoo suggests this might be the case.
- Concludes that short-term costs to the criminal justice system, while troubling, do not appear high enough to suggest opportunities for offsets. We were not able to collect cost data for the use of the child welfare and foster care systems by homeless families in any of the study communities. This is an area in which additional research might find opportunities for cost offsets.
- Suggests that local policies designed to prevent families from becoming homeless and divert those on the brink of homelessness can succeed. Very few families using the Community Care Grants program in DC subsequently became homeless during a 30 month tracking period. Because the program screens for lease-holding history, employment history, and active substance abuse, it is likely that families diverted from homelessness would have used the emergency shelter system for short periods only. On the other hand, they might have been out-placed from emergency shelter into transitional housing. Similarly in Kalamazoo, financial assistance intended to prevent homelessness seems to have been largely successful, as few families in the study cohort received such assistance before becoming homeless. To confirm the success of this type of program would require tracking the results of prevention efforts directly—and ideally randomly assigning families to receive or not receive the limited funds available for such programs.

Because the daily cost of emergency shelter typically is just as high as the cost of transitional housing and sometimes is higher, moving families out of emergency shelter and into transitional housing quickly makes sense for families who are not placed immediately into permanent housing. In some communities, emergency shelters for families may operate more like transitional housing, but are being used like emergency shelters—that is, by many households for relatively short periods. Careful program evaluation may be required to determine whether the services rendered are appropriate to the needs for which they are allocated and whether there are opportunities for cost savings by cutting costs of individual programs.

As for transitional housing itself, analysis of cost effectiveness is needed to determine if long stays in transitional housing are justified either by improved outcomes for adults and children²⁵ or by reductions in costs to mainstream services system. The data we collected on the use of Medicaid by homeless families in Kalamazoo permits us to speculate that families who have used transitional housing subsequently use the health care system in a more cost-effective way, but we do not really know if health costs would have tapered off naturally or with an alternative less expensive housing intervention. More detailed analyses of use of health care by homeless families, and its costs, would be valuable.

²⁵ HUD is now conducting an experimental design evaluation that will compare the outcomes of transitional housing with those of other approaches for serving homeless families.

Since the cost of permanent supportive housing to the homeless services system is low and families typically are well-connected to mainstream systems before they become homeless, quickly moving families who qualify out of emergency shelter and into this type of housing makes sense. More data collection and analysis is needed to determine the total costs to public systems of permanent supportive housing and whether providing services through mainstream systems is more cost-effective than services provided directly by residential programs for homeless people and paid for by their budgets. The services model used for permanent supportive housing, with housing and services managed and funded separately, may be more efficient than the services model used for transitional housing because it is better able to scale services to individual family needs.

Furthermore, it matters who pays for the services, even if they are ultimately paid for by public programs. Using funds appropriated to homeless programs for services can divert resources from providing for immediate shelter needs of homeless families and from programs that place them into long-term, stable housing.

Overall, exiting the homeless system did not yield a reduction in costs to mainstream services systems for first-time homeless families. From the limited data we have, costs to the criminal justice system went up following homelessness. Much more data are needed about other systems that may be affected by homelessness, in particular the child welfare system.

First-time homeless families who appear in the residential system for homeless people, leave, and then come back after long “gaps” and often with changes in family composition are expensive to the homeless services system when their costs are considered on a daily basis, as they appear to use relatively expensive programs. However, their relatively short lengths of stay mean that they do not create high total costs per family. Among homeless families, this is the group with the greatest potential for savings to mainstream systems. More research is needed on the complete costs over time of these “long gappers” to both homeless and mainstream systems. Also needed is the development of knowledge on how best to stabilize these families, based on interventions that are coordinated across mainstream sectors, including the child welfare and criminal justice systems.

6. Implications for Policy and Future Research

Around the country, communities are grappling with how to use their limited resources to efficiently and effectively respond to homelessness. In these uncertain economic times, many more individuals and families may experience first-time homelessness; thus, it is even more critical for communities to act prudently to use resources to meet the changing demand. This study presents findings that help to improve our understanding of homelessness and its associated costs; it presents ideas about opportunities for cost savings; and it develops an approach for measuring costs that, coupled with other evaluation methods, can help communities understand the cost-effectiveness of different homelessness interventions.

Throughout this report, we identified two types of findings with associated policy implications. One, different populations use homelessness programs differently and some populations are associated with greater costs. Communities may want to consider adjusting current interventions or developing new strategies to target people more efficiently. Second, we found that the structure of homeless programs and the roles they fill within the broader homeless assistance system present opportunities for cost savings.

We identified certain demographic characteristics and patterns of first-time homelessness that were associated with greater mainstream system involvement, but the analysis did not identify clear opportunities for overall mainstream system cost savings through the implementation of alternative responses to homelessness. However, the results also do not eliminate the possibility of mainstream system cost savings. Analysis of more comprehensive client-level data may yield more conclusive findings in this area.¹

This chapter summarizes our recommendations and reiterates ideas for future research that will continue to help policymakers and practitioners improve systems that respond to homelessness. While all communities can benefit from these findings, the results are not intended to be representative of the entire nation or every community. Regression analysis showed that the community in which individuals and families received services frequently had a strong effect on both length of stay and cost. Thus, local factors and particular Continuum and program-level decisions can have a large intervening effect on patterns of homelessness and associated homeless system costs. Policymakers should not assume that the findings here, despite spanning multiple different types of communities, will necessarily hold true everywhere. They should instead discuss whether the patterns of homelessness within their own communities are appropriate, whether their homelessness systems are efficient in achieving outcomes for people who become homeless, and whether there are opportunities for cost savings through alternative program models.

¹ We found it very challenging to obtain comprehensive mainstream data from the many federal, state, and local public agencies, in addition to private providers, that collect them. Future research that relies on analysis of mainstream administrative data will need to devote significant effort to the task of identifying and securing these data.

6.1. Policy Implications Related to Different Patterns of Homeless System Use

The study clearly demonstrates that the experience of homelessness and the costs associated with it are diverse and wide-ranging across different groups of homeless people. Most first-time individuals and families experience homelessness only once or twice and, in response, use emergency shelter for a limited period of time at fairly low cost. But some experience much longer stays and some have very high associated costs. And others use the system sporadically, moving in and out of homeless programs multiple times during long periods. Our analysis suggests that communities should consider specific responses to homelessness that target the needs of those who use the system in different ways.

6.1.1. Households that Use Only Emergency Shelters for Brief Periods

The majority of individuals we studied, 57 to 66 percent of the first-time homeless single adults in each of the three communities, used only emergency shelter and only stayed briefly. On average, “short-stayer” individuals used emergency shelter programs for only one week (Des Moines) to three weeks (Jacksonville) at an average cost per household of $321 to $686. Many first-time families, ranging from 42 percent in DC to 66 percent in Houston, also had only a few brief stays in emergency shelter. The stays for families were on average longer than those of the individuals in our cohorts. One group of short-stayer families in South Carolina remained in shelter only 10 days, but other short-stayer families in all four communities stayed an average of one to three months. The average costs per short-stayer family ranged from less than $1,000 to almost $9,000, depending on the average number of days spent in programs and the relative cost of the programs used.

These short-stayers all had much lower costs than other groups of first-time homeless individuals and families. We surmise that the short-stayers in emergency shelter are those households that may be most likely able to avoid homelessness with appropriate prevention assistance. However, the findings may suggest different responses for individuals versus families from a cost-perspective, recognizing that costs alone should not guide homelessness policy.

The homeless systems that have been established in the communities in which we studied individuals offer emergency shelter with low daily costs. For the majority of individuals, the emergency shelters seem to provide an immediate, low-cost response to their homelessness. It would be very difficult to fund a prevention response at such low cost, particularly since it may be challenging to identify up front which of the individuals’ homelessness could be prevented with minimal assistance. Perhaps the emergency shelter system is an “adequate” response to an immediate housing crisis for most individuals, and a place in which individuals who are not able to quickly resolve their housing crisis can be assisted or referred to more intensive interventions.

In contrast, emergency shelters for families are as expensive on average, if not more expensive, than transitional housing and permanent supportive housing offered in the four communities in which we had information on homeless families. The average cost per short-stayer family, even for the group in South Carolina that used shelter for only 10 days, exceeds a one-month rental subsidy based on local Fair Market Rents. The short-stayer families that stayed one to three months had associated costs per family of $2,508 to $8,890, significantly higher than several months of rental assistance. If families truly only need one to three months of assistance, communities may want to consider shelter diversion or rapid-rehousing interventions that optimize the use of resources to get families back into housing. Alternatively, communities could look at the cost structure of current emergency shelter programs to determine if the environment and services offered are appropriate to the needs of those who are using them. If families stay in shelter for brief periods of time, they may not be taking full advantage of the non-crisis-related services provided to them; thus it may be possible to reduce costs by scaling back on the resources offered to families on-site in shelters. For those with greater needs who need longer stays or more intensive services, it may be more cost effective to quickly move them into transitional housing (facility-based or scattered site) or permanent supportive housing.

6.1.2. Households Who Remain in Homeless Programs for Extended Periods

The greatest opportunities for homeless system cost savings lie with the individuals and families who remain in homeless programs for extended periods. Without an assessment of the outcomes associated with the longer lengths of stay, we cannot determine whether the long stays are cost-effective. The extremely high costs associated with most of these groups suggest that communities should assess whether there are ways to reduce costs of existing programs without diminishing client outcomes, whether communities are appropriately targeting the high-cost interventions to those who benefit from them most, and whether alternative, lower-cost interventions could be developed that might be equally or more effective.

Transitional housing programs provide a starting place for this discussion. Not surprisingly since most transitional housing programs are designed for lengths of stay up to two years, those who used transitional housing alone or in combination with emergency shelter had lengths of stay in homeless programs three times that of households who only used emergency shelter. Even when controlling for lengths of stay, these households also had costs higher than those who only used emergency shelter, two times higher for individuals and one-third higher for families. The difference reflects the fact that emergency shelters for families are generally similar in cost and sometimes even more expensive than transitional housing programs, whereas transitional housing for individuals is generally more expensive than shelter.

For individuals, extended use of transitional housing costs an average of $9,000 to $14,000 per person, with the exception of those who used a low-cost form of shared transitional housing in Des Moines. For families, heavy users of transitional housing averaged between $15,500 and $38,800 per family, with the exception of families in Kalamazoo whose costs were $6,574 on average. The environment in which transitional housing is provided, a centralized facility versus scattered site apartments, does not appear to make a consistent difference in program costs, although the distribution of costs between housing operations and services does vary somewhat from one model to another. Therefore, a program's housing model is not primarily a cost question, but rather a programmatic or philosophical one depending on the subpopulation being served.

In all cases, the costs to house individuals and families in transitional housing for extended periods are significantly higher than rental subsidies based on Fair Market Rents for an equivalent period. Transitional housing programs generally provide intensive supportive services along with housing assistance, so a direct comparison of rental assistance to transitional housing is not appropriate. However, communities may want to consider whether alternative interventions or combinations of rent subsidies and standalone supportive services could achieve similar outcomes at lower costs. To the extent that transitional housing is being used by individuals and families as a form of subsidized permanent housing, actual rent subsidies without extensive services may be much more cost-effective.

Permanent supportive housing is generally less expensive from the perspective of the homeless system than other types of residential homeless programs for families, often similar in cost to a deep rental subsidy. This is not to suggest that the services come at no cost, but rather that permanent supportive housing programs appear to have been successful at helping residents obtain services for which they were already eligible through mainstream systems. To the extent that individuals or families have disabilities that qualify them for permanent supportive housing, communities should expedite their placement into permanent supportive housing programs. This may involve improved assessment and triage processes and may also require development of additional permanent supportive housing resources to accommodate increased referrals.

While some mainstream costs are substantial for these groups of heavy users of transitional housing, ending their homelessness does not appear to offer clear opportunities to achieve cost offsets. Our analysis identified fairly high rates of families who had received some form of mental health or substance abuse treatment in the year prior to homelessness among those who used transitional housing. So, unlike conclusions from past research, family transitional housing in our study communities appears to serve those with behavioral health and medical needs. To the extent that individuals and families are eligible for assistance in mainstream systems but do not have disabilities that qualify them for permanent supportive housing, there may be opportunities to create systematic linkages between transitional housing programs and mainstream system to promote appropriate use of mainstream systems (e.g., using primary healthcare systems for routine medical care rather than emergency or acute healthcare systems) and more efficient mechanisms for delivering these services. For instance, communities should consider creating transitional housing that is modeled like permanent supportive housing. This model would provide housing and limited housing-focused services through the homeless (or other housing) system and non-housing services through mainstream systems.

6.1.3. Households Who Use Homeless Programs Multiple Times with Long Gaps Between Stays

Our analysis also identified a small group of first-time homeless individuals and families who return multiple times for homeless assistance but have long gaps between stays. Their patterns suggest that the assistance they receive from the homeless system the first and even second or third time is not sufficient to help them regain stable housing. These households sometimes only use emergency shelter and other times use a combination of program types. Across the individual sites, costs for individuals who repeatedly used homeless programs with long gaps between stays averaged approximately $1,000 for groups that only used emergency shelter to as high as $10,705 for a group of individuals in Houston who used a range of program types. Costs for families averaged from $3,295 in Kalamazoo for a group that used only emergency shelter for a total of 38 days across all stays to $17,314 for a group in DC that spent an average of 9 months in range of programs. The homeless system costs are lower on average for groups with long gaps than those incurred by groups with extended stays because the homeless system does not incur costs between program stays.

Beyond the high levels of housing instability, this group is also of interest because of the nature of its involvement with mainstream systems. In Jacksonville, 62 percent of individuals with repeated use of emergency shelters and long gaps were arrested or spent time in jail and 26 percent of the comparable group in Houston had arrests or jail stays during the period in which we studied mainstream use. In Kalamazoo, 61 percent of families with long gaps had a family member who was arrested or spent time in jail during the study period, as did 23 percent in Houston. In South Carolina, 71 percent of families with long gaps had a family member arrested. For both first-time homeless individuals and families, households with long gaps have much higher involvement with the criminal justice system than other groups. Since these criminal justice system rates represent a time period spanning approximately 3 years, starting 12 months before each household's first stay in a homeless program and generally going through the end of 2006, not all of the involvement occurred during homelessness or the gaps between homeless program stays. However, communities may be able to use patterns of homelessness to identify individuals and families who would benefit from interventions designed to reduce repeat offenses and achieve long-term housing stability. Local criminal justice agencies may be interested in supporting a joint intervention to assist homeless individuals and families with a history of criminal involvement.

A significant percentage of families with long gaps also had changes in household composition from one program stay to the next. Half to two-thirds of families with this pattern in Kalamazoo, Upstate South Carolina, and Houston had a household composition change, and 92 percent of families with long gaps in DC had such a change. These high rates of household change are evidence of household instability and may also suggest high involvement in child welfare systems. In DC, the only site in which we obtained rates of child welfare involvement, 55 percent of the group with long gaps had child welfare involvement at some point during the study period. Unfortunately the nature and timing of child welfare involvement were not available for DC, and data on child welfare involvement were not available for any of the other family sites. However, costs of out-of-home placement by the child welfare system can be substantial. The significant housing and family instability experienced by this group suggests that neither homeless nor mainstream systems are addressing sufficiently the needs of these families.

Although homeless costs associated with households with long gaps are not nearly as large as those for individuals and families with extended stays in homeless programs, the homeless system resources used by this population are sizable enough to support alternative interventions. Moreover, if costs associated with child welfare were captured, the costs for families in this group might be substantially higher. Communities should consider systems to identify individuals and families who leave homeless programs after a relatively brief stay and then return for a second or third time within the next few months. They could be targeted with a specific intervention to address the challenges they face in retaining permanent housing. For families, it may be possible to identify those who are likely to cycle in and out of the homeless system by assessing family stability as part of initial intake. Communities should consider partnering with the child welfare system to develop interventions to promote long-term family and housing stability for these families.

6.2. Policy Implications Related to Individuals and Families with Different Demographic Characteristics

Homelessness impacts first-time individuals and families with different demographic characteristics in different ways, and we found that different demographic groups use homeless programs differently. Cutting across the patterns of homelessness described in the last section, we identified several demographic characteristics that were associated with higher costs: gender for single adults, race for single adults, age for all populations, and household change for families. Recommendations for each of these demographic groups are discussed in this section.

6.2.1. Homeless Costs for Single Women

Among individuals, single women had fewer stays but used homeless programs 74 percent longer than single men. And women dominate groups with certain patterns of homelessness, such as those who use more expensive types of programs.² Even when controlling for length of stay, program type and other demographic characteristics, multivariate regression analysis shows that single women have 97 percent higher costs than men. We speculate that there are several reasons for the higher costs. Women's needs may be greater, and they may use higher-cost programs that can respond to these needs. In some sites, single women are served in small programs together with families, usually with higher daily costs, whereas single men often are served in large programs with lower daily costs. Like single women, most families have fewer but longer stays than single men. Thus, the similar patterns of use for both single women and families also may be influenced by the expectations of program goals and staff.

Regardless of the reasons, communities may want to reevaluate their systems for serving single women. Programs designed to accommodate families require a different physical environment, generally with more privacy than that needed for single women. If a community has sufficient numbers of single women experiencing homelessness, programs or living spaces designed specifically to meet the physical and programmatic needs of single women may be able to be delivered at lower costs per day without affecting quality. To the extent that women are staying in transitional housing for extended periods due to severe mental illness or other long-term disabilities, it may be more appropriate and less costly to quickly place these women in permanent supportive housing programs. As with all long-stayers in transitional housing (Section 6.1.2), communities should also consider whether alternative interventions such as rapid rehousing with community-based assistance could achieve equivalent or better outcomes at lower costs.

6.2.2. Homeless Costs for Older Individuals and Families Headed by Older Adults

Relatively older adults, homeless as individuals or as part of families, also had longer lengths of stay and higher homeless costs than younger adults. Even controlling for length of stay, type of program used, and other demographic characteristics, costs for individuals older than 40 were 10 percent higher for adults than those between 31 and 40 years. Among homeless families, costs for families headed by people between 18 and 24 were one-third less than those headed by 31 to 40 year olds. For individuals, the reasons for relatively older people using higher cost programs are not clear and may be due to individual needs and program eligibility. For families, the differences in costs can almost entirely be explained by the types of program used and lengths of stay.

Single women are older on average than women in families with children. This is not surprising as women who are older may have grown children and therefore be less likely to be accompanied by them. Since both age and gender are associated with higher costs for first-time homeless individuals, communities may want to consider using age and gender in combination with other indicators to identify older women with greater needs immediately at intake. Quickly diverting this group to alternative interventions specifically designed to meet their physical and programmatic needs may be more cost-effective.

² Data from victim service providers, such as domestic violence shelters, were not available for this study, so these findings are for other type of homeless residential services.

6.2.3. Homeless Costs of African-Americans

African-Americans are over-represented among first-time homeless individuals and families in comparison to the general population of individuals and families in poverty in each of the communities we studied, with the exception of Jacksonville. The multivariate analysis of lengths of homelessness and costs reveals contrasting results for African-American individuals and families. Among the individuals we studied, African-Americans are more likely to spend longer cumulative periods of time homeless, have a greater number of stays, and to incur higher homeless system costs than individuals of other races. However among the families we studied, African-Americans are likely to spend shorter periods of time in homeless programs and to be associated with lower costs. In some communities, African-Americans are associated with higher mainstream system costs and in some, lower. The conclusions suggest different strategies for African-American individuals than for families.

For individuals, African-Americans are likely to have longer lengths of stay due to their repeated episodes of homelessness. The greater costs are somewhat surprising, since African-Americans are found at lower rates in the path groups that primarily use transitional housing, the program type generally associated with higher costs. However, in Jacksonville these patterns of use—using emergency shelters rather than transitional housing—may in part drive the higher homeless system costs for African-American individuals. African-Americans comprise 73 percent of the emergency shelter long-stayer group, but only 47 percent of the Jacksonville study cohort. The Jacksonville emergency shelter that accommodates long stays is one of the most expensive homeless programs offered in the community. In Des Moines, the group of individuals that uses the lower cost, shared room model of transitional housing has a low rate of African-Americans compared with the Des Moines study cohort as a whole. To the extent that African-Americans individuals are using emergency shelter for extended periods, communities should explore strategies to alert programs to these patterns of extended stays, so more appropriate interventions can be deployed. If individuals are identified with issues that suggest need for more intensive interventions, they should be placed quickly in appropriate permanent supportive housing, transitional housing, or a newly created homeless program type that is focused on addressing their specific needs.

Among families, patterns of homelessness and involvement in healthcare systems suggest that African-American families are homeless due to extreme poverty, rather than issues related to mental illness or substance abuse. If so, communities should explore prioritizing African-American families for prevention and rapid rehousing interventions that address housing and income issues with less focus on services for non-economic issues. It may be particularly appropriate to provide a prevention or rapid rehousing intervention for families who have several characteristics associated with shorter episodes of homelessness and lower costs, for instance when African-American families headed by younger adults with younger children request shelter assistance. While communities may feel uncomfortable discussing methods of directing assistance based on race, this finding could be translated into strategies that identify ways other than race to uncover indicators for families who become homeless primarily due to poverty rather than psycho-social issues.

Alternatively, the low involvement in healthcare systems may also reflect an informal or clinical bias that results in lower access by African-American families to mainstream systems or fewer referrals or admissions to homeless programs that offer higher-intensity assistance. Therefore, communities should also consider whether informal discrimination at the community level and as part of the case management process needs to be addressed.

6.2.4. Potential for Achieving Mainstream Cost Savings

The question of whether mainstream system costs can be offset by appropriate housing interventions is left open by this study. Our analysis suggests that there are few opportunities for mainstream cost savings when targeting groups based on their patterns of homelessness; however, consistent with past research, significant mainstream system costs may be achievable when targeting individuals or families with high levels of inappropriate involvement in mainstream systems prior to homelessness. For example, for individuals in Houston we identified patterns of mental health inpatient involvement immediately prior to homelessness, which imply that homeless programs may be currently used to house some individuals when they leave inpatient facilities. Mainstream systems and homeless systems (or ideally mainstream housing systems) may be able to design more appropriate, lower cost post-care housing responses that can offset future mainstream and homeless system costs for individuals being discharged from inpatient facilities.

Several demographic groups of first-time homeless individuals in Jacksonville and Houston, the only sites in which we had data to accommodate regression analysis, are associated with higher mainstream costs over the full period in which we studied these individuals when controlling for patterns of homelessness.³ First-time homeless single women had higher mainstream costs when compared to men for mental health treatment costs (as well as physical healthcare costs and income supports in Jacksonville) and lower criminal justice costs. Relatively older adults in both communities also had lower criminal justice costs. However, age had different effects on costs for health care across communities. First-time homeless adults over 40 had higher mental health and physical health costs in Jacksonville and lower mental health care costs in Houston. Results for race provided a mixed picture. Communities may want to explore whether certain demographic groups should be targeted with alternative interventions to ensure appropriate use of mainstream systems.

The key point is that communities must recognize that mainstream cost savings are most likely not readily achievable when targeting homeless individuals or families defined by their use of the homeless system, even those who are homeless for extended periods. Instead, communities interested in mainstream cost savings should be intentional about identifying and targeting those with high mainstream system use as they enter the system.

6.3. Ideas for Future Research

This study does not show which homelessness interventions are cost-effective or indicate whether mainstream systems are appropriately used during periods of homelessness. But it does illuminate the diverse patterns and costs of homeless and mainstream system use that are essential to answer the critical policy question of whether instances of higher costs are appropriate as a response to homelessness for specific subgroups, or whether there are more efficient and effective ways of meeting people's needs.

³ The mainstream costs were incurred throughout the periods before, during and after homelessness in which we studied these individuals.

This research raises a number of additional questions that should be the focus of new research.

1. Are there specific features of homeless programs, such as program structure or size that are consistently associated with higher costs? Understanding specific cost drivers more clearly may help communities understand how to design lower-cost interventions.
2. Do some program models have outcomes that justify greater investment?
3. Are needs and patterns of homelessness for single women distinct enough to warrant systems designed specifically for them, such that future homeless system planning would focus on three broad populations: single men, single women, and families with children?
4. Are there individual and family characteristics beyond those identified in this study that can be used to predict who is likely to experience extended or high-cost homeless system use? This study identifies many patterns of homelessness associated with high costs, but changing those costs requires directing people to alternative interventions before the costs have been incurred and communities will need a basis for setting new referral policies.
5. Are the tentative conclusions drawn here about the relationship of homelessness for African-American families and extreme poverty warranted? Are there other factors that are important for identifying African-American and other families who are likely candidates for prevention or rehousing interventions?
6. How are costs of the child welfare system related to periods of homelessness? Do the conclusions regarding limited opportunities for mainstream cost offsets change when analyzing a broader range of mainstream domains within the same community?
7. Although mainstream costs appear to be related to homelessness, does desirable and undesirable mainstream involvement vary when homeless individuals or families are accessing transitional housing as opposed to a shelter, permanent housing or rapid rehousing program? For instance, this study did not attempt to understand whether individuals had greater inpatient use while in shelter and more routine mental health care when placed in transitional housing. Understanding the nature of mainstream costs, how they change in relation to different types of homeless programs, would help communities implement homeless programs that encourage cost-effective use of mainstream systems.
8. How do mainstream costs vary for the periods in-between homeless program stays as compared with during homeless program stays and the periods before and after homelessness? This study aggregated the homeless program stays and the gaps between them in a single “during homelessness” period. More granular analysis might help explain important trends in mainstream use preceding homelessness, during stays in different types of homeless program, during times of housing instability between homeless program stays, and following homelessness

While there are many research avenues still to explore, this study contributes substantially to the effort to quantify the costs associated with homelessness. Understanding these costs is a critical step in ensuring that the resources invested in serving those who are homeless are directed in a manner that best meets the diverse needs of homeless individuals and families.

Appendix A: Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Individuals in Jacksonville, FL

A.1. Overview

This study aims to understand the financial costs associated with 1,972 single adults in Jacksonville, Florida who became homeless for the first-time between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005. This study describes how people who become homeless use homeless and mainstream services and the total costs associated with those services. The mainstream services included in this report are arrests and jail stays, Medicaid-funded healthcare costs, mental health services, substance abuse treatment, food stamps, and TANF benefits. Mainstream services were tracked for the periods before, during, and following homelessness.¹

Of the seven sites included in this study on the costs of first-time homelessness, we were able to develop the most comprehensive dataset for Jacksonville: data on utilization and costs for more mainstream systems, data for costs of residential homeless programs that include capital costs, and data on patterns of homelessness that include people who were contacted by homeless street outreach programs but never entered homeless residential programs.

Eighty percent of the first-time homeless individuals in the study cohort for Jacksonville were men. The average age was 41 years, and the study cohort was evenly split between whites and African-Americans (Exhibit 1). Half of the cohort had only one stay in a homeless program, and more than three-quarters used only emergency shelters. A small subset of the cohort had extended stays in homeless residential programs, and they were responsible for the majority of homeless costs. Three-fourths of the study cohort used mainstream systems before, during, or following the period of homelessness (Exhibit 1), and the costs of the study cohort to mainstream systems increased during homelessness.

Exhibit 1: The Jacksonville Cohort
Basic Cohort Information
Total Persons	1,972
Average Age	41
Percent Male	80%
Percent White	48%
Homeless Program Utilization
Length of Homeless Tracking Period	18 months
Average Number of Stays	3.3 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	57 days
Median Length of Stay	10 days
Mainstream System Utilization
Incurred costs in at least one mainstream system	74%
Incurred costs in two or more mainstream systems	49%

A.1.1 Highlights of Cost Findings

On average, individuals in the study cohort spent 132 days homeless during the 18-month homeless tracking period.² During this period, the study cohort incurred a per person total cost of $2,652 for homeless and mainstream systems combined. Sixty-two percent of costs were incurred by the homeless system ($1,634), and the remaining 38 percent was spread across mainstream domains. Criminal justice was by far the most expensive mainstream domain during homelessness (Exhibit 2).

¹ For the purposes of this study, mainstream systems are those that do not exclusively target people who are homeless.

² The period of homelessness extends from the first entry into a program for homeless people through the last exit from such a program. It may include “gap days” during which a person is not in a homeless program. Thus the 132 day average period of homelessness is longer than the 57 day average total length of stay shown on Exhibit 1.

Homeless System Costs

- Distribution of Costs: The distribution of homeless costs was highly skewed. Fifty percent of the study cohort had total homeless system costs of less than $225 and accounted for only 2 percent of total homeless costs. Ten percent of the study cohort had homeless costs of $5,300 or more. These individuals accounted for 62 percent of total homeless costs.

Exhibit 2: Costs While Homeless
Domain	Average Costs per Person
Homeless System Costs	$1,634
Mainstream System Costs (all domains)	$1,018
Income support (Food Stamps and TANF)	$138
Physical Health	$219
Criminal Justice	$397
Substance Abuse	$158
Mental Health	$106
Total Costs While Homeless	$2,652

Homeless System

Costs Included

- Operational costs of homeless residential programs, including facility rents
- Services provided by homeless residential and homeless outreach programs
- Capital Costs of facilities owned by the program or donated

Costs Not Included

- Programs not covered by HMIS: Probably not major costs; over 90 percent of beds are covered in the HMIS either directly or through data merges. However, the costs of one large health program that targeted the homeless are not included in this study.

- Costs by Program Type: Emergency shelters with 24-hour staffing and on-site supportive services had the highest daily cost of homeless residential programs. Overnight shelters and permanent supportive housing programs with low-intensity services had the lowest daily cost.³
- Costs by Demographics: The average homeless system cost for women ($2,754) was more than double the average cost for men ($1,337). Women tended to stay in more extensive programs than men and have longer program stays.

- Costs by Homeless System Utilization: Not surprisingly, there was a strong correlation between length of time spent in homeless programs and homeless costs. Users with long term stays (six months or more) in transitional housing had the highest average homeless costs.

Cost of Mainstream Systems

More than $12.4 million, $6,294 per person, in mainstream costs were incurred over the entire study period, which extended from one year before each person became homeless to December 2006. Like costs to the homeless services system, the distribution of mainstream costs across the study cohort was highly skewed, with more than a quarter of the study cohort using no mainstream systems and another quarter using more than $7,000 in mainstream services during the entire study period.

³ The term Permanent Supportive Housing is used here because these programs were considered part of Jacksonville’s homeless service system. However, some of these programs were funded with HUD Section 8 SRO Moderate Rehabilitation grants and do not offer intensive supportive services.

Mainstream Systems
Costs Included
•	Physical Health (Medicaid Managed Care and Fee For Service)
•	Income support (TANF and Food Stamps)
•	Criminal Justice (county and city)
•	Mental Health and Substance Abuse: Medicaid and IDS funded
Costs Not Included
•	Non-Medicaid Primary Health Care: Likely to be high; as participation in Medicaid was low.
•	Veterans Administration Funded Services: May be high, we do not know what percent of the study cohort were veterans.
•	Other benefits (SSI/SSDI)

- The event of becoming homeless for the first time was associated with a sharp increase in costs to mainstream systems (Exhibit 3).⁴ This increase was most pronounced in the criminal justice domain, where average monthly costs more than doubled during homelessness.
- Persons in the study cohort were frequently arrested for crimes such as trespassing that appeared to be directly related to their homelessness.

- Mental health was the only domain for which average monthly costs were lower during homelessness, and persons receiving mental health services had lower homeless costs than the rest of the study cohort.

- In regression analysis, demographic characteristics and involvement in mainstream domains were stronger predictors of mainstream costs than the path a person takes through the homeless service system. In particular, whether or not a person received physical healthcare was a very strong predictor of mainstream costs. Age was also a strong predictor, with the youngest and the oldest age groups in the study cohort having the highest mainstream costs.
- Overall mainstream costs were far lower than estimates from previous studies, suggesting that the experience of becoming homeless does not necessarily lead to long-term, costly involvement in mainstream service systems.

⁴ Average monthly costs are used here to adjust for the wide variance in the length of the homeless period for the study cohort.

A.2. The Homeless Services System for Single Adults in Jacksonville-Duval, Clay Counties

The Jacksonville-Duval/Clay Counties Continuum of Care (CoC) covers approximately 1,350 square miles along the northeastern Florida coastline. The CoC includes a significant portion of the metropolitan Jacksonville area, including its downtown hub, and has a population of 980,226. Exhibit 4 is a map showing the Jacksonville-Duval/Clay Counties CoC.

In January 2005, the CoC reported a point in time census of 2,930 homeless persons, 86 percent of whom (2,521) were single adults. Of those, 721 were without shelter. Nearly one in every 335 people in Jacksonville-Duval/Clay Counties was homeless on that single night in January.⁵

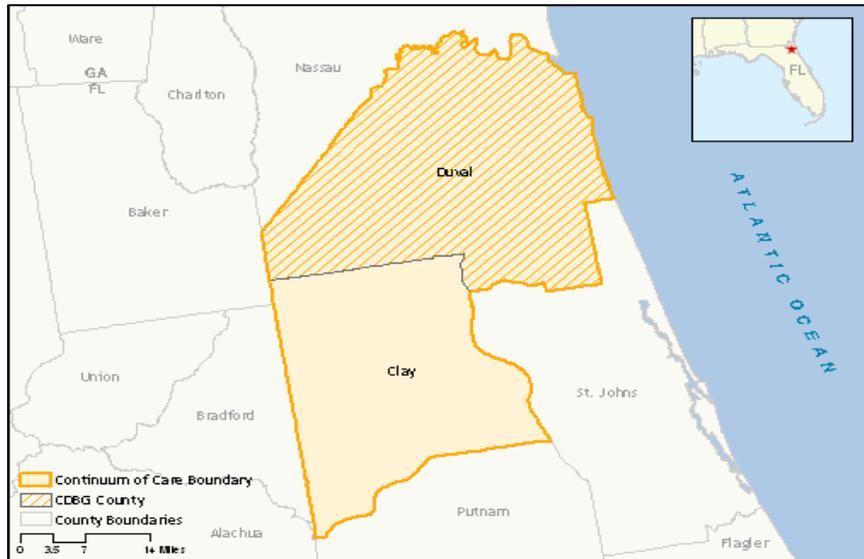

Fifteen primary agencies within the CoC provide shelter, transitional housing and permanent housing to homeless people. They are clustered primarily within downtown Jacksonville. Several additional agencies do not provide shelter but provide supportive services to homeless persons in Jacksonville. Nearly all of the homeless service agencies, including large faith-based organizations that do not receive any public funding, participate actively in the CoC planning process. The CoC, led by the non-profit Emergency Services and Homeless Coalition (ESHC), establishes priorities for program development and funding. In 2004, ESHC published a 10-Year Strategic Plan entitled Ending Homelessness in Jacksonville: A Blueprint for the Future (ESHC, 2004). The plan encourages the CoC to adopt a “Housing First” approach of moving clients as quickly as possible into permanent housing. However, as is true for many jurisdictions that have announced intentions to place clients rapidly into permanent housing, Jacksonville’s service system still reflects, for the most part, a more traditional staged housing framework, wherein clients are assumed to move from emergency shelter to transitional housing and from there to independent or permanent supportive housing.

A.2.1 Homeless Program Types

Homeless programs in Jacksonville were assigned a program-type based on their role in the homeless service system, the level of supportive services they provided, and their expected cost structure.

Exhibit 4: The Jacksonville-Duval/Clay Counties CoC

⁵ This estimate is based on the Continuum of Care’s 2005 Homeless Population and Subpopulations chart from its annual funding application to HUD (HUD, 2006) and 2005 ACS population estimates for Duval and Clay Counties (U.S. Census Bureau, n.d.).

Exhibit 5 shows the program types identified in this analysis, the number of programs in each category, the number of available beds for each program type, and information on the costs collected for these programs.

Exhibit 5: Jacksonville CoC Program Typology
Program Type	Description	Number of Programs	Number of Beds	Notes on Cost Estimates
Supportive Services Only	This category includes a service center that provides food, clothing and job training; a health clinic; and a case management program for persons with psychiatric disabilities.	3	N/A	These programs were not included in the case study due to lack of standardized data on utilization.
Street Outreach	Street-based outreach and service center, offering low demand, engagement-focused services. Clients are engaged on the streets and come into the center for more extensive assistance. Clients typically receive services for 6-12 months.	2	N/A	No data available on level of services received so a standard "engagement" cost was applied to each stay.
Congregate Overnight Shelter	Overnight shelters for homeless individuals. Programs were all faith-based and offered minimal services.	3	180	One overnight shelter was not included in this study due to lack of HMIS data. Costs were collected directly from one of the two other programs.
Congregate 24-hour Emergency Shelter	Emergency Shelter with 24-hour supervision, permitting longer lengths of stay and offering more extensive services.	1	300	Costs collected directly.
Facility-based Transitional Housing	Congregate facilities offering longer lengths of stay (up to 2 years) and intensive services, typically focused on substance abuse recovery.	8	450	Two programs were not included in study because they did not participate in HMIS. Cost data was collected directly from three of the six remaining programs.
Scattered Site Transitional Housing	Market-rate housing. Agency holds the lease, but clients may take over the lease if/when they become self-sufficient. Rent subsidies are typically provided for up to two years. Clients receive case management and other services.	2	60	Costs were collected directly from both programs.
Facility-based PH: Minimal Services	Section 8 Moderate Rehabilitation Single Room Occupancies (SROs). Clients served were not necessarily disabled. Minimal services offered in conjunction with program.	4	450	Costs were collected directly for three of the four programs.
Facility-based PSH: Moderate to Intensive Services	Permanent Supportive Housing, either SROs or group housing. Exclusively serve persons with disabilities and offer more intensive services.	5	175	Two programs were excluded due to lack of HMIS data. Costs were collected directly from two of three remaining programs.
Scattered Site PSH: Moderate to Intensive Services	Market-rate housing. Either the agency or the client holds the lease. Clients receive permanent, deep rental subsidy, case management, and other services.	4	165	One program was excluded due to lack of HMIS data. For Shelter + Care programs, case match included as service cost.

Jacksonville has two homeless outreach programs that provide a variety of services to persons living on the streets. In most cases these services are limited to brief interactions such as distributing blankets or bus tokens. However, some clients engaged for longer periods of time are placed into residential homeless programs.

Jacksonville has three overnight emergency shelters. These facilities offer minimal services and often limit the total number of nights clients can stay there. One overnight shelter allows three free nights per month and then charges $5 per night. Although overnight shelters are not very large, they serve more people than other programs because they have the highest turnover rates. The largest emergency shelter in the area was placed in a separate category because, unlike the overnight emergency shelters, it has 24-hour staffing, on-site supportive services, and no explicit limits on length of stay.

Most transitional housing units in Jacksonville are facility-based, meaning that clients are housed in a single building or a campus of buildings owned or leased by the program. There are a few scattered-site transitional programs that rent individual apartments in larger complexes where most of the buildings' tenants are not homeless. Most transitional housing programs offer supportive services, including case management, benefits assistance, and job training. These programs screen out persons who are actively using drugs or alcohol and cite employment, sobriety and obtaining permanent housing as their primary program goals.

The majority of permanent supportive housing units in Jacksonville are Section 8 Moderate Rehabilitation Single Room Occupancies (SROs). Unlike permanent supportive housing, these programs do not exclusively serve persons with disabilities. Aside from meals, these permanent housing SROs do not include on-site supportive services. Services are provided through referral. Jacksonville also has several permanent supportive housing programs that offer more intensive on-site supportive services. Most individuals using permanent housing programs are not included in this study because their initial homeless program entry date was prior to July 1, 2004.

Annual operating budgets were collected for a sample of homeless programs of each type. The annual operating costs include the costs of housing operations, program administration and supportive services such as food and case management. For programs that own their own facilities, an estimate of the capital costs of those facilities was factored into the daily cost. Annual costs were divided by the annual number of total shelter days provided to derive a daily cost.

The daily costs were merged with homeless service utilization data to derive the total costs for each program stay. The primary source of data used to measure homeless program utilization was HMIS data. However, three of Jacksonville's largest providers did not consistently enter data into the HMIS during the study period. These providers had their own separate databases to track the number of clients they served, their characteristics, and their lengths of stay. For the study, data extracts from the HMIS and each of the three provider databases were merged to create a single dataset that captured the majority of homeless programs in the Jacksonville CoC.

Some programs did not participate in HMIS or provide a separate dataset. Those programs are missing from the analysis, and, therefore, this study does not provide a complete account of how many single adults became homeless during the study period, their service patterns, or their total costs. For instance, no data was available for Circle of Love, a medium-size faith-based organization that operates an overnight shelter and a transitional housing program, or for Volunteers of America’s permanent supportive housing programs. Despite these limitations, data was available for over 95 percent of the total emergency, transitional and permanent supportive housing beds within the CoC.

Jacksonville has several homeless supportive services only programs whose costs are not included in this case study, including a health clinic; a service center that provides meals, clothing and employment services; and a case management program for homeless persons with psychiatric disabilities. These programs were excluded from the case study because of their lack of consistent and standardized HMIS data.

A.2.2 Homeless Costs by Program Type

It cost the homeless service system more than $3.2 million to provide shelter and services to the 1,972 persons in the homeless study cohort during the 18-month homeless tracking period. Exhibit 6 presents the homeless system costs for each homeless program-type used by the study cohort of first-time homeless individuals in Jacksonville. Service intensity is the biggest determinant of cost per day. Programs that offer an array of on-site services such as healthcare and employment assistance have higher daily costs. Facility-based residential programs, where clients are all served in a single building or campus, have daily costs similar to those of scattered-site programs that lease market-rate apartment units.

Type	Total Cost	Total Days	Average Cost Per Day	Total Program Stays	Distinct Persons Served	Average # of Stays per Person	Average # of Days per Stay	Average Cost Per Person
Outreach and Engagement ^a	$15,868	177	$89.65	177	168	1.1	1	$94
Congregate Overnight Shelter	$134,183	9,862	$13.61	4,909	1,210	4.1	2	$111
Congregate 24-hour Emergency Shelter	$1,733,325	54,046	$32.07	884	700	1.3	61	$2,476
Facility-based Transitional Housing: Moderate to Low Intensity Services	$773,714	24,680	$31.35	434	348	1.2	57	$2,223
Scattered Site Transitional Housing: Moderate to Low Intensity services	$19,002	686	$27.70	6	6	1.0	114	$3,167
Facility-based PSH: Moderate to Intensive Services	$157,231	5,457	$28.81	33	31	1.1	165	$5,072
Scattered Site PSH: Moderate to Intensive Services	$82,250	2,650	$31.04	13	12	1.1	204	$6,854
Facility-based PSH: Minimal Services	$305,696	14,758	$20.71	59	58	1.0	250	$5,271

^a Each outreach engagement was treated as a one-day stay

Homeless outreach programs were responsible for less than one percent of total homeless system costs. Only nine percent of the study cohort had contact with a homeless outreach worker. The HMIS data did not offer information on the types of services clients received, so an average cost per “engagement” was estimated and applied to each member of the study cohort reported to have received outreach services.

Although congregate overnight emergency shelters served 61 percent of the homeless study cohort, they accounted for only 9 percent of homeless days and only 4 percent of homeless system costs. On average, a night in an overnight congregate shelter cost $13.61, a significantly lower unit cost than any other residential homeless program. Overnight shelters also had the lowest total costs per person served because they had much shorter lengths of stay than other residential homeless programs.

Jacksonville’s congregate 24-hour emergency shelter served 35 percent of the study cohort at sometime during the tracking period and accounted for 48 percent of total shelter days and 54 percent of homeless costs. This shelter had a daily cost of $32.07, the highest of any residential program, or $962 for a one-month stay. By comparison, the 2007 fair market rent for a 1-bedroom apartment in Jacksonville was $669. The twenty-four hour emergency shelter had a longer average length of stay than facility-based transitional housing programs. This could be because the 24-hour shelter has fewer program requirements such as maintaining sobriety or paying program rent. Because of the slightly higher daily cost and the slightly longer average stay, the total cost per individual of a stay in 24-hour emergency shelter was higher than the total cost of a stay in a transitional-housing facility.

Transitional housing programs accounted for 25 percent of total homeless system costs. Facility-based transitional housing programs had a slightly higher daily unit cost ($31.35) than scattered site transitional housing ($27.70). However, scattered-site transitional housing programs had a higher total per-person cost because their average stay was twice as long. The median stay in facility-based transitional housing lasted less than 30 days, possibly because persons in the study cohort had difficulty complying with their sobriety requirements or other program rules.

Although only 5 percent of the study cohort used permanent supportive housing, these programs accounted for 17 percent of total homeless costs.⁶ The daily costs of permanent supportive housing programs varied greatly depending on the level of services provided. Facility based SRO programs with minimal services had a daily cost per person of $20.71, while scattered site permanent supportive housing programs with more intensive services had a daily cost per person of $31.04. Permanent supportive housing programs with more intensive services had significantly shorter average lengths of stay than permanent supportive housing programs with services provided through referrals. Overall, permanent supportive housing programs had the highest total costs per person because their average lengths of stay were greater than other residential programs.

⁶ Several permanent supportive housing programs for people with mental illness did not have data in the HMIS, including these program might have increased the number of clients using permanent housing programs and their associated costs. However, most of those clients would not have been likely to fall into our cohort of first-time homeless between July 1, 2004 and June 30, 2005.

A.3. Homeless System Costs

A.3.1 Utilization of the Homeless System

The study cohort’s homeless service utilization was tracked for 18 months from the initial program entry date for each member of the study cohort. Seventy-eight percent of the study cohort used only emergency shelter or street outreach programs, and fifty percent of the study cohort had only one program stay.

The median total length of stay in residential homeless programs was only ten days. A small subset of the study cohort stayed in homeless residential programs for six months or more. As a result, the average length of stay (57 days) was more than five times the median length of stay. Similarly, a small subset of persons had five or more program stays. Although fifty percent of the study cohort had only one program stay, the average number of program stays was 3.3 (Exhibit 7).

It was rare for people in the study cohort to use the homeless service system as a continuum, moving from emergency shelter to transitional or permanent housing. Only 22 percent of the study cohort used transitional or permanent supportive housing at all. The majority of persons who used transitional or permanent housing also had an emergency shelter stay (59%). However, of those who used both emergency shelter and transitional or permanent housing, 37 percent accessed transitional or permanent housing directly, had a program exit, and then had a subsequent stay at an emergency shelter. When people moved from emergency shelter into transitional or permanent supportive housing, there was often a lag between their exit from emergency shelter and their entry into transitional or permanent supportive housing, suggesting that their entry into transitional or permanent supportive housing was not the result of a referral.

Exhibit 7. Homeless Program Utilization
Average number of Homeless Program Stays	3.3
Percent of study cohort with only one program stay	50%
Percent of study cohort that used only emergency shelter or outreach programs	78%
Percent of study cohort that used transitional and/or permanent supportive housing	22%
Average (mean) number of days spent in homeless programs	57
Median number of days spent in homeless programs	10

A.3.2 Homeless System Costs per Person

Exhibit 8 shows the distribution of costs to the homeless services system for individuals in the study cohort. The average cost per person was $1,634, while the median was $225. The minimum cost for a person represents one night in an emergency shelter, and the maximum is for a person who stayed in a range of homeless programs for the entire 18-month period.

Exhibit 8. Summary of Per Person Homeless System Costs
Average Homeless System Cost Per Person	$1,634
Median Homeless Cost	$225
Minimum Homeless Cost	$13.61
25 th Percentile of Homeless Costs	$40.82
75 th Percentile of Homeless Costs	$1,578
Maximum Homeless Costs	$23,069

As shown in Exhibit 8, half the study cohort had a total homeless cost of less than $225. Almost all of these individuals either used just emergency shelter or had a street outreach contact followed by an emergency shelter stay and spent only a few days total in shelter. These individuals accounted for only 2 percent of total homeless costs. Ten percent of the study cohort had a total homeless cost of $5,300 or more. These individuals accounted for 62 percent of total homeless costs.

Exhibit 9: Distribution of Homeless Costs

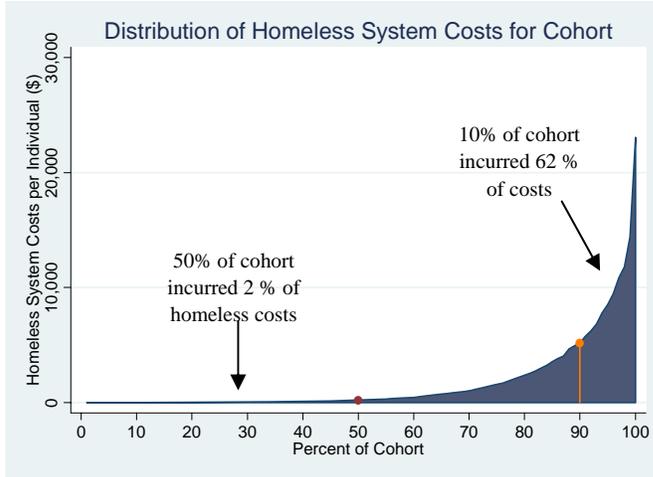

Exhibit 9 shows the cumulative distribution of homeless system costs for the individuals in the study cohort. The distribution of homeless system costs is heavily skewed by a small percentage of users responsible for the majority of total costs.

A.3.3 Homeless Costs by Demographic Characteristics

The average total homeless cost of women in the study cohort was more than double the average costs of men, as shown in Exhibit 10. Women were more likely to have long stays in emergency shelter. Fifty-five percent of persons who spent 6 months or more in emergency shelter were women, even though women made up only 20 percent of the homeless study cohort. This finding is consistent with other studies that have found that women typically have longer lengths of stay in residential homeless programs (HUD, 2008).

	Average Homeless Cost
Gender
Men	$1,337
Women	$2,754
Race
White	$1,348
African-American	$1,928
Age
18 to 24	$1,197
25 to 30	$1,327
31 to 40	$1,466
41 to 50	$1,689
51 and older	$2,152

Not only did women have longer homeless program stays, they also typically used more expensive programs. Multivariate regression analysis, shown in Appendix B.3.1, measures the effect each independent variable has on homeless costs, holding other variables constant. The outcome variable is in log form, and these coefficients can be understood as percentage differences from the reference category for each categorical variable. Model 4 in Appendix B.3.1 shows the effect of gender on homeless costs, controlling for the length of stay spent in homeless programs, number of program stays, gaps between homeless stays, race, and age. The female variable has a co-efficient of 1.21, meaning that women had 121 percent higher homeless costs after controlling for other variables. The relationship between gender and homeless costs was statistically significant at the .01 level.

The average total homeless cost for African-Americans ($1,928) was nearly $600 higher than the average homeless cost for whites ($1,348) (Exhibit 10).⁷ African-Americans had longer average lengths of stay than whites. However, even after controlling for length of stay and other variables, African-Americans still had 39.4 percent higher costs than whites (Appendix B.3.1). This finding was statistically significant at the .01 level.

Exhibit 10 also shows that costs per individual increase with age, with those over 50 having the highest cost per person. Older persons were more likely to progress from emergency shelter to transitional or permanent supportive housing or to be placed directly in permanent supportive housing, possibly because they were more likely to have a documented disability. However, multivariate regression analysis found that the effect of age on total homeless cost per person was not statistically significant after controlling for homeless program utilization, suggesting that the greater cost per person for older individuals is associated only with longer stays (Appendix B.3.1, Model 4).

A.3.4 Costs by Homeless Path Group

First-time homeless individuals followed eight distinct “paths” through the homeless services system in Jacksonville. These paths were assigned based on a multivariate cluster analysis that included as variables the number of nights spent in homeless programs, number of homeless stays, length of gaps (in days) between homeless stays, and the types and sequences of programs used while homeless. Exhibit 11 presents the Jacksonville path groups, the percentage of the study cohort in each path, the path groups’ demographic characteristics, their lengths of stay, and the average cost to the homeless system for each person in the path group. Appendix B.1 provides more information on the demographic characteristics of each path group, and Appendix B.2 shows their utilization of homeless programs.

Two-thirds of the study cohort, 1,302 people, fell into either the “ES Short Stayer” or the “Street/ES Short Stayer” path group. These people had brief stays in emergency shelter or a brief engagement with a homeless outreach program followed by a stay in emergency shelter. The majority of people in these path groups spent three days or less in homeless programs and typically used only overnight emergency shelter rather than the more costly 24-hour emergency shelter. Therefore, the total homeless cost per person for these path groups were very low compared to the rest of the study cohort. The individuals in these path groups were overwhelmingly male and somewhat more likely to be white than individuals in other path groups.

Two percent of the study cohort had a single stay in emergency shelter that lasted more than six months. “Emergency Shelter Long Stayers” was the only path group with more women than men. This path group also had the highest percentage of African-Americans. “Emergency Shelter Long Stayers” had the second highest total homeless system cost per person of any path group, $9,756. The forty-four persons in this path group had a higher total homeless cost ($429,274) than the 746 “Emergency Shelter Short Stayers” ($419,768).

⁷ Information on ethnicity was not available from the Homeless Management Information System (HMIS).

Exhibit 11: Jacksonville Homeless Path Groups

Path Name	Description	% of Study Cohort	Average Age	Percent Male	Percent White	Average Length of Stay	Average Homeless Cost	Total Homeless Cost
Single ES Short Stayers	A single stay in emergency shelter lasting less than 6 months	38%	40	80%	51%	18	$563	$419,768
Street/ES Short Stayers	This pattern includes outreach engagements followed by short emergency shelter stays, as well as multiple, brief shelter stays	28%	41	85%	52%	29	$853	$474,039
Single ES Long Stayers	A single stay in emergency shelter lasting 6 months or more	2%	41	46%	25%	304	$9,756	$429,274
Multiple ES Long Gappers	Multiple emergency shelter stays with significant gaps in time between stays	10%	42	95%	37%	40	$910	$179,249
Sequential Short Stayers	Brief use of transitional housing, sometimes following emergency shelter. A few members of this path ended the sequence with a short stay in PSH following emergency shelter or transitional housing. Total length of stay less than 6 months.	10%	41	65%	50%	54	$1,585	$310,652
Sequential Long Stayers	Long stays in transitional housing, sometimes following a stay in emergency shelter. A few members of this path ended the sequence with a short stay in PSH. Total length of stay greater than 6 months.	2%	47	67%	50%	364	$10,416	$374,961
Circlers	Use of emergency shelter following transitional or permanent supportive housing.	7%	43	79%	38%	135	$3,987	$566,200
Permanent Supportive Housing Long Stayers	Long stays in permanent supportive housing, sometimes preceded by a stay in emergency shelter	3%	46	67%	42%	338	$8,493	$467,126

Ten percent of the study cohort had a high number of stays in emergency shelter spread out over a long period of time. Ninety-five percent of “Emergency Shelter Long Gappers” were male and two thirds were African-Americans. “Long Gappers” had an average of 11 distinct program stays during the study period, and most of these stays lasted only a few days (Appendix B.2). On average, 398 days elapsed between the first shelter entry for “Emergency Shelter Long Gappers” and their last shelter exit during the study period. However, “ES Long Gappers” spent an average of only forty days in emergency shelter. Some “ES Long Gappers” may be chronically homeless persons alternating among spending the night in emergency shelters, living on the streets or in other tenuously housed situations, and staying in other institutions. The average homeless cost for this path group was $910, lower than the overall study cohort average.

Ten percent of persons in the study cohort were “Sequential Short Stayers”. This path group ended the homeless “path” in transitional or permanent housing and had a total length of stay of less than six months. Two percent of persons in the study cohort were “Sequential Long Stayers”. This path group ended the homeless “path” in transitional or permanent housing and had a total length of stay of six months or more. Although people in these two path groups are characterized as “sequential” users of the homeless service system, the majority (56 percent) used only transitional housing.

“Sequential Long Stayers” had a total homeless cost per person of $10,416, the highest of any path group. Together the 36 “Sequential Long Stayers” incurred $374,961 in total homeless costs, $64,000 more than the total homeless costs of the 196 “Sequential Short Stayers” ($310,652). “Sequential Long Stayers” and “Sequential Short Stayers” both were somewhat more likely to be women than the study cohort as a whole. Long Stayers were older on average than other path groups, with an average age of 47, compared to 41 for the overall study cohort (Appendix B.1).

Seven percent of the study cohort, 142 people, were “Circlers”, meaning that they exited transitional or permanent supportive housing only to have a subsequent homeless program stay in emergency shelter or transitional housing. Compared to other path groups using transitional or permanent housing, “Circlers” were more likely to be male and more likely to be African-American. Because of their relatively short lengths of stay, their average costs were lower than costs for the “long-stayer” path groups.

Three percent of the study cohort, 55 persons, had long stays in permanent housing. “Permanent Supportive Housing Long Stayers” had a higher average age than the study cohort as a whole. Although this group had an average length of stay of 338 days and the highest median length of stay of any path group (384 days, compared with 371 for sequential long-stayers), they typically stayed in SRO units with minimal services and low daily costs (Appendix B.2). Thus, their total cost per person was considerably less than the costs per person of the long-term stayer groups that spent most of their time in transitional housing or emergency shelter.

A.4. Mainstream System Costs

Of the six sites in the Cost of Homelessness study, Jacksonville provides the most complete picture of mainstream service costs associated with first-time homelessness.

Administrative data on mainstream service systems were collected through the University of South Florida (USF), which acted as an intermediary. USF manages behavioral health data for the State and was able to link our homeless study data with mainstream datasets to produce the analysis needed for this case study. The study includes data for: Medicaid-funded physical

One or more mainstream domains	74%
Two or more mainstream domains	49%
Income support	52%
Criminal Justice	38%
Mental Health	25%
Substance Abuse	22%
Physical Health (Medicaid funded)	20%

healthcare; state and Medicaid funded mental health and substance abuse services; Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF); food stamps; and jail and arrest data from the Duval County Sheriff. The data on physical healthcare cover both capitation plans (Medicaid managed care) and fee for service encounters. The capitation plan costs reported in the study represent the costs incurred by the medical providers for the visits and services provided, rather than the amount of the premiums paid by the State for the managed care.

Not included in the study are physical healthcare costs not covered by Medicaid, such as emergency room visits for the uninsured, and medical and other services provided through the Veterans Administration. We also did not collect data on SSI/SSDI income support or on service encounters and costs that members of the study cohort might have had with the child welfare system.⁸

Mainstream service costs were analyzed for the periods before, during and after homelessness. The pre-homelessness period was defined as the 12 months prior to the first homeless program entry for an individual in the study cohort. During homelessness was defined as the period between a cohort member's initial entry into a homeless program and his or her final exit from a homeless program.⁹ The after homelessness period was defined as the period between a person's final program exit date and the end of the study period December 31, 2006. The entire study period lasted between 2.5 and

⁸ Members of the study cohort were served only as single individuals during the study period. However, some of them may have been parents of minor children with encounters with the child welfare system, just as some received TANF income.

⁹ If clients were still in a homeless program 18 months after their initial program entry, they were given an exit date of 18 months (548 days) after their initial entry. For persons who had more than one homeless program stay, the during-homelessness period includes time when those persons were not actually residing in homeless programs and many not have actually been homeless. For example, a person in the study cohort might go to an overnight shelter for one night on July 3, 2004, exit the shelter to live in his own apartment, and then have a subsequent one night stay in an overnight shelter on December 21, 2005. Although this person's total length of stay in homeless programs was two nights, his total period "during homelessness" was 536 days.

3.5 years, depending on a client’s initial homeless program entry date.¹⁰ Exhibit 12 shows the percentage of the study cohort using each mainstream system at some point during the entire study period.

Exhibit 13 summarizes the mainstream system costs of the Jacksonville study cohort of first-time homeless individuals. The average total mainstream system cost per person in the study cohort was $6,294. Some mainstream costs are positive, as persons in the study cohort received necessary benefits or services. Other mainstream costs were less positive, for example, incarceration or involuntary psychiatric hospitalizations.

Like homeless costs, the distribution of mainstream costs was heavily skewed, with a majority of the study cohort with relatively low costs and a small subset with very high costs. The skew is reflected in the large gap between the mean mainstream cost ($7,136) and the median mainstream cost ($1,602). More than a quarter (26 percent) of the study cohort made no use of mainstream services during the study period, so the 25th percentile cost per person is zero.

Exhibit 13. Summary of Total Mainstream System Costs
Total Mainstream Costs	$12,410,933
Percent of study cohort that incurred mainstream costs	74%
Average mainstream costs per person	$6,294
Average mainstream costs per person incurred during homelessness	$1,018
25 th percentile of mainstream cost	$0
Median mainstream cost	$1,602
75 th percentile of mainstream cost	$7,136
Maximum mainstream cost	$180,814

Exhibit 14 shows the total monthly mainstream costs for the entire study cohort for each major domain in the periods before, during and after homelessness. Monthly averages are used to control for the difference in length between the before, during and after homelessness time-periods. Total monthly mainstream costs for almost all domains were highest during homelessness. The biggest reason for the increase was a 125 percent spike in criminal justice costs during homelessness. The Duval County Department of Corrections spent an average of $178,072 per month on the homeless study cohort during this period.

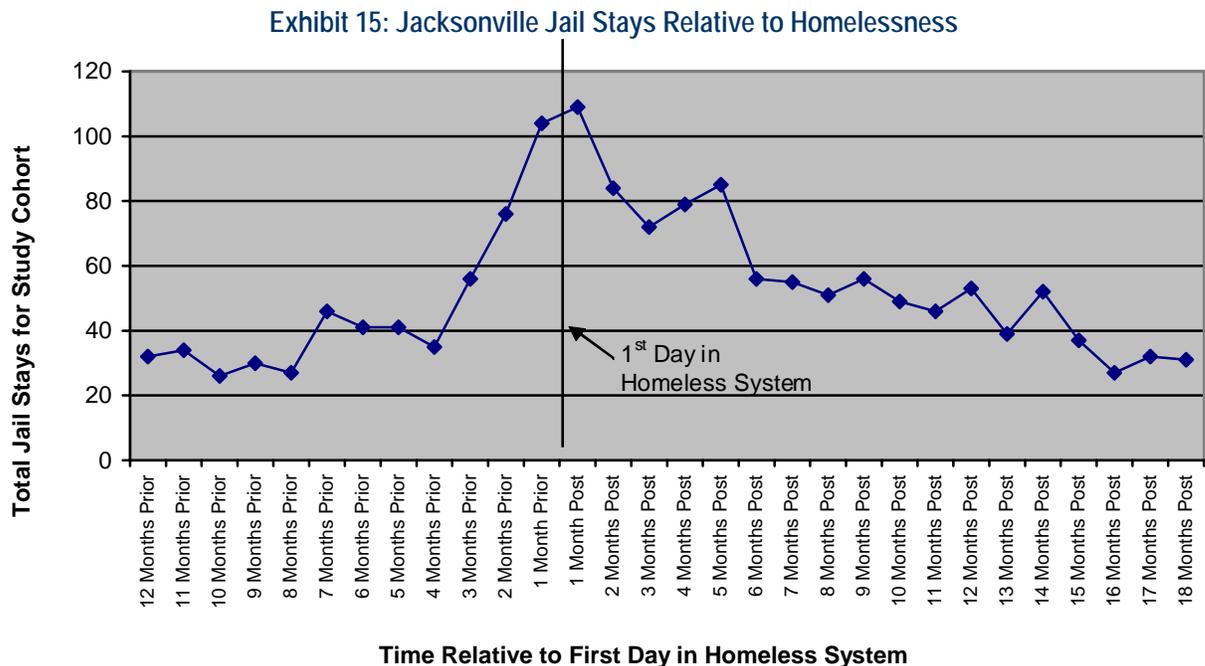

Exhibit 14: Total Monthly Mainstream Costs for the Study Cohort Before, During, and After Homelessness
	Criminal Justice	Physical Health	Mental Health	Income Support	Substance Abuse	All Domains
Average Monthly Costs by Time Period
Prior	$79,274	$89,923	$78,091	$42,595	$26,622	$317,198
During	$178,072	$98,206	$47,328	$61,526	$70,992	$456,124
Post	$73,950	$81,049	$76,908	$58,568	$37,862	$327,746
Percent of Costs Incurred by Time Period
Prior	25%	28%	25%	13%	8%	-
During	39%	22%	10%	13%	16%	-
Post	23%	25%	23%	18%	12%	-
Overall	26%	25%	22%	16%	11%	-

¹⁰ The total length of the mainstream tracking period varied based on when persons in the study cohort first entered the homeless service system. Persons with a program entry date of July 1, 2004 had a total study period of 3.5 years (July 1, 2003 – December 31, 2006). Persons with a program entry date of June 30, 2005 had a total study period of 2.5 years (June 30, 2004–December 31, 2006). The average mainstream study period was 1,090 days.

Criminal justice was the most expensive mainstream domain for the study cohort, accounting for 26 percent of overall mainstream costs and 39 percent of mainstream costs incurred while the study cohort was homeless (Exhibit 14). Criminal justice costs include the costs of making an arrest ($244.50/arrest) and putting someone in jail (a $165 processing fee plus $60 for each night spent in jail). Criminal justice costs do not include court costs or prison costs. Thirty-eight percent of the study cohort had at least one encounter with the criminal justice system (Exhibit 12).

Exhibit 14 shows a 125 percent increase in monthly criminal justice costs for the study cohort during homelessness, suggesting that persons are more likely to incur criminal justice costs while they are homeless. Trespassing was the most commonly cited cause for arrest, followed by possession of a controlled substance, petty theft, public intoxication, and driving with a suspended license – all non-violent offenses.

The monthly costs by time period show a sharp spike in criminal justice costs during homelessness. However, a more granular analysis of the criminal justice data shows that jail stays increase dramatically directly before and after first contact with a homeless program (Exhibit 15). The dramatic increase in jail stays (and jail costs) is obscured in Exhibit 14 because monthly costs are averaged out over the entire 12-month “pre-homelessness” period. Exhibit 15 suggests a connection between the event of becoming homeless and the likelihood a person goes to jail. In some cases a jail stay may have disrupted a person’s housing arrangement and precipitated his homelessness; in other cases, being homeless might have made people more likely to be arrested for vagrancy crimes such as trespassing or loitering.¹¹

¹¹ Other research analyzing rates of homelessness among ex-offenders found that individuals released from state prisons or jails have a greater risk of homelessness than individuals with similar characteristics who have not been recently incarcerated. The same research also found that certain demographic characteristics and longer periods of incarceration were associated with greater risks of homelessness after release. (Graham, D., Locke, G., Bass Rubenstein, D. & Carlson, K., unpublished)

Unfortunately, the administrative data used in this study is insufficient to investigate these relationships more thoroughly. This level of analysis requires client-level utilization data, which we did not receive for the other mainstream systems in Jacksonville.

Exhibit 16 shows the results of multivariate analysis we conducted to understand which characteristics of the study cohort and its patterns of homelessness are related to criminal justice costs.¹² In these models, the regression coefficients represent the differences in dollar costs between individuals with and without a particular characteristic. The first model in Exhibit 16 includes the number of homeless stays, length of stay in homeless programs, the number of gap days spent between homeless program stays, age, gender, and race. The coefficients in these models should be interpreted as the effect (in dollars) having a particular characteristic has on a person's criminal justice costs, controlling for all other characteristics included in the model. According to this model, there is not a strong association between the number of homeless program stays and criminal justice costs or between length of stay in homeless programs and criminal justice costs. However, there is a strongly significant relationship between sporadic use of the homeless service system and criminal justice costs. People who had long gaps between homeless program stays had higher criminal justice costs. The gap days variable has a coefficient of 149.9, meaning that for every 30 days spent between homeless program stays, criminal justice costs increased by almost $150. The first model in Exhibit 16 also shows a strong relationship between gender and criminal justice costs, with women having almost $1,000 lower criminal justice

Exhibit 16. Multivariate Regression Models for Criminal Justice Costs
	Model without mainstream involvement	Model with mainstream involvement
Patterns of Homelessness
Total Number of Stays	-34.855 (21.201)	-16.612 (18.684)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	11.861 (27.582)	-40.961* (24.685)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	149.972 (25.196)	46.678 (22.557)
Demographics+
Females	-992.334 (249.377)	-699.162 (239.654)
African-Americans	380.364* (195.320)	391.015 (173.505)
Other Races	814.333 (535.575)	1,037.067 (470.540)
Ages 18-24	91.847 (380.230)	20.461 (335.731)
Ages 25-30	-59.916 (341.461)	30.047 (300.492)
Ages 41-50	-639.606 (240.925)	-442.451 (212.209)
Ages 51 and above	-1,094.955 (291.206)	-451.928* (257.551)
Mainstream Involvement
Income Support (TANF and food stamps)	N/A	162.643 (180.981)
Physical Healthcare	N/A	-522.385 (247.343)
Mental Health	N/A	133.297 (211.859)
Substance Abuse	N/A	1,003.905 (211.772)
Criminal Justice	N/A	3,973.550 (178.374)
Constant	1,820.685 (220.352)	61.876 (214.513)
Observations	1972	1972
R-Squared	.04	.26
+ Reference categories are males, whites, and ages 31-40. Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

¹² Appendix B.4 provides a complete set of regression models, which include controls for missing variables. Appendices B.5 and B.6 provide alternate regression models that control for homeless path group and homeless cost respectively, rather than homeless service utilization.

costs than men. Age was also strongly associated with criminal justice costs, as persons over 40 had lower criminal justice costs than persons between 31 and 40.

The second regression model shown in Exhibit 16 controls for both patterns of use of the homeless services system and for use of the mainstream domains, including criminal justice, with which the study cohort had encounters.¹³ Thus, individuals with criminal justice encounters had criminal justice costs almost $4,000 greater (the coefficient is 3973.55) than those without such encounters (whose criminal justice costs would be zero). Because this model controls for whether or not a person becomes involved in the criminal justice system, the coefficients indicate the extent of a person's involvement and not the likelihood of his involvement.

Thus, individuals who received substance abuse services as well as criminal justice services incurred an additional $1,004 in criminal justice costs, while those who used Medicaid reimbursed health care had criminal justice costs $522 lower. Even after controlling for the differential use of mainstream services, across the entire study cohort women had criminal justice costs about $700 lower than men. The model shows that African American individuals have higher criminal justice costs than whites, as do those identifying themselves as belonging to "other" races. Not surprisingly, relatively older members of the study cohort have lower criminal justice costs than younger people.

After controlling for involvement in mainstream domains, there is still a significant relation between gap days and criminal justice costs. However the relationship is much weaker, as the coefficient decreases from 149.9 to 46.7. After controlling for involvement in mainstream domains, there is a negative correlation between length of stay in homeless programs and criminal justice costs. However, the effect is slight and only significant at the 10 percent level. Apparently, peoples' characteristics that are not directly related to homelessness—whether they are arrested, whether they have needs that bring them into contact with substance abuse services, whether they lack routine medical care—are much more powerful determinants of their criminal justice costs than their patterns of use of homeless programs. Gender and race also are more powerful predictors of criminal justice encounters than are patterns of use of the homeless services system.

Income support was used by just over half of the study cohort. Fifty-two percent of the study cohort received food stamps during the study period, while only three percent of persons in the cohort received TANF. The low utilization of TANF benefits was expected because most persons in the study cohort were single men, and many of the women may not have qualified for TANF because they did not have children living with them. Income support costs increased 44 percent while persons in the study cohort were homeless and decreased only slightly after clients exited homeless programs (Exhibit 14). It is unclear how persons living in residential homeless programs, who in many cases were provided free meals, used their food stamp benefits.

Multivariate analysis results indicate that income support costs were positively associated with longer homeless lengths of stay. The first regression model shown in Exhibit 17 shows that each additional 30 days in homeless residential programs is associated with an additional $80 in income support across the study cohort. An alternate model that controls for homeless path groups (Appendix B.5.1, Model 2) shows that those with long stays in emergency shelter had a $2,327 higher income support cost per person. The models control for the gender of the individual and also show that women have much higher income support amounts than men. The second model in Exhibit 17 shows that people who also receive physical health care have higher income support amounts than those who do not.

¹³ Both models are shown in their entirety in Appendices B.4.1 and B.4.2 respectively.

Overall, the pattern seems to identify a group better connected to programs that alleviate poverty than other first-time homeless individuals.

Substance Abuse

services were used by 22 percent of the study cohort (Exhibit 12).

The monthly cost of substance abuse treatment for the study cohort spiked 167 percent during homelessness, from $26,622 to $70,992 and decreased to $37,862 after persons in the study cohort exited homeless programs (Exhibit 14). Substance abuse treatment was the least expensive mainstream service domain during the study period, having the lowest costs in the periods before and after homelessness.

However, it was the third most expensive domain while people in the study cohort were homeless.

Exhibit 17. Multivariate Regression Models for Income Support Costs
	Model without mainstream involvement	Model with mainstream involvement
Patterns of Homelessness
Total number of stays	-5.599 (10.013)	-2.596 (8.964)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	80.128 (13.027)	40.700 (11.843)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	0.982 (11.900)	-12.295 (10.822)
Demographics+
Females	1,770.719 (117.779)	833.108 (114.976)
African-Americans	280.946 (92.248)	135.253 (83.241)
Other Races	-174.340 (252.948)	-115.260 (225.746)
Ages 18-24	416.656 (179.580)	185.669 (161.070)
Ages 25-30	248.953 (161.269)	92.079 (144.164)
Ages 41-50	-152.958 (113.787)	-242.203 (101.810)
Ages 51 and above	-104.207 (137.534)	-210.229* (123.563)
Mainstream Involvement
Income Support (TANF and food stamps)	N/A	1,445.796 (86.828)
Physical Healthcare	N/A	1,423.293 (118.666)
Mental Health	N/A	-255.665 (101.641)
Substance Abuse	N/A	-123.407 (101.600)
Criminal Justice	N/A	7.975 (85.577)
Constant	394.947 (104.071)	-112.587 (102.915)
Observations	1972	1972
R-Squared	0.16	0.34
+ Reference categories are males, whites, and ages 31-40. Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

Path groups that involved the use of transitional housing programs (“Sequential” Stayers and “Circlers”) had higher substance abuse costs than path groups associated with only the use of emergency shelter.¹⁴ The relationship between use of transitional housing programs and substance abuse costs holds both when the use of mainstream systems is controlled for in the model and when it is not (Exhibit 18). Most transitional housing programs cited achieving sobriety as a principal program goal, and these programs may have referred their clients to mainstream drug treatment programs. An alternative specification of the model shows that each 30-day increase in the length of stay in a homeless program is associated with a $61 increase in substance abuse costs (Appendix B.4.1). The first regression model in Exhibit 18, which does not control for the use of mainstream services, shows that heavy users of permanent supportive housing also have high substance abuse costs, but the coefficient is no longer significant in the second model, which does control for mainstream involvement. A possible explanation is that, while users of permanent supportive housing are more likely to incur substance abuse costs than other path groups, their substance abuse costs are not higher than other people who receive substance abuse treatment. Receiving mental health treatment was associated with a $451 increase in substance abuse costs, for persons who received substance abuse treatment (Exhibit 18). Gender appears to have no effect on substance abuse costs.

Mental health services were the third most expensive mainstream service domain across the entire study period but the least expensive domain during the homelessness

Exhibit 18. Multivariate Regression Models for Substance Abuse Costs
	Model without mainstream involvement - controlling for homeless path group	Model with mainstream involvement - controlling for homeless
Homeless Path Group+
Single ES Long Stayers	-12.359 (448.596)	-267.271 (400.888)
Multiple ES Long Gappers	349.426 (231.315)	29.563 (209.701)
Street/ES Short Stayers	312.461* (160.581)	126.469 (143.937)
PSH Long Stayers	1,174.122 (402.976)	583.988 (362.491)
Sequential Short Stayers	883.603 (231.450)	414.067 (207.256)
Sequential Long Stayers	1,345.077 (494.468)	862.500* (440.936)
Circlers	491.023* (263.855)	130.110 (238.325)
Mainstream Involvement
Income Support (TANF and food stamps)	N/A	146.196 (125.848)
Physical Healthcare	N/A	239.911 (172.276)
Mental Health	N/A	451.142 (147.491)
Substance Abuse	N/A	2,951.154 (147.036)
Criminal Justice	N/A	-9.928 (123.700)
Constant	587.542 (164.758)	-179.410 (158.159)
Observations	1972	1972
R-Squared	0.02	0.23
+ Reference categories are Single Emergency Shelter Short Stayers, males, whites, and ages 31-40. Both models also controlled for age, gender, and race. The full models are shown in Appendix B.4.1 and B.4.2. Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%, significant at 5%; significant at 1% period, as shown on Exhibit 14. The exhibit shows that during homelessness, total mental health costs went down for the study cohort, even as substance abuse costs rose. This may reflect a substitution effect between similar services during the period of homelessness. However, regression models that look for determinants of mental health costs across the entire study period show no statistically significant differences in cost between persons who have and have not received substance abuse treatment (Exhibit 19). This means that, persons in the study cohort that received substance abuse treatment and also received mental health services had higher substance abuse costs than those who only received substance abuse treatment. However, persons who received mental health services and also received substance abuse treatment did not have higher mental health costs than persons that only received mental health services.

¹⁴ Appendix B.7 shows mainstream involvement and per person costs by time period and homeless path group.

Both before and after controlling for involvement in mainstream systems, African-Americans have significantly lower mental health costs than white individuals (Exhibit 19). “Sequential Short Stayers”, those with short stays in transitional or permanent supportive housing, have higher mental health costs in both regression models (Appendix B.5.1, Appendix B.5.2). Aside from this, the path group regression analysis showed no significant relationship between homeless service use and mental health costs. Among those persons who had mental health treatment, people who received Medicaid funded physical health care incurred an additional $3,204 in mental health costs (Exhibit 19).

Physical health care was the least likely mainstream domain to be utilized by the Jacksonville cohort.

Exhibit 19. Multivariate Regression Models for Mental Health Services Costs ¹⁵
	Model without mainstream involvement	Model with mainstream involvement
Demographics
Female	1,663.730 (441.617)	34.806 (454.595)
African-American	-907.569 (345.888)	-745.157 (329.119)
Other Race	575.892 (948.438)	358.007 (892.559)
Ages 18-24	1,237.724* (673.342)	286.685 (636.842)
Ages 25-30	636.365 (604.686)	334.982 (569.998)
Ages 41-50	237.133 (426.649)	244.497 (402.536)
Ages 51 and older	1,065.059 (515.691)	1,003.213 (488.545)
Mainstream Involvement
Income Support (TANF and food stamps)	N/A	-623.605* (343.301)
Physical Healthcare	N/A	3,203.957 (469.182)
Mental Health	N/A	4,531.870 (401.871)
Substance Abuse	N/A	131.791 (401.706)
Criminal Justice	N/A	-7.631 (338.355)
Constant	1,183.239 (390.217)	92.949 (406.907)
Observations	1972	1972
R-Squared	0.02	0.13
+ Reference categories are Single Emergency Shelter Short Stayers, males, whites, and ages 31-40. Both models also controlled for number of homeless program stays, homeless length of stay, and gaps between homeless stays. The full models are shown in Appendix B.4.1 and B.4.2 Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

While used by only 20 percent of the study cohort, it had the second highest total cost (Exhibit 14). Physical health care costs did not change significantly in the periods before, during and after persons in the study cohort were homeless (Exhibit 14).¹⁶ Long-stayers in permanent supportive housing had by far the highest physical health care costs of any path group. Their average physical health care cost was $9,300, 239 percent higher than the per person physical health care costs of the next highest path group (Appendix B.7). Most permanent supportive housing programs serve exclusively people with disabilities, and these individuals may have physical as well as mental health conditions. No other path group had a significant association with physical health care costs after controlling for demographic characteristics. However, there was a significant association between physical health care costs and the length of time spent in homeless programs. The first model in Exhibit 20 shows that, for every thirty days spent in homeless programs, physical health care costs increase $199. In the second model, which controls for mainstream involvement, each 30-day increase in homeless length of stay is associated with a $157 increase in physical health care costs (Exhibit 20). This indicates that not only are persons with long stays in homeless programs more likely to receive Medicaid funded physical health care, they also are likely to receive it more frequently and/or receive more expensive services. The models that include involvement in other mainstream systems show that people who receive mental health services also have substantially higher physical health care costs than other members of the study cohort (Exhibit 20). The models that do not control for receipt of mainstream services show that women have much higher physical health care costs than men. However, once receipt of physical health care and other mainstream services is controlled for, women have lower costs than men (Exhibit 20). Apparently, individual homeless men are less likely than individual homeless women to receive Medicaid-reimbursed physical health care services, but when they do, their treatment is more expensive.

¹⁶ Appendix B.7 shows the per person costs and involvement rates in physical health care by time period and homeless path group.

Exhibit 20. Multivariate Regression Models for Physical Health Care Costs
	Model without mainstream involvement	Model with mainstream involvement
Patterns of Homelessness
Total number of stays	-74.742 (36.628)	-34.522 (33.302)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	198.681 (47.651)	157.377 (44.000)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	13.062 (43.528)	4.806 (40.207)
Demographics+
Females	2,170.849 (430.825)	-951.443 (427.168)
African-Americans	560.360* (337.435)	284.895 (309.262)
Other Races	209.352 (925.260)	163.165 (838.707)
Ages 18-24	646.639 (656.886)	-508.376 (598.418)
Ages 25-30	128.096 (589.908)	-476.145 (535.607)
Ages 41-50	47.339 (416.223)	63.805 (378.249)
Ages 51 and above	912.642* (503.089)	421.008 (459.069)
Mainstream Involvement
Income Support (TANF and food stamps)	N/A	-312.324 (322.588)
Physical Healthcare	N/A	7,847.323 (440.874)
Mental Health	N/A	1,159.145 (377.624)
Substance Abuse	N/A	878.769 (377.469)
Criminal Justice	N/A	-571.797* (317.940)
Constant	477.218 (380.681)	-219.240 (382.356)
Observations	1972	1972
R-Squared	0.04	0.21
+ Reference categories are males, whites, and ages 31-40. Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

A.5. Total Homeless and Mainstream Costs

The average total homeless and mainstream cost for each individual in the study cohort was $7,927. The median total system cost for persons in the study cohort was $3,057 (Exhibit 21). The average cost was inflated by a small subset of persons with overall homeless and mainstream system costs of more than $20,000.

Total Costs (mainstream and homeless)	$15,632,202
Average (mean) total cost per Person	$7,927
Median total cost	$3,057
Average Costs incurred while homeless	$2,651

Exhibit 22 shows the distribution of overall costs during the homeless period across the homeless services system and mainstream domains.

Sixty-two percent of overall costs incurred during homelessness were borne by homeless programs and 38 percent was borne by mainstream systems. The average monthly costs for all mainstream domains except for mental health were highest during homelessness. Criminal justice was the most expensive mainstream domain during homelessness, accounting for 15 percent of total costs in this period.

Exhibit 22: Distribution of Costs During Homelessness

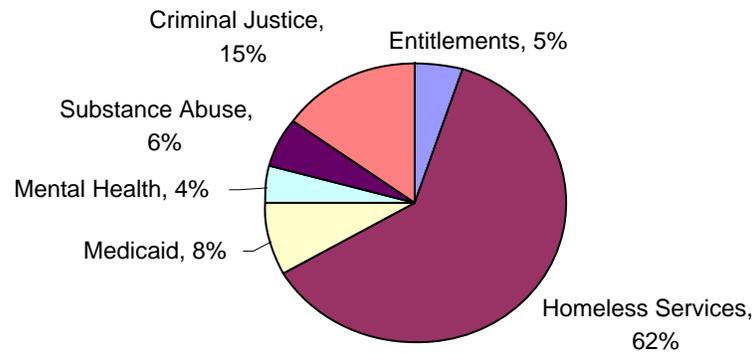

Exhibit 23 shows the average total costs of the study cohort by path group and time period. More detail about the differences in mainstream utilization and costs by path group is provided in Appendix B.7. The three path groups associated with long homeless residential stays (“Single ES Long Stayers”, “Transitional Housing Long Stayers”, and “Permanent Housing Long Stayers”) had the highest overall costs. PSH Long Stayers had a total average cost of $23,930, the highest of any path group, primarily because their physical healthcare costs were much higher than any other path group.

	ES Short Stayers	Street/ES Short Stayers	ES Long Stayers	ES Long Gappers	Sequential Short Stayers	Sequential Long Stayers	Circlers	PSH Long Stayers
Mainstream Costs Before Homelessness	$1,822	$1,571	$3,314	$1,260	$3,313	$2,439	$1,624	$4,808
Homeless Costs	$563	$853	$9,756	$910	$1,585	$10,416	$3,987	$8,493
Mainstream Costs During Homelessness	$259	$711	$2,953	$1,841	$1,054	$2,385	$2,057	$6,198
Mainstream Costs After Homelessness	$3,288	$3,456	$3,384	$2,563	$4,533	$846	$2,499	$4,432
Total	$5,932	$6,771	$19,407	$6,574	$10,485	$16,086	$10,167	$23,931

The high healthcare costs for users of permanent supportive housing were expected because many of Jacksonville’s permanent supportive housing programs exclusively served people with disabilities, and these individuals are older than the study cohort as a whole and may have chronic physical conditions as well as mental health problems. More than half of PSH Long Stayers also had some involvement with the criminal justice system during the study period. Compared to other path groups, mainstream costs for PSH Long Stayers remained fairly consistent before and after becoming homeless.

“Sequential Long Stayers”, persons who had long stays in transitional housing, had the highest homeless costs of any path group, but only average mainstream costs. Their average total costs ($16,086), were well below the overall costs of long-term stayers in emergency shelter or permanent supportive housing. The mainstream costs of “Sequential Long Stayers” dropped dramatically after homelessness, a possible indication that their lives were more stable as a result of their homeless stay or stays. Another interpretation is that this group of users was higher functioning than other path groups and thus had less frequent and less expensive involvement with mainstream systems after exiting homeless programs.

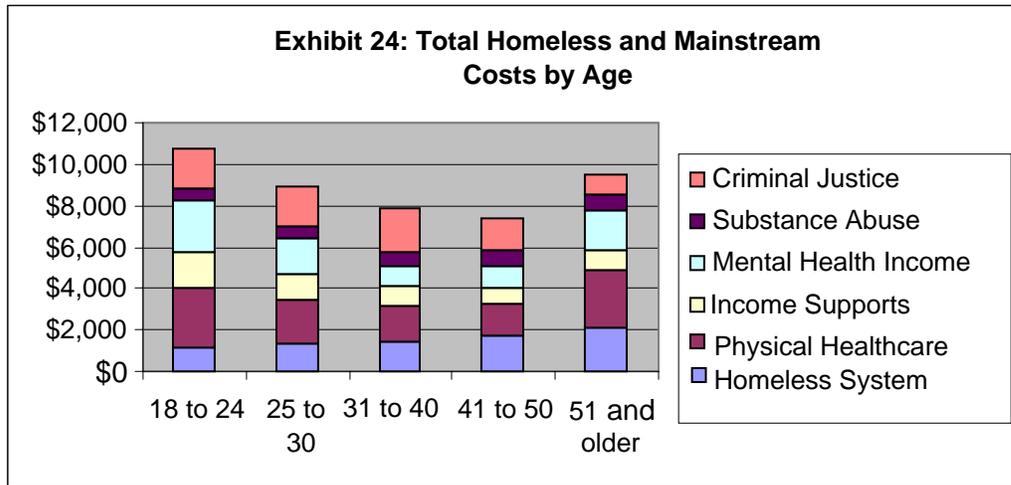

People with a single long stay in emergency shelter had an average total cost of $19,407. This small path group, only two percent of the study cohort, had the second highest homeless ($9,756) and mainstream ($9,651) costs per person of any path group. This group appeared to be more connected to mainstream supports than other path groups. They were the most likely to receive both income supports (86 percent) and physical healthcare (39 percent).

“Sequential Short Stayers” and “Circlers” had nearly identical total costs per person, $10,485 and $10,167 respectively. Sequential Short Stayers had much higher mental health costs before becoming homeless than any other path group (Appendix B.7). Unlike Sequential Long Stayers, the average mainstream costs of Sequential Short Stayers remained high after exiting homeless programs. “Circlers” had high average criminal justice costs during homelessness; suggesting that in some cases a jail stay helped trigger homeless recidivism and entry into emergency shelter. However, both of these path groups had lower overall costs than long term users of transitional or permanent housing because they spent less time in residential homeless programs.

Surprisingly, “Multiple Emergency Shelter Long Gappers” the group that most closely resembles the chronically homeless in their patterns of homelessness, had the lowest average mainstream costs before becoming homeless of any path group (Exhibit 23). Although Long Gappers had high criminal justice costs during homelessness, their overall mainstream costs were significantly lower than users of transitional or permanent housing or long-term stayers in emergency shelter because they were less connected to mainstream services like food stamps and healthcare. Long Gappers also had low homeless costs because, despite their many homeless program stays, their cumulative number of nights in shelter was low and they used inexpensive overnight shelters. “Single ES Short Stayers”, the most common path group representing 38 percent of the study cohort, had the lowest total cost per person. “Street ES Short Stayers” also had overall costs significantly lower than the cohort average.

There was a U-shaped relationship between age and total cost, as demonstrated in Exhibit 24. The 18-24 year old age group had the highest total costs per person. Although their homeless costs were low, their income support costs were significantly higher than other age groups, and they also had high Medicaid and mental health costs. Persons over 50 also had significantly higher total costs than other age groups. Older persons had significantly higher homeless and Medicaid costs compared with persons between the ages of 25 and 49.

Multivariate regression analysis shows that homeless service patterns, gender, race, and mainstream system involvement all had significant effects on overall costs. Holding constant demographic and mainstream system variables, long term stayers in transitional housing (“Sequential Long Stayers”) had the highest overall costs, 438 percent higher than short-term stayers in emergency shelter (Exhibit 25). After controlling for homeless path groups, mainstream involvement, and other demographic characteristics, women had 93 percent higher overall costs than men (Exhibit 25).

Similarly, African-Americans had 41-percent higher overall costs than whites (Exhibit 25). The entire difference in overall costs for African Americans was because of higher homeless costs. There was no significant difference in mainstream costs between African-Americans and those who are white (Appendix B.3.1, Models 5 and 6; Appendix B.3.2, Models 5 and 6.)

Involvement in mainstream systems was highly correlated with total costs for the homeless and mainstream systems combined. In most cases, persons involved in mainstream systems had higher overall costs. For instance, controlling

Exhibit 25. Multivariate Regression Models for Overall Homeless and Mainstream Costs

	Model with mainstream involvement -controlling for homeless path group
Homeless Path Group+
Single ES Long Stayers	3.890 (0.240)
Multiple ES Long Gappers	1.519 (0.126)
Street/ES Short Stayers	0.721 (0.086)
PSH Long Stayers	3.892 (0.217)
Sequential Short Stayers	1.800 (0.124)
Sequential Long Stayers	4.378 (0.264)
Circlers	2.902 (0.143)
Demographics+
Females	0.931 (0.100)
African-Americans	0.408 (0.072)
Other Races	0.348 (0.196)
Mainstream Involvement
Income Support (TANF and food stamps)	0.542 (0.075)
Physical Healthcare	0.405 (0.103)
Mental Health	-0.203 (0.088)
Substance Abuse	0.429 (0.088)
Criminal Justice	0.192 (0.074)
Constant	3.620 (0.095)
Observations	1972
R-Squared	0.49
+ Reference categories are Single Emergency Shelter Short Stayers, males, and whites. Both models also controlled for age. The full models are shown in Appendix B.3.2, which also includes models for homeless costs and overall mainstream costs. Standard errors in parentheses. ^a significant at 10%; ^b significant at 5%; ^c significant at 1% for other factors, persons receiving income supports had 54 percent higher costs than persons that did not receive income supports (Exhibit 25). The only exception to this was mental health. Controlling for homeless path group, demographics, and receipt of other mainstream services, people who used the mental health system had 20 percent lower overall costs than people who did not receive mental health services (Exhibit 25). The most likely explanation for this is that persons who received mental health services spent less time in homeless programs and had lower homeless costs.

A.6. Implications

This case study is consistent with past research showing great diversity in the ways people use the homeless service system. It also finds a similar diversity in the effects of becoming homeless on use of mainstream services. Particularly for homeless costs, but also for mainstream costs, a small subset of the study cohort was responsible for the majority of costs. Homeless interventions that target intensive users of homeless and mainstream services have the greatest potential for cost savings. More research is needed to understand what separates the majority of first-time homeless persons having brief and relatively inexpensive involvement with homeless and mainstream systems from the small subset with long periods of homelessness and costly involvement in homeless and mainstream systems. However, this case study did have several findings with direct implications for homeless policymakers.

A.6.1. Findings Associated with Homeless Paths

The small subset of the study cohort with long stays in emergency shelter, transitional, or permanent supportive housing had by far the highest costs over the entire period. People with longer homeless stays and higher homeless costs across program types also incurred higher costs for physical healthcare, income supports, and substance abuse treatment. Additionally, in many cases placement into service- rich, long-term homeless residential programs tends to increase costs to mainstream service systems rather than offset them. The current expenditures may also be justified by client needs and outcomes. However, homeless prevention and housing-based assistance targeting the most intense users of the homeless system may be able to equally meet needs and yield cost savings for both homeless and mainstream systems.

Short-term users of transitional housing had much higher mental health costs before becoming homeless than long-term users of emergency shelter or transitional housing. This could be an indication that people with the greatest barriers to independent living may have more difficulty successfully using homeless programs. It also suggests that people with long stays, and therefore those who incur the highest homeless costs, may not be the people with the greatest barriers to housing.

People with the most glaring need for assistance, those with long episodes of homelessness characterized by sporadic short stays in overnight shelters, actually had very low overall costs because they were not well connected to homeless or mainstream services. However, many people in this path group appeared to be stuck in a cycle of homelessness and incarceration. Criminal justice was the most expensive mainstream system for this group across the entire study period, and criminal justice costs spiked considerably around the time of initial entry into a homeless program, suggesting that people exiting jails are at increased risk of homelessness and persons with multiple homeless program stays are at increased risk of incarceration. In many cases, persons in the study cohort were arrested for public nuisance crimes like loitering or trespassing on public property, that were directly related to their homelessness. This reflects a need for better discharge planning and greater coordination between law enforcement, homeless service providers, and mental health and substance abuse service providers to prevent repeated homelessness and criminal justice involvement.

A.6.2. Findings Associated with Gender, Age and Race

There were substantial differences in the experiences of men and women. Women had longer stays in homeless programs, used programs with higher daily costs, and thus had significantly higher homeless costs. In part this could be because women chose to stay in residential programs until they had secured stable housing while men often alternated between shelter and other tenuous living arrangements. However, the pattern also reflects the design of the homeless system itself. Overnight emergency shelters tend to only serve single men while transitional housing programs are more likely to serve single women and families. Therefore, it is possible that single women are more likely to use transitional housing even to address short-term housing needs. Both transitional housing for individuals and programs serving families are generally more expensive than emergency shelter for individuals. Emergency shelter programs that are geared to the specific short-term needs of single women might yield cost savings, reducing the percentage of women who need the more intensive assistance provided in transitional housing.

The youngest and oldest members of the Jacksonville study cohort had the highest overall costs. People between 18 and 25 incurred significantly higher costs in mainstream systems, particularly income supports and mental health services, than the rest of the study cohort. People over 50 had higher homeless and physical healthcare costs.

First-time homeless African-American individuals also had higher overall costs and homeless costs, though not necessarily higher mainstream costs. This is related to their disproportionate use of a single long-term emergency shelter, one of the most expensive homeless programs in the community. To the extent that African-Americans individuals are using emergency shelter for extended periods as a form of permanent housing, communities should explore alternative, lower-cost housing strategies. Alternatively, for those who remain in shelter due to intensive needs that prevent them from resolving their homelessness, they should be referred to lower-cost transitional or permanent supportive housing programs that can more appropriately address their needs. In either case, systems should be implemented to alert programs to these patterns of extended stays, so more appropriate interventions can be deployed.

Targeting prevention or rapid rehousing interventions to individuals who have several of the demographic characteristics associated with higher costs, or even raising awareness among program staff on the different ways in which various demographic groups tend to use the homeless system, may help ensure that individuals are directed to providers that best match their particular needs and also provide additional opportunities for cost savings.

A.6.3. Concluding Findings on the Cost of Homeless Programs

Except for overnight shelters with minimal services, the monthly costs of a stay in a homeless residential program were substantially higher than the fair market rent for a one-bedroom apartment in Jacksonville. It is worth exploring whether the cost of issuing a permanent housing voucher, even with accompanying additional services administered by the homeless system or through mainstream systems (as is the case with permanent supportive housing programs), might be comparable to long-term placement in transitional housing.

This study provides an outline of the different ways that people who become homeless use homeless and mainstream services and the associated costs. However, this study did not collect data on clients' outcomes after exiting homeless residential programs or their long-term use of mainstream services after homelessness. This type of data would be necessary to compare the cost-effectiveness of various homeless interventions. Absent detailed health records for the study cohort, it is not possible to determine whether the low rates of involvement in healthcare and substance abuse treatment indicate a lack of need or a failure to connect persons in the study cohort to needed services. Finally, this case study is one piece of a larger study of the costs of homelessness, encompassing six communities. One of the key findings of the overall study is that the costs of homelessness vary greatly based on location and the characteristics of the study population. Policymakers should be wary of using cost estimates from this or other communities as a proxy for their own population and are encouraged to use their own administrative data to determine the costs of homelessness in their own communities.

References

- Emergency Services and Homeless Coalition of Jacksonville, Inc. [ESHC]. (2004). Ending Homelessness in Jacksonville: A Blueprint for the Future. Jacksonville, FL: ESHC. Retrieved from http://www.endhomelessness.org/files/2014_file_JacksonvilleFL.pdf
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2006). HUD's 2005 Continuum of Care Homeless Assistance Programs: Homeless Populations and Subpopulations. Retrieved from http://www.hud.gov/offices/cpd/homeless/local/reports/2005_fl_510_pop_sub.pdf
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2008). The Third Annual Homeless Assessment Report to Congress. Retrieved from the HMIS.info Web site: <http://www.hmis.info/ClassicAsp/documents/Final%20AHAR%20Report.pdf>
- U.S. Census Bureau. (n.d.). 2005 American Community. Retrieved from the American Factfinder website: <http://factfinder.census.gov>

Appendix B: Jacksonville Tables

B.1. Demographic Characteristics of Homeless Path Groups

Characteristic	Single ES Short Stayers	Street/ES Short Stayers	Single ES Long Stayers	Multiple ES Long Gappers	Sequential Short Stayers	Sequential Long Stayers	Relapsers	PSH Long Stayers	All Paths
Total Individuals	746	556	44	197	196	36	142	55	1972
% of Study Population	38%	28%	2%	10%	10%	2%	7%	3%	100%
Gender
Males	80%	85%	46%	95%	65%	67%	79%	67%	80%
Females	20%	15%	55%	5%	33%	28%	20%	29%	19%
Gender not reported	0%	0%	0%	0%	1%	5%	1%	4%	0%
Ages (at Client Start Date)
18 to 24	10%	8%	2%	6%	11%	3%	4%	.	8%
25 to 30	13%	10%	14%	10%	8%	3%	5%	9%	11%
31 to 40	28%	28%	32%	24%	27%	14%	25%	15%	27%
41 to 50	31%	36%	32%	43%	34%	42%	47%	42%	36%
51 to 61	14%	13%	18%	16%	17%	22%	16%	31%	15%
62 and older	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%
Age not reported	4%	4%	2%	2%	4%	17%	3%	4%	4%
Average Age at Client Start Date	40	41	41	42	41	47	43	46	41
Race
White	51%	52%	25%	37%	50%	50%	38%	42%	48%
Black or African-American	45%	42%	73%	58%	46%	39%	54%	53%	47%
Asian	1%	1%	2%	1%	0%	0%	1%	0%	1%
American Indian or Alaska Native	1%	1%	0%	1%	1%	0%	1%	2%	1%
Other	2%	2%	0%	2%	1%	0%	1%	2%	2%
Race not reported	1%	3%	0%	1%	3%	11%	5%	2%	2%

B.2. Homeless Service Utilization by Homeless Path Group

	Single ES Short Stayers	Street/ES Short Stayers	Single ES Long Stayers	Multiple ES Long Gappers	Sequential Short Stayers	Sequential Long Stayers	Relapsers	PSH Long Stayers	All Paths
Number of Clients	746	556	44	197	196	36	142	55	1,972
Percent of Clients	38%	28%	2%	10%	10%	2%	7%	3%	100%
Total Number of Stays
Average	1	3.1	1	10.9	2.4	5.6	7.6	2.7	3.3
25th Percentile	1	2	1	4	1	2	3	1	1
50th Percentile (Median)	1	2	1	8	2	2	5	2	2
75th Percentile	1	4	1	14	3	3	9	3	3
Percent of Individuals with Only One Stay	100.0%	12.4%	100.0%	0.0%	50.0%	22.2%	0.0%	36.4%	49.9%
Total Length of Stays (in Days)
Average	18	29	304	40	54	364	135	338	57
25th Percentile	1	3	215	12	11	266	38	172	2
50th Percentile (Median)	2	6	269	24	33	371	83	384	10
75th Percentile	17	20	372	47	84	469	199	505	56
Total Gap Between Stays (in Days)
Average	0	58	0	358	71	49	182	68	75
50th Percentile (Median)	0	17	0	363	0	0	159	2	0
Total Homeless Period (in Days)
Average	18	87	304	398	125	413	317	406	132

B.3. Multivariate Analysis of Total Costs, Homeless Costs, and Total Mainstream Costs

B.3.1 Models Excluding Usage of Each Domain as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for model 1 and model 2 is total costs (homeless and mainstream) in log scale. The outcome variable for model 3 and model 4 is homeless costs in log scale. The outcome variable for model 5 and model 6 is total mainstream costs in log scale.

Description: All models control for gender, race and age. Models 1, 3, 5 are with control based on path groups; models 2, 4, and 6, are with control based on underlying utilization data. These models do not include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

	Model (1) Total Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (2) Total Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (3) Homeless Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (4) Homeless Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (5) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (6) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Service Utilization Model
Single ES Long Stayers+	4.109		4.119		0.376
	(0.247)		(0.257)		(0.242)
Multiple ES Long Gappers	1.678		1.707		0.190
	(0.127)		(0.133)		(0.135)
Street/ES Short Stayers	0.789		0.874		0.108
	(0.088)		(0.096)		(0.100)
PSH Long Stayers	4.229		4.077		0.595
	(0.222)		(0.231)		(0.222)
Sequential Short Stayers	1.899		1.848		0.274
	(0.127)		(0.133)		(0.139)
Sequential Short Stayers	4.555		4.473		0.406
	(0.272)		(0.284)		(0.284)
Circlers	3.076		3.054		0.210
	(0.145)		(0.151)		(0.153)
Total Number of Stays		0.023		0.023		-0.033
		(0.007)		(0.007)		(0.008)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30		0.410		0.409		0.034
		(0.009)		(0.009)		(0.010)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30		0.086		0.086		0.034
		(0.008)		(0.008)		(0.010)

	Model (1) Total Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (2) Total Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (3) Homeless Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (4) Homeless Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (5) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (6) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Service Utilization Model
Female+	1.235 (0.094)	1.073 (0.078)	1.460 (0.102)	1.208 (0.086)	0.672 (0.097)	0.625 (0.097)
Black+	0.437 (0.074)	0.360 (0.061)	0.457 (0.078)	0.394 (0.065)	-0.048 (0.081)	-0.032 (0.080)
Other race	0.302 (0.202)	0.307* (0.167)	0.352 (0.217)	0.351* (0.182)	-0.007 (0.225)	-0.041 (0.224)
Age: 18-24+	0.118 (0.143)	0.165 (0.118)	0.093 (0.153)	0.155 (0.128)	0.598 (0.154)	0.590 (0.153)
Age: 25-30	0.102 (0.129)	0.114 (0.106)	0.062 (0.136)	0.108 (0.113)	0.228 (0.141)	0.215 (0.140)
Age: 41-50	0.053 (0.091)	0.113 (0.075)	0.034 (0.097)	0.089 (0.081)	-0.083 (0.100)	-0.058 (0.099)
Age: 51 or above	0.206* (0.110)	0.096 (0.091)	0.198* (0.116)	0.090 (0.097)	0.140 (0.123)	0.160 (0.122)
Gender missing	0.706 (0.526)	0.343 (0.434)	0.935 (0.574)	0.427 (0.479)	0.399 (0.562)	0.411 (0.557)
Race missing	0.581 (0.263)	0.775 (0.217)	0.634 (0.279)	0.834 (0.233)	-0.005 (0.289)	0.020 (0.287)
Age missing	-0.656 (0.270)	-0.448 (0.222)	-0.715 (0.294)	-0.532 (0.245)	0.032 (0.316)	0.066 (0.312)
Constant	3.944 (0.091)	4.030 (0.069)	3.810 (0.095)	3.893 (0.074)	7.731 (0.103)	7.810 (0.093)
Observations	1972	1972	1901	1901	1465	1465
R-squared	0.46	0.63	0.45	0.61	0.07	0.08
Notes: + Reference categories are: Single Emergency Shelter Short Stayers, Men, Whites, Age 31 to 40. Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%

B.3.2 Models Including Usage of Each Domain as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for model 1 and model 2 is total costs (homeless and mainstream) in log scale. The outcome variable for model 3 and model 4 is homeless costs in log scale. The outcome variable for model 5 and model 6 is total mainstream costs in log scale.

Description: All models control for gender, race and age. Models 1, 3, 5 are with control based on path groups; models 2, 4, and 6, are with control based on underlying utilization data. These models include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

	Model (1) Total Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (2) Total Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (3) Homeless Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (4) Homeless Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (5) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (6) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Service Utilization Model
Single ES Long Stayers	3.890 (0.240)		3.905 (0.251)		0.450 (0.184)
Multiple ES Long Gappers	1.519 (0.126)		1.532 (0.131)		0.067 (0.104)
Street/ES Short Stayers	0.721 (0.086)		0.801 (0.094)		0.038 (0.076)
PSH Long Stayers	3.892 (0.217)		3.727 (0.227)		0.247 (0.170)
Sequential Short Stayers	1.800 (0.124)		1.753 (0.130)		0.177* (0.106)
Sequential Short Stayers	4.378 (0.264)		4.296 (0.276)		0.353 (0.216)
Circlers	2.902 (0.143)		2.878 (0.149)		0.142 (0.117)
Total Number of Stays		0.026 (0.006)		0.025 (0.007)		-0.018 (0.006)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30		0.393 (0.009)		0.391 (0.009)		0.020 (0.008)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30		0.075 (0.008)		0.074 (0.008)		0.014* (0.008)
Female+	0.931 (0.100)	0.869 (0.083)	1.117 (0.110)	0.981 (0.092)	0.044 (0.081)	0.034 (0.081)
Black+	0.408 (0.072)	0.346 (0.060)	0.424 (0.077)	0.377 (0.064)	-0.011 (0.062)	0.004 (0.062)
Other race	0.348* (0.196)	0.342 (0.162)	0.390* (0.211)	0.382 (0.177)	0.060 (0.171)	0.034 (0.170)
Age: 18-24+	0.058 (0.140)	0.125 (0.116)	0.034 (0.149)	0.114 (0.125)	0.238 (0.118)	0.225* (0.117)
Age: 25-30	0.072 (0.125)	0.093 (0.104)	0.037 (0.132)	0.088 (0.111)	0.105 (0.107)	0.093 (0.107)
Age: 41-50	0.037	0.093	0.027	0.076	-0.045	-0.036

	Model (1) Total Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (2) Total Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (3) Homeless Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (4) Homeless Costs - Homeless Service Utilization Model	Model (5) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Path Group Model	Model (6) Mainstream Costs – Homeless Service Utilization Model
	(0.088)	(0.073)	(0.094)	(0.079)	(0.076)	(0.075)
Age: 51 or above	0.218	0.109	0.211*	0.102	0.158*	0.166*
	(0.107)	(0.089)	(0.114)	(0.095)	(0.094)	(0.094)
Any Food Stamp or TANF Costs	0.542	0.430	0.541	0.423	0.577	0.587
	(0.075)	(0.062)	(0.080)	(0.068)	(0.068)	(0.068)
Any Physical Healthcare Costs	0.405	0.239	0.458	0.285	1.433	1.413
	(0.103)	(0.085)	(0.111)	(0.093)	(0.078)	(0.078)
Any Mental Health Costs	-0.203	-0.126*	-0.213	-0.145*	0.832	0.831
	(0.088)	(0.073)	(0.094)	(0.079)	(0.068)	(0.067)
Any Substance Abuse Costs	0.429	0.357	0.419	0.372	0.644	0.637
	(0.088)	(0.073)	(0.093)	(0.078)	(0.066)	(0.066)
Any Criminal Justice Costs	0.192	0.127	0.248	0.160	1.104	1.094
	(0.074)	(0.062)	(0.079)	(0.067)	(0.063)	(0.063)
Gender Missing	0.665	0.328	0.921*	0.433	0.110	0.108
	(0.510)	(0.423)	(0.557)	(0.468)	(0.427)	(0.425)
Race Missing	0.579	0.772	0.622	0.830	0.006	0.035
	(0.256)	(0.212)	(0.271)	(0.227)	(0.220)	(0.219)
Age Missing	-0.582	-0.404*	-0.624	-0.479	0.235	0.246
	(0.263)	(0.218)	(0.287)	(0.240)	(0.242)	(0.240)
Constant	3.620	3.766	3.468	3.619	6.117	6.172
	(0.095)	(0.074)	(0.100)	(0.080)	(0.101)	(0.096)
Observations	1972	1972	1901	1901	1465	1465
R-squared	0.49	0.65	0.49	0.64	0.47	0.47
Notes: + Reference categories are: Single Emergency Shelter Short Stayers, Men, Whites, Age 31 to 40. Standard errors in parentheses. *significant at 10%; significant at 5%; significant at 1%.

B.4. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain, with Homeless Utilization as Covariates

B.4.1 Models Excluding Usage of Each Domain as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for these models is total costs associated with each domain in their original metric (dollar amounts).

Description: All models control for homeless utilization data, gender, race, and age homeless utilization. These models do not include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

	Criminal Justice	Income Supports	Physical Healthcare	Mental Health	Substance abuse
Total Number of Stays	-34.855 (21.201)	-5.599 (10.013)	-74.742 (36.628)	-15.781 (37.545)	-15.465 (14.559)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	11.861 (27.582)	80.128 (13.027)	198.681 (47.651)	-47.273 (48.844)	60.639 (18.941)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	149.972 (25.196)	0.982 (11.900)	13.062 (43.528)	-18.746 (44.618)	40.846 (17.302)
Female+	-992.334 (249.377)	1,770.719 (117.779)	2,170.849 (430.825)	1,663.730 (441.617)	257.364 (171.251)
Black+	380.364* (195.320)	280.946 (92.248)	560.360* (337.435)	-907.569 (345.888)	-378.032 (134.129)
Other race	814.333 (535.575)	-174.340 (252.948)	209.352 (925.260)	575.892 (948.438)	-745.892 (367.788)
Age: 18-24+	91.847 (380.230)	416.656 (179.580)	646.639 (656.886)	1,237.724* (673.342)	-192.726 (261.110)
Age: 25-30	-59.916 (341.461)	248.953 (161.269)	128.096 (589.908)	636.365 (604.686)	-196.469 (234.486)
Age: 41-50	-639.606 (240.925)	-152.958 (113.787)	47.339 (416.223)	237.133 (426.649)	15.568 (165.447)
Age: 51 or above	-1,094.955 (291.206)	-104.207 (137.534)	912.642* (503.089)	1,065.059 (515.691)	-43.218 (199.976)
Gender missing	-690.350 (1,392.916)	90.055 (657.863)	1,894.993 (2,406.404)	-953.652 (2,466.687)	702.451 (956.538)
Race missing	-575.680 (696.237)	287.534 (328.827)	-673.060 (1,202.820)	1,133.490 (1,232.952)	-422.936 (478.117)
Age missing	-1,842.868 (713.407)	-7.848 (336.937)	1,816.595 (1,232.484)	9.502 (1,263.359)	636.696 (489.908)
Constant	1,820.685 (220.352)	394.947 (104.071)	477.218 (380.681)	1,183.239 (390.217)	727.681 (151.319)
Observations	1972	1972	1972	1972	1972
R-squared	0.04	0.16	0.04	0.02	0.02
Notes: + Reference categories are: Men, Whites, Age 31 to 40. Standard errors in parentheses. * significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%.

B.4.2 Models Including Usage of Each Domain as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variables for these models are total homeless costs, total mainstream costs, and costs associated with each domain, all in log scale.

Description: All models control for homeless utilization data, gender, race, and age homeless utilization. These models include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

Total Costs (log scale)	Homeless Costs	Mainstream Costs	Medicaid Costs	Mental Health Costs	Substance Abuse Costs	Entitlement Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Number of Homeless Program Stays	0.025 (0.007)	-0.018 (0.006)	-0.057 (0.039)	-0.025 (0.025)	-0.007 (0.027)	-0.012* (0.007)	-0.005 (0.011)
Homeless Length of Stay (cost per additional 30 days)	0.391 (0.009)	0.020 (0.008)	0.034 (0.022)	-0.020 (0.022)	0.045 (0.022)	0.027 (0.008)	-0.041 (0.014)
Homeless Gap Days (cost per 30 additional days between stays)	0.074 (0.008)	0.014* (0.008)	0.021 (0.025)	-0.004 (0.022)	0.024 (0.022)	-0.008 (0.008)	0.025 (0.011)
Females	0.981 (0.092)	0.034 (0.081)	0.128 (0.188)	-0.021 (0.196)	-0.237 (0.226)	0.470 (0.083)	-0.557 (0.141)
African-Americans	0.377 (0.064)	0.004 (0.062)	-0.023 (0.177)	-0.316* (0.166)	-0.280 (0.175)	0.123* (0.068)	0.158 (0.100)
Other Races	0.382 (0.177)	0.034 (0.170)	-0.387 (0.516)	0.234 (0.389)	-1.263 (0.457)	-0.121 (0.196)	0.462 (0.298)
Ages 18 – 24	0.114 (0.125)	0.225* (0.117)	0.569 (0.281)	0.188 (0.269)	-0.090 (0.331)	0.164 (0.129)	0.070 (0.185)
Ages 25 – 30	0.088 (0.111)	0.093 (0.107)	0.226 (0.28)	0.443 (0.279)	-0.536* (0.309)	0.160 (0.120)	-0.059 (0.169)
Ages 41 – 50	0.076 (0.079)	-0.036 (0.075)	0.349 (0.246)	0.183 (0.202)	-0.104 (0.207)	-0.047 (0.084)	-0.163 (0.119)
Age 51 and Above	0.102 (0.095)	0.166* (0.094)	0.260 (0.266)	0.207 (0.256)	-0.050 (0.265)	0.221 (0.103)	-0.244 (0.160)
Received Food Stamps or TANF	0.423 (0.068)	0.587 (0.068)	-0.015 (0.211)	0.012 (0.174)	0.468 (0.185)		0.240 (0.103)
Received Medicaid Services	0.285 (0.093)	1.413 (0.078)		0.749 (0.174)	-0.501 (0.214)	0.614 (0.082)	-0.269* (0.14)
Received Mental Healthcare	-0.145* (0.079)	0.831 (0.067)	0.299* (0.176)		0.441 (0.176)	0.029 (0.075)	0.150 (0.116)
Received Substance Abuse	0.372 (0.078)	0.637 (0.066)	0.254 (0.184)	0.137 (0.158)		0.018 (0.074)	0.361 (0.108)
Involved with Criminal Justice	0.160 (0.067)	1.094 (0.063)	0.031 (0.177)	0.045 (0.162)	0.304* (0.17)	0.071 (0.067)
Missing Gender	0.433 (0.468)	0.108 (0.425)	0.960 (1.125)	-0.411 (0.954)	0.147 (1.289)	-0.015 (0.454)	-0.812 (0.957)
Missing Race	0.830 (0.227)	0.035 (0.219)	-1.107 (1.015)	0.321 (0.513)	0.630 (0.749)	0.190 (0.226)	-0.435 (0.363)
Missing Age	-0.479 (0.240)	0.246 (0.24)	0.573 (0.591)	-0.658 (0.524)	0.954 (0.679)	0.206 (0.256)	-2.011 (1.371)
Constant	3.619 (0.080)	6.172 (0.096)	7.432 (0.328)	6.917 (0.229)	6.389 (0.248)	6.435 (0.094)	7.374 (0.127)
Observations	1901	1465	390	492	437	1024	755
R-squared	0.64	0.47	0.04	0.07	0.11	0.2	0.09

Reference categories are: Males, Whites, Ages 31 – 40

Standard errors in parentheses. * Significant at 10%;  Significant at 5%;  Significant at 1%

B.5. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain, with Path Groups as Covariates

B.5.1 Models Excluding Usage of Each Domain as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for these models is total costs associated with each domain in their original metric (dollar amounts).

Description: All models control for homeless path groups, gender, race, and age homeless utilization. These models do not include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

	Model (1) Criminal Justice	Model (2) Income Supports	Model (3) Physical Healthcare	Model (4) Mental Health	Model (5) Substance Abuse
Single ES Long Stayers+	47.142 (656.299)	2,326.988 (306.924)	1,629.965 (1,118.827)	-1,238.011 (1,158.049)	-12.359 (448.596)
Multiple ES Long Gappers	1,677.589 (338.415)	-93.135 (158.263)	-540.835 (576.914)	-163.468 (597.138)	349.426 (231.315)
Street/ES Short Stayers	541.743 (234.931)	-4.741 (109.867)	-134.925 (400.498)	-2.881 (414.539)	312.461* (160.581)
PSH Long Stayers	839.736 (589.556)	439.888 (275.711)	7,562.911 (1,005.047)	-177.606 (1,040.280)	1,174.122 (402.976)
Sequential Short Stayers	43.786 (338.613)	-247.596 (158.355)	910.630 (577.251)	1,306.901 (597.487)	883.603 (231.450)
Sequential Long Stayers	42.512 (723.410)	43.305 (338.309)	-634.893 (1,233.235)	-716.680 (1,276.468)	1,345.077 (494.468)
Circling/ Relapsers	1,099.228 (386.022)	325.064* (180.526)	-342.969 (658.072)	-501.256 (681.141)	491.023* (263.855)
Female+	-920.635 (249.170)	1,793.028 (116.526)	2,252.018 (424.773)	1,590.685 (439.664)	264.270 (170.314)
African American+	356.920* (196.010)	254.646 (91.666)	524.382 (334.149)	-901.187 (345.863)	-346.331 (133.978)
Other Race	839.945 (537.436)	-215.937 (251.336)	176.758 (916.195)	659.964 (948.314)	-681.944* (367.350)
Age: 18-24+	90.056 (381.693)	455.442 (178.502)	715.421 (650.692)	1,209.422* (673.503)	-211.340 (260.896)
Age: 25-30	-82.979 (342.779)	231.148 (160.303)	63.796 (584.352)	684.489 (604.838)	-179.945 (234.297)
Age: 41-50	-692.992 (242.255)	-135.882 (113.293)	-19.914 (412.985)	236.254 (427.463)	-14.492 (165.587)
Age: 51 or above	-1,132.213 (292.185)	-52.109 (136.643)	748.102 (498.102)	1,013.491 (515.564)	-74.962 (199.715)
Gender missing	-895.875 (1,398.425)	495.061 (653.985)	1,427.608 (2,383.968)	-1,309.097 (2,467.542)	426.853 (955.857)
Race missing	-508.396 (700.858)	290.689 (327.762)	-426.163 (1,194.788)	1,139.488 (1,236.674)	-484.723 (479.053)
Age missing	-1,967.192 (718.321)	28.630 (335.929)	1,998.803 (1,224.558)	176.788 (1,267.487)	550.893 (490.989)
Constant	1,682.568 (241.042)	467.889 (112.726)	476.466 (410.918)	978.383 (425.323)	587.542 (164.758)
Observations	1972	1972	1972	1972	1972
R-squared	0.04	0.18	0.06	0.02	0.02

Notes: + Reference categories are: Single ES Short Stayers, Men, Whites, Age 31 to 40.
Standard errors in parentheses. * significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%.

B.5.2 Model Including Usage of Each Domain as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for these models is total costs associated with each domain in log scale.

Description: All models control for homeless path groups, gender, race, and age homeless utilization. These models include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

Total Costs (log scale)	Homeless Costs	Mainstream Costs	Medicaid Costs	Mental Health Costs	Substance Abuse Costs	Entitlement Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Single ES Long Stayers	3.905 (0.251)	0.450 (0.184)	1.011 (0.416)	-1.088 (0.535)	-0.356 (0.562)	0.784 (0.179)	-0.084 (0.356)
Multiple ES Long Gappers	1.532 (0.131)	0.067 (0.104)	-0.302 (0.37)	-0.13 (0.309)	0.245 (0.288)	-0.254 (0.12)	0.256* (0.151)
Street/ES Short Stayers	0.801 (0.094)	0.038 (0.076)	0.119 (0.216)	-0.320* (0.194)	0.096 (0.216)	-0.015 (0.086)	0.143 (0.128)
PSH Long Stayers	3.727 (0.227)	0.247 (0.17)	0.789* (0.421)	-0.247 (0.475)	1.155 (0.45)	0.228 (0.167)	-0.403 (0.271)
Sequential Short Stayers	1.753 (0.13)	0.177* (0.106)	0.841 (0.275)	-0.233 (0.263)	0.772 (0.268)	-0.087 (0.115)	-0.192 (0.184)
Sequential Long Stayers	4.296 (0.276)	0.353 (0.216)	-0.73 (0.604)	-0.537 (0.562)	1.437 (0.536)	-0.009 (0.225)	-0.407 (0.38)
Circling/Relapsers	2.878 (0.149)	0.142 (0.117)	0.421 (0.379)	-0.926 (0.303)	0.198 (0.326)	0.089 (0.121)	0.181 (0.195)
Females	1.117 (0.11)	0.044 (0.081)	0.134 (0.184)	0.08 (0.197)	-0.256 (0.223)	0.478 (0.082)	-0.564 (0.141)
African-Americans	0.424 (0.077)	-0.011 (0.062)	-0.031 (0.176)	-0.352 (0.166)	-0.203 (0.176)	0.096 (0.069)	0.144 (0.101)
Other Races	0.390* (0.211)	0.06 (0.171)	-0.334 (0.511)	0.296 (0.388)	-1.276 (0.452)	-0.12 (0.196)	0.506* (0.299)
Ages 18 – 24	0.034 (0.149)	0.238 (0.118)	0.563 (0.275)	0.197 (0.267)	-0.151 (0.328)	0.201 (0.129)	0.08 (0.186)
Ages 25 – 30	0.037 (0.132)	0.105 (0.107)	0.226 (0.276)	0.42 (0.277)	-0.498 (0.305)	0.161 (0.119)	-0.066 (0.17)
Ages 41 – 50	0.027 (0.094)	-0.045 (0.076)	0.339 (0.244)	0.219 (0.201)	-0.095 (0.207)	-0.037 (0.084)	-0.174 (0.121)
Age 51 and Above	0.211* (0.114)	0.158* (0.094)	0.307 (0.265)	0.197 (0.256)	0.015 (0.261)	0.249 (0.103)	-0.281* (0.16)
Received Food Stamps or TANF	0.541 (0.08)	0.577 (0.068)	0.096 (0.209)	0.065 (0.173)	0.438 (0.184)		0.222 (0.105)
Received Medicaid Services	0.458 (0.111)	1.433 (0.078)		0.714 (0.173)	-0.484 (0.212)	0.626 (0.083)	-0.264* (0.141)
Received Mental Healthcare	-0.213 (0.094)	0.832 (0.068)	0.267 (0.175)		0.416 (0.175)	0.033 (0.075)	0.137 (0.117)
Received Substance Abuse	0.419 (0.093)	0.644 (0.066)	0.255 (0.182)	0.116 (0.158)		0.034 (0.074)	0.363 (0.109)
Involved with Criminal Justice	0.248 (0.079)	1.104 (0.063)	0.055 (0.176)	0.04 (0.163)	0.317* (0.169)	0.072 (0.067)

Total Costs (log scale)	Homeless Costs	Mainstream Costs	Medicaid Costs	Mental Health Costs	Substance Abuse Costs	Entitlement Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Missing Gender	0.921* (0.557)	0.11 (0.427)	0.754 (1.117)	-0.501 (0.955)	-0.227 (1.274)	0.171 (0.455)	-1.016 (0.973)
Missing Race	0.622 (0.271)	0.006 (0.22)	-0.846 (0.998)	0.44 (0.511)	0.758 (0.742)	0.144 (0.226)	-0.452 (0.366)
Missing Age	-0.624 (0.287)	0.235 (0.242)	0.791 (0.583)	-0.598 (0.523)	1.07 (0.672)	0.254 (0.257)	-2.226 (1.384)
Constant	3.468 (0.1)	6.117 (0.101)	7.144 (0.327)	7.012 (-0.237)	6.272 (0.27)	6.420 (-0.101)	7.329 (-0.139)
Observations	1901	1465	390	492	437	1024	755
R-squared	0.49	0.47	0.09	0.09	0.14	0.21	0.09

Reference categories are: Males, Whites, Ages 31 – 40

Standard errors in parentheses. * Significant at 10%;  Significant at 5%;  Significant at 1%

B.6. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain, with Total Homeless Costs as a Covariate

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for these models is total costs associated with each domain in log scale.

Description: All models control for homeless costs, gender, race, and age homeless utilization. These models include utilization of each particular mainstream domain as covariates.

Total Costs By Domain (log scale)	Medicaid Costs	Mental Health Costs	Substance Abuse Costs	Entitlement Costs	Criminal Justice Costs
Total Homeless System Costs	0.102 (0.046)	-0.077* (0.041)	0.058 (0.042)	0.029* (0.017)	-0.005 (0.026)
Females	0.107 (0.199)	0.101 (0.209)	-0.309 (0.233)	0.510 (0.087)	-0.649 (0.15)
African-Americans	-0.103 (0.183)	-0.341 (0.168)	-0.275 (0.176)	0.141 (0.07)	0.137 (0.1030)
Other Races	-0.155 (0.541)	0.42 (0.424)	-1.268 (0.473)	-0.104 (0.199)	0.426 (0.314)
Ages 18 – 24	0.494* (0.295)	0.278 (0.273)	-0.118 (0.34)	0.151 (0.132)	0.117 (0.19)
Ages 25 – 30	0.134 (0.288)	0.383 (0.277)	-0.577* (0.31)	0.163 (0.121)	-0.065 (0.172)
Ages 41 – 50	0.271 (0.256)	0.15 (0.205)	-0.086 (0.209)	-0.059 (0.086)	-0.171 (0.123)
Age 51 and Above	0.135 (0.273)	0.126 (0.258)	-0.066 (0.268)	0.258 (0.104)	-0.327 (0.162)
Received Food Stamps or TANF	-0.032 (0.222)	0.019 (0.181)	0.514 (0.189)		0.242 (0.109)
Received Medicaid Services		0.850 (0.176)	-0.510 (0.216)	0.645 (0.084)	-0.329 (0.146)
Received Mental Healthcare	0.403 (0.181)		0.449 (0.18)	0.032 (0.077)	0.168 (0.12)
Received Substance Abuse	0.238 (0.19)	0.134 (0.16)		0.004 (0.076)	0.339 (0.111)
Involved with Criminal Justice	0.036 (0.182)	0.145 (0.163)	0.332* (0.171)	0.052 (0.069)
Missing Gender	0.92 (1.184)	0.098 (1.054)	0.364 (1.277)	0.769 (0.485)	-1.493 (0.946)
Missing Race	-1.467 (1.043)	0.755 (0.525)	0.583 (0.748)	0.231 (0.227)	-0.486 (0.379)
Missing Age	0.813 (0.686)	-0.609 (0.569)	0.943 (0.681)	0.13 (-0.271)	-2.059 (1.381)
Constant	6.878 (0.424)	7.144 (0.275)	6.169 (0.324)	6.233 (0.127)	7.422 (0.169)
Observations	369	465	429	980	719
R-squared	0.05	0.09	0.1	0.2	0.08

Reference categories are: Males, Whites, Ages 31 – 40

Standard errors in parentheses. * Significant at 10%;  Significant at 5%;  Significant at 1%

B.7. Mainstream Involvement and Per Person Mainstream Costs by Homeless Path Group and Time Period

Path Groups	ES Short Stayers	Street/ES Short Stayers	ES Long Stayers	ES Long Gappers	Sequential Short Stayers	Sequential Long Stayers	Circlers	PSH Long Stayers
Number of Individuals	746	556	44	197	196	36	142	55
% of Cohort	38%	28%	2%	10%	10%	2%	7%	3%
Criminal Justice
Percent Involved	31%	38%	34%	62%	35%	36%	44%	55%
Average Costs Pre	$461	$573	$376	$527	$356	$488	$454	$539
Average Costs During	$12	$307	$57	$1,636	$215	$178	$1,400	$561
Average Costs Post	$777	$902	$612	$885	$529	$14	$366	$628
Average Costs Total	$1,251	$1,783	$1,045	$3,048	$1,100	$680	$2,219	$1,728
Income Supports (TANF and food stamps)
Percent Involved	42%	51%	86%	53%	57%	67%	71%	84%
Average Costs Pre	$298	$194	$706	$182	$227	$432	$328	$332
Average Costs During	$57	$84	$1,777	$45	$57	$366	$243	$667
Average Costs Post	$598	$561	$1,458	$367	$670	$321	$697	$528
Average Costs Total	$953	$839	$3,941	$593	$955	$1,119	$1,267	$1,527
Physical Healthcare
Percent Involved	22%	17%	39%	12%	25%	22%	15%	31%
Average Costs Pre	$499	$319	$1,865	$213	$957	$167	$375	$3,197
Average Costs During	$86	$56	$808	$19	$302	$528	$201	$3,452
Average Costs Post	$804	$733	$1,218	$303	$1,367	$451	$489	$2,651
Average Costs Total	$1,389	$1,108	$3,892	$535	$2,626	$1,146	$1,064	$9,300
Mental Healthcare
Percent Involved	21%	28%	25%	21%	30%	28%	30%	27%
Average Costs Pre	$474	$427	$131	$267	$1,230	$470	$147	$429
Average Costs During	$59	$117	$147	$50	$116	$336	$121	$568
Average Costs Post	$839	$746	$92	$498	$1,545	$53	$483	$284
Average Costs Total	$1,372	$1,290	$371	$816	$2,891	$859	$750	$1,281
Substance Abuse
Percent Involved	17%	22%	23%	26%	32%	31%	26%	33%
Average Costs Pre	$90	$57	$235	$71	$542	$881	$321	$310
Average Costs During	$45	$147	$164	$91	$365	$977	$93	$950
Average Costs Post	$269	$514	$4	$511	$422	$7	$465	$341
Average Costs Total	$404	$718	$403	$673	$1,329	$1,865	$879	$1,601
All Mainstream Domains
Average Costs Pre	$1,822	$1,571	$3,314	$1,260	$3,313	$2,439	$1,624	$4,808
Average Costs During	$259	$711	$2,953	$1,841	$1,054	$2,385	$2,057	$6,198
Average Costs Post	$3,288	$3,456	$3,384	$2,563	$4,533	$846	$2,499	$4,432
Average Costs Total	$5,369	$5,737	$9,651	$5,664	$8,901	$5,670	$6,180	$15,438

Note: Jacksonville's ES Short Stayers and Street/ES Short Stayers are combined in the ES Short Stayers common path group. Sequential Short Stayers and Sequential Long Stayers are combined in the Sequential Program Users common path group.

Appendix C: Individual Data

C.1. Cohort Summaries

C.1.1 Jacksonville, Florida Study Cohort

Path Groups	ES Short Stayers	Street/ES Short Stayers	ES Long Stayers	ES Long Gappers	Sequential Short Stayers	Sequential Long Stayers	Circlers	PSH Long Stayers	Total Cohort
Number of Individuals	746	556	44	197	196	36	142	55	1,972
% of Cohort	38%	28%	2%	10%	10%	2%	7%	3%	100%
Demographics^a
Male	80%	85%	45%	95%	66%	71%	79%	70%	81%
African-American	45%	43%	73%	59%	47%	44%	57%	54%	48%
51 and older	17%	16%	20%	17%	21%	31%	17%	33%	18%
Average Age at First Entry	40 yrs	41 yrs	41 yrs	42 yrs	41 yrs	47 yrs	43 yrs	46 yrs	41 yrs
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	1 stay	3 stays	1 stay	11 stays	2 stays	6 stays	8 stays	3 stays	3 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	18 days	29 days	304 days	40 days	54 days	364 days	135 days	338 days	57 days
Average Total Gap	0 days	58 days	0 days	358 days	71 days	49 days	182 days	68 days	75 days
Median Total Length of Stay	2 days	6 days	269 days	24 days	33 days	371 days	83 days	384 days	10 days
Mainstream System Involvement (% of study cohort with involvement at any point during the study)
Medicaid Managed Care and Primary Health Claims	22%	17%	39%	12%	24%	22%	15%	31%	20%
Mental Health - Medicaid and State	21%	28%	25%	21%	30%	28%	30%	27%	25%
Substance Abuse Treatment - Medicaid and State	17%	22%	23%	26%	32%	31%	26%	33%	22%
Criminal Justice - Arrests and Jail	31%	38%	34%	62%	35%	36%	44%	55%	38%
TANF	5%	2%	18%	1%	3%	0%	1%	2%	3%
Food Stamps	42%	51%	86%	53%	57%	67%	71%	84%	52%
Costs During Homelessness (Average Cost Per Person in Path Group)
Homeless System	$563	$853	$9,756	$910	$1,585	$10,416	$3,987	$8,493	$1,634
Medicaid Managed Care and Primary Health Care Claims	$86	$56	$808	$19	$302	$528	$201	$3,452	$219
Medicaid and State-funded Mental Health Treatment	$58	$117	$147	$50	$116	$336	$121	$568	$106
Medicaid and State-funded Substance Abuse Treatment	$45	$147	$164	$91	$365	$977	$93	$950	$158
Jail and Arrests	$12	$307	$57	$1,636	$214	$178	$1,400	$561	$397
TANF	$4	-	$227	$1	$2	-	$1	$3	$7
Food Stamps	$54	$84	$1,551	$44	$55	$366	$241	$664	$131
Mainstream Costs	$259	$711	$2,954	$1,841	$1,054	$2,385	$2,057	$6,198	$1,002
Total Costs	$822	$1,564	$12,710	$2,751	$2,639	$12,801	$6,044	$14,691	$2,636

Note: Jacksonville's ES Short Stayers and Street/ES Short Stayers are combined in the ES Short Stayers common path group. Sequential Short Stayers and Sequential Long Stayers are combined in the Sequential Program Users common path group.

^aNull demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere.

C.1.2 Houston, Texas Individuals Study Cohort

	Street Only	ES Short Stayers	Extended ES Stayers	ES Long Gappers	Frequent ES Long Gappers	Sequential Program Users	Circlers	TH Only or PSH Only	Total Cohort
Number of Individuals	871	2,306	115	263	101	89	85	576	4,406
% of Cohort	20%	52%	3%	6%	2%	2%	2%	13%	100%
% of Cohort excluding Street Only Path Group	-	65%	3%	7%	3%	3%	2%	16%	100%
Demographics^a
Male	78%	88%	43%	88%	100%	51%	31%	23%	74%
African-American	63%	52%	72%	66%	63%	65%	68%	52%	57%
51 and older	17%	17%	9%	19%	30%	19%	8%	12%	16%
Average Age at First Entry	42 yrs	40 yrs	37 yrs	42 yrs	46 yrs	43 yrs	40 yrs	40 yrs	41 yrs
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	1 stay	2 stays	1 stay	7 stays	40 stays	3 stays	3 stays	1 stay	3 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	1 day	8 days	158 days	23 days	124 days	182 days	174 days	150 days	39 days
Average Total Gap	0 days	16 days	6 days	376 days	245 days	149 days	150 days	10 days	44 days
Median Total Length of Stay	1 day	2 days	112 days	14 days	95 days	254 days	269 days	205 days	22 days
Mainstream System Involvement (% of study cohort with involvement at any point during the study)
Mental Health Care	2%	17%	30%	36%	28%	35%	48%	28%	18%
State MH Inpatient	0%	<1%	0%	3%	0%	0%	2%	<1%	<1%
Criminal Justice	1%	14%	14%	26%	23%	19%	27%	19%	13%
Costs During Homelessness (Average Cost Per Person in Path Group)
Residential Homeless	$199	$353	$10,540	$880	$2,494	$14,418	$10,705	$8,799	$2,257
Mental Health Care	$2	$149	$1,050	$1,669	$1,491	$2,052	$1,847	$489	$380
State MH Inpatient				$170					$10
Criminal Justice	-	$45	$222	$1,049	$782	$900	$749	$109	$157
Mainstream Costs	$2	$194	$1,272	$2,888	$2,274	$2,952	$2,596	$598	$547
Total Costs	$201	$547	$11,812	$3,768	$4,768	$17,370	$13,301	$9,397	$2,804
Note: ES Long Gappers and Frequent ES Long Gappers are combined in the ES Long Gapper common path group. ^aNull demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere.

C.1.3 Des Moines, Iowa Study Cohort

	ES Short Stayers	ES Long Gappers	Sequential Program Users	Circlers	TH Only (Shared Room Model)	TH Only (Ind Room Model)	Total Cohort
Number of Individuals	641	154	42	48	147	92	1,124
% of Cohort	57%	14%	4%	4%	13%	8%	100%
Demographics^a
Male	73%	72%	88%	90%	58%	85%	73%
African-American	21%	29%	27%	26%	12%	18%	21%
51 and older	16%	14%	31%	19%	3%	13%	15%
Average Age at First Entry	39 yrs	40 yrs	44 yrs	40 yrs	34 yrs	37 yrs	39 yrs
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	2 stays	8 stays	4 stays	7 stays	1 stay	1 stay	3 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	17 days	63 days	259 days	203 days	133 days	237 days	73 days
Average Total Gap	10 days	308 days	110 days	171 days	9 days	26 days	63 days
Median Total Length of Stay	4 days	44 days	181 days	157 days	92 days	198 days	24 days
Average Per Person Residential Homeless System Costs	$321	$1,224	$8,539	$6,374	$3,103	$11,731	$2,308
^aNull demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere.

C.2. Cross-Site Individuals Multivariate Analyses

C.2.1 Analysis of Homeless Costs and Homeless Service Utilization, with Homeless Program Type as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variables for these models are total homeless costs in log scale and total length of stay (in days) in log scale

Description: Both models control for the program types used, site, gender, race and age. The homeless costs model also controls for homeless utilization data.

	Model 1: Total Homeless Costs (log scale)	Model 2: Length of Stay (log scale)
Homeless Programs Used+
Persons who only Used TH Housing	1.299 (0.049)	2.029 (0.063)
Only Used ES and TH Programs	1.114 (0.067)	2.294 (0.088)
Used Other Program Types or Combinations	0.793 (0.051)	1.261 (0.067)
Site+
Des Moines, IA	0.068 (0.045)	0.227 (0.061)
Houston, TX	0.012 (0.033)	-0.465 (0.046)
Homeless System Utilization+
Number of stays	0.037 (0.003)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	0.351 (0.005)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	0.073 (0.004)
Demographics+
Female	0.974 (0.035)	0.735 (0.047)
Black	0.192 (0.030)	0.300 (0.040)
Other Race	0.051 (0.059)	0.100 (0.080)
Age 18 – 24	0.074 (0.055)	-0.232 (0.075)
Age 25 – 30	0.105 (0.051)	-0.043 (0.070)
Age 41 – 50	0.098 (0.037)	0.190 (0.051)
Age 18 – 24	0.098 (0.046)	0.261 (0.062)
Gender missing	-0.452 (0.091)	0.439 (0.123)
Race missing	0.241 (0.087)	0.930 (0.119)

	Model 1: Total Homeless Costs (log scale)	Model 2: Length of Stay (log scale)
Age missing	0.134	-2.345
	(0.063)	(0.084)
Constant	3.953	1.685
	(0.041)	(0.054)
Observations	7502	7502
R-squared	0.68	0.36
Notes: + Reference categories are: Used ES Only, Jacksonville, Age 31 – 40, Male, White. Standard errors in parentheses. * significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%

C.2.2 Analysis of Homeless Costs and Homeless Service Utilization, without Homeless Program Type as Covariates

Outcome variables: The outcome variables for these models are (1) total homeless cost in log scale, (2) total number of stays in log scale, (3) total length of stay in log scale, and (4) total number of gap days in log scale.

Description: All four models control for site, gender, race and age. The model for homeless costs controls for homeless system utilization data.

Outcome variable	Model 1: Total Homeless Costs (log scale)	Model 2: Number of Stays (log scale)	Model 3: Length of Stay (log scale)	Model 4: Total gap days (log scale)
Site+
Des Moines, IA	0.180 (0.049)	0.023 (0.030)	0.293 (0.067)	-0.179* (0.103)
Houston, TX	0.095 (0.037)	-0.084 (0.023)	-0.534 (0.050)	-0.119 (0.078)
Homeless System Utilization
Number of stays	0.030 (0.003)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	0.385 (0.004)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30	0.076 (0.004)
Demographics+
Female	1.268 (0.037)	-0.376 (0.022)	1.307 (0.049)	0.335 (0.099)
Black	0.188 (0.033)	0.137 (0.020)	0.276 (0.045)	0.403 (0.075)
Other Race	-0.032 (0.065)	0.098 (0.040)	-0.060 (0.089)	-0.015 (0.143)
Age 18 – 24	0.061 (0.061)	-0.092 (0.038)	-0.310 (0.083)	-0.030 (0.141)
Age 25 – 30	0.087 (0.057)	-0.098 (0.035)	-0.116 (0.078)	-0.237* (0.128)
Age 41 – 50	0.116 (0.041)	0.098 (0.025)	0.228 (0.056)	0.222 (0.088)
Age 18 – 24	0.094* (0.051)	0.153 (0.031)	0.260 (0.069)	0.074 (0.106)
Gender missing	-0.655 (0.098)	-0.241 (0.061)	0.136 (0.134)	-0.596 (0.272)
Race missing	0.129 (0.095)	0.246 (0.059)	0.707 (0.130)	0.256 (0.229)
Age missing	0.582 (0.055)	-0.501 (0.034)	-1.645 (0.074)	0.180 (0.304)
Constant	4.059 (0.044)	0.657 (0.027)	2.096 (0.059)	3.630 (0.092)
Observations	7502	7502	7502	2870
R-squared	0.62	0.11	0.22	0.03
Notes: + Reference categories are: Used ES Only, Jacksonville, Age 31 – 40, Male, White Standard errors in parentheses * significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%

C.3. Multivariate Analysis of Costs by Domain in Houston Individuals

Outcome variables: The outcome variable for these models is total costs associated with each domain in their original metric (dollar amounts).

Description: Models 1, 2, and 3 model Mental Health System Costs. Models 4, 5, and 6 model criminal justice costs. All models control for gender, race, and age. Models 1 and 4 control based on path groups. Models 2 and 5 control for underlying homeless utilization data. Models 3 and 6 control for homeless system costs.

	Model 1	Model 2	Model 3	Model 4	Model 5	Model 6
Outcome	Mental Health System Costs (Homeless Path Group Model)	Mental Health System Costs (Homeless Utilization Model)	Mental Health System Costs (Homeless Cost Model)	Criminal Justice Costs (Homeless Path Group Model)	Criminal Justice Costs (Homeless Utilization Model)	Criminal Justice Costs (Homeless Cost Model)
Path Group+
Street-Only Short Stayers	-648.743			-497.902
	(472.107)			(389.487)
Emergency Shelter Long Gappers	2,351.606			1,179.294
	(401.362)			(331.123)
Emergency Shelter Multiple-Stay Long Gappers	2,317.959			761.055
	(627.240)			(517.472)
Emergency Shelter Extended Stayers	767.744			709.349
	(598.898)			(494.089)
Progressive Long Stayers	2,084.817			604.719
	(672.278)			(554.628)
Circling Long Stayers	2,966.777			1,943.164
	(695.542)			(573.821)
TH-Only and PSH-Only	-94.020			790.651
	(331.763)			(273.704)
Homeless System Utilization
Number of stays		2.035			-23.043*
		(15.330)			(12.658)
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30		135.568			-33.204
		(31.638)			(26.123)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30		207.498			136.029
Homeless System Costs
Total Homeless Costs			244.533			-25.776
			(54.671)			(44.988)

	Model 1	Model 2	Model 3	Model 4	Model 5	Model 6
Outcome	Mental Health System Costs (Homeless Path Group Model)	Mental Health System Costs (Homeless Utilization Model)	Mental Health System Costs (Homeless Cost Model)	Criminal Justice Costs (Homeless Path Group Model)	Criminal Justice Costs (Homeless Utilization Model)	Criminal Justice Costs (Homeless Cost Model)
Demographics+
Female	568.855 (257.202)	408.504* (233.006)	6.249 (254.764)	-635.795 (212.191)	-174.216 (192.393)	-227.191 (209.644)
Black	-249.602 (217.731)	-281.174 (216.820)	-170.798 (218.043)	81.006 (179.627)	62.298 (179.028)	125.816 (179.427)
Other Race	-668.275 (309.769)	-671.700 (308.407)	-589.103* (310.447)	-752.921 (255.559)	-813.770 (254.652)	-777.166 (255.465)
Age 18 – 24	-653.342 (416.243)	-625.156 (414.834)	-664.094 (417.714)	-338.548 (343.400)	-388.749 (342.528)	-384.910 (343.734)
Age 25 – 30	-94.633 (370.515)	-28.563 (369.645)	-149.842 (371.953)	-290.677 (305.674)	-321.642 (305.216)	-365.413 (306.077)
Age 41 – 50	-729.987 (269.043)	-797.297 (268.755)	-739.953 (270.714)	-1,242.844 (221.960)	-1,250.060 (221.911)	-1,210.904 (222.769)
Age 51 or greater	-1,454.007 (334.955)	-1,498.154 (334.779)	-1,453.801 (336.496)	-1,634.459 (276.337)	-1,635.552 (276.428)	-1,624.431 (276.901)
Gender missing	174.329 (1,121.838)	-27.085 (1,117.312)	-211.924 (1,127.713)	-227.348 (925.514)	184.237 (922.565)	137.760 (927.988)
Race missing	-1,015.764* (551.384)	-692.421 (448.306)	-330.123 (452.561)	-749.294* (454.890)	-376.993 (370.166)	-341.467 (372.410)
Age missing	-1,393.196 (498.065)	-1,772.292 (299.000)	-2,305.343 (294.904)	-1,745.497 (410.902)	-2,333.122 (246.884)	-2,470.592 (242.675)
Constant	2,161.168 (265.168)	1,990.985 (262.855)	1,278.324 (362.525)	2,420.949 (218.763)	2,520.263 (217.039)	2,741.075 (298.320)
Observations	4404	4404	4404	4404	4404	4404
R-squared	0.04	0.04	0.03	0.04	0.04	0.03

Notes: + Reference categories are ES Short Stayers, Age 31 – 40, Male, White

Standard errors in parentheses

* significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%

Appendix D: Family Data

D.1. Family Cohort Summaries

D.1.1 Houston, Texas Families Study Cohort

Path Groups ^a	ES Short Stayers	ES Repeat Users	ES Long Gappers	Multi-Program Users	Housing Program Users	Total Cohort
Number of Families	262	54	22	44	95	477
% of Cohort	55%	11%	5%	9%	20%	100%
Number of Adults	290	65	29	47	103	534
Number of Children	553	125	50	80	187	995
Avg. Household Size	3.2	3.5	3.6	2.9	3.1	3.2
Household Characteristics
One Adult	89%	83%	68%	93%	91%	88%
Membership changed during homeless period	7%	52%	68%	70%	26%	25%
Children six and under	53%	35%	45%	56%	49%	50%
Demographics^b
Male Adults	14%	25%	28%	9%	3%	13%
African-American	65%	67%	78%	62%	61%	65%
Adults 41 and older	15%	16%	28%	21%	15%	16%
Average Age at First Entry	30.4	33.4	34.9	32.5	31.8	31.5
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	1 stay	2.1 stays	3.4 stays	2.5 stays	1.2 stays	1.4 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	37.1 days	100.6 days	63.0 days	236.3 days	283.6 days	113.0 days
Median Total Length of Stay	24 days	49 days	45 days	191 days	45 days	49 days
Average Total Gap	0.0 days	41.3 days	346.0 days	81.1 days	12.2 days	30.5 days
Mainstream System Involvement (% of study cohort with involvement at any point during the study)
Criminal Justice	5%	7%	23%	14%	13%	8%
Mental Health	11%	19%	23%	23%	21%	16%
State Hospitals	-	-	-	-	1%	0.2%
Costs During Homelessness (Average Cost Per Person in Path Group)
Homeless System	$2,321	$5,748	$3,885	$26,913	$35,344	$11,626.77
Criminal Justice	-	-	$163	-	-	$7.52
Mental Health	$48.92	$210.29	$72.68	$331.27	$364.72	$157.22
State Hospitals	-	-	-	-	-	-
Mainstream Costs	$49	$210	$236	$331	$365	$164.74
Total Costs	$2,370	$5,959	$4,121	$27,244	$35,709	$11,792
^a The ES Short Stayers and ES Repeat Users are combined to form the Brief Users of Emergency Shelter path in the Family Chapter, Multi-Program Users and Housing Program Users are considered Heavy Users of Transitional Housing, and the Emergency Shelter Long Gappers path is considered Repeat Users with Long Gaps.
^b Null demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere

D.1.2 Kalamazoo, Michigan Study Cohort

Path Groups ^a	ES Single Use Short Stayers	ES Repeat Users	ES Long Gappers	Multi-Program Long Gappers	Long Stayers	Total Cohort
Number of Families	161	47	33	19	82	342
% of Cohort	47%	14%	10%	6%	24%	100%
Number of Adults	172	51	38	21	98	380
Number of Children	307	94	92	42	171	706
Avg. Household Size	3.0	3.1	3.9	3.3	3.3	3.2
Household Characteristics
One Adult	93%	92%	85%	90%	81%	89%
Membership changed during homeless period	1%	17%	61%	53%	5%	13%
Children six and under	48%	54%	56%	51%	44%	49%
Demographics^b
Male Adults	12%	8%	16%	10%	24%	15%
African-American	59%	53%	71%	67%	60%	60%
Adults 41 and older	11%	10%	11%	19%	15%	12%
Average Age at First Entry	29.6	28.8	29.1	32.7	31.1	30.0
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	1 stay	2.1 stays	3.1 stays	3.3 stays	1.2 stays	1.5 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	14.6 days	48.1 days	37.8 days	144.1 days	289 days	94 days
Median Total Length of Stay	8 days	31 days	31 days	135 days	308 days	30 days
Average Total Gap	0 days	50.0 days	377.5 days	275.4 days	8.7 days	60.5 days
Mainstream System Involvement (% of study cohort with involvement at any point during the study)
Criminal Justice	39%	45%	61%	63%	34%	42%
Medicaid	92%	98%	100%	100%	94%	94%
Financial Assistance ^{ccc}	>=32%	>=36%	>=58%	>=79%	>=40%	>=39%
Costs During Homelessness (Average Cost Per Person in Path Group)
Homeless System	$1,172	$2,977	$3,295	$5,925	$6,574	$3,184
Criminal Justice	$1.09	$45.34	$125.61	$383.00	$112.31	$67.08
Medicaid	$340.35	$1,951.99	$13,184.15	$10,283.72	$10,555.85	$4,802.88
Financial Assistance	$3.04	$51.15	$204.29	$268.76	$295.47	$113.95
Mainstream Costs	$344	$2,048	$13,514	$10,935	$10,964	$4,984
Total Costs	$1,516	$5,026	$16,809	$16,860	$17,537	$8,168

^a ES Single Use Short Stayers and ES Repeat Users are combined to form the Brief Users of Emergency Shelter path in the Family Chapter, the Long Stayers path is considered Heavy Users of Transitional Housing, and ES Long Gappers and Multi-Program Long Gappers are considered Repeat Users with Long Gaps.

^b Null demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere

^c De-duplicated data across programs within this domain was not provided. Values in this row represent the maximum value received by the path group in any one type of sub-domain. The total de-duplicated value across types is most likely higher assuming that at least some families receiving each type of assistance were different.

D.1.3 Upstate South Carolina Study Cohort

Path Groups ^a	One Week Single Stayers	One Month Returners	Three-Month Single Stayers	Six Month Returners	Long Stay Progressers	TH Only Long Stayers	Total Cohort
Number of Families	35	11	24	14	25	36	145
% of Cohort	24%	8%	17%	10%	17%	25%	100%
Number of Adults	38	12	26	17	28	41	162
Number of Children	57	16	48	26	48	77	272
Avg. Household Size	2.7	2.6	3.1	3.1	3.0	3.3	3.0
Household Characteristics
One Adult	91%	91%	92%	79%	88%	86%	88%
Membership changed during homeless period	0%	36%	4%	64%	36%	6%	17%
Children six and under	50%	69%	27%	46%	30%	43%	41%
Demographics^b
Male Adults	3%	17%	8%	18%	11%	15%	10%
African-American	56%	25%	46%	41%	63%	54%	49%
Adults 41 and older	5%	8%	23%	0%	18%	12%	12%
Average Age at First Entry	30.1	29.1	34.6	28.3	32.4	31.3	31.2
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	1 stay	2.1 stays	1 stay	2.3 stays	2.2 stays	1 stays	1.4 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	9.3 days	31.6 days	87.6 days	176.2 days	328.5 days	375.3 days	186.0 days
Median Total Length of Stay	6 days	33 days	87 days	117 days	298 days	409 days	103 days
Average Total Gap	0 days	92.7 days	0 days	133.8 days	24.9 days	3.4 days	24.9 days
Mainstream System Involvement (% of study cohort with involvement at any point during the study)
Criminal Justice	31%	45%	38%	71%	32%	19%	34%
Food Stamps	80%	100%	92%	100%	100%	94%	92%
Medicaid ^c	>=69%	100%	>=96%	>=93%	100%	>=94%	>90%
Costs During Homelessness (Average Cost Per Person in Path Group)
Homeless System	$784	$2,508	$8,890	$12,475	$16,036	$15,478	$9,663.12
Criminal Justice	-	$18.18	$41.67	$57.14	$64.00	$33.33	$33.10
Food Stamps	$64.00	$866.00	$630.58	$2,140.57	$2,725.92	$3,030.44	$1,614.57
Medicaid	$48.17	$2,730.73	$1,712.75	$4,071.43	$4,436.76	$5,608.89	$3,052.89
Mainstream Costs	$112	$3,615	$2,385	$6,269	$7,227	$8,673	$4,700.56
Total Costs	$896	$6,123	$11,275	$18,744	$23,262	$24,151	$14,363.68
^a One-Week Single Stayers, One-Month Returners and Three-Month Returners are combined to form the Brief Users of Emergency Shelter path in the Family Chapter, Long Stay Progressers and TH Only Long Stayers are considered Heavy Users of Transitional Housing, and the Six-Month Returners are considered Repeat Users with Long Gaps. ^b Null demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere ^c De-duplicated data across programs within this domain were not provided. Values in this row represent the maximum value received by the path group in any one type of sub-domain.

D.1.4 Washington, DC Study Cohort

Path Groups ^a	Congregate ES, Short Stayers	Congregate and Apartment ES	Progressing Long Stayers	Transitional Housing Only	Direct to Permanent Housing	Long Gappers	Total Cohort
Number of Families	135	36	52	45	91	51	410
% of Cohort	33%	9%	13%	11%	22%	12%	100%
Number of Adults	157	47	70	47	108	171	500
Number of Children	303	112	135	90	199	107	946
Avg. Household Size	3.4	4.4	3.9	3.0	3.4	3.5	3.5
Household Characteristics
One Adult	84%	72%	69%	96%	81%	69%	80%
Membership changed during homeless period	11%	64%	75%	22%	5%	92%	34%
Children six and under	43%	53%	43%	64%	44%	53%	48%
Demographics^b
Male Adults	15%	25%	16%	4%	21%	25%	18%
African-American	97%	100%	100%	94%	96%	98%	97%
Adults 41 and older	21%	15%	29%	21%	16%	21%	20%
Average Age at First Entry	32.0	30.6	30.8	30.5	30.6	32.4	31.6
Homeless Experience
Average Number of Stays	1.2 stays	2.6 stays	2.8 stays	1.2 stays	1 stays	7.2 stays	2.2 stays
Average Total Length of Stay	67.2 days	513.2 days	550.5 days	447.1 days	384.4 days	272.6 days	308.6 days
Median Total Length of Stay	39 days	474 days	543 days	472 days	381 days	207 days	258 days
Average Total Gap	5.8 days	20.4 days	42.6 days	0.1 days	0.0 days	514.7 days	73.2 days
Mainstream System Involvement (% of study cohort with involvement between 7/1/2003 and 7/31/2008)
Medicaid	92%	100%	100%	98%	93%	98%	95%
Substance Abuse	7%	8%	6%	13%	1%	29%	9%
Child Welfare	46%	56%	37%	49%	29%	55%	43%
Mental Health	30%	47%	46%	58%	14%	55%	36%
^a Congregate ES Short Stayers are considered Brief Users of Emergency Shelter in the Family Chapter, Progressing Long Stayers and Transitional Housing Only are combined to form Heavy Users of Transitional Housing and the Long Gappers are considered Repeat Users with Long Gaps. ^b Null demographic values are excluded from percentage calculations and thus may differ from findings presented elsewhere

D.2. Cross-Site Family Multivariate Analysis

D.2.1 Analysis of Total Homeless Costs: Approach 1

Description: This series of regressions starts with the basic building blocks of costs per family, first adding length of stay (Model 1) to dummy variables controlling for site differences. Model 2 adds program type to site dummy variables and length of stay. Models 3 and 4 add other variables that reflect program use patterns, number of stays, number of “gap days,” and whether the family changed composition during the period of homelessness. The final models (5 and 6) add basic family demographic characteristics: age of adults, age of children, household size, and race.

Outcome Variable: Total Homeless Costs in Log Scale

Total Homeless Cost (log scale)	Model 1 (Length of Stay only)	Model 2 (Model 1 variables plus Program Type)	Model 3 (Model 2 variables plus Number of stays and number of “gap days”)	Model 4 (Model 3 variables plus Change in composition during homeless period)	Model 5 (All variables except household change)	Model 6 (All variables)
Washington, DC ^a	0.734 (0.097)	0.828 (0.098)	0.769 (0.098)	0.727 (0.098)	0.864 (0.103)	0.836 (0.103)
Upstate South Carolina	0.733 (0.121)	0.700 (0.120)	0.748 (0.119)	0.732 (0.118)	0.719 (0.119)	0.693 (0.119)
Houston, TX	0.843 (0.086)	0.862 (0.085)	0.903 (0.084)	0.854 (0.085)	0.916 (0.085)	0.862 (0.086)
Length of stay (in days) divided by 30	0.239 (0.006)	0.218 (0.008)	0.223 (0.008)	0.219 (0.008)	0.222 (0.008)	0.219 (0.008)
Transitional Housing-only program type		0.422 (0.112)	0.442 (0.111)	0.459 (0.111)	0.464 (0.112)	0.475 (0.111)
Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing-only program type		0.633 (0.131)	0.443 (0.133)	0.394 (0.133)	0.489 (0.133)	0.437 (0.133)
Other program type		-0.066 (0.153)	-0.222 (0.154)	-0.330 (0.157)	-0.303* (0.155)	-0.427 (0.158)
Total number of stays			0.051 (0.024)	0.037 (0.024)	0.044* (0.024)	0.031 (0.024)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30			0.036 (0.008)	0.025 (0.009)	0.038 (0.008)	0.028 (0.009)
Any change in household composition during the study period				0.326 (0.096)		0.350 (0.099)
Total number of adults in household					0.025 (0.160)	-0.024 (0.160)
Total number of children in household					0.067 (0.028)	0.055 (0.028)
Male adult-only household type					-0.218 (0.237)	-0.230 (0.236)

Total Homeless Cost (log scale)	Model 1 (Length of Stay only)	Model 2 (Model 1 variables plus Program Type)	Model 3 (Model 2 variables plus Number of stays and number of "gap days")	Model 4 (Model 3 variables plus Change in composition during homeless period)	Model 5 (All variables except household change)	Model 6 (All variables)
Female adult-only household type					-0.243 (0.184)	-0.245 (0.183)
African American household head					-0.273 (0.084)	-0.290 (0.084)
Household head of other race					-0.038 (0.167)	-0.042 (0.166)
Household head ages 18-24					-0.037 (0.099)	-0.038 (0.099)
Household head ages 25-30					0.023 (0.092)	0.020 (0.091)
Household head ages 41-50					0.084 (0.108)	0.086 (0.107)
Household head ages 51 or above					0.159 (0.246)	0.156 (0.245)
Household with youngest child born after study entry					-0.338 (0.207)	-0.465 (0.209)
Household youngest child ages 6-12					0.198 (0.088)	0.205 (0.088)
Household youngest child ages 13-17					0.184 (0.142)	0.195 (0.141)
Household head race missing					-0.232 (0.214)	-0.191 (0.213)
Household head age missing					-0.763 (0.553)	-0.802 (0.551)
Youngest child age missing					-0.064 (0.261)	-0.061 (0.260)
Constant	6.221 (0.068)	6.163 (0.068)	6.012 (0.074)	6.031 (0.074)	6.179 (0.356)	6.283 (0.355)
Observations	1287	1287	1287	1287	1285	1285
R-squared	0.60	0.61	0.63	0.63	0.64	0.64

Reference categories are: Kalamazoo, MI, Emergency Shelter-only program type, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31 - 40, household youngest child ages 0-5.

Standard errors in parentheses

* significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%

^a Excluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

D.2.2 Analysis of Total Homeless Costs: Approach 2

Description: This approach starts with site dummies and basic family demographics (Model 1) and then adds program type (Model 3), length of stay (Model 4), and then numbers of stays and gap days (Model 5). Models 2 and 6 also add the variable that reflects whether the household changed composition. Model 1 does not control either for length of stay or for program type.

Outcome Variable: Total Homeless Costs in Log Scale

Total homeless cost (log scale)	Model 1 (Basic family demographics)	Model 2 (Model 1 variables plus Household Change)	Model 3 (Model 2 variables plus Program Type)	Model 4 (Model 3 variables plus Length of Stay)	Model 5 (Model 4 plus Number of stays and gap days)	Model 6 (All variables)
Washington, DC ^a	1.630 (0.149)	1.453 (0.148)	1.483 (0.126)	0.898 (0.104)	0.864 (0.103)	0.836 (0.103)
Upstate South Carolina	1.442 (0.177)	1.377 (0.174)	1.121 (0.148)	0.682 (0.121)	0.719 (0.119)	0.693 (0.119)
Houston, TX	1.016 (0.128)	0.890 (0.127)	1.007 (0.106)	0.881 (0.086)	0.916 (0.085)	0.862 (0.086)
Total number of adults in household	0.181 (0.241)	-0.023 (0.238)	0.048 (0.200)	0.067 (0.161)	0.025 (0.160)	-0.024 (0.160)
Total number of children in household	0.085 (0.042)	0.052 (0.042)	0.095 (0.035)	0.065 (0.028)	0.067 (0.028)	0.055 (0.028)
Male adult-only household type	-0.176 (0.358)	-0.253 (0.350)	-0.226 (0.296)	-0.203 (0.239)	-0.218 (0.237)	-0.230 (0.236)
Female adult-only household type	-0.219 (0.278)	-0.239 (0.272)	-0.368 (0.230)	-0.254 (0.186)	-0.243 (0.184)	-0.245 (0.183)
African American household head	-0.249* (0.127)	-0.277 (0.125)	-0.194* (0.105)	-0.270 (0.085)	-0.273 (0.084)	-0.290 (0.084)
Household head of other race	-0.369 (0.252)	-0.320 (0.247)	-0.046 (0.209)	-0.032 (0.169)	-0.038 (0.167)	-0.042 (0.166)
Household head ages 18-24	-0.387 (0.150)	-0.349 (0.147)	-0.251 (0.124)	-0.065 (0.100)	-0.037 (0.099)	-0.038 (0.099)
Household head ages 25-30	-0.070 (0.139)	-0.060 (0.136)	-0.088 (0.115)	-0.005 (0.093)	0.023 (0.092)	0.020 (0.091)
Household head ages 41-50	0.293* (0.163)	0.267* (0.160)	0.185 (0.135)	0.092 (0.109)	0.084 (0.108)	0.086 (0.107)
Household head ages 51 or above	0.575 (0.372)	0.518 (0.365)	0.631 (0.308)	0.227 (0.249)	0.159 (0.246)	0.156 (0.245)
Household with youngest child born after study entry	0.988 (0.299)	0.380 (0.304)	0.481* (0.251)	-0.054 (0.204)	-0.338 (0.207)	-0.465 (0.209)

Total homeless cost (log scale)	Model 1 (Basic family demographics)	Model 2 (Model 1 variables plus Household Change)	Model 3 (Model 2 variables plus Program Type)	Model 4 (Model 3 variables plus Length of Stay)	Model 5 (Model 4 plus Number of stays and gap days)	Model 6 (All variables)
Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.092	0.124	0.165	0.177	0.198	0.205
	(0.134)	(0.131)	(0.111)	(0.089)	(0.088)	(0.088)
Household youngest child ages 13-17	0.120	0.155	0.049	0.170	0.184	0.195
	(0.215)	(0.211)	(0.178)	(0.144)	(0.142)	(0.141)
Household head race missing	-0.778	-0.602*	-0.398	-0.273	-0.232	-0.191
	(0.324)	(0.318)	(0.268)	(0.216)	(0.214)	(0.213)
Household head age missing	-0.940	-0.994	-0.641	-0.822	-0.763	-0.802
	(0.839)	(0.822)	(0.693)	(0.560)	(0.553)	(0.551)
Youngest child age missing	0.180	0.168	-0.297	-0.034	-0.064	-0.061
	(0.395)	(0.387)	(0.327)	(0.264)	(0.261)	(0.260)
Any change in household composition during the study period		0.926				0.350
		(0.125)				(0.099)
Transitional Housing-only program type			2.274	0.459	0.464	0.475
			(0.109)	(0.113)	(0.112)	(0.111)
Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing-only program type			2.119	0.659	0.489	0.437
			(0.146)	(0.131)	(0.133)	(0.133)
Other program type			1.668	-0.143	-0.303*	-0.427
			(0.170)	(0.154)	(0.155)	(0.158)
Length of stay (in days) divided by 30				0.215	0.222	0.219
				(0.008)	(0.008)	(0.008)
Total number of stays					0.044*	0.031
					(0.024)	(0.024)
Total gaps between stays (in days), divided by 30					0.038	0.028
					(0.008)	(0.009)
Constant	7.025	7.227	6.555	6.307	6.179	6.283
	(0.537)	(0.527)	(0.444)	(0.359)	(0.356)	(0.355)
Observations	1285	1285	1285	1285	1285	1285
R-squared	0.16	0.20	0.43	0.63	0.64	0.64

Reference categories are: clients in Kalamazoo, Emergency Shelter-only program type, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31-40, household youngest child ages 0-5

Standard errors in parentheses

* significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%

¹Excluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

D.2.3 Analysis of the Selection of Program Type, With Household Change as a Covariate

Description: The coefficients for this Multinomial Logit model are expressed as odds ratios, with values greater than one showing that, compared to the reference category, a particular type of household is more likely to use a program type. This model is used to identify the factors associated with the type of program use by first-time homeless families.

Program type Category (ES only; TH only; ES and TH only; Other)	Multinomial Logit Model
	Base category = Emergency Shelter Only
Outcome	Transitional Housing Only	Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing Only	Other
Washington, D.C. ^a	0.866 (0.205)	0.966 (0.311)	5.776 (2.591)
Upstate South Carolina	1.630* (0.406)	2.865 (0.940)	0.151 (0.163)
Houston, TX	1.002 (0.190)	0.656 (0.200)	0.799 (0.342)
Total number of adults in household	1.112 (0.471)	0.827 (0.399)	1.255 (0.516)
Total number of children in household	0.972 (0.065)	0.830* (0.076)	0.998 (0.091)
Any change in household composition during the study period	0.894 (0.200)	6.057 (1.446)	15.410 (4.673)
Male adult-only household type	0.975 (0.597)	0.829 (0.593)	1.849 (1.346)
Female adult-only household type	1.493 (0.720)	0.897 (0.484)	1.438 (0.757)
African American household head	0.939 (0.174)	1.083 (0.296)	0.212 (0.081)
Household head of other race	0.714 (0.269)	0.177 (0.185)	0.000 (0.000)
Household head ages 18-24	0.749 (0.169)	1.062 (0.343)	0.277 (0.129)
Household head ages 25-30	0.965 (0.200)	1.387 (0.415)	0.988 (0.337)
Household head ages 41-50	1.037 (0.263)	1.831 (0.602)	1.206 (0.428)
Household head ages 51 or above	0.767 (0.457)	1.234 (0.863)	0.390 (0.346)
Household with youngest child born after study entry	1.525 (0.870)	2.729* (1.216)	0.327 (0.205)
Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.761 (0.158)	1.121 (0.313)	1.258 (0.408)
Household youngest child ages 13-17	1.160 (0.365)	1.186 (0.517)	1.626 (0.794)
Household head race missing	0.427 (0.245)	0.456 (0.485)	0.421 (0.469)
Household head age missing	0.576 (0.767)	0.000 (0.000)	0.000 (0.000)
Youngest child age missing	3.273* (1.667)	0.802 (0.894)	2.961 (2.792)
Constant	0.223 (0.205)	0.115* (0.124)	0.035 (0.036)
Observations	1285
Log likelihood	-1109.4261
Reference categories are: clients in Kalamazoo, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31-40, household youngest child ages 0-5
Coefficients in relative risk ratio format
Standard errors in parentheses
* significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%
^a Excluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

D.2.4 Analysis of the Selection of Program Type, Without Household Change as a Covariate

Description: coefficients for this Multinomial Logit model are expressed as odds ratios, with values greater than one showing that, compared to the reference category, a particular type of household is more likely to use a program type. This model is used to identify the factors associated with the type of program used by first-time homeless families. This analysis is identical to the one shown previously, except that the household change variable is excluded from the model.

Program type Category (ES only; TH only; ES and TH only; Other)	Multinomial Logit Model
	Base category = Emergency Shelter Only
	Transitional Housing Only	Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing Only	Other
Washington, DC ^a	0.852 (0.201)	1.346 (0.414)	9.246 (3.822)
Upstate, South Carolina	1.622 (0.404)	3.433 (1.080)	0.224 (0.237)
Houston, TX	0.990 (0.186)	0.984 (0.283)	1.433 (0.562)
Total number of adults in household	1.102 (0.445)	1.220 (0.603)	2.156 (0.849)
Total number of children in household	0.972 (0.064)	0.890 (0.080)	1.127 (0.096)
Male adult-only household type	0.965 (0.579)	0.899 (0.643)	1.732 (1.190)
Female adult-only household type	1.512 (0.705)	0.925 (0.509)	1.369 (0.688)
African American household head	0.934 (0.173)	1.155 (0.302)	0.286 (0.101)
Household head of other race	0.713 (0.268)	0.164 (0.171)	0.000 (0.000)
Household head ages 18-24	0.747 (0.168)	1.009 (0.316)	0.265 (0.118)
Household head ages 25-30	0.961 (0.199)	1.370 (0.395)	0.925 (0.290)
Household head ages 41-50	1.034 (0.261)	1.829 (0.585)	1.319 (0.424)
Household head ages 51 or above	0.780 (0.465)	1.391 (0.948)	0.553 (0.451)
Household with youngest child born after study entry	1.376 (0.745)	7.974 (3.403)	1.124 (0.703)
Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.763 (0.158)	1.013 (0.274)	1.016 (0.303)
Household youngest child ages 13-17	1.164 (0.365)	1.035 (0.440)	1.454 (0.640)
Household head race missing	0.432 (0.247)	0.290 (0.306)	0.198 (0.215)
Household head age missing	0.575 (0.757)	0.000 (0.000)	0.000 (0.000)
Youngest child age missing	3.324* (1.685)	0.912 (0.987)	3.284 (2.813)
Constant	0.222 (0.197)	0.086* (0.094)	0.029 (0.028)
Observations	1285
Log likelihood	-1109.4261
Reference categories are: clients in Kalamazoo, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31-40, household youngest child ages 0-5
Coefficients in relative risk ratio format
Standard errors in parentheses
* significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1%
^a Excluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

D.2.5 Analysis of the Length of Stay

Description: This series of regressions predicts length of stay, based on study site and household characteristics, and the types of programs used. Model 1 includes all variables. Model 2 excludes the program type variables. Model 3 excludes the household change variable.

Outcome variable: Length of Stay in Log Scale

Total length of stay (log scale)	Model 1 All Variables	Model 2 All Variables except Program Type	Model 3 All Variables except Household Change
Washington, DC ^a	0.913 (0.115)	1.003 (0.144)	0.964 (0.116)
Upstae South Carolina	0.714 (0.135)	0.991 (0.170)	0.737 (0.136)
Houston, TX	0.449 (0.098)	0.400 (0.123)	0.507 (0.097)
Total number of adults in household	-0.045 (0.183)	0.014 (0.232)	0.032 (0.184)
Total number of children in household	0.077 (0.032)	0.056 (0.040)	0.091 (0.032)
Any change in household composition during the study period	0.443 (0.104)	0.879 (0.121)
Transitional Housing-only program type	2.436 (0.100)		2.431 (0.100)
Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing-only program type	1.988 (0.137)		2.123 (0.134)
Other program type	1.921 (0.164)		2.145 (0.156)
Male adult-only household type	-0.127 (0.271)	-0.093 (0.342)	-0.105 (0.272)
Female adult-only household type	-0.361* (0.210)	-0.195 (0.265)	-0.362* (0.211)
African American household head	-0.132 (0.097)	-0.214* (0.122)	-0.110 (0.097)
Household head of other race	-0.182 (0.191)	-0.500 (0.240)	-0.175 (0.192)
Household head ages 18-24	-0.269 (0.113)	-0.406 (0.143)	-0.278 (0.114)
Household head ages 25-30	-0.057 (0.105)	-0.041 (0.133)	-0.063 (0.106)
Household head ages 41-50	0.145 (0.123)	0.238 (0.156)	0.146 (0.124)
Household head ages 51 or above	0.538* (0.281)	0.437 (0.356)	0.567 (0.283)
Household with youngest child born after study entry	0.224 (0.238)	0.390 (0.297)	0.487 (0.231)
Household youngest child ages 6-12	0.103 (0.101)	0.038 (0.128)	0.087 (0.102)
Household youngest child ages 13-17	0.176 (0.162)	0.273 (0.205)	0.156 (0.164)
Household head race missing	-0.312 (0.245)	-0.630 (0.310)	-0.378 (0.247)
Household head age missing	-0.522 (0.634)	-0.860 (0.801)	-0.492 (0.638)

Total length of stay (log scale)	Model 1 All Variables	Model 2 All Variables except Program Type	Model 3 All Variables except Household Change
Youngest child age missing	-0.183 (0.299)	0.337 (0.377)	-0.179 (0.301)
Constant	2.812 (0.407)	3.372 (0.513)	2.726 (0.409)
Observations	1285	1285	1285
R-squared	0.48	0.16	0.47
Reference categories are: clients in Kalamazoo, Emergency Shelter-only program type, mixed-adult household type, white household head, household head ages 31-40, household youngest child ages 0-5 Standard errors in parentheses * significant at 10%;  significant at 5%;  significant at 1% ^aExcluded CCG/SAFAH-only families in DC

D.2.6 Summary Statistics of Variables Used in the Family Cross-site Regression Models

Variable	Obs	Mean	Std. Dev.	Min	Max
Cost	1287	10,310.99	15,820.13	31.65	97,242.60
Costs in Log scale	1287	7.95	1.92	3.45	11.48
DC	1287	0.25	0.43	0	1
South Carolina	1287	0.11	0.32	0	1
Houston	1287	0.37	0.48	0	1
Total length of stay	1287	144.37	175.48	1	550
Total length of stay (in days), divided by 30	1287	4.81	5.85	0.03	18.33
Number of stays	1287	1.62	1.61	1	25
Total gap days	1287	53.11	139.45	0	867
Total gaps between stays (in days) divided by 30	1287	1.77	4.65	0	28.90
Transitional Housing-only program type	1287	0.18	0.39	0	1
Emergency Shelter and Transitional Housing-only program type	1287	0.09	0.29	0	1
Other program type	1287	0.07	0.26	0	1
Any change in household composition during study period	1287	0.25	0.43	0	1
Total number of adults in household	1286	1.14	0.38	1	4
Total number of children in household	1285	2.12	1.28	1	9
Male adult-only household type	1287	0.05	0.21	0	1
Female adult-only household type	1287	0.83	0.38	0	1
African American household head	1287	0.70	0.46	0	1
Household head of other race	1287	0.05	0.21	0	1
Household head ages 18-24	1287	0.27	0.44	0	1
Household head ages 25-40	1287	0.24	0.43	0	1
Household head ages 41-50	1287	0.14	0.35	0	1
Household head ages 51 or above	1287	0.02	0.14	0	1
Household with youngest child born after study entry	1287	0.03	0.17	0	1
Household youngest child ages 6-12	1287	0.25	0.43	0	1
Household youngest child ages 13-17	1287	0.08	0.27	0	1
Household head race missing	1287	0.03	0.16	0	1
Household head age missing	1287	0.01	0.07	0	1
Youngest child age missing	1287	0.02	0.14	0	1

Bibliography of Cost of Homelessness Case Studies

Leopold, J., Spellman, B., Khadduri, J., & Sokol, B. (2009) Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Individuals in Jacksonville, Florida. Cambridge MA: Abt Associates, Inc.

Khadduri, J., Spellman, B., Sokol, B., Leopold, J., & Rothschild, L. (2009a) Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Families in Washington, D.C. Cambridge MA: Abt Associates, Inc.

Khadduri, J., Spellman, B., Sokol, B., Leopold, J., & Rothschild, L. (2009b) Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Individuals in Des Moines, Iowa. Cambridge MA: Abt Associates, Inc.

Sokol, B., Leopold, J., Spellman, B. & Khadduri, J., (2009) Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Houston, Texas. Cambridge MA: Abt Associates, Inc.

Sokol, B., Spellman, B., Khadduri, J., & Leopold, J. (2009a) Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Families in Kalamazoo, Michigan. Cambridge MA: Abt Associates, Inc.

Sokol, B., Spellman, B., Khadduri, J., & Leopold, J. (2009b) Costs Associated with First-time Homelessness: Families in Upstate South Carolina. Cambridge MA: Abt Associates, Inc.

References

- Abt Associates Inc. (2005). Sources of Funding for Permanent Housing for Chronically Homeless People. Unpublished data.
- Burt, M. (2005). Taking Health Care Home: Baseline Report on PSH Tenants, Programs, Policies, and Funding. Oakland, CA: Corporation for Supportive Housing.
- Burt, M. (2008). Evolution of Permanent Supportive Housing in Taking Health Care Home Communities, 2004–2007: Tenants, Programs, Policies, and Funding at Project End. Oakland, CA: Corporation for Supportive Housing.
- Burt, M. (2009, forthcoming). Life after Transitional Housing for Homeless Families. U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.
- Burt, M., Aron, L.Y., & Lee, E. (2001). Helping America's homeless: Emergency shelter or affordable housing? Washington, DC: Urban Institute Press.
- Canton, C. L. M., Wilkens, C., & Anderson J. (2007). People Who Experience Long-Term Homelessness: Characteristics and Interventions. Toward Understanding Homelessness: The 2007 National Symposium on Homelessness Research. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HUDUser Web site: http://www.huduser.org/publications/homeless/homeless_symp_07.html
- Chiu, T., Fang, D., Chen, J., Wang, Y., and Jeris, C. (2001). A Robust and Scalable Clustering Algorithm for Mixed Type Attributes in Large Database Environment. In D. Lee (Ed.) Proceedings of the seventh ACM SIGKDD international conference on knowledge discovery and data mining (pp. 263-268). San Francisco, CA. New York, NY: ACM Presss.
- Corporation for Supportive Housing. (2005). Taking Health Care Home: Baseline Report on PSH Tenants, Programs, Policies, and Funding. Oakland, CA: Corporation for Supportive Housing.
- Corporation for Supportive Housing. (2008). Evolution of PSH in Taking Health Care Home Communities, 2004–2007: Tenants, Programs, Policies, and Funding at Project End. Oakland, CA: Corporation for Supportive Housing.
- Culhane, D. P., Averyt, J. M., & Hadley, T. R. (1997). The rate of public shelter admission among Medicaid-reimbursed users of behavioral health services. Psychiatric Services (Washington, D.C.), 48(3), 390-392.
- Culhane, D. P., Metraux, S. & Hadley, T. (2002). Public service reductions associated with placement of homeless persons with severe mental illness in supportive housing. Housing Policy Debate, 13, 134.

- Culhane, D. P., Metraux, S., Min Park, J., Schretzman M., & Valente J. (2007). Testing a Typology of Family Homelessness Based on Patterns of Public Shelter Utilization in Four U.S. Jurisdictions: Implications for Policy and Program Planning. Housing Policy Debate, 18(1). Fannie Mae Foundation.
- Culhane, D. P., Parker, W. D., Poppe, B., Gross, K. S., & Sykes, E. (2007). Accountability, Cost-Effectiveness, and Program Performance: Progress Since 1998. Toward Understanding Homelessness: The 2007 National Symposium on Homelessness Research. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HUDUser Web site: http://www.huduser.org/publications/homeless/homeless_symp_07.html
- D'Amore, J., Hung, O., Chiang, W., Goldfrank, L. (2001). The epidemiology of the homeless population and its impact of the urban emergency department. Academic Emergency Medicine: Official Journal of the Society for Academic Emergency Medicine, 8(11), 1051-1055.
- Emergency Services and Homeless Coalition of Jacksonville, Inc. [ESHHC]. (2004). Ending Homelessness in Jacksonville: A Blueprint for the Future. Jacksonville, FL: ESHC. Retrieved from http://www.endhomelessness.org/files/2014_file_JacksonvilleFL.pdf
- Folsom, D. P., Hawthorne, W. L., Lindamer, L., Gilmer, T., Bailey, A., Golshan, S. (2005). Prevalence and Risk Factors for Homelessness and Utilization of Mental Health Services Among 10,340 Patients with Serious Mental Illness in a Large Public Mental Health System. American Journal of Psychiatry, 162(2), 370-376.
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2004). Homeless Management Information Systems (HMIS) Data and Technical Standards Final Notice (Fed. Reg, 69-146, pp. 45888-45934).
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2005). 2006 Fair Market Rents. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HUDUser Web site: <http://www.huduser.org/datasets/fmr/fmr2006r/index.html>
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2006). Predicting Staying in or Leaving Permanent Supportive Housing That Serves Homeless People with Serious Mental Illness. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development Office of Policy Development and Research.
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2007). 2007 Fair Market Rent Administrative Fees. Retrieved May 4, 2009, from the HUD Web site: <http://www.hud.gov/offices/pih/programs/hcv/adminfees2007.cfm>
- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2008). The Annual Homeless Assessment Report to Congress. U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development Office of Community Planning and Development. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HUDUser Web site : <http://www.huduser.org/Publications/pdf/ahar.pdf>

- Housing and Urban Development (HUD). (2008). The Third Annual Homeless Assessment Report to Congress. U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development Office of Community Planning and Development. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HMIS.info Web site: <http://www.hmis.info/ClassicAsp/documents/Final%20AHAR%20Report.pdf>
- Kaiser Family Foundation. (n.d.). State Health Facts. Retrieved on February 11, 2009, from <http://www.statehealthfacts.org>
- Kuhn, R., & Culhane, D. P. (1998). Applying cluster analysis to test a typology of homelessness by pattern of shelter utilization: Results from the analysis of administrative data. American Journal of Community Psychology, 26(2), 207-232.
- Kushel, M. B., Perry, S., Clark, R., Moss, A. R., & Bangsberg, D. (2002). Emergency Department Use Among the Homeless and Marginally Housed: Results from a Community-Based Study. American Journal of Public Health, 92(5), 778-784.
- Kushel, M. B., Vittinghoff, E., & Haas, J. S. (2001). Factors Associated with the Health Care Utilization of Homeless Persons. The Journal of the American Medical Association, 285(2), 200-206.
- Locke, G., Khadduri, J., & O'Hara, A. (2007). Housing Models. Toward Understanding Homelessness: The 2007 National Symposium on Homelessness Research. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HUDUser Web site: http://www.huduser.org/publications/homeless/homeless_symp_07.html
- Mandelberg, J. Kuhn, R. E., & Kohn, M. A. (2000). Epidemiologic Analysis of an Urban, Public Emergency Department. Academic Emergency Medicine, 7(6), 637-646. doi: 10.1111/j.1553-2712.2000.tb02037.x
- National Alliance to End Homelessness (NAEH) (2000). A Plan, Not A Dream: How to End Homelessness in Ten Years. National Alliance to End Homelessness
- Office of Management and Budget (2002). Fiscal Year 2003 Budget of the U.S. Government. Retrieved May 25, 2009, from the OMB Web site: <http://www.whitehouse.gov/omb/budget/fy2003/pdf/budget.pdf>
- Padgett, D. K., Struening, E. L., Andrews, H., & Pittman, J. (1995). Predictors of Emergency Room Use by Homeless Adults in New York City: The Influence of Predisposing, Enabling and Need Factors. Social Science & Medicine, 41(4), 547-556.
- Public Policy Institute of New York State. (n.d.). 2006 Medicaid Spending, Total and Per Capita. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from The Public Policy Institute of New York State, Inc., Web site: <http://www.ppiny.org/reports/jtf/medicaidtotal.html>

- Rog, D. & Buckner, J. (2007). Homeless Families and Children. Toward Understanding Homelessness: The 2007 National Symposium on Homelessness Research. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from the HUDUser Web site: http://www.huduser.org/publications/homeless/homeless_symp_07.html
- Rog, D., Holupka, C., & Patton, L. (2007). Characteristics and Dynamics of Homeless Families with Children: Final Report (Contract No: 233-02-0087 TO14). U.S. Department of Health and Human Services: Office of the Assistance Secretary for Planning and Evaluation. Retrieved February 20, 2009, from <http://aspe.hhs.gov/hsp/homelessness/improving-data08/report.pdf>
- Rosenheck, R. (2000). Cost-Effectiveness of Services for Homeless People with Mental Illness: The Application of Research to Policy and Practice. The American Journal of Psychiatry, 157, 1563-1570.
- Rosenheck, R., Kaspro, W., Frisman, L., & Liu-Mares, W. (2003). Cost-Effectiveness of Supportive Housing for Persons with Mental Illness. Archives of General Psychiatry 60(9), 940-951.
- Salit, S. A., Kuhn, E. M., Hartz, A. J., Vu, J. M., & Mosso, A. L. (1998). Hospitalization Costs Associated with Homelessness in New York City. The New England Journal of Medicine, 338(24), 1734-1740.
- Scully, E. & Shank, M. (2007). Linking HMIS With Mainstream Healthcare Databases [PowerPoint slides]. Retrieved February 24, 2009, from http://www.endhomelessness.org/files/1748_file_EvanScully.ppt
- Shinn, M., Rog, D. & Culhane, D. (2005). Family Homelessness: Background, Research Findings, and Policy Options. Washington DC: U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness.
- Graham, D., Locke, G., Bass Rubenstein, D. & Carlson, K. (2004). Impact of Ex-Offender Reentry Policies on Homelessness. Unpublished study prepared for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, Sacramento: Walter R. McDonald & Associates, Inc.
- Wooldridge, Jeffrey M. (2001). Econometric Analysis of Cross Section and Panel Data. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press.
- Zhang, T., Ramakrishnon, R., & Livny M. (1996). BIRCH: An Efficient Data Clustering Method for Very Large Databases. In H. V. Jagadish & I.S. Mumick (Eds.) Proceedings of the ACM SIGMOD conference on management of data (pp. 103-114). Montreal, Canada. New York, NY: ACM Press.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 28

THE NORTH CAROLINA STATE BAR

JOURNAL

FALL
2014

IN THIS ISSUE

Life After Meth page 8

Washington State LLLT Program page 16

Seven Room Barn page 24

Hanging on by a thread?

You are not alone. Free, confidential assistance is available.

The Lawyer Assistance Program (“LAP”) was created by lawyers for lawyers. The LAP has been a trusted resource for thousands of lawyers, judges, and law students since 1979. We are committed to helping you get the help you need. Every call or email we take is confidential and is received by a professional staff person.

Contact us today.
info@nclap.org

www.NCLAP.org

FREE • SAFE • CONFIDENTIAL

Western Region
Cathy Killian 704.910.2310

Piedmont Region
Towanda Garner 919.719.9290

Eastern Region
919.719.9267

THE
NORTH CAROLINA
STATE BAR
JOURNAL

Fall 2014
Volume 19, Number 3

Editor

Jennifer R. Duncan

Publications Committee

G. Gray Wilson, Chair
Dorothy Bernholz, Vice-Chair
Harry B. Crow
Margaret H. Dickson
Rebecca Eggers-Gryder
Forrest A. Ferrell
Douglas R. Gill
James W. Hall
Anna Hamrick
Charles Hardee
Darrin D. Jordan
Sonya C. McGraw
Robert Montgomery
Nancy Black Norelli
Harold (Butch) Pope
Barbara B. Weyher
Alan D. Woodlief Jr.

© Copyright 2014 by the North Carolina State Bar. All rights reserved. Periodicals postage paid at Raleigh, NC, and additional offices. Opinions expressed by contributors are not necessarily those of the North Carolina State Bar. POSTMASTER: Send address changes to the North Carolina State Bar, PO Box 25908, Raleigh, NC 27611. The North Carolina Bar Journal invites the submission of unsolicited, original articles, essays, and book reviews. Submissions may be made by mail or e-mail (nobar@bell-south.net) to the editor. Publishing and editorial decisions are based on the Publications Committee's and the editor's judgment of the quality of the writing, the timeliness of the article, and the potential interest to the readers of the Journal. The Journal reserves the right to edit all manuscripts. The North Carolina State Bar Journal (ISSN 10928626) is published four times per year in March, June, September, and December under the direction and supervision of the council of the North Carolina State Bar, PO Box 25908, Raleigh, NC 27611. Member rate of $6.00 per year is included in dues. Nonmember rates $10.78 per year. Single copies $3.21. The Lawyer's Handbook $10.78. Advertising rates available upon request. Direct inquiries to Director of Communications, the North Carolina State Bar, PO Box 25908, Raleigh, North Carolina 27611, tel. (919) 828-4620.

www.ncbar.gov

Contents

FEATURES

- 8 Life After Meth—A Journey of Addiction and Recovery
By Douglas Wilson “Wil” Miller

- 13 Informing the Public in Upcoming Judicial Elections
By Ashley M. London

- 14 If it Feels Like Technology is Moving Faster, It's Not Just You
By Erik Mazzone

- 16 Washington State LLLT Program: Improving Access to Justice
By Thea Jennings

- 18 The Bottom Line—Legal Services is a Good Investment
By Mary Irvine

- 20 “Living with Blindness has Given Me a Broader Perspective...”—An Interview with Attorney Jamie Dean
By John Gebring

- 24 Seven Room Barn
By P. Richard Wilkinson

- 27 Poetic Justice
By James DuPuy and ML Philpott

Cover photo courtesy of Lara M. Wilson Photography.

Update Membership Information: Members who need to update their membership information must do so by contacting the Membership Department via one of the four following methods: (1) log on to the Member Access section of the State Bar's website (www.ncbar.gov); (2) mail changes to: NC State Bar, Membership Dept., PO Box 26088, Raleigh, NC 27611-5908; (3) call (919) 828-4620; or (4) send an e-mail to amaner@ncbar.gov. In deciding what address to list with the State Bar, be advised that this address will be used for all official correspondence from the State Bar and that membership information is a public record pursuant to the NC Public Records Act.

Contents

DEPARTMENTS

- 5 President's Message
- 28 Profile in Specialization
- 29 Resolution of Appreciation
- 30 Lawyer Assistance Program
- 32 Paralegal Certification
- 33 IOLTA Update

- 34 The Disciplinary Department
- 36 Trust Accounting
- 38 Rule Amendments
- 41 Proposed Ethics Opinions
- 46 Legal Ethics

BAR UPDATES

- 40 In Memoriam
- 49 Law School Briefs
- 51 Distinguished Service Award
- 52 Client Security Fund
- 53 Merritt Nominated as VP
- 54 Selected Financial Data

Officers

Ronald G. Baker Sr., Kitty Hawk - President 2013-2014
 Ronald L. Gibson, Charlotte - President-Elect 2013-2014
 Margaret M. Hunt, Brevard - Vice-President 2013-2014
 L. Thomas Lunsford II, Raleigh - Secretary-Treasurer
 M. Keith Kapp, Raleigh - Past-President 2013-2014

Councilors

By Judicial District

- 1: C. Everett Thompson, Elizabeth City
- 2: G. Thomas Davis Jr., Swan Quarter
- 3A: Charles R. Hardee, Greenville
- 3B: Debra L. Massie, Beaufort
- 4: Robert W. Detwiler, Jacksonville
- 5: Harold L. Pollock, Burgaw
- 6A: Gilbert W. Chichester, Roanoke Rapids
- 6B: Lloyd C. Smith Jr., Windsor
- 7: Randall B. Bridgen, Rocky Mount
- 8: Shelby D. Benton, Goldsboro
- 9: Paul J. Stainback, Henderson
- 9A: Alan S. Hicks, Roxboro
- 10: Heidi C. Bloom, Raleigh
- Nicholas J. Dombalis II, Raleigh
- Theodore C. Edwards II, Raleigh
- John N. (Nick) Fountain, Raleigh
- Donna R. Rascoe, Raleigh
- John M. Silverstein, Raleigh
- C. Colon Willoughby Jr., Raleigh
- Cynthia L. Wittmer, Raleigh
- 11A: Donald E. Harrop Jr., Dunn
- 11B: Marcia H. Armstrong, Smithfield
- 12: Lonnie M. Player Jr., Fayetteville
- 13: Harold G. Pope, Whiteville
- 14: John A. Bowman, Durham
- William S. Mills, Durham
- 15A: Charles E. Davis, Mebane
- 15B: Dorothy Bernholz, Chapel Hill
- 16A: William R. Purcell II, Laurinburg
- 16B: David F. Branch Jr., Lumberton
- 17A: Matthew W. Smith, Eden
- 17B: Thomas W. Anderson, Pilot Mountain
- 18: Barbara R. Christy, Greensboro
- Robert C. Cone, Greensboro
- Richard S. Towers, High Point
- 18H: James D. Foster, Concord
- 19A: W. Edward Bunch, Asheboro
- 19B: Darrin D. Jordan, Salisbury
- 19C: Douglas R. Gill, Southern Pines
- 19D: Frederick D. Poisson Jr., Wadesboro
- 20A: Harry B. Crow Jr., Monroe
- 20B: Michael L. Robinson, Winston-Salem
- 21: G. Gray Wilson, Winston-Salem
- 22: Kimberly S. Taylor, Taylorsville
- 22B: Roger S. Tripp, Lexington
- 23: John S. Willardson, Wilkesboro

- 24: Rebecca Eggers-Gryder, Boone
- 25: Forrest A. Ferrell, Hickory
- 26: Robert J. Bernhardt, Charlotte
- A. Todd Brown, Charlotte
- Mark Henriques, Charlotte
- F. Fincher Jarrell, Charlotte
- Dewitt McCarley, Charlotte
- Mark W. Merritt, Charlotte
- Nancy Black Norelli, Charlotte
- 27A: Sonya Campbell McGraw, Gastonia
- 27B: Ralph W. Meekins, Lincolnton
- 28: Howard L. Gum, Asheville
- 29A: Marvin R. Sparrow, Rutherfordton
- 29B: Christopher S. Stepp, Hendersonville
- 30: Gerald R. Collins Jr., Murphy

Public Members

Margaret H. Dickson, Fayetteville
 Paul L. Fulton, Winston-Salem
 James W. Hall, Ahoskie

Staff

Carmen H. Bannon, Deputy Counsel
 Betsy C. Barham, Receptionist
 Tim Batchelor, Investigator
 Kelly Beck, Compliance Coordinator, Membership/CLE
 Joy C. Belk, Asst. Dir. Paralegal Certification
 Krista Bennett, Fee Dispute Facilitator, ACAP
 Michael D. Blan, Systems Analyst/Programmer
 Peter Bolac, District Bar Liaison/Trust Account Compliance Counsel
 Elizabeth E. Bolton, Receptionist
 Lori Brooks, Admin. Asst., Office of Counsel
 Delia M. Brown, Administrative Asst., LAP
 Krista E. Carlson, Investigator
 Becky B. Carroll, Paralegal
 Joseph D. Cerone, Office Manager
 Alyssa M. Chen, Deputy Counsel
 Margaret Cloutier, Senior Deputy Counsel
 Joseph J. Commisso, Director of Investigations
 Susannah B. Cox, Deputy Counsel
 Luella C. Crane, Director of ACAP
 Jennifer R. Duncan, Director of Communications
 A. Root Edmonson, Deputy Counsel
 Julie A. Ferrer, CLE Clerk
 Martha Fletcher, Payroll and Benefits Administrator
 Towanda Garner, Piedmont LAP Coordinator
 Lanice Heidbrink, Exec. Asst., Administration
 Jeffery Hill, Computer Systems Administrator
 Leonor Hodge, Deputy Counsel
 Debra P. Holland, Asst. Director, CLE
 Mary L. Irvine, Access to Justice Coordinator
 Tammy Jackson, Membership Director

Katherine Jean, Counsel and Assistant Executive Dir.
 David R. Johnson, Deputy Counsel
 Sharon Kelly, Events Manager
 Barbara Kerr, Archivist
 Cathy D. Killian, Clinical Director, LAP
 Melanie Kincaid, Paralegal
 Suzanne Lever, Asst. Ethics Counsel
 L. Thomas Lunsford II, Executive Director
 Adam Maner, Professional Organization Coordinator
 Beth McIntire, IT Manager
 Beth McLamb, Payment Coordinator, Membership
 Nichole P. McLaughlin, Asst. Ethics Counsel
 Barry S. McNeill, Deputy Counsel
 Diane Melching, Admin. Asst., ACAP
 Dotie K. Miani, Deputy Clerk of DHC/Asst. Facilities Manager
 Claire U. Mills, Accounts Manager, IOLTA
 Alice Neece Mine, Asst. Executive Dir., Dir. of CLE, Specialization, & Paralegal Certification
 Robynn E. Moraites, LAP Director
 George Muench, Investigator
 Denise Mullen, Asst. Director of Specialization
 Pat Murphy, Deputy Counsel
 Loriani Nicolichia, Accreditation Coordinator, CLE
 Emily Oakes, Attendance/Compliance Coordinator, CLE
 Brian Oten, Deputy Counsel
 Lianne Palacios, Accounting Manager
 Anne M. Parkin, Field Auditor
 Heather Pattle, Administrator, Office of Counsel
 C. Fred Patton Jr., Investigator
 Wondella Payne, Paralegal
 Aaliyah Pierce, Acct. Data Asst., IOLTA
 Angel Pitts, Mail/Copy/Accounting Clerk
 Jennifer Porter, Deputy Counsel
 Evelyn Pursley, Executive Dir., IOLTA
 Sonja B. Puryear, Admin. Asst., Investigations
 Joan Renken, Admin. Asst., Office of Counsel
 Randall C. Ross, Investigator
 Whit Ruark, Investigator
 Sandra L. Saxton, Public Liaison, ACAP
 Fern Gunn Simeon, Deputy Counsel
 Jaya Singh, Accounting Asst.
 Jennifer Slattery, Paralegal
 Susie Taylor, Admin. Asst./Special Projects Manager, LAP
 Judith Treadwell, Public Liaison, ACAP
 Kristina M. Troskey, Paralegal
 Wayne C. Truax, Investigator
 Joshua T. Walthall, Deputy Counsel
 A. Dawn Whaley, Admin. Asst., Investigations
 Edward R. White, Investigator
 Brittany A. Wilson, Paralegal
 Mary D. Winstead, Deputy Counsel
 Christiane Woods, Admin Asst., Investigations

The Fun Comes to a Halt

BY RONALD G. BAKER SR.

Prior to June 25 of this year, serving as the president of the North Carolina State Bar had been both enjoyable and relatively pain free except for the amount of time involved. All of that changed, however, at 5:30 PM that day when I received a phone call from State Bar Executive Director Tom Lunsford. During that phone call, Tom advised me that he had just received information from a state senator that House Bill 663 entitled "Commodities Producer Protection," which had crossed over to the Senate back in May 2013, had been stripped of its agricultural content and amended to substantially alter the definition of the practice of law. The purpose of that amendment was clearly to put a legislative stamp of approval on LegalZoom's method of operation in North Carolina and other places. As I mentioned in my first column after becoming president, among other lawsuits the State Bar is involved in, one is a suit brought by LegalZoom which involves, among other issues, the question of whether its activities in North Carolina constitute the unauthorized practice of law. We learned that HB 663 was to come before the Senate's Judiciary 1 Committee at 10:00 AM the following (June 26) morning.

Knowing that the State Bar should be represented at the meeting of the Judiciary Committee, the chair of the Authorized Practice Committee, Mike Robinson, was called around 7:00 PM on the evening of the 25th. Without hesitating, Mike graciously rearranged his schedule and promised to come to Raleigh and appear at the meeting of Senate Judiciary Committee 1 to state the position of the State Bar—that the language of the proposed amendment to the definition of the practice of law was entirely too broad and should not be passed. Mike appeared at the committee meeting and expressed the State Bar's position magnificently. Mr. Robinson told the committee that the State Bar's interest and responsibility in the matter is consumer protection, and that the amendment would likely have serious unintended consequences and should not be the subject of precipitous legislative action. Unfortunately, the amended bill was voted out of the committee with a favorable report. At that point it appeared that the matter would come before the entire Senate with a favorable report of Senate Judiciary Committee 1 on the following Tuesday. Had the Senate adopted HB 663 it would have then returned to the House, where all that would have been needed was concurrence for the amended bill to be enacted.

Following the meeting of Senate Judiciary 1, past State Bar President John McMillan along with his partner, Michelle Frazier, volunteered to help the State Bar figure out how to effectively oppose LegalZoom in the legislature. The first two things that I did as your president were to write all of the members of the State Bar Council and all past presidents of the State Bar to advise them of the amendment to HB 663 and its likely consequences, and to request their assistance in contacting senators and legislators in an attempt to thwart passage of the bill. I also called Senate President Pro Tem Phil Berger to discuss the matter with him directly. Senator Berger graciously returned my call (as well as many others from lawyers and councilors) and discussed the matter with me. This bill had not been on Senator Berger's radar, and he was not aware of its pendency until we spoke with him. He promised to look into the matter and also requested that the State Bar come up with proposed alternate language for the bill that would be acceptable to the State Bar. Throughout the ensuing days Senator Berger was very responsive to the concerns of the State Bar.

Councilors, former State Bar presidents, and lawyers all over the state began calling their senators and representatives, and all of those calls had an effect. The bill was removed from the July 1 Senate calendar and postponed until a later time. Ultimately it was sent to the Senate Rules Committee.

All of this activity in the legislature was taking place against the backdrop of many other factors. As noted above, one was the LegalZoom litigation. The judge assigned to the case had stated to the parties on more than one occasion that ultimately it was the charge of the State Bar to regulate the practice of law in North Carolina, and that it should exercise its authority to come to some resolution in the matter. Of course, the court made very clear that if the State Bar could not resolve the matter, then the court would have to do so. Another complicating factor to the situation that had to be taken into account was the Federal Trade Commission's action against the North Carolina Dental Board when that board attempted to prevent nonlicensed individuals from performing teeth whitening services. Its efforts in doing so seem to be clearly within the purview of the statutory authority granted to it by the legislature. Yet the Federal Trade Commission determined its activities to be anticompetitive and improper, and even ruled that the members of the Dental Board might be subject to personal liability for antitrust violations. The State Bar, of course, also had its own experience with the Federal Trade Commission in dealing with activities surrounding real estate closings back in 2002, and again in 2010-2011 when the matter was revisited by the State Bar. Last, but not least, it was recognized that the chances of LegalZoom and similar providers being ordered to cease operation in this state were virtually nil.

In light of all of the foregoing, the officers, the Special Litigation Committee of the State Bar, and the chair and vice-chair of the Authorized Practice Committee felt that it was necessary and appropriate that an effort be made to draft alternate language for consideration by the legislature that attempted to satisfy the State Bar's obligation to protect the citizens of North Carolina, yet did not run afoul of federal antitrust law. Such a suggested alternative was drafted by the Office of Counsel of the State Bar and considered by the Officers and Councilors just mentioned. The language was thoroughly vetted and ultimately approved. It was submitted to representatives of LegalZoom. Various counter proposals were received from LegalZoom, none of which were acceptable to the State Bar. Ultimately, LegalZoom's representatives were advised that the language that the State Bar had proposed was final and the State Bar was not prepared to agree to anything else. Following that, a conference was held between State Bar officials and LegalZoom's representatives along with LegalZoom's corporate general counsel for the purposes of explaining the language and the State Bar's reasoning with respect to it. Ultimately, LegalZoom agreed to accept the State Bar's language with two very minor clarifications, which merely better explained the State Bar's intention than the words that had been used. In doing so, LegalZoom agreed to support the substitute language before the legislature, and also agreed to settle the pending lawsuit by agreeing to conform its business practices to the new proposed statutory language. That information was communicated both to the members of the House and Senate and to various bar groups around the state. A copy of the final language of the proposed alternate bill from the State Bar appears at the end of this column. Ultimately, the substitute language was never introduced and the State Bar was advised that no action would be forthcoming from the legislature during this session with respect to the proposed amendments to Chapter 84 of the General Statutes. Thus, at present, matters remain status quo.

The vast majority of comments that the State Bar has received concerning its proposed substitute language to the LegalZoom legislation proposal have been favorable. The notable exception has been the comments from the real estate bar, particularly that portion that deals with residential real estate closings. That group has been rather vocal in its criticism of the State Bar's proposed alternate bill language, and they have accused the State Bar of "caving in" to LegalZoom, of lacking intestinal fortitude (to put things in language that is printable in a publication of general distribution), and of having characteristics that would serve no purpose to repeat here. While the concerns of the real estate bar are understandable, and largely well-founded, the State Bar has to deal with realities. First, LegalZoom has not been enjoined from doing business in any other state in the United States. In fact, it was represented to the legislature by representatives of LegalZoom that their operations have been approved in 49 states and that North Carolina is the lone holdout. Of course, this is not entirely true, but, as noted above, LegalZoom has not been enjoined from doing business anywhere else and is not likely to be enjoined from doing business in North Carolina. Second, there is a recognized scrivener's exception to the definition of the practice of law that has been recognized by courts all over the United States, specifically by the business court in the case of the North Carolina State Bar v. LienGuard, Inc. and Janis Lundquist, 2014 NCBC 11. It is clearly legal to sell legal forms in this state and the court seemed to recognize in the LienGuard decision that should LienGuard simply present its clients with a "fill in the blanks" form and populate the form with client-supplied information without any change or further manipulation, their method of operation would probably be legal. This is precisely what the State Bar has tried to mandate in the proposed statutory language. Some have urged the State Bar to adopt the settlement that LegalZoom entered into in South Carolina. It is the view of the State Bar that the language proposed in North Carolina is more restrictive than that approved by the South Carolina Supreme Court. It is noteworthy that the South Carolina ruling was not the result of a trial, but merely the approval of a settlement that was negotiated between private parties and LegalZoom, and that LegalZoom paid $500,000 in attorney's fees to the private litigants. There is no question that the North Carolina State Bar will never be able to stop providers from making legal forms available on the internet. The best that the State Bar can hope to do is regulate the practices to the greatest extent possible for the protection of the consuming public. That is what has been attempted by the proposed language. It is understood that the proposed language will not suit everyone, and that reasonable minds can differ as to whether this is the proper way to go. However, under all of the constraints that had to be considered, it was felt by the leadership, the Office of Counsel, and the North Carolina State Bar Council that this was the best way to handle what was a challenging situation.

The officers and staff of the State Bar sincerely appreciate the help and support of the North Carolina Bar Association and its lobbyist Kim Crouch in their efforts with respect to this legislation. The same is true of the Advocates for Justice and its president, Danny Glover. The cooperation of the Republican leadership in the Senate and the lawyer representatives in the House is also appreciated. Finally, there are really not words sufficient to recognize the great debt the State Bar owes to Past President John McMillan and his partner Michelle Frazier for their efforts on behalf of the State Bar and the lawyers of North Carolina in opposing the original amendment. They have spent countless volunteer hours on our behalf. Without them, it is hard to predict where we might be now.

On June 25 being president of the State Bar went from being enjoyable to challenging and difficult. It, however, remained rewarding. This being my last column as president, I would be remiss if I did not recognize and express my thanks for the dedicated effort of all of the officers, committee chairs and vice-chairs, and councilors during my term as president. Anyone who has not served as a councilor has any idea how time consuming such service is. Finally, I want to thank the lawyers of North Carolina for affording me the opportunity to serve as president of the North Carolina State Bar. Certainly when I started practicing law 39 years ago I would never have predicted that I would ever even be a State Bar councilor, much less the president of the North Carolina State Bar. I am deeply honored to have had the opportunity to serve. Thank you.

Proposed Amendment that would Except the Following from the Definition of the Practice of Law

(2) The production, distribution, or sale of materials, provided that:

- (a) The production of the materials must have occurred entirely before any contact between the provider and the consumer;
- (b) During and after initial contact between the provider and the consumer, the provider's participation in creating or completing any materials must be limited to typing, writing, or reproducing exactly the information provided by the consumer as dictated by the consumer or deleting

Experience.
Strength.
Service.

With over 50 years of experience, GilsbarPRO is the exclusive administrator for the CNA Lawyers Professional Liability Program in the State of North Carolina. CNA is the largest underwriter of lawyers malpractice insurance in the United States and is A-rated by A.M. Best. This combination is your best alternative for peace of mind in today's challenging environment.

Coverage You Can Trust. Call The PROs Today.
800.906.9654 • gilsbarpro.com

content that is visible to the consumer at the instruction of the consumer;

(c) The provider does not select or assist in the selection of the product for the consumer; provided, however, (i) operating a website that requires the consumer to select the product to be purchased, (ii) publishing descriptions of the products offered, when not done to address the consumer's particular legal situation and when the products offered and the descriptions published to every consumer are identical, and (iii) publishing general information about the law, when not done to address the consumer's particular legal situation and when the general information published to every consumer is identical, does not constitute assistance in selection of the product;

(d) The provider does not provide any individualized legal advice to or exercise any legal judgment for the consumer; provided, however, that publishing general information about the law and describing the products offered, when not done to address the consumer's particular legal situation and when the general information published to every consumer is identical, does not constitute legal advice or the exercise of legal judgment;

(e) During and after initial contact between the provider and the consumer, the provider may not participate in any way in selecting the content of the finished materials;

(f) In the case of the sale of materials including information supplied by the consumer through an internet website or otherwise, the consumer is provided a means to see the blank template or the final, completed product before finalizing a purchase of that product;

(g) The provider does not review the consumer's final product for errors other than notifying the consumer (i) of spelling errors, (ii) that a required field has not been completed, and (iii) that information entered into a form or template by the consumer is factually inconsistent with other information entered into the form or template by the consumer;

(h) The provider must clearly and conspicuously communicate to the consumer that the materials are not a substitute for the advice or services of an attorney;

(i) The provider discloses its legal name and physical location and address to the consumer;

(j) The provider does not disclaim any warranties or liability and does not limit the recovery of damages or other remedies by the consumer; and

(k) The provider does not require the consumer to agree to jurisdiction or venue in any state other than North Carolina for the resolution of disputes between the provider and the consumer.

For purposes of this subsection, "production" shall mean design, creation, publication, or display, including by means of an internet website; "materials" shall mean legal written materials, books, documents, templates, forms, or computer software; and "provider" shall mean designer, creator, publisher, distributor, displayer, or seller. ■

Ronald G Baker Sr. is a partner with the Kitty Hawk firm of Sharp, Michael, Graham & Baker LLP.

Life After Meth—A Journey of Addiction and Recovery

BY DOUGLAS WILSON “WIL” MILLER

In the summer of 1997 at the age of 35, I fell in love. That relationship exposed me to many new things. Unfortunately, one of them was methamphetamine.

I didn't know a lot about meth the first time I tried it. It wasn't a common drug where I was from. I knew it was a stimulant and I knew it was illegal. And although I had been employed as a prosecutor in New York City and Seattle for the preceding nine years, I had always been a vocal opponent of the “War on Drugs” and refused to handle drug cases because of it. That left a dangerous void in my knowledge of meth.

From the very first time I tried meth, I loved it. Nothing had ever made me feel as happy or alive or confident as meth did. That's because no natural experience can make your brain produce dopamine like meth can. Dopamine is a neurotransmitter that makes you experience pleasure. Normally there are about 100 units of dopamine in the pleasure centers of your brain; when you have sex, those levels double up to around 200 units. Cocaine can make your dopamine levels go up to 350 units and keep them there for over an hour. That's why cocaine is so addictive. But when you use meth, your dopamine levels shoot up to 1,250 units and you stay high for up to 12 hours. At the same time your dopamine levels are spiking, meth is also reducing blood flow to your frontal lobes, hobbling that section of your brain that helps you make good and responsible decisions. It's a dangerous combination—a perfect storm of addiction.

Barreling Towards Addiction

By the third time I tried meth, I knew I wasn't going to stop, and soon what started as a weekend ritual of getting high quickly snowballed into extended periods of use followed by debilitating periods of withdrawal. Meth withdrawal can leave you feeling impossibly weak, apathetic, and depressed, sometimes for days. You eat and sleep uncontrollably and sometimes experience crying jags or bouts of paranoia for no reason. It can make you feel like you're losing your mind.

Photo courtesy of Lana M. Wilson Photography

By December 1997 I couldn't take it anymore. I became an addicted, daily substance user just to avoid withdrawal. Suddenly, for the first time in my career, I started showing up late to work. I couldn't stay organized anymore. I was losing my temper for no reason and being really rude to some of the defense attorneys.

Many people believe it's easy to figure out when someone is using meth by their violent or erratic behavior, but that's a myth. Like any drug, individual responses to meth vary widely. Just as some alcoholics can maintain the appearance of sobriety with relatively high blood-alcohol levels, many meth addicts can do the same with meth. In many ways, my meth-influenced behavior was not unlike the behavior of many trial attorneys who are short-tempered and stressed out, and for the most part it went unnoticed.

Being a prosecutor certainly made my addiction much more complicated. I was overwhelmed with feelings of guilt and hypocrisy. And although I knew I desperately needed help, I had no idea where I could get it without losing my job.

And I really didn't want to lose my job. I loved being a trial attorney and a victims' advocate. After graduating from Duke Law in 1988, I started my career in the Brooklyn DA's Office, where I focused on prosecuting sex crimes. Three years later, I took a job as a trial attorney and supervisor in the Special Victims Bureau in the Queens DA's Office. Then in 1995 I moved to Seattle to work for Norm Maleng as a King County deputy prosecutor.

Being a prosecutor was all I had ever done. I was also really good at it. In nine years of trying cases back-to-back, I rarely lost. Trial work felt completely natural to me—like the thing I was born to do.

Caught at the Courthouse

That all ended one day in March 1998, three months into my addiction, when a security guard at the King County Courthouse asked me to open my briefcase, which had just gone through the x-ray machine. It was a common request; I frequently had my briefcase searched when entering the courthouse. Only this time, inside there was an Altoids tin containing drugs and drug paraphernalia—I recognized the Altoids tin. It belonged to me and my significant other. But I had no idea why it was in my briefcase, where it would so obviously be found by security.

In an instant, I saw my life crumble before my eyes. I was about to lose everything: my job, my friends, and my reputation. I denied the drugs were mine, but I knew it didn't matter. The damage was done. A few days later, I resigned my job and a special prosecutor was appointed to handle the investigation.

As I saw it, I had two choices at that point: 1) stop using meth and face reality, or 2) keep using a drug that made me insanely happy, no matter how bad my life became. I knew if I kept using meth there was a good chance it would eventually kill me, but that was no longer a reason not to use it. My life already felt like it was over. I wanted it to be over.

But I had a different problem now. Snorting meth no longer put enough of the drug into my bloodstream to make its magic work. I needed to get a lot more in me, a lot faster. So I started injecting it. At $25 a shot, that was expensive, and within a few weeks I was completely broke. Not surprisingly, that's also when my relationship ended. Once my significant other was gone, I felt completely lost.

All my former friends were prosecutors who couldn't have any contact with me. All I had left was meth. However, I was still an experienced criminal attorney—one who now knew dozens of meth addicts, most of whom desperately needed representation from a lawyer they could trust. You're probably thinking, "You were still able to practice? Didn't the Washington Supreme Court suspend you?" No, they didn't. Because I had yet to be charged with any crime.

When word went out among the meth addicts in Seattle that I was going to start practicing criminal law again, they quickly became my client base and my friends. They almost never had money, but they almost always had meth. My addiction found a way to survive.

Propped up by the chemically induced confidence of meth, I walked back into the King County Courthouse in May 1998, three months after resigning my job, and started my career as a criminal defense attorney. Much to my surprise, I loved it just as much as I loved being a prosecutor. That's when I realized I might still have a future. I wanted to live, but only if I could stop using meth.

The Public Learns My Name

So I made a plan: I'd save up enough money to pay for rehab and get my mortgage current, then block out enough time in my schedule to go. It may not have been realistic, but it was a huge improvement over my earlier plan of just using meth until it killed me. Unfortunately, my plan got interrupted when the special prosecutor handling the courthouse incident decided not to charge me with drug possession. His decision provoked an angry backlash of editorials and newspaper articles claiming preferential treatment by one prosecutor for another—editorials and articles that named me publicly for the first time as the person involved. I'm not sure why I wasn't charged; in retrospect, I really wish I had been. If I had, my case would likely have gone to drug court, where I would have gotten the kind of life-saving intervention I desperately needed.

That burst of publicity quickly scared off all my paying clients. No one wanted to hire me. Soon I started getting notices from my mortgage lender threatening me with foreclosure, and then my phone and utilities were turned off. Even though I was now no longer facing potential drug charges, my life kept getting worse and worse. That's when I finally gave up trying to save myself.

About a month later, in December 1998—a year into my addiction—my ex started calling me again. He said he needed my help getting some meth for a friend of his. He told me if I could finance the deal, we could split the profit. It didn't take a lot of convincing at that point: I could no longer see any future, and like most meth addicts, it wasn't the first time I had done something like this. My ex set up the initial meeting and I obtained the drugs. Over the course of the next two months, I sold drugs to his friend three times.

On February 16, 1999, the fourth time I was supposed to sell his friend drugs, the friend showed up at my house with a SWAT team, a battering ram, and a KOMO 4 News team to film my arrest live on television. It turned out the "friend" was an undercover cop and my ex was making money setting me up for the police.

Well, that was the luckiest thing that ever happened to me. It was the only intervention I was ever going to get, and it started the chain reaction of events that eventually saved my life. Only it didn't happen quickly. After my arrest, I used my knowledge of the criminal justice system to stall my trial for over a year and a half. I still had my license to practice law, but it was almost impossible for me to concentrate on the little bit of work I had. It was during this time between my arrest and my trial that I made my first serious attempt at drug rehab.

Rehab and Picking Up Where You Left Off

There are two basic schools of drug recovery programs. One is the 12-step approach, which uses a person's faith in God, or a "higher power," to help recover from addiction. The other approach is based on cognitive behavioral therapy—a school of psychology that employs a variety of techniques to help a person understand their addictive behavior and quit using. My first rehab was based exclusively on the 12-step model. I'm a huge fan of the 12-step

“It turns out you don’t really need “faith” to benefit from a 12-step meeting.
All you really need to do is talk and listen.”

program; I’ve seen it help a lot of people, and I have witnessed firsthand the amazing power of faith.

But I am also a lifelong atheist. So “faith” just isn’t one of the tools in my toolbox. At rehab I openly questioned the appropriateness—for me—of a “faith-based” or “spiritual” recovery program. After ten days of arguing, I was told by the facility director that I was in the wrong place and that I needed to leave. I returned to Seattle and stayed clean for a few months, but by late autumn of 1999, I relapsed with a vengeance. It was during that first major relapse that I learned the truth of one of many valuable sayings taught to me by the 12-step program: “You pick up where you left off.” What does that mean? That means when you’re dealing with addiction, and you stop using your drug of choice for a while, then relapse, you don’t get to go back to the feelings you had during the first few fun times you used. The drug won’t do that neat little trick for you anymore. Instead, you go right back to the crappy feelings you had just before you quit.

With chronic meth use, you reach a point where the drug no longer makes you feel good, because you have literally worked the dopamine-producing cells in your brain to death. They’re gone. The meth still gives you an adrenaline rush, but now the drug starts to make you crazy—paranoid, delusional, or severely ADD. But you know that if you stop using meth, you’ll become incredibly weak and depressed. So every day you use, you’re choosing between being crazy and being depressed.

When I relapsed, I became really angry, distracted, and convinced everyone was out to get me. My law practice was in shambles. It was impossible for me to be an effective advocate when I couldn’t even predict when I’d be awake. Even with planning, alarm clocks, and the best of intentions, I missed court dates and important appointments because I had stayed awake for too many days, run out of meth, and fallen unconscious. The judges and prosecutors were completely fed up with my behavior—and with good reason. It was obvious to everyone I had relapsed and that I should no longer be practicing law.

I continued to use meth right through my trial in July 2000. I wasn’t surprised when I got convicted. I expected it. That’s when the Washington Supreme Court finally disbarred me.

Even after my conviction, I managed to stay out of custody while my case was on appeal. I was homeless at that point and living on the couches of other drug addicts all over Seattle. That’s when I finally hit my rock bottom. I knew that, compared to where I was at that moment, prison was going to be a step up for me—at least in prison I’d have a bed, clean clothes, and regular meals. Only I was determined not to go to prison addicted. So I made a new plan to get clean—a much more realistic plan.

I got myself into a state-funded rehab (this time based on the cognitive behavioral therapy model of recovery), moved into clean and sober housing, and found work as a housekeeper at a Victorian bed and breakfast on Seattle’s Capitol Hill. The owners of the B&B were a woman and her elderly mother who had followed my story in the newspapers, felt sorry for me, and miraculously agreed not only to be my employers, but also my surrogate family as I struggled through the first years of my recovery. They were difficult years. I gained 50 pounds. I was often severely depressed. My brain still didn’t function well. The cravings for meth were intense. But at least I had some income, a job with lots of leftovers to eat, and the love and support of those two women who owned the B&B. I knew they genuinely wanted to see me succeed and it made all the difference. If it weren’t for them, I probably wouldn’t have made it.

Serving Time

After successfully completing six months of rehab and staying meth-free for over a year, I knew what had to happen next. In August 2002 I withdrew my case from the Washington State Court of Appeals, and on September 22 I turned myself in to the Department of Corrections to start serving my sentence.

My situation in prison was precarious. After all, I was an openly gay former prosecutor forced to serve my time in the same jurisdiction where I had spent years putting violent felons behind bars. Most of that time I went unrecognized, and I was fine. But there were times when I was recognized by men I had prosecuted for serious violent offenses, and things got dangerous quickly. As a result, I spent more than two months locked up in solitary confinement for my own protection, in a 9 x 6 foot cell with bright fluorescent lights that could never be turned off. There were many days when I thought I would lose my mind.

Despite that, I will always value the time I spent in prison, the vast majority of which was really helpful. In prison I was safe from temptation during the early fragile years of my recovery. I could never have afforded the two-year inpatient drug rehab I needed. Prison served that role in my life. I met hundreds of men whose lives had been destroyed by drugs, especially meth. For many of them, the drug had taken their teeth, destroyed their skin, and left them with horrible burns from meth lab accidents. Some had lost their minds.

In prison I learned that this was the insanity I had helped foster when I got involved with meth, and this is what I would become if I went back to using it. It was a life-changing lesson and an amazing gift. And although I will always do everything I can to keep my clients out of prison, I genuinely feel I was lucky to go...and even luckier to have lived through it.

It was also from prison that I started writing letters to everyone I knew. That’s how I finally reconnected with family and friends. When their letters came flooding back in, I realized I was no longer alone in my struggle, and I began to believe that if I could stay clean, I just might be able to get my life back.

Gaining Hope

The Washington Supreme Court

doesn't allow disbarred attorneys to work as paralegals in Washington, but other states don't have that rule. So after my release from prison on September 12, 2004, I moved my parole from Seattle to Wilmington, North Carolina, where I reunited with my family and got a job in a civil litigation firm as a paralegal and office manager. I worked there for the next eight years.

During those eight years, I got involved with the North Carolina State Bar's Lawyer Assistance Program (or LAP, as it's called). LAP trained me to be a volunteer and let me serve as a mentor, monitor, and recovery coach for other drug-addicted lawyers. LAP also got me speaking at CLEs, high schools, and community groups about meth addiction and recovery.

It was through LAP that I started going to lunches for lawyers in recovery. The lunches were like 12-step meetings just for attorneys. I went reluctantly at first, but after going for a while I came to understand why 12-steppers are so passionate about their program. It was in those meetings that I learned just how much shame I was still carrying around with me about the things I had done to other people while using meth—things like worrying my family and friends, embarrassing my co-workers, disappointing my clients, and worst of all, enabling the addictions of other addicts. Those lunch meetings gave me a safe place to talk about my guilt and remorse, and the lawyers there helped me find a way to live with those feelings. I had recovered from meth addiction long before I ever went to my first LAP lawyer lunch, but the things that happened to me at those meetings finally made me feel like I was healed.

It turns out you don't really need "faith" to benefit from a 12-step meeting. All you really need to do is talk and listen. And it was also at those lunches that the other lawyers convinced me to try and get my law license back in Washington. I knew with four felony convictions the chances were slim, but they had faith I could pull it off.

Reinstatement

It took me almost a year to get ready for my hearing before the WSBA Character and Fitness Board in 2009. I was still a total control freak about all things resembling trials. I represented myself. The hearing lasted over seven hours. After a lot of testimony, a lot of argument, and quite a bit of deliberation, the Board voted to reinstate me.

After retaking the bar exam, I was officially reinstated as a lawyer in Washington in June 2010. Although my original plan was to then get admitted to the bar in North Carolina, part of me never gave up on the idea of moving back to Seattle. As fate would have it, after 12 years of being single, I ended up getting married just a few months before Washington passed marriage equality by popular vote. I took that as a sign. So a year ago in June, my husband and I packed the car and headed west.

I'll always miss North Carolina, but Seattle feels like home. It feels like where I belong. And it feels like the place where my personal history and skill set can do the

METH BY THE NUMBERS

Usage Rate

According to a 2012 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, funded by an agency of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and administered by Research Triangle Institute, approximately 1.2 million people in the United States reported using meth.

Environmental Impact

- Areas where meth-making poisonous by-products are dumped or "dead zones" can contaminate the environment and cost thousands to clean up.
- A small dead zone cleanup can cost $40,000.
- Much of meth waste is highly flammable and explosive, which makes it a danger for the summer forest fire season.

- Meth waste leaches moisture from whatever it touches, so it is very harmful to the surrounding environment, whether discarded indoors or outdoors.

Impact on Economy

- The RAND Corporation released a study stating that meth use costs the United States between $16.2 and $48.3 billion per year.
- The annual cost of drug-related crimes in the United States is over $61 billion, according to the US Department of Justice's National Drug Intelligence Center (justice.gov/archive/ndic/pubs44/44731/44731p.pdf).
- A 2010 National Drug Threat Study found that meth and cocaine cause a majority of drug-related crimes.

Drug Abuse by Attorneys

- The ABA estimates nearly 20 percent of lawyers suffer from alcohol and substance abuse.
- The national heavy drinkers rate is 26.2 percent of people aged 18 or older, according to the NIH. Attorneys with heavy drinking problems are twice the national rate, according to the ABA's Commission on Lawyer Assistance Programs. (niaaa.nih.gov/alcohol-health/overview-alcohol-consumption/alcohol-facts-and-statistics; americanbar.org/groups/lawyer_assistance/resources/alcohol_abuse_dependence.html)

Thanks for your JPE survey responses!

NOW PLEASE SEND YOUR FRIENDS AND NEIGHBORS
to
*ElectNCJudges.org

NORTH CAROLINA
BAR ASSOCIATION
SEEKING LIBERTY & JUSTICE

most good for other people struggling with addiction. But I realize I can't be a proper role model for recovery if the people who need me most can't see me. So I make sure I'm visible to them by representing them and telling them my story. Not surprisingly, many of my criminal and family law cases involve issues of addiction.

Recovery from meth is not impossible or uncommon. In my experience, it often takes a lot of external support to get through those first crucial years of recovery. The reason my addiction blew up in such a spectacular way had a lot to do with how isolated I became from my sober family and friends, and even more to do with my false belief that recovery from meth addiction was not possible. People have recovered from meth addiction, but the stigma makes it very hard to identify themselves publicly. If recovered meth addicts don't start coming out of the shadows and showing their recovery to the world, the lie that you can't recover from meth addiction will continue and be a huge obstacle for those trying to quit.

Getting Help

If you have a problem with addiction, the NC Lawyer Assistance Program is ready to provide confidential help. You can meet with a LAP counselor personally, or LAP can set you up with a peer counselor (a fellow attorney) who can speak to you about your options. Best of all, anything you tell your peer counselor is confidential pursuant to Rule 1.6(c). Don't be afraid to ask for help and don't be afraid to accept help when it's offered.

But what if the problem isn't with you? What if someone you care about or work with is struggling with addiction? What can you do to help? Those are really difficult situations, often complicated by a host of other issues. All I can say for certain is that it's important that you don't enable them. Don't give them opportunities, or excuses, or resources that make it easier for them to continue using. But don't give up on them, either. Don't stop caring about them. Tell them their substance abuse is scaring you. Tell them you want them to stop. And remind them that when they're ready to stop, you'll still be there for them, because you care about them.

It can make all the difference. ■

Douglas Wilson "Wil" Miller is a litigator in Seattle with a private practice focused on criminal defense, family law, and personal injury. Miller devotes much of his spare time to providing pro bono legal services to the survivors of domestic violence, and serving as a recovery coach to meth-addicted lawyers throughout the country. He volunteers with the WSBA Lawyers Assistance Program. He can be reached at wil@wilmler.com.

The North Carolina Lawyer Assistance Program is a confidential program of assistance for all North Carolina lawyers, judges, and law students, which helps address problems of stress, depression, alcoholism, addiction, or other problems that may lead to impairing a lawyer's ability to practice. If you would like more information, go to nclap.org or call: Cathy Killian (for Charlotte and areas west) at 704-910-2310, Towanda Garner (in the Piedmont area) at 919-719-9290, or Robynn Monaites (for Raleigh and down east) at 704-892-5699.

The Washington State Bar Association grants authorization to the NC State Bar to reprint "Life After Meth" by Douglas Wilson "Wil" Miller, which appeared in the June 2014 issue of NWLawyer.

Informing the Public in Upcoming Judicial Elections

BY ASHLEY M. LONDON

A record number of attorneys across North Carolina carved time out of hectic schedules to complete the Judicial Performance Evaluation (JPE) surveys conducted by the North Carolina Bar Association—and the process will continue to create a more informed electorate.

All candidates for the trial bench in 2014 were evaluated. The JPE Survey Phase I was conducted in November 2013, covering superior and district court judges whose terms will expire in 2014. Phase II was conducted at the end of the February 2014 filing period, covering newly installed judges and nonincumbent candidates.¹ The combined results for all contested judicial seats are currently available for public review in advance of the general election on November 4, 2014, at ElectNCJudges.org. The nonincumbent survey is the only one of its kind in the US.

The state of North Carolina has elected its judges for more than a century. But if one asks just about any person on the street the merits of one judicial candidate over another, the answers will vary dramatically in degree of knowledge or ignorance. Judicial election candidates receive little consideration by the general voting public—despite the critical jobs performed by members of the bench—because of a previous dearth of knowledge available for review before ballots are cast. The North Carolina Bar Association has sought to fill that knowledge gap. Its efforts have met with widespread success, thanks to the input of thousands of attorney participants.

“Phase I of the JPE survey harvested 31,000 individual responses, and Phase II (covering the challengers) 7,298 individual evaluations, which is a magnificent response,” says Nancy Black Norelli, immediate past chair of the JPE committee.

The large response enabled the North Carolina Bar Association to provide extensive information for voters on nine superior and district court races that appeared on the primary ballot on May 6.

The results from the JPE survey are easily accessible to the public through the website ElectNCJudges.org. A voter simply clicks on the county of residence, and all contested trial court seats on his or her ballot appear in PDF format, printable and accessible on handheld electronic devices. Thirty-seven counties are represented. The 2014 election cycle will mark the second time members of the public will have access to the survey results.

Each active North Carolina attorney was encouraged to evaluate each judicial candidate with whom the attorney has had a level of professional contact in six categories: Integrity & Impartiality, Legal Ability, Professionalism, Communication, Administrative Skills, and Overall Performance. To preserve the integrity of the feedback, the names and responses from participating attorneys were kept confidential, with an outside accounting firm hired to conduct the surveys.

“We are grateful to the lawyers across the state for their participation in both phases of the survey for the 2014 election cycle,” Norelli says. “Voters, as we learned during the last election, are grateful to have access to this information before they go to the polls.”

The goal for the JPE Committee moving forward is to make sure that members of the public are aware of this exceptional resource. The NCBA will market the website throughout the election season in print and online publications, and will also be conducting a social media campaign to promote the survey.

“We are encouraging members of the NCBA to talk about the website and the survey, both at work and in their broader communities,” said Matt Sawchak, the current chair of the JPE Committee. “It’s important to remember how the results of judicial elections have a far-reaching impact on the lives of all North Carolinians. Helping alert the public to these survey results is a great way to serve our fellow North Carolinians and promote an impartial judiciary.”

This project was made possible by a grant from the NCBA Foundation Endowment. It is another example of how North Carolina lawyers serve the public and our judicial system. ■

Ms. London, a former professional journalist and 2011 graduate of Charlotte School of Law, is a member of the faculty at Charlotte School of Law.

Endnote

1. Complete survey information can be found in two separate reports posted on the NCBA website, ncba.org, under the headings, “JPE Survey - Phase I Results” and “JPE Survey - Phase II Results.” Results for judges who are not seeking election are not reported.

If it Feels Like Technology is Moving Faster, It's Not Just You

BY ERIK MAZZONE

I spent my mom's recent 75th birthday with her helping her use the Netflix and HBOGo apps on her iPad. Not earthshaking; there are lots of 70 year olds toting iPads these days. But then I recalled that when I first started working at the North Carolina Bar Association—February of 2008, which doesn't seem so long ago to me – Apple had not invented the App Store yet. Apps wouldn't become a part of our lives for another five months, and now they are part of our cultural landscape.

The past six years have been an incredibly vibrant time for technology. The stew of smart phones, cloud-based software, and ubiquitous internet connections—along with investments from venture capitalists—have produced a torrent of products and services that have transformed the way virtually all of us use technology in our personal and professional lives. At the Bar Center during breaks in CLE programs, you'd be hard pressed to find a lawyer not hunched over a smart phone, pecking out emails and putting out fires.

These technological advancements do come with a cost: they sometimes provide services that bump uncomfortably into our ethics rules. Because our ethics rules (of necessity) lag the pace of technological innovation, it can be frustrating to embrace new services without knowing whether they will eventually pass ethical muster. That said, the business justification for embracing these new technologies is so persuasive that it remains worth figuring out how and what to incorporate into your practice.

In this article, I'll address two of the most significant technology trends that have marked the last year or two and which I believe are likely to impact the next couple of years as well. These are not companies, services, or apps; they are meta-trends in the technology world that will have a profound impact on us as technology users. The two trends are the sharing economy and the evolution of cloud-based software.

The Sharing Economy

The phrase "sharing economy" might be new to you, but it's based on an old idea: that borrowing something expensive (say, a pickup truck) from a friend is more efficient than buying one of your own if you only need it once in a while.

Dave Cutler/Illustration Source

The sharing economy refers to this old idea of sharing expensive goods and services, but puts a new wrapper around it. There is a burgeoning posse of companies, services, and apps dedicated to using technology to help make the sharing of these big ticket items more frictionless.

It's easiest to think about it as a time share condo. Time share condos became popular because even if you could not afford to purchase a vacation home in a resort area for several hundred thousand dollars, most people could afford to purchase the right to use a vacation condo a single week each year as a time share. Along with 51 other purchasers, they share the costs of the condo.

In the way time shares make vacation condos more affordable, the sharing economy makes virtually everything more affordable: Relay Rides enables the sharing of cars, Airbnb enables the sharing of spare rooms and entire residences, and so on.

These examples are consumer-focused, but the sharing economy is reaching into services used by law firms as well. Ruby Receptionists is a phone answering service that law firms pay for a certain number of minutes of phone answering per month. Speak Write is a web-based typing service that allows users to purchase just the portion of transcription support needed, paying by the word. Lawyers have been sharing real estate for a long time, but in recent years the rise of executive suite services like Regus has formalized these arrangements and reduced costs and increased flexibility for countless firms across North Carolina. The business justification for these sharing economy services is easy to see: it reduces large capital expenditures, allows the flexible increase or decrease of services as needed, and prevents paying for more support than one needs.

As these sharing economy services become more popular, ethics guidance has begun to surface. 2012 FEO 6 (use of time-shared office address on letterhead and advertising) cautions that use of a time-shared address in advertising or letterhead can't be misleading, such as implying a deeper connection between law firm and community than actually exists. 2011 FEO 14 (outsourcing administrative tasks) requires that a lawyer must obtain written consent from her client before outsourcing tasks such as transcription to a foreign jurisdiction.

The upshot is that for staffing support, real estate, and virtually any other expensive purchase a lawyer needs to make, it is worth looking to see if the sharing economy has provided a more affordable option. If you do find some shared resources that work, re-read the Formal Ethics Opinions and see if you need to update your client agreements.

The Evolution of Cloud-Based Software

When use of cloud-based software was ratified for lawyer use (subject to a reasonable care standard) by 2011 FEO 6, it drew an invisible line among the practicing bar. Lawyers quietly sorted themselves into those willing to let their clients' confidential information be stored on computers outside their office walls and those who would not. Three years into the evolution of cloud-based software, it has become harder than ever for the latter group to maintain their prohibition.

While it's pretty straightforward to avoid the use of obvious cloud-based applications like Dropbox, Gmail, and Clio practice management software, it's not always so easy to spot software that relies on cloud technology in one fashion or another. Smartphones and tablet computers have quietly opened the backdoor to use of cloud software in two key ways. First, messaging apps, including text messages, have begun to supplant email as the primary method of sending text messages, especially among younger users. Messaging apps across all major mobile platforms tend to rely heavily on cloud-based software. Lawyers who eschew storing client data in cloud-based services like Dropbox often think nothing of exchanging text messages laden with confidential information to the same ethical effect.

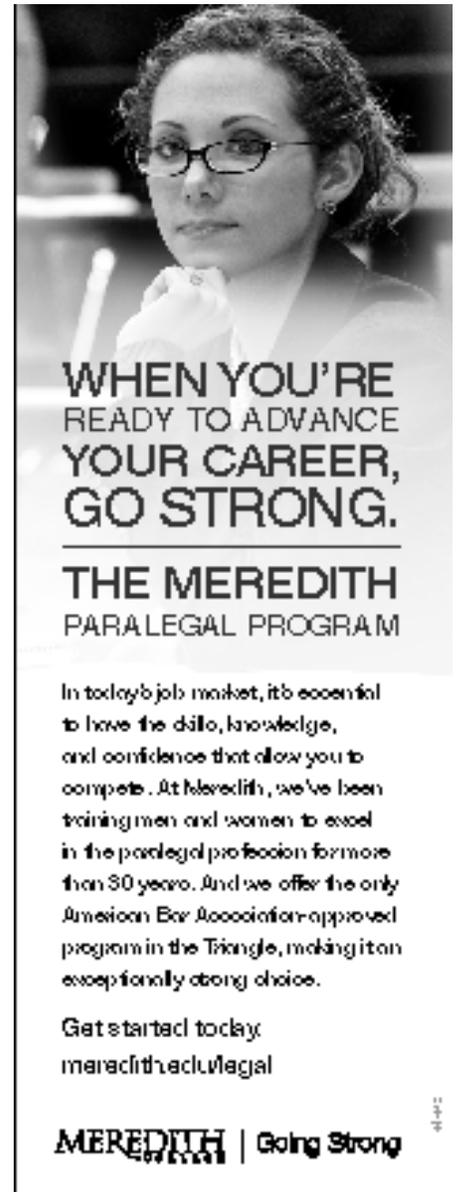

Additionally, as functionality has expanded for tablet computers, much of it has ridden on an infrastructure of cloud-based software. iPad users cheered when Microsoft finally made its Office suite available for iPads earlier this year. It instantly improved the use of iPads for document creation and editing. Use of those apps (as well as countless others used for document creation and editing) is diminished if not made virtually unusable without connecting them to an online storage service like Dropbox or Windows OneDrive.

It never feels particularly like you are using the cloud; it just creeps in to help make the tablet and apps work more seamlessly together. We should expect it to get harder to avoid cloud-based software in the future, both because it will mean forgoing services that will allow us to serve clients more efficiently, and because it will be harder to tell when we're actually using the cloud.

The takeaway here is that if you are dead set against using the cloud in any capacity for your professional life, you will need to exercise great diligence to make sure you aren't inadvertently relying on a cloud service.

Summary

Things are happening fast in this zone.

WHEN YOU'RE READY TO ADVANCE
YOUR CAREER, GO STRONG.

THE MEREDITH
PARALEGAL PROGRAM

In today's job market, it's essential to have the skills, knowledge, and confidence that allow you to compete. At Meredith, we've been training men and women to excel in the paralegal profession for more than 30 years. And we offer the only American Bar Association-approved program in the Triangle, making it an exceptionally strong choice.

Get started today:
meredithlegal.com

MEREDITH | Going Strong

The sharing economy and the evolution of cloud-based software will continue to shape the landscape for advances that allow us to practice more efficiently and serve our clients better. Understanding these trends enables lawyers to understand the ethical implications of using the services and apps that rely on them.

It's been a remarkable six years. Who can possibly imagine what the next six will bring? ■

Erik Mazzone is the director of the Center for Practice Management at the North Carolina Bar Association where he dispenses practice management and technology advice, and helps dispose of leftover food from CLE programs.

Washington State LLLT Program: Improving Access to Justice

BY THEA JENNINGS

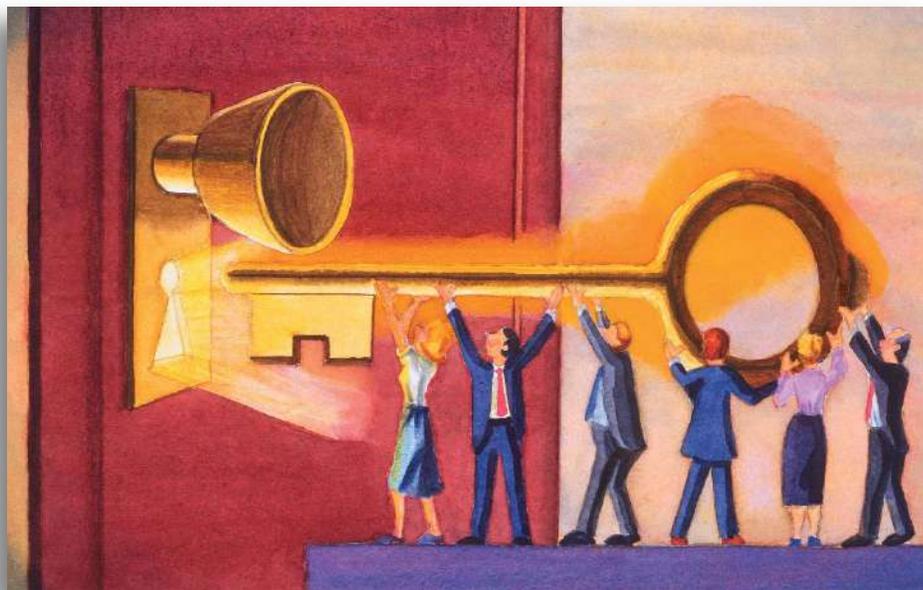

At the request of State Bar President Ron Baker, the Board of Paralegal Certification has been monitoring efforts in other states to permit limited licensing of nonlawyers to provide discrete legal services to the public, targeting litigants of modest means. The recent “legal technician” initiative in Washington State has prompted several other jurisdictions to consider expanding the scope of legal services to be offered by qualified legal technicians as a form of authorized practice. While the Washington program was just launched this year, the Board will follow its progress to determine whether it increases access to justice while protecting the public. The program is explained below.

Washington State is leading the nation in licensing nonlawyers to practice law on a limited basis with its Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT) Program. As the first state to implement such a program, Washington breaks new ground and serves as the model for other states that seem well poised to take the leap, including California and New York.

History and Creation of the LLLT Rule

The genesis of this effort arose in part from alarming statistics regarding the need for access to legal services among Washington’s moderate to low income citizens. According to a 2003 Civil Legal Needs Study, nearly 88% of low income Washington residents face their legal problems alone, without the assistance of an attorney. Often these legal problems relate to family law, housing, consumer law, and other basic needs. The LLLT Program seeks to provide competent, reduced cost legal services to this underserved population.

In response to the Civil Legal Needs Study and concerns regarding the unauthorized practice of law, the Washington Supreme Court took the monumental step of adopting the LLLT Rule—a rule that would for the first time provide a regulatory framework for educated and experienced paralegals to obtain a limited license to practice law in approved practice areas. In its order adopting Admission to Practice Rule (APR) 28, the Washington Supreme Court stated “[w]e have a duty to ensure the public can access affordable legal and law related services, and that they are not left to fall prey to perils of the unregulated market place.”(Order at 5-6). With the adoption of APR 28 in June 2012, the Washington

Ron L. Wheeler/Illustration Source

Supreme Court created a new legal professional—the Limited License Legal Technician (LLLT).

The LLLT Board

The Washington Supreme Court created the LLLT Board (board) to govern the LLLT Program and to ensure LLLTs are well-trained in ways that protect the public from the unauthorized and unregulated practice of law and increase access to justice. The board is staffed and the program is administered by the Washington State Bar Association (WSBA).

The board began its work in January 2013. As one of its first actions, the board recommended domestic relations as the first practice area in which to license LLLTs, which the Washington Supreme Court unanimously approved in March 2013. APR 28 contemplates that the Rule would be applied to other practice areas. Consideration of additional practice areas will be undertaken during 2014.

The board is acutely aware of its duty to protect the public and increase access to justice. For its first year, the board spent long hours defining the LLLT family law scope of practice and qualifications for the LLLT license.

Scope of Practice for LLLTs

Self-represented litigants are frequently unprepared to advocate for their interests in court or against an opposing party, oftentimes to devastating effects. The role of the LLLT is to help these litigants navigate the legal process and to arm them with the tools they need to adequately represent themselves. The limited scope of legal services the LLLTs may provide to pro se clients includes:

- informing clients of procedures and the course of legal proceedings,
- providing approved and lawyer prepared self-help materials,
- reviewing documents and exhibits from the opposing party and explaining them to clients,
- selecting, completing, filing, and serving approved and lawyer prepared forms and advising of their relevance,
- advising clients of necessary documents and explaining their relevance, and
- assisting clients in obtaining necessary documents.

There are specific actions LLLTs may not engage in, such as representing a client in a court proceeding, negotiating a client's legal rights, and discussing a client's position with another person or conveying the position of another party to a client. LLLTs must advise clients to seek the advice of an attorney for matters outside the scope of their authority.

Qualifications

During 2013, the board worked conscientiously to develop LLLT qualifications that guarantee both the protection of the public, and that LLLTs possess the knowledge and skills to practice in their field.

LLLTs will be well educated, trained, and tested before licensure.

Education

Of great importance to the board is establishing the credibility of the program by requiring a rigorous course of study that will guarantee the competence of legal technicians coming into the profession. LLLTs must have:

- (1) a minimum associate level degree,
- (2) 45 credit hours of core curriculum in legal studies from an ABA approved program, and
- (3) attended practice area courses developed by or in conjunction with an ABA approved law school.

Unanticipated partnerships have developed between the board and Washington's higher learning institutions, which is sure to contribute to the success and integrity of the program. Both Washington's community colleges and law schools have combined forces with the board to further the goal of making the education affordable, accessible, and academically rigorous.

Representatives from each of the Washington law schools assisted the board with developing the domestic relations practice area courses. What has resulted is a technologically innovative and collaborative approach to offering the courses. The 15-credit hour, three-quarter class will be web-cast, meaning students can attend in real time from any location nationwide. The University of Washington's School of Law began offering the series of courses for the first time in Winter Quarter 2014 for a fraction of the cost of law school. Professors from all three Washington law schools will assist in the delivery of the education.

Recognizing that many competent and experienced paralegals currently in the workforce may not have completed the LLLT education, the board approved a limited time waiver, or grandfathering provision, that seeks to balance the need to protect the public with the great need for access to justice in our state. The waiver qualifies these individuals for licensure without completing the required associate degree or core education. The waiver applies to those who have:

- (1) passed NALA's Certified Paralegal Exam,
- (2) active certification as a certified paralegal, and
- (3) 10 years of substantive law related work experience supervised by an attorney.

The waiver is not a license to practice as an LLLT, nor does it waive the practice area education. The short term waiver period ends December 31, 2016.

Exam

After completing the LLLT education, there are two exams to pass: the core education and the practice area exams. Given that LLLTs will advise clients on their legal rights and responsibilities, the examination will test on not only general coursework, but also on the ability to assess a client's case and recommend an appropriate course of action.

Experience

Given that the LLLTs may set up their own firms without the supervision of an attorney, experience ensures LLLTs have the tools and expertise to provide competent legal services autonomously. Before entering the profession, LLLTs must have completed at least 3,000 hours (18 months full time) of substantive law related work experience supervised by a lawyer. The experience must be gained three years before or after passing the exam.

Next Steps

The board continues to create the operational details of the LLLT Program, including drafting the Rules of Professional Conduct (RPC) for LLLTs, which are the ethical rules LLLTs must abide by. Among the many ethical situations the board must grapple with are the types of business relationships LLLTs may form, the results of which may well change the landscape of legal service providers in our state. The board is also hard at work developing the domestic relations practice area examination, which will include multiple choice, essay, and practice exercise sections. If all goes according to projected timelines, the first LLLT examination will be held in March 2015, with the first LLLT licenses issued by early Spring 2015. ■

Reprinted with permission of NALA, The National Association of Legal Assistants/Paralegals, and by Thea Jennings. This article originally appeared in the January/February 2014 Facts & Findings, NALA's bi-monthly magazine for paralegals. The article is reprinted here in its entirety. For further information, contact NALA at nala.org or (918) 587-6828.

The Bottom Line—Legal Services is a Good Investment

BY MARY IRVINE

Public support of civil legal services for the poor is money well spent. A recent report found that advocacy boosted the state's economy by nearly $49 million in a single year. The study, conducted by the UNC Center on Poverty, Work, and Opportunity in partnership with the North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission, used data from Legal Aid of North Carolina, Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, and Pisgah Legal Services from cases closed in 2012 to analyze the organizations' collective economic impact. The bottom line is quite simple—investment in legal services benefits the entire state.

Despite an increasing need for free civil legal services, legal services providers have experienced cuts to every traditional funding source, both private and public. Since 2008, state funding has decreased by 40% in North Carolina, and United Way and IOLTA grants have dropped by 32% and 30%, respectively. Further, increased scrutiny facing non-profits across the country is putting pressure on all to demonstrate the value of their work, putting more emphasis on measuring outcomes and requiring frequent reporting on progress.

As a result, legal services providers nationwide have turned to economic impact studies to build the case for investment in their programs. Economic impact research provides insight into the specific impact on a particular geographic area due to a change in the economy. In the legal services industry, this research measures the value of advocacy that brings new direct benefits into the state—usually federal dollars—which then stimulate the economy, resulting in additional indirect economic impacts.

The findings? Civil legal service providers undoubtedly spur local economic growth and save the state money. For every dollar spent by the state on legal aid, nearly $10 flows into the economy for the residents of North Carolina—a 108% return on the state's investment in legal services.

The need for legal services far surpasses available resources of legal services providers to represent all eligible clients. "While resources to support legal services have decreased, the need for legal assistance is greater than ever," said George Hausen, executive director of Legal Aid of North Carolina, "and our goal is to ensure the basic needs of people are met, including access to food, shelter, safety, and healthcare." Further investment will result in justice for those in need of legal assistance and economic benefit for all North Carolinians.

The North Carolina Economic Impact Study

Released in January, the study "A 108% Return on Investment: The Economic Impact to the State of North Carolina of Civil Legal Services in 2012" found that legal representation helped North Carolinians gain access to $9.2 million dollars in new federal benefits, including food stamps, disability, other cash assistance programs for low-income families, and federal tax refunds. Without the help of a free attorney, the benefits likely would not have been secured by clients working on their own. The study also found an additional $8.8 million was awarded to low-income clients in child support and housing cases. This includes awards of monthly child support payments and past due support for struggling single-parent families. Housing awards include protection of housing benefits, rent abatements due to problems with the condition of the housing unit, return of a client's security deposit, or avoidance of unreasonable charges by the landlord.

"This report quantifies what we knew anecdotally," said Jennifer Lechner, executive director of the North Carolina Equal Access

A Safe Harbor for your Health Plan

With the uncertainty of health reform, North Carolina lawyers have a proven alternative in the NC Bar Association Health Benefit Trust, a health plan created exclusively for law firms.

NC BAR ASSOCIATION HEALTH BENEFIT TRUST UNIQUE BENEFITS INCLUDE:

- Greater rate flexibility under health reform regulations should offer many law firms lower rates.
- Dedicated service from Lawyers Insurance and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of NC
- Variety of benefit plans to meet the needs of each member firm.
- Plan pays COBRA, continuation fees and plan fees required under health reform.
- Non-profit, tax exempt structure insures all funds are for benefit of plan members.

ENROLL NOW to avoid the turbulence of health reform in 2014.

Call for Your
FREE, PERSONALIZED Consultation.

800.662.8843 | 919.677.8900
lawyersinsuranceagency.com

to Justice Commission. “Legal aid is good for North Carolina—not just for their provision of legal services to those who would otherwise be unable to access the justice system, but also through the economic benefit these services bring to the state as individuals spend money at businesses in their communities.”

Flowing from the direct economic benefits, the study also found an indirect impact of nearly $13.9 million. The indirect impact provides an estimate of the changes in the local and state economies when new federal revenue enters the market and additional spending occurs. The estimate includes increases in employment, wages, and business outputs. While only an estimate of increased economic activity, the number captures the benefit to the community as a whole of providing legal services to those who could not otherwise afford an attorney.

The report also found that the efforts of legal services providers to prevent domestic violence, eviction, and foreclosure generate cost savings for the state of $17.1 million. Cost savings represent the amount saved by the state and local communities in emergency medical services, mental health treatment, public health, court costs, unpaid property taxes, police and fire services, social services, and other public services. For example, by preventing 488 foreclosures, legal services kept many families who were the victims of mortgage scams in their homes and reduced local government expenditures to secure vacant, foreclosed properties.

“Poverty is the greatest challenge facing the people of North Carolina,” said Gene Nichol, director of the Poverty Center. “By advocating for the rights of the poor, the work of legal services lawyers brings us closer to equal justice under the law. It also generates an economic benefit to the state worth millions.”

Access to Justice Makes Dollars and Sense

In addition to depriving North Carolina families of much needed access to the justice system, lack of civil legal representation leaves money on the table that could have boosted the overall economic outlook of the state. This study, not unlike scores of others done in states across the country, suggests further economic gains with increased funding for legal services given the inadequate capacity of providers to serve all those who are eligible.

The primary focus of civil legal service providers is to ensure access to the civil legal system for all, regardless of ability to pay. “The financial benefits do not begin to measure the full value of this work,” said Ken Schorr, executive director of Legal Services of Southern Piedmont and member of the NC Equal Access to Justice Commission. “Protecting women and children from violence, keeping families from being separated or homeless, helping elderly and disabled people stay in control of their lives, and other life-changing benefits cannot be measured in terms of dollars.”

However, in working to meet clients’ legal needs, legal services organizations gain immense benefits for the state, reaching far beyond the individual clients and families served.

To read the study, visit the North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission, ncequalaccesstojustice.org. ■

Mary Irvine is IOLTA’s access to justice coordinator.

“Living with Blindness Has Given Me a Broader Perspective...” —An Interview with Attorney Jamie Dean

BY JOHN GEHRING

When Gray Wilson asked me to interview Jamie Dean, an attorney with the Womble Carlyle firm in Winston-Salem, I wondered where the point of interest was. Dean graduated Summa Cum Laude from Wake Forest University and then from the Wake Forest School of Law, Magna Cum Laude, and also received a Master's in Business Administration. Along the way, during his student years, he was inducted in both Phi Beta Kappa and the Mortarboard National Honor Society. Further, he was a silver medalist in adaptive rowing in the 2008 games in Beijing. The major law firms in the United States look to hire, and do hire, the academically elite, so why is the story of Jamie Dean any different from the other honors graduates? All of his accolades are set forth in his Womble Carlyle profile, with one omission! Until you meet him you would not know that Jamie Dean has a disability, one that he describes as both beneficial to him and also as an inconvenience. I met with Jamie and Priscilla (his four-legged co-counsel), and we talked about his life. You see, Jamie is blind. Thus this interview...

John Ghering (JG): Have you been blind from birth? What sports have drawn your interest, and are these sports activities correctly called “adaptive”? Your sport in the 2008 Paralympic games in Beijing was “adaptive rowing”. You stated that you do not consider yourself to be an adaptive person. How so? What does that mean?

Jamie Dean (JD): I was legally blind from birth due to a disease called retinitis pigmentosa (“RP”). RP didn’t affect my visual acuity so much as it reduced my visual field. I’ve heard people compare my condition to trying to look at an elephant from six inches away: the image is clear, but you just can't see the whole picture. When I was a child, my vision did not have a great impact on my life. I could read, write, ride a bike, and do most things other kids could do. As I neared middle school age, my visual field took its most significant decrease, and that process continued gradually throughout high school. By the end of high school, I was relying on my first seeing eye dog and using adaptive technologies like a talking computer and recorded books. At present, my vision is pretty much limited to distinguishing between light and dark.

Sports have been an integral part of my life since a pretty young age, due mainly to the persistent prompting of my dad. He saw that I needed something from which to draw confidence and to keep me connected to other kids my age, so he really pushed me to try new things and to stay the course when my athletic endeavors were not going my way (which was frequent).

I've done a mix of "adaptive" (sports created or adapted for people with disabilities) and mainstream sports, but I've spent most time in mainstream competition. When I came to Wake Forest, I joined the rowing club, because rowing seemed like one of the few sports for which sight was not a prerequisite and because the club's leadership didn't seem as daunted as some other clubs about the prospect of having a blind member.

As for "adaptive" sports, I had never heard of "adaptive rowing" until my very last college race. At that race, a former national team coach spotted me using a white cane while still in my spandex unisuit (the most significant drawback to rowing), put two and two together, and introduced me to the current national adaptive team director. The next spring, I was invited to try out for the national adaptive team and, over the next three years, I was honored to compete for Team USA in the United States, Canada, Germany, England, and, in 2008, the Paralympic Games in Beijing, China.

"Adaptive" rowing really is no different from any other form of rowing, except that all participants have physical disabilities. There is no difference in the stroke, equipment, or technical aspects of the sport. The main distinctions between my adaptive races and my college races before them were that (1) in my adaptive races, my crew was comprised of two men and two women, which is not done in any other collegiate or Olympic rowing event and (2) our "adaptive" races were only 1,000 meters long instead of the 2,000 meter length used in other collegiate and Olympic races.

I am extremely proud to call myself a Paralympian. However, before joining the national team, I never would have considered myself an "adaptive" athlete as much as an "adapted" athlete. In other words, I had been able to compete in the mainstream despite my blindness. The same is true of my everyday life. Blindness is the undercurrent that informs how I go about accomplishing my daily tasks, but it's not the driving force behind what I do or why I do it. I do not define myself by my lack of sight, and my hope is that others see past the seeing eye dog and cool adaptive technologies to the father, husband, and lawyer behind them, as well.

JG: You have said that being blind has benefitted you and that most of the time this disability is just an inconvenience, sometimes a major inconvenience. Please describe the benefits and inconveniences.

JD: The most valuable benefit of blindness is perspective. I often tell people that, if you think I am cocky now, imagine how insufferable I would be if I could see. That is more truth than gest. Blindness has forced me to see the importance of reliance on other people and not being too proud to ask for help. In our hyper-independent culture, this adjusted perspective keeps me grounded and, in my better moments, gives me a greater appreciation for the people around me.

To jump back to your earlier question, athletics bore out another of the great benefits of blindness. When I started rowing, to put it bluntly, I was abysmal. I mean, my performance was shameful. At the first team time-trial, I was the slowest man, by far, and slower than two or three of the women. However, one thing blindness taught me is that sometimes, to get what you want, you have to work harder and put in more time than everyone else. That was the approach I took. I lifted weights, gained muscle, did extra workouts, and so on until I caught up with the others on my team, and eventually worked my way into the stroke seat of the varsity men's lightweight crew. That is where I remained for my sophomore, junior, and senior years. I think the perseverance that fueled my transition was something that developed in me as a result of my blindness, not an intrinsic character trait.

As for inconveniences, the two things that get under my skin more than any others are not being able to drive and not being able to read print. There are ways to get around both of those things, but they are decidedly annoying to someone like me who likes to get out and about and to get lost in books.

JG: As for your rowing for the national team, just how did you fit this extracurricular activity into your academic schedule? Also, speaking of schedules, how have you fit your current community efforts with your "lawyer" schedule? And what are your community activities?

JD: I was blessed with gracious law and business school faculty and administrators and a gracious employer. I'm sure this grace was strained on occasion, like the time the US Anti-Doping Agency showed up to administer my random drug test while I was in class, and the deans had to allow their conference room to be commandeered as a temporary urine analysis lab. Wake Forest's faculty and administrators were also extremely generous in allowing me to miss classes at the beginning of my 1L and 2L years so that I could compete in the annual world championships that are the qualifying events for the Paralympics, and they helped me arrange my course load so that I could essentially miss half of the first semester of my 3L year to participate in the Paralympics. Womble was also very kind in allowing me to miss many Fridays during my summer clerkship so that I could travel to spend weekends training with my team in Philadelphia and DC. My wife showed the greatest grace and patience by permitting us to postpone our honeymoon so that I could train, and in allowing me to use the second bedroom in our apartment as a home gym. It truly took a coordinated effort to get me to Beijing, and I am very grateful for everyone who helped along the way.

As for community activities, I don't think I am any more involved than most attorneys, particularly since becoming a father. I am a deacon at my church and a volunteer for the Forsyth County Jail and Prison ministry, where I play guitar for chapel services every few months. I am also a board member for a young non-profit that my friends started to do economic development work in Uganda. This year I also started teaching pre-trial practice and procedure at Wake Forest, which has been a privilege and also a lot of fun. By limiting my community activities to things I really care about, I have found that making time has never been a major problem.

Dean with his teammates on the podium at the 2008 Paralympic Games in Beijing, China.

JG: Preparing for trial is exhausting and the trial of a case even more so! I cannot imagine doing all this without the benefit of sight.

How do you locate a case or exhibit in court; how do you pick a jury and how to you talk to the jury in a “face to face” matter?

JD: As for any lawyer, the key for me is careful and deliberate preparation. I use technology to its fullest when I’m arguing a motion or trying a case. My computer has special software that can read documents to me, so I make sure I have all cases, exhibits, outlines, etc. saved on my laptop whenever I go to court. I use an earphone so I can read my notes without my computer reading to the whole court room. The same computer software makes online legal research fully accessible, so I can use Lexis and Westlaw just like anyone else. With the proliferation of wireless internet access, including in many court houses, there is very little I cannot access from my laptop.

Jury interactions are a different animal and something I am still figuring out. I think walking in with a cute dog is a good start. I also think that blindness can be a humanizing factor that differentiates me from the other blue and gray suit clad stiff and helps the jury see me as a real person. Rather than hide my blindness, I have tried to address it in a light hearted way at the outset of my trials to put the jury at ease and eliminate distractions as we move on to what really matters. For example, at the beginning of voir dire in one trial, I reminded the jury that “Y’all have seen my four-legged co-counsel, so you know that raising your hand and waiting for me to call on you isn’t going to do any of us much good.” That elicited a chuckle, accomplished the more important objective of securing the jury’s cooperation during the voir dire process, and broke the ice so that the jurors could get past my blindness and my dog and focus on the case. Preparation also helps, particularly in orienting myself to the courtroom, witness stand, and jury box so that, even if people are silent, I can fake eye contact well enough to keep things from becoming too awkward.

This is not to say there have never been any mishaps. In the above-referenced trial, for example, I was pretty embarrassed at the close of voir dire by a Batson challenge that I did not anticipate. I realized, only after the opposing counsel stood up and began passionately arguing his motion, that I had no idea what the racial composition of my jury pool even was, including those who had been excluded. That was a mistake that mostly resulted from being a rookie, but blindness certainly did not help. In another trial, one of my colleagues walked an exhibit up to the witness stand while I was cross-examining an expert. After what I thought was a pretty effective cross based on the exhibit, I confidently instructed my colleague that he could step down, only to realize when he put his hand on my shoulder a second later that he had quietly returned to our table some minutes earlier. Fortunately, another thing blindness has taught me is that, sometimes, the only thing to do is enjoy a laugh at your own expense (which is what I did along with the rest of the courtroom).

JG: Modern day computer science must be a great help (necessity?) to you, but it takes more than a computer to try a case. Exactly how does the computer work for you? What are the computer programs which allow you “to see” what you are doing?

JD: The main computer program I use is called JAWS. In essence, it speaks everything that is written on the screen, including documents, websites, email, etc. It enables me to perform legal research and draft documents the same way any other lawyer would. Another crucial asset I’ve been fortunate to have is an excellent support staff, including the assistants I’ve worked with and our firm’s team of word processors. Together, they scan and convert paper documents or electronic documents that JAWS can’t read into accessible formats, so that I can read every part of the case file. The other piece of technology that I’ve become dependent upon, like many others, is my iPhone and its built-in accessibility software. I use my phone for everything from emails to reading to looking up cases and rules in court. More than a cool gadget, the iPhone has actually been a great equalizer in access to information for the blind.

JG: Part of the Christian faith requires the faithful to care for the “widows and orphans”. You and your wife adopted two children from Ethiopia and now are expecting a biological child. Before the adoption of the children, did you have any special ties to Ethiopia? Please tell us about fatherhood and your family life.

JD: My wife and I felt called to adoption before we knew one another, and we discussed adoption early on in our relationship. Within our first year of marriage, we decided to adopt first and try for biological children later, which we thought would enable us and our extended families to focus on connecting

CONTINUED ON PAGE 53

Share Your Thoughts and Ideas with the Bar

The Journal wants articles of interest to the legal community. Submit your work or suggestions for publication. Contact the editor at ncbar@bellsouth.net.

Seven Room Barn

BY P. RICHARD WILKINSON

The rusty neglected hinges made a squeal as Frankie yanked open the sagging rough-board rectangle that served as a door into Uncle Otha's seven room barn. You had to squat and kinda crabwalk to get into the opening of any tobacco barn, and this one was especially low. The smaller and lower the door, the less heat you'll lose, and this tall of a barn needed all the heat it could hold. Frankie stepped sideways over the high sill and ducked into the barn.

His steps caused dust to rise from the floor of tobacco talcum, making the air rich with the intoxicating smell of flue-cured tobacco. Dust particles hung suspended in the shafts of sunlight leaking through the chinks in the walls, narrow strips of visibility crisscrossing the shadows up high in the barn, making a ladder of light that funhouse mirrored the set timbers used to hang the sewn sticks of just-picked tobacco; they too laddered above across the vast empty space created by four simple and tall log walls. Frankie breathed a big gulp of dust, aroma, and nostalgia.

This was Uncle Otha's barn, once considered not only the biggest tobacco barn in all of Wake County, but at the time also one of its tallest structures as well. From the vent window at the very top, you could see both the Knightdale fire lookout tower—looking like a project from Frankie's brother's Erector set—and the new Holiday Inn high-rise in Raleigh, which was shaped like a mailing tube with balconies and supposedly copied a famous building in Hollywood. More impressively, from those two buildings you could unmistakably see the shiny top of Uncle Otha's barn. Frankie used to brag about that at school when he was younger, and actually saw it was true once when he visited Raleigh with his pa. They had taken the elevator in the hotel to the top floor and looked out a hallway window. Way in the distance was Otha's flashy tin roof.

While all of the Piedmont's tobacco farms were dotted with log curing barns, the usual barn was only about two stories tall. Conventional wisdom held that the dry heat from the flues—literally greenwood fires in ground level hearths before the gas company set up in Wendell—would lessen by the time it rose much higher, hence failing to dry or “cure” the tobacco hung at the higher levels. Barns were about 16 by 16, and were divided into four parallel “rooms.” Frankie was confused when he was little because these “rooms” don't have walls and as such aren't really rooms at all. Each room was defined by the ladder of eight timbers crossing from one side of the barn to the other, each timber about 30 inches directly above the one below it and spaced about four feet apart from side to side. Each level of cross timbers would support the ends of the long, roughhewn tobacco sticks laden with sticky, heavy, ripe green-gold leaves—the leaves tied on by hand when Frankie was little, but he remembered the carnival atmosphere the day his pa and uncle came home pulling a brand spanking new Holland stitching machine, an immensely labor saving machine part conveyor belt, part industrial seamstress, and part magic to Frankie. The loaded sticks would travel on the conveyor through the stooped door to the floor man inside, usually both tall and strong and frequently also the crew boss, who then handed up one end of the heavy tobacco stick—reaching as high as he could—to one of the hangers clambering above. The hangers were agile and strong teenagers who flew monkeylike up and down the wide-spaced ladder of crosslogs, filling the top tier in the first room by squeezing as many fat, loaded sticks as they could, side-by-side on each level. Good hangers would flatten themselves against the wall to force in a few more sticks, cramming the space with

The Results Are In!

This year the Publications Committee of the State Bar sponsored its 11th Annual Fiction Writing Competition. Fifteen submissions were received and judged by the committee members. The submission that earned first prize is published in this edition of the Journal.

as much tobacco as possible. Then they would move down a level and start to fill the next tier. Once that room was jammed full all the way to the bottom rung, the process would start again at the top in the next room.

Sometimes a barn monkey would lose his grip and drop a loaded stick, making the floor man dodge, curse, and threaten. They were heavy enough to cause serious injury, especially when dropped from on high. Frankie's pa once said he thought you could kill a man if you dropped a stick on him from the top tier of Otha's barn.

For although you might see a rare six room barn, proudly built eight feet wider but no taller by some proud, successful (and some unsuccessful yet still proud), scratch-dirt farmer—usually placed right by the road so everyone would see and hopefully draw the right conclusions of prosperity and ambition—Otha's barn was a very unique “seven rooms,” almost twice as high as any other. Oh, the Broadwells claimed an “eight room barn,” but everybody knew it was really only two four room barns built side-by-side, sharing a common wall. And instead of roadside, Otha built his barn tucked back into the trees behind his house, ostensibly to use the natural shade for his barn workers, but having the subsidiary effect of making his barn look even taller as its sheet metal roof towered over the pines. Like the six room farmers, Otha enjoyed all the envy of his peers, but in the trees he was free from their sins of obvious pride and showmanship.

Otha had hit upon the idea of a taller barn when we first got LP gas for the barns. Ignoring the local naysayers—including two professors from NC State who came out at the request of “concerned neighbors”—Frankie’s uncle dropped a bunch of tall straight pines one winter and started building his barn the next. (“Goddam engineers,” muttered Uncle Otha.) Using woodstove pipe, he built tall chimneys that rose beside and anchored to the walls, and that carried heat almost all the way to the top. And though technically it still only had four “rooms,” they were very tall. Otha’s barn was exactly three-quarters taller than most so, as he figured it, the barn held seven rooms worth of tobacco. Instead of eight hanger levels, there were 14.

Frankie looked up again at the ladder of cross timbers and he remembered attempting to climb it while neglected one hot afternoon when he was just six. Using the gaps in the log walls as toeholds, he made it all the way to the second level before falling and breaking his arm, landing on one of the sheet metal covered gas burners installed on the dirt floor of the barn. He tasted some bitterness now at that memory, as he not only broke his arm, but he also got a whipping for wandering away, and even worse, his pa never let him work in the barns when he got older. Instead, he was a field worker—he spent all day every day but Sunday out in the hot North Carolina sun all summer long.

Frankie was adept at the manual field work: the plugging and planting; the hoeing and weeding; laying endless rows of irrigation pipe; breaking out the flowering tops and suckers that would limit broadleaf growth; and “priming,” the term used for harvesting the leaves by hand when they were at their prime. Yet he wasn’t very adept at much else. His pa’s attempts to teach him to operate the tractor were disastrous—he still couldn’t drive. Although an enthusiastic reader, he did poorly in school and was slow to pick up on things in general. Mostly ignored in school—by teachers and peers—he had never held any job but farming right here, and he still lived at home with his ma and uncle. He knew he was different and it had made him shy and friendless. It was the main reason why he spent so much time alone in the barns now that they weren’t used.

Despite banishment to the field, that’s not to say the young Frankie never went to the barns when they were used. For 16 years he would accompany his pa in the evenings after supper to check on the barns, making sure the burners were all lit and adjusting the heat to maximize the curing process. On crisp fall dawns he would help load the cured tobacco onto a flatbed trailer, the humidity just right for keeping the leaf in “order”—meaning supple and not brittle—so it could be handled. Oftentimes the field hands would ride in on the last trailer of primed tobacco, and hang out in the shade while the barn hands would sew and load the last of the sticks. His first (and only) kiss was in this tobacco barn, the lucky girl the skinny 15 year old sister of the barn crew boss. Otha’s barn was where Frankie came to hide when he wanted to be alone; it’s where he came to cry when his brother died, and when his pa died. He had lots of memories of this barn.

He had not always lived at his uncle’s. Although the brothers farmed together, Frankie’s immediate family used to live on the adjoining farm, but they had lost it during the estate battle after his grandpa on his mother’s side died and his ma’s sister forced the sale of everything. (“Goddam lawyers!” cursed Uncle Otha.) They had lived and farmed with his father’s brother ever since. Frankie knew nothing but farm life: wide open spaces, trees, animals, and tobacco. He couldn’t imagine living anywhere else. The farm was his sanctuary, the barn his solitude. He always came here when he was upset, so it felt right to come for one last visit.

The burners were all gone now, scavenged for scrap metal or used to turn old cut up fuel tanks into pig cookers. The log barn had set empty for years, and Frankie suspected he was the only one who went inside anymore. The barns were no longer used because Otha had switched to metal automated curing sheds in the 80s, a necessary evolution needed to use the automated tobacco harvester. The harvester eliminated the need for field laborers, who had gotten harder and harder to find each year. Frankie remembered the various groups of workers from over the years: when he was a child they had always been black (“We’re supposed to call them Negroes,” sneered Uncle Otha); when he was a young teen the blacks didn’t want to farm anymore so his pa hired a bunch of teenagers from the nearby trailer park (“Watch out for the white trash stealin’ from us,” growled Uncle Otha); and then when the trailer park crew grew up and drifted away, the farm hired migrant workers from Mexico. (“And when the crop is in, they’ll go back to where they’re from!” predicted a smiling Uncle Otha.)

Frankie’s pa had never warmed to his brother’s tall barn theories, and usage proved his caution well placed. It used more gas than two four room barns would, and even then getting a uniform cure was challenging. Most days during harvest they would fill two barns with fat loaded sticks. Eight rooms of tobacco was plenty of work for one day, especially when you were pacing yourself for eight weeks of that work at six days a week. So in theory a seven room day should be shorter, but it wasn’t. The extra height meant an extra barn monkey was needed, which meant one less primer in the field. Fewer primers slowed the picking; climbing up and down the tall ladders with heavy loads slowed the barning. Frankie’s ma would sometimes call the great old barn Otha’s Folly or the Terrible Tobacco Tower, but Frankie noticed she never did when Otha was around.

Sadly, this great old barn—in fact the whole farm—would soon be history. The location of the new outer bypass around Raleigh was announced and it was coming right through Otha’s house. (“Goddam bureaucrats!” roared Uncle Otha.) Frankie was visiting the barn one last time as he, his ma, and Uncle Otha cleaned and sorted and readied to move to some house in a subdivision with a tiny yard. No one was excited or happy about the move, least of all Frankie. Everything was packed. Today was the last day any of his kin would live on this spot. The loss left him feeling worse than anything before. The farm was always the one constant he could count on, even when other stuff let him down or left him bewildered. Now it would be gone.

Frankie felt truly lost and aimless. His feelings of grief and despair had grown over the last years, the bad events coming one after the other, no gap in between long enough to have mourned and evolved, but instead each tragedy overlaying the last until assimilating all into a single giant chest-pressing weight he never seemed to shake. Losing the farm wasn’t just the proverbial last straw, but instead was like being crushed by a giant bale of hay dropped from a plane. He didn’t know what to do.

His ma tried hard to convince Frankie to use this opportunity to start a new life, to strike out on his own. He needed to find a job. He needed to stop depending on her; she could already see her next few years would be spent caring for the aging Otha. (“No goddam drool-chinned nursing home!” raged Uncle Otha.) Even the pastor at church had pulled him aside to urge Frankie to let go of the past and move into the future. Assuming he could and assuming he wanted to, Frankie wasn’t even sure how. Where does one start when starting over?

Frankie looked up at the cross timbers. Now that he was grown, the first beams were head high, causing him to duck as he moved around. He tugged on one, feeling its strength, and made a decision. Maybe here is where you start over. Today would be very different, and not just because he was moving. Today he would have the courage to do what escaped him many times since the broken arm. Today he would climb to the top of the seven room barn.

The first tier was easy. It was no higher than standing on the back deck of the house, and it took little effort to kick off the floor and wall and scramble up. He stood on the beam with one hand holding to a knot in the wall. He realized now that even grown he would have to climb to the upper room the same way he had as a child—working his way up a wall, digging his toes into the chinks between the logs, while pulling up on the beam of the next tier above.

The second level was where Frankie had fallen as a child, breaking his arm and ruining his chances of working in the shade. It didn’t look that tall at all. He was sure he could just jump down from here if he wanted. This was also the log Jeanie sat on when she would sneak a cigarette, since she was too young to smoke. She would climb up and sit bent-kneed on the second, with her feet on the first, leaning against the wall, wrongly believing her brother the barn boss was oblivious. Frankie would just as sneakily follow her and stand looking up at her as she smoked. She wore cutoff jeans—the kids called them Daisy Dukes—and he tried not to stare at her legs. They hardly ever said anything, instead sharing a quiet moment in the shade, each wondering what the other was wondering. On the last day of harvest of the last season he would ever see her or her brother, she tossed her butt down into the dirt as always, but when she hopped down

Jeanie had walked right up to Frankie and kissed him hard, and had then ducked out through the door. He could still feel the warmth of her lips, the mash of his lips against his teeth, and the complete vacuum that immediately followed. He looked up into the shadows and dust for a moment longer than the kiss, and then scrambled up to the third beam and kept climbing.

Otha had fallen from about the fifth level when Frankie was 16, the suspected cause the drinking of “apple cider” that Otha kept in a big barrel hidden in the loft of the regular barn. He broke both wrists, just before harvest, so he was completely useless when they needed him the most. (“Come here and help me, Frankie! I can’t even wipe my own damn ass!” bellowed the double-casted Otha.)

Frankie climbed up onto the seventh level of cross beams. Now he was nervous, for it seemed a long way down. He rested here for a while at the halfway point, looking up and looking down. He was being flooded with memories and emotions, all of it making him shaky. He had never climbed this high anywhere, much less in the barns—he was always too scared. Heck, he didn’t even like the second floor balcony at North Hills Mall. He took a big deep breath and started to climb up to the next logs.

The tenth row of beams held a good memory for him. It was from here that his older brother pissed down on top of the head of one of the trailer park boys, a troublemaking bully called “Rooftop” because of the stiff shingle of hair that stuck straight out from his forehead. He had cornered a young Frankie in the barn and was teasing and pushing him around, unaware the brother was hanging out up high. “Francis, Francis,” he had sing-songed until he felt the first splash and unwittingly looked straight up into the yellow stream. Rooftop ran from the barn cursing and crying. He never came back. The good memory faded though, since Frankie’s brother died some years later in Iraq. (“Goddam politicians!” wailed Uncle Otha.) Frankie missed his brother something fierce.

The memory of Rooftop brought a flood of others. If Frankie had ever had any “friends,” it was a handful of the dozens of field workers who had come and gone over the years. Like DJ, the big black kid who didn’t talk like any of the others—black or white—but instead sounded like the books Frankie liked to read. DJ would tell Frankie he could be whatever he wanted when he grew up. DJ planned on going to college and being a lawyer. Or Michael and Billy, the two cut-ups from the trailer park who would pull pranks like putting garter snakes in the bacca trailer to scare the girls at the barn, or would offer Frankie a dollar to eat a fat, juicy tobacco worm. Or Miguel, the migrant worker who had claimed to not speak or understand any English until the day Frankie’s pa came by with an old TV in the back of the truck. He was giving the migrants the set to put in the ancient tenant farmer’s shack where they all lived. Miguel had taken one look at the TV and blurted out, “Is it color?” This had caused Frankie to fall down laughing, which made the other workers laugh too. After that, he and Miguel always primed side-by-side rows, and Miguel would tell him stories of life in Mexico.

There had been a few others like the Wilson boys and the Baker brothers, maybe not friends but at least friendly. However, none of the former workers had ever stopped by the farm over the years, and after the switch to automation, there were no more crews. After graduation from high school, Frankie knew not much more than the isolation of the farm, except for sporadic trips to the First Baptist Church with his ma and the Wendell tobacco warehouse with his uncle.

Frankie resumed moving slowly up the wall. He didn’t pause anymore for fear he would lose his will to rise any further. He pulled and reached and climbed, and finally kicked up onto the last timber. This was the 14th tier, but technically the first to be filled with tobacco. Even though it was a nice day, the top of the barn was sermon hot and stuffy. Being above the trees meant no shade. The sun would bear down on the metal roof, super-heating the upper barn in the summer. It supplemented Otha’s chimneys, but was almost unbearable to the hangers laboring in it. Here, from the side, the barn monkey could get some fresh air by opening a small wooden vent built into the wall—you lifted a swinging hook from a bent nail and pushed the door outward. Except the door had swelled eons ago and was always stuck, so you had to beat it open using your fist like a hammer. Holding on tightly with one arm, he banged open the vent.

He blinked in the sudden blinding flood of sunlight. Through the opening, Frankie could see out over the trees, just as Uncle Otha had planned. He could see part of the old farmhouse where six generations of his father's family had lived. The view had changed over the years, with the fire tower now long gone and Raleigh full of tall, generally square-cornered buildings. Most of the neighboring tobacco fields and log barns were also gone, they and the forests buried under cookie-cutter subdivisions. Yet, even with farms turning into neighborhoods, and cross-roads country stores lost to bigger IGAs or even bigger Kroger shopping centers, it still was a vast vista of trees and open space. The bypass would change that, for good or ill.

For Frankie, though he had never been here, the top of the seven room barn was the place that had affected his life the most. Frankie's father fell from right here, opening this stupid little door, losing his balance while banging on it with his fist. He cracked his skull on one of those stupid little gas burners at the bottom. He last saw his father in the Intensive Care Unit at Wake Memorial, his head completely wrapped in gauze, a stupid little tube leading from one corner of his mouth, a trickle of blood dribbling from the other. ("Goddam doctors," sobbed Uncle Otha.) Nothing had ever been the same again.

Frankie had never imagined being this far off the ground. The floor, even without the old jets, looked deadly simply because it was so far down. Sliding his hands out onto the log and pushing off the barn wall with his feet, he edged out onto the beam that once held hundreds of pounds of ripe, fat tobacco, letting it settle into his armpits as his torso hung half off half on and his legs dangled below.

Frankie hung there using his muscles and body weight to achieve a state of suspended animation. It took little effort to remain in balance. It felt like floating. He turned his head and looked out of the little window over the trees and let his memories float as well: he thought of his ma and his pa and his Uncle Otha; the loss of one brother and not one but two farms; the smell of cured tobacco and unwashed workers; the long, hot summers and long tanned legs; loud music and loud auctioneers. He could hear the singing of the field crews working their way down the long rows, the steady rumble of the tractor and trailer slowly keeping pace beside them. He felt for a moment the peace that he always felt during the morning and afternoon breaks, sitting in the shade, listening to birds chirp and twitter over the silenced tractor, drinking deeply from an ice-cold Pepsi. ("Off your ass and on your feet; out of the shade and into the heat!" roared Uncle Otha.) He could feel the scratch of burlap, the sticky of tobacco resin, the pain in his bent lowered back. He could taste the sting of sprayed chemicals, of sweat pouring down his face, of cold chicken soup eaten directly from the can at the store during lunch when all the farmers would congregate for 30 minutes repeating the same tired phrases about the heat, the humidity, the crop, and the prices. He could sense the buzz of nicotine seeping into his pores from the black gum staining his forearms after a long day of priming. He thought of highways and houses, families and funerals, the things he would never have and the things he would never have again. Loss, longing, helplessness, aimlessness, despair, and bittersweet nostalgia washed over Frankie, just like the acrid papery smell of decades of cured tobacco. He now had no past and he could see no future.

Frankie thought of all of these things as he swayed on the log and floated in the warm still air. He suddenly and sharply realized, maybe with a clarity of reason he had never experienced, that he did indeed carry an awful heavy burden with him, a burden that prevented him from moving forward, from being happy. And dammit! he was tired of feeling that way. He looked down at the shadowy dirt floor. He looked at the rough log walls. He looked out the window at bright sunshine and what would be no more. He even looked up at the underside of the tin roof, never shiny underneath but not on top anymore either, noting the small pinholes and spreading stains of rust. Frankie looked at everything and nothing, felt everything and nothing, tasted and heard and smelled everything and nothing. He was being crushed by his feelings, His Feelings, HIS FEELINGS. Something drastic had to change, and then Frankie decided that the best way for him to get on with life was to simply let it all go. And so he did.

Frankie let go. ■

P. Richard Wilkinson closed his law practice in 1998 to take a two year travel sabbatical. He has since roamed the American West fighting wildfire, rafting Class V rivers, climbing 10,000'+ mountains, and skiing big lines. He will begin his return home to NC in 2015, projecting the journey will take 12 to 18 months (depending on Alaska).

Poetic Justice

The following poems are excerpts from the book Poetic Justice, a collection of vignettes from life in the practice of law rendered as humorous poems, written by Charlotte attorney James DuPuy and award-winning writer and editor ML Philpott. A portion of the proceeds from the sale of the book go to benefit WomensLaw.org. For more information, see poeticjusticethebook.com.

The Call Not Taken

With a wink in Robert Frost's direction

Two lines diverged on a Mylar plat,
And to one call I could not commit,
And being new here, sweating I sat,
And wondered just how it could be that
A single line could seemingly split.
One line was an easement of some sort,
But which was which? I was doomed to fail.
The clock was ticking, time had grown short,
And as my guts started to contort,
I sat alone and chewed my thumbnail.
Being young and scared, I dared not ask
My cruel senior partner for his take,
For fear of catching merciless flack,
Or being the victim of a wisecrack,
When he realized I was a fake.
So I chose the one that I thought right,
With anxiety and doubts acute.
Two lines diverged on a plat and I,
I called the one less traveled by,
And that led to my malpractice suit.

Ode to the Rainmaker

With thanks for the inspiration to Elizabeth Barrett Browning

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
You reek of charm, the genetically blessed,
And while I spend my hours in this office,
You're on some golf course or other most days.
Your intellect is at best rather base,
Your work product is far below the rest,
Your attitude is I-couldn't-care-less,
When I clean up your mess, you get the praise.
Family connections and a silver spoon,
Like a nephew in the mob you're plugged in.
What's to love, then? It's simple. Selfish, too:
I like having a job, money to spend.
And as little true law work as you do,
You've the golden touch at bringing it in. ■

Profiles in Specialization—Robert C. Kemp III

BY DENISE MULLEN, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF LEGAL SPECIALIZATION

I recently had an opportunity to talk with Robert (Bert) C. Kemp III, a board certified specialist in state criminal law practicing in Pitt County. Bert attended the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, earning an undergraduate degree in economics, and subsequently received his law degree from Wake Forest University. Following graduation he spent several years practicing both general litigation and criminal defense before accepting a position as an assistant public defender in Pitt County. He was appointed chief public defender in June 2007 and currently supervises 13 attorneys in that office. Bert is also a judge advocate, holding the rank of lieutenant colonel in the NC National Guard. Bert became a board certified specialist in 2005, and was appointed to the Criminal Law Specialty Committee in 2013. His comments about the specialization program and its impact on his career follow.

Q: Why did you pursue certification?

I had been in private practice as a criminal defense attorney when I accepted the position of assistant public defender in Pitt County. At the time, several of my clients viewed that change as a demotion, akin to a resident doctor or some kind of training position. They expressed concern for me and were hopeful that I would get myself out of trouble and back to being a "real" lawyer. I had to explain that I was a "real" lawyer and that I took this position very seriously. I wanted to prove to clients, colleagues, and mainly to myself that I could accomplish this goal. I also knew it would be a good opportunity to refresh my knowledge about criminal law as well.

Q: How did you prepare for the examination?

I read Chapters 14, 15, 15A, and 20 of the North Carolina General Statutes. I also reviewed materials from several continuing legal education courses. The School of Government has a wealth of outstanding information available online, and I certainly took advantage of those resources. As an assistant public defender I worked mainly on high-level felonies, including robberies and sex offense cases. I viewed having to study as a great opportunity to re-learn some items I had forgotten. I especially reviewed recent case law and spent time examining subjects I did not routinely encounter in my daily work.

Q: Has certification been helpful to your practice?

The certification has shown others that this is a target that can be achieved. One of my personal goals moving forward is to promote certification within the public service arena. I believe that it is critical to our judicial system to retain qualified lawyers in both public defender and prosecutorial positions, as well as those working for Legal Aid. Many of the lawyers that I work with are [de facto] specialists in their area and deserve, not only a monetary raise, but a high level of recognition for their dedication. Board certification is one way to provide this recognition, and hopefully to encourage and inspire them to continue their public service.

I am so pleased to learn that the Board of Legal Specialization recently launched a new program with NC LEAF [Lawyers Education Assistance Foundation, ncleaf.org] to provide financial scholarships to cover the certification application fees for state prosecutors, public defenders, and non-profit public service attorneys. I think this type of program and the John R. Justice program [ncleaf.org/content/john-r-justice-jrj-program-summary] are critical components to retaining quality public defenders and prosecutors. For the past few years, pay increases have been few and far between for these lawyers. Therefore, every little bit helps to recognize their dedication.

Q: How does certification benefit your clients?

Few ways exist to distinguish yourself as a dedicated and competent lawyer. Certification is one way that I can demonstrate to my clients what this practice means to me, and give them the comfort that they have been assigned a "real" lawyer. As the public defender for Pitt County, I have built an office of good and knowledgeable employees who have a calling for this work. I want all of our clients to recognize the quality and commitment of their attorneys.

Q: Are there any hot topics in your specialty area right now?

One of the biggest issues in criminal law right now involves the collateral consequences associated with a conviction, such as in domestic violence cases, DWIs, and sex offenses. Our work as public defenders encompasses all of these areas. DWI law has become so complicated—with the consequences for clients being so serious—that it really takes a specialist's depth of knowledge and experience to be able to understand and properly manage all of the issues involved. Other hot topics include immigration ramifications and the possible upcoming change in juvenile delinquency laws. If the juvenile age is indeed raised in certain cases, more proceedings will be handled in juvenile court, which will significantly increase the demand for specialists in juvenile delinquency law.

Q: Is certification important in your practice area?

Certification is extremely important in criminal law. The more information made available to the public, the better. In general, clients today have greater access to information, thereby enabling them to make informed choices. However, I, as a public defender, am appointed to represent my

Kemp

Resolution of Appreciation for Jeri L. Whitfield

WHEREAS, the North Carolina State Bar Board of Legal Specialization desires to recognize the services of JERI L. WHITFIELD and her contribution to the specialization program of the North Carolina State Bar; and

WHEREAS, Jeri's exemplary statewide reputation as a workers' compensation defense lawyer led to her appointment by the board to the initial Workers' Compensation Law Specialty Committee where she served for six years; the committee was charged with the development of the standards for the specialty and the drafting of the first workers' compensation law specialty examination; and, although specialty certification in this practice area may appear to be more advantageous to plaintiffs' lawyers than to defense lawyers, Jeri became a champion for board certification, recognizing the significance of a workers' compensation law specialty to the public and to the professional development of all workers' compensation lawyers; and

WHEREAS, Jeri became one of the first board certified specialists in workers' compensation law in 1997; and

WHEREAS, as a member of the Board of Legal Specialization from 2006 to 2014, Jeri gave unselfishly of her time and talent—over the course of nine years, missing only one board meeting; Jeri's personal experience with certification helped the board to make informed policy decisions about the certification and recertification of lawyers, the allocation of resources, the employment of the board's first psychometrician, and the development of new areas of specialty, including elder law; and

WHEREAS, as a member of numerous board committees and review panels, Jeri heard complex appeals from denials of certification and recertification, and, as a consequence of her experience with difficult appeals, she was appointed to chair a committee that studied and then overhauled the board's hearing and appeal rules, thereby increasing the clarity, transparency, and fairness of the process; and

WHEREAS, as chair of the board from 2011 to 2014, Jeri led the development of new and unique specialties in practice areas that are important to the consuming public; to wit: appellate practice—for which she enlisted the support of law partner, former Chief Justice James Exum—juvenile delinquency law, and trademark law; and she oversaw the twenty-fifth anniversary of the North Carolina State Bar's specialization program; and

WHEREAS, Jeri's consummate professionalism, thoughtful and diplomatic approach to difficult issues, championship of the specialization staff, and unwavering support of board certification for lawyers as the hallmark of professionalism, will be missed by the members of the board, by the specialization staff, and by the members of the bar;

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED BY THE NORTH CAROLINA BOARD OF LEGAL SPECIALIZATION:

That the members of the board hereby express their appreciation and gratitude to JERI L. WHITFIELD for her outstanding devotion and service on the North Carolina State Bar Board of Legal Specialization.

client. Therefore, the client has no choice in their attorney, which makes certification even more important in developing a high level of trust and comfort between the attorney and client.

Q: How does certification benefit the profession?

Certification builds trust and credibility with the clients, which in turn benefits the profession. It also creates a collegiality among peers, including adversaries, as it promotes a focus on professional practice rather than monetary gain. Anything we can do as lawyers to further our knowledge and hone our skills will also improve the practice of criminal law for all involved.

Q: How do you see the future of specialization?

I think the program will continue to expand as more attorneys will see it becoming almost a necessity. Providing a legal specialty certification program is one way that the State Bar shows the public that it is making an investment in the continuing education and growth of attorneys. ■

For more information on the State Bar's specialization program, visit us online at nclawspecialists.gov. To donate to the NC Leaf Scholarship Fund, please send a check to: NC LEAF - Specialization Scholarship, 217 E. Edenton Street, Raleigh, NC 27601.

NO MORE THAN 24!

Please return every phone call, email or other form of communication from a client within 24 hours. The number one complaint against lawyers each year at the NC State Bar is, "my lawyer will not return my phone calls or communications." We can end these complaints—it will just take a little effort.

—Mel Wright
Executive Director, The Chief Justice's
Commission on Professionalism

The Price We Pay as Professional Problem Solvers

BY ROBYNN MORAITES

Most of us decided to go to law school because we had a passion for justice and helping people. While we may not think of the legal profession as a traditional helping profession like we typically think of social work, the reality is that we serve in a primary helping capacity. Clients are in distress, enough so that they have elected to pay someone (a lawyer) to help them fix the problem or help them achieve the best (or more often, the least bad) outcome.

When we help a client fix a problem or reach a desired outcome, we often feel a strong sense of personal and professional achievement and satisfaction. Researchers call that experience “compassion satisfaction.” Compassion satisfaction is crucially important because it sustains us through the bad days—the days when we don’t achieve the desired outcome or when a client has no viable good options. For many of us, much of our career is spent assisting people in terribly difficult situations, and our ability to effect real change or outcomes is far more limited than we ever imagined it would be.

With the ever increasing specialization of the profession, today most lawyers deal with a very high volume of the same kind of client distress day in and day out. It is not uncommon, for example, for a workers’ comp lawyer to have anywhere from 250-400 open cases at one time. With a high case load and nonstop exposure to the same type of client distress, over the course of a career the bad days can begin to outweigh the good ones. When that happens, we may develop a condition known as compassion fatigue. If left unaddressed, compassion fatigue can lead to secondary trauma and burn out.

Compassion fatigue is defined as the cumulative physical/emotional/psychological effects of continual exposure to traumatic or distressing stories/events when working in a helping capacity where demands outweigh resources. The two largest factors that contribute to developing compassion fatigue are 1) high volume of workload and 2) exposure to client distress and trauma. Unfortunately, all the best legal training in the world cannot turn off our mirror neurons, which exist in that highly-evolved part of our brain that responds neurologically/emotionally to other people’s distress as an involuntary response (even when we might not have any conscious awareness of an emotional response). The symptoms of compassion fatigue can often mimic those of depression or anxiety, but there are a few key differences (and depression and anxiety are often symptoms of compassion fatigue).

Behavioral symptoms:

- absenteeism from work
- anger and irritability with coworkers, clients, opposing counsel, judges, family, and friends
- indecisiveness; an impaired ability to make decisions
- avoidance of clients in general or certain clients
- lack of diligence in work performed
- no longer finding enjoyment in hobbies and activities that used to be pleasurable
- avoidant behavior at home (e.g. watching too much TV, reading, online gaming, and not interacting with family or friends).

Psychological symptoms:

- emotional exhaustion
- intrusive thoughts (like flashbacks to evidence in an old case when one is at home, or a sense of dread of something bad happening to one’s family or children)
- heightened sense of anxiety and fear
- sleep disturbance at night and fatigue during the day
- loss of appetite
- cynicism (loss of empathy; loss of faith in humanity)

- sense of isolation or alienation from others (for example, either intentionally distancing from friends and family or simply feeling isolated in a group—“When I get home, I feel like I am from another planet because of what I saw today at work.”)

- physical complaints (headaches, stomach problems, TMJ, back problems, etc.)
- helplessness
- dread of seeing certain clients.

When one moves beyond compassion fatigue into secondary trauma and burnout, symptoms are more severe. In secondary trauma, the lawyer or judge has developed a post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) response to the day-to-day activities needed in his or her job and in life. The PTSD response results not from some personal trauma the lawyer once suffered, but from the vicarious trauma he or she is exposed to when helping clients.

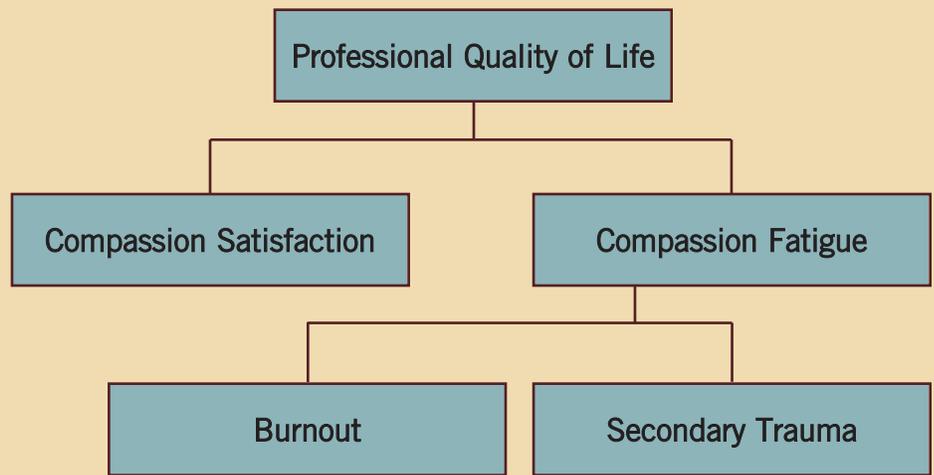

Judges in particular are at risk for developing compassion fatigue, especially district court judges. And lawyers in these practice areas are considered particularly at risk for developing compassion fatigue:

- criminal law
- family law
- personal injury and workers’ comp law
- medical malpractice law
- personal bankruptcy
- wills, trusts, and estates.

In good news, compassion fatigue can often be treated largely through awareness and lifestyle choices. The problem, of course, is that many of us are entrenched in how we operate on a day-to-day basis, and some of these lifestyle suggestions seem unattainable. The LAP has helped so many lawyers bring their lives back into balance who are suffering from compassion fatigue.

Listed below are some suggestions that at first blush might seem minor, but have the greatest impact.

- Rigorous exercise three to four times a week. Our bodies and brains store a great deal of pent-up energy from the stresses we encounter in work and life. Regular exercise does more than release endorphins, although that is a great benefit. I am a big advocate of hot yoga. As one client reports, “It takes all the fight right out of you.” Another client who was suffering from compassion fatigue reported, “If I hit two hot yoga classes a week I seem to be fine. When I skip a week I start to derail pretty quickly.” Running, long distance cycling, swimming, triathlons, vinyasa (power) yoga or hot yoga, Zumba, or other aerobic classes are all viable options. Anything that moves your heart rate into a 65-85% of max range will work—it needn’t be a high impact activity.

By Beth Hudnall Stamm PhD, et. al.

- Finding ways to laugh and have real fun and connection. Our emotional balance in life depends in part on the stimulus hitting our mirror neurons. When you recall times you felt really connected to someone or a group of people, there was something very positive happening in your brain. That felt sense of connection is an important tool for emotional resilience. Sometimes a belly laugh that brings tears to our eyes is more restorative than two years of talk therapy. So find people who make you laugh and to whom you feel a deep sense of connection and spend time with them.

- Resume or develop hobbies. Usually as work and time demands increase, the first thing we abandon are hobbies and activities that seemingly serve no useful purpose. These activities are precisely the kinds of things that restore emotional resilience. Doing something you enjoy simply because you enjoy it balances the chemistry in your brain and goes a long way toward balancing our perspective when faced with difficulties. Find those things you abandoned—or those things you’ve always wanted to do but have never gotten around to doing—and begin to incorporate them into your life.

- Begin to develop some form of a mindfulness or meditation practice. These practices help foster big-picture perspective and separate us, just a little bit, from our emotional reactions to situations. As we get more skilled in learning to step back emotionally and noticing our reactions, those reactions have less power to dictate our behavior. We learn to pause when agitated or doubtful instead of reacting to the agitation or doubt.

Compassion fatigue symptoms are normal displays of stress resulting from the problem solving and caregiving work we perform on a regular basis. While the symptoms can be at first subtle if not addressed, they can eventually become disruptive to both our work and home life. An awareness of the symptoms and their negative effects can lead to positive change, personal transformation, and a new emotional resilience. Reaching a point where we each realize we have control over our own life choices takes some time, dedication, and hard work. There is no magic involved. There is only a commitment to make our lives the best they can be. ■

Robynn Moraites is the director of the North Carolina Lawyer Assistance Program.

The North Carolina Lawyer Assistance Program is a confidential program of assistance for all North Carolina lawyers, judges, and law students, which helps address problems of stress, depression, alcoholism, addiction, or other problems that may lead to impairing a lawyer’s ability to practice. If you would like more information, go to nclap.org or call: Cathy Killian (for Charlotte and areas west) at 704-910-2310, Towanda Garner (in the Piedmont area) at 919-719-9290, or Robynn Moraites (for Raleigh and down east) at 704-892-5699.

Celebrating Certified Paralegals

BY JOY BELK

On May 2, 2014, the North Carolina State Bar Board of Paralegal Certification held an event to honor North Carolina certified paralegals (CPs) and to express appreciation to CPs for their contributions to the new North Carolina State Bar headquarters. The event was held at the new headquarters and consisted of a free three-hour continuing paralegal education (CPE) program followed by a catered reception. Over 200 guests attended the event.

Shelby Benton of Benton Family Law, a NC State Bar councilor from the 8th Judicial District and current member of the Board of Paralegal Certification, presented at the CPE program. Ms. Benton, a certified family law specialist who practices in Wayne County, provided an overview of social media and how it can be used by paralegals to help lawyers investigate cases, discover electronic evidence, and better represent their clients. Attorney Ketan P. Soni provided ed materials for the presentation.

NC State Bar Foundation Chair John McMillan and NC State Bar Board of Paralegal Certification Chair G. Gray Wilson.

Patricia F. Clapper, ACP, NCCP, made a presentation on “Patti’s Wonderful Websites for Paralegals.” Ms. Clapper is a paralegal for Levine & Stewart in Chapel Hill and currently serves on the Board of Paralegal Certification. She is also the current president of the North Carolina Paralegal Association and an adjunct professor for the paralegal certificate program at Central Piedmont Carolina Community College.

Alice Neece Mine presented the ethics portion of the CPE program. Ms. Mine is the assistant executive director of the North Carolina State Bar. In this capacity she is staff counsel to the Ethics Committee and director of the Board of Paralegal Certification.

After the CPE presentations, board chair Gray Wilson welcomed the certified paralegals and recognized NC State Bar officers, former and present members of the Board of Paralegal Certification, members of the Paralegal Certification Committee,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 35

Income Outlook Remains Bleak for Near Future

Income

Unfortunately, we must report that the income from IOLTA accounts continues to decrease as many banks are recertifying their comparability rates at lower levels. In 2013, income from IOLTA accounts declined by 9% and was under $2 million for the second year in a row, which had not previously happened since 1994. However, our total income, which received a boost from two cy pres awards during 2013 totaling over $650,000, was $2.4 million. Income from participant accounts through the first quarter of 2014 decreased by another 5%.

Grants

Current Grants. Beginning with 2010 grants, we have limited our grant making to a core group of (mainly) legal aid providers. Even with that restriction and using over $2.5 million in reserve funds, grants have dramatically decreased (by over 40%). For 2013, we were able to keep grants steady at the 2012 level of $2.3 million without using any additional funds from reserve because of a large cy pres award received in 2012. We were also able to add funds to our reserve, bringing it to just under $1 million. The reserve funds and the additional income from cy pres awards received in 2013 allowed the trustees to keep grants steady at $2.3 million again for 2014, although we are taking $215,000 from reserve for that purpose.

Grant Software. For the 2015 grant cycle we will implement new grant software that is already in use in three large IOLTA programs in other states. The new software will allow applicants to apply online and submit all necessary documents through the system, and allow staff and trustees to review applications through the system. Further, all narrative and statistical reporting and tracking of grantee outcomes will occur within the system, allowing staff to generate reports on program impacts efficiently. The initial $16,000 cost of purchasing and implementing the software is being supported by two grants totaling $9,000 from the Chief Justice's Commission on Professionalism and the NC Equal Access to Justice Commission.

Though in difficult times, NC IOLTA reaches its 30th year in 2014. NC State Bar officers and IOLTA trustees recognized the milestone at the April board dinner. Edward C. Winslow III, John B. McMillan, Janice M. Cole, Michael A. Colombo (chair), Freeman Edward Broadwell Jr., (vice-chair), Hope H. Connell, Charles E. Burgin, E. Fitzgerald Parnell, and Linda M. McGee.

State Funds

In addition to its own funds, NC IOLTA administers the state funding for legal aid on behalf of the NC State Bar. Total state funding distributed for the 2013 calendar year was $3.5 million, decreased from just under $6 million in 2008 due to reductions to both the appropriated funds and the filing fee allocations. The state budget adjustments for 2014-15 eliminated the appropriation for legal aid work (currently $671,250). Though the proposed Senate budget had also eliminated the Access to Civil Justice funding from court fees (~$1.8 million), that funding was continued in the final budget, with significant additional reporting requirements for Legal Aid of NC. The Equal Access to Justice Commission and the NCBA continue to work to sustain and improve the funding for legal aid.

IOLTA Leadership

The State Bar Council appointed Ed Broadwell and Charles Burgin as chair and vice-chair of the NC IOLTA Board of Trustees for 2014-15. Broadwell is retired chairman and CEO of Home Trust Bank in Asheville, and has served on the board of the American Bankers Association (2007-09) and the NC Bankers Association (1976-78 and 1980-82), including serving in 1980-81 as chair. Burgin, a former NC Bar Association president, is retired from private practice in Marion. Both have served as NC IOLTA trustees for a number of years, and their continuity and knowledge of the NC IOLTA program and its grantees will be particularly valuable

CONTINUED ON PAGE 36

Lawyers Receive Professional Discipline

Disbarments

Donald Lively of Raleigh surrendered his law license and was disbarred by the State Bar Council. Lively was administratively suspended in 2010 for failing to attend mandatory continuing legal education. During the suspension he practiced law, collected fees, and misrepresented his professional status to the court, other attorneys, his clients, and third parties.

Susan E. Mako, formerly of Wilmington, was disbarred by the DHC. The DHC concluded that Mako misappropriated and grossly mishandled entrusted funds, did not pay taxes, and abandoned her law practice.

Richard Z. Polidi of Raleigh surrendered his law license and was disbarred by the Wake County Superior Court. Polidi received approximately $16,000 in settlement for a client. Although Polidi knew his client had assigned the right to those funds to a third party, he used the entrusted funds for his own benefit and for the benefit of the client without the third party's authorization.

Suspensions & Stayed Suspensions

The DHC suspended William T. Batchelor of Wilmington for three years. The DHC found that Batchelor charged and collected a clearly excessive amount for expenses and mismanaged his trust account in a variety of ways. After serving one year of the suspension, Batchelor may apply for a stay of the balance upon compliance with numerous conditions.

George Rexford (Rex) Gore of Shallotte is a former elected district attorney. Gore agreed to increase an assistant district attorney's compensation by approving false travel reimbursement claims the ADA submitted to the Administrative Office of the Courts. He approved 63 travel claims totaling over $14,000 for mileage the ADA did not incur. Gore pled guilty to the misdemeanor offense of Willful Failure to Discharge Duties. The DHC suspended Gore for four years. Gore received credit toward the satisfaction of the four-year suspension for the time since the court suspended his law license in August 2013. After serving two years of the suspension, Gore may apply for a stay of the balance upon compliance with numerous conditions.

In 2012, Roydera Hackworth of Greensboro was suspended by the DHC. Before she was suspended, Hackworth engaged in the unauthorized practice of law by representing her nephew in a personal injury case in Alabama, where she was not licensed. After she was suspended by the DHC, Hackworth continued representing her nephew. She also made misrepresentations to the Grievance Committee. The DHC suspended Hackworth for five years. The suspension runs concurrently with the suspension imposed in 12 DHC 3.

Mary Susan Phillips of Wallace neglected numerous clients and did not respond to notices from the clerk of court to file estate accountings. The DHC suspended her for three years. After serving nine months of the suspension, Phillips may apply for a stay of the balance upon compliance with numerous conditions.

Asheville attorney Julia Leigh Sitton pled guilty to misdemeanor obstruction of justice. Sitton was an employee of the Bev Perdue campaign. Sitton agreed that a campaign contributor could pay her an extra $2,000 per month through a purported consulting contract under which Sitton did not actually provide any consulting services to the contributor. This arrangement allowed the contributor to exceed the limit on allowable campaign contributions under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 163-278.13 and allowed the campaign to avoid reporting the payments on campaign finance reports required by N.C. Gen. Stat. § 163-278.8 and § 163-278.11. The DHC suspended Sitton's law license for three years. After serving one year of the suspension, Sitton may apply for a stay of the balance upon compliance with enumerated conditions. Sitton received credit for the time she voluntarily abstained from the practice of law following her conviction.

Censures

Ronald E. Cooley of Hillsborough was censured by the Grievance Committee. Cooley failed to attend a deposition for his client, did not communicate with his client about discovery requests, did not comply with discovery obligations, did not ensure proper service on an opposing party, and made false statements to his client.

The Rowan County District Court censured Tiffany Dawn Russell of Durham. The court concluded that Russell engaged in unprofessional behavior and willfully failed to

Don't Miss Important State Bar Communications

Log on to nbar.gov to make sure we have your email address.

comply with Rule 12 of the General Rules of Practice for the Superior and District Courts. Russell gave notice of appeal.

Reprimands

Thomas D. Blue Jr. of Raleigh was reprimanded by the Grievance Committee. Blue was assigned by his law firm to supervise a nonattorney assistant's trust account record keeping. Because Blue failed to ensure the assistant was conducting proper reconciliations, the firm did not discover an error on a client ledger that occurred in November 2010. As a result of the undiscovered error, the firm over disbursed to the client 14 months later. The firm finally discovered the original error and the overdisbursement in August 2013. The Grievance Committee recognized several mitigating factors.

The Grievance Committee reprimanded Kristen Comerford, formerly of Winston-Salem. Comerford made false entries in document review software and a timekeeping system to exaggerate her billable hours.

Mark Jetton of Raleigh was reprimanded by the Grievance Committee. Jetton's direct solicitation letters contained false and misleading statements, promised results that could not be guaranteed, and compared his services to those of other lawyers.

The Grievance Committee reprimanded Christopher Lane of Clemmons. Lane agreed to serve as "Of Counsel" to a foreign law firm and facilitated the firm's unauthorized practice of law in North Carolina. Lane also made false or misleading statements to a client of the foreign firm.

The Grievance Committee reprimanded Raleigh lawyer W. Andrew LeLiever. LeLiever did not timely comply with bankruptcy court orders, did not appear at court hearings regarding his noncompliance, and told the bankruptcy trustee that he would not pay over funds in his possession that belonged to the bankruptcy estate without a court order. LeLiever also committed a number of trust account violations, including failing to reconcile his trust account quarterly, failing to maintain client ledgers, commingling his own funds with entrusted funds, and using improper methods to disburse funds from his trust account.

Jennifer Moore of Asheville was reprimanded by the Grievance Committee. Moore made misleading statements to the State Bar, neglected her client's interests, and did not take appropriate steps to protect the client's interests when she withdrew from representation.

The Grievance Committee reprimanded Claire J. Samuels of Charlotte, who argued the merits of her client's case in emails to the judge and her clerk.

Antoinette Van-Riel of Winston-Salem was reprimanded by the Grievance Committee. Van-Riel charged clearly excessive fees, did not communicate with her client, did not participate in the State Bar's mandatory fee dispute resolution program, and did not respond to the Grievance Committee.

Karen Wright of Shelby was reprimanded by the Grievance Committee. Wright neglected her duty to settle the estates of her clients' parents, did not keep the beneficiaries reasonably informed about the statuses of the estates, and did not promptly comply with the beneficiaries' reasonable requests for information.

Reinstatements

Douglas T. Simons of Durham surrendered his law license and was disbarred by the State Bar Council on April 15, 2005. Simons admitted that he misappropriated at least $300,000. On March 27, 2014, a panel of the DHC recommended that his petition for reinstatement be denied. Simons' appeal to the State Bar Council is pending.

In November 2007, Ralph T. Bryant of Newport surrendered his law license and was disbarred by the DHC for misappropriating entrusted funds totaling $64,847. Bryant petitioned for reinstatement. On June 12, 2014, a panel of the DHC announced its finding that Bryant had reformed, but that his reinstatement would be detrimental to the integrity and standing of the bar, the administration of justice, or to the public's interest and recommended that his petition for reinstatement be denied. An order has not yet been entered. ■ and members of the Item Writers Committee in attendance. He also recognized John McMillan, chair of the North Carolina State Bar Foundation, and other members of the foundation in attendance. Prior to the construction of the new State Bar headquarters, the foundation was created to receive donations of funds for the enhancement of the new building. That initiative was kickstarted in 2009 when the Board of Paralegal Certification, upon the recommendation of the paralegal members of the board, gave half a million dollars for the construction of the building.

Paralegals (cont.)

Mr. McMillan presented Mr. Wilson and the Paralegal Certification Program with a beautiful memory book that chronicles the construction of the new headquarters. Champagne glasses were passed and a toast was made in appreciation of certified paralegals for their dedication to and financial support of the State Bar.

After the toast, everyone was treated to a catered reception. The decorations and food were provided by Savory Fare of Durham. Guests were given tours of the new building and art collection. The tour ended with a visit to the first floor "Members Suite" where a plaque commemorating the contribution to the building hangs. The reception provided the opportunity for seasoned and newly certified paralegals to network and visit with old and new friends. It was a memorable and successful event. ■

Joy Belk is the assistant director of the Paralegal Certification Program.

Top Tips on Trust Accounting: Trust Account Reconciliation Sheet & Instructions

BY PETER BOLAC

On the next page you will find a Trust Account Reconciliation Sheet, which was designed to assist lawyers with their quarterly three-way reconciliations. Rule 1.15-3(d)(1) requires that lawyers complete a three-way reconciliation at least quarterly; however, the State Bar recommends that lawyers perform this task on a monthly basis. We have designed these instructions to make it as simple and clear as possible to complete your reconciliation. The numbers and sections in these instructions correspond to the numbers and sections on the reconciliation sheet.

Instructions

General Information

You will note that you must complete a separate form for each trust account. Many lawyers encounter problems because they try to combine all entrusted funds into one reconciliation regardless of whether they are held in separate accounts. You must also attach the listed documents in order for this to be a proper three-way reconciliation.

Reconciliation of Lawyer's Trust Account Records

1. Enter the total of positive client ledger balances as of the cut-off date on the bank statement. This includes any administrative funds ledger or firm funds ledger that you maintain to service the account. Do not include balances that are negative. If a client ledger shows a negative balance, check the box. On another page, explain the reason for the negative balance and show your corrective action.

2. List the balance shown on your general ledger/checkbook register as of the cut-off date on the bank statement. Using the same cut-off date on all documents is imperative to avoid mismatched numbers.

Bank Statement Reconciliation

3. List the ending balance as shown on the bank statement. On the next line list the deposits that have yet to appear on the bank statement (probably because they were made at the end of the month). You should provide a list of these outstanding deposits and note the number of these deposits in the provided line. Do the same for outstanding/uncleared checks. Take this time to examine the list of outstanding checks and to investigate why those checks have not cleared.

4. Add the outstanding deposits to the ending balance and subtract the outstanding checks to find your Subtotal.

5. This section is provided for lawyers to explain any necessary adjustments to their reconciliation. Adjustments might be required if, for example, you identify bank errors in your review of the bank statement. Adjustments that are made to balances must be explained with documentation.

6. Your Adjusted Trust Account Bank Balance is your Subtotal plus or minus any necessary adjustments listed in Section 5.

7. The balances listed in Sections 1, 2, and 6 should all agree. If they are different, attach an explanation and show how this imbalance has been corrected. The person who completed the reconciliation should sign the form, as well as the lawyer who reviewed the reconciliation and supporting documents. Save this reconciliation for six years as required in Rule 1.15-3.

If you have any questions about this form (or would like a PDF copy) or any other trust accounting issue, please contact Peter Bolac at (919) 450-7860 or Pbolac@ncbar.gov. Follow Peter on Twitter @TrustAccountNC for alerts on trust account scams.

Random Audits

Districts randomly selected for audit in the 3rd quarter are District 15A (Alamance County) and District 23 (Alleghany, Ashe, Wilkes, and Yadkin Counties). ■

Peter Bolac is the State Bar's district bar liaison and trust account compliance counsel.

IOLTA Update (cont.)

in these roles.

The council also appointed three trustees. John McMillan was reappointed to a second three-year term, and Betty Quick and Sid Eagles were appointed as new trustees replacing outgoing trustees Linda M. McGee and Hope H. Connell.

- John B. McMillan is in private practice in Raleigh. He currently serves on the Equal Access to Justice Commission. During his service as NC State Bar president in 2008-2009, he made it a priority to increase IOLTA income by implementing comparability, and he had earlier supported moving NC IOLTA to a mandatory program as a NCSB officer and councilor. His knowledge of the State Bar, the IOLTA program, and the legal aid community is extremely valuable to our program.

- Elizabeth L. Quick is in private practice in Winston-Salem. Through her work with a number of charitable organizations and foundations, she has strong knowledge of and interest in philanthropy. She is a past-president of the North Carolina Bar Association, 1997-98.

- Sidney S. Eagles Jr. is in private practice in Raleigh. From 1983 to 2004 he served first as a judge and later as chief judge of the North Carolina Court of Appeals. He has also served as counsel to the speaker of the house and as a special deputy attorney general. He will bring valuable judicial perspective to the board. ■

Amendments Pending Approval of the Supreme Court

At its meetings on April 25, 2014, and July 25, 2014, the council of the North Carolina State Bar voted to adopt the following rule amendments for transmission to the North Carolina Supreme Court for approval (for the complete text see the Spring 2014 and Summer 2014 editions of the Journal or visit the State Bar website):

Proposed Amendments to the Procedures for Reinstatement from Inactive Status and Administrative Suspension

27 N.C.A.C. 1D, Section .0900, Procedures for Administrative Committee

The proposed amendments eliminate the three different CLE requirements for reinstatement from inactive status and administrative suspension in favor of one standard that applies to all petitioners for reinstatement without regard to when the petitioner was transferred to inactive or suspended status; make March 10, 2011, the effective date for the requirement of passage of the bar exam if a petitioner was administratively suspended for seven years or more; and permit a member to take up to 6.0 CLE credits per year online to satisfy the requirements for reinstatement from inactive status and administrative suspension.

Proposed Amendment to the Rules Governing the Administration of the CLE Program

27 N.C.A.C. 1D, Section .1500, Rules Governing the Administration of the Continuing Legal Education Program

The proposed amendment requires a lawyer to be a nonresident for at least six consecutive months in a given year to qualify for the nonresident exemption from mandatory CLE.

Proposed Amendments to the Standards for Certification as a Specialist

27 N.C.A.C. 1D, Section .2500, Certification Standards for the Criminal Law Specialty, and 27 N.C.A.C. 1D, Section .2600, Certification Standards for the

Immigration Law Specialty

The proposed amendments to the standards for the criminal law specialty reduce the number of opposing counsel and judges that must be listed as peer references on an application for certification in criminal law.

The proposed amendments to the standards for the immigration law specialty clarify that CLE courses on topics related to immigration law may be used to satisfy the CLE requirements for certification and recertification, and require four peer references to be from lawyers or judges who have substantial experience in immigration law.

Proposed Amendments to the Rules of Professional Conduct

27 N.C.A.C. 2, The Rules of Professional Conduct

In 2012 and 2013 the American Bar Association (ABA) amended the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct to address issues relative to outsourcing, lawyer mobility, and advances in technology. Following study by a special committee of the State Bar Council, similar proposed amendments to 13 of the North Carolina Rules of Professional Conduct (the NC Rules) were approved for publication by the council on January 24, 2014. An executive summary and the proposed rule amendments can be viewed in the Spring 2014 edition of the Journal and on the State Bar website (ncbar.gov/PDFs/Ethics_20-20.pdf).

Previously, at a meeting on October 25, 2013, the council voted to adopt amendments to Rule 1.17 and Rule 7.3 of the NC Rules, unrelated to the ABA amendments, for transmission to the North Carolina Supreme Court for approval (see the Fall 2013 edition of the Journal or visit the State Bar website). However, at its meeting on January 24, 2014, the council decided that all pending proposed amendments to the NC Rules should be submitted to the Supreme Court at one time. Therefore, proposed amendments to the following North Carolina Rules of Professional Conduct have been approved for transmission to the Supreme Court (proposed amendments to the title of a rule are noted):

Rule 1.0, Terminology

Rule 1.1, Competence

Rule 1.4, Communication

Rule 1.6, Confidentiality of Information

Rule 1.17, Sale of a Law Practice

Rule 1.18, Duties to Prospective Client

Rule 4.4, Respect for Rights of Third Persons

Rule 5.3, Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer ~~Assistants~~ Assistance

Rule 5.5, Unauthorized Practice of Law; Multijurisdictional Practice of Law

Rule 7.1, Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services

Rule 7.2, Advertising

Rule 7.3, ~~Direct Contact with Potential Solicitation of Clients~~

Rule 8.3, Disciplinary Authority; Choice of Law

Proposed Amendments to the Rules of the Board of Law Examiners

Rules Governing Admission to the Practice of Law in the State of North Carolina, Section .0100, Organization

Proposed amendments to Rules Governing Admission to the Practice of Law change the street and mailing address listed for the offices of the Board of Law Examiners to reflect the board's recent move to a new location.

The Process

Proposed amendments to the Rules of the North Carolina State Bar are published for comment in the Journal. They are considered for adoption by the council at the succeeding quarterly meeting. If adopted, they are submitted to the North Carolina Supreme Court for approval. Amendments become effective upon approval by the Court. Unless otherwise noted, proposed additions to rules are printed in bold and underlined; deletions are interlined.

Proposed Amendments

At its meeting on July 25, 2014, the council voted to publish the following proposed rule amendments for comment from the members of the bar:

Proposed Amendments to the Discipline and Disability Rules

27 N.C.A.C. 1B, Section .0100, Discipline and Disability of Attorneys

To better identify the program's purpose, the proposed amendments change the name of the Trust Accounting Supervisory Program to the Trust Account Compliance Program. There are no changes to the substance of the rule other than the name change.

.0112 Investigations: Initial Determination; Notice and Response; Committee Referrals

(a) Investigation Authority

...

(k) Referral to Trust Accounting ~~Supervisory Compliance~~ Program

(1) If, at any time before a finding of probable cause, the Grievance Committee determines that the alleged misconduct is primarily attributable to the respondent's failure to employ sound trust accounting techniques, the committee may offer the respondent an opportunity to voluntarily participate in the State Bar's ~~Trust Account Supervisory Compliance~~ Program for up to two years before the committee considers discipline.

If the respondent accepts the committee's offer to participate in the ~~supervisory compliance~~ program, the respondent must fully cooperate with the Trust Account Compliance Counsel...

(2) Completion of Trust Account ~~Supervisory Compliance~~ Program

...

(3) The committee will not refer to the program any case involving possible misappropriation of entrusted funds, criminal conduct, dishonesty, fraud, misrepresentation, or deceit, or any other case the committee deems inappropriate for referral...Referral to the Trust Accounting ~~Supervisory Compliance~~ Program is not a defense to allegations that a lawyer misappropriated entrusted funds, engaged in criminal conduct, or engaged in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, misrepresentation, or deceit, and it does not immunize a lawyer from the disciplinary consequences of such conduct.

Proposed Amendments to the Rules Governing the Administration of the CLE Program

27 N.C.A.C. 1D, Section .1500, Rules Governing the Administration of the Continuing Legal Education Program

The proposed amendments change the name of the mandatory CLE program for new lawyers from "Professionalism for New Admittees" to "Professionalism for New Attorneys" (PNA Program), and permit the Board of Continuing Education to approve alternative timeframes for the PNA Program, which will give CLE providers more flexibility to be creative in their presentations of the program.

.1518 Continuing Legal Education Program

(a) Annual Requirement

...

(c) Professionalism Requirement for New Members.

Except as provided in paragraph (d)(1), each active member admitted to the North Carolina State Bar after January 1, 2011, must complete the North Carolina State Bar Professionalism for New ~~Admittees~~ Attorneys Program (PNA Program) in the year the member is first required to meet the continuing legal education requirements as set forth in Rule .1526(b) and (c) of this subchapter. CLE credit for the PNA Program shall be applied to the annual mandatory continuing legal education requirements set forth in paragraph (a) above.

(1) Content and Accreditation. The State Bar PNA Program shall consist of 12 hours of training in subjects designated by the State

...

(2) Evaluation ...

(3) ~~Format~~ Timetable and Partial Credit. The PNA Program shall be pre-ented in two six-hour blocks (with appropriate breaks) over two days. The six-hour blocks do not have to be attended on consecutive days or taken from the same provider; however, no partial credit shall be awarded for attending less than an entire six-hour block unless a special circumstances exemption is granted by the board. The board may approve an alternative timetable for a PNA program upon demonstration by the provider that the alternative timetable will provide an enhanced learning experience or for other good cause; however, no partial credit shall be awarded for attending less than the entire 12-hour program unless a special circumstances exemption is granted by the board.

(4) Online and Prerecorded Programs.

The PNA Program may be distributed over the Internet by live web streaming (webcasting) but no part of the program may be taken online (via the Internet) on demand...

(d) Exemptions from Professionalism Requirement for New Members.

...

Proposed Amendments to Certification Standards for the Juvenile Delinquency Subspecialty

27 N.C.A.C. 1D, Section .2500, Certification Standards for the Criminal Law Specialty

The proposed amendments reduce the number of practice hours required to meet the "substantial involvement" criterion for the juvenile delinquency subspecialty and allow for additional forms of "practice equivalents." This will reflect more realistically the practice experience of qualified

Thank You to Our Meeting Sponsor

Thank you to Lawyers Mutual for sponsoring the July quarterly meeting.

juvenile delinquency practitioners, particularly in rural communities.

.2508 Standards for Certification as a Specialist in Juvenile Delinquency Law

Each applicant for certification as a specialist in juvenile delinquency law shall meet the minimum standards set forth in Rule .1720 of this subchapter. In addition, each applicant shall meet the following standards for certification:

(a) Licensure and Practice ...

(b) Substantial Involvement - An applicant shall affirm to the board that the applicant has experience through substantial involvement in the practice of juvenile delinquency law.

(1) Substantial involvement shall mean during the five years immediately preceding the application, the applicant devoted an average of at least ~~500~~ 400 hours a year to the practice of juvenile delinquency law, but not less than ~~400~~ 100 hours in any one year. "Practice" shall mean substantive legal work, specifically including representation of juveniles or the state in juvenile delinquency court, done primarily for the purpose of providing legal advice or representation, or a practice equivalent.

(2) "Practice equivalent" shall mean:

(A) ...
(B) ...

(C) Service as a law professor in a juvenile delinquency legal clinic at an accredited law school may be used to meet the requirement set forth in Rule .2508(b)(1).

(D) The practice of state criminal law may be used to meet the requirement set forth in Rule .2508(b)(1) but not to exceed 100 hours for any year during the five years. "Practice of state criminal law" shall mean substantive legal work representing adults or the state in the state's criminal district and superior courts

(3) ...

(b) Continuing Legal Education

...

Proposed Amendments to the Standards for Certification of Paralegals

27 N.C.A.C. 1G, Section .0100, The Plan for Certification of Paralegals

The proposed amendments permit a degree from a foreign educational institution to satisfy part of the educational requirements for certification if the foreign degree is evaluated by a qualified credential evaluation service and found to be equivalent to an associate's or bachelor's degree from an accredited US institution.

.0119 Standards for Certification of Paralegals

(a) To qualify for certification as a paralegal, an applicant must pay any required fee, and comply with the following standards:

(1) Education. The applicant must have earned one of the following:

(A) an associate's, bachelor's, or master's degree from a qualified paralegal studies program;

(B) a certificate from a qualified paralegal studies program and an associate's or bachelor's degree in any discipline from any institution of post-secondary education that is accredited by an accrediting body recognized by the United States Department of Education (an accredited US institution) or an equivalent degree from a foreign educational institution if the degree is determined to be equivalent to a degree from an accredited US institution by a organization that is a member of the National Association of Credential Evaluation Services (NACES) or the Association of International Credentials Evaluators (AICE) and ~~a certificate from a qualified paralegal studies program~~; or

(C) a juris doctorate degree from a law school accredited by the American Bar Association.

(2) Examination.

... ■

In Memoriam

Douglas E. Canders
Fayetteville, NC

John Fleming Carter III
Wilmington, NC

Leonor Ortiz Childers
Durham, NC

David McKenzie Clark
Greensboro, NC

William C. Connor
Greensboro, NC

John Wyatt Dickson
Fayetteville, NC

Wiley Edwin Gavin
Asheboro, NC

William Campbell Gray Jr.
Wilkesboro, NC

Fred A. Gregory
Durham, NC

Charles Franklin Griffin
Charlotte, NC

Robert Curtis Gunst Sr.
Waxhaw, NC

Alton Myles Haynes Jr.
Pineville, NC

Margaret McLean Faw Fonvielle
Heyward
Wilmington, NC

Clark Mason Holt
Reidsville, NC

William Horace Lewis Jr.
Farmville, NC

William F. Marshall Jr.
Danbury, NC

Thomas Hill Matthews
Rocky Mount, NC

Christy Eve Reid
Charlotte, NC

Archie Leak Smith
Asheboro, NC

Dow M. Spaulding
Greensboro, NC

Daniel Thomas Tillman
Wadesboro, NC

David H. Wagner Jr.
Winston-Salem, NC

Harold L. Waters
Jacksonville, NC

Laura Kay Zhao
Charlotte, NC

Committee Revisits Sending a NC Subpoena to a Records Custodian in Another Jurisdiction

Council Actions

At its meeting on July 25, 2014, the State Bar Council adopted the ethics opinions summarized below:

2013 Formal Ethics Opinion 8

Responding to the Mental Impairment of Firm Lawyer

Opinion analyzes the responsibilities of the partners and supervisory lawyers in a firm when another firm lawyer has a mental impairment.

2013 Formal Ethics Opinion 12

Disclosure of Settlement Terms to Former Lawyer Asserting a Claim for Fee Division

Opinion rules that, in a workers' compensation case, when a client terminates representation, pursuant to an applicable exception to the duty of confidentiality, the subsequently hired lawyer may disclose the settlement terms to the former lawyer to resolve a pre-litigation claim for fee division.

2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 4

Serving Subpoenas on Health Care Providers Covered by HIPAA

Opinion rules that a lawyer may send a subpoena for medical records to an entity covered by HIPAA without providing the assurances necessary for the entity to comply with the subpoena as set out in 45 C.F.R. § 164.512(e)(ii).

2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 5

Advising a Civil Litigation Client About Social Media

Opinion rules a lawyer must advise a client about information on social media if information and postings on social media are relevant and material to the client's representation. The lawyer may advise a client to remove information on social media if not spoliation or otherwise illegal.

2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 6

Duty to Avoid Conflicts When Advising Members of Nonprofit Organization

Opinion rules that a lawyer who provides free brief consultations to members of a nonprofit organization must still screen for conflicts prior to conducting a consultation.

Ethics Committee Actions

At its meeting on July 24, 2014, the Ethics Committee voted to send the following proposed opinion to a subcommittee for continued study: Proposed 2013 FEO 14, Representation of Parties to a Commercial Real Estate Loan Closing. The committee also voted to publish a proposed substitute opinion for 2013 FEO 2, Providing Defendant with Discovery During Representation, an opinion that was adopted by the State Bar Council on January 24, 2014. Although the committee declined to recommend withdrawal of the existing opinion at this time, it is publishing the proposed substitute opinion to garner comment from members of the bar. On page 46 the Legal Ethics column considers the competing concerns addressed in the adopted opinion and the proposed substitute opinion which are printed, in their entirety, after the article. The Ethics Committee also voted to publish a revised version of one proposed opinion and three new proposed opinions. The comments of readers on the proposed opinions are welcomed.

Proposed 2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 1 Protecting Confidential Client Information When Mentoring July 24, 2014

Proposed opinion examines issues relative to confidentiality and the attorney-client privilege when mentoring law students and lawyers.

Note: This opinion does not apply to law students certified pursuant to the Rules Governing the Practical Training of Law Students (27 N.C.A.C 1C, Section .0200) or to lawyers, employees, or law clerks (paid or volunteer) being mentored or supervised by a lawyer within the same firm. This opinion addresses issues pertaining to informal mentoring relationships between lawyers, or between a lawyer and a law student, as well as to established bar and/or law school mentoring programs. Mentoring relationships between a lawyer and a college or a high school student are not addressed by this opinion because such relationships require more restrictive measures due to these students' presumed inexperience and lack of understanding of a lawyer's professional responsibilities, particularly the professional duty of confidentiality.

Inquiry #1:

May a lawyer who is mentoring a law student allow the student to observe confidential client consultations between the lawyer and the lawyer's client?

Opinion #1:

Yes. The lawyer may allow the law student to observe the consultation so long as the student signs a confidentiality agreement and the lawyer's client gives his or her informed consent, confirmed in writing.

Rule 1.6(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct provides that a lawyer shall not reveal information acquired during the professional relationship with a client unless (1) the client gives informed consent; (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized; or (3) one of the exceptions set out in Rule 1.6(b) applies. "Informed consent" is defined by Rule 1.0(f) as denoting "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation appropriate to the circumstances."

Relevant to mentoring scenarios is the potential waiver of the attorney-client privilege that can occur when communications between the lawyer and the client take place in the presence of a third party. The attorney-client privilege prohibits a lawyer from testifying as to confidential communications between the lawyer and the client for the purpose of legal representation. State v. McIntosh, 336 NC 517, 523, 444 S.E.2d 438, 441 (1994).

It is important to note the distinction between the duty of confidentiality set out in Rule 1.6 of the Rules of Professional Conduct and the attorney-client privilege. Although the concepts of confidentiality and attorney-client privilege are often used interchangeably, privilege applies to a much narrower category of client information. A privilege exists if (1) the relation of attorney and client existed at the time the communication was made, (2) the communication was made in confidence, (3) the communication relates to a matter about which the attorney is being professionally consulted, (4) the communication was made in the course of giving or seeking legal advice for a proper purpose although litigation need not be contemplated, and (5) the client has not waived the privilege. McIntosh, 336 NC at 523-24, 444 S.E.2d at 442. Because the representation of a client typically includes many activities that are not confidential communications between a client and a lawyer, there are many opportunities for a mentee to observe a lawyer/mentor without implicating the attorney-client privilege. (Examples include: real estate closings, court proceedings, witness interviews, etc.)

The privilege is fundamental to the client-lawyer relationship and the trust that underpins that relationship. To seek the client's informed consent, the lawyer must research the law relating to the attorney-client privilege and explain to the client what effect the law student's presence during the consultation may have on the attorney-client privilege including a potential waiver of the privilege. The lawyer must also explain any other adverse effect on the client's interests. ABA Standing Comm. on Ethics and Prof'l Resp., Formal Op. 98-411(1988). The lawyer must not ask for consent unless, in his professional opinion, either the attorney-client privilege will not be waived by the presence of the law student or a potential waiver of the attorney-client privilege will cause minimal, or no, detriment to the client's interests such that to ask for consent is reasonable.

Pursuant to Rule 1.0(c), "confirmed in writing" in this context "denotes informed consent that is given in writing by the person or a writing that a lawyer promptly transmits to the person confirming an oral informed consent."

The issues addressed in this opinion as to the potential waiver of the privilege are limited to mentoring scenarios where a law student/new lawyer/mentee is observing a communication between the lawyer and the lawyer's client but is not participating in the representation as co-counsel or as an agent of the representing lawyer.

Inquiry #2:

If a lawyer is mentored by a lawyer in a different law firm, do the requirements in Opinion #1 apply when the lawyer-mentee observes a client consultation between the lawyer-mentor and a client or when the lawyer-mentor observes the lawyer-mentee conducting such a consultation with his client?

Opinion #2:

Yes. The lawyer conducting the consultation must evaluate the effect of the observing lawyer's presence on the attorney-client privilege. If the lawyer concludes that, in his professional opinion, either the attorney-client privilege will not be waived by the presence of the other lawyer, or a potential waiver of the attorney-client privilege will cause minimal or no detriment to the client's interests such that to ask for consent is reasonable, the lawyer may ask the client to consent to the observation. The lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent confirmed in writing.

The lawyer conducting the consultation must also obtain an agreement from the observing lawyer to maintain the confidentiality of the information as well as an agreement that the observing lawyer will not engage in adverse representations. Rule 1.7 and Rule 1.9.

Both lawyers should check for conflicts of interest in advance of the consultation. Rule 1.7 and Rule 1.9.

Inquiry #3:

When a lawyer seeks advice from a lawyer-mentor on the representation of a client of the lawyer, what actions should be taken to protect confidential client information?

Opinion #3:

If possible, the lawyer should try to obtain guidance without disclosing identifying client information, which can be done by using a hypothetical. If the consultation is general and does not involve the disclosure of identifying client information, no client consent is necessary and the lawyers do not have to comply with the requirements set out in Opinion #2.

If the consultation is intended to help the lawyer-mentee comply with the ethics rules,

Public Information

The Ethics Committee's meetings are public, and materials submitted for consideration are generally NOT held in confidence. Persons submitting requests for advice are cautioned that inquiries should not disclose client confidences or sensitive information that is not necessary to the resolution of the ethical questions presented.

Citation

To foster consistency in citation to the North Carolina Rules of Professional Conduct and the formal ethics opinions adopted by the North Carolina State Bar Council, the following formats are recommended:

- To cite a North Carolina Rule of Professional Conduct: NC Rules of Prof'l Conduct Rule 1.1 (2003)
- To cite a North Carolina formal ethics opinion: NC State Bar Formal Op. 1 (2011)

Note that the current, informal method of citation used within the formal ethics opinions themselves and in this Journal article will continue for a transitional period.

no client consent is necessary and the lawyers do not have to comply with the requirements set out in Opinion #2. Rule 1.6(b)(5) provides that a lawyer may reveal protected client information to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary "to secure legal advice about the lawyer's compliance with [the Rules of Professional Conduct]." Pursuant to Comment [10] to Rule 1.6:

A lawyer's confidentiality obligations do not preclude a lawyer from securing confidential legal advice about the lawyer's personal responsibility to comply with [the Rules of Professional Conduct]. In most situations, disclosing information to secure such advice will be impliedly authorized for the lawyer to carry out the representation. Even when the disclosure is not impliedly authorized, paragraph

Rules, Procedure, Comments

All opinions of the Ethics Committee are predicated upon the Rules of Professional Conduct as revised effective March 1, 2003, and thereafter amended, and referred to herein as the Rules of Professional Conduct (2003). The proposed opinions are issued pursuant to the "Procedures for Ruling on Questions of Legal Ethics." 27 N.C.A.C. ID, Sect. .0100. Any interested person or group may submit a written comment or request to be heard concerning a proposed opinion. Any comment or request should be directed to the Ethics Committee at PO Box 25908, Raleigh, NC 27611, by September 30, 2014.

Captions and Headnotes

A caption and a short description of each of the proposed opinions precedes the statement of the inquiry. The captions and descriptions are provided as research aids and are not official statements of the Ethics Committee or the council.

(b)(5) permits such disclosure because of the importance of a lawyer's compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct.

If the consultation does not involve advice about the lawyer's compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct, a hypothetical is not practical, or making the inquiry risks disclosure of information relating to the representation, the lawyer-mentee must comply with the requirements set out in Opinion #2.

Both the lawyer-mentee and the lawyer-mentor should avoid the creation of a conflict of interest with any existing or former clients by virtue of the mentoring relationship. For example, the lawyer-mentee should not consult with a lawyer he knows has represented the opposing party in the past without first ascertaining that the matters are not substantially related, and that the opposing party is not represented in the current matter by the lawyer-mentor. Similarly, the lawyer-mentor should obtain information sufficient to determine that the lawyer-mentee's matter is not one affecting the interests of an existing or former client. Rule 1.7 and Rule 1.9.

Proposed 2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 7 Use of North Carolina Subpoena to Obtain Documents from Foreign Entity or Individual July 24, 2014

Proposed opinion rules that a lawyer may provide a foreign entity or individual with a North Carolina subpoena accompanied by a statement/letter explaining that the subpoena is not enforceable in the foreign jurisdiction, the recipient is not required to comply with the subpoena, and the subpoena is being provided solely for the recipient's records.

Editor's note: This opinion supplements and clarifies 2010 FEO 2, Obtaining Medical Records from Out of State Health Care Providers.

Inquiry #1:

In a state legal matter, a lawyer wishes to obtain documents from a medical provider or other entity that is not located in North Carolina and does not have a registered agent in the state (foreign entity). The lawyer contacts the foreign entity and requests the documents. The lawyer informs the foreign entity that the subpoena power set out in N.C. R. Civ. P. 45 does not extend to the foreign jurisdiction. The foreign entity indicates that it will comply with the request for documents upon the receipt of a North Carolina subpoena "for its records."

May the lawyer provide the foreign entity with a North Carolina subpoena accompanied by a statement/letter explaining that the subpoena is not enforceable in the foreign jurisdiction and is provided to the entity solely for the entity's records?

Opinion #1:

Yes. Rule 8.4(c) states that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation. RPC 236 provides that it is false and deceptive for a lawyer to use the subpoena process to mislead the custodian of documentary evidence as to the lawyer's authority to require the production of such documents. 2010 FEO 2 prohibits a lawyer's use of a subpoena to request medical records under the authority of Rule 45 knowing that the North Carolina subpoena is unenforceable. 2010 FEO 2 explains that if "the North Carolina subpoena is not enforceable out of state, the lawyer may not misrepresent to the out of state health care provider that it must comply with the subpoena."

RPC 236 and 2010 FEO 2 prohibit a lawyer from making misrepresentations to the subpoena recipient that the lawyer has the legal authority to issue the subpoena under Rule 45 or misleading the recipient as to whether compliance with the subpoena is required by law.

If the subpoena is accompanied by a statement/letter explaining that the subpoena is not enforceable in the foreign jurisdiction, the recipient is not required to comply with the subpoena, and the subpoena is being provided solely for the entity's records, the lawyer has not made misrepresentations to, nor misled, the subpoena recipient. The subpoena recipient is aware that it cannot be compelled to comply with the subpoena and may determine whether to provide the requested documents voluntarily.

Inquiry #2:

Would the answer differ if the lawyer wishes to obtain the appearance and testimony of an individual over which the North Carolina court does not have in personam jurisdiction?

Opinion #2:

No. If an individual requests a North Carolina subpoena, knowing that the North Carolina court lacks in personam jurisdiction over the individual and the subpoena will not be enforceable, the lawyer may provide the individual with the subpoena, accompanied by a statement/letter explaining that the subpoena is not enforceable as to the individual and is being provided solely at the individual's request.

Proposed 2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 8 Accepting an Invitation from a Judge to Connect on LinkedIn July 24, 2014

Proposed opinion rules that a lawyer may accept an invitation from a judge to be a "connection” on a professional networking website, and may endorse a judge. However, a lawyer may not accept a legal skill or expertise endorsement or recommendation from a judge.

Facts:

Lawyer has a profile listing on LinkedIn, a social networking website for people in professional occupations. The website allows registered users (“members”) to maintain a list of contact details on their LinkedIn pages for people with whom they have some level of relationship via the website. These contacts are called “connections.” Members can invite anyone (whether a site user or not) to become a connection.

LinkedIn can be used to list jobs and search for job candidates, to find employment, and to seek out business opportunities. Members can view the connections of other members, post their photographs, and view the photos of other members. Members can post comments on another member’s profile page. Members can also endorse or write recommendations for other members. Such endorsements or recommendations, if accepted by the recipient, are posted on the recipient’s profile listing.

Inquiry #1:

May a lawyer with a professional profile on LinkedIn accept an invitation to connect from a judge?

Opinion #1:

Yes. Interactions with judges using social media are evaluated in the same manner as personal interactions with a judge, such as an invitation to dinner. In certain scenarios, a lawyer may accept a judge’s dinner invitation. Similarly, in certain scenarios a lawyer may accept a LinkedIn invitation to connect from a judge. However, if a lawyer represents clients in proceedings before a judge, the lawyer is subject to the following duties: to avoid conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice; to not state or imply an ability to influence improperly a government agency or official; and to avoid ex parte communications with a judge regarding a legal matter or issue the judge is considering. See Rule 3.5 and Rule 8.4. These duties may require the lawyer to decline a judge’s invitation to connect on LinkedIn.

Rule 8.4(d) provides that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to “engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice.” Rule 8.4(e) provides that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to “state or imply an ability to influence improperly a government agency or official.” Lawyers have an obligation to protect the integrity of the judicial system and to avoid creating an appearance of judicial partiality. See 2005 FEO 1.

If a lawyer receives an invitation to connect from a judge during the pendency of a matter before the judge, and the lawyer concludes that accepting the invitation will impair the lawyer’s compliance with these duties, the lawyer should not accept the judge’s invitation to connect until the matter is concluded. The lawyer may communicate to the judge the reason the lawyer did not accept the judge’s invitation. Such a communication with the judge is not a prohibited ex parte communication provided the communication does not include a discussion of the underlying legal matter.

Rule 3.5 prohibits lawyers from engaging in ex parte communications with a judge. Because connected members can post comments on each other’s profile pages, the connection between a judge and a lawyer appearing in a matter before the judge could lead to improper ex parte communications. Therefore, while the lawyer has a matter pending before a judge, the lawyer may not use LinkedIn or any other form of social media to communicate with the judge about the pending matter.

Rule 8.4(f) provides that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to “knowingly assist a judge or judicial officer in conduct that is a violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law.” To the extent that a judge is prohibited by the North Carolina Code of Judicial Conduct from participating in LinkedIn, or from sending invitations to connect to lawyers, a lawyer may not assist the judge in violating such prohibitions.

Inquiry #2:

May the lawyer send an invitation to connect to a judge?

Opinion #2:

Yes, subject to the limitations described in Opinion #1.

Inquiry #3:

A LinkedIn member has the option of displaying a “skills & expertise” section within his profile. A member can add items to the “skills & expertise” section of his profile page. In addition, some connections can add a new item to another member’s “skills & expertise” section, can “endorse” a skill or expertise already listed for the member, or write a recommendation for the member. A member who is being endorsed by another member will receive a notification containing the identity of the endorser and the specific skill or expertise that is being endorsed. The member may decline the endorsement entirely or choose the specific endorsements to be displayed. The endorsed member may also subsequently edit the “skills & expertise” section to “hide” selected endorsements. If a member endorses another member, and the endorsement is not declined by the recipient, the endorser’s name and profile picture will appear next to the skill on the endorsed member’s profile.

A recommendation is a comment written by a LinkedIn member to recognize or commend another member. When someone recommends a member, the recommended member will receive a message in the recommended member’s LinkedIn inbox and a notification on the member’s “Manage Recommendations” page. Recommendations are only visible to connections. A member can choose to hide a recommendation from the member’s profile, but cannot delete it. Recommendations written for others can be withdrawn or revised.

May a lawyer endorse a judge’s legal skills or expertise, or write a recommendation on the judge’s profile page?

Opinion #3:

Yes, subject to the limitations explained in Opinion #1.

Inquiry #4:

May a lawyer accept an endorsement or recommendation from a judge and display the endorsement or recommendation on his profile page?

Opinion #4:

No. Displaying an endorsement or recommendation from a judge on a lawyer’s profile page would create the appearance of judicial partiality and the lawyer must decline. See Rule 8.4(e).

Inquiry #5:

May a lawyer accept and post endorsements and recommendations on his LinkedIn profile page from persons other than judges?

Opinion #5:

Lawyers are professionally obligated to ensure that communications about the lawyer or the lawyer's services are not false or misleading. See Rule 7.1(a). Provided that the content of the endorsement or recommendation is truthful and not misleading in compliance with the requirements of Rule 7.1, the lawyer may post endorsements and recommendations from persons other than judges on the lawyer's LinkedIn profile page. See 2012 FEO 8.

Inquiry #6:

A lawyer previously accepted and displayed on his LinkedIn profile page an endorsement or recommendation from a lawyer who subsequently became a judge. Is the lawyer required to remove the endorsement or recommendation from the lawyer's profile?

Opinion #6:

Yes. See Opinion #4.

Inquiry #7:

Do the holdings in this opinion apply to other social media applications such as Facebook, Twitter, Google+, Instagram, and Myspace?

Opinion #7:

The holdings apply to any social media application that allows public display of connections, endorsements, or recommendations between lawyers and judges.

Proposed 2014 Formal Ethics Opinion 9 Private Lawyer Supervision of Investigation Involving Misrepresentation July 24, 2014

Proposed opinion rules that a private lawyer may supervise an investigation involving misrepresentation if certain conditions are satisfied.

Note: This opinion does not apply to the conduct of a government lawyer. As explained in comment [1] to Rule 8.4, the prohibition in Rule 8.4(a) against knowingly assisting another to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct or violating the Rules of Professional Conduct through the acts of another does not prohibit a government lawyer from providing legal advice to investigatory personnel relative to any action such as investigatory personnel are lawfully entitled to take.

In addition, this opinion is limited to private lawyers who advise, direct, or supervise conduct involving dishonesty, deceit, or misrepresentation as opposed to a lawyer who personally participates in such conduct.

Inquiry:

Attorney A was retained by Client C to investigate and, if appropriate, file a lawsuit against Client C's former employer, E. Employer E employed Client C as a janitor and required him to work 60 hours per week. E paid Client C a salary of $400 per week. Attorney A believes that because his client's employment was a "non-exempt position" under the North Carolina Wage and Hour Act, the payment method used by E was unlawful. Instead, E should have paid Client C at least $7.25 (minimum wage) per hour for each of the first 40 hours Client C worked per week, and at least $10.88 (time and a half) for each hour in excess of 40 (overtime) that Client C worked per week.

Prior to filing a lawsuit, Attorney A wants to retain a private investigator to investigate E's payment practices. The private investigator suggests using lawful, but misleading or deceptive tactics, to obtain the information Attorney A seeks. For example, the private investigator may pose as a person interested in being hired by E in the same capacity as Client C to see if E violates the North Carolina Wage and Hour Act when compensating the investigator.

Prior to filing a lawsuit, may Attorney A retain a private investigator who will misrepresent his identity and purpose when conducting an investigation into E's payment practices?

Opinion:

Rule 8.4(c) provides that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." This prohibition is extended to third parties acting at the direction of a lawyer by Rule 8.4(a). However, the Rules of Professional Conduct are rules of reason. Rule 0.2, Scope. Therefore, not every act of dishonesty, deceit, or misrepresentation constitutes professional misconduct.

Other jurisdictions have interpreted their

Rules of Professional Conduct to permit lawyer supervision of investigations involving misrepresentation in circumstances similar to that set out in the inquiry. For example, the bars of Arizona and Maryland permit lawyers to use "testers" who employ misrepresentation to collect evidence of discriminatory practices. Ariz. State Bar Comm. on the Rules of Prof'l Conduct, Op. 99-11 (1999); Maryland Bar Ass'n, Op. 2006-02 (2005). These ethics opinions conclude that testers are necessary to prove discriminatory practices and, therefore, serve an important public policy. The State Bar of Arizona opined that it would be inconsistent with the intent of the Rules of Professional Conduct to interpret the rules to prohibit a lawyer from supervising the activity of testers. Ariz. State Bar Comm. on the Rules of Prof'l Conduct, Op. 99-11 (1999).

The intent of Rule 8.4 is set out in comment [3] to the rule: "The purpose of professional discipline for misconduct is not punishment, but to protect the public, the courts, and the legal profession." The challenge is to balance the public's interest in having unlawful activity fully investigated and possibly thereby stopped, with the public's and the profession's interest in ensuring that lawyers conduct themselves with integrity and honesty. In an attempt to balance these two important interests, we conclude that a lawyer may advise, direct, or supervise an investigation involving pretext under certain limited circumstances.

A lawyer may advise, direct, or supervise the use of misrepresentation (1) in lawful efforts to obtain information on unlawful activity; (2) in the investigation of violations of criminal law, civil law, or constitutional rights; (3) if the lawyer's conduct is otherwise in compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct; (4) the lawyer has a good faith belief that there is a reasonable possibility that a violation of criminal law, civil law, or constitutional rights has taken place, is taking place, or will take place in the foreseeable future; (5) misrepresentations are limited to identity or purpose; and (6) the evidence sought is not reasonably and readily available through other means.

If Attorney A concludes that each of the conditions is satisfied, he may retain a private investigator to conduct an investigation into E's payment practices which investigation may include misrepresentations as to identity and purpose. ■

Grappling with the Duty to Inform When a Client is Incarcerated

BY SUZANNE LEVER

Imagine that you have been wrongly accused of a crime that is punishable by death. Because you are incarcerated, you have been forced to close down your law practice. With no income, you are unable to retain a private defense lawyer. Therefore, you are being defended by a court-appointed lawyer. Eager to learn what evidence the state has against you, you ask to see the discovery. Your lawyer reviews the discovery and provides you with his summary of the relevant discovery materials. Anxious and unsatisfied, you request the opportunity to review the complete discovery file. Do the Rules of Professional Conduct require your lawyer to comply with your request?

Now imagine that you have been court-appointed to represent a defendant in a capital case. While awaiting trial, the incarcerated defendant has had several amorous telephone conversations with his girlfriend, all of which have been recorded per prison regulations. The recordings are included in the discovery materials provided to you by the state. Your paralegal reviews the 17 plus hours of recordings and determines that they contain no information relevant to your client's legal defense. After providing the defendant with your summary of the relevant discovery materials, the defendant requests the opportunity to personally review all of the discovery, including the recordings of the telephone conversations. It is not permissible to leave the discovery with the defendant in the jail. Therefore, one of your staff members will have to travel to the jail and sit with the defendant while he reviews the written discovery and listens to the recordings. Do the Rules of Professional Conduct require you to comply with the defendant's request?

Rule 1.4 provides that a lawyer shall keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and promptly comply with reasonable requests for information. The two scenarios above demonstrate that what is "reasonable" may be in the eyes of the beholder.

A recently adopted ethics opinion attempts to give guidance to lawyers faced with such discovery review requests. Pursuant to 2013 FEO 2 (adopted 1/24/2014), if, after providing a criminal client with a summary of the discovery materials, the client requests access to the entire discovery file, the lawyer must afford the client the opportunity to review all of the "relevant" discovery materials unless the lawyer believes it is not in the best interest of the client's legal defense to comply with the request. In determining what discovery materials are relevant, and what disclosure is in the best interest of the client's legal defense, the lawyer must exercise his independent professional judgment.

The content of 2013 FEO 2 was, and continues to be, hotly debated. Some lawyers believe a criminal defense client is absolutely entitled to review everything in the client's file. Other lawyers argue that a criminal defense lawyer has absolute discretion to determine what file materials to disclose to a criminal client. Rule 1.2 discusses the general allocation of authority between the lawyer and the client. The rule provides that a lawyer must abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation and, as required by Rule 1.4, shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued. Comment [2] to Rule 1.2 notes that clients "normally defer to the special knowledge and skill of their lawyer with respect to the means to be used to accomplish their objectives, particularly with respect to technical, legal, and tactical matters."

Query: Is a criminal defense lawyer's decision on whether to provide a client with unlimited access to discovery materials a matter of trial strategy and judgment that ultimately lies within the lawyer's discretion?

There are genuine concerns underlying the continuing discussion: the limited resources available to represent indigent defendants; the practical difficulties in providing discovery review to an incarcerated defendant; the sheer volume of discovery produced pursuant to open discovery laws; and the desire to provide equal access to justice to all criminal defendants.

2013 FEO 2 attempts to address these sometimes competing concerns in the context of a lawyer's duties under the Rules of Professional Conduct. Of paramount importance in the drafting was the desire to craft an ethics opinion that did not differentiate a lawyer's professional responsibilities to clients based on the client's location or ability to pay for the lawyer's services.

The Ethics Committee continued to debate 2013 FEO 2 even after its adoption. Given the importance of the issues addressed in the opinion, as well as the necessity for immediate guidance for criminal defense lawyers, the Ethics Committee took an unusual step at its meeting on July 24, 2014, by voting to publish for comment an alternative version of the opinion.

Without substantially changing the conclusions in 2013 FEO 2, the alternative proposed opinion emphasizes that, in determining what discovery materials are relevant and what disclosure is in the best interest of the client's legal defense, the lawyer must exercise his or her independent professional judgment in the context of the critical decisions that are exclusively those of the criminal defendant. Under Rule 1.2(a)(1), the client in a criminal case has the authority to decide the "plea to be entered, whether to waive a jury trial, and whether [to] testify." The opinion draws the connection between these decisions and the duty to keep the client reasonably informed and to respond to requests for information. The alternative proposed opinion states that a criminal defense lawyer complies with the requirement of Rule 1.4 to keep a client “reasonably informed” by providing the client with information sufficient to make these important decisions.

The two opinions also differ slightly as to the criteria for withholding relevant discovery from a criminal defense client. The adopted opinion provides that a lawyer may withhold relevant discovery if withholding the information is in the best interest of the client’s legal defense. The adopted opinion adds that the defense lawyer may redact information that would endanger the safety and welfare of the client or others, violate a court rule or order, or is subject to a protective order or nondisclosure agreement. The acceptable justifications for withholding relevant discovery in the alternative opinion are expanded to include discovery agreements and time constraints due to the volume of discovery and deadlines for trial or pleas.

Query: Does the adopted opinion allow more discretion to the lawyer because it does not specify the conditions under which a lawyer may withhold review of discovery from an incarcerated client, or is more specific guidance, as provided in the alternative opinion, preferable?

Comments on the adopted opinion as well as the alternative draft will be considered at the October ethics meeting.

Suzanne Lever is assistant ethics counsel for the North Carolina State Bar.

Providing Discovery to an Incarcerated Client

At its meeting on July 24, 2014, the Ethics Committee considered a motion to recommend that the State Bar Council withdraw existing ethics opinion 2013 FEO 4, which was adopted by the Council in January of this year, and to publish a proposed substitute opinion. The motion failed but a second motion, to publish the proposed substitute opinion for comment, passed. It was agreed that the existing opinion would be published together with the substitute so that members of the bar could compare and offer comment on whether the substitute, by providing additional or different guidance, should supersede the existing opinion. Comments are strongly encouraged and should be directed to the Ethics Committee at PO Box 25908, Raleigh, NC 27611, by September 30, 2014.

2013 FEO 2 Providing Defendant with Discovery During Representation

January 24, 2014

Opinion rules that if, after providing a criminal client with a summary/explanation of the discovery materials in the client’s file, the client requests access to the entire file, the lawyer must afford the client the opportunity to meaningfully review all of the relevant discovery materials unless the lawyer believes it is in the best interest of the client’s legal defense not to do so.

Inquiry #1:

Lawyer represents Defendant in a criminal case. The state has provided Lawyer with discovery as PDF files. The state has also provided Lawyer DVDs containing copies of the video recordings of interrogations of Defendant and a codefendant; surveillance videotapes; and audio recordings of calls made by Defendant and the codefendant from the jail.

Lawyer reviewed the discovery and provided Defendant with a summary of the evidence. Defendant demands that he be provided a copy of the entire 1,200 pages of discovery and be allowed to view/listen to the 17 hours of video and audio recordings.

Does Lawyer have an ethical duty to comply with the client’s demand?

Opinion #1:

As a matter of professional responsibility, Rule 1.4 requires a lawyer to “keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter” and “promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.” As stated in comment [5] to Rule 1.4:

The client should have sufficient information to participate intelligently in decisions concerning the objectives of the representation and the means by which they are to be pursued...The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with the duty to act in the client’s best interests, and the client’s overall requirements as to the character of representation.

The duties set out in Rule 1.4 are similar to those found in ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, Defense Functions, Standard 4-3.8 (3d ed. 1993) which provides:

- (a) Defense counsel should keep the client informed of the developments in the case and the progress of preparing the defense and should promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.
- (b) Defense counsel should explain developments in the case to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.

During the course of the representation, the lawyer complies with the requirements of Rule 1.4 by providing the client with a summary of the discovery materials and consulting with the client as to the relevance of the materials to the client’s case. However, if the lawyer has provided the client with a summary/explanation of the discovery materials and the client, nonetheless, requests copies of any of the file materials, the lawyer must afford the client the opportunity to meaningfully review all of the relevant discovery material unless the lawyer believes it is in the best interest of the client’s legal defense to deny the request. The lawyer is not required to provide the client with a physical copy of the discovery materials during the course of the representation.

In determining what discovery materials are relevant, and what disclosure is in the best interest of the client’s legal defense, the lawyer must exercise his or her independent professional judgment. As stated in comment [5] to Rule 1.4: “The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with the duty to act in the client’s best interests, and the client’s overall requirements as to the character of representation.” However, as stated in comment [7] to Rule 1.4, a lawyer “may not withhold information to serve the lawyer’s own interest or convenience or the interest or convenience of another person.” Therefore, the lawyer may not deny the request due to issues of expense or inconvenience.

Inquiry #2:

If Lawyer provides Defendant with a copy of, or access to, discovery materials, may Lawyer redact or otherwise remove private information of a third person, such as the address of a witness or pictures of an alleged rape victim?

Opinion #2:

The lawyer may redact or otherwise remove information that the lawyer determines, in his professional discretion, should not be disclosed to the client, including information that would endanger the safety and welfare of the client or others, violate a court rule or order, or is subject to any protective order or nondisclosure agreement. See Rule 1.4, cmt. [7].

Proposed Substitute for 2013 Formal Ethics Opinion 2 Providing Incarcerated Defendant with Opportunity to Review Discovery Materials

July 24, 2014

Proposed substitute opinion rules that if, after providing an incarcerated criminal client with a summary/explanation of the discovery materials in the client's file, the client requests access to any of the discovery materials, the lawyer must afford the client the opportunity to meaningfully review relevant discovery materials unless certain conditions exist.

Inquiry #1:

Lawyer represents Defendant in a criminal case. The state has provided Lawyer with discovery as PDF files. The state has also given Lawyer DVDs containing copies of the video recordings of interrogations of Defendant and a codefendant; surveillance videotapes; and audio recordings of calls made by Defendant and the codefendant from the jail.

Lawyer reviewed the discovery and provided Defendant with a summary of the evidence. Defendant demands that he be provided a copy of the entire 1,200 pages of discovery and be allowed to view/listen to the 17 hours of video and audio recordings.

Does Lawyer have an ethical duty to comply with the client's demand?

Opinion #1:

As a matter of professional responsibility, Rule 1.4 requires a lawyer to "keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter" and "promptly comply with reasonable requests for information." As stated in comment [5] to Rule 1.4:

The client should have sufficient information to participate intelligently in decisions concerning the objectives of the representation and the means by which they are to be pursued...The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with the duty to act in the client's best interests, and the client's overall requirements as to the character of representation.

The duties set out in Rule 1.4 are similar to those found in ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, Defense Functions, Standard 4-3.8 (3d ed. 1993) which provides:

(a) Defense counsel should keep the client informed of the developments in the case and the progress of preparing the defense and should promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.

(b) Defense counsel should explain developments in the case to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.

Under Rule 1.2(a)(1), the client in a criminal case has the authority to decide, "after consultation with the lawyer, as to a plea to be entered, whether to waive a jury trial, and whether the client will testify." During the course of the representation, a criminal defense lawyer complies with the requirements of Rule 1.4 to keep a client "reasonably informed" by providing the client with sufficient information to make informed decisions about these important issues. This obligation is fulfilled by providing the client with a summary of the discovery materials and consulting with the client as to the relevance of the materials to the client's case. If the lawyer has provided the client with a summary/explanation of the discovery materials and the client, nonetheless, requests copies or asks to review any of the file materials, the duty to comply with reasonable requests for information requires the lawyer to afford the client the opportunity to meaningfully review relevant discovery material unless one or more of the following conditions exist: (1) the lawyer believes it is in the best interest of the client's legal defense to deny the request; (2) a protective order or court rule limiting the discovery materials that may be shown to the defendant or taken to a jail or prison is in effect; (3) such review is prohibited by the specific terms of a discovery agreement¹ between the prosecution and the defense lawyer; (4) because of circumstances beyond the defense counsel's control, such review is not feasible in light of the volume of discovery materials and the time remaining before trial or before a decision must be made by the client on a plea offer; or (5) disclosure of the discovery materials will endanger the safety or welfare of the client or others.

In determining what discovery materials are relevant, and what disclosure is in the best interest of the client's legal defense, the lawyer must exercise his or her independent professional judgment in the context of the decisions that the defendant must make about what plea to enter, whether to waive jury trial, and whether to testify. See Rule 1.2(a)(1). As noted above: "The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with the duty to act in the client's best interests, and the client's overall requirements as to the character of representation." Rule 1.4, cmt. [5]. However, as stated in comment [7] to Rule 1.4, a lawyer "may not withhold information to serve the lawyer's own interest or convenience or the interest or convenience of another person." Therefore, the lawyer may not deny the request due to issues of expense or inconvenience.

Regardless of whether the lawyer determines that the client should have an opportunity to review some or all of the discovery materials, the lawyer is not required to provide the client with a physical copy of the discovery materials during the course of the representation.

Inquiry #2:

If Lawyer provides Defendant with a copy of, or access to, discovery materials, may Lawyer redact or otherwise remove private information of a third person, such as the address of a witness or pictures of an alleged rape victim?

Opinion #2:

The lawyer may redact or otherwise remove information that the lawyer determines, in his professional judgment, should not be disclosed to the client, including information that would endanger the safety and welfare of the client or is subject to a protective order, court rule, or agreement prohibiting disclosure. See Rule 1.4, cmt. [7]. ■

Endnote

1. Discovery agreements between the prosecution and the defense may present other ethical concerns not addressed in this opinion.

Law School Briefs

All of the law schools located in North Carolina are invited to provide material for this column. Below are the submissions we received this quarter.

Campbell University School of Law

Campbell Law Confers 150 Degrees at 2014 Graduation—Campbell Law School conferred 150 Juris Doctor degrees at its 36th annual hooding and graduation ceremony on May 9 at Meymandi Concert Hall at the Duke Energy Center for the Performing Arts. Red Hat President and Chief Executive Officer Jim Whitehurst delivered the commencement address.

The National Jurist Names Campbell Law to List of Top Private Law Schools for Best Value—Campbell Law School has been named to a list of the top 22 private law schools in the country for best value by The National Jurist. In selecting institutions for inclusion, the publication considered a number of academic and financial variables, including price of tuition, student debt accumulation, employment success, bar passage, and cost of living figures.

Campbell Law Invited to Participate in NITA Tournament of Champions—Campbell Law School has received an invitation to the prestigious National Institute of Trial Advocacy's Tournament of Championships mock trial competition. One of the premier mock trial competitions in the country, only 16 law schools are invited to the Tournament of Champions.

Campbell Law Students Awarded WCBA Scholarships—Campbell Law School students Amanda Brookie and Emily Pappas have been awarded Wake County Bar Association Memorial Scholarships for the upcoming academic year. Brookie, a rising second year student, and Pappas, a rising third year, formally received their $5,000 scholarships during a presentation at a recent WCBA luncheon on June 3 at the Women's Club of Raleigh.

Benton named NCBA President-Elect—Shelby Duffy Benton, a 1985 Campbell Law graduate, has been named president-elect of the North Carolina Bar Association. She is the first Campbell Law graduate to serve the NCBA in this capacity.

Charlotte School of Law

Student Success Program—Charlotte School of Law's mission is to provide leadership in meeting the evolving needs of the profession and in unlocking the potential of students. To further those commitments, Charlotte will launch this fall its Student Success Program, a comprehensive addition to its program of education that is unique to American legal education. The purpose of the program is to systematically develop key competencies vital to success in law school, on the bar exam, in job search and career development, and in professional endeavor. Initially the program will focus on the competency clusters of grit, professionalism, and emotional intelligence (self-awareness and relationship building). The competencies will be developed through integration into the pedagogy of small classes, a graduation requirement that calls on students to complete activities or assessments throughout the three years, and training law school staff to support and reinforce development of these competencies.

Partnership with Yingke Law Firm—Charlotte has entered into a partnership with the Yingke Law Firm for the law school to provide training programs to lawyers in the firm. Yingke is the largest law firm in the Asian-Pacific region with 2,400 lawyers in 40 offices in major commercial regions around the world. The educational programs will provide lawyers based in China with substantive training in US business law and other areas important to the work of Yingke lawyers.

Ms. JD Fellowship—Charlotte student Lexi Andresen has been selected as one of 15 recipients of the Ms. JD Fellowship. The fellowship, awarded in partnership with the ABA Commission on Women in the Profession, recognizes academic performance, leadership, and dedication to advancing the status of women in the profession. Fellows are provided with a mentor who has been a winner of the ABA Brent Award. Andresen is the first fellowship recipient from a North Carolina law school.

Duke Law School

New Civil Justice Clinic Focuses on Civil Litigation Assistance for Low-Income Clients—Duke Law School has launched the Civil Justice Clinic, the school's tenth clinical program. A partnership between Duke Law and Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC), the clinic has the dual focus of providing substantive legal assistance to low-income clients who have little access to civil justice, as well as facilitating students' development of practical litigation skills that are readily translatable to a wide variety of cases and practice areas. For students, the clinic includes a substantive weekly seminar, direct client representation, and individual supervision and instruction from Duke faculty and LANC attorneys.

The clinic, which is based out of the Durham LANC office, is directed by Charles R. Holton, a partner at Womble Carlyle Sandridge & Rice in Research Triangle Park who currently chairs the LANC Board of Directors. He is a longstanding member of the local advisory committee for LANC's Durham office and was named Pro Bono Attorney of the Year for 2013 by the North Carolina Bar Association.

Student-Run Cancer Pro Bono Project Honored by NCBA—The Duke-UNC Cancer Pro Bono Project was honored in June with the North Carolina Bar Association's 2014 Law Student Group Pro Bono Award. The project represents a partnership between Duke Law School, UNC School of Law, and the Duke and UNC Cancer Centers. Under the supervision of volunteer attorneys, law students hold advanced directive clinics at each cancer center twice each month, where they interview patients to assess their legal needs and educate them on matters related to advanced directives. They draft the relevant documents for their clients and, with their supervisors, facilitate their review and execution by the patient-clients.

Elon University School of Law

National Symposium Advances Experiential

Education in Law—A June 13-15 national symposium at Elon Law featured research findings about the educational value of immersive and recurring legal practice experiences for law students. Elon welcomed more than 150 participants from the US and Canada including members of the legal academy and profession, and representatives from other disciplines including architecture, business, and medicine.

“This is not just about clinical legal education,” said Luke Bierman, dean and professor of law at Elon. “This is not just about externships. It’s not just about simulations in classrooms. It’s about how to move all these things in a particular way, and how to think about how it fits into the enterprise of legal education and the goals we have for our students.”

ABA President-Elect William C. Hubbard called for innovators in law and legal education to shape the future of justice by creating more efficient and effective models for the delivery of legal services. Prominent law scholar William Henderson presented research indicating that Northeastern’s Cooperative Legal Education Program (co-op) accelerates more self-aware and deliberate career planning by students, enabled by insights they gain during nearly a year of full-time legal experience through the program. NCBA President Alan Duncan highlighted NCBA programs including the Center for Practice Management, providing two full-time staff devoted to assisting attorneys with law firm start up, technology, and practice management questions.

Other highlights included:

- practitioners and teachers in medical, architectural, and business sectors presented insights about experiential education components in their fields
- law school leaders presented innovative experiential education programs established since 2012
- panelists presented research in areas such as cost and sustainability measures for experiential legal education and the regulatory landscape at national and state levels surrounding pedagogical change in law schools.

Visit the symposium website for details: law.elon.edu/aell.

North Carolina Central University School of Law

Wallace to Lead NCCU Dispute Resolution Institute—NCCU Law Professor Kathleen Wallace was named director of the school’s Dispute Resolution Institute (DRI) beginning July 2014. Wallace takes the reins from outgoing director Mark Morris.

NCCU has led the state in developing expertise in the growing field of conflict resolution with the creation of its Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) Clinic in 2000 and the DRI in 2006.

The practice of alternative dispute resolution seeks to avoid the typical adversarial approach of litigation in order to better preserve the relationship between those in conflict. This is particularly important in cases involving divorcing parents, family members, business partners, and neighbors—anyone who anticipates ongoing interaction.

At NCCU’s Dispute Resolution Institute, those seeking a certificate complete three core courses—Negotiation, Mediation, and Arbitration—and select from among a dozen others in ADR processes and practice to total ten credit hours.

One popular elective is the ADR Clinic. NCCU Law has partnered with the Elna B. Spaulding Conflict Resolution Center to mediate cases presented at the center and in district court in Durham. Each Friday the students gain hands-on experience mediating community disputes, Medicare/Medicaid appeals, and misdemeanor offences involving property damage and simple assaults.

According to Wallace, “Our students can easily parlay these negotiation and conflict management skills in almost any professional capacity.”

She should know. Since 2004 Wallace has also served as a mediator for the US Olympic Committee. As a crisis intervention specialist and legal counsel for the US Paralympic Team, Wallace attended the Paralympic Games in Sochi, Russia, where she managed disputes regarding rule interpretation, disqualifications, and athletes’ rights.

Wallace intends to use her tenure as director to increase students’ engagement in the community. “I’d like to see more work with youth in conflict management and with families in crisis regarding decisions about elder care,” said Wallace.

University of North Carolina School of Law

Dean Boger Announces Plan to Return to Teaching—John Charles “Jack” Boger ’74 announced that he will conclude his role as dean of the law school in July 2015 to return to the law school faculty. He will have served as dean for nine years, and as a member of the UNC faculty for 25 years. Boger was named the law school’s 13th dean in 2006 after serving as deputy director of the UNC Center for Civil Rights. He holds the Wade Edwards Distinguished Chair. Boger will continue to lead the law school until his successor is named and assumes the leadership role in the summer of 2015.

New Associate Dean for Student Affairs—The law school welcomes Paul Rollins to its staff, starting in August as its new associate dean for student affairs. Rollins, a native of South Carolina, received his BA degree from the University of South Carolina and his JD degree from Yale Law School. He joins UNC from UGA’s law school, where he served as associate dean for administration and student affairs. In his role at UNC he will oversee the admissions, student services, and career development offices.

Faculty Corporate Law Treatise Quoted by SCOTUS—In the recently decided Hobby Lobby case, both the majority and the dissenting opinions of the Supreme Court cited propositions from Treatise on the Law of Corporations, a book co-authored by Tom Hazen, the Cary C. Boshamer Distinguished Professor of Law at UNC School of Law, and James Cox, a law professor at Duke. The Supreme Court previously has cited Hazen’s work in securities law, but the opinions in the Hobby Lobby case represent the first time that both the majority and dissent cited his work in the same case.

Wake Forest University School of Law

Interim Dean Named—Wake Forest University School of Law Executive Associate Dean for Academic Affairs Suzanne Reynolds (’77) has been named interim dean of the law school effective September 1, following the announcement that Dean Blake D. Morant has accepted an offer to become dean at George Washington Law School.

Reynolds has served as Wake Forest Law’s executive associate dean for academic affairs for the past four years. She is the first woman to serve as dean of Wake Forest Law.

Needham Yancy Gulley Professor of Criminal Law Ron Wright, who served as executive associate dean for academic affairs at the law school for three years prior to Reynolds, will step back into his former role.

Both appointments are for the 2014-2015 academic year, according to WFU Provost Rogan Kersh. A national search for Dean

CONTINUED ON PAGE 51

John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award

James B. Maxwell is a recipient of the John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award. A Virginia native, Mr. Maxwell earned his undergraduate degree from the Randolph-Macon College in 1963, and his law degree from Duke University in 1966. Mr. Maxwell currently practices at the law firm of Maxwell, Freeman & Bowman, PA in Durham. Throughout his distinguished career, Mr. Maxwell has established himself as an outstanding attorney, mentor, community servant, coach, and leader. Among countless endeavors, Mr. Maxwell was the first lawyer to serve both as president of the NC Academy of Trial Lawyers and as president of the North Carolina Bar Association. In addition, Mr. Maxwell has coached the Duke University Law School National Moot Court Team since 2002, has been chair of the Legal Aid Board of Directors, and chair of the Lawyers Mutual Claims Committee. He has been listed in the Best Lawyers in America since 1987. He has spoken at dozens of CLEs and written numerous articles relating to both litigation and professional ethics. A man of character who has dedicated his life to serving the legal community and the public, James B. Maxwell is a deserving recipient of the John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award.

Sharon A. Thompson is a recipient of the John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award. Ms. Thompson began practicing law in 1976 in Raleigh. In 1979 she became a member of Thompson & McAllaster, where she remained until starting the Sharon Thompson Law Group in 1991. Ms. Thompson currently concentrates in family law but has previously practiced in a wide range of areas. Ms. Thompson served two terms in the NC House of Representatives from 1987-1990. She was also an adjunct professor at NC Central University Law School. A pioneer, Ms. Thompson was a cofounder of the NC Association of Women Attorneys (NCAWA), and founding member and first president of the NC Gay and Lesbian Attorneys (NC GALA). In 1987 Ms. Thompson was granted the annual award from the NCAWA for promoting the participation of women in the legal profession and the rights of women under the law. She was a member of the Board of Governors of the NC Academy of Trial Lawyers, and in 2007 she was inducted into the NC Bar Association's General Practice Hall of Fame. She has spoken at numerous CLEs and published many articles focusing on family law issues for LGBT clients. An excellent lawyer and civil rights advocate, Sharon A. Thompson is a deserving recipient of the John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award.

M. Gordon Widenhouse is a recipient of the John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award. Mr. Widenhouse received his undergraduate degree from Davidson College in 1976, his Master of Arts from UNC-Greensboro in 1978, and his JD from Wake Forest University Law School in 1982. Following law school, Mr. Widenhouse clerked in the United States District Court, and then for Justice James Exum in the North Carolina Supreme Court. After a time as an assistant appellate defender and assistant federal public defender, Mr. Widenhouse has focused his career on appellate litigation and criminal defense with the firm of Rudolf, Widenhouse & Filako in Chapel Hill. Mr. Widenhouse has been an adjunct professor at NC Central University Law School, where he was awarded a Charles L. Becton Teaching Award in 2013. In addition to teaching law students, Mr. Widenhouse has devoted time to assisting high school students in North Carolina with a better understanding of the legal system and the legal profession as one of the founders of the Wade Edwards High School Mock Trial Program for the NCAJ. The award for the best overall competitor at the competition is named after Mr. Widenhouse. He has spoken at numerous CLEs, published numerous articles, and is considered a mentor to many lawyers. Listed in NC Super Lawyers since 2007 and Best Lawyers in America since 2002, Mr. Widenhouse has had a career of service to the bar and to the public, and is a deserving recipient of the John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award.

Seeking Award Nominations

The John B. McMillan Distinguished Service Award honors current and retired members of the North Carolina State Bar who have demonstrated exemplary service to the legal profession. Awards will be presented in recipients' districts, with the State Bar councilor from the recipient's district introducing the recipient and presenting the certificate. Recipients will also be recognized in the Journal and honored at the State Bar's annual meeting in Raleigh.

Members of the bar are encouraged to nominate colleagues who have demonstrated outstanding service to the profession. The nomination form is available on the State Bar's website, ncbar.gov. Please direct questions to Peter Bolac, PBolac@ncbar.gov ■

Law School Briefs (cont.)

Morant's successor will begin in September.

Reynolds is widely respected for her scholarship and teaching about family law, and for her public service. She was a principal drafter of statutes that modernized the law of both alimony and of adoption, and she co-founded a domestic violence program that received national recognition by the American Bar. Reynolds authored a three-volume treatise on North Carolina family law that has become the authoritative source for law students, lawyers, and judges.

Wright is one of the nation's best known criminal justice scholars. He is the co-author of two casebooks in criminal procedure and sentencing; his empirical research concentrates on the work of criminal prosecutors. He is a board member of the Prosecution and Racial Justice Project of the Vera Institute of Justice, and has been an adviser or board member for Families Against Mandatory Minimum Sentences (FAMM), North Carolina Prisoner Legal Services, Inc., and the Winston-Salem Citizens' Police Review Board. Prior to joining the faculty, he was a trial attorney with the US Department of Justice. ■

Client Security Fund Reimburses Victims

At its July 24, 2014, meeting, the North Carolina State Bar Client Security Fund Board of Trustees approved payments of $250,137.86 to 11 applicants who suffered financial losses due to the misconduct of North Carolina lawyers.

The payments authorized were:

1. An award of $22,880.95 to a former client of William S. Britt of Lumberton. The board determined that Britt was retained to handle a negligence claim against a nursing home that resulted in the client's husband's death and personal injury claims for the client and her two sons. Britt settled the matters and deposited the settlement proceeds into his trust account, but failed to disburse some of the funds prior to his trust account being frozen by the State Bar. Due to misappropriation, Britt's trust account balance is insufficient to cover all of his clients' obligations. Although Britt had deposited funds in his lawyer's trust account to cover the expected shortage, he agreed that his client should be reimbursed by the board and be subrogated to the funds in his lawyer's trust account. Britt was disbarred on June 12, 2014.

2. An award of $72,576.08 to two former clients of Sue E. Mako of Wilmington. The board determined that Mako was retained to handle the clients' personal injury claims. Mako settled the matters and deposited the settlement proceeds into her trust account. At the time of the deposits, Mako knew that her trust account was short due to an unrelated scam. Mako failed to make any disbursements from the proceeds for the benefit of the clients prior to the State Bar freezing Mako's trust account. Due to the shortage in her account caused by Mako's disbursement against uncollected funds related to the scam, and her dishonest act of failing to return missing funds to the trust account from money she earned after the scam, Mako's trust account balance is insufficient to cover all her clients' obligations. Mako's disbarment will be effective on August 20, 2014.

3. An award of $3,366.53 to a former client of Nicholas A. Stratas of Raleigh. The board determined that Stratas was retained to handle a client's personal injury claim. Stratas settled the matter and retained a portion of the settlement proceeds to resolve a subrogation lien. Stratas failed to resolve the lien prior to being disbarred. Due to misappropriation, Stratas' trust account balance was insufficient to pay all his clients' obligations. Stratas was disbarred on February 1, 2013. The board previously reimbursed ten other Stratas clients a total of $152,215.78.

4. An award of $11,696.10 to a former client of Daniel L. Taylor of Troutman. The board determined that Taylor was retained to prepare estate planning documents for a client's father. Taylor suffered a stroke shortly after meeting with the client and prior to the client signing a "nonrefundable" fee agreement and paying the legal fee. Taylor failed to provide any valuable legal services for the fee paid. Taylor died on December 25, 2013.

5. An award of $11,746.10 to a former client of Daniel L. Taylor. The board determined that Taylor was retained to prepare estate planning documents and provide asset protection services for the client and his wife. The client signed two "nonrefundable" fee agreements and paid the combined fee in full because time was of the essence to get his wife's assets protected due to her declining health. Despite being paid and having all the necessary information to prepare the documents, Taylor failed to produce any documents for the client's wife prior to her death. Taylor failed to provide any valuable legal services for the fees paid.

6. An award of $5,000 to former clients of Daniel L. Taylor. The board determined that Taylor was retained to handle the client's son's petition for a contested case hearing before the Office of Administrative Hearings (OAH). Taylor faxed the client's handwritten petition, rather than one he was retained to prepare, to OAH a day after the filing deadline. Taylor failed to provide any valuable legal service for the clients.

7. An award of $6,000 to a former client of Daniel L. Taylor. The board determined that Taylor was retained to prepare estate planning documents and represent a client in a petition for guardianship over her husband. The client signed Taylor's "nonrefundable" fee agreement and paid the fees for the estate planning documents and representation in the guardianship proceeding. After preparing the estate planning documents, filing the guardianship petition, and participating in the guardianship proceeding, Taylor requested an additional $6,000 fee to complete the guardianship. The client paid the additional fee, but Taylor failed to complete the guardianship. Taylor failed to provide any valuable legal services for the additional fee paid.

8. An award of $11,696.10 to a former client of Daniel L. Taylor. The board determined that Taylor was retained to apply for Medicaid benefits and provide asset planning services for the client's father. The client signed a "nonrefundable" retainer agreement and paid the fees quoted. Taylor never prepared any estate planning documents and failed to provide any other valuable legal services for the fee paid.

9. An award of $3,500 to a former client of Clyde Gary Triggs of Hildebran. The board determined that Triggs was retained to handle a client's domestic matter. Triggs failed to provide any valuable legal services to the client prior to being disbarred. Triggs was disbarred on January 31, 2013.

10. An award of $1,266 to a former client of David A. Vesel of Raleigh. The board determined that Vesel was retained to handle a client's real estate closing. Vesel failed to deliver two disbursement checks on the client's behalf prior to his trust account being frozen by the State Bar. Due to misappropriation, Vesel's trust account balance was insufficient to pay all his clients' obligations. Vesel was disbarred on July 5, 2013. The board previously paid one other Vesel client a total of $5,914.

11. An award of $100,000 to a former client of W. Darrell Whitley of Lexington. The board determined that Whitley was retained to create and administer a trust for a client. Within two weeks of the client's funds being deposited into his trust account, Whitley misappropriated virtually all of the funds. Due to misappropriation, Whitley's trust account was insufficient to pay all of his clients' obligations. Whitley died on December 6, 2011. The board previously reimbursed several other Whitley clients and applicants a total of $664,096.74. ■

Living with Blindness (cont.)

a multi-national, multi-racial family. We did not have any ties to Ethiopia, but we both had friends and experiences that drew us to Africa, generally. We also had friends who went through the Ethiopian adoption process before us, so that encouraged us to go that route. Thus, in May of 2012 we brought home our daughter Kalkidan (then age four) and our son Rebuma (then 18 months old).

Fatherhood has been a blast. My children really help to keep me humble. They don't care where I work or who I represent, but are just impressed that I have a job where there is a candy dish and a soda fountain and where I get to talk on a phone that actually has a cord, as opposed to the ubiquitous smart phones that are all they've ever known. Coming home to fans who don't keep track of wins and losses or count billable hours is the best part of every day.

I will say that fatherhood is one of the few areas where I've found blindness to be frustrating. There are things I'd like to be able to do as a dad—see my son's goofy facial expressions, watch my daughter dance and play soccer, or play catch—that I can't do, and not being able to do things isn't something I am very accustomed to. I guess I am still learning what it means to be blind in a new stage of life.

JG: In describing your disability, you used the phrase that sight for you is like “looking at an elephant from six inches away”. In many ways, this describes some sighted persons and how they pass their lives with blinders on. How have you handled the elephant?

JD: That is a lesson I am still learning. Like most people, I sometimes struggle to see what really matters beyond the court deadlines, case outcomes, and career goals that require so much daily energy. As I mentioned before, though, living with blindness has given me a broader perspective about the inter-connectedness of people and the importance of relationships. That perspective has not always made me a more sanguine or compassionate person, but, as I've grown up, started a family and a career, I have been able to see and appreciate just how many people contributed to getting me to where I am in life: a dad who encouraged me to work hard and compete; a mom who, many nights, came home from work only to spend several hours reading textbooks to me when my high-school couldn't provide them in accessible formats; teachers and coaches who worked creatively to teach me their subjects and sports; friends who rowed and trained with me to prepare me for the Paralympics, though there was no potential for personal glory for them; colleagues who took the risk of hiring a blind person and who provide the support needed to enable me to do my job; and a wife and kids who love and encourage me without regard to personal or professional successes. Understanding how much I have benefited from the generosity of other people inspires both confidence and humility, and for me has been the best medicine against the self-absorption that can be so alluring. ■

John Gehring, a former State Bar councilor and chair of the Publications Committee, is now semi-retired, which means that he “works less and enjoys it more.”

Merritt Nominated as Vice-President

Charlotte attorney Mark Merritt was selected by the State Bar's Nominating Committee to stand for election to the office of vice-president of the North Carolina State Bar. The election will take place in October at the State Bar's annual meeting.

Merritt is a graduate of the University of North Carolina where he was a Morehead Scholar and a member of Phi Beta Kappa. He earned his law degree in 1982 from the University of Virginia and served as editor in chief of the Virginia Law Review. After law school he clerked on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals for Judge John M. Wisdom. He returned to Charlotte and has practiced law at Robinson Bradshaw & Hinson since 1983.

His professional activities include serving as treasurer and president of the Mecklenburg County Bar, serving on the Board of Directors and as president of Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, and serving as chair of the North Carolina Bar Association Antitrust Section Counsel. While a State Bar councilor he has served as chair of the Ethics Committee and of the Lawyers Assistance Program. He has served as a member of the Facilities, Grievance, Issues, and Authorized Practice Committees. He also served as chair of the Special Committee on Ethics 2020.

Mark is a member of the American College of Trial Lawyers and the International Society of Barristers.

He is married to Lindsay Merritt and has three children, Alex, Elizabeth, and Jay. ■

The North Carolina State Bar and Affiliated Entities

Selected Financial Data

The North Carolina State Bar			Total operating			Fund equity-
	2013	2012	revenues	2,470,211	3,276,866	retained earnings	176,840	172,960
Assets			Operating expenses	(2,691,021)	(2,711,263)		$191,899	$181,122
Cash and cash equivalents	$6,548,412	$7,156,681	Non-operating revenues	8,518	9,568	Revenues and Expenses
Property and equipment, net	17,691,016	13,791,676	Net income (loss)	$(212,292)	$575,171	Operating revenues-
Other assets	329,470	300,252				specialization fees	$136,050	$134,018
	$24,568,898	$21,248,609				Operating expenses	(132,164)	(129,244)
Liabilities and Fund Equity						Non-operating revenues	(6)	89
Current liabilities	$4,843,760	$4,754,581	Board of Client Security Fund			Net income	$3,880	$4,863
Long-term debt	11,545,979	8,613,737		2013	2012
	16,389,739	13,368,318	Assets
Fund equity-retained earnings	8,179,159	7,880,291	Cash and cash equivalents	$1,390,739	$1,668,369	The Chief Justice's Commission on Professionalism
	$24,568,898	$21,248,609	Other assets	(790)	(446)		2013	2012
Revenues and Expenses				$1,389,949	$1,667,923	Assets
Dues	$7,631,961	$7,399,734	Liabilities and Fund Equity			Cash and cash equivalents	$221,068	$196,053
Other operating revenues	909,935	753,104	Current liabilities	$20,269	$17,662	Other assets	100,762	100,527
Total operating revenues	8,541,896	8,152,838	Fund equity-retained earnings	1,370,018	1,650,261		$321,830	$296,580
Operating expenses	(8,027,353)	(7,166,301)		$1,390,287	$1,667,923	Liabilities and Fund Equity
Non-operating revenues	(30,175)	837,569	Revenues and Expenses			Current liabilities	522	90
Net income	$484,368	$1,824,106	Operating revenues	$728,173	$741,424	Fund equity-retained earnings	321,308	296,490
			Operating expenses	(1,009,786)	(783,750)		$321,830	$296,580
			Non-operating revenues	1,370	3,098	Revenues and Expenses
			Net loss	$(280,243)	$(39,228)	Operating revenues-fees	$327,547	$328,321
						Operating expenses	(302,761)	(292,266)
			Board of Continuing Legal Education			Non-operating revenues	32	63
				2013	2012	Net income	$24,818	$36,118
			Assets
			Cash and cash equivalents	$287,066	$243,708	Board of Paralegal Certification
			Other assets	173,802	191,853		2013	2012
				$460,868	$435,561	Assets
			Liabilities and Fund Equity			Cash and cash equivalents	$402,611	$348,099
			Current liabilities	116,822	69,520	Other assets	7,050	-
			Fund equity-retained earnings	344,046	366,041		$409,661	$348,099
				$460,868	$435,561	Liabilities and Fund Equity
			Revenues and Expenses			Current liabilities -
			Operating revenues	$664,397	$646,041	accounts payable	7,275	7,193
			Operating expenses	(686,423)	(652,845)	Fund equity-retained earnings	402,386	340,906
			Non-operating revenues	31	(400)		$409,661	$348,099
			Net loss	$(21,995)	$(7,204)	Revenues and Expenses
						Operating revenues-fees	$245,575	$257,130
			Board of Legal Specialization			Operating expenses	(184,083)	(205,688)
				2013	2012	Non-operating revenues	(12)	155
			Assets			Net income (loss)	$61,480	$51,597
			Cash and cash equivalents	$191,899	$180,394
			Other assets	-	728
				$191,899	$181,122
			Liabilities and Fund Equity
			Current liabilities	15,059	8,162

COMMUNITY of lawyers

COMMON PURPOSE:
good legal practices

SHARED GOALS: improving the legal profession

LAWYERS MUTUAL.
Your community partner in law.

MON HENRY, JR.
THE CROSBY LAW FIRM
101 EASTON N.C. (CHARLOTTE OFFICE)

www.lawyersmutualnc.com 919.677.8900 800.662.8843

The North Carolina State Bar
PO Box 25908
Raleigh, NC 27611

Fall 2014

Appeal & Supersedeas Bonds ♦ Injunction & TRD Bonds ♦ Probate & Guardianship Bonds

Surety One, Inc. is always ON

SURETY ONE

"Bondsmen to the World"

Puerto Rico, United States, US Virgin Islands and Dominican Republic

(787) 333-0222

(800) 373-2804

www.SuretyOne.org

Underwriting@SuretyOne.org

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 29

Unauthorized Practice of Law Claims Against LegalZoom—Who Do These Lawsuits Protect, and is the Rule Outdated?

CAROLINE SHIPMAN*

INTRODUCTION

Hypothetical 1: It is a rainy day and you need to get from your apartment to an appointment quickly. You could go outside, brave the elements, and look for a taxi. But it might be awhile until you spot one. And even then, when you think you've found one, the light might not be on—it could be busy. Not to mention the fact that taxis can be expensive, and the rates go up with traffic. Alternatively, you could order an Uber. The Uber has an upfront price, it will come straight to your door, and you do not need to embarrassingly flail your arms and sprint in the streets to hail it.

Hypothetical 2: You have just come up with an amazing invention in a not-so-great economy and want to get a patent as soon as possible. You could try to find a patent lawyer, asking around for recommendations and doing research on qualified lawyers in your area. This could take a while. And even if you do find one you like the lawyer could be too busy to take you on as a client. Not to mention the fact that lawyers can be expensive, and that you might incur a substantial amount of unanticipated charges. Alternatively, you could use LegalZoom. LegalZoom provides a set price for registering a patent, you can do it from your couch, and best of all, you do not need to interact with a lawyer.

The hypotheticals above are meant to illustrate how developments in technology have drastically changed the ways many businesses operate and how consumers have come to demand more easily accessible and less expensive services.¹ Perhaps most apparently, these changes have affected simple business models like transportation in Hypothetical 1, food delivery, and booking a spin class. But they also have touched complex industries where business is typically conducted by licensed professionals, like the legal services described in

* J.D., Georgetown University Law Center (expected May 2020); B.A., Kenyon College (2015). © 2019, Caroline Shipman.

1. See Jochen Wirtz, How Tech and the Focused Service Model Are Transforming the Service Sector, FORBES, (Mar. 12, 2018), <https://www.forbes.com/sites/nusbusinessschool/2018/03/12/how-tech-and-the-focused-service-model-are-transforming-the-service-sector/#7722ebb2397a> [<https://perma.cc/Z3YW-KVM3>].

Hypothetical 2.² Unsurprisingly then, numerous companies are trying to use technology to disrupt the legal industry to provide cheaper and more convenient legal services to consumers. A recent study conducted by Harris Poll of over 2,000 adults in the United States showed that 76% of respondents aged 18–54 said “they were willing to use online legal services for legal issues if it would save them money.”³

Based on the facts above, one might think that lawyers working on less complex matters for smaller clients will inevitably be edged out by these online legal services. However, Rule 5.5 of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct published by the American Bar Association, the restriction on the unauthorized practice of law, has served as a roadblock, halting the complete overthrow of traditional legal services,⁴ and highlights some of the ethical issues surrounding whether these online legal services are an adequate substitute to traditional legal services. Although there are multiple providers of online legal services,⁵ this Note will look specifically at LegalZoom, which has faced a number of unauthorized practice of law challenges.⁶ The different lawsuits regarding this issue that LegalZoom has faced and continues to face raise interesting questions of whom the restriction on the unauthorized practice of law is meant to protect, what the rule seeks to achieve, and whether it has been successful in its goals.

This Note examines three recent unauthorized practice of law allegations involving LegalZoom, which have involved dissimilar parties opposing LegalZoom and which have unfolded in very different ways. The first lawsuit discussed is LegalZoom v. North Carolina State Bar.⁷ In this case, LegalZoom brought an action against the North Carolina State Bar in response to their cease and desist letters to LegalZoom on the basis that it was operating illegally and engaged in the unauthorized practice of law.⁸ The second case discussed is Janson v.

2. Another example of a complex industry where business is typically conducted by licensed professionals is financial advising. A growing number of financial services companies are providing consumers the option to use robo-advisors to create and manage their stock portfolios. See Tara Siegel Bernard, Robo-Advisers for Investors Are Not One-Size-Fits-All, N.Y. TIMES, (Jan. 26, 2016), <https://www.nytimes.com/2016/01/23/your-money/robo-advisers-for-investors-are-not-one-size-fits-all.html> [<https://perma.cc/ATP3-NXE5>].

3. ALM Media, Survey: 69 Percent of People Would Use Online Legal Services Over Attorneys, YAHOO FINANCE (Dec. 12, 2018), <https://finance.yahoo.com/news/survey-69-percent-people-online-163048715.html> [<https://perma.cc/PNK9-HRME>].

4. Cf. Emily McClure, LegalZoom and Online Legal Service Providers: Is the Development and Sale of Interactive Questionnaires That Generate Legal Documents the Unauthorized Practice of Law?, 105 KY. L.J. 563, 573 (2017) (discussing a number of cases where unauthorized practice of law claims have been brought against online legal providers).

5. Other companies that provide legal services comparable to those provided by LegalZoom include RocketLawyer, Bridge US, and Modria. Margaret Hagan, The User Experience of the Internet as a Legal Help Service: Defining Standards for the Next Generation of User-Friendly Online Legal Services, 20 VA. J.L. & TECH. 394, 413 (2016).

6. McClure, supra note 4, at 573.

7. LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

8. Id. at *2-5.

LegalZoom, which was a class action brought in Missouri by customers of LegalZoom against the company for charging consumers while allegedly engaged in the unauthorized practice of law.⁹ The third case examined is LegalForce v. LegalZoom, a case brought by a California IP firm against LegalZoom as well as codefendants United States Patent & Trademark Office, the State Bar of California, the State Bar of Arizona, and the State Bar of Texas.¹⁰ In this still ongoing lawsuit, the plaintiffs assert that LegalZoom is engaged in large scale unauthorized practice of law and that regulators have turned a blind eye.¹¹

After the discussion of the unauthorized practice of law cases against LegalZoom, this Note will discuss two policy issues related to the unauthorized practice of law. The first issue addressed is who the ban on the unauthorized practice of law rule actually protects. The second issue is whether the rules should be updated to allow for technological companies like LegalZoom to provide consumers with certain legal services.

Part I of this Note will provide relevant background information on how LegalZoom's online legal services work, as well as provide a basic overview on restrictions of the unauthorized practice of law. Part II of the Note will examine the aforementioned unauthorized practice of law lawsuits against LegalZoom in North Carolina, Missouri, and California. Part III will compare and contrast the policy concerns raised in these different cases, and which concerns have the most merit.

I. A BRIEF BACKGROUND

This background is meant to provide a very rudimentary understanding of the way that LegalZoom's services function, as well as explain the purpose and background of ABA Model Rule 5.5's restriction on the unauthorized practice of law.

A. HOW DOES LEGALZOOM WORK?

LegalZoom was founded in 1999, when the rising popularity of the internet inspired many individuals to utilize new technologies and the web to create new types of business models.¹² LegalZoom's platform offers online interactive legal documents, subscription legal plans, and registered agent services.¹³ LegalZoom's services were designed to be an affordable alternative to traditional legal services for small businesses and individual consumers.¹⁴

9. Janson v. LegalZoom.com, Inc., 802 F. Supp. 2d 1053, 1053 (W.D. Mo. 2011).

10. LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183, at 2 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017).

11. Id. at 96-104.

12. See About Us, LEGALZOOM, <https://www.legalzoom.com/about-us> [<https://perma.cc/6PSS-VXTD>] (last visited Jan. 15, 2019).

13. LegalZoom.com, Inc., Registration Statement p. 1 (Form S-1) (May 10, 2012).

14. See About Us, LEGALZOOM (last visited Jan. 15, 2019), <https://www.legalzoom.com/about-us> [<https://perma.cc/6PSS-VXTD>].

The interactive legal document service is a large portion of LegalZoom's business.¹⁵ For small businesses, LegalZoom provides interactive legal documents that consumers can use for incorporation of their business, registering business names, applying for patents and copyrights, amongst other things.¹⁶ For individual consumers, some of the interactive legal documents LegalZoom provides include last will and testament, power of attorney, living will, living trust, uncontested divorce, and name change.¹⁷ The interactive legal documents are created through a three-step process.¹⁸ First, "customers complete an online questionnaire that uses conditional, rules-based logic to personalize questions based on earlier responses."¹⁹ Second, LegalZoom employees review the customer's "responses for spelling, grammar, and completeness."²⁰ Third, the LegalZoom software "generates a final document tailored, as applicable, to the appropriate federal, state, or local jurisdiction" and prints the final copy to send to the customer or the appropriate government agency when a filing is required.²¹ The system automatically notifies customers of the status of their documents.²²

While a user of LegalZoom's services might understandably construe the interactive document service as a form of legal advice, in its Terms of Use, LegalZoom proffers numerous disclaimers on why its services cannot be relied upon for that purpose:

At no time do we review your answers for legal sufficiency, draw legal conclusions, provide legal advice, opinions or recommendations about your legal rights, remedies, defenses, options, selection of forms, or strategies, or apply the law to the facts of your particular situation. LegalZoom is not a law firm and may not perform services performed by an attorney. LegalZoom, its Services, and its forms or templates are not a substitute for the advice or services of an attorney LegalZoom strives to keep its legal documents accurate, current and up-to-date. However, because the law changes rapidly, LegalZoom cannot guarantee that all of the information on the Site or Applications is completely current. The law is different from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and may be subject to interpretation by different courts. The law is a personal matter, and no general information or legal tool like the kind LegalZoom provides can fit every circumstance. Furthermore, the legal information contained on the Site and Applications is not legal advice and is not guaranteed to be correct, complete or up-to-date. Therefore, if you need legal advice for your specific problem, or if your specific problem is too complex to 15. See LegalZoom.com, Inc., Registration Statement p. 1 (Form S-1) (May 10, 2012).

16. Id. at p. 65.

17. Id.

18. Id.

19. Id.

20. Id.

21. Id.

22. Id.

be addressed by our tools, you should consult a licensed attorney in your area.²³

In the Terms of Use, LegalZoom purports that the company does not offer legal advice or any services meant to be performed by an attorney.²⁴ However, simply stating this policy does not necessarily make it true, and obvious tensions exist between the fine print and how a rational consumer would expect to rely on LegalZoom. This will be discussed more in the Part III discussion on policy.

B. UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE OF LAW RULES: ORIGINS AND RATIONALE

In assessing whether LegalZoom engages in the unauthorized practice of law, it is important to understand ABA Model Rule 5.5(b) and what it seeks to achieve. ABA Model Rule 5.5(b) holds that:

A lawyer who is not admitted to practice in this jurisdiction shall not: (1) except as authorized by these Rules or other law, establish an office or other systematic and continuous presence in this jurisdiction for the practice of law; or (2) hold out to the public or otherwise represent that the lawyer is admitted to practice law in this jurisdiction.²⁵

For over a century, the American legal profession has placed restrictions on who may practice law.²⁶ This rule was initially concerned with individuals fraudulently representing themselves as lawyers, but it has also evolved in response to technological changes which threatened to disrupt the channels of legal advice in far-reaching ways.²⁷

Advancements in technology seem to create new anxieties surrounding the unauthorized practice of law, and one early example of this took place when the radio became popular in America.²⁸ In the 1930s, NBC broadcast a national radio show called The Good Will Court where individuals brought their legal issues to a panel of judges who would respond to these inquiries with legal advice.²⁹ Although the show disclaimed to listeners that the legal advice on the show should not be treated as a replacement for advice from a lawyer, the ABA Committee on Professional Ethics and Grievances denounced the program.³⁰

23. Terms of Use, LEGALZOOM, <https://www.legalzoom.com/legal/general-terms/terms-of-use> [<https://perma.cc/2QUA-T983>] (last visited on Jan. 15, 2019).

24. Id.

25. MODEL RULES OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 5.5 (2016).

26. Thomas R. Andrews, Nonlawyers in the Business of Law: Does the One Who Has the Gold Really Make the Rules?, 40 HASTINGS L.J. 577, 579–80 (1989) (“At least as early as 1899, the New York Penal Code prohibited anyone from practicing as an attorney or making it a business to practice as such ‘without having first been duly and regularly licensed and admitted to practice law in the courts of record of this state.’”).

27. See Catherine J. Lanctot, Attorney-Client Relationships in Cyberspace: The Peril and the Promise, 49 DUKE L.J. 147, 147–48 (1999).

28. Id. at 200.

29. Id. at 202.

30. Id. at 210.

They condemned the show, saying that listeners would detrimentally rely on legal counsel from the show when in reality the advice might be inappropriate for listeners' specific legal situations.³¹ These lawyers brought their complaints about The Good Will Court to the New York Appellate Division, which responded by prohibiting lawyers and judges from appearing on the show which effectively ended the broadcast program.³² Although The Good Will Court did not survive, the case signaled that the future of the legal profession would be full of challenges posed by technologies that disrupted traditional modes of providing legal advice. The case also illustrated the dual motivations behind unauthorized practice of law rules: concern with protecting the public from unqualified legal advice and to act as an anti-competition safeguard for lawyers.

There are many legitimate policy reasons for the restrictions against the unauthorized practice of law. These reasons include "preserving and strengthening the lawyer-client relationship"³³ and protecting "the public from being advised and represented in legal matters by unqualified and undisciplined persons over whom the judicial department could exercise slight or no control."³⁴ The functioning of the legal system would not be possible without the privileges afforded to and obligations imposed on lawyers when they enter into a formal attorney-client relationship. The formation of an attorney-client relationship subjects a lawyer to "duties of care, loyalty, confidentiality, and communication, duties enforceable by the client and through disciplinary sanctions."³⁵ An individual receiving legal advice from an individual or entity not authorized to practice law would therefore not be afforded the protections of an attorney-client relationship, which is a serious reason why the unauthorized practice of law could end up being problematic for people seeking legal advice. The other chief reason behind the policy requiring a license to practice law is to ensure that an individual rendering legal services is competent and that the public is not injured by individuals who are not qualified to provide the services for which they are charging people.³⁶

Despite the legitimate interests that unauthorized practice of law statutes protect, some critics have rebuked these rules for several reasons. One chief reason is that these rules inhibit innovation in the legal industry.³⁷ Another major critique is that the bar's purpose in the promulgation of these rules has more to do with protecting lawyers' economic interests than with concerns for the public.³⁸

31. Id. at 204–07.

32. Id. at 212.

33. Duke University School of Law, Unauthorized Practice of Law: Supreme Court Holds States Cannot Restrict Authorized Activities of Nonlawyer Patent Office Practitioner Source, 1964 DUKE L.J. 190, 192–93.

34. W. Va. State Bar v. Earley, 109 S.E.2d 420, 424 (W. Va. 1959).

35. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS ch. 2, intro. note (AM. LAW INST. 2000).

36. Earley, 109 S.E.2d at 436.

37. See Gillian K. Hadfield, Legal Barriers to Innovation: The Growing Economic Cost of Professional Control over Corporate Legal Markets, 60 STAN. L. REV. 1689, 1695 (2008).

38. See Gillian K. Hadfield, Higher Demand, Lower Supply? A Comparative Assessment of the Legal Resource Landscape for Ordinary Americans, 37 FORDHAM URB. L.J. 129, 154 (2010).

It is ironic, given the zealous policing of unauthorized practice of law, that there is not a strong consensus for defining what the practice of law actually is. Comment 2 to Rule 5.5 in the Model Rules says that the definition of practice of law is jurisdiction specific and therefore a flexible construct.³⁹ This amorphous standard makes sense given the fact that “the boundaries of the practice of law are unclear and have been prone to vary over time and geography,”⁴⁰ and also because the multifaceted nature of providing legal services makes it difficult to render an exhaustive list of everything the lawyer does in one definition.⁴¹ However, overly broad or vague definitions of the practice of law can be detrimental in that they allow lawyers to monopolize certain activities for their own gain⁴² and stifle the innovation of affordable alternatives in the world of legal services.⁴³

II. UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE OF LAW CHALLENGES TO LEGALZOOM

Numerous plaintiffs have challenged LegalZoom in court, alleging that the company engages in the unauthorized practice of law. Because each state promulgates its own rule regarding the unauthorized practice of law, there is no universal consensus on the issue and courts have taken broad discretion in deciding these matters. Accordingly, LegalZoom has been involved in a “whack-a-mole” type of litigation, having to face each challenger that pops up in a new jurisdiction. The following examples about actions that took place in North Carolina, Missouri, and California demonstrate how different constituents interpret unauthorized practice of law statutes, and how they have sought to protect their interests against LegalZoom.

A. NORTH CAROLINA

One of LegalZoom’s unauthorized practice of law disputes took place in North Carolina in an action against the State Bar of North Carolina.⁴⁴ In 2003, the bar first looked into LegalZoom but brought no action.⁴⁵ Then, in 2007 it reopened an

39. MODEL RULES OF PROF’L CONDUCT R. 5.5 cmt. 2 (AM. BAR ASS’N 2018) (“The definition of the practice of law is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another.”).

40. DEP’T OF JUSTICE & FED. TRADE COMM’N, Comment Letter on the American Bar Association’s Proposed Model Definition of the Practice of Law (Dec. 20, 2002), at 2, <https://www.justice.gov/atr/comments-american-bar-associations-proposed-model-definition-practice-law> [<https://perma.cc/5B63-PZ5D>].

41. State Bar of Ariz. v. Ariz. Land Title & Tr. Co., 366 P.2d 1, 8–9 (1961), opinion supplemented on denial of reh’g, 371 P.2d 1020 (1962).

42. DEP’T OF JUSTICE & FED. TRADE COMM’N, Comment Letter on the American Bar Association’s Proposed Model Definition of the Practice of Law (Dec. 20, 2002), at 3, <https://www.justice.gov/atr/comments-american-bar-associations-proposed-model-definition-practice-law> [<https://perma.cc/5B63-PZ5D>].

43. Ray Worthy Campbell, Rethinking Regulation and Innovation in the U.S. Legal Services Market, 9 N.Y. U. J.L. & BUS. 1, 51 (2012).

44. See LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

45. Daniel Fisher, LegalZoom Settles Fight with North Carolina Bar over Online Law, FORBES (Oct. 22, 2015), <https://www.forbes.com/sites/danielfisher/2015/10/22/legalzoom-settles-fight-with-north-carolina-bar-over-online-law/#1080b74d3eb2> [<https://perma.cc/2N4T-FDWX>].

investigation and in 2008 issued a cease and desist letter asserting that LegalZoom's activities in the state constituted the unauthorized practice of law and therefore the company was operating illegally.⁴⁶ LegalZoom did not stop its activities, and subsequently filed an action against the Bar for relief because the Bar had refused to register the company's prepaid legal plans.⁴⁷

In the ensuing litigation, the Superior Court of North Carolina considered whether LegalZoom's activities constituted the practice of law, looking specifically into whether their services fell into two well-known exceptions to this rule.⁴⁸ The first exception considered was the "self-help" exception, and the court examined whether LegalZoom is merely a tool for people engaged in self-representation.⁴⁹ The second exception that the court assessed was the "scrivener's exception," which allows unlicensed individuals to record information provided by another individual without engaging in the unauthorized practice of law "as long as they do not also provide advice or express legal judgments."⁵⁰ The State Bar argued that LegalZoom's activities did not fall into these exceptions because its software system, which contained conditional logic based on earlier responses, does require professional legal judgment, and compared LegalZoom's questionnaires to a lawyer interviewing a client and choosing follow-up questions based on the client's response.⁵¹ In its opinion in 2014, the North Carolina court did not reach a definitive conclusion based on these arguments, holding that a more developed factual record was necessary to reach a decision on the unauthorized practice of law.⁵²

Around the same time that the North Carolina court was considering the LegalZoom-State Bar dispute, another case of particular interest to LegalZoom, which also originated in North Carolina, was making its way to the Supreme Court, North Carolina State Board of Dental Examiners v. Federal Trade Commission.⁵³ This case involved the issue of whether the North Carolina State Board of Dental Examiners, a statutorily created agency that regulated the practice of dentistry in the state, was in violation of federal antitrust laws when it issued cease and desist letters to non-dentists offering teeth whitening services.⁵⁴ LegalZoom filed an amicus curiae brief in support of the Federal Trade

46. Complaint at 26, LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

47. Complaint at 1, LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

48. LegalZoom.com, Inc. v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2014 WL 1213242 at *12 (N.C. Super. Ct. Mar. 24, 2014).

49. Id.

50. Id.

51. Id. at *5.

52. Id. at *10.

53. N.C. State Bd. of Dental Examiners v. F.T.C., 135 S. Ct. 1101 (2015).

54. Id. at 1104.

Commission.⁵⁵ The Supreme Court cited the precedent Parker v. Brown for the proposition that state regulatory bodies are immune from antitrust actions when a state acts to regulate activity within its boundaries.⁵⁶ However, when a regulatory body is made up of market participants, their actions are lawful only so much as they further state policy, and they can only claim immunity if they are subject to active supervision by the state.⁵⁷ Because the Board of Dental Examiners was a non-state regulatory body that was not subject to active supervision, they were not immune to antitrust actions.⁵⁸ Riding the coattails of this case, in 2015 LegalZoom filed a federal antitrust lawsuit against the North Carolina State Bar for its refusal to register prepaid legal plans.⁵⁹

Shortly after LegalZoom filed the antitrust lawsuit, the two parties went to the bargaining table where they developed a consent agreement in an attempt to end their years-long dispute.⁶⁰ The compromise that was reached required LegalZoom to agree to three things: (1) to have North Carolina lawyers evaluate all the documents they offer in the state; (2) to allow customers to view the full text of blank document templates before being charged; and (3) to inform customers that forms are not substitutes for an attorney.⁶¹ The Bar then agreed to support a state law to clarify some ambiguities regarding the definition of unauthorized practice of law.⁶² The General Assembly of North Carolina did subsequently pass in 2015 “An Act to Further Define the Term ‘Practice Law’ For the Purpose of Protecting Members of the Public From Harm Resulting From the Unauthorized Practice of Law,” codified in North Carolina General Statute section 84-2.2.⁶³ This section provides that the definition of the practice of law “does not include the operation of a Web site by a provider that offers consumers access to interactive software that generates a legal document based on the consumer’s answers to questions presented by the software. . . .”⁶⁴ The rule also imposes the same conditions that the consent agreement required from LegalZoom, such as to have a North Carolina licensed attorney review the templates before offering them, disclosing that the services are not a substitute for an attorney, etc.⁶⁵

55. Brief for Legalzoom.com, Inc. as Amici Curiae Supporting Respondent, N.C. State Bd. of Dental Examiners v. FTC., 135 S. Ct. 1101 (2015) (No. 13-534).

56. N.C. State Bd. of Dental Examiners, 135 S. Ct. at 1104–05.

57. Id. at 1116–17.

58. Id. at 1103.

59. See Fisher, supra note 45.

60. Id.

61. Id.

62. See id.

63. N.C. GEN. STAT. §84-2.2.

64. Id.

65. Id.

B. MISSOURI

LegalZoom also faced a legal dispute in Missouri.⁶⁶ The case was settled out of court, with LegalZoom allowed to keep operating after meeting certain requirements to change its business.⁶⁷ However, the trial court's denial of LegalZoom's motion for summary judgment on the issue of unauthorized practice of law demonstrated that it was very plausible that LegalZoom could have been found guilty of the plaintiffs' allegations. The plaintiffs in the Missouri case, Janson v. LegalZoom, were not lawyers or a bar association, but rather a class of individuals who had purchased services from LegalZoom and sued for unauthorized practice of law. The plaintiffs did not allege that LegalZoom's documents were defective,⁶⁸ but rather asserted that the money the plaintiffs paid LegalZoom "was not used for their benefit because LegalZoom is not authorized to engage in the lawful practice of law in the State of Missouri."⁶⁹

In this case, the court once again analyzed the theory that LegalZoom's services fell under the self-help exemption regarding the unauthorized practice of law, that their services were simply a tool for consumers to engage in pro se representation.⁷⁰ The court recognized that this exemption could apply when consumers downloaded and printed LegalZoom's forms to fill out themselves but drew a distinction when consumers used the online software.⁷¹ The court noted the representations that LegalZoom made in advertisements and its website remove it from the realm of self-help, discussing the nature of the online document preparation:

LegalZoom says: 'Just answer a few simple online questions and LegalZoom takes over. You get a quality legal document filed for you by real helpful people.' . . . Thus, LegalZoom's internet portal sells more than merely a good (i.e., a kit for self help) but also a service (i.e., preparing that legal document). Because those that provide that service are not authorized to practice law in Missouri, there is a clear risk of the public being served in legal matters by 'incompetent or unreliable persons.'⁷²

As stated in the excerpt above, the Missouri court paid particular attention to the role that humans play at LegalZoom and noted the various stages where LegalZoom employees intervene in these self-help services, asserting that this human intervention, and not the internet medium, created the unauthorized

66. Janson v. LegalZoom.com, Inc., 802 F. Supp. 2d 1053 (W.D. Mo. 2011).

67. Debra Cassens Weiss, LegalZoom Can Continue to Offer Documents in Missouri Under Proposed Settlement, ABA JOURNAL (Aug. 23, 2011), <http://www.abajournal.com/news/article/legalzoom-can-continue-to-offer-documents-in-missouri-under-proposed-settle/> [<https://perma.cc/BDV9-39H7>].

68. Janson, 802 F. Supp. 2d at 1057.

69. Id.

70. Id. at 1063.

71. Id.

72. Id. at 1064.

practice of law issue.⁷³ The first major aspect in which individuals are involved is when an employee creates the template itself, and the court said there is no difference between the LegalZoom document preparation and “a lawyer in Missouri asking a client a series of questions and then preparing a legal document based on the answers provided and applicable Missouri law.”⁷⁴ The court also pointed out the human intervention that occurs after the consumer has filled out the form: employees review files for completeness, spelling and grammar, consistency, factual issues, formatting, and printing and shipping the form.⁷⁵ The court asserted that this human involvement by those unauthorized to practice the law poses a risk that an incompetent or unqualified person may be involved in the creation of this legal document to the detriment of the consumer.⁷⁶

In its denial of summary judgment in favor of LegalZoom, the court held that, under LegalZoom’s then business model, a reasonable juror could find that LegalZoom engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. However, before the trial court ruled on the merits, the case was settled, and LegalZoom agreed to provide compensation to plaintiffs and agreed to make certain business modifications.⁷⁷

C. CALIFORNIA

One of LegalZoom’s most recent disputes regarding whether it engages in the unauthorized practice of law is in LegalForce v. LegalZoom.⁷⁸ In December 2017, an IP lawyer filed a lawsuit against LegalZoom asserting that by engaging in the unauthorized practice of law, and by evading the regulatory costs associated with the traditional practice of law, LegalZoom is essentially able to be a monopoly.⁷⁹ One of LegalZoom’s services is IP related, and includes trademark and copyright registration services.⁸⁰ The complaint also names the United States Patent & Trademark Office and the state bars of California, Arizona, and Texas as “necessary defendants,” alleging that they essentially abet LegalZoom’s monopoly by allowing it to operate.⁸¹

73. See id.

74. Id. at 1065.

75. Id. at 1064.

76. Id.

77. The specific business modifications were not apparent in the public record, but presumably are similar to the modifications agreed to in the North Carolina case. See Weiss, supra note 67.

78. LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017).

79. Samson Habte, IP Firm Files $60M Antitrust Suit vs. LegalZoom, State Bars, BLOOMBERG LAW (Dec. 20, 2017), <https://biglawbusiness.com/ip-firm-files-60m-antitrust-suit-vs-legalzoom-state-bars> [<https://perma.cc/YHN4-KRG2>].

80. See Intellectual Property, LEGALZOOM, <https://www.legalzoom.com/business/intellectual-property/> [<https://perma.cc/8SBN-AK9C>] (last visited Jan. 15, 2019).

81. See Habte, supra note 79.

LegalForce's complaint makes an appeal to the court based on the investments, hurdles, and requirements necessary for an individual to be authorized to practice law, pointing out the inequity in the fact that LegalZoom is allowed to offer the same service yet bypass these onuses: "Attorneys who have spent years going through law school, taking a difficult bar exam . . . and performing conflict checks cannot effectively compete against non-law firm competitors like LegalZoom on an even playing field."⁸² The complaint also notes the compliance costs that LegalZoom is able to avoid, such as not having to purchase malpractice insurance or conduct conflict checks.⁸³

LegalForce is seeking $60 million in damages and declaratory relief that would allow LegalForce to file patents similarly to LegalZoom, in essence, to remove red tape without liability for the unauthorized practice of law.⁸⁴ Some specific examples of what LegalForce is looking for in declaratory relief is that non-lawyer assistants at the firm be allowed to perform certain tasks regarding patent filing that would otherwise be the unauthorized practice of law, to not have to check for conflicts, and to sell forms for consumers to fill out themselves similarly to LegalZoom.⁸⁵

Although the LegalForce complaint raised many novel issues regarding LegalZoom and the unauthorized practice of law, resolution of this dispute will not take place in the court system.⁸⁶ This case is currently being arbitrated as the court found that when the plaintiff purchased services from LegalZoom (even for mere investigatory purposes), it became bound by the company's arbitration clause.⁸⁷

III. WHAT TO MAKE OF THESE CASES

Although all three of the cases above included unauthorized practice of law allegations against LegalZoom, these cases are extremely different and highlight some of the competing interests incident to the rule against the unauthorized practice of law. Two key issues raised are: (1) who is the unauthorized practice of law rule actually protecting, and (2) whether the current rules are appropriate in our modern society.

82. Complaint at ¶ 63, LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017).

83. Id. at ¶ 83.

84. See Habte, supra note 79.

85. Complaint at Prayer for Relief Section, LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017).

86. Kat Greene, LegalZoom Can Arbitrate IP Firm's Ad, Competition Claims, LAW360 (Apr. 10, 2018), <https://www-law360-com.proxygt-law.wrlc.org/articles/1032015/legalzoom-can-arbitrate-ip-firm-s-ad-competition-claims> [<https://perma.cc/3BT9-PXJZ>].

87. Id.

A. WHO IS THE BAN ON UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE OF LAW PROTECTING?

The cases above against LegalZoom include a number of different players, including bar associations, independent lawyers, and consumers of legal services themselves. Despite their different motives and interests, they all brought unauthorized practice of law claims against LegalZoom.

Lawyers who bring unauthorized practice of law claims might sometimes be viewed as doing so for selfish purposes.⁸⁸ That is, that the rule gets invoked not to protect consumers, but rather to protect the bar's monopoly.⁸⁹ Both North Carolina State Bar and the LegalForce complaint involved lawyers asserting unauthorized practice of law claims against LegalZoom, and they demonstrated that the rule is essentially entangled with self-interest.⁹⁰ The LegalForce complaint reveals a large element of lawyer self-interest, as it asserts antitrust claims on the basis that by engaging in the unauthorized practice of law, LegalZoom can edge out competition.⁹¹ The concerns the plaintiff raises about why a LegalZoom monopoly should be prevented are primarily based on inequity to lawyers' investments, rather than out of a concern for the public.⁹² These claims also ignore the notion that competition in the legal market might be beneficial to the public by increasing the supply of legal resources available to consumers and driving down prices. This bolsters the proposition that "[t]he belief that lawyers are somehow above 'trade' is an anachronism."⁹³

Whether rules against unauthorized practice of law are effective anti-competitive measures is another issue. Indeed, this is illustrated in the distinctions between the North Carolina State Bar and LegalForce disputes. In North Carolina State Bar, LegalZoom accused the North Carolina Bar of being monopolistic for not letting it operate,⁹⁴ while in LegalForce, plaintiffs asserted in their complaint that LegalZoom was becoming a monopoly because the bar did not crack down on them for the unauthorized practice of law.⁹⁵ The differences in these two cases also demonstrate that bar associations might not always be protective towards traditional lawyering.

88. See Julee Fischer, Policing the Self-Help Legal Market: Consumer Protection or Protection of the Legal Cartel?, 34 IND. L. REV. 121, 144 (2000).

89. See id. at 122.

90. See LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017); LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

91. See LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017).

92. Id.

93. Bates v. State Bar of Ariz., 433 U.S. 350, 350 (1977).

94. See LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

95. See LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017).

The more conventionally recognized beneficiaries of unauthorized practice of law rules, however, are consumers and the public at large. As discussed in Part I, there are a number of compelling policy reasons why strong unauthorized practice of law rules are necessary for the public benefit.⁹⁶ Two of these considerations that could potentially be undermined by services like LegalZoom are that (1) there is no real lawyer-client relationship, which creates trust as well as obligations on the lawyer's behalf; and (2) an unqualified individual might provide the legal services.⁹⁷ The Janson case against LegalZoom was brought by a class of individuals who had purchased the company's products and claimed to be harmed by the fact LegalZoom was engaged in the unauthorized practice of law.⁹⁸ The facts of that case are interesting when considering the policy intentions of the rule, because plaintiffs admitted that the documents had not been defective,⁹⁹ so the hazards associated with the second public policy reason for the unauthorized practice of law rule is not clearly met. Although the case was not decided on the merits, perhaps one could speculate that the plaintiffs' allegations that they were harmed by LegalZoom's engagement in the unauthorized practice of law does implicate the first policy consideration regarding lawyer-client relationships. That is, that plaintiffs were damaged by paying for legal services that did not provide the benefits of the lawyer-client relationship traditionally afforded to individuals who purchases legal services. Notably, because LegalZoom does not seem to have an ascertainable track record of harming the public in ways that the unauthorized practice of law rule seeks to prevent, assessing what public policy dangers might arise from LegalZoom's activities are largely hypothetical.

These different cases show that the unauthorized practice of law rules can be used by different types of parties to seek different ends. While the rule may conventionally be thought to be about protecting the public from incompetent legal service, it would be naïve not to recognize that the rule also is wielded as a weapon by lawyers to protect their own economic interests.

B. DO UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE OF LAW RULES NEED TO BE UPDATED FOR THE TECHNOLOGICAL ERA?

As discussed in Part I, many states' unauthorized practice of law rules are very broad and not friendly to technological advancements. Critics have suggested this much about the Model Rules in general, asserting that "[t]he existing language and content of the Model Rules is outdated and does not account for technological advancement."¹⁰⁰ Additionally, both North Carolina State Bar and the LegalForce complaint reveal that rules against unauthorized practice of law must

96. See Part I.

97. Id.

98. Janson v. LegalZoom.com, Inc., 802 F. Supp. 2d 1053, 1057 (W.D. Mo. 2011).

99. Id.

100. Katherine Medianik, Artificially Intelligent Lawyers: Updating the Model Rules of Professional Conduct in Accordance with the New Technological Era, 39 CARDOZO L. REV. 1497, 1501 (2018).

be updated or clarified in response to new technology, as they are inadequate in their current states.¹⁰¹

The Federal Trade Commission has also been a proponent of updating practice of law definitions in ways that would allow consumers to use technology that would otherwise be prohibited.¹⁰² As the agency entrusted with consumer protection, it noted that “overbroad scope-of-practice and unauthorized-practice-of-law-policies can potentially inhibit new ways of delivering legal services that may benefit consumers.”¹⁰³ In fact, when the North Carolina rule to update the definition of practice of law was proposed in the wake of the LegalZoom case there, the Federal Trade Commission, along with the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, wrote a comment letter that in general supported the General Assembly’s effort to allow the use of technology for certain legal services.¹⁰⁴ They suggested that updating the definition of the practice of law to exclude interactive software that generates legal documents can benefit consumers by being more cost effective, pressuring lawyers to reduce their costs, promoting more efficient and convenient legal services, and increasing access to legal services in general.¹⁰⁵ However, they also recognized certain risks to consumers by allowing this type of technology, and stated that express disclosures that the software is not a substitute for a lawyer are necessary.¹⁰⁶

The passing of North Carolina’s rule that included an exception to the practice of law definition demonstrated one way that updates to rules against the unauthorized practice of law can allow for consumers to use technology like LegalZoom for their simple legal needs. However, while a number of states have added exceptions to allow for interactive technologies like LegalZoom, most states do not provide these exceptions.¹⁰⁷ It can be expected that without updates to these rules, many more unauthorized practice of law claims will be brought against LegalZoom and its peers.

The LegalForce case suggests that updating unauthorized practice of law rules could also benefit more traditional law firms, in addition to companies like LegalZoom. The plaintiff in LegalForce said in an interview with Bloomberg Law that one goal of the lawsuit is for the law firm to be able to adopt

101. See LegalForce RAPC Worldwide v. LegalZoom.com, No. 5:17-cv-7194, 2017 WL 6505183 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2017); LegalZoom.com v. N.C. State Bar, No. 11CVS15111, 2011 WL 8424700 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2011).

102. See Cristina L. Underwood, Balancing Consumer Interests in A Digital Age: A New Approach to Regulating the Unauthorized Practice of Law, 79 WASH. L. REV. 437, 445 (2004) (“The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) has also criticized state use of broad practice of law definitions for its failure to accommodate access to emerging technologies.”).

103. DEP’T OF JUSTICE & FED. TRADE COMM’N, Comment Letter on North Carolina HB 436 at 10 (June 10, 2016), <https://www.justice.gov/atr/file/866666/download> [<https://perma.cc/3GR9-956H>].

104. See id.

105. Id. at 2.

106. Id.

107. Underwood, supra note 102, at 446.

LegalZoom's model.¹⁰⁸ The complaint even "asks the court to declare that lawyers can sell form documents, like trademark applications, and 'employ non-lawyer assistants to recommend and advise' buyers on how to customize them" without being in violation of unauthorized practice of law rules.¹⁰⁹ This case thus shows that if unauthorized practice of law rules are amended to be less hostile to technology, it is not inevitable that traditional firms will go out of business because everyone will use services from LegalZoom. Rather, traditional law firms can also cut costs and increase efficiency that will enable them to compete with LegalZoom, which will ultimately benefit consumers.

There are a few arguments, however, for why unauthorized practice of law rules should not be updated to allow for companies like LegalZoom to operate. One of the strongest arguments is that some consumers may rely on these services without understanding that the documents they purchase may be of a lesser quality and less reliable than what they would get from a traditional lawyer. While LegalZoom explicitly states in its Terms of Use that legal documents purchased on their site may not be accurate, it is not likely that people are aware of this since very few people read the fine print.¹¹⁰ For this reason, even unauthorized practice of law rules that require certain disclosures be provided by online document providers regarding their sufficiency, such as the rule in North Carolina, may fail to protect consumers from relying on LegalZoom-type documents to their detriment.

The Janson case raises another consideration as to why updating unauthorized practice of law rules to allow services like LegalZoom to operate might have detrimental consequences: that employees involved in the creation of interactive legal documents might not be competent.¹¹¹ Requiring individuals to be competent and qualified when rendering legal services is the essential purpose on the restrictions of unauthorized practice of law.¹¹² Because no qualifications or licenses are necessary to be involved in the creation and quality checking of LegalZoom documents, there is a risk of incompetency or even dubious ethics. This risk is exacerbated by the fact that LegalZoom limits its liability in its Terms of Use, providing little option for recourse for customers that would be harmed by erroneous legal documents.¹¹³ Additionally, LegalZoom has an arbitration

108. See Habte, supra note 79.

109. Id.

110. A 2017 Deloitte study found that over 90% of people don't read terms of service and legal conditions before accepting. Caroline Cakebread, You're Not Alone, No One Reads Terms of Service Agreements, BUSINESS INSIDER (Nov. 15, 2017), <https://www.businessinsider.com/deloitte-study-91-percent-agree-terms-of-service-without-reading-2017-11> [<https://perma.cc/5AAP-HTGY>].

111. See McClure, supra note 4, at 581.

112. Id. ("The purpose of regulating the unauthorized practice of law is . . . to protect the public from incompetent or unreliable persons offering legal advice.").

113. Terms of Use, LEGALZOOM, <https://www.legalzoom.com/legal/general-terms/terms-of-use> [<https://perma.cc/2QUA-T983>] (last visited on Jan. 15, 2019).

clause for customers that purchase their services.¹¹⁴ Since LegalZoom and similar companies are not technically practicing law, they would not be liable for malpractice claims. This raises a hazard which has been called the “malpractice gap” which is “created when technology companies practice law without being held to the same standard of care as the rest of the practicing legal community.”¹¹⁵

The benefits associated with updating unauthorized practice of law statutes to be friendlier to companies like LegalZoom must be considered against the aforementioned risks. A paramount consideration is that allowing companies like LegalZoom to operate does help increase access to civil justice. It does so by providing cheap and convenient legal services. It is recognized in the current legal economy that many people who have legal needs are unable to find appropriate legal services.¹¹⁶ For this reason lawyers are able to charge extremely costly fees for their services and there are limited alternatives for consumers in need of legal services that are affordable.¹¹⁷ Recognizing this need, one way to counteract the risks could be to update unauthorized practice of law statutes to allow the LegalZooms of the world to operate, but impose on them regulations regarding explicit disclosures and restricting limits on liability.

CONCLUSION

There is little doubt that advancements in technology will affect the ways that legal services are offered to the public. The cases against LegalZoom show, however, that there is often resistance to these changes that stem from the ethical issues surrounding them. The rule against the unauthorized practice of law has been invoked as a barricade to companies like LegalZoom, based on legitimate concerns about how the public may be harmed by new technology in the legal industry, and perhaps also based on lawyers’ resistance to economic competition. While some genuine public policy dangers are raised by allowing companies like LegalZoom to operate, many unauthorized practice of law rules that are hostile to technological innovation may hinder efficiency and access to justice.

114. Id.

115. David Andrew Kobilka, Backs to the Future: How the Legal Profession Has Ignored the Malpractice Gap Created by Technology, 20 J. CONSUMER & COM. L. 130, 131 (2017).

116. Deborah L. Rhode et al., Access to Justice Through Limited Legal Assistance, 16 NW. J. HUM RTS. 1, 2 (2018).

117. See Zachary C. Zurek, The Limited Power of the Bar to Protect Its Monopoly, 3 ST. MARY’S J. LEGAL MALPRACTICE. & ETHICS 242, 251 (2013).

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 30

The Truth About the Billable Hour

One important aspect of law firm life that is nearly impossible to avoid is the “billable hour.” Most law firms make their money by billing their clients by the hour. In order to be profitable to your firm, you must make enough money from your billable hours not only to cover your salary and your overhead, but also to generate revenue for the firm. It’s not a complicated equation – the more hours you bill, the more revenue for the firm.

Firms “average,” “target” or “minimum” stated billables typically range between 1700 and 2300, although informal networks often quote much higher numbers. The NALP Directory of Legal Employers (www.nalpdirectory.com) contains billable hour information in the “hour and lifestyle” tab, although many firms choose not to share their data.

Not all law firms have the same emphasis on billable hours. Public interest law firms, smaller law firms, and law firms outside of large metropolitan areas often require less billable hours and may place more emphasis on training, client development, community-related activities and the like. In addition, government and public interest employers typically do not have any billable hour requirements because they do not bill their hours to a paying client.

A. The Full Time Job: Target 1800 Billable Hours

Assume you “work” from 8:00 am - 6:00 pm each day	10.0
Assume you take an hour for lunch	-1.0
Assume you take two 15 minute coffee breaks	- .5
Assume you spend a half-hour reading legal updates and reviewing general correspondence	- .5
Assume you will need to attend department meetings, occasional conferences, and do CLE	- .5
This means that you work 10 hours a day but may bill	7.5
If you work a 5 day week	x 5
You have been at work 50 hours and billed	37.5
If you do this all year long, and we assume:
3 weeks vacation
2 weeks holiday
No sick days or personal days
You will work 47 weeks	x 47
And have billed an annual average of	1762
To gain an extra 70 hours to be respectable you could:
(a) Add approximately 1 ½ hours a week (approximately 20 minutes a day)
1 ½ x 47 weeks =	70
So come in at 8:00 am and work until 6:20 pm Mon - Fri
You have achieved	1832
BUT You have been “at work”	2420

The Commute

With a half hour commute (to your desk and working) you are “working” from 7:30 am to 6:50 pm
With a one hour commute you are “working” from 7:00 am to 7:20 pm, Monday - Friday

OR

(b) Work one Saturday a month
(10:00 am to 5:00 pm with 1 nonbillable hour) 6 x 12 months = 72

You have now billed 1834
BUT... You have been “at work” 2434

B. The Overtime Job: Target 2200 Billable Hours

Assume you “work” from 8:00 am - 8:00 pm each day 12.0

Assume you take an hour for lunch and an hour for dinner -2.0

Assume you take four 15 minute bathroom/coffee breaks -1.0

Assume you will need the same time for department meetings, conferences and CLE -.5

This means you “work” 12 hours a day but bill only 8.5

You do this 5 days a week x 5

You have “worked” 60 hours but have billed only 42.5

If you do this all year long, and we assume:

3 weeks vacation

2 weeks holiday

No sick days or personal days

You will work 47 weeks x 47

And have billed an annual average of 1997

To gain the needed 200+ hours you could add two Saturdays a month

If you work 10-5 two Saturdays per month with 1 nonbillable hour you will have 6 billables per day x 2 = 12 x 12 months = 144

For a new total of... 2141

Still Short!

So add another Saturday a month for 10 months
(take a break in Nov. & Dec. for the Holidays) 6 x 10 months = 60

You made it! You have billed

2201

However, you have been “at work”

3058

The Commute

With a half hour commute you are “working” from 7:30 am to 8:30 pm Monday - Friday

And 9:30 am - 5:30 pm three Saturdays a month

With a one hour commute you are “working” 7:00 am to 9:00 pm Monday - Friday

And 9:00 am to 6:00 pm three Saturdays a month

Keep in mind that these schedules do not account for personal calls at work, training/observing, talking with coworkers, a longer lunch (to exercise or shop perhaps), a family funeral, pro bono work (if not treated as billable hours), serving on a Bar committee, writing an article for the bar journal, or interviewing an applicant. When contemplating offers from firms, ask questions to learn more about their billable hour policies and practices.

w:\brochures\private\billable hour (July 2018)

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 31

WASHINGTON STATE BAR ASSOCIATION

ADMISSIONS POLICIES OF THE WASHINGTON STATE BAR ASSOCIATION

Under the authority of, and consistent with, the Washington Supreme Court's Admission and Practice Rules, the Board of Governors of the Washington State Bar Association (Bar) has adopted the following Admissions Policies in administering those rules. These policies apply to individuals seeking admission to the Bar as a lawyer, limited license legal technician (LLLT), limited practice officer (LPO), house counsel or foreign law consultant. These policies supplement APR 3-5, 8(f), 14 and 20-25. Any discrepancy or conflict between these policies and the Admission and Practice Rules (APR) is unintentional and will be resolved in favor of strict compliance with the APR.

Adopted July 1, 2012. Amended July 28, 2017, amendments effective September 1, 2017.
Amended November 14, 2020, amendments effective December 1, 2020.

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS AND DEFINITIONS

A. Applications

Applications for admission to practice law in Washington must be completed and submitted online or as prescribed by the Bar's admissions staff. Permission to submit an application in a paper format may be requested and granted for good cause shown.

B. Definitions

"Approved Law School" means a law school approved by the Board of Governors. Only those law schools approved, or provisionally approved, by the American Bar Association at the time the J.D. was conferred are approved by the Board of Governors. A list of ABA approved law schools is available on the ABA website.

"Attorney Applicant" means a person applying for admission as a lawyer under APR 3 who, at the time of filing the application, has ever been admitted to practice law as a lawyer (or the equivalent for that jurisdiction) in any jurisdiction other than Washington.

"Foreign Law Consultant Applicant" means a person applying for licensure as a foreign law consultant under APR 14.

"General Applicant" means a person applying for admission as a lawyer under APR 3 who, at the time of filing the application, has never been admitted to practice law as a lawyer (or the equivalent for that jurisdiction) in any jurisdiction other than Washington.

"House Counsel Applicant" means a person applying for licensure as a house counsel under APR 8(f).

"LLLT Applicant" means a person applying for admission as a limited license legal technician.

"LPO Applicant" means a person applying for admission as a limited practice officer.

II. APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS

A. Application Submission Policy

All applicants must submit electronically, within the filing deadlines specified below, the following:

- a completed application in the form required by the Bar including any required supplemental documentation;
- two Certificates of Good Moral Character, dated within 6 months prior to the application date and completed by two lawyers admitted to practice law in any U.S. jurisdiction or the foreign jurisdiction in which the applicant is admitted to practice law. For LLLT Applicants and LPO Applicants the certificates may be completed by LLLTs or LPOs admitted to practice in Washington; and
- an Authorization and Release form. The form must be signed and notarized within 6 months prior to the application date.

In addition, Attorney Applicants must submit:

- a Certificate of Good Standing from each jurisdiction in which the applicant has ever been admitted (including federal courts and tribal courts). Certificates of Good Standing (or similar document) for Attorney Applicants admitted to practice law must be issued by the admitting authority (e.g., State Bar or highest state court) in each jurisdiction where the applicant has been admitted. If the applicant is no longer admitted in the jurisdiction, the applicant must submit a letter from the jurisdiction that includes the dates of admission and status history. The certificate or letter must be signed and dated within 6 months prior to the application date.

All documents must be in English or accompanied by a certified English translation.

B. Application Filing Deadlines

Only applications for an exam have a filing deadline. Applications for admission by exam are accepted beginning February 1 for the summer exam and September 1 for the winter exam. Filing deadlines for applications to take an examination are as follows:

Examination	Applications Accepted	First Deadline	Late Filing Deadline	Failed the Immediately Preceding Winter WA Exam Deadline With No Late Fee
Summer Exam	February 1	March 5	April 5	May 5
Winter Exam	September 1	October 5	November 5	N/A

The deadline will be the next business day when a deadline falls on a Saturday, Sunday or holiday.

Late filing requires payment of a late filing fee as provided in the fee schedule. No applications will be accepted after the late filing deadline except for applicants who failed the immediately preceding winter Washington exam and are applying for the following summer Washington exam; those applicants are not required to pay the late filing fee and the deadline will be May 5.

Applications, including payment, Authorization and Release form, and Certificates of Good Moral Character, must be submitted online by 11:59 P.M. (PST/PDT) the day of the deadline. Applications, authorization and release forms, or certificates of good moral character filed after the first deadline will incur a late filing fee. Applications with incomplete or missing payment, authorization and release forms or certificates of good moral character will not be processed and will be disqualified if not received by the final deadline.

The LLLT Board or Limited Practice Board may schedule exams at times other than the lawyer bar exams and set application deadlines for those exams. Any such exams and the corresponding application deadlines will be posted on the Bar’s website.

C. Other Deadlines

- Request ADA accommodations..... 45 days prior to first day of exam.
- File all requested and/or additional items..... 18 days prior to first day of exam.
- Character and fitness resolution..... 18 days prior to first day of exam.
- Exam360 (laptop) registration 18 days prior to first day of exam.

Change of exam method.....	18 days prior to first day of exam.
Change of exam location	18 days prior to first day of exam.
Special requests for exam room	18 days prior to first day of exam.
Withdraw from exam with partial refund.....	18 days prior to first day of exam.
UBE Score Transfer Applications.....	No deadline, may apply at any time.
Admission by Motion Applications	No deadline, may apply at any time.
House Counsel Applicants.....	No deadline, may apply at any time.
Foreign Law Consultant Applicants.....	No deadline, may apply at any time.
Withdraw a non-exam application with partial refund	One year from date of application.

III. FEES

A. Fee Schedule

(1) General Applicants.....	$585
Late Filing Fee (exam applicants only).....	$300
(2) Attorney Applicants	$620
Late Filing Fee (exam applicants only).....	$300
(3) LLLT Applicants.....	$300
Practice Area Exam Only	$250
Professional Responsibility Exam Only.....	$80
Late Filing Fee.....	$150
(4) LPO Applicants	$200
Late Filing Fee.....	$100
(5) House Counsel Applicants.....	$620
(6) Foreign Law Consultant Applicants.....	$620

All bank card transactions are subject to a separate non-refundable transaction fee of 2.5%. There is no transaction fee for payments by electronic funds transfer or check.

For exam applicants, payments by check must be received or postmarked by the application deadline. Payments received or postmarked after the first deadline will incur a late filing fee as outlined in section II (B). Applications will not be accepted if payment is received or postmarked after the final deadline.

B. NCBE Investigation Fee

Applications for General Applicants applying under APR 3(b)(4)(B), House Counsel Applicants, Foreign Law Consultant Applicants, and all Attorney Applicants, except for applicants eligible for military spouse admission by motion under APR 3(c)(2), are referred to the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE) for verification and investigation of the information in the application. Applicants are required to pay a nonrefundable investigation fee to the NCBE. See section V of these policies for all NCBE requirements.

C. Withdrawals and Refunds

For all applicants, the application fee includes a non-refundable administrative processing fee as set forth below. An exam applicant must withdraw an application at least 18 days prior to the date of the examination for a partial refund. All other applicants must withdraw their applications no later than one year after filing the application to receive a partial refund. The Bar will issue a refund of the application fee less the administrative fee. Any late filing fees paid and any investigation costs are nonrefundable. No refunds will be issued for withdrawals or disqualifications made less than 18 days prior to the date of the exam. Exam applicants forfeit all fees if they do not show up for the exam.

The partial refund policy applies to applications that are disqualified.

Administrative Fee (nonrefundable portion of application fee):

General, Attorney, House Counsel and Foreign Law Consultant Applicants.....	$300
LLLT Applicants.....	$150
LPO Applicants	$100

If there are extraordinary circumstances that prevent an applicant from taking the examination (e.g., a serious medical emergency, death in the immediate family, significant health problems, house fire), a written request must be delivered to the Bar within 18 days after the exam in order to receive a partial refund as set forth above. The Bar may require the applicant to submit supporting documentation for the request.

For good cause shown, Bar staff has discretion to change the application type upon request of the applicant and transfer any application fee already paid to the new application type.

IV. CHARACTER & FITNESS REVIEW

All applicants are subject to a character and fitness review prior to being admitted to practice law in Washington State. The responsibility for full disclosure rests entirely upon the applicant. Permission to sit for the examination or admission to practice law may be withheld pending a hearing before the Character and Fitness Board and a final determination by the Washington Supreme Court regarding whether the applicants have met their burden of proving that they are of good moral character, fit to practice law and have met the Essential Eligibility Requirements. See APR 20-24.3. Factors considered by Admissions staff and Bar Counsel when determining whether an applicant should be referred to the Character and Fitness Board are set forth in APR 21(a).

Washington requires resolution of all character and fitness issues at least 18 days prior to sitting for the exam. Exam applicants with unresolved character and fitness issues after this deadline will not be permitted to sit for the exam and will have their application transferred to the next exam. Applicants may choose to withdraw from the exam and receive a partial refund if the request is made at least 18 days prior to the first day of the exam in lieu of transferring to the next exam. Therefore, applicants who disclose any information that may raise an issue of character or fitness are advised to file their applications early in the registration period. Early filing or providing information prior to the 18 day deadline does not guarantee all issues will be resolved 18 days prior to the exam.

V. NCBE REPORT REQUIREMENT

Applications for General Applicants applying under APR 3(b)(4)(B), House Counsel Applicants, Foreign Law Consultant Applicants, and all Attorney Applicants, except for applicants eligible for military spouse admission by motion under APR 3(c)(2), are referred to the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE) for verification and investigation of the information in the application. Applicants who have an application that is referred to the NCBE will be contacted by the NCBE and required to pay an investigation fee and submit authorization and release forms directly to the NCBE. The Bar cannot finish processing applications until the report is received from the NCBE.

Applicants applying for an exam will not be allowed to sit for the exam if the Bar does not receive a report back from the NCBE at least 18 days prior to the first day of the exam; in that case, the application will be transferred to the next exam.

Applicants may choose to withdraw from the exam and receive a partial refund if the request is made at least 18 days prior to the first day of the exam in lieu of transferring to the next exam.

NCBE reports are valid for one calendar year from the date the Bar receives the completed report from the NCBE, after which a supplemental or new NCBE report will be required. See the NCBE website for additional information: <http://www.ncbex.org/character-and-fitness/jurisdiction/wa>.

VI. REASONABLE ACCOMMODATIONS UNDER THE ADA

Any applicant with a disability for which reasonable accommodation is needed must request such accommodation through the online admissions site at least 45 days prior to the examination date. Applicants requesting reasonable accommodations because of disabilities must provide appropriate documentation of the disability and specify the extent to which the standard testing procedures need to be modified. The burden of proof is on the applicant to show the need for any reasonable accommodations. The Bar reserves the right to make final judgment concerning testing accommodations and may have documentation reviewed by a medical specialist, psychologist or learning disability specialist. See the online admissions site for additional information regarding accommodations requests and required documentation.

Any reasonable accommodation may not compromise the integrity or security of the examination or affect the standards set for the examination. The Bar and any applicant granted accommodations must agree to and accept the terms and conditions of the accommodations no less than 18 days prior to the first day of the examination.

VII. SPECIAL REQUESTS FOR THE EXAM ROOM

For good cause shown, applicants may be permitted to bring otherwise prohibited items into the exam room. Examples of items are: pillows/lumbar supports, ergonomic chairs, book stand, wrist rest, medication, external keyboard or mouse, and religious headgear. In addition, applicants may request a specific seating location in the exam room due to a medical condition.

The Bar will provide a room for nursing mothers upon request. Nursing mothers may use the nursing room before and after the exam, during breaks and during the exam. An applicant must be accompanied by a proctor if the nursing room is used during the exam session.

All special requests for an exam must be made on the online admissions site no less than 18 days prior to the first day of the exam. All requests must be supported (if applicable) by a doctor's note.

VIII. LAPTOP USE AND EXAM360 SOFTWARE

Applicants for an exam requesting to use a laptop computer for the written portions of the exam must register, pay for, and download software from ILG Exam360. Exam360 must be purchased and downloaded for each administration of the exam, even if used in the past. Fees paid to ILG Exam360 are nonrefundable and nontransferable. Laptop users must sign a waiver of liability on exam day. Applicants who do not purchase and download the software by 18 days prior to the exam will be required to handwrite the exam.

If an exam applicant's laptop fails prior to the exam, the applicant must contact ILG Exam360 to download Exam360 again.

IX. EXAMINATION PROVISIONS

A. Grading and Results for All Examinations

(1) All applicants for all exams are to abide by the Exam Security Policy as established by the Bar.

(2) Grading of examinations shall be anonymous. Graders shall be provided exam answers with only the applicant ID number to identify to whom the answer belongs. Names or other personal information that would identify an applicant is not provided to the graders. All information matching names and numbers of the applicants shall be kept in the custody of the Bar until all examinations have been graded and each examination has been given either a pass or fail grade by applicant number only.

(3) There is no review or appeal of final examination results. APR 4(b).

(4) The names of successful applicants will be posted on the Bar's website.

(5) Unsuccessful exam applicants may reapply and retake the exam in the same manner as any other applicant.

B. Lawyer Bar Examination

(1) All lawyer bar exam applicants must pass the Uniform Bar Exam prepared and coordinated by the National Conference of Bar Examiners. The UBE consists of Multistate Bar Exam (MBE), Multistate Essay Exam (MEE) and Multistate Performance Test (MPT) questions. The UBE is administered over two days in accordance with the procedures established by the NCBE.

(2) The Board of Bar Examiners is responsible for the grading of the MEE and MPT questions on the UBE. In order to assure fairness and uniformity in grading, the Board of Bar Examiners shall follow NCBE-prescribed standards for grading to be used by all graders. The Board of Bar Examiners shall, as soon as practicable and within any guidelines prepared by the NCBE, certify the scores on the MEE and MPT portions for all applicants who have taken the UBE.

(3) Upon completion of the grading and certification, the Bar shall cause each lawyer bar exam applicant to be notified of the result of the examination. All results shall be reported to the NCBE in accordance with procedures established by the NCBE. All scaled scores and the applicant's national percentile rank for the MBE will also be reported to the applicant's law school.

(4) All lawyer bar exam applicants will be provided with the scaled written (MEE+MPT) score, scaled MBE score, total scaled UBE score and their national percentile rank for the MBE. Unsuccessful lawyer bar exam applicants will receive copies of their written essay and performance test questions and answers and written raw scores. No other raw scores, results information or examination materials will be provided to the applicants.

C. Washington Law Component

All applicants qualifying for admission as a lawyer under APR 3 must pass the Washington Law Component (WLC). The WLC is comprised of online materials and an online multiple choice test based on areas or subjects of law that are specific to Washington State. The Board of Bar Examiners is responsible for the content of the WLC and shall publish the Washington state specific materials for applicants.

The WLC is self-administered by applicants and is available to applicants after submitting the application. There is no fee to take the WLC. The WLC is an open-book test. Applicants may take the WLC as many times as necessary to achieve the minimum pass score. There is a mandatory waiting period of 24 hours after failing to pass the WLC the first time. Subsequent fails of the WLC require a 72 hour waiting period before retaking the test. The WLC minimum pass score is 80% correct. If an applicant fails the UBE or withdraws from the UBE after taking the WLC, that applicant must retake the WLC after applying for the next UBE administration.

X. UBE SCORE TRANSFER APPLICANT PROVISIONS

UBE score transfer applicants must have a qualifying UBE score and must meet one of the qualifications for lawyer bar examination applicants as set forth in APR 3(b).

UBE score transfer applicants may apply in Washington as a UBE score transfer applicant while applying in a different UBE jurisdiction to take the UBE, with the intent of transferring a qualifying score from that jurisdiction to Washington. The applicant must notify the Bar of the jurisdiction where the applicant will take the UBE.

Applicants are not permitted to apply at the same time for admission in Washington as both an applicant to take the UBE in Washington and an applicant seeking to transfer a UBE score to Washington.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 32

Utah State Bar
Licensed Paralegal Practitioner Program
Admissions and Licensing
645 South 200 East
Salt Lake City, Utah 84111
(801) 531-9077
Web site: www.utahbar.org

UTAH STATE BAR

LICENSED PARALEGAL PRACTITIONER APPLICATION FOR ADMISSION
FILING INSTRUCTIONS and INFORMATION

These instructions apply to persons who wish to file an application for admission to the Utah State Bar as a Licensed Paralegal Practitioner.

READ AND RETAIN THESE INSTRUCTIONS for use in preparing your application and for future reference.

The application conforms with the requirements outlined in Rule 14-802- Authorization to Practice Law, and the Rules Governing Licensed Paralegal Practitioners (“Rules”). You should refer to these rules (available on the Bar’s website) prior to completing the application. Neither the Bar nor its representatives has the authority to waive the deadlines, fees, or requirements contained therein.

Use these instructions in conjunction with the Application Checklist and the Application Steps (both found on our website) to ensure you compile and submit a complete application.

The first step in meeting the burden of proving your character and fitness to practice law as a Licensed Paralegal Practitioner (“LPP”) is to demonstrate your individual ability to read and follow instructions and thereby file a complete and accurate application. The LPP Admissions Staff is available to answer questions that may arise as you complete the application process. However, it is not the role of the LPP Admissions Staff to:

1. Advise you whether you should answer ‘Yes’ or ‘No’ to a particular question;
2. Suggest the evidence you should provide in order to meet your burden of proving character and fitness or eligibility; or
3. Conduct an individualized review of your application to determine what documents are still missing.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Filing Deadlines.....	1
II. Application Fees.....	1
III. Completing and Filing the Application.....	2
A. Format
B. Content
C. Submission
IV. Supplemental Documentation.....	4
A. Documentation to be Provided with Application
B. Documentation to be Provided only if Applicable
C. Documentation that can be Mailed
D. Documentation to be Provided by Third Party
E. Declaration of Completion
V. Reapplication for Admission	10
VI. Application Procedures.....	11
A. Updating the Application
B. Correspondence
C. Process
VII. Character and Fitness... ..	13
A. Overview
B. Investigation
C. Denied Applicants
VIII. Test Accommodations.....	15
IX. Application Withdrawal, Transfer, and Refund Policies... ..	16
X. General Information Concerning the LPP Examination... ..	18
XI. Most Common Errors that Delay the Processing of an Application.....	20

I. FILING DEADLINES

A. APPLICATIONS FOR ADMISSION BY EXAMINATION

MARCH EXAMINATION:

Application filing deadline date – October 1

Late filing deadline date – October 15 (include a $50 late fee)

Final filing deadline date – November 1 (include a $100 late fee)

AUGUST EXAMINATION:

Application filing deadline date – April 1

Late filing deadline date – April 15 (include a $50 late fee)

Final filing deadline date – May 1 (include a $100 late fee)

The Application, with all forms and applicable supplementary documentation, must be received by the Bar (NOT postmarked) by close of business on the appropriate filing deadline. If the deadline date falls on a Saturday, Sunday, or holiday the deadline date will be the first business day thereafter.

NO APPLICATIONS OR SUPPLEMENTAL DOCUMENTATION FOR APPLICATIONS WILL BE ACCEPTED AFTER NOVEMBER 1 FOR THE MARCH LPP EXAMINATION AND MAY 1 FOR THE AUGUST LPP EXAMINATION.

II. APPLICATION FEES

A. Application fees are subject to change without notice and are as follows:

Applicants taking All Practice Areas and Professional Responsibility Examination	$400
Applicants taking one or two Practice Areas and Professional Responsibility Examination	$100/each exam area
	AND
	$100 for Professional Responsibility
Incomplete Application Fee	Varies, up to $150

B. Personal checks or money orders can be used for payment of application fees. Please make checks or money orders payable to: Utah State Bar.

C. It is strongly recommended that you wait to pay the fee and submit your application when you are sure you will be able to meet the next applicable deadline. Please note: if you pay the fees but then miss the application deadline, you must pay the late fee that is in force on the day all required documentation is received by the Admissions Office.

D. If at any time in the course of processing your application the Bar discovers that your application is missing documentation that should have been included when it was filed, an additional late fee may be assessed. This applies to all applications.

III. COMPLETING AND FILING THE APPLICATION

A. FORMAT

1. The LPP Exam Application Form must be typed and submitted to the LPP Admissions Office by the applicable filing deadline date.
 - a) The examination applications for the August exam are posted the preceding December or January. The examination applications for the March exam are posted the preceding July or August. If you want to start gathering information for the application, you may do so prior to the application being posted by referring to the Application Checklist and Application Steps.
2. The Application process requires you to provide numerous supporting documents. You must do so before the application deadline. A small number of documents will need to have the original mailed; these also must be received- NOT postmarked- by the Bar by the deadline.

B. CONTENT

1. All questions must be fully answered; leave no questions blank.
2. If a particular question does not apply or the answer is "none," so state.
3. If the question calls for an explanation, provide a detailed narrative of all circumstances and events leading up to and surrounding the incident(s) described in your response. Failure to do so delays the processing of your application. Use extra paper as necessary.
4. If you need additional space in order to provide all the information requested (for example, if you attended more than 3 colleges) you may copy the blank forms and use the blank copies to supply the necessary information.
5. Unless otherwise noted, all dates must include the month and the year.
6. All addresses, including reference and employer addresses, must be current and include zip codes. Telephone numbers must also be provided where requested. If an employer is no longer in business, provide the address as it was when you were employed there; instead of a phone number include a note that it no longer exists.
7. Thoroughly PROOFREAD your responses.
8. Absolute and complete candor is required. Omissions or misstatements on the application will be presumed intentional. Failure to be completely candid on your application may result in denial of admission.

C. SUBMISSION

1. Use the Application Checklist as a guide to gather the necessary documents prior to submission. Verifying that your application is complete is your responsibility.
2. Once you submit your application, any changes to your application will need to be made by filing an Amendment form.
3. If you submit an incomplete application, even if you paid the filing fee with your application, you may be subject to subsequent late fees in place when your application is completed. These fees will need to be paid by check or money order. The Bar does not accept credit card payments at this time.
4. Your complete application is not considered fully ‘submitted’ or ‘filed’ until all required documents have been submitted and the Declaration of Completion is received by the Admissions Office. In other words, if you submit your application and provide the required forms on March 1st, but your Declaration of Completion does not arrive until March 14th, your application is considered filed on March 14th. For those documents with a time limit (for example, the DMV record cannot be dated more than 30 days prior to the date the application is filed), the time would be measured from March 14th.
5. Applications mailed to the Bar should be sent with tracking capability (i.e. FedEx, UPS, U.S. Certified or Priority Mail) to the following address:

Utah State Bar
LPP Admissions
645 South 200 East
Salt Lake City, UT 84111

The LPP Admissions Office cannot be held liable for any lost applications sent via methods without tracking capabilities.

IV. SUPPLEMENTAL DOCUMENTATION

A. DOCUMENTATION TO BE PROVIDED WITH APPLICATION

1. Passport-style photograph. This photograph will be used on your Bar card once admitted. It will also be used to verify your identity at the examination. The photograph must be recent (within the last year) and it must be different from your government ID (i.e. do not simply scan your driver's license or passport). Your appearance should be the same on the day of the test so if something changes (e.g. hair color or facial hair), you will need to send a new photo. Attach the photo to the Application in the area noted on the first page.
2. Applicant Certification and Acknowledgment. This document must be initialed, signed with a pen, dated and notarized. Signature and date of notary execution must be no more than 30 days prior to the date the application is filed. Read this document carefully. This is your sworn verification that all statements and representations in your application are true and correct. The Application Verification and Acknowledgement is also your sworn statement that no alterations have been made to the text of the application questions, that you have proofread your responses, that you will amend your application within 10 days of any changes, and that you will cooperate in providing information to the Bar.
3. Authorization and Release. This document must be signed in pen, dated, and notarized. Date of signature and notary execution must be no more than 30 days prior to the date your application is filed. This document authorizes the Utah State Bar to conduct an investigation relative to your character and fitness for admission to practice law.
4. Notification of Release of Information. This document must be signed in pen, dated, and notarized. In it you acknowledge your understanding that as per the Rules Governing LPP's, the Bar is able to release information to certain parties.
5. FBI Criminal Background Report OR FBI Declaration Form. Please provide the original report with your application. This report cannot be dated more than six months prior to the date you file the application. If you have not received your background check from the FBI, you may still meet the application deadline, but only if you provide the signed FBI Declaration form. To provide proof that your request for a background check has been sent to the FBI, a copy of the mailing receipt showing the tracking or article number must be included with the declaration.
 - a) The background check process generally takes 2 months but may take longer. It is your responsibility to follow up with the FBI.

- b) Please be aware that the FBI will not allow background checks to be forwarded. If your address changes before you receive the report, you must send a new request.
 - c) The FBI does not send a copy of the completed report to the Bar.
 - d) If you receive the report after submitting your application, you must submit the document to the Admissions Office no later than two weeks prior to the next Motion for Admission to be eligible for inclusion on that motion.
 - e) If you have spent a considerable amount of time in another country, the Bar may ask you to obtain a background check from the appropriate authority in that country.
 - f) Fingerprint Card Instructions. Use this document to help you fill out the information section of the fingerprint card which you will send to the FBI. It does not need to be submitted. Blank fingerprint cards can be obtained at your local law enforcement agency or from the Utah State Bar. The Utah State Bar does not provide fingerprinting services.
 - g) Request Form. Submit this form with a completed fingerprint card to the Federal Bureau of Investigation at the West Virginia address printed on the form. This form does not need to be submitted to the Bar.
 - h) FBI-approved Channelers. For an additional fee it may be possible to expedite a background check request by using an FBI-approved Channeler to electronically forward the fingerprints to the FBI. Visit the FBI's website for a list of approved Channelers and for more information on this option. You will need to verify with the Channeler that they are able to provide an authenticated background check.
6. Driving Record. You must provide a copy of your motor vehicle records ("MVR") for the last 3 years, dated no more than 30 days prior to your application being filed. The record does not need to be certified; however, it must be obtained directly from the authority issuing the license (i.e. not a third-party website). If you have held a license in more than one state in the last three years, you will need to obtain a record from each of those states. For Applicants licensed in Utah, information on obtaining your MVR is available at the Department of Public Safety's website: <http://www.driverlicense.utah.gov>. Please note: although the DMV record only has to cover three years, you are required to report every traffic citation you have received in the last five (5) years on Form 4T.
7. Educational Requirements. Official Transcripts showing that you meet the minimum education requirements as set forth in the application and in Rules 15-701 and 703. Applicants who have received a Limited Time Waiver do not need to comply with this requirement.

8. National Paralegal Certification. At the time of filing your application, provide an original certificate verifying that you have been credentialed by one of the following organizations: National Association of Legal Assistants (Certified Paralegal or Certified Legal Assistant); National Association of Legal Secretaries (Professional Paralegal); National Foundation of Paralegal Associations (CORE Registered Paralegal).
9. Substantive Law-Related Experience Certification Form. This form must be completed and signed by the attorney supervising your Substantive Law-Related Experience. You must show that, in the three (3) years prior to your application, you have obtained the requisite number of hours, including the area-specific hour requirements, to satisfy the Substantive Law-Related Experience thresholds as set forth in Rules 15-701 and 15-703. If the same attorney has supervised you in all the practice areas, you need only submit one form. If there is more than one attorney supervising your experience in different practice areas, please submit a completed form for each supervising attorney and provide specific totals for each area in which the attorney supervised you.
10. Certificate(s) of Good Standing. (Attorneys Only) You must obtain a certificate from all jurisdictions where licensed, dated no more than 30 days prior to your application. A Certificate of Good Standing verifies your date of admission and whether you are currently subject to any discipline.
11. Disciplinary History. (Attorneys Only) You must obtain and submit a Disciplinary History (a.k.a. Letter of Discipline, Complaint Check, Grievance History, etc.) from all jurisdictions where licensed, dated no more than 30 days prior to your application. The Disciplinary History must state whether there are or ever have been any complaints filed against you, and whether those complaints were dismissed or resulted in public or private discipline. Almost invariably you must specifically request that private matters be addressed. In almost every state, the Disciplinary History is separate from the Certificate of Good Standing, and frequently it is requested from a separate authority.
12. Examination Regulations and Code of Conduct for Applicants to the Utah State Bar. This document must be initialed, signed in pen, dated, and notarized no more than 30 days prior to the date your application is filed.

B. DOCUMENTATION TO BE PROVIDED ONLY IF APPLICABLE

1. Courtesy Provisions for Health-Related Conditions. This document should be completed if you need to bring prohibited items such as medication and food or drink into the exam room due to a medical condition. You can also use this form to request special seating arrangements (e.g. near restroom, front of the room, etc.). A note from your doctor must be submitted with the form verifying your medical condition and explaining why you must have access to the item(s) at all times or why you need the special seating.
2. Medical Alert Form. Complete this form if you have a medical condition that might require emergency medical attention during the examination.

3. Form 1 – Record of Military Service. This form requires you to attach a copy of your DD-214 if you are no longer in the military. If you were in the military for any of the last five years, you must also attach a copy of your OERs, NCOERs, or the equivalent for those years.
4. Form 2 – Bonding Companies. Use this form to provide details if you answered ‘Yes’ to Question 22 about Bonding Companies.
5. Form 3 – Record of Civil Actions and Form 3A – Record of Administrative Actions. These forms require you to attach copies of the pleadings and other documentation or proof that the records have been destroyed. Therefore, these forms should always have at least one document attached to it.
6. Form 4 – Record of Criminal Cases. This form requires you to attach copies of the police reports and court documents or proof from the appropriate authority that no records are available. Writing on the form that the documents are no longer available is NOT sufficient—you must provide proof from the court and police department. Therefore, this form should always have at least two documents attached to it. Please note that you will be contacting two different authorities to obtain the requisite documentation: the police department for the police report and the court for the court documents. Also note that in most states sealed records are still available to the subject of the record; if they are not you must provide evidence that access is forbidden. If you petitioned to have a record expunged, you must provide a copy of the expungement order.
7. Form 4T – Record of Traffic Cases. The main information required for standard traffic citations are the location, the title (what the ticket was for), the date you received it, and how you resolved it. More serious cases (such as a DUI or a hi-and-run), should be reported on Form 4. If you cannot remember the information for all the tickets you have received, you will need search the court records of the states where you believe you received the citations; they will have dockets going back several decades. Most states have their court records online, for free or for a fee. Utah’s online court database is called XChange and requires payment of a fee. Tip: If you use XChange, put an asterisk after your first name (ex: John*) and do not enter any information other than your first and last name when you search; this will provide the most thorough results.
8. Form 5 – Record of Bankruptcy or Insolvency. This form requires you to attach copies of the bankruptcy documents, including the petition, schedules, and discharge order.
9. Form 6 – Record of Debts and Defaults. Use this form to provide details if you answered ‘Yes’ to questions asking about defaults or late payments on your debts. You do not need to report every debt you currently have, only those that are referenced in the application’s financial history questions.

10. Form 6T – Record of State and Federal Tax Liens. This form requires you to attach a copy of the lien and its release (if it has been released). Please be aware that Applicants with unpaid taxes will NOT receive character and fitness approval until the liens are released.
11. Form 7 – Record of Conduct. This form is necessary if you answered “Yes” to questions about “other conduct”. These questions refer to conduct and conditions that may have an effect on an individual’s ability to practice law in a safe, competent, and/or ethical manner. Answering ‘Yes’ to these questions will not result in an automatic denial. Rather, it is your opportunity to show that you understand how the conditions/conduct relate to the practice of law and what actions you have taken or plan to take to prevent any negative effects on your practice.
12. Child Support Payment History. If you are the obligor on any child and/or spousal support, you must provide a copy of your child and/or spousal support payment history. Please be aware that Applicants who are behind on their support obligations will not receive approval from the Admissions Committee until they are current and have a six-month history of on-time payments. If no official payment history is available, you may submit an affidavit from the ex-spouse verifying you are current on your payments.
13. Test Accommodation Forms. Please see the General Guidelines for Test Accommodations for more information.

C. DOCUMENTATION THAT CAN BE MAILED.

1. Character Reference Forms. Provide a copy of these two pages to the individuals you have asked to be your references. All Applicants need three (3) Character Reference Forms: one form to be completed by an individual generally known to the Applicant, one form to be completed by an attorney generally known to the Applicant, and one form to be completed by current or former employers (if unemployed). Character Reference Forms may not be completed by persons related to you by blood or marriage, romantic partners, classmates from the same graduating class, or current employees. Your references should return the complete forms to you in a sealed envelope with their signature on the seal. Once you have received all three references, mail them to the Bar in a single package by the filing deadline. Do NOT send them individually. If you want to be able to confirm receipt of the references, you should send the package RETURN RECEIPT REQUESTED or OVERNIGHT DELIVERY for tracking capability because the Bar will not be able to immediately confirm receipt.

D. DOCUMENTATION TO BE SUBMITTED BY A THIRD PARTY

1. Certificate of Law School Graduation (if applicable). Submit this form to your law school Dean or Registrar for completion. The school (or you) must mail the original of the completed document to the Bar before the deadline. Once the document is received, the Bar will send an email confirmation. Please note that this confirmation will not be sent until you have submitted your application.

2. It is your complete responsibility to follow up with the law school to ensure the original document is delivered to the Bar before the deadline. Electronic versions will not be accepted.
 - a) LPP applicants are not required to have a J.D. However, if an applicant has graduated from law school, the applicant will need to provide the Certificate of Law School Graduation or be otherwise able to satisfy the education requirements.

E. DECLARATION OF COMPLETION.

1. Declaration of Completion. This form should be the last document you sign and submit. It may be emailed to lppadmissions@utahbar.org OR mailed to Utah State Bar Admissions, 645 South 200 East, SLC, UT 84111. Read this document carefully and make sure you have complied with it before signing. The date this document is RECEIVED by the Bar (NOT the date it is signed or postmarked) is the date your application is considered FILED. The Admissions Office will not review your application until this document is received. Do not sign and send this form until you are sure your application is complete.

V. REAPPLICATION FOR ADMISSION FORM

1. The Reapplication for Admission Form is intended to update the information in a previously-submitted original application.
2. You may use a Reapplication for Admission form instead of a full application if you are in one of the following situations:
 - a) You failed an exam and it is less than two years since you filed a full application.
 - b) You were permitted to transfer your application from a previous exam for character and fitness or medical reasons.
 - c) You withdrew a previous application after it had been accepted for processing and have filed a full application within the last two years.
3. You may NOT use the Reapplication for Admission form if you are in one of the following situations:
 - a) Your previous application was rejected as incomplete.
 - b) You withdrew an application before it was accepted for processing.
 - c) Your previous application was denied.
 - d) It has been more than two years since you filed a full application.
4. Deadlines and Fees. The deadlines and fees to submit the Reapplication for Admission form are the same as those for the full application, with the following two exceptions:
 - a) You are a transfer applicant who was given a different deadline in the letter confirming the transfer.
 - b) You are a failing applicant who is reapplying for the next scheduled examination. In this case you will have a separate retake deadline that will be specified in the results letter. This deadline is usually about 4 weeks after the results are released.
5. Reapplicants should refer to the Reapplication Checklist to ensure they submit all necessary supplemental documentation. A Reapplication that is missing the necessary supplemental documentation will be rejected as incomplete.

VI. APPLICATION PROCEDURES

A. UPDATING THE APPLICATION. This is a continuing application and all changes to the information provided must be reported within ten days of occurrence, using the Amendment form found on the website. Refer to the applicable question number that you are amending and provide all details relative to that question. Changes will not be accepted by telephone or e-mail. You must continue to update your application until you are admitted to practice law as an LPP in Utah. Failure to update your application may result in denial of admission.

B. CORRESPONDENCE.

1. Almost all correspondence will be sent via email. You should check your email frequently to ensure that you do not miss crucial communication. You should also read all communications carefully.
2. It is the policy of the Bar to correspond solely with the Applicant regarding a current or potential application. This includes questions about how to complete the application. Third parties such as family members or legal assistants may not act as intermediaries between the Applicant and the Bar. Exceptions to this policy are limited to extraordinary circumstances such as overseas military service. In such cases the Applicant may provide a signed and notarized document specifying the individual with whom we should communicate and the dates when the applicant will be unavailable.

C. PROCESS.

Below is an overview of the application process.

1. SUBMISSION. You may submit the application and any supplemental documents via mail or personal delivery. Applications submitted by mail must be received by the Bar on or before the stated deadlines. Applications received after the deadline will not be accepted without the specified late filing fees.
2. ACCEPTANCE. If and when the application is complete, it will be accepted and you will receive notification via email. This should occur within 1-2 weeks after Submission. Once your application is accepted, you are expected to update it as necessary until you are admitted. Any changes should be reported within 10 days of occurrence.
3. PROCESSING. The Admissions Office will process the applications in order of the dated each was received in the Admissions Office. Depending on the number of applications, processing generally begins 1-2 weeks after acceptance. Processing involves a detailed review of the application and the commencement of the investigation; this could take up to several months. The Admissions Office may follow up with you to obtain additional documentation, information, or explanations. During this stage you may receive a “Deficiency Notice” that will list the documents needed to complete your file.

At any time during processing the Admissions Office may request that you provide more information regarding your application. You must provide any requested information before the deadline specified in the request or you will be charged a late fee.

4. REVIEW. The LPP Admissions Committee meets to examine the application and the information obtained through the Bar's investigation.
5. LPP ADMISSIONS COMMITTEE ACTION. There are several possible actions the Committee might take in regard to an application after its review:
 - a) Approval – An approval letter is issued.
 - b) Request for Additional Information – You will receive an email detailing the information desired by the Committee; after the Bar receives the requested documentation, your application will be Reviewed once again.
 - c) Corrective Action Requirement – You will receive notification that the Committee cannot approve the application until you take certain steps.
 - d) Interview or Hearing – The Committee may require you to appear in person to answer specific questions and/or to address specific concerns.
 - e) Denial – A denial letter or decision is issued detailing the reasons for the denial.
6. PRE-EXAMINATION. During this period, you will receive correspondence with details about the examination. The Admissions Office will continue monitoring and investigating each application. If your character and fitness is called into question at any time, your application may be returned to the Admissions Committee for Review and Committee Action.
7. EXAMINATION. See Section IX for general information about the examination.
8. RESULTS. Results are sent via email 8-10 weeks after the Examination. Failing Applicants have the opportunity to apply to sit for the next examination. Please note: The Admissions Office will continue to monitor and investigate your application. If your character and fitness is called into question at any time, the application may be returned to the Committee for Review and Committee Action.
9. LICENSING. A short time before the next motion for admission is scheduled to be submitted to the Court, the LPP Admissions Office will send an email to those eligible for admission. This email will detail the steps you must take in order to be included on the motion.
10. PLACED ON MOTION. If you complete the necessary steps, your name will be submitted to the Court for final approval on a Motion for Admission. Motions for Admission to the Bar are only presented to the Utah Supreme Court four times a year: February, May, August, and October.
11. TAKE THE LICENSED PARALEGAL PRACTITIONER OATH. You cannot practice as an LPP until after you take and sign the LPP Oath. This can be done any time after the Motion for Admission is approved by making arrangements with the Court. You must continue to update your application until you take the LPP Oath.

VII. CHARACTER AND FITNESS

A. OVERVIEW

1. The LPP Admissions Committee of the Utah State Bar will conduct a background investigation on every Applicant for admission to the Bar as an LPP. Under Rule 15-708 of the Rules Governing Licensed Paralegal Practitioners all Examination Applicants must be certified to the Utah Supreme Court as morally and ethically fit prior to sitting for the LPP Examination. Applicants whose Character and Fitness background investigations are not completed by the date of the examination will have their applications deferred to the next LPP Examination.
2. To avoid delays in the completion of the investigation, be certain to provide all information requested in the application, including:
 - a) Complete and accurate mailing addresses for employers and references.
 - b) Complete and detailed accounts of all circumstances where explanations are required, including dates, location and final outcome.
3. Persons who file late applications will be given the lowest priority for completion of the background investigation and character and fitness approval. Applicants whose background investigations are not completed by the date of the examination will have their applications deferred to the next LPP Examination.
4. The Utah State Bar is not at liberty to engage in discussions relative to the status of an investigation. Applicants will be contacted, however, if explanations are inadequate, additional details are needed, or the Admissions Committee requests your appearance before an Inquiry Panel to discuss matters relative to your character and fitness for admission.
5. The burden of proof is on the Applicant to establish by clear and convincing evidence that he or she has the requisite character and fitness to practice law as an LPP. Therefore, it is important to substantiate any claims or explanations with appropriate documentation.

B. INVESTIGATION

The character and fitness investigation will include, but is not limited to, the following areas:

1. Financial History. As part of the background investigation, the Utah State Bar will obtain a credit report for every Applicant.
 - a) Please be aware that Applicants are expected to be current on all of their accounts. Applicants with accounts past due or with unpaid judgments, taxes, or child support will NOT be approved. In certain situations, an applicant may be considered current on past due accounts if he or she can demonstrate that payment arrangements have been made and kept with the creditor(s) for a minimum of six months.

2. Education. Your law school or undergraduate institution will be contacted to obtain relevant information and you may be asked to provide copies of documents that were previously submitted as part of an application for admission at those institutions.
3. References. Letters may be sent, and phone calls may be made to individuals deemed by the Bar's investigator as likely to have pertinent information. Some of these references may be anonymous: this means that you did not list them as references, but they have been identified as current or former neighbors, co-workers, employees, or clients.
4. Other Jurisdictions. The Bar may contact other jurisdictions to which you have applied and/or been admitted, to verify information and perhaps obtain a copy of your application.
5. Court Records. The Bar will search court records of various states to verify that all criminal, civil and traffic cases have been reported.

C. DENIED APPLICANTS.

1. Applicants who are denied must wait to reapply at least one year after the date of the denial, unless another date is specified in the denial letter. A full and Complete application must be filed in accordance with the normal deadlines and late fees.

VIII. TEST ACCOMMODATIONS

- A. If you need test accommodations that affect the format or administration of the exam (e.g. extra time, a private room, extra breaks, etc.) and you have a documented disability that qualifies you for test accommodations under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), you may file a request for Test Accommodations using the Utah State Bar forms.
- B. These forms and instructions are found on the LPP Admissions website (“General Guidelines for Test Accommodations” and “Supplemental Forms – Test Accommodations”).
- C. You must indicate on your application that you are requesting accommodations and submit the completed forms before the filing deadline.
 - 1. If you file test accommodation documentation late you must pay the appropriate late fee. If you miss the final filing deadline your application can still move forward, but you will not be eligible for test accommodations on that particular examination.
- D. All requests must be accompanied by current, supporting medical documentation.
Incomplete requests will be denied.
- E. If there are any items that you need to bring with you into the exam room, such as food, medicine, special equipment, etc. which do not affect the format or administration of the test itself, use the Courtesy Provisions for Health-Related Conditions form to make your request.

IX. APPLICATION WITHDRAWAL, TRANSFER AND REFUND POLICIES

A. WITHDRAWALS

1. If you wish to withdraw your application, you must do so in writing. You may do this at any time. However, your ability to obtain a refund is determined by the date on which your withdrawal request is received. See “C” below.

B. TRANSFERS

1. At-will requests to transfer your application are not permitted. Emergency transfers are limited to two circumstances: 1) a personal medical emergency or 2) a death in the immediate family.
2. Applicants who are absent from the examination due to an emergency must submit proof of the emergency and a written request to transfer before the end of the examination or their application will be considered withdrawn. A $100 transfer fee must accompany the request. If you are absent from the examination and do not submit a written emergency transfer request to the Utah State Bar you will be considered a No Show and your application will be withdrawn (see section “D”).

C. REFUNDS

1. All Examination Applicants. A 50% refund of the application filing fee (NOT any/all late fees) is available for Applicants who withdraw no later than 30 days prior to the date of the LPP Examination. Absolutely no refunds will be available after such time.
 - a) Refunds must be requested in writing at the time the application is withdrawn and will be processed in accordance with the date the withdrawal request is received in the LPP Admissions Office.
 - b) No refund is available to Applicants who have been called to appear before the LPP Admissions Committee.

D. AUTOMATIC WITHDRAWALS

1. If one of the following occurs your application will be considered withdrawn, with or without notice:
 - a) If you do not file a complete application by the final filing deadline.
 - b) You fail to respond to repeated requests from the LPP Admission Office.
 - c) You are absent from the LPP examination without notice.
2. Applicants who have had their application automatically withdrawn may only reopen the process by filing a new completed application with the appropriate fees.
 - a) Those whose application was never accepted for processing (see 1(a) above) must submit a full application in accordance with the Filing Instructions.
 - b) Those whose application was automatically withdrawn after being accepted for processing (see 1(c) above) may use a Reapplication form if the Admissions Office has not specified otherwise and if it has been less than two years since they filed a full application.

X. GENERAL INFORMATION CONCERNING THE LPP EXAMINATION

A. RESTRICTION OF PERSONAL ITEMS

1. Personal items are prohibited from the testing area. More detailed information will be forwarded one month prior to the examination.
2. Restrooms and drinking fountains will be accessible during the examination, with proctor surveillance.
3. Applicants with a medical condition that necessitates bringing medication, food or special equipment (e.g. inhaler, insulin pump, lactation pump, etc.) into the exam room must complete the Courtesy Provisions for Health-Related Conditions form.
4. Use of specially designed chairs, footstools, podiums or other types of personal equipment are restricted. If such equipment is necessary for the purpose of relieving a physical disability or impairment, you must complete a Courtesy Provisions for Health-Related Conditions form.

B. EXAM FORMAT

1. Overall Format

The LPP examination is a one-day examination, consisting of a multiple-choice Professional Responsibility Exam and up to three practice-area specific exams. The LPP Professional Responsibility Exam consists of 50 multiple-choice questions (90 minutes allotted for completion). The Family Law exam consists of 50 multiple-choice questions (90 minutes allotted for completion) and an essay/practical question (90 minutes allotted for completion). The Landlord/Tenant and Debt Collection areas each have 25 multiple-choice questions (45 minutes allotted for completion) and an essay/practical question (45 minutes allotted for completion).

2. The Written Component.

Each area-specific exam contains an essay/practical question that are intended to test the fundamental skills required for the performance of many an LPP's tasks. These skills include problem-solving; factual analysis; legal analysis; reasoning; written communication; organization and management of a legal task; and recognizing and resolving ethical dilemmas.

C. UNSUCCESSFUL APPLICANTS

1. A failing Applicant is entitled to examine his or her answers to the written portion of the examination. You may do so by sending a written request to the Admissions Office with a $25 fee (cash or check).
2. Examinations shall be retained for not less than six months after the date that examination results have been announced.

3. Applicants who wish to retake the Utah State Bar LPP examination immediately following the failed exam must file a Reapplication for Admission Form (see Section V) and submit the proper application fee by the retake deadline. The retake deadline will be approximately 4 weeks after the results are released. An exact date will be provided in the results letter.
4. For Applicants who apply to retake a later exam, normal deadlines and late fees apply. If it has been more than two years since the original application was filed, you must complete the full application.

XI. THE MOST COMMON ERRORS THAT DELAY THE PROCESSING OF AN APPLICATION:

A. Failing to provide all required documentation.

1. Failing to provide evidence that you are current on child support (if applicable).
2. Failing to send all three sealed references.
3. Failing to attach the pleadings for civil actions or evidence that no records are available. (Note: Sealed records are available to the parties of the case.) See Form 3.
4. Failing to attach the police report and court documents for a criminal action or evidence that no records are available. (Note: Evidence must be provided that no records are available even if the case has been expunged.) See Form 4.
5. Failing to provide a Disciplinary History (if you are an attorney).
6. Failing to provide documentation related to Bar Complaints (if you are an attorney).

B. Failing to provide proof of mailing to the FBI Declaration Form. (Note: You may not cross out or remove this requirement from the declaration form.)

C. Answering ‘No’ when you have in fact received traffic citations. (Note: you must report every traffic citation you have received in the last five (5) years, not just those that appear on your driving record.)

D. Typographical errors in the dates of your employment or residence history.

E. Unexplained gaps of more than four months in your employment history.

F. Failing to provide a detailed explanation of circumstances surrounding any school discipline, an employment termination, a criminal act, or a civil action.

G. Failing to provide a DMV record.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 33

OVW Fiscal Year 2021 Justice for Families Program Solicitation

CFDA #	16.021
Grants.gov Opportunity Number:	O-OVW-2021-30001
Solicitation Release Date:	November 23, 2020 4:00 PM
Version:	1
Grants.gov Deadline:	January 21, 2021 11:59 PM
Application JustGrants Deadline:	January 25, 2021 11:59 PM

Eligible Applicants:

City or township governments, County governments, Native American tribal governments (Federally recognized), Nonprofits having a 501(c)(3) status with the IRS, other than institutions of higher education, State governments, Other

Other

Eligible applicants are limited to: States, units of local government, courts (including juvenile courts), Indian tribal governments, nonprofit organizations, legal services providers, and victim service providers in the United States or U.S. territories. For more information, see the Eligibility Information section of this solicitation.

Letter of Intent

Applicants are strongly encouraged to submit a non-binding Letter of Intent to OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov by January 8, 2021. Interested applicants who do not submit a Letter of Intent are still eligible to apply. For more information, see the Application and Submission Information section of this solicitation.

Pre-Application Information Sessions

OVW will post a pre-recorded Pre-Application Information Session on its website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>. This session is tentatively scheduled to be available by December 11, 2020. For more information, see the Application and Submission Information section of this solicitation.

Contact Information

For assistance with the requirements of this solicitation, email OVW at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov. Alternatively, interested parties may call OVW at 202-307-6026.

Submission Information

Registration: To submit an application, all applicants must obtain a Data Universal Number System (DUNS) number and register online with the System for Award Management (SAM) and with Grants.gov. To ensure sufficient time to complete the registration process, applicants must obtain a DUNS number and register online with SAM and with Grants.gov immediately, but no later than January 8, 2021.

Submission: Applications for this program will be submitted through a NEW two-step process: (1) submission of the SF-424 and SF-LLL in Grants.gov and (2) submission of the full application including attachments in the Justice Grants System (JustGrants). Submit the SF-424 and SF-LLL as early as possible, but no later than 24 – 48 hours prior to the Grants.gov deadline. For technical assistance with Grants.gov, contact Grants.gov Applicant Support at 1-800-518-4726 or support@grants.gov. For technical assistance with JustGrants, contact OVW JustGrants Support at 1-866-655-4482 or OVW.JustGrantsSupport@usdoj.gov.

For more information about registration and submission, see the Application and Submission Information section of this solicitation.

Notification

OVW anticipates notifying applicants of funding decisions by October 1, 2021.

Contents

Program Description	5
Overview of OVW	5
Statutory Authority	5
About the OVW Justice for Families	5
Program Scope	5
Purpose Areas	5
OVW Priority Areas	7
Activities that Compromise Victim Safety and Recovery or Undermine Offender Accountability	7
Out-of-Scope Activities	7
Activities Requiring Prior Approval	8
Federal Award Information	8
Availability of Funds	8
Type of Award	9
Types of Applications	9
Mandatory Program Requirements	9
Eligibility Information	9
Eligible Applicants	9
Cost Sharing And Match	10
Other Program Eligibility Requirements	11
Application and Submission Information	12
Information to Complete the Application for Federal Assistance (SF-424) ..	13
Standard Applicant Information (JustGrants 424 and General Agency Information)	14
Proposal Abstract	14
Proposal Narrative	14
Budget and Associated Documentation	16
Budget Worksheet and Budget Narrative (Web-based Form)	16
Pre-Agreement Cost	18
Indirect Cost Rate Agreement (if applicable)	18
Financial Management Questionnaire (including applicant disclosure of high-risk status)	18
Disclosure of Process Related to Executive Compensation	20
Data Requested with Application	20
Memoranda of Understanding (MOUs) and Other Supportive Documents	22
Additional Application Components	23
Letters of Nonsupplanting	23
Proof of 501(c)(3) Status (Nonprofit Organization Only)	23
Confidentiality Notice Form	23
Disclosures and Assurances	24
Disclosure of Lobbying Activities	24
DOJ Certified Standard Assurances	24
DOJ Certifications Regarding Lobbying; Debarment, Suspension and Other Responsibility Matters; and Drug-Free Workplace Requirements .	24

Applicant Disclosure of Duplication in Costs, Applications, and/or Current Awards	24
How to Apply	24
Submission Dates and Time	25
Application Review Information	27
Review Criteria	27
Review and Selection Process	28
Anticipated Announcement and Federal Award Dates	29
Federal Award Administration Information	29
Federal Award Notices	29
Administrative, National Policy, and Other Legal Requirements	29
General Information about Post-Federal Award Reporting Requirements	30
Federal Awarding Agency Contact(s)	30
Other Information	30
Public Reporting Burden- Paper Work Reduction Act Notice	30
Application Checklist	31

Program Description

Overview of OVW

OVW is a component of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ). Created in 1995, OVW administers grant programs authorized by the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) and subsequent legislation and provides national leadership on issues of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking. OVW grants support coordinated community responses to hold offenders accountable and serve victims.

Statutory Authority

34 U.S.C. § 12464

About the OVW Justice for Families

This program is authorized by 34 U.S.C. § 12464. The Grants to Support Families in the Justice System program (referred to as the Justice for Families Program) (CFDA # 16.021) was authorized in the Violence Against Women Reauthorization Act of 2013 (VAWA 2013) to improve the response of the civil and criminal justice system to families with a history of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking, or in cases involving allegations of child sexual abuse. The program supports the following activities for improving the capacity of courts and communities to respond to families affected by the targeted crimes: court-based and court-related programs; supervised visitation and safe exchange by and between parents; training for people who work with families in the court system; civil legal services; and the provision of resources in juvenile court matters. For additional information about this program and related performance measures, including how awards contribute to the achievement of program goals and objectives, see:

- OVW grant program information: <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/grant-programs>.
- Program performance measures under the Measuring Effectiveness Initiative: <https://www.vawamei.org/grant-programs/>.
- Examples of successful projects in OVW's most recent report to Congress on the effectiveness of VAWA grant programs: <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/page/file/1292636/download>.

Program Scope

Activities supported by this program are determined by statute, federal regulations, and OVW policies. If an applicant receives an award, the funded project is bound by this solicitation, the DOJ Financial Guide, including updates to the financial guide after an award is made, the Solicitation Companion Guide, and the conditions of the award.

Purpose Areas

Pursuant to 34 U.S.C. § 12464, funds under this program must be used for one or more of the six purposes discussed below. OVW is interested in funding projects that take a coordinated approach to helping families victimized by domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking as they navigate the justice system. To help achieve this coordinated approach, applicants may propose either a standard project or a comprehensive project.

Standard Project: Applicants must propose activities either under purpose area 1 (supervised visitation) or 5 (courts). If an applicant is proposing to provide supervised visitation/safe exchange services (purpose area 1), the applicant must propose activities under at least one additional purpose area. The courts purpose area (purpose area 5) can be addressed in combination with another purpose area or on its own under any one or more of the purpose area 5 sub-categories. However, applications that address pro se victim assistance programs (purpose area 5(b)) or propose education and outreach programs (purpose area 5(e)) also must propose activities under at least one more purpose area 5 subcategory or other purpose area(s).

Comprehensive Project: Applicants must propose activities under purpose areas 1 (supervised visitation), 5 (courts), and 6 (civil legal services). Applicants may include additional purpose areas in a comprehensive project application but are required to include purpose areas 1, 5, and 6.

VAWA 2013 includes eight distinct purpose areas for the Justice for Families Program. In FY 2021, however, OVW is limiting applicants to addressing only purpose areas 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8:

(Purpose Area 1) Supervised visitation and safe exchange: Provide supervised visitation and safe visitation exchange of children and youth by and between parents in situations involving domestic violence, dating violence, child sexual abuse, sexual assault, or stalking. Although the program statute allows for sliding scale fees (34 U.S.C. § 12464(d)(2)), to ensure accessibility of OVW-funded services, grantees providing supervised visitation and safe exchange services are not allowed to charge fees to parents served with OVW funds. For a standard project, applicants proposing activities under this purpose area must propose activities under at least one additional purpose area. For a comprehensive project, this purpose area must be included.

(Purpose Area 3) Training for court-based and court-related personnel: Educate court-based and court-related personnel and court-appointed personnel (including custody evaluators and guardians ad litem) and child protective services workers on the dynamics of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking, including information on perpetrator behavior, evidence-based risk factors for domestic and dating violence homicide, and on issues relating to the needs of victims, including safety, security, privacy, and confidentiality, including cases in which the victim proceeds pro se. Applicants proposing activities under this purpose area must also propose activities under purpose area 1 and/or 5.

(Purpose Area 4) Juvenile court resources: Provide appropriate resources in juvenile court matters to respond to dating violence, domestic violence, sexual assault (including child sexual abuse), and stalking and ensure necessary services dealing with the health and mental health of victims are available. Applicants proposing activities under this purpose area must also propose activities under purpose area 1 and/or 5.

(Purpose Area 5) Court and court-based programs and services: Enable courts or court-based or court-related programs to develop or enhance: a) court infrastructure (such as specialized courts, consolidated courts, dockets, intake centers, or interpreter services); b) community-based initiatives within the court system (such as court watch programs, victim assistants, pro se victim assistance programs, or community-based supplementary services); c) offender management, monitoring, and accountability programs; d) safe and confidential information-storage and information-sharing databases within and between court systems; e) education and outreach programs to improve community access, including enhanced access for underserved populations; and f) other projects likely to improve court responses to domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking. For a standard project, applicants proposing activities under purpose area 5 are not required to propose activities under any other purpose area. (However, OVW will not consider applications that only propose pro se victim assistance programs (purpose area 5(b)) or only propose education and outreach programs (purpose area 5(e)). Applicants may apply to implement additional purpose areas if they choose. For a comprehensive project, purpose area 5 must be included.

(Purpose Area 6) Civil legal assistance: Provide civil legal assistance and advocacy services, including legal information and resources in cases in which the victim proceeds pro se, to:

- a. victims of domestic violence; and
- b. nonoffending parents in matters:
 - i. that involve allegations of child sexual abuse;
 - ii. that relate to family matters, including civil protection orders, custody, and divorce; and

- iii. in which the other parent is represented by counsel.

Applicants proposing activities under this purpose area must also propose activities under purpose area 1 and/or 5 for a standard project. This purpose area must be included in a comprehensive project. In addition, a project in which the primary focus is on providing civil legal assistance is not appropriate for the Justice for Families Program and will be removed from consideration. At least 50% of all proposed activities and budget items in the application must be targeted toward activities other than civil legal services. All costs supporting civil legal services, including indirect costs and pro se victim assistance programs that provide civil legal assistance proposed under purpose area 5(b), will be counted toward this cap on civil legal assistance.

(Purpose Area 8) Training within the civil justice system: Improve training and education to assist judges, judicial personnel, attorneys, child welfare personnel, and legal advocates in the civil justice system. Applicants proposing activities under this purpose area must also propose activities under purpose area 1 and/or 5.

OVW Priority Areas

In FY 2021, OVW is interested in supporting the priority areas identified below. Applications proposing activities in the following areas will be given special consideration:

1. Reduce violent crime against women and promote victim safety through investing in law enforcement, increasing prosecution, and promoting effective prevention. Applications meaningfully addressing purpose area 5(a) (34 U.S.C. § 12464(b)(5)(A)) by developing or enhancing specialized courts, consolidating courts and/or dockets, and/or creating special intake centers will receive special consideration.
2. Increase resources for courts and tribes to register protection orders in the National Crime Information Center (NCIC) and give access to tribes to crime information systems. Applications meaningfully addressing purpose area 5(d) (34 U.S.C. § 12464(b)(5)(D)) by developing or enhancing safe and confidential information-storage and information-sharing databases within and between court systems will receive special consideration.
3. Increase efforts to combat stalking. To receive special consideration under this priority, applicants must clearly identify how they will meaningfully engage in efforts to combat stalking.

Activities that Compromise Victim Safety and Recovery or Undermine Offender Accountability

OVW does not fund activities that jeopardize victim safety, deter or prevent physical or emotional healing for victims, or allow offenders to escape responsibility for their actions. Applications that propose any such activities may receive a deduction in points during the review process or may be eliminated from consideration. Information on activities that compromise victim safety and recovery or undermine offender accountability may be found in the Solicitation Companion Guide.

Out-of-Scope Activities

The activities listed below are out of the program scope and will not be supported by this program's funding. See also the list of unallowable costs in the Funding Restrictions section of this solicitation.

1. Research projects. Funds under this program may not be used to conduct research, defined in 28 C.F.R. § 46.102 as a systematic investigation designed to develop or contribute to generalizable knowledge. Surveys and focus groups, depending on their design and purpose, may constitute research and therefore be out-of-scope. Prohibited research does not include assessments conducted for internal improvement purposes only (see Limited Use of Funds below). For information on distinguishing between research and assessments, see the Solicitation Companion Guide.

2. Mediation involving offenders and victims being physically present in the same place, in cases where domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking is an issue.
3. Parent education programs.
4. Individual, group, and family counseling.
5. Telephonic and/or virtual monitoring of supervised visitation. (OVW will grant temporary exceptions to grantees experiencing extreme impediments, such as the COVID-19 pandemic or a natural disaster, to in-person supervised visitation.)
6. Supervised visitation and exchange services unrelated to domestic violence, dating violence, child sexual abuse, sexual assault, or stalking.
7. Legal representation in child protection cases, except for cases in which the legal services are provided to a victim of domestic violence and the proceedings relate to or arise out of the abuse or violence committed against the victim.
8. Legal representation in child sexual abuse cases, except for cases in which the legal services are provided to nonoffending parents and relate to family matters, including civil protection orders, custody, and divorce, and in which the other parent is represented by counsel.
9. Criminal defense of victims charged with crimes.
10. Support of law reform initiatives, including, but not limited to, impact litigation.
11. Civil legal services and pro se victim assistance programs that exceed 50% of the total project costs and activities.

Applications that propose activities deemed to be substantially out-of-scope may receive a deduction in points during the review process or may be eliminated from consideration.

Limited Use of Funds

Grantees may use up to two percent of grant award funds to assess their work for internal improvement purposes only, such as by convening a listening session to identify service gaps in the community or surveying training participants about the quality of training content and delivery. Applicants considering such assessments must refer to the OVW research decision tree in the Solicitation Companion Guide to ensure that the activity does not qualify as human subjects research. The Solicitation Companion Guide also provides additional information on federal requirements related to research, assessments, and surveys.

Activities Requiring Prior Approval

Activities listed below will require prior approval in order to be supported by grant funds (see the Solicitation Companion Guide for more information on relevant requirements).

1. Surveys, whether conducted as part of a program or needs assessment, or for any other purpose. Prior approval is necessary to determine whether the activity is within the scope of the award and meets the requirements of the Paperwork Reduction Act.
2. Renovations, including such minor things as painting, carpeting, or installing lighting. In addition to obtaining prior approval, recipients must follow all necessary steps to ensure that funded renovations are in compliance with the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) and related laws, which may be time consuming and may include public notice and consultation.

Federal Award Information

Availability of Funds

All awards are subject to the availability of appropriated funds and any modifications or additional requirements that may be imposed by law. There is no guarantee that funds will be available in the future. OVW may elect to make awards in a future fiscal year for applications submitted under this solicitation but not selected for FY 2021 funding, depending on the merits of the applications and the availability of funding.

Awards will be made as grants.

Award Period and Amounts

The award period is 36 months. Budgets must reflect 36 months of project activity, and the total "estimated funding" on the SF-424 must reflect 36 months. OVW anticipates that the award period will start on October 1, 2021.

This program typically makes awards in the range of $550,000 for standard projects and $650,000 for comprehensive projects. OVW estimates that it will make up to 19 standard awards and three to five comprehensive awards for an estimated $13,000,000.

Funding levels under this program for FY 2021 are:

1. Standard projects: up to $550,000 for the entire 36 months.
2. Comprehensive projects: up to $650,000 for the entire 36 months.

OVW has the discretion to make awards for greater or lesser amounts than requested and to negotiate the scope of work and budget with applicants prior to making an award.

Types of Applications

In FY 2021, OVW will accept applications for this program from the following:

New: Applicants that have never received funding under this program or whose previous Justice for Families funding expired on or before January 25, 2020.

Continuation: Applicants that have an existing or recently closed (after January 25, 2020) award under this program. Continuation funding is not guaranteed.

Recipients of an FY 2019 or FY 2020 award under this program are NOT eligible to apply as the lead applicant on an FY 2021 proposal.

Note: Current grantees with a substantial amount of unobligated funds remaining (50 percent or more of the previous award) as of March 31, 2021 without adequate justification may not be considered for funding or may receive a reduced award amount if selected for funding in FY 2021.

Mandatory Program Requirements

Applicants that receive funding under this program will be required to engage in the following activities:

1. OVW-sponsored training and technical assistance (TTA).
2. OVW may conduct a program assessment or evaluation necessitating grantee involvement. Therefore, recipients may be expected to dedicate some OVW-funded time and resources to participating in an assessment or evaluation.
3. A new grantee orientation unless exempted by OVW.

Eligibility Information

Eligible Applicants

Pursuant to 34 U.S.C. § 12464(a), the following entities are eligible to apply for this program:

1. States, meaning any of the states and the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands (34 U.S.C. § 12291(a)(31)).
2. Units of local government, meaning any city, county, township, town, borough, parish, village, or other general purpose political subdivision of a state (34 U.S.C. § 12291(a)(40)). Pursuant to 28 C.F.R. § 90.2(g), the following are not considered units of local government and are not eligible to apply as the lead applicant: police departments, pre-trial service agencies, district or city attorneys' offices, sheriffs' departments, probation and parole departments, and universities.

3. Courts (including juvenile courts), meaning any civil or criminal, tribal, and Alaska Native Village, federal, state, local or territorial court having jurisdiction to address domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault or stalking, including immigration, family, juvenile, and dependency courts (34 U.S.C. § 12291(a)(2)). This does not include prosecutors' offices.
4. Indian tribal governments, meaning a tribe, band, pueblo, nation, or other organized group or community of Indians, including any Alaska Native village or regional or village corporation (as defined in, or established pursuant to, the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (43 U.S.C. § 1601 et seq.)), that is recognized as eligible for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians or the governing body of an Indian tribe (34 U.S.C. § 12291(a)(36)).
5. Nonprofit organizations, meaning an organization that is described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and is exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of such Code (34 U.S.C. § 12291(b)(16)(B)(i)).
6. Legal services providers, meaning entities that provide legal assistance to victims of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking. This does not include for-profit organizations.
7. Victim service providers, meaning nonprofit, nongovernmental or tribal organizations or rape crisis centers, including state or tribal coalitions, that assist or advocate for domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking victims, including domestic violence shelters, faith based organizations, and other organizations, with a documented history of effective work concerning domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking (34 U.S.C. § 12291(a)(43)). Victim service providers must provide direct services to victims of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking as one of their primary purposes and have a demonstrated history of effective work in this field.

Faith-Based and Community Organizations

Faith Based and community organizations that meet the eligibility requirements are eligible to receive awards under this solicitation (see "Faith-Based Organizations" on the OVW website for more information).

501(c)(3) Status

Any entity that is eligible for this program based on its status as a nonprofit organization must be an organization that is described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and is exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of that Code. See 34 U.S.C. § 12291(b)(16)(B)(i).

Ineligible Entities and Disqualifying Factors

Applications submitted by ineligible entities or that do not meet all program eligibility requirements may not be considered for funding. In addition, an application deemed deficient in one or more of the following categories may not be considered for funding: 1. activities that compromise victim safety, 2. out-of-scope activities, 3. unallowable costs, 4. pre-award risk assessment, 5. completeness of application contents, and 6. timeliness. Failure to comply fully with all applicable unique entity identifier and SAM requirements (see Application and Submission section for more information on these requirements) will result in removal from consideration. An applicant with past performance issues, long-standing open audits, or an open criminal investigation also may not be considered for funding.

Note: Any nonprofit organization that holds money in offshore accounts for the purpose of avoiding paying the tax described in section 511(a) of the Internal Revenue Code is not eligible for a grant from this program. See 34 U.S.C. § 12291(b)(16)(B)(ii).

Cost Sharing And Match

This program has no matching or cost-sharing requirement.

Other Program Eligibility Requirements

In addition to meeting the eligible entity requirements outlined above, applicants for this program must also meet the requirements below. All certification and other eligibility related documents must be current and developed in accordance with the FY 2021 solicitation.

Certifications must take the form of a letter, on letterhead, signed, and dated by the authorized representative. Failure to provide required certifications may disqualify an application from further consideration. At a minimum, an application missing the required certification letter will be required to submit a certification letter prior to receiving an award. The signed certification letter must be uploaded as a separate attachment in JustGrants. Sample certification letters can be found on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.

Certification of Eligibility

Under 34 U.S.C. § 12464(d), all applicants for the Justice for Families Program must:

- Certify that the organizational policies of the applicant do not require mediation or counseling involving offenders and victims being physically present in the same place, in cases where domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking is alleged.

Applicants proposing projects under purpose area 1 (supervised visitation and/or safe exchange services) must also:

- Demonstrate that adequate security measures, including adequate facilities, procedures, and personnel capable of preventing violence, and adequate standards are, or will be, in place (including the development of protocols or policies to ensure that confidential information is not shared with courts, law enforcement agencies, or child welfare agencies unless necessary to ensure the safety of any child or adult using the services of a program funded by OVW).

Applicants proposing projects under purpose area 4 (juvenile court resources) or 5 (court and court-based programs and services) must also:

- Certify that victims of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking are not charged fees or any other costs related to the filing, petitioning, modifying, issuance, registration, enforcement, withdrawal, or dismissal of matters relating to the domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking.

Applicants proposing projects under purpose area 5 to support custody evaluation and/or guardian ad litem services must also:

- Certify that any person providing custody evaluation or guardian ad litem services through a program funded under this program has completed or will complete training developed with input from and in collaboration with a tribal, state, territorial, or local domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking victim service provider or coalition on the dynamics of domestic violence and sexual assault, including child sexual abuse, that includes training on how to review evidence of past abuse and the use of evidence-based theories to make recommendations on custody and visitation.

Applicants proposing projects under purpose area 5(b) or 6 to provide civil legal assistance services must also certify the following:

Delivery of Legal Assistance Certification

Pursuant to 34 U.S.C. § 12464(d), to be eligible for an award, any recipient or subrecipient providing legal assistance with funds awarded under this program must certify in writing that:

1. any person providing legal assistance with funds through this program – (A) has demonstrated expertise in providing legal assistance to victims of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking in the targeted population; or (B)(i) is partnered with an entity or person that has demonstrated expertise described in subparagraph (A); and (ii) has completed, or will complete, training in connection with domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault or stalking and related legal issues, including training on evidence-based risk factors for domestic and dating violence homicide;
2. any training program conducted in satisfaction of the requirement of paragraph (1) has been or will be developed with input from and in collaboration with a tribal, state, territorial, or local domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault or stalking victim service provider or coalition, as well as appropriate tribal, state, territorial, and local law enforcement officials;
3. any person or organization providing legal assistance with funds through this program has informed and will continue to inform state, local, or tribal domestic violence, dating violence, or sexual assault programs and coalitions, as well as appropriate state and local law enforcement officials of their work;
4. the grantee’s organizational policies do not require mediation or counseling involving offenders and victims physically together, in cases where sexual assault, domestic violence, dating violence, or child sexual abuse is an issue; and
5. any person providing legal assistance through a program funded under the Justice for Families Program has completed or will complete training on domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking, including child sexual abuse, and related legal issues.

Required Partnerships

All applicants for the Justice for Families Program must include formal partnerships with both 1) a nonprofit, nongovernmental, or tribal domestic violence or sexual assault victim service provider (as defined in “Eligible Applicants” section) and 2) a court. If a court is the lead applicant, it must have a domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider as a project partner. If a domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider is the lead applicant, it must have a court as a partner. If the lead applicant is neither a domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider nor a court, it must have a partnership with both a domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider and a court.

Limit on Number of Applications

OVW will consider only one application per organization for the same service area. In addition, if an applicant submits multiple versions of the same application, OVW will review only the most recent system-validated version submitted before the deadline.

Application and Submission Information

Address to Request Application Package

The complete application package (this solicitation, including links to required forms) is available on Grants.gov and on the OVW website. Applicants wishing to request a paper copy of these materials should contact the Justice for Families Program at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov or 202-307-6026.

Pre-Application Information Session: OVW will post a pre-recorded Pre-Application Information Session on its website. Listening to this session is optional and not a requirement to be eligible to apply. The session is tentatively scheduled to be available by December 11, 2020 on the OVW website <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>. The session will be captioned in English and Spanish. Interested applicants needing additional language assistance should contact this program at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov or at 202-307-2026 as soon as possible, but no later than December 1, 2020.

Content and Form of Application Submission

The information below ("Letter of Intent" through "Submission Dates and Times") describes the full content and form of application submission.

Letter of Intent

Applicants intending to apply for FY 2021 funding under this program are strongly encouraged to submit a Letter of Intent. The letter should state that the applicant is registered and current with SAM and with Grants.gov. The letter should be submitted to OVW at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov by January 8, 2021. This letter will not obligate the applicant to submit an application. See <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants> for a sample Letter of Intent.

Formatting and Technical Requirements

Applications must follow the requirements below for all documents, unless otherwise noted. Points may be deducted for applications that do not adhere to the following requirements:

1. Double-spaced (Data Requested with Application, Pre-Award Risk Assessment, and charts may be single-spaced).
2. 8½ x 11 inch pages.
3. One-inch margins.
4. Type no smaller than 12 point, Times New Roman (TNR) or Arial font, except for footnotes, which may be in 10-point font.
5. Page numbers.
6. No more than 20 pages for the Proposal Narrative for standard projects and no more than 25 pages for comprehensive projects.
7. Word documents in the following formats: Microsoft Word (.doc), PDF files (.pdf), or Text Documents (.txt).
8. Headings and sub-headings that correspond to the sections identified in this section of the solicitation.

Application Contents

Applications must include the required documents and demonstrate that the program eligibility requirements have been met. For a complete checklist of the application contents, see the Application Checklist in the Other Information section of this solicitation.

OVW will not contact applicants for missing items on the list below. Applications that do not include all of the following documents will be considered substantially incomplete and will not be considered for funding:

1. Proposal Narrative.
2. Budget Detail Worksheet and Narrative.
3. Data Requested with Application.
4. Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) or Letters of Commitment (LOC) submitted in addition to or in lieu of MOU.

Information to Complete the Application for Federal Assistance (SF-424)

Application for Federal Assistance (SF-424)

Applicants must complete the SF-424 in Grants.gov. The SF-424 is generated when the applicant begins the submission process. For "Type of Applicant," do not select "Other." The amount of federal funding requested in the "Estimated Funding" section of this form must match the amount of federal funding requested in the budget section of the application package. This program does not require a match; therefore, the values for the Applicant line should be zero. The individual who is listed as "Authorized Representative" must be an individual who has the authority to apply for and accept grant awards on behalf of the organization or jurisdiction.

Intergovernmental Review (SF-424 Question 19): This solicitation ("funding opportunity") is subject to Executive Order (E.O.) 12372, Intergovernmental Review of Federal Programs. Applicants must check the Office of Management and Budget's website for the names and addresses of state Single Points of Contact (SPOC) under Intergovernmental Review: <https://www.whitehouse.gov/wp-content/uploads/2020/04/SPOC-4-13-20.pdf>. If the applicant's state appears on the SPOC list, the applicant must contact the state SPOC to find out about, and comply with, the state's process under E.O. 12372. In completing the SF-424, such an applicant is to make the appropriate selection in response to question 19 once the applicant has complied with its state E.O. 12372 process. An applicant whose state does not appear on the SPOC list should answer question 19 by selecting the following response: "Program is subject to E.O. 12372 but has not been selected by the state for review."

Disclosure of Lobbying Activities (SF-LLL)

All applicants must complete and submit the Disclosure of Lobbying Activities (SF-LLL) form in Grants.gov. Applicants that expend any funds for lobbying activities must provide the information requested on the SF-LLL. Applicants that do not expend any funds for lobbying activities should enter "N/A" in the required highlighted fields.

Standard Applicant Information (JustGrants 424 and General Agency Information)

Applicants must complete this web-based form in JustGrants, which is pre-populated with the SF-424 data submitted in Grants.gov. Applicants are required to confirm the Authorized Representative, verify the legal name and address, and enter the ZIP code(s) for the areas affected by the project.

Proposal Abstract

The Proposal Abstract must provide a short summary (no more than two pages double-spaced) of the proposed project, including names of applicant and partners, project title, purpose of the project (including goal and intended outcome), primary activities for which funds are requested, who will benefit (including geographic area to be served), products and deliverables, and how the applicant will measure progress in completing project goals and objectives. Applicants must not summarize past accomplishments in this section. The Proposal Abstract, which is to be entered into a text box in JustGrants, will not be scored but is used throughout the review process.

Proposal Narrative

The Proposal Narrative may not exceed 20 pages (standard project) or 25 pages (comprehensive project), double-spaced, and reviewers will not read beyond this page limit. The Proposal Narrative must include the following three sections. The total point value for the proposal narrative section is 65 points. Applicants must upload the Proposal Narrative as an attachment in JustGrants.

Purpose of the Proposal (10 points)

This section must describe:

1. The challenge or need faced by the community and how the goal/vision for the proposal will meet that need.
2. The communities to be served, including the geographic location, the populations in the service area, including any underserved population, and any available, relevant victimization rates.
3. The purpose area(s) the applicant is proposing to address.
4. The gaps in services and how the proposed project will complement and not duplicate existing services.
5. Any previous or current efforts (OVW-funded or not) to address the problem(s) the proposed project targets, and the effectiveness of those efforts.

What Will Be Done (45 points)

The application must provide a clear link between the proposed activities and the need identified in the "Purpose of the Proposal" section above. The application must not include any of the activities listed as unallowable costs in the Funding Restrictions section of this solicitation.

This section must describe:

1. The approach to addressing the challenge or need identified in the Purpose of the Proposal section above.
2. How the applicant will measure its progress in achieving the proposal's goal(s)/vision. Identify targeted outcome(s) and describe any tool(s) the applicant will use to track those outcomes and report them to OVW. Tools may include OVW performance progress reports and logic model templates (both available at <https://www.vawamei.org/tools-resource/resources-available/>).
3. How the applicant will move to project sustainability; continuation applicants must provide specific details.
4. The safety needs of victims of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking, and the applicant's commitment to addressing those needs through the proposed project.
5. Project goals, objectives, activities, and products (if applicable), and provide a corresponding 36-month timeline.
6. If applicable, how the proposed project will reduce violent crime against women and promote victim safety through activities under purpose area 5(a).
7. If applicable, how the proposed project will increase resources for courts and tribes to register protection orders in NCIC and give access to tribes to crime information systems under purpose area 5(d).
8. If applicable, how the proposed project will increase efforts to combat stalking.
9. How the project will address the victimization rates identified in the Purpose of the Proposal section.
10. How the proposed project will reach each population identified in the Purpose of the Proposal section.

For applicants proposing projects under purpose area 1 – supervised visitation and/or safe exchange services:

1. Using concrete examples, describe the extent to which the applicant's or a project partner's supervised visitation and/or safe exchange services align—or will be aligned—with the OVW's Supervised Visitation Guiding Principles.
2. If applicable, describe the applicant's or a partner's previous experience providing supervised visitation and exchange services to families affected by domestic violence, dating violence, child sexual abuse, sexual assault, or stalking.
3. Provide a detailed statement of how the applicant will ensure that adequate security measures, including adequate facilities, procedures, and personnel capable of preventing violence, and adequate standards are, or will be, in place. Describe the layout and security features of the facility and where in the community the facility is located. Describe how the applicant will develop protocols or policies to ensure that confidential information is not shared with courts, law enforcement agencies, or child welfare agencies unless necessary to ensure the safety of any child or adult using the services of a program funded by OVW.

For applicants proposing projects under purpose area 4 and/or 5 – court programs and services:

1. Describe any specialized docket or court infrastructure that is currently in place or will be established as part of this project.
2. Describe how the project will improve the judicial handling of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking, and cases involving child sexual abuse; ensure offender accountability; and promote informed judicial decision-making.

3. If the applicant is proposing to use any technology, explain how the project will address any victim safety concerns that could arise from the use of technology, such as confidentiality, safety planning, and informed consent.

For applicants proposing projects under purpose area 6 – civil legal assistance:

1. Describe the extent to which the applicant will provide legal services to victims of domestic violence; and/or to nonoffending parents in matters that involve allegations of child sexual abuse and relate to family matters, including civil protection orders, custody, and divorce, and in which the other parent is represented by counsel.
2. Describe how the applicant or project partner will provide a supervision and mentoring plan for attorney staff supported by this project.
3. If the applicant is not a domestic violence or sexual assault victim service provider, explain how it will coordinate with a local domestic violence or sexual assault victim service provider.

For applicants proposing projects under purpose area 3 or 8 – training:

1. Describe any training program or curriculum that is currently in place or will be established as part of this project.
2. Identify the agencies that will be trained, the estimated number of trainings and attendees for each training, and the purpose of the trainings.
3. Describe how the project will improve training and education for court-based and court-related personnel on the dynamics of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking and/or improve training and education for those within the civil justice system.
4. Provide a detailed statement of how the applicant will reach the intended audience for training and education, including efforts MOU partners will engage in to encourage identified participants to attend the trainings.

Who Will Implement the Proposal (10 points)

This section must:

1. Identify the key individuals and organizations, including project partners, involved in the proposed project.
2. Demonstrate that the individuals and organizations identified have the capacity to address the stated need and can successfully implement the proposed project activities; attach job descriptions of all key personnel.
3. Demonstrate that the applicant and/or project partner(s) include a domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider and a court.
4. Describe the applicant's expertise in the areas of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, stalking, and child sexual abuse, as appropriate.
5. Describe the project partner(s)' expertise in the areas of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, stalking, and child sexual abuse, as appropriate.

Budget and Associated Documentation

Applicants must complete the web-based form in JustGrants for the budget worksheet and budget narrative. Applicants also must upload the applicable associated documentation as described below under each heading. The budget worksheet and budget narrative are worth a total of 15 points and will be reviewed separately from the proposal narrative. The associated documentation will not be scored, but failure to include it may result in removal from consideration or a delay in access to funding.

Budget Worksheet and Budget Narrative (Web-based Form)

Complete the budget worksheet and narrative form for all applicable cost categories. The budget narrative must describe each line item requested in the budget and explain all costs included in the budget, including how the costs of goods and services are determined and how they will fulfill the objectives of the project. See the sample budget and the Creating a Budget webinar available on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>. Keep in mind that budgetary requirements vary among programs. Applicants must submit reasonable budgets based on the resources needed to implement their projects in their specific geographic location.

Award Period and Amount

Budgets should cover a project period of 36 months, or three years, starting October 1, 2021 and ending on September 30, 2024. Budget requests should not exceed $550,000 for standard projects and $650,000 for comprehensive projects.

The budget must:

1. Display a clear link between the specific project activities and the proposed budget items. The budget should not contain items that are not supported by the proposal narrative.
2. Include funds to attend OVW-sponsored TTA in the amount of $15,000 for standard projects and $20,000 for comprehensive projects for applicants located in the 48 contiguous states. For applicants located in the territories, Hawaii, or Alaska, include $20,000 for standard projects and $25,000 for comprehensive projects. This amount is for the entire 36 months and NOT per year. Applicants also may budget expenses in excess of the required amount if they are aware of relevant non-OVW sponsored conferences or training for which they would like permission to use grant funds to support staff/project partner attendance.
3. For applicants that anticipate using OVW funds to cover only a portion of a particular service they provide (e.g., supervised visitation or civil legal assistance), the budget should prorate operational costs such as rent, phone service, etc., accordingly.
4. Include funds or describe other resources available to the applicant to ensure access for individuals with disabilities, Deaf/hard of hearing individuals, and persons with limited English proficiency. See Accessibility under Federal Award Administration Information for more information.
5. Compensate all project partners for their full level of effort, unless otherwise stated in the MOU/LOC. For more information on compensating project partners, see the sample Budget Detail Worksheet on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.
6. Distinguish clearly between subawards and contracts in allocating any grant funds to other entities. Pursuant to 2 C.F.R. § 200.331, a subaward is for the purpose of carrying out a portion of the federal award, such as compensating an MOU partner, and a contract is for the purpose of obtaining goods and services for the grantee's own use. The substance of the relationship is more important than the form of the agreement in determining whether the recipient of the pass-through funds is a subrecipient or a contractor. The awarding and monitoring of contracts must follow the recipient's documented procurement procedures, including full and open competition, pursuant to the procurement standards and monitoring requirements in 2 C.F.R. §§ 200.317-200.329. The issuance and monitoring of subawards must meet the requirements of 2 C.F.R. § 200.332, which includes oversight of subrecipient/partner spending and monitoring performance measures and outcomes attributable to grant funds. For more information, see the sample Budget Detail Worksheet and the Solicitation Companion Guide on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.

OVW awards are governed by the provisions of 2 C.F.R. Part 200 and the DOJ Financial Guide, which include information on allowable costs, methods of payment, audit requirements, accounting systems, and financial records. For additional information on allowable and unallowable costs, see the Funding Restrictions section below and the sample budget on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.

Funding Restrictions

The following information is provided to allow applicants to develop an application and budget consistent with program requirements.

Unallowable Costs

The costs associated with the activities listed below are unallowable and must not be included in applicants' budgets.

1. Lobbying except with explicit statutory authorization.
2. Fundraising.
3. Purchase of real property.
4. Physical modifications to buildings, including minor renovations (such as painting or carpeting) without prior approval by OVW.
5. Construction.

Food and Beverage/Costs for Refreshments and Meals

Generally, food and beverage costs are not allowable. Recipients must receive prior approval to use grant funds to provide a working meal and/or refreshments at a meeting, conference, training, or other event; OVW may provide such approval if one of the following applies:

1. The location of the event is not in close proximity to food establishments, despite efforts to secure a location near reasonably priced and accessible commercial food establishments.
2. Not serving food will significantly lengthen the day or necessitate extending the meeting to achieve meeting outcomes.
3. A special presentation at a conference requires a plenary address where there is no other time for food to be obtained.
4. Other extenuating circumstances necessitate the provision of food.

Justification for an exception listed above must be included in the applicant's budget narrative. For additional information on restrictions on food and beverage expenditures, see <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/conference-planning>.

Conference Planning and Expenditure Limitations

Applicants' budgets must be consistent with all requirements (including specific cost limits and prior approval and reporting requirements, where applicable) governing the use of federal funds for expenses related to conferences (which is defined to include meetings, retreats, seminars, symposiums, training, and other similar events), and costs of attendance at such events. Information on conference planning, minimization of costs, and conference reporting is available at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/conference-planning>.

Pre-Agreement Cost

OVW generally does not allow pre-award costs. Costs incurred prior to the start date of the award may not be charged to the project unless the recipient receives prior approval from OVW. See the DOJ Financial Guide for more information on pre-award costs.

Indirect Cost Rate Agreement (if applicable)

Applicants that intend to charge indirect costs through the use of a negotiated indirect cost rate must have a current, signed, federally-approved indirect cost rate agreement and must upload and attach a copy of the agreement to their application in JustGrants. Applicants (other than state, local, and tribal governments) that do not have a current negotiated (including provisional) rate may elect to charge a de minimis rate of 10% of modified total direct costs, which may be used indefinitely. State, local, and tribal governments that have never negotiated an indirect cost rate with the federal government and receive less than $35 million in direct federal funding per year also may choose to use the 10% de minimis rate.

Organizations that wish to negotiate an indirect cost rate should contact OVW's Grants Financial Management Division at OVW.GFMD@usdoj.gov or 1-888-514-8556 for more information.

Financial Management Questionnaire (including applicant disclosure of high-risk status)

Applicant Financial Capability Questionnaire (if applicable)

All nonprofit, nongovernmental organizations that apply for funding from OVW and have not previously (or within the last three years) received funding from OVW must complete an Applicant Financial Capability Questionnaire and attach it to their application in JustGrants. In addition, applicants may be required to submit their current year's audit report at a later time. The questionnaire can be found at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/file/866126/download>.

Pre-Award Risk Assessment

Each applicant must respond to the questions below in a document uploaded and attached to its application in JustGrants. Do not submit responses from a prior fiscal year without updating them to be responsive to all questions listed below. This information will be used for a mandatory pre-award risk assessment. Failure to provide this information or to respond to questions from OVW regarding this information in a timely manner could result in the application being removed from consideration or a delay in access to funds. Provide complete responses that address all questions included for each numbered item. This document should be no more than four pages and may be single or double-spaced.

1. Will all funds awarded under this program be maintained in a manner that they will be accounted for separately and distinctly from other sources of revenue/funding? Provide a brief description of the applicant's policies and procedures that ensure funds will be tracked appropriately.
2. Does the applicant have written accounting policies and procedures? How often are these policies and procedures updated? Provide a brief list of the topics covered in the applicant's policies and procedures. OVW may request a copy for review during the application/award process or as part of the grant monitoring process.
3. Is the applicant's financial management system able to track actual expenditures and outlays with budgeted amounts for each grant or subgrant? Provide a brief summary of the organization's process for tracking expenditures, including tracking budgeted versus actual amounts.
4. Does the applicant have procedures in place for minimizing the time between transfer of funds from the United States Treasury and disbursement for project activities? Provide a short summary of the applicant's policy for requesting payments for grant awards.
5. Does the applicant have effective internal controls in place to ensure that federal funds are used solely for authorized purposes? Provide a brief description of the applicant's internal controls that will provide reasonable assurance that the award funds will be managed properly.
6. Does the applicant have a documented records retention policy? If so, briefly describe the policy and confirm that the policy complies with federal regulations. Information on Record Retention and Access can be found at 2 C.F.R. §§ 200.334-200.338.
7. Does the applicant or any of its employees have any potential personal or organizational conflicts of interest related to the possible receipt of OVW award funds? Applicants are required to disclose in writing any potential conflicts of interest to their awarding agency. See 2 C.F.R. § 200.112 and Chapter 3.20, Grant Fraud, Waste and Abuse, of the DOJ Financial Guide for additional information.
8. Is the individual primarily responsible for fiscal and administrative oversight of grant awards familiar with the applicable grants management rules, principles, and regulations including the Uniform Administrative Requirements, Cost Principles, and Audit Requirements for Federal Awards (2 C.F.R. Part 200)? Provide a short list of the individual's qualifications/experience. If the individual is not familiar with the applicable rules and regulations, the applicant must contact OVW's Grants Financial Management Division at OVW.GFMD@usdoj.gov or 1-888-514-8556 immediately after the applicant is notified of its award to coordinate training.
9. Does the applicant have policies and procedures in place to manage subawards and monitor activities of subrecipients as necessary to ensure that subawards are used for authorized purposes, in compliance with laws, regulations, and terms and conditions of the award, and that established subaward performance goals are achieved (2 C.F.R. §§ 200.331-200.333)? Provide a brief description of the organization's policies and procedures on subrecipient management and monitoring.
10. Does the applicant currently require employees to maintain time distribution records that accurately reflect the work performed on specific activities or cost objectives in order to support the distribution of employees' salaries among federal awards or other activities (2 C.F.R. § 200.430)? Budget estimates do not qualify as support for charges to federal awards. Provide a brief description of the organization's established timekeeping policies and procedures.

11. Is the applicant designated as high risk by a federal agency outside of DOJ? ("High risk" includes any status under which a federal awarding agency provides additional oversight due to the applicant entity's past performance, or other programmatic or financial concerns with the applicant entity.) If so, provide the names(s) of the federal awarding agency, the date(s) the agency notified the applicant entity of the high risk designation, contact information for the high risk point of contact at the federal agency, and the reason for the high risk status, as set out by the federal agency.

Disclosure of Process Related to Executive Compensation

An applicant that is a nonprofit organization may be required to make certain disclosures relating to the processes it uses to determine the compensation of its officers, directors, trustees, and key employees and must upload and attach a document with these disclosures to its application in JustGrants.

Under certain circumstances, a nonprofit organization that provides unreasonably high compensation to certain persons may subject both the organization's managers and those who receive the compensation to additional federal taxes. A rebuttable presumption of the reasonableness of a nonprofit organization's compensation arrangements, however, may be available if the nonprofit organization satisfies certain rules set out in Internal Revenue Service regulations with regard to its compensation decisions.

Each applicant must state at the time of its application (in the Data Requested with Application section) whether the applicant is a nonprofit organization that uses the Internal Revenue Service's three-step safe-harbor procedure to establish a rebuttable presumption that its executives' compensation is reasonable. If the applicant states that it uses the safe-harbor procedure, then it must disclose, in an attachment to its application (to be titled "Disclosure of Process Related to Executive Compensation"), the process it uses to determine the compensation of its officers, directors, trustees, and key employees (together, "covered persons"). See 34 U.S.C. § 12291(b)(16)(B)(iii).

At a minimum, the disclosure must describe in pertinent detail: (1) the composition of the body that reviews and approves compensation arrangements for covered persons; (2) the methods and practices used by the applicant nonprofit organization to ensure that no individual with a conflict of interest participates as a member of the body that reviews and approves a compensation arrangement for a covered person; (3) the appropriate data as to comparability of compensation that is obtained in advance and relied upon by the body that reviews and approves compensation arrangements for covered persons; and (4) the written or electronic records that the applicant maintains as concurrent documentation of the decisions with respect to compensation of covered persons made by the body that reviews and approves such compensation arrangements, including records of deliberations and of the basis for decisions. For a sample letter, see the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.

For purposes of the required disclosure, the following terms and phrases have the meanings set out by the Internal Revenue Service for use in connection with 26 C.F.R. § 53.4958-6: officers, directors, trustees, key employees, compensation, conflict of interest, appropriate data as to comparability, adequate documentation, and concurrent documentation.

Following receipt of an appropriate request, OVW may be authorized or required by law to make information submitted to satisfy this requirement available for public inspection. Also, a recipient may be required to make a prompt supplemental disclosure after the award in certain circumstances (e.g., changes in the way the organization determines compensation).

Data Requested with Application

The Data Requested with Application should be uploaded as an attachment in JustGrants. The following responses must be included:

1. Name, title, address, telephone number, and email address for the grant point-of-contact. This person must be an employee of the applicant.
2. Statement as to whether the applicant (the organization whose DUNS number is being used for the application) will serve as a fiscal agent. A fiscal agent is an entity that does not participate in implementation of the project and passes all funds through to subrecipients, conducting minimal administrative activities. A fiscal agent applicant must list these subrecipients and include a statement acknowledging that, should an award be made, the applicant will be responsible for all applicable statutory, fiscal, and programmatic requirements, including those of 2 C.F.R. Part 200, as well as all project deliverables. In such situations, the fiscal agent must be an eligible applicant for the program.
3. Statement as to whether the applicant has expended $750,000 in federal funds in the applicant's past fiscal year. If so, specify the end date of the applicant's fiscal year.
4. Statement as to whether the applicant is a nonprofit organization that is described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and is exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of that Code.
5. Statement as to whether the applicant is a nonprofit organization that holds money in offshore accounts for the purpose of avoiding paying the tax described in section 511(a) of the Internal Revenue Code.
6. Statement as to whether the applicant is a nonprofit organization that uses the Internal Revenue Service's three-step safe-harbor procedure to establish a rebuttable presumption that its executives' compensation is reasonable. If the applicant is not a nonprofit organization or is a nonprofit that does not use the safe-harbor procedure, provide a statement to that effect. For additional information about the safe-harbor procedure, see "Disclosure of Process Related to Executive Compensation" in the Additional Required Information section of this solicitation.
7. Statement as to whether the applicant is a recipient, or partner/subrecipient, on a current grant or pending application for this grant program. If a current grant, provide the year of the award and the role of the applicant on the award (recipient or project partner).
8. Statement as to whether any proposed project partner/subrecipient is a recipient, or partner/subrecipient, on a current grant or pending application for this grant program. If a current grant, provide the year of the award and the role of the partner(s) on the award (recipient or project partner/subrecipient).
9. Statement as to whether the application addresses the priority area to reduce violent crime against women and promote victim safety through investing in law enforcement, increasing prosecution, and promoting effective prevention under purpose area 5(a).
10. Statement as to whether the application addresses the priority area to increase resources for courts and tribes to register protection orders in NCIC and give access to tribes to crime information systems under purpose area 5(d).
11. Statement as to whether the application addresses the priority area to increase efforts to combat stalking.
12. The purpose areas the application addresses and whether the application is a standard or comprehensive project. If the application is addressing purpose area 5(b), pro se victim assistance programs that provide civil legal assistance, and/or purpose area 6, Civil Legal Assistance, state the percentage of activities and funds of the project that will support civil legal assistance.
13. Name of the nonprofit, nongovernmental, or tribal domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider partnering on the project or an affirmative statement that the lead applicant is such an entity.
14. Name of the court partner on the project or an affirmative statement that the lead applicant is such an entity.
15. The percentage of grant activities, should the application be funded, that will address each of the following issues (the total percentages should not exceed 100%):

- Stalking.
- Domestic Violence.
- Dating Violence.
- Sexual Assault.

Memoranda of Understanding (MOUs) and Other Supportive Documents

For purposes of this solicitation, the MOU is a document containing the terms of the partnership and the roles and responsibilities between two or more parties, and it must be included as an attachment to the application in JustGrants. The MOU and/or LOC section is worth a total of 20 points. The MOU is not a substitute for a subaward agreement, which ensures that subrecipients adhere to the requirements of the award and 2 C.F.R. Part 200 (see 2 C.F.R. § 200.332). Partners receiving funds under the award generally are considered subrecipients because they are carrying out a portion of the federal award.

The MOU must be a single document and must be signed and dated by the Authorized Representative of each proposed partner organization during the development of the application. OVW will accept electronic signatures. MOUs missing signatures may result in a point deduction or removal from consideration, particularly if the MOU is missing the signature of a required partner. If necessary, an MOU can include multiple signature pages so long as each page includes the names and titles of all signatories to the MOU. A sample MOU is available on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.

Applicants must have formal partnerships, delineated in the MOU (or LOC) with both 1) a nonprofit, nongovernmental, or tribal domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider and 2) a court (as outlined in the “Required Partnerships” section under Eligibility Information).

The MOU must clearly:

1. Identify the partners and provide a brief history of the collaborative relationship among those partners, including when and under what circumstances the relationship began and when each partner entered into the relationship.
2. Describe the roles and responsibilities each partner will assume to ensure the success of the proposed project.
3. State that each project partner has reviewed the budget, is aware of the total amount being requested, and is being fully compensated for their work under the grant or is agreeing to be partially compensated or receive no compensation from the grant.
4. Demonstrate meaningful collaboration with a state, tribal, or local court system and a nonprofit, nongovernmental or tribal domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider.
5. Demonstrate a meaningful partnership among all signing parties.
6. Specify the extent of each partner’s participation in developing the application.
7. Identify the people who will be responsible for developing and implementing project activities and describe how they will work together and with project staff.
8. Describe the resources each partner would contribute to the project, either through time, in-kind contributions, or grant funds (e.g., office space, project staff, and training).
9. Demonstrate that the project has commitments from entities that will receive training if the applicant proposes training under purpose area 3 or 8 (training for court-based, court-related personnel or those within the civil justice system).

If a court is unable to sign an MOU, the court may submit a letter of commitment (LOC) in lieu of signing the MOU as described below:

- If the court is the lead applicant and unable to sign an MOU, all project partners

- should submit LOCs and no MOU is required.
- If the court is a project partner and unable to sign an MOU, the lead applicant should still submit an MOU signed by the applicant and any other non-court partners and the court partner should submit an LOC.
- If the domestic violence and/or sexual assault victim service provider is the lead applicant and the only project partner is the court, the court should submit an LOC but the lead applicant is not required to submit an MOU or LOC.

Each LOC must:

1. Identify the name of the organization and provide a brief description of the collaborative relationship with the applicant.
2. Highlight the expertise of the individual or organization's staff who will be affiliated with this project.
3. State the roles and responsibilities the organization would assume to ensure the success of the proposed project.
4. Demonstrate a commitment to work with the applicant and its partners to achieve the stated project goals.
5. State that the organization has reviewed the budget, is aware of the total amount being requested, and is being fully compensated for its work under the grant or is agreeing to be partially compensated or receive no compensation from the grant (not applicable to courts submitting LOC as lead applicant).
6. Specify the extent of the organization's participation in developing the application.
7. Describe the resources that would be contributed to the project, either through time, in-kind contributions, or grant funds (e.g., office space, project staff, and training).
8. Demonstrate that the project has commitments from entities that will receive training if the applicant proposes training under purpose area 3 or 8 (training for court-based, court-related personnel or those within the civil justice system).

Note: LOCs submitted in lieu of an MOU under circumstances other than those defined above will not be accepted.

Additional Application Components

The following components will not be scored but must be included with the application. Failure to supply this information will result in the application being removed from consideration. Some components will be generated during the application submission process while others will be uploaded and attached to the application in JustGrants.

Letters of Nonsupplanting

Applicants must attach a letter to OVW's Director, signed by the Authorized Representative, certifying that federal funds will not be used to supplant non-federal funds should a grant award be made. A sample letter is available at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>.

Proof of 501(c)(3) Status (Nonprofit Organization Only)

As noted under Eligible Applicants, an entity that is eligible for this program based on its status as a nonprofit organization must be an organization that is described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and is exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of the Code. All such applicants are required to attach a determination letter from the Internal Revenue Service recognizing their tax-exempt status. OVW cannot make an award to any nonprofit organization that does not submit a 501(c)(3) determination letter from the Internal Revenue Service.

Confidentiality Notice Form

All applicants are required to acknowledge that they have received notice that grantees and subgrantees must comply with the confidentiality and privacy requirements of VAWA, as amended. Applicants must upload and attach, under Additional Attachments in JustGrants, the completed acknowledgement form available on the OVW website at http://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/ovw/pages/attachments/2015/01/20/confidentiality_acknowledgement_form_42015.pdf

. This form must be signed by the Authorized Representative.

Disclosures and Assurances

Review, complete, and submit all disclosures, assurances, and certifications as described below.

Disclosure of Lobbying Activities

All applicants must complete and submit the Disclosure of Lobbying Activities (SF-LLL) form in Grants.gov before beginning the application process in JustGrants.

DOJ Certified Standard Assurances

Applicants must read and acknowledge the DOJ Certified Standard Assurances in JustGrants.

DOJ Certifications Regarding Lobbying; Debarment, Suspension and Other Responsibility Matters; and Drug-Free Workplace Requirements

Applicants must read and acknowledge these DOJ certifications in JustGrants.

Applicant Disclosure of Duplication in Costs, Applications, and/or Current Awards

Applicants must disclose all current and pending OVW awards (if applicable). If the applicant has a current grant or cooperative agreement under any OVW grant program or an award that has been closed since January 25, 2020, the information must be provided in a table using the sample format found on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>. The applicant must also provide the same information regarding any current OVW grants or pending applications on which the applicant is a subrecipient.

Applicants also must disclose all other federal grant programs from which the applicant currently receives funding or for which it has applied for funding in FY 2021 to do similar work. Provide this information in a table using the sample format found on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/resources-applicants>. Both tables, if applicable, should be uploaded as attachments in JustGrants.

How to Apply

Applications must be submitted electronically via Grants.gov and JustGrants. Applicants that are unable to submit electronically must follow the instructions below under OVW Policy on Late Submissions. See Submission Dates and Times below for a list of steps for registering with all required systems and deadlines for completing each step.

Unique Entity Identifier and System for Award Management (SAM)

Federal regulations require that an applicant for federal funding: (1) be registered in SAM before submitting its application; (2) provide a valid unique entity identifier in its application; and (3) continue to maintain an active SAM registration with current information at all times during which it has an active federal award or an application or plan under consideration by a federal awarding agency. In addition, OVW may not make an award to an applicant until the applicant has complied with all applicable unique entity identifier and SAM requirements and, if an applicant has not fully complied with these requirements by the time OVW is ready to make an award, then OVW may determine that the applicant is not qualified to receive an award. See 2 C.F.R. §§ 25.200, 25.205.

The unique entity identifier that applicants for federal grants and cooperative agreements are required to have is a Data Universal Number System (DUNS) number. A DUNS number is a unique, nine-character identification number provided by the commercial company Dun & Bradstreet (D&B). Once an applicant has applied for a DUNS number through D&B, its DUNS number should be available within two business days.

SAM centralizes information about grant recipients and also provides a central location for grant recipients to change organizational information. Grants.gov uses SAM to establish roles and IDs for electronic submission of grant applications.

If the applicant already has an Employer Identification Number (EIN), the SAM registration will take up to two weeks to process. If the applicant does not have an EIN, then the applicant should allow two to five weeks for obtaining an EIN from the Internal Revenue Service. There is no fee associated with these processes. These processes cannot be expedited. OVW strongly discourages applicants from paying a third party to apply or register on their behalf in an attempt to expedite these processes. To ensure all applicants are able to apply by the deadline for this solicitation, applicants must have obtained a DUNS number and registered online with the SAM and with Grants.gov no later than January 8, 2021.

Submission Dates and Time

After applicants obtain their DUNS number and register with SAM, they can begin the Grants.gov registration process. The applying organization must complete the Grants.gov registration process prior to beginning an application for a federal grant. The E-Business Point of Contact (E-Biz POC) must register the applicant organization with Grants.gov. The E-Biz POC oversees the applicant's Grants.gov transactions and assigns the AOR. The AOR submits the application to Grants.gov and must register with Grants.gov as well. In some cases the E-Biz POC is also the AOR for the applicant. Complete instructions can be found at www.Grants.gov.

In JustGrants, each applying entity will have an assigned Entity Administrator who is responsible for managing entity-level information and assigning roles in the system. The Entity Administrator is also the E-Biz POC designated in SAM.gov. For more information on registering with JustGrants, see <https://justicegrants.usdoj.gov/>.

It is the applicant's responsibility to ensure that the application is complete and submitted by the deadline. Failure to meet the submission deadline will result in an application not being considered for funding. Applicants should refer to the list below to ensure that all required steps and deadlines are met.

Failure to begin registration or application submission by the deadlines stated in the list below is not an acceptable reason for late submission.

Applicant Actions with Required Dates/Deadlines

1. Obtain a DUNS number by January 8, 2021. Apply for a DUNS number at <https://www.dnb.com> or call 1-866-705-5711.
2. Register with SAM by January 8, 2021. Access the SAM online registration through the SAM homepage at <https://www.sam.gov/SAM> and follow the online instructions for new SAM users. If the applicant already has the necessary information on hand, the online registration takes approximately 30 minutes to complete, depending upon the size and complexity of the business or organization. Organizations must update or renew their SAM registration at least once a year to maintain an active status.
3. Register with Grants.gov by January 8, 2021. Once the SAM registration is active, the applicant will be able to complete the Grants.gov registration.
4. Submit Letter of Intent by January 8, 2021 to the Justice for Families Program, OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov, 202-307-6026.

5. If necessary, request hardcopy submission by January 13, 2021. Applicants that cannot submit an application electronically due to lack of internet access must contact the program at 202-307-6026 or OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov to request permission to submit a hardcopy application.
6. Download updated version of Adobe Acrobat at least 48 hours before the Grants.gov deadline. Applicants are responsible for ensuring that the most up-to-date version of Adobe Acrobat is installed on all computers that may be used to download the solicitation and to submit the SF-424 and SF-LLL on Grants.gov. To verify that the Adobe software version is compatible with Grants.gov, visit the following link: <http://www.grants.gov/web/grants/applicants/adobe-software-compatibility.html>.
7. Begin application submission process in Grants.gov as early as possible, but no later than 24 – 48 hours prior to the Grants.gov deadline. Applicants may find this funding opportunity on Grants.gov by using the CFDA number, Grants.gov opportunity number, or the title of this solicitation, all of which can be found on the cover page. Applicants will submit two forms in Grants.gov (SF-424 and SF-LLL). After submitting these forms, the applicant will receive an email notification from JustGrants to complete the rest of the application in JustGrants. If the applicant is a new user in JustGrants, the email will include instructions on registering with JustGrants.
8. Upon receipt of this email, register with JustGrants (if necessary) and begin to develop the application. Some of the application components will be entered directly into JustGrants, and others will require uploading attached documents. Therefore, applicants will need to allow ample time before the JustGrants deadline to prepare each component and to submit the complete application package at least 24 – 48 hours prior to the deadline. Applicants may save their progress in the system and revise the application as needed prior to hitting the Submit button at the end of the application in JustGrants.
9. Confirm application receipt: Applicants should closely monitor their email and JustGrants accounts for any notifications from Grants.gov or JustGrants about a possible failed submission. The user who is authorized to submit applications on behalf of the organization is the one who will receive these notifications. OVW does not send out these notifications, nor does OVW receive a copy of these notifications. It is the applicant's responsibility to notify OVW of any problems with the application submission process. Submitting the application components at least 48 hours before each deadline (Grants.gov or JustGrants, as applicable) will enable the applicant to receive notice of a failed submission and provide an opportunity to correct the error before the applicable deadline.

OVW Policy on Late Submissions/Other Submission Requirements

Applications submitted after 11:59 p.m. E.T. on January 25, 2021 will not be considered for funding, unless the applicant receives OVW permission to submit a late application. In limited circumstances, OVW will approve a request to submit an application after the deadline. The lists below provide a description of the circumstances under which OVW will consider such requests. Approval of a late submission request is not an indication of the application's final disposition. Applications approved for late submission are still subject to the review process and criteria described in this solicitation.

To ensure fairness for all applicants, OVW requires that applicants requesting late submission adhere to the following:

Experiencing Technical Difficulties Beyond the Applicant's Reasonable Control

Issue with SAM, Grants.gov, or JustGrants Registration

1. Register and/or confirm existing registration at least three weeks prior to the application deadline to ensure that the individual who will be submitting the application has SAM, Grants.gov, and JustGrants access and is the person registered to submit on behalf of the applicant.
2. Maintain documentation of when registration began, any issues related to registration, and all communication with technical support.

Note: Failure to begin the SAM, Grants.gov, or JustGrants registration process in sufficient time (i.e., by the date identified in this solicitation) is not an acceptable reason for late submission.

Unforeseeable Technical Difficulties During the Submission Process

1. Contact Grants.gov or JustGrants, as applicable, for Applicant/User Support at least 24 hours prior to the applicable deadline.
2. Maintain documentation of all communication with Grants.gov or JustGrants Applicant/User Support.
3. Prior to the applicable deadline, contact this program, via email at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov indicating that the applicant is experiencing technical difficulties and would like permission to submit a late application. The email must include the following: a) A detailed description of the difficulty that the applicant is experiencing; b) The contact information (name, telephone, and email) for the individual making the late submission request; and c) In the case of JustGrants technical difficulties, the complete application packet (Proposal Narrative, Budget and Budget Narrative, MOU and/or LOC, and applicable certifications).
4. Within 24 hours after the applicable deadline, the applicant must email this program at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov the following information: a) Applicant's DUNS number; b) Grants.gov or JustGrants Applicant/User Support tracking numbers; and c) Other relevant documentation.

Common foreseeable technical difficulties for which OVW will not approve a late submission: (1) Using an outdated version of Adobe Acrobat; and (2) Attachment rejection (Grants.gov will reject attachments with names that contain certain unallowable characters).

Note: Through Grants.gov or JustGrants, OVW can confirm when submission began. Applicants that attempt final submission less than 24 hours before the deadline will not be considered for late submission. By beginning the final submission process 24-48 hours before the deadline, applicants should have sufficient time to receive notice of problems with their submissions and make necessary corrections.

Severe Inclement Weather or Natural or Man-Made Disaster

1. Contact this program at OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov as soon as the applicant is aware of severe weather or a natural or man-made disaster that may impede the submission of an application by the deadline. The email should include a detailed description of the weather event or natural or man-made disaster. A detailed description includes when the event occurred, or is likely to occur, the impacted area, and the specific impact on the applicant and/or partners' ability to submit the application by the deadline (e.g., without power for "x" days, office closed for "x" days). If the application is complete and ready for the submission at the time the applicant notifies OVW, the application should be included with the email.
2. Applicants impacted by severe weather or a natural or man-made disaster occurring on the deadline must contact OVW within 48 hours after the due date or as soon as communications are restored.

Note: OVW may not be able to accommodate all requests resulting from severe inclement weather or a natural or man-made disaster.

OVW will review the request for late submission and required documents and notify the applicant whether the request has been approved or denied within 30 days of the submitted request.

Application Review Information

Review Criteria

Review Criteria

Applications will be scored based on the degree to which the application responds to each section and addresses each element in the section. Furthermore, applications will be scored based upon the quality of the response, capacity of the applicant and any partners, and the level of detail provided. Each element must be addressed in the section in which it is requested. Points may be deducted if the applicant does not include the information in the appropriate section regardless if it is included elsewhere within the application. Each section will be reviewed as a separate document and will be scored as such. Specifically, for the Justice for Families Program, scoring will be as follows:

1. Proposal narrative: (65) points, of which:
 - A. Purpose of the proposal: (10) points.
 - B. What will be done: (45) points.
 - C. Who will implement the proposal: (10) points.
2. Budget worksheet and budget narrative: (15) points.
3. MOU/LOC: (20) points.

Voluntary match or other cost sharing methods will not be considered in the evaluation of the application.

Review and Selection Process

Applications will be subject to a peer review and a programmatic review.

Peer Review

OVW will subject all eligible, complete, and timely applications to a peer review process that is based on the criteria outlined in this solicitation. OVW may use internal reviewers, external reviewers, or a combination of both.

Programmatic Review

All applications that are considered for funding will be subject to a programmatic review. The programmatic review consists of assessing the application for compliance with the program's scope, activities that compromise victim safety, and, if applicable, past performance and priority area review. OVW reserves the right to deduct points from applications for the following reasons:

1. Activities that compromise victim safety and recovery and undermine offender accountability (deduct up to 10 points).
2. Out-of-scope and unallowable activities (deduct up to 10 points).
3. Past performance (deduct up to 25 points).
4. Formatting and Technical Requirements (deduct up to 5 points).
5. Activities and budget items targeted toward civil legal services exceeding the 50% limitation described under Purpose Area 6 (deduct up to 10 points).

An application that is deemed to be substantially out-of-scope, proposes a substantial number of activities that are unallowable, or proposes activities that pose a significant threat to victim safety or a serious breach of confidentiality will not be considered for funding. An applicant with considerable past performance issues may receive a deduction in points as described above or be removed from consideration entirely regardless of the application's peer review score.

As a part of the programmatic review process described above, applicants with current or recently closed OVW awards will be reviewed for past performance and risk based on the elements listed below.

1. Demonstrated effectiveness of the current project indicated by timely progress toward meeting project goals and objectives.
2. Demonstration that past activities supported with OVW grant funds have been limited to program purpose areas.
3. Adherence to all special conditions of existing grant award(s) from OVW.
4. Adherence to programmatic and financial reporting requirements, including timely submission of required reports.
5. Completion of close-out of prior awards in a timely manner.
6. Appropriate use of and active participation in OVW-sponsored workshops and other technical assistance events as required by a special condition of the current or recent award.
7. Receipt of financial clearances on all current or recent grants from OVW.

8. Timely resolution of issues identified in any audit or on-site financial or programmatic monitoring visit.
9. Adherence to the Office of Management and Budget single-audit requirement.
10. Timely expenditure of grant funds.
11. Adherence to the requirements of the DOJ Financial Guide.

Prior to making an award, OVW is required to review and consider any information about applicants included in the designated integrity and performance system accessible through SAM (currently the Federal Award Performance and Integrity Information System or FAPIIS). Applicants may review and comment on information in FAPIIS about themselves that another federal awarding agency has previously entered. OVW will consider the applicant's comments as well as other information available in FAPIIS in making its judgment about the risk posed by making an award to the applicant as described in 2 C.F.R. § 200.206.

Absent explicit statutory authorization or written delegation of authority to the contrary, all final award decisions will be made by the OVW Director, who also may give consideration to factors including, but not limited to, reaching underserved populations, geographic diversity, OVW priorities, past performance, and available funding when making awards. All award decisions are final and not subject to appeal.

High-Risk Grantees

Based on DOJ's assessment of each grantee with regard to current or previous funding, unresolved audit issues, delinquent programmatic and fiscal reporting, and prior performance, a grantee may be designated "high-risk." Awards to high-risk grantees may carry special conditions such as increased monitoring and/or prohibitions on drawing down funds until certain requirements are met. High-risk grantees with substantial or persistent performance or compliance issues, long-standing open audits, or open criminal investigations may not be considered for funding.

Anticipated Announcement and Federal Award Dates

It is anticipated that all applicants will be notified of the outcome of their applications by October 1, 2021.

Federal Award Administration Information

Federal Award Notices

Successful applicants will receive OVW award notifications electronically from JustGrants (not Grants.gov). This award notification will include instructions on enrolling in Automated Standard Application for Payments (ASAP) and accepting the award. Recipients will be required to log into JustGrants to review, sign, and accept the award. The Authorized Representative must acknowledge having read and understood all sections of the award instrument and submit the required declaration and certification to accept the award; these steps will be completed electronically in JustGrants.

Administrative, National Policy, and Other Legal Requirements

Information for All Federal Award Recipients

Applicants selected for awards must agree to comply with additional legal, administrative, and national policy requirements. OVW strongly encourages applicants to review the information pertaining to these additional requirements prior to submitting an application. This information can be found in the section of the Solicitation Companion Guide entitled "Post-Award Requirements for All Federal Award Recipients."

Terms and conditions for OVW awards are available at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/award-conditions>. These terms are subject to change prior to the issuance of the awards.

Violence Against Women Act Non-Discrimination Provision

The Violence Against Women Reauthorization Act prohibits OVW grantees from excluding, denying benefits to, or discriminating against any person on the basis of actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sex, gender identity, sexual orientation, or disability in any program or activity funded in whole or in part by OVW. Recipients may provide sex-segregated or sex-specific programming if doing so is necessary for the essential operation of a program, so long as the recipient provides comparable services to those who cannot be provided with the sex-segregated or sex-specific programming. Additional information on the civil rights obligations of OVW funding recipients can be found in the Solicitation Companion Guide under "Civil Rights Compliance."

Accessibility

Recipients of OVW funds must comply with applicable federal civil rights laws, which, among other things, prohibit discrimination on the basis of disability and national origin. Compliance with these laws includes taking reasonable steps to ensure that persons with limited English proficiency have meaningful access to recipients' programs and activities and that these programs and activities are readily accessible to individuals with disabilities. More information on these obligations is available in the Solicitation Companion Guide under "Civil Rights Compliance."

General Information about Post-Federal Award Reporting Requirements

OVW grantees are required to submit semi-annual progress reports and quarterly Federal Financial Reports (SF-425). Appropriate progress report forms will be provided to all applicants selected for an award. Forms will be submitted electronically. Future awards and fund drawdowns may be withheld if reports are delinquent. For more information on post award reporting requirements, including requirements for certain recipients to report information on civil, criminal, and administrative proceedings in FAPIIS, see the Solicitation Companion Guide and the award condition on recipient integrity and performance matters available on the OVW website at <https://www.justice.gov/ovw/award-conditions>.

Progress Reporting Frequency

semi-annual

Federal Awarding Agency Contact(s)

For assistance with the requirements of this solicitation, contact the following: for programmatic questions, contact this program at 202-307-6026 or OVW.JFF@usdoj.gov, for financial questions, contact 202-307-6026 or OVW.GFMD@usdoj.gov, and for technical questions, contact Grants.gov Applicant Support at 800-518-4726 or support@grants.gov or OVW JustGrants Support at 1-866-655-4482 or OVW.JustGrantsSupport@usdoj.gov.

Other Information

Public Reporting Burden- Paper Work Reduction Act Notice

Under the Paperwork Reduction Act, a person is not required to respond to a collection of information unless it displays a currently valid OMB control number. OVW tries to create forms and instructions that are accurate, can be easily understood, and impose the least possible burden on applicants. The estimated average time to complete and file this form is 30 hours. Comments regarding the accuracy of this estimate or suggestions for simplifying this form can be submitted to the Office on Violence Against Women, U.S. Department of Justice, 145 N Street, NE, Washington, DC 20530.

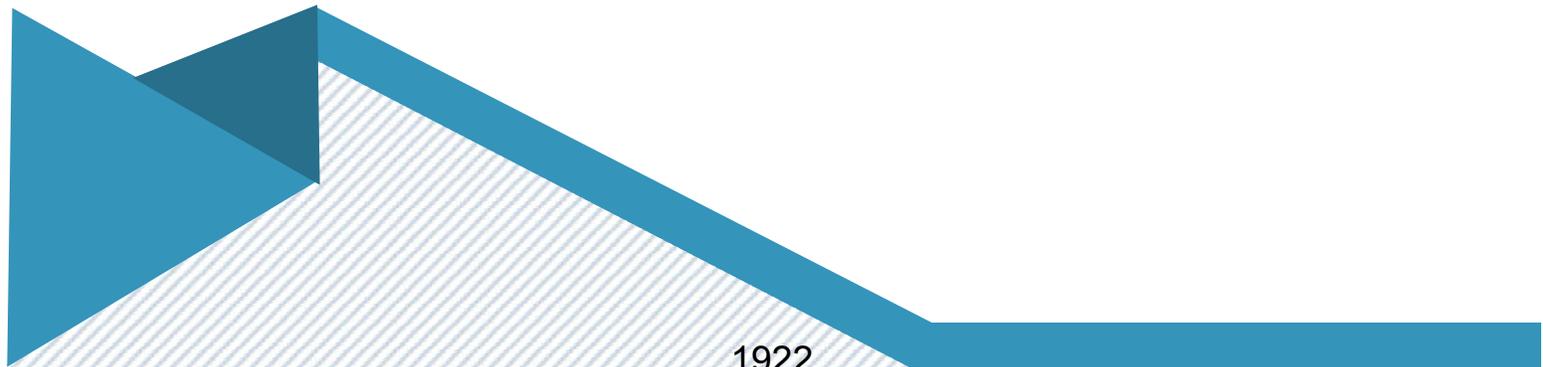

Note: Any materials submitted as part of an application may be released pursuant to a request under the Freedom of Information Act.

Applicants must submit a fully executed application to OVW, including all required supporting documentation. Prior to peer review, OVW will not contact applicants for missing items. Additionally, if an applicant plans to submit an application under any other OVW grant program this fiscal year, it is the applicant's responsibility to ensure that only documents pertinent to this solicitation are included with this application. OVW will not redirect documents that are inadvertently submitted with the wrong application (e.g., a Rural Program letter submitted with a Transitional Housing Program application will not be transferred to the Rural application).

Application Document	Completed
Letter of Intent.
Data Requested with Application.
Proposal Narrative <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Purpose of Proposal • What Will Be Done • Who Will Implement the Proposal
Proposal Abstract.
Budget Worksheet and Budget Narrative.
Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) and/or Letters of Commitment (LOC).
Application for Federal Assistance: SF-424.
Disclosure of Lobbying Activities (SF-LLL).
Applicant Financial Capability Questionnaire (if applicable).
Confidentiality Notice Form.
Disclosure of Process Related to Executive Compensation (if applicable).
Pre-Award Risk Assessment.
Indirect Cost Rate Agreement (if applicable).
Letter of Nonsupplanting.
Proof of 501(c)(3) Status (Nonprofit Organizations Only).
Applicant Disclosure(s) of Duplication in Cost Items.
Delivery of Legal Assistance Certification Letter (if applicable).
Certification of Eligibility Regarding Mediation or Counseling (required for all applicants).
Certification Letter Demonstrating Safe Operation of Supervised Visitation or Safe Exchange (only applicable to applicants proposing activities under purpose area 1).
Certification Letter Regarding Filing and Other Fees (only applicable to applicants proposing activities under purpose area 4 or 5 that are court-based programs).
Certification Letter Regarding Custody Evaluation and Guardian Ad Litem Services (only applicable to applicants proposing activities under purpose area 4 or 5 to support custody evaluation and/or guardian ad litem services).

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 34

American Bar Endowment

Opportunity Grant Program Eligibility and Guidelines

Opportunity Grant Program Goal and Purpose

Through the ABE Opportunity Grants program, the ABE supports new, boots-on-the-ground, innovative programs and projects that serve the immediate and critical legal needs of the public and are of importance to the legal profession and its concerns for access to justice. Accordingly, ABE Opportunity Grant Program funding focus areas include:

- Access to justice, especially for vulnerable and underserved populations, through innovations to legal services delivery, including maximizing pro bono service delivery;
- The rule of law and improvement of the justice system, including ensuring equal justice and elimination of bias; and
- Increased public understanding of the law and the legal system to foster greater civic engagement.

This grant program favors programs and projects new to the providers and underserved communities that address immediate and on-going urgent needs in innovative ways taking advantage of existing and emerging technologies and other opportunities that might not otherwise be able to obtain timely funding from alternative sources. Grant proposals requesting support of $25,000 or less are typical and viewed more favorably by the Grants Committee as it makes it possible to fund more projects. Requests for larger amounts will be considered if the proposed project addresses immediate and critical needs in a particularly innovative fashion with tools or resources that can be replicated by other service providers.

Organizational Eligibility

An organization is eligible to apply for an ABE Opportunity Grant if it is tax-exempt under section 501(c)(3) of the and classified as a public charity under section 509 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code or if it has a written fiscal agency relationship with such an organization. Eligible organizations must be incorporated in the United States or a U.S. Territory. This grant program does not fund governmental regulatory agencies.

Potential grantees include (but are not limited to):

- bar associations and bar foundations;
- law schools and law school legal clinics;
- Legal Services Corporation (LSC) funded organizations;
- legal service delivery organizations;
- human service organizations with legal service or law-related programming; and
- other non-profits or civic organizations with law-related programming.

ABE is particularly interested in supporting programs and projects that have a direct effect on the needs of individuals and communities. National organizations that apply should carefully draw the connection between their proposed work and its impact on local communities.

Organizations that have previously been funded by the ABE may apply for a new project/program. The ABE can only consider additional funding to an organization after a final grant report is submitted and accepted.

Project/Program Eligibility

ABE Opportunity Grants support law-related public service, education, and needs assessment/best practice demonstration projects/programs. Eligible projects must take place in and impact the United States or a U.S. territory. The ABE does not fund international projects.

ABE Opportunity Grants only support new and innovative projects. The ABE does not fund projects and programs that your organization is already doing or services it is already providing. To be considered new and innovative, the project you propose must, for example:

- create or utilize a tool, technology or program delivery approach that is new to your organization or community or to the field of law (examples include, adding a walk-in clinic to your delivery model for survivors of domestic violence; launching a new medical-legal partnership to serve a previously unserved population; adding a mobile clinic to your service delivery model to serve rural clients; automating Miranda warnings in multiple languages);
- address a new and urgent need or problem (examples include, pro se representation training to take advantage of a new law); or
- identify or document a new challenge or need (examples include, developing a legal framework for representing human trafficking survivors, conducting a needs assessment of medical clinic patients' legal needs).

The ABE will consider projects that, for example:

- build organizational capacity to serve clients better (examples include, upgrading or adding a client online intake system or creating on-demand training for pro bono lawyers so services can expand)
- develop tools, technology or approaches that could be used by the broader legal community (examples include, translating immigration forms and instructions into multiple languages, developing an app to assist disaster survivors and pro bono lawyers gather needed paperwork for legal claims or adding a petition generator to a client online service portal)
- document/prove a best practice (examples include, studying public defense best practices and reporting results, analyzing eviction data in rural areas to drive better prevention programming).

The ABE will not consider projects that seek funding to support the direct provision of legal services without a new or innovative component.

Generally, an ABE Opportunity Grant is a one-time award with a grant period of one year or less. The ABE Opportunity Grant Program favors projects/programs that are time-limited (i.e., do not involve long term general operating costs such as salaries and rent). The ABE will consider grants in support of one-time costs of a longer-term program (e.g., purchase the van to deliver mobile services). The ABE will also consider seed funding (except for staff costs) for a longer-term initiative if the organization can demonstrate firm plans to secure continued funding. Organizations applying to start a program that will become part of the annual programming of the organization will need to answer a question in the application about their specific plans to ensure continued funding for the effort.

The ABE Opportunity Grant Program does not support ongoing current general operating or staff expenses. You can use ABE grant funds to help the costs of consultants; interns; and short-term, project-specific contractual workers. Opportunity grants do not support the following:

- personnel costs (salaries and benefits) of staff. Your project budget may include the time of staff people, but you cannot use ABE Opportunity Grant funds to support these line items;
- portions of salary for individuals who are supervising direct project staff (these are considered indirect costs);
- capital expenditures unless they are one-time costs directly related to the implementation of the project (e.g., software or other technology to launch a project or a vehicle needed to provide mobile legal services delivery);
- indirect expenses and administrative overhead;
- fundraising expenses;
- sponsorships of fundraising or awards events;
- programs or projects that are intended to influence legislation or elect candidates; and
- operating deficits.

Application Process and Deadlines

To apply for an Opportunity Grant, you must complete this application form. Instructions for completing the form will assist you. If you have questions or need additional guidance, you can contact Jackie Casey at 312-988-6402 or jcasey@abenet.org.

For the 2021 grant cycle, the ABE is also adding an OPTIONAL letter of inquiry. By completing the letter of inquiry form, you can obtain feedback about your proposed project, including to determine if it fits the ABE guidelines as previously described.

To receive feedback before your application, you can submit your letter of inquiry form to the ABE by 5:00 Central Standard Time on Friday, August 21, 2020. Feedback will be provided by email or telephone conversation by Friday, September 11, 2020. Positive feedback about your letter of inquiry should not be interpreted as a promise of funding.

The letter of inquiry process is OPTIONAL. Organizations can bypass the letter of inquiry and submit a full proposal to be considered for funding. Proposals are due by 5:00 Central Standard Time on Friday, October 2, 2020. Announcement of grant awards will take place on or before February 28, 2021. Grants awards will be paid by April 1, 2021.

ABE Opportunity Grant Program Contact Information

Jackie Casey
American Bar Endowment
321 North Clark Street, 14th Floor
Chicago, Illinois 60654-7648
Attention: Opportunity Grants
312-988-6402
jcasey@abenet.org

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 35

CIVIL LEGAL AID GRANT PROGRAM

Grant Purpose

NC IOLTA's Civil Legal Aid Grants provide general support for a network of legal aid organizations that together provide basic access to the justice system for low-income people residing in every county in North Carolina. Some of these grants support legal aid for specific client services and serve specific client groups.

Funding Criteria

Preference generally will be given to requests from applicants:

- Having multiple-funding sources;
- For the direct representation of clients or client groups, including community legal education and community economic development;
- For staffed civil legal aid organizations as the most effective and efficient means by which to deliver high quality legal assistance to the poor, including pro bono efforts as an important supplement to staffed legal services;
- Supporting current qualified providers over additional, separate programs except where a separate program can address client needs more effectively and efficiently;
- Cooperating in the statewide coordination of delivery of civil legal aid through the NC Equal Justice Alliance formerly known as the NC Legal Services Planning Council, and, in areas with multiple providers, undertaking cooperative efforts as appropriate;
- Developing innovative client service techniques and evaluating their effectiveness and efficiency.

Definition of Indigent

To be considered for a Civil Legal Aid Grant from NC IOLTA, a program must be providing civil legal aid to indigent or low-income individuals or groups through a staffed program or a program using volunteer lawyers on a pro bono or reduced-fee basis.

The organization's definition of indigent or low-income clients must be clients who are:

- at or below 200% of the federal poverty guideline; or
- eligible to receive public assistance through a government program for the indigent.

In determining income, the organization may consider availability of income, i.e. whether the individual seeking assistance has direct and unfettered access, without having to obtain the consent or cooperation of another person over whom the individual does not have control and who does not in fact consent or cooperate.

If an organization uses a definition of indigent or low-income clients, for all or a portion of its clients that is different from the above, it must be able to show that a majority of its clients fall within the stated NC IOLTA definition.

Legal services may include direct legal representation and related training and technical assistance.

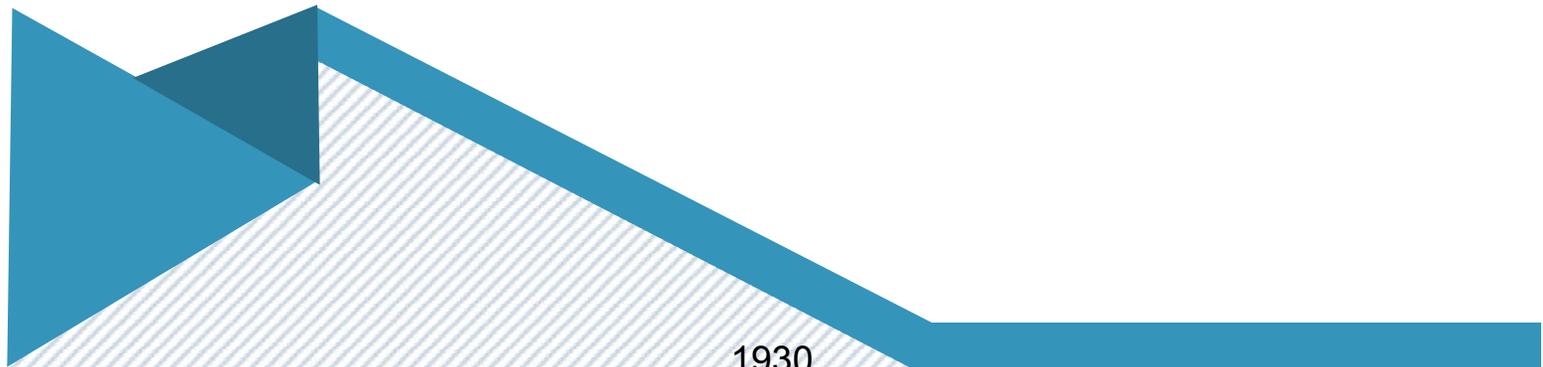

It is presumed that legal services will be provided to the indigent free of charge. However, an organization will not be disqualified for charging nominal fees as long as its policy allows for complete waiver of fees in cases where clients cannot pay the fee. Such organizations should keep updated with NC IOLTA a copy of their fee schedule and include information on fees received in their regular financial reports to NC IOLTA.

Definition of Legal Aid Organization

NC IOLTA defines a legal aid organization as a non-profit organization under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code whose primary purpose is to provide civil legal aid to low-income clients.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 36

FAMILY LAW EXAM GUIDE

Family Law Exam Structure

- 2020 Exam offered with ExamSoft Remote Proctoring only.
- 6 hours long (four 90-minute modules).
- Exam Sessions will begin around 8 AM and finish prior to 5 PM.

Morning Module 1

- Includes approximately 18 questions.
- Short answer questions (5 points or 7.5 points each).
- Short essay questions (10 points or 12.5 points each). Allow approximately 10 minutes per essay question.
- Please note the point values and plan your time accordingly.

Morning Module 2

- Includes approximately 18 questions.
- Short answer questions (5 points or 7.5 points each).
- Short essay questions (10 points or 12.5 points each). Allow approximately 10 minutes per essay question.
- Please note the point values and plan your time accordingly.

60-minute lunch break

Afternoon Module 1

- Includes approximately 18 questions.
- Short answer questions (5 points or 7.5 points each).
- Short essay questions (10 points or 12.5 points each). Allow approximately 10 minutes per essay question.
- Please note the point values and plan your time accordingly.

Afternoon Module 2

- Includes approximately 18 questions.
- Short answer questions (5 points or 7.5 points each).
- Short essay questions (10 points or 12.5 points each). Allow approximately 10 minutes per essay question.
- Please note the point values and plan your time accordingly.

All questions are allocated "points" and require responses that demonstrate accuracy, clarity, sound reasoning, recognition of the problem presented, knowledge of the principle of law involved and correct application of those principles. Full or partial credit for answers may be given.

Subject Matter

The examination shall cover the applicant's knowledge and application of the law relating to:

- (A) Contempt (Chapter 5A of the North Carolina General Statutes);

- (B) Adoptions (Chapter 48);
- (C) Bastardy (Chapter 49);
- (D) Absolute Divorce, Divorce from Bed and Board, Alimony, Child Custody and Child Support, including enforcement of alimony, post-separation support, and Child Support Orders, and equitable distribution, (Chapter 50);
- (E) The Family Law Arbitration Act (Chapter 50, Article 3)
- (F) Collaborative Law Proceedings (Chapter 50, Article 4)
- (G) Appointment of Parenting Coordinators (Chapter 50, Article 5)
- (H) Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (Chapter 50A);
- (I) Domestic violence (Chapter 50B) and Chapter 50(c) No Contact Orders;
- (J) Marriage (Chapter 51);
- (K) Powers and liabilities of married persons (Chapter 52);
- (L) Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (Chapter 52C);
- (M) Uniform Premarital Agreement Act (Chapter 52B);
- (N) Termination of parental rights, including adoption and failure to provide support (Chapter 7B, Article 1);
- (O) Federal Wiretap Act and North Carolina Statutes concerning wiretapping and computer trespass;
- (P) Internal Revenue Code §§71 (Alimony), 215 (Alimony Deduction, 121 (Exclusion of Gain from the Sale of Principal Residence), 151 and 152 (Dependency Exemptions), 1041 (Transfer of Property Incidental to Divorce), 2043 and 2516 (Gift Tax Exception), 414 (p) (Defining QDRO Requirements), 408 (d)(6) (IRA Transfer Requirements for Non-Taxable Event), and regulations interpretive of these Code sections; and
- (Q) Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (28 USC §1738A).

A recent family law examination contained questions on the following subjects. This year’s examination should include a similar allocation, but additional topics may also be included.

Family Law Exam Topics

Absolute divorce	Non-guidelines Child Support
Adoption	Military family law issues
Alienation of affection	Paternity
Alimony	Postnuptial agreements
Annulment	Postseparation support
Chapter 50C No Contact Orders	Premarital agreements
Child custody	QDRO (Qualified Domestic Relations Order)
Civil Procedure	Separation agreements
Criminal conversation	Tax issues arising from child custody (exemptions, deductions, etc.)
Criminal/civil contempt	Tax issues regarding support payments
Divorce from bed and board	Termination of parental rights
Domestic violence	Trial procedure

Equitable distribution	UCCJEA
Grandparent child support	UIFSA
Grandparent visitation/custody	Wiretapping/computer trespass/interception of communications
Guidelines Child Support

SAMPLE QUESTIONS/ANSWERS

(Please note that sample questions are included only as a reference for types of questions and suggested answers, they are not intended for use as legal authority.)

1) Criminal contempt proceedings:

- a) May be commenced only with a show cause order
- b) Require that an indigent person alleged to be guilty of contempt be afforded the right to counsel before any imprisonment may be imposed.
- c) Do not apply to civil action for child support.
- d) Restrict any term of imprisonment to a period of six months or less.
- e) All of the above.
- f) None of the above.

ANSWER #1: b

1) The amount of child support set in a separation agreement is:

- a) The amount, which must be set by the court, in absence of evidence to the contrary.
- b) Some evidence of the reasonable needs of the child.
- c) A rebuttable presumption of the amount necessary for the child.
- d) All of the above.
- e) None of the above.

ANSWER #2: c

2) Mr. Morning and his employee, Miss Goodnight, lived together in North Carolina for 10 years before they decided to marry, both working for Mr. Morning's company. During this ten-year period, the couple lived in Mr. Morning's home which he had inherited free of any encumbrance. Miss Goodnight had paid all of the utility bills, all clothing, and food expenses for the couple during the time they lived together.

After their marriage, Mr. Morning withdrew $90,000 cash from his separate funds and Ms. Morning (nee Miss Goodnight) withdrew $10,000 cash from her separate funds. The couple purchased a new condominium at Atlantic Beach for $100,000 as tenants by the entirety. The couple withdrew identical amounts of $90,000 cash by Mr. Morning from his separate funds and $10,000 cash from Mrs. Morning's separate funds and purchased CP&L stock in Mr. Morning's name alone. The couple continued to work in the business and each contributed 15% of his/her salary to retirement, as each of them had done for last 11 years. The marriage lasted exactly one year at which time the couple separated, sought equitable distribution and are now divorced.

(A) What, if anything, does Mrs. Morning own with regard to the home the couple lived in during the ten-year period? Explain your answer.

(B) What is Mrs. Morning entitled to receive from the condominium? Explain your answer.

(C) What is Mrs. Morning entitled to receive from the CP&L stock? Explain your answer.

(D) What, if anything, are Mr. Morning and Mrs. Morning entitled to with regard to the other's retirement accounts during the period in which they lived together and during their marriage? Explain your answer.

ANSWER #3:

(A) Mrs. Morning has no interest with regard to the home the couple lived in during the ten-year period prior to their marriage. North Carolina does not recognize the acquisition of “marital” rights with respect to a couple living together as man and wife but not married. Any remedy that Mrs. Morning may have would have to sound in unjust enrichment or quasi contract and could relate only to such issues. No consideration can be given in North Carolina for a sexual relationship between parties who are unmarried. Additionally, the home was inherited and was lien free. During the one-year period of the marriage, there is no evidence there was any active appreciation and thus any appreciation there may have been would have been passive. Passive appreciation on a spouse’s separate property remains separate property and the other spouse acquires no interest in same.

(B) With respect to the condominium, the parties took title as tenants by the entirety. Under McLean and its progeny, this would give rise to a strong presumption, rebuttable only by clear and convincing evidence, that the parties intended a gift to the marital estate. There is no evidence in this fact pattern to suggest this presumption could be overcome. A recent amendment to N.C.G.S. 50-20(b) changed the presumption on real property taken by the entireties during the marriage to a simple presumption rebutted by the greater weight of the evidence, although there have been no interpretive cases and it is not clear from 50-20(b) how the presumption can be overcome (i.e., by evidence of intent or only evidence of the source of funds). In practice, the stricter McLean presumption may still be applied.

(C) With respect to the CP&L stock, the result is different than with respect to the condominium. The equitable distribution statute states that separate property remains separate property regardless of how it is titled. The McLean distinction was drawn as a result of conveyancing language and law with respect to real property; no such distinction is present with respect to the CP&L stock. Therefore, the portion of the CP&L stock purchased by Mr. Morning from his separate funds ($90,000) would be his separate property. The portion of the CP&L stock attributable to Mrs. Morning’s separate funds ($10,000) would be her separate property. Nothing in this fact situation evidences any intent to make a gift to Mr. Morning.

(D) No marital rights of any type are acquired by a couple living together without the benefit of marriage. Therefore, any contributions Mr. Morning made to his retirement account prior to his marriage to Mrs. Morning would be his separate property. This would also be true for Mrs. Morning, i.e., all of her premarital contributions to her pension plan would be her separate property. All earnings and accumulations on each party’s separate retirement funds would also be their separate property. With respect to the contributions made by each party during their marriage and prior to their separation, these contributions would be marital. The contributions were 15 percent of the salary received for work performed during the marriage and as such would be classified as marital property. The court would have the authority to utilize a Qualified Domestic Relations Order to address the money in the pension plans or could determine the date of separation fair market value of the marital portion of each plan and distribute other assets as a “set off.”

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 37

ESTATE PLANNING AND PROBATE LAW

Estate Planning and Probate Law Exam Structure

- 2020 Exam offered with ExamSoft Remote Proctoring only.
- 6 hours long (four 90-minute modules).
- Exam sessions will begin around 8 AM and finish at approximately 5 PM.

Morning Module 1

- Includes one extensive essay question involving the development of an estate plan for a couple with complex estate planning needs and significant estate assets; includes a number of sub parts which ask you to address various tax and non-tax issues related to the development of their plan.
- The extensive fact pattern is provided and a total of 20 questions follow. The questions have various point values and require responses that demonstrate accuracy, clarity, sound reasoning, recognition of the problem presented, knowledge of the principle of law involved, and correct application of those principles. Please note the point values and allocate your time accordingly.
- Full or partial credit for answers may be given. Essay questions should be treated as law school exam essay questions. Mentioning a concept without further explanation will not get full credit. Merely listing bullet points without explanation will not get full credit. The law must be applied to the facts given.

Morning Module 2

- Includes two shorter essay questions which may cover NC estate and trust administration and NC corporate, partnership, and LLC law, including Federal and NC estate and income tax issues, as well as questions related to a client's insurance and retirement plan assets.
- The fact patterns are provided and a total of five questions follow for each essay. The questions have various point values and require responses that demonstrate accuracy, clarity, sound reasoning, recognition of the problem presented, knowledge of the principle of law involved, and correct application of those principles. Please note the point values and allocate your time accordingly.
- Full or partial credit for answers may be given. Essay questions should be treated as law school exam essay questions. Mentioning a concept without further explanation will not get full credit. Merely listing bullet points without explanation will not get full credit. The law must be applied to the facts given.

60-minute lunch break

Afternoon Module 1

- 52 multiple choice questions – covering topics including: Estate/GST Tax, Gift Tax, NC Trust Law, NC Wills and POA's, Estate Administration and Probate Law, Advanced Planning Techniques, Insurance and ILIT's, Retirement Benefits, and Business Issues.

Afternoon Module 2

- 53 multiple choice questions – covering topics including: Estate Administration, Business Issues, NC Trust Law, Fiduciary Income Tax, Advanced Planning Techniques, Gift Tax, Retirement Benefits, and NC Wills and POA's.

Subject Matter

The examination shall cover the applicant's knowledge and application of the law in the following topics:

- (A) Federal gift tax;
- (B) Federal estate tax;

- (C) Federal generation skipping transfer tax;
- (D) Federal and North Carolina fiduciary income taxes;
- (E) Federal and North Carolina income taxes as they apply to the final returns of the decedent and his or her surviving spouse;
- (F) North Carolina law of wills and trusts;
- (G) North Carolina probate law, including fiduciary accounting;
- (H) Federal and North Carolina income and estate tax laws and Federal gift tax law applicable to revocable and irrevocable inter vivos trusts;
- (I) North Carolina law of business organizations, family law, and property law as they may be applicable to estate planning transactions;
- (J) Federal and North Carolina tax law applicable to LLC's, partnerships and corporations (including S corporations) which may be encountered in estate planning and administration; and
- (K) Planning with life insurance, retirement accounts, and charitable trusts.

Exam Preparation Tips

Please study the exam topics listed above. Approximately 60% of the exam tests your knowledge of gift, estate, generation skipping and income tax rules as these rules pertain to estate planning and estate administration matters. The balance of the exam (approximately 40%) tests North Carolina state law issues. The exam will test your knowledge of current law as the law exists at the time of the examination.

Most applicants who pass the exam have spent substantial time preparing for the exam. It is important that you identify the areas and topics of which you have the least knowledge and that you concentrate your preparation in these areas. Many applicants obtain the materials for or attend the North Carolina Bar Association Estate Planning and Fiduciary Law Survey CLE Course (normally offered every third year). These materials are offered by the Bar Association in digital copy and/or video replay. See ncbar.org (<https://www.ncbar.org/members/sections/estate-planning-fiduciary-law/>).

The estate planning and probate law examination covers the following topics. The current exam may include a very similar distribution of questions.

Estate Planning & Probate Law Exam Topics

Asset protection	Fiduciary income tax return preparation
Beneficiary designations	Formalized business agreements
Business continuation	Generation-skipping transfer tax
Charitable transfers	Gift tax returns
Claims against estate	Income in respect of a decedent
Comprehensive estate plan	Inter vivos trusts
Decedent's final income tax returns	IRA distributions
Deferred estate tax payment	Irrevocable trusts
Disclaimers	Joint tenancies
Elective Share	Life Insurance policies and planning
Estate freezing	Marital dispositions
Estate planning documents	NC laws of wills and trusts

Estate tax liability	Powers of attorney
Federal estate tax	Probate administration and accounting
Federal estate tax return	Revocable trusts
Federal gift tax	Summary Administration
Fiduciaries

SAMPLE QUESTIONS/ANSWERS

(Please note that sample questions are included only as a reference for types of questions and suggested answers, they are not intended for use as legal authority.)

1) Grantor creates a trust with three co-trustees named. The terms of the trust confer the authority to invest the trust property on only one of the three co-trustees. Which of the following is/are TRUE under default North Carolina statutes, assuming the terms of the trust do not specifically address these issues?

- A. The excluded co-trustees are not liable, individually or as fiduciaries for any loss incurred by the beneficiaries as the result of imprudent action taken by the co-trustee with sole investment authority.
- B. The excluded trustees have no duty to monitor the conduct of the co-trustee with sole investment authority.
- C. The excluded co-trustees are not required to give notice to any beneficiary of any action taken or not taken by the co-trustee with sole investment authority whether or not the excluded co-trustees agree with the action of the co-trustee with investment authority.
- D. All of the above.

ANSWER #1: D

2) FEDERAL ESTATE TAX: Decedent's will provides for a QTIP trust to be funded for the surviving spouse in the amount of $1,000,000. At the date of the descendant's death, the surviving spouse is 50 years old. The value of a life estate for a life tenant of age 50 is 76.642%. The value of the QTIP trust at the date of the death of the surviving spouse is also $1,000,000.

- a) What is the maximum value of the QTIP trust, which qualifies for the federal estate tax marital deduction at the decedent's death?
- b) What value of the QTIP trust would be includible in the surviving spouse's estate for federal estate tax purposes at her death?

ANSWER #2: (a) $1,000,000 (b) $1,000,000

3) ESTATE PLANNING DOCUMENTS AND PROCEDURES: Mudd Family: Ronald Mudd, age 60, is married to Jane Mudd, age 55 and they have three children: Raoul Mudd, age 35, is a practicing surgeon, is married, and has two children, ages 12 and 6; Stephanie M. Mudd, age 32, is married - her husband is a computer programmer- and has one child, age 8; and Melanie Mudd, age 30, is unmarried, but has a child, age 4. She is employed by the Communist Workers Party and corresponds infrequently with her parents, visiting them only on rare occasions. All of the children and grandchildren are North Carolina residents except for Melanie and her child who live in California.

Estate Facts: Following his making of an appointment with you to get advice on appropriate estate planning documents, Ronald Mudd has presented to you detailed information with regard to his assets at the present time which are:

Cash and Money Market Accounts $1,000,000

Marketable Securities 20,000,000

Life Insurance (Face Amount) 2,000,000

Residence 275,000

Rental Real Estate 300,000

Personal Property and Personal Effects 10,000

Current Gross Estate $13,585,000

The income currently being produced by his assets amounts to $835,000 as follows:

Cash and Money Market Accounts $5,000

Marketable Securities 800,000

Rental Real Estate 30,000

Total Income from Assets $835,000

At your initial conference Ronald Mudd indicates that the primary intentions with regard to disposition of his estate are that his wife be amply provided for during her remaining lifetime and that death taxes be minimized so as to provide a maximum amount to be left to his family. He also indicates to you that, following the death of his wife, he would prefer that funds be provided on a preferential basis to care for his daughters and their children rather than for his son, whose education and medical training have been financed by Ronald and who is commencing to build an independent estate. In addition, he inquires with regard to a procedure whereby only limited funds be made available to his daughter, Melanie, whom he considers unreliable and imprudent.

- a) Discuss in the space provided below and on the following page the estate plan (lifetime and at death) that you would recommend for Ronald and his family, including (if appropriate) testamentary and inter vivos trusts.
- b) Discuss the dispositive provisions you would recommend for Ronald's will and trusts to carry out his primary testamentary intentions and planning objectives [Do not discuss the selection of fiduciaries (See question (c), below)].
- c) Discuss in the space provided below the factors to be considered in the selection of fiduciaries under Ronald's will and any testamentary or inter vivos trusts included in the estate plan recommended in question (a), above. State also your recommendations as to the specific fiduciaries to be selected by Ronald.

ANSWER #3

a) Because of the size of Ronald's estate, an estate plan would be recommended which would take full advantage of the unlimited marital deduction under the federal estate tax law. In addition, it would be appropriate to make use of the federal unified credit shelter share, so that this amount would be excluded from the taxable estate of Ronald's wife, Jane, at her death. Due regard would be reserved to provide an inheritance for the Mudd daughters, Stephanie and Melanie, providing supervision for the investment of Stephanie's trust for a limited period of time and permanent provisions for the administration and preservation of an estate or funds for Melanie, including possibly a provision for Melanie by an inter vivos trust.

Provisions for generation-skipping bequests to the children of Raoul Mudd would be recommended within the amount of the GST exemption.

b) Exemption equivalent bequests (subject to payment of death taxes) to Ronald's daughters, Stephanie and Melanie, in trust with the trust income payable to his wife and/or daughters and his residuary estate to a qualified marital trust for Jane with remainder, or contingent bequests of the residue if Jane predeceases, trusts for his daughters with a $1,000,000 bequest to the children of Raoul in minority trusts; Stephanie's trust would terminate when she attained age 45, the remainder interest passing to Stephanie; Melanie's trust would terminate upon the death of the survivor of Jane or Melanie and would pass to Melanie's child, subject to being held in trust until she attained at least age 30.

In the event that funds were needed by Melanie prior to Ronald's death, a recommendation might be that an irrevocable inter vivos trust be established to provide for Melanie's welfare, and the bequest passing to Melanie's trust under Ronald's will would be adjusted for equalization with the same amount to be passed to Stephanie or to Stephanie's trust following the administration of Ronald's estate.

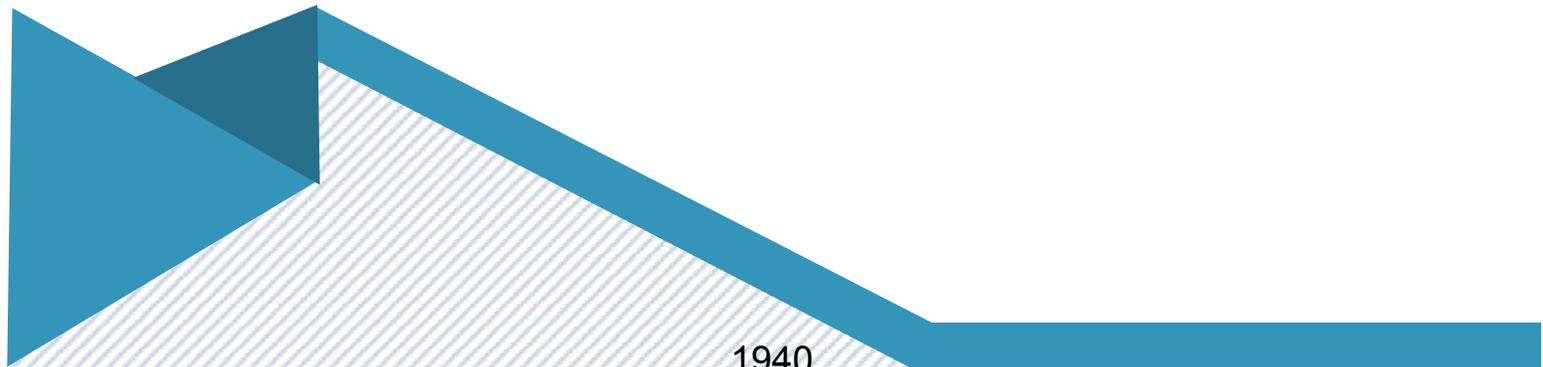

c) In selecting an executor for the administration of Ronald's will, I would recommend his wife, Jane Mudd, or his wife, Jane, and his daughter, Stephanie, with consideration as successor executors of Ronald's will, his son, Raoul Mudd, and/or a North Carolina bank or trust company.

In the selection of a trustee for the QTIP marital trust, my recommendations would be Stephanie and/or Raoul with a North Carolina bank or trust company as either a co-trustee or a successor-trustee of the QTIP Trust.

With regard to the naming of a trustee for Melanie's trust, I would certainly consider recommending a California bank if the trust were to be established prior to the death of Ronald Mudd and possibly a California bank (if such bank qualifies to serve as a trustee of a testamentary trust under North Carolina law) as trustee of any testamentary trust established for the benefit of Melanie Mudd and her daughter.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 38

THE PEDAGOGY OF TRAUMA-INFORMED LAWYERING

SARAH KATZ & DEEYA HALDAR*

“Trauma-informed practice” is an increasingly prevalent approach in the delivery of therapeutic services, social and human services, and now legal practice. Put simply, the hallmarks of trauma-informed practice are when the practitioner puts the realities of the client’s trauma experiences at the forefront in engaging with the client, and adjusts the practice approach informed by the individual client’s trauma experience. Trauma-informed practice also encompasses the practitioner employing modes of self-care to counterbalance the effect the client’s trauma experience may have on the practitioner.

This article posits that teaching trauma-informed practice in law school clinics furthers the goals of clinical teaching, and is a critical aspect of preparing law students for legal careers. Trauma-informed practice is relevant to many legal practice areas. Clients frequently seek legal assistance at a time when they are highly vulnerable and emotional. As clinical professors who each supervise a family law clinic, we of course teach our students how to connect with their clients, while drawing the appropriate boundaries of the attorney-client relationship. Equally challenging and important is helping our students cultivate insight into identifying and addressing trauma and its effects. Many of our clinics’ clients are survivors of intimate partner violence or have experienced other significant traumatic events that are relevant to their family court matters. Law students should learn to recognize the effects these traumatic experiences may have on their clients’ actions and behaviors. Further, law students should learn to recognize the effect that their clients’ stories and hardships are having on their own advocacy and lives as a whole. It is particularly crucial that we educate our law students about the effects of vicarious trauma and help them develop tools to manage its effects as they move through their clinical work and ultimately into legal practice.

This article argues that four key characteristics of trauma-informed lawyering are: identifying trauma, adjusting the attorney-cl-

* The authors are Sarah Katz, Assistant Clinical Professor of Law, James E. Beasley School of Law, Temple University, and Deeya Haldar, Adjunct Professor of Law, Thomas R. Kline School of Law at Drexel University. The authors are extremely grateful for the research assistance of Khadijeh Jaber, Temple Law ’15, and Janice Daul, Drexel Law ’14. Sarah Boonin, Brad Colbert, Phyllis Goldfarb, Natalie Nanasi and Jane Stoeber provided invaluable feedback on an early version at the Clinical Law Review workshop at New York University. Colleagues at the AALS Clinical Conference, AALS Family Law Mid-Year Meeting, and the Mid-Atlantic Clinical Workshop gave thoughtful suggestions and edits. Thank you also to Susan Brooks for helpful guidance as this project unfolded.

ent relationship, adapting litigation strategy, and preventing vicarious trauma. Specifically, the article discusses how to teach trauma-informed lawyering through direct examples of pedagogical approaches.

INTRODUCTION

When Victoria¹ came into the clinic for an intake appointment with a law student, the student knew only that this was a child and spousal support case. After explaining the goals and purpose of an intake interview, the law student asked a simple question: what legal problem brings you here today? Victoria broke down crying and began explaining that about two years before, she learned that her husband of twenty-one years had been sexually abusing their now thirteen year-old daughter and fifteen year-old son since they were small children. Victoria stated that her husband had sometimes physically abused her, but she knew nothing of the sexual abuse. After the disclosure, she had filed for and been granted a protection order in Tennessee on behalf of herself and her children. She then moved with her children from the marital home in Tennessee to Philadelphia to be with family. The Tennessee protection order expired, and because of threatening phone messages received from her husband, she had sought a protection order again in Philadelphia. A local domestic violence legal services agency had referred her to the clinic for help with a child and spousal support case.

During the meeting with the law student, Victoria became increasingly upset, and continued to share details of the abuse she and her children had suffered. Victoria seemed intent on convincing the law student that she really had not known about the abuse of her children while it was happening. The law student offered tissues and told Victoria repeatedly that he believed her, and that it must have been so awful to make this realization. When the law student tried to move the focus of the conversation to the pending support case, it turned out that Victoria had not brought any of the paperwork she had been asked to bring by the clinic's office manager. The law student got as much information as Victoria could provide, and then explained that for the clinic to see if it could help her with the case, he would need to see the paperwork. The law student and Victoria scheduled another appointment, and the law student provided Victoria a written list of the needed documents. The law student discussed with his supervisor, and later shared in class case rounds, how challenging the interview had been. Victoria did bring the needed documents to the second appointment, and the clinic ultimately accepted the case.

¹ This case description is based on the experience of a client represented by Professor Katz's clinic. Names and identifying information have been changed.

Prior to going to court, Victoria called the law student asking if she could just not attend the court date, because she was terrified of seeing her husband. The law student calmly explained that Victoria needed to be present if she wanted to pursue the support claim. They scheduled a time to meet the day before court, and the law student spent a lot of time reviewing with Victoria exactly what occurs in a support hearing, including where she and others would sit, what types of questions would be asked, and what the law student would be doing. The law student also arranged to meet Victoria prior to the hearing time at a location near the courthouse, so they could walk into court together. Because the litigation became very contentious and there were multiple court hearings, the law student repeated this approach each time there was a court hearing. He also encouraged Victoria to speak with her therapist about her anxiety over dealing with her husband. Ultimately the support case was resolved favorably for Victoria.

While many reading would view the description of the law student's handling of the case above as simply "good lawyering," it is also an example of "trauma-informed practice." "Trauma-informed practice" is an increasingly prevalent approach in the delivery of therapeutic services, social and human services, and now legal practice. Put simply, the hallmarks of trauma-informed practice are when the practitioner, here a law student, puts the realities of the clients' trauma experiences at the forefront in engaging with clients and adjusts the practice approach informed by the individual client's trauma experience. Trauma-informed practice also encompasses the practitioner employing modes of self-care to counterbalance the effect the client's trauma experience may have on the practitioner.

Although there is a body of clinical legal education literature devoted to the value of teaching and developing law students' empathy toward their clients, less attention has been devoted to the importance of teaching trauma-informed practice, the pedagogy of teaching law students to recognize and understand trauma, and the effect of vicarious trauma on law students (and attorneys) who work with clients who have experienced serious trauma. Clients frequently seek legal assistance at a time when they are highly vulnerable and emotional. In practice areas such as family law, immigration, child welfare, criminal law and others, by necessity, clients must share some of the most intimate and painful details of their lives. In our family law clinics, our students are taught how to connect with their clients, while drawing the appropriate boundaries of the attorney-client relationship. Equally challenging and important is helping our students cultivate insight into identifying and addressing trauma and its effects. Many of our clinics' clients are domestic violence survivors or have experienced other significant traumatic events that are relevant to their family court matters. Law students must learn to recognize the effects these traumatic experiences may have on their clients' actions and behaviors. Further, law students must learn to recognize the effect that their clients' stories and hardships are having on their own advocacy and lives as a whole. It is particularly crucial that we educate our law students about the effects of vicarious trauma and help them develop tools to manage its effects as they move through their clinical work, and ultimately into legal practice.

Although the authors draw from their own experience teaching family law clinics, other types of law school clinics could likely benefit from the pedagogy of trauma-informed lawyering, such as immigration law, criminal law, juvenile law, and veterans' rights law.² A significant body of literature exists regarding working with traumatized children involved in the legal system, including in the law school clinical context.³ It is the authors' intention that this article will provide tools for teaching trauma-informed practice in all law school clinic settings, while the examples offered are specific to family law experience.

This article proceeds in three sections. The first section will further explore trauma-informed practice, and what is meant by the terms "trauma," and "vicarious trauma." The second section will argue why teaching trauma-informed lawyering in a clinical legal education setting makes sense. The third section will identify four hallmarks of trauma-informed legal practice: (1) identifying trauma; (2) adjusting the lawyer-client relationship; (3) adapting litigation strategy; and (4) preventing vicarious trauma. The article then discusses how to incorporate these hallmarks of trauma-informed lawyering as teaching goals in law school clinics through direct examples of pedagogical approaches.

² See, e.g., Lynette M. Parker, Increasing Law Students' Effectiveness When Representing Traumatized Clients: A Case Study of the Katherine & George Alexander Community Law Center, 21 GEO. IMMIGR. L.J. 163 (2007) (discussing students in immigration clinic begin confronted with traumatized client seeking asylum); Ingrid Loreen, Therapeutic Jurisprudence & The Law School Asylum Clinic, 17 ST. THOMAS L. REV. 835, 845 (2005) (arguing that students need training in therapeutic jurisprudence topics, including trauma training in order to adequately serve traumatized clients seeking asylum); Sarah Mourer, Study, Support, and Save: Teaching Sensitivity in the Law School Death Penalty Clinic, 7 U. MIAMI L. REV. 357 (2013) (discussing students exposed to clients with trauma histories in the Miami Law Death Penalty Clinic); Capt. Evan R. Seamone, The Veterans' Lawyer as Counselor: Using Therapeutic Jurisprudence to Enhance Client Counseling for Combat Veterans with Posttraumatic Stress Disorder, 202 MIL. L. REV. 185 (2009).

³ See Carolyn Salisbury, From Violence and Victimization to Voice and Validation: Incorporating Therapeutic Jurisprudence in a Children's Law Clinic, 17 ST. THOMAS L. REV. 623 (2005). See also Renee DeBoard-Lucas, Kate Wasserman, Betsy McAlister Groves & Megan Bair-Merritt, 16 Trauma-Informed, Evidence-Based Recommendations for Advocates Working with Children Exposed to Intimate Partner Violence, 32(9) CHILD L. PRAC. 136 (2013); JEAN KOH PETERS, REPRESENTING CHILDREN IN CHILD PROTECTIVE PROCEEDINGS: ETHICAL AND PRACTICAL DIMENSIONS 9 (2007); NATIONAL CHILD TRAUMATIC STRESS NETWORK, BIRTH PARENTS WITH TRAUMA HISTORIES AND THE CHILD WELFARE SYSTEM: A GUIDE FOR JUDGES AND ATTORNEYS, available at <http://www.nctsn.org/products/birth-parents-trauma-histories-child-welfare-system-guide-birth-parents-2012> (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015).

I. DEFINING TRAUMA-INFORMED PRACTICE

Trauma-informed practice has gained traction in the therapeutic world for at least the last decade. As one practitioner has explained, “[t]rauma-informed practice incorporates assessment of trauma and trauma symptoms into all routine practice; it also ensures that clients have access to trauma-focused interventions, that is, interventions that treat the consequences of traumatic stress. A trauma-informed perspective asks clients not ‘What is wrong with you?’ but instead, ‘What happened to you?’”⁴ As psychiatrist Sandra Bloom has written, “It connects a person’s behavior to their trauma response rather than isolating their actions to the current circumstances and assuming a character flaw.”⁵ A trauma-informed system also focuses on how services are delivered, and how service-systems are organized.⁶ These approaches in the therapeutic context have begun to profoundly inform the delivery of other types of human and social services, such as child welfare,⁷ law enforcement, and the courts.⁸ But in order to understand what is meant by trauma-informed practice, an understanding of trauma, and vicarious trauma is necessary; this section will define and explain these terms, and then return to a discussion of how trauma-

⁴ Nancy Smyth, Trauma-Informed Social Work Practice: What Is It and Why Should We Care?, SOCIAL WORK/SOCIAL CARE & MEDIA (Mar. 20, 2012), available at <http://swscmedia.wordpress.com/2012/03/20/trauma-informed-social-work-practice-what-is-it-and-why-should-we-care-opinion-piece-by-dr-nancy-smyth/> (citing SANDRA L. BLOOM, & BRIAN FARRAGHER, DESTROYING SANCTUARY: THE CRISIS IN HUMAN SERVICES DELIVERY SYSTEMS (2011)).

⁵ Sandra L. Bloom, Why Should Philadelphia Become a Trauma-Informed City, Briefing Paper Prepared for the Philadelphia Mayoral Forum, sponsored by the Scattergood Foundation (2015), available at <http://sanctuaryweb.com/Portals/0/Bloom%20Pubs/2015%20Bloom%20Why%20should%20Philadelphia%20become%20a%20Trauma.pdf>.

⁶ Sandra L. Bloom, The Sanctuary Model of Trauma-Informed Organizational Change, 16 (1) THE SOURCE 12, 14 (Nat’l Abandoned Infants Resource Center, 2007).

⁷ ABA CENTER FOR CHILDREN & THE LAW, IMPLEMENTING TRAUMA-INFORMED PRACTICES IN CHILD WELFARE (2013) available at <http://childwelfareparc.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/11/Implementing-Trauma-Informed-Practices.pdf>.

⁸ SUBSTANCE ABUSE AND MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES ADMINISTRATION, ESSENTIAL COMPONENTS OF TRAUMA-INFORMED JUDICIAL PRACTICE, available at http://www.nasmhpd.org/sites/default/files/JudgesEssential_5%201%202013finaldraft.pdf (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015) [hereinafter SAMHSA].

informed practice is implemented.

A. Understanding Trauma

An event is defined as traumatic when it renders an individual's internal and external resources inadequate, making effective coping impossible.⁹ A traumatic experience occurs when an individual subjectively experiences a threat to life, bodily integrity or sanity.¹⁰ The American Psychological Association further defines trauma as:

[An] emotional response to a terrible event like an accident, rape or natural disaster. Immediately after the event, shock and denial are typical. Longer term reactions include unpredictable emotions, flashbacks, strained relationships and even physical symptoms like headaches or nausea. While these feelings are normal, some people have difficulty moving on with their lives.¹¹

External threats that result in trauma can include “experiencing, witnessing, anticipating, or being confronted with an event or events that involve actual or threatened death or serious injury, or threats to the physical integrity of one's self or others.”¹²

Trauma can take many different forms. A 1997 study found that about one third of the population will experience severe trauma at some point.¹³ The most common sources of trauma, experienced by 15 to 35 percent of the people surveyed, included witnessing someone being hurt or killed, or being involved in a fire, flood, or other such life-threatening accidents.¹⁴ Other common experiences included robbery and sudden deaths of loved ones.¹⁵ An estimated 0.5 percent of people (1.2 million) in the United States were victims of a violent crime in 2014.¹⁶ Researchers have begun to confirm the interconnection between the effects of racism and trauma.¹⁷ Further the intercon-

⁹ Richard R. Kluft, Sandra L. Bloom, & John D. Kinzie, Treating the Traumatized Patient and Victims of Violence, in 86 NEW DIRECTIONS IN MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES 79 (2000) (citing B. A. Van der Kolk, The Compulsion to Repeat the Trauma: Re-enactment, Re-victimization, and Masochism, 12 PSYCHIATRIC CLINICS OF N. AM. 2 (1989)).

¹⁰ LAURIE A. PEARLMAN & KAREN SAAKVITNE, TRAUMA AND THE THERAPIST: COUNTERTRANSFERENCE AND VICARIOUS TRAUMATIZATION IN PSYCHOTHERAPY WITH INCEST SURVIVORS 60 (1995).

¹¹ Trauma, AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION, <http://www.apa.org/topics/trauma/> (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015).

¹² Id.

¹³ S.D. Solomon & J.R.T. Davidson, Trauma: Prevalence, Impairment, Service Use, and Cost, 58 J. CLINICAL PSYCHIATRY (SUPPL. 9) 5-11, 7 (1997).

¹⁴ Id.

¹⁵ Id.

¹⁶ Jennifer L. Truman & Lynn Langton, Criminal Victimization, 2014 at 1 (U.S. Dept. of Justice Sept. 29, 2015), available at <http://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/pdf/cv14.pdf>.

¹⁷ See, e.g., Dottie Lebron, Laura Morrison, Dan Ferris, Amanda Alcantara, Danielle Cummings, Gary Parker & Mary McKay, The Trauma of Racism (McSilver Institute for

nection between urban poverty and trauma has been established.¹⁸

Intimate partner violence and child maltreatment are other examples of trauma, and are far more prevalent than is often acknowledged. On average, twenty four people per minute are victims of rape, physical violence, or stalking by an intimate partner in the United States—more than twelve million women and men over the course of a year.¹⁹ Nearly three in ten women and one in ten men in the US have experienced rape, physical violence, and/or stalking by a partner and report a related impact on their functioning.²⁰ A reported 1.71% of children are maltreated in the United States.²¹

The rates of abuse are higher among the population of litigants in family court. The anecdotal experience of our family law clinics is many of our clients have experienced serious incidents of physical or sexual abuse by an intimate partner, and in the past as a child. They may also have witnessed or experienced their own child(ren) being physically or sexually abused. These anecdotal observations are supported by empirical study. For example, one study indicated that 80% of parents who were separating or divorcing were able to agree on custody and parenting time with their children. But among the 20% of parents who needed the court to intervene to decide custody, domestic violence was remarkably prevalent, and a domestic violence allegation was substantiated in 41-55% of these cases.²² In fact, experts have noted the “majority of parents in ‘high-conflict divorces’ involving child custody disputes report a history of domestic violence.”²³ The National Center for State Courts has found documented evidence in court records of domestic violence in 20-55% of contested custody cases.²⁴

Poverty Policy & Research, NYU 2015), available at <http://www.mcsilver.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/04/Trauma-of-Racism-Report.pdf>; Glenn H. Miller, Commentary: The Trauma of Insidious Racism 37(1) J AM. ACAD. PSYCHIATRY LAW 41, 42 (Mar. 2009).

¹⁸ See, e.g., KATHRYN COLLINS ET AL., UNDERSTANDING THE IMPACT OF TRAUMA AND URBAN POVERTY ON FAMILY SYSTEMS: RISKS, RESILIENCE & INTERVENTIONS (Family Informed Trauma Treatment Center 2010).

¹⁹ CENTERS FOR DISEASE CONTROL, UNDERSTANDING INTIMATE PARTNER VIOLENCE FACT SHEET, available at, <http://www.cdc.gov/ViolencePrevention/pdf/IPV-FactSheet.pdf> (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015).

²⁰ Id.

²¹ U.S. DEPT. OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, FOURTH NATIONAL INCIDENCE STUDY OF CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT (NIS-4): REPORT TO CONGRESS, at 3-3 (2010).

²² Janet R. Johnson, Soyoun Lee, Nancy W. Oleson, & Marjorie G. Walters., Allegations and Substantiations of Abuse in Custody-Disputing Families, 43 FAM. CT. REV. 283, 289-290 (2005).

²³ PETER JAFFE, MICHELLE ZERWER, SAMANTHA POISSON, ACCESS DENIED: THE BARRIERS OF VIOLENCE AND POVERTY FOR ABUSED WOMEN AND THEIR CHILDREN AFTER SEPARATION 1 (2002).

²⁴ NATIONAL CENTER FOR STATE COURTS, DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AND CHILD CUSTODY DISPUTES: A RESOURCE HANDBOOK FOR JUDGES AND COURT MANAGERS 5 (1997).

The trauma experiences of clients have a direct relationship to how they relate to their attorneys and the courts, because trauma has a distinct physiological effect on the brain, which in turn affects behavior in the short-term and long-term. Colloquially, this evolutionary response is sometimes referred to as a “flight, fight, freeze.” As one writer has explained:

The brain’s prefrontal cortex—which is key to decision-making and memory—often becomes temporarily impaired. The amygdala, known to encode emotional experiences, begins to dominate, triggering the release of stress hormones and helping to record particular fragments of sensory information. Victims can also experience tonic immobility—a sensation of being frozen in place—or a dissociative state.²⁵

Subsequently, a traumatic experience becomes encoded as a traumatic memory and is stored in the brain via a pathway involving high levels of activity in the amygdala, making recall of the traumatic event highly affectively charged.²⁶ Recall, either intentional or through inadvertent exposure to internal or external stimuli related to the trauma, leads to the release of stress hormones.²⁷ For many individuals who have experienced trauma, specific conditioned stimuli may be linked to the traumatic event (unconditional stimulus) such that re-exposure to a similar environment produces recurrence of fear and anxiety similar to what was experienced during the trauma itself.²⁸ Thus the physiological effects of trauma can manifest far after the traumatic incident occurs, as the amygdala does not always discriminate between real dangers and memory from a past dangerous situation.

In response to traumatic experiences, an individual may feel intense fear, helplessness, or horror.²⁹ People process these reactions differently, resulting in different indicators of trauma.³⁰ Four common behaviors are: anxiety and depression, intense anger towards self or others, the formation of unhealthy relationships, and denial.³¹ Yet, although these common behaviors can result from trauma, the reac-

²⁵ Rebecca Ruiz, Why Don't Cops Believe Rape Victims?, SLATE (June 19, 2013), http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/jurisprudence/2013/06/why_cops_don_t_believe_rape_victims_and_how_brain_science_can_solve_the.html.

²⁶ Ronald A. Ruden, Neurobiology of Encoding Trauma, in THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF TRAUMA: AN INTERDISCIPLINARY GUIDE (Charles R. Figley ed.) 228, 230-231 (2012).

²⁷ Id.

²⁸ Dennis Charney, Psychobiological Mechanisms of Resilience and Vulnerability: Implications for Successful Adaptation to Extreme Stress, 2 AM. J. PSYCHIATRY 161 (2004).

²⁹ Kluft et al., supra note 9, at 1.

³⁰ Id. at 3.

³¹ Sandra L. Bloom, The Grief That Dare Not Speak Its Name Part I: Dealing With the Ravages of Childhood Abuse, PSYCHOTHERAPY REV. 2 (9), 408, 408-409 (2000). See also JUDITH HERMAN, TRAUMA AND RECOVERY: THE AFTERMATH OF VIOLENCE – FROM DOMESTIC TO POLITICAL TERROR, 88-95 (1992).

tions to traumatic events can look different among individuals because although trauma is a common human experience, it is affected by a wide range of “personality styles, ego strengths, diatheses for mental and physical illnesses, social supports, intercurrent stressors, and cultural backgrounds.”³² Thus, the reactions to trauma are psychobiologic and are influenced by complex individual and social contexts, all of which determine the ways in which each individual processes trauma.³³ As a result there are no universal indicators of, or responses to, traumatic events.³⁴

The responses to trauma can be short term or long term.³⁵ Short-term consequences can include re-experiencing the traumatic event, such as having recurrent or intrusive distressing recollections of the event, acting or feeling as if the event is recurring, or avoidance of stimuli associated with the trauma.³⁶ Avoidance may include efforts to avoid thoughts, feelings, or conversations associated with the trauma, efforts to avoid activities, places, or people that arouse recollections of the trauma. Avoidance can also include amnesia for aspects of the trauma, detachment or estrangement from others, defensive mumbling, or dissociative symptoms.³⁷ Dissociation may consist of a diminished awareness or realization of ones surroundings, problems with concentration and attention, or increased arousal.³⁸ Increased arousal refers to such symptoms as experiencing difficulty falling or staying asleep, hypervigilance, or an exaggerated startle response.³⁹

Long-term consequences may include persistence of the short term symptoms, chronic guilt and shame, a sense of helplessness and ineffectiveness, a sense of being permanently damaged, difficulty trusting others or maintaining relationships, vulnerability to re-victimization, and becoming a perpetrator of trauma.⁴⁰ The responses may also be triggered or exacerbated by anniversaries of traumatic events or stressors that are suggestive of the past trauma.⁴¹

B. Understanding Vicarious Trauma

Vicarious trauma, also sometimes called “compassion fatigue” or “secondary trauma,” is a term for the effect that working with survi-

³² Kluff et al., supra note 9, at 3.

³³ Id. at 1.

³⁴ Id. at 3.

³⁵ Id. at 4.

³⁶ Id. at 4.

³⁷ Id. at 4-5; HERMAN, supra note 31, at 89.

³⁸ HERMAN, supra note 31, at 94.

³⁹ Id. at 5.

⁴⁰ Id. at 4.

⁴¹ Id.

R

R

R

vors of trauma may have on counselors, therapists, doctors, attorneys, and others who directly help them.⁴² Vicarious traumatization refers to harmful changes that occur in professionals' views of themselves, others, and the world, as a result of exposure to the graphic or traumatic experiences of their clients.⁴³ As psychologist Mark Evces has written, "[s]econdary, or indirect, traumatic exposure is not limited to mental health providers. Anyone who repeatedly and empathically engages with traumatized individuals can be at risk for distress and impairment due to indirect exposure to others' traumatic material."⁴⁴

Vicarious trauma is distinct from "burnout," which refers to the toll that work may take over time.⁴⁵ Burnout can usually be remedied by taking time off, by moving to a new job. Vicarious trauma is a state of tension or preoccupation with clients' stories of trauma.⁴⁶ It may be marked by either an avoidance of clients' trauma histories (almost a numbness to the trauma) or by a state of persistent hyperarousal.⁴⁷

Professionals experiencing vicarious trauma may experience painful images and emotions associated with their clients' traumatic memories and may, over time, incorporate these memories into their own memory systems.⁴⁸ As a result, there may be disruptions to schema in five areas.⁴⁹ These are safety, trust, esteem, intimacy, and control, each representing a psychological need.⁵⁰ Each schema is experienced in relation to self and others. The harmful effects of vicarious trauma occur through the disruptions to these schemas.⁵¹ Vicarious trauma "has been described as a common, long-term response to working with traumatized populations, and as part of a continuum of helper reactions ranging from vicarious growth and resilience to vicarious traumatization and impairment."⁵²

As a normal response to the continuing challenges to their beliefs

⁴² AMERICAN COUNSELING ASSOCIATION, VICARIOUS TRAUMA FACT SHEET #9, available at, <http://www.counseling.org/docs/trauma-disaster/fact-sheet-9—vicarious-trauma.pdf?sfvrsn=2> (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015).

⁴³ Katie Baird & Amanda C. Kracen, Vicarious Traumatization and Secondary Traumatic Stress: A Research Synthesis, 19 COUNSELING PSYCHOL. Q. 181 (2006).

⁴⁴ Mark R. Evces, What is Vicarious Trauma?, in VICARIOUS TRAUMA AND DISASTER MENTAL HEALTH: UNDERSTANDING RISKS AND PROMOTING RESILIENCE, 9, 10 (Gertie Quintangon & Mark R. Evces, eds.) (2015).

⁴⁵ Lisa McCann & Larie A. Pearlman, Vicarious Traumatization: A Framework for Understanding the Psychological Effects of Working with Victims, 3 J. TRAUMATIC STRESS 131, 133 (1990).

⁴⁶ AMERICAN COUNSELING ASSOCIATION, supra note 42.

⁴⁷ Id.

⁴⁸ McCann & Pearlman, supra note 45, at 144.

⁴⁹ Baird & Kracen, supra note 43.

⁵⁰ Id.

⁵¹ Id.

⁵² Evces, supra note 44, at 11.

R

R

R

R

and values, individuals experiencing vicarious trauma may exhibit varying symptoms.⁵³ Some of these symptoms include: denial of clients' trauma, over-identification with clients, no time and energy for oneself, feelings of great vulnerability, experiencing insignificant daily events as threatening, feelings of alienation, social withdrawal, disconnection from loved ones, loss of confidence that good is still possible in the world, generalized despair and hopelessness, loss of feeling secure, increased sensitivity to violence, cynicism, feeling disillusioned by humanity, disrupted frame of reference, changes in identity, world view, and spirituality, diminished self-capacities, impaired ego resources, and alterations in sensory experiences.⁵⁴

C. Understanding Trauma-Informed Practice

The increase in studies on trauma and vicarious trauma, and the various measures taken to mitigate the effects of the two have resulted in a systemic approach to how human services can be delivered to address the concerns of trauma and vicarious trauma simultaneously. "A trauma-informed approach to services or intervention acknowledges the prevalence and impact of trauma and attempts to create a sense of safety for all participants, whether or not they have a trauma-related diagnosis."⁵⁵ To be trauma-informed means to be educated about the impact of interpersonal violence and victimization on an individual's life and development.⁵⁶ Providing trauma-informed services requires all the staff of an organization to understand the effects of trauma on the people being served, so that all interactions with the organization reduce the possibility of retraumatization and are consistent with the process of recovery.⁵⁷ Trauma-informed practice recognizes the ways in which trauma impacts systems and individuals.⁵⁸ Becoming trauma informed results in the recognition that behavioral ⁵³ Id.

⁵⁴ Christian Pross, Burnout, vicarious traumatization and its prevention, 16 TORTURE 1 (2006).

⁵⁵ SAMSHA, supra note 8, at 1.

⁵⁶ Denise E. Elliott and Paula Bjelajac et al., Trauma-Informed or Trauma Denied: Principles and Implementation of Trauma-Informed Services for Women, 33(4) JOURNAL OF COMMUNITY PSYCHOLOGY, 461-477, 462 (2005).

⁵⁷ Id.

⁵⁸ Whereas vicarious trauma impacts individuals exposed to trauma victims, organizations working with a traumatized population can experience organizational trauma, in which an organization's adaptation to chronic stress can create "a state of dysfunction that in some cases virtually prohibits the recovery of the individual clients who are the source of its underlying and original mission, and damages many of the people who work within it." SANDRA L. BLOOM, & BRIAN FARRAGHER, DESTROYING SANCTUARY: THE CRISIS IN HUMAN SERVICES DELIVERY SYSTEMS 14 (2011). See also Shana Hormann and Pat Vivian, Toward and Understanding of Traumatized Organizations and How to Intervene in Them, 11(3) TRAUMATOLOGY 159, 160-164 (September 2005).

symptoms, mental health diagnoses, and involvement in the criminal justice system are all manifestations of injury, rather than indicators of sickness or badness – the two current explanations for such behavior.⁵⁹ As a result, trauma-informed services and programs are more supportive (rather than controlling and punitive), avoid retraumatizing and punishing those served, and avoid vicarious traumatization of those serving the survivors.⁶⁰

In particular, trauma-informed practice has had a significant impact in the fields of domestic violence,⁶¹ health care, child welfare, law enforcement and judicial administration. As discussed in the next section, trauma-informed practice has also informed the practice of law.

II. THE TRAUMA-INFORMED LAWYER

The concepts of trauma-informed practice have begun to have a profound effect on attorneys who routinely work with trauma survivors.⁶² Particularly for attorneys in practice areas such as domestic vi-

⁵⁹ SANDRA L. BLOOM & BRIAN FARRAGHER, RESTORING SANCTUARY: A NEW OPERATING SYSTEM FOR TRAUMA-INFORMED SYSTEMS OF CARE, 1, 7-9 (2013).

⁶⁰ For example, one model used to accomplish these goals is the Sanctuary Model, a trauma-informed method for changing organizational culture, created by psychiatrist Sandra Bloom. The Sanctuary Model can be described as a “plan, process, and method for creating trauma-sensitive, democratic, nonviolent cultures that are far better equipped to engage in the innovative treatment planning and implementation that is necessary to adequately respond to the extremely complex and deeply embedded injuries that children, adults, and families have sustained.” Sandra L. Bloom, The Sanctuary Model of Organizational Change for Children’s Residential Treatment, THERAPEUTIC COMMUNITY: THE INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL FOR THERAPEUTIC AND SUPPORTIVE ORGANIZATIONS 26(1): 65-81, 70-71 (2005). The Sanctuary Model proposes seven characteristics that would result in an organization being trauma informed: a culture of nonviolence, which means committing to safety skills and higher goals; a culture of emotional intelligence, which means to teach and model emotional management skills; a culture of social learning, which involves creating an environment that promotes conflict resolution and transformation; a culture of shared governance, which involves encouraging self-control, self-discipline, and healthy authority figures; a culture of open communication; a culture of social responsibility, which involves building healthy relationships and connections; and a culture of growth and change, which requires restoring hope, meaning and purpose by actively working through loss/trauma. Id. at 71.

⁶¹ Joshua M. Wilson, Jenny E. Fauci, & Lisa A. Goodman, Bringing trauma-informed practice to domestic violence programs: A qualitative analysis of current approaches, 85(6) AM. J. OF ORTHOPSYCHIATRY 586, 587 (2015).

⁶² See LISA PILNIK & JESSICA R KENDALL, OFFICE JUVENILE JUSTICE AND DELINQUENCY PREVENTION, IDENTIFYING POLYVICTIMIZATION AND TRAUMA AMONG COURT-INVOLVED CHILDREN AND YOUTH: A Checklist and Resource Guide for Attorneys and Other Court-Appointed Advocates (2012), <http://www.ojjdp.gov/programs/safestart/IdentifyingPolyvictimization.pdf>. KAREN REITMAN, ATTORNEYS FOR CHILDREN GUIDE TO INTERVIEWING CLIENTS: INTEGRATING TRAUMA INFORMED CARE AND SOLUTION FOCUSED STRATEGIES (2011); Barbara Glesner Fines & Cathy Madsen, Caring Too Little, Caring Too Much: Competence and the Family Law Attorney, 75 UMKC L. REV. 965 (2007); Lynda Murdoch, Psychological Consequences of Adopting a Therapeutic Lawyering Approach: Pitfalls and Protecting Strategies, 24 SEATTLE U.L. REV. 483 (2000); Susan Daicoff, olence, immigration, and child welfare, the principles of trauma-informed practice have altered the way legal services are delivered.⁶³ In fact, trauma-informed practice can have relevance to all areas of practice, as clients may present with a trauma history whether central to the subject of the representation or not.

Trauma-informed practice can be particularly salient for attorneys because traditionally attorneys are trained to separate emotions from the law in order to competently analyze legal problems.⁶⁴ By borrowing trauma-informed techniques developed in the therapeutic context, attorneys are learning to provide more effective representation.⁶⁵ Attorneys can learn how to identify trauma, and to adjust their methods of counseling and representation to incorporate an understanding of their clients' trauma history. Attorneys can also help clients identify the need for behavioral health intervention, or help clients secure trauma-informed therapeutic services.⁶⁶ Attorneys can also employ methods of self-care to prevent vicarious traumatization. Systemic implementation of these methods form trauma-informed legal practice. Domestic violence legal centers, immigration legal centers, and other public interest legal services offices have become particularly adept at incorporating these practices into daily legal work. This article posits that clinical law professors can and should incorporate this methodology into law school clinics.

The experience of Victoria, the client described at the beginning of this article, is a good example of trauma-informed lawyering at work. First, the law student handling the case was trained to recognize trauma. In other words, the student could recognize that the Law as a Healing Profession: The "Comprehensive Law Movement", 6 PEPP. DISP. RESOL. L.J. 1 (2006); MARJORIE SILVER, THE AFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL: PRACTICING LAW AS A HEALING PROFESSION (2007); Marjorie Silver, Love, Hate, and Other Emotional Interferences in the Lawyer/Client Relationship, 6 CLIN. L. REV. 259 (1999); Marjorie A. Silver, Supporting Attorneys' Personal Skills, 78 REV. JUR. U.P.R. 147, 148 (2009); MARY MALEFYT SEIGHMAN, ERIKA SUSSMAN, & OLGA TRUJILLO, REPRESENTING DOMESTIC VIOLENCE SURVIVORS WHO ARE EXPERIENCING TRAUMA AND OTHER MENTAL HEALTH CHALLENGES: A HANDBOOK FOR ATTORNEYS, available at <http://www.nationalcenterdvtraumamh.org/publications-products/attorneys-handbook/> (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015).

⁶³ Both authors had the opportunity as legal services attorneys to work in family law practices that trained staff in and applied methods of trauma-informed practice.

⁶⁴ Parker, supra note 2.

⁶⁵ Id. See also AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, ABA POLICY ON TRAUMA-INFORMED ADVOCACY FOR CHILDREN & YOUTH (Feb. 10, 2014), http://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/administrative/child_law/ABA%20Policy%20on%20Trauma-Informed%20Advocacy.authcheckdam.pdf; Eliza Patten & Talia Kraemer, Practice Recommendations for Trauma-Informed Legal Services (July 2013), available at http://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/administrative/child_law/5C_Patten%20Kraemer_Practice%20Recommendations%20for%20Trauma%20Informed%20Legal%20Services.authcheckdam.pdf.

⁶⁶ See PILNIK & KENDALL, supra note 62.

R

R

physical abuse that Victoria had experienced, as well as the knowledge that her children had been sexually abused, were traumatic experiences which would profoundly affect the attorney-client relationship and the nature of the representation, even though the abuse allegations were not directly pertinent to the case. If the law student not been trained in trauma-informed practice, he might have been more dismissive of the client's insistence on telling her trauma story. Instead, the law student exhibited patience and affirmation for the client that ultimately enabled the client to develop a trusting relationship with the law student. Similarly, the law student adjusted his approach to counseling the client and preparing the client for court, based upon the law student's acknowledgement and understanding of the client's trauma experience. Instead of simply preparing the client for the kinds of testimony and evidence that would be requested, the law student took into account how terrifying it was for the client to go to court against her abusive ex-husband. The student also encouraged the client regarding the importance of continuing in therapy, drawing clear lines between the kind of counseling the law student could provide, and support that could be provided by a therapist. Finally, the law student also had opportunities for self-reflection and sharing through supervision to allow him to process the impact of working with a client who had experienced severe trauma.

Rather than waiting until lawyers enter practice to learn these skills, law schools can and should teach trauma-informed lawyering, particularly in the law clinic setting.⁶⁷ Teaching trauma-informed lawyering in law school clinics bolsters and builds upon existing approaches to clinical pedagogy. Clinical legal education has traditionally emphasized teaching social justice values, client-centered lawyering and the acquisition of practical lawyering skills,⁶⁸ and teaching trauma-informed lawyering reinforces each of these areas. Further, trauma-informed lawyering builds upon existing clinical pedagogical literature on therapeutic jurisprudence, empathy and emotional intelligence, and vicarious trauma.⁶⁹ Law school clinics are particularly well-suited to teach trauma-informed lawyering because of the focus on reflective practice, and their capacity to teach law students important practice skills to take into their legal careers.

⁶⁷ See, e.g., Jill Engle, Taming the Tigers: Domestic Violence, Legal Professionalism and Well-Being, 4 TENN. J. RACE, GENDER & SOC. JUST. 1 (2015); Joan Meier, Teaching Lawyering With Heart, forthcoming in VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN (2015), available at http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2685926##.

⁶⁸ See, e.g., Stephen Wizner, Beyond Skills Training, 7 CLIN. L. REV. 327, 338 (2001); David Binder and Paul Bergman, Taking Lawyering Skills Training Seriously, 10 CLIN. L. REV. 191 (2003); Katherine Kruse, Fortress in the Sand: The Plural Values of Client-Centered Representation, 12 CLIN. L. REV. 369 (2006).

⁶⁹ See, e.g., MARJORIE A. SILVER, THE AFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL: PRACTICING LAW AS A HEALING PROFESSION (2007).

A. Teaching Trauma-Informed Lawyering Fits with the Values of Clinical Pedagogy and into Already Existing Clinical Theoretical Areas

Teaching trauma-informed lawyering in law school clinics furthers the value clinical legal education places on teaching social justice principles and the notion of client-centered lawyering.

1. Social Justice

Clinical legal education has always had a social justice focus, in its mission to provide much-needed legal services for the indigent, and also in its goals of exposing law students to the lack of legal services for the poor, and to the limits and realities of the legal system. The first clinics were established and developed in the 1920s and 1930s as a way to supplement traditional, doctrinal classes taught in the Langdellian case method. However, clinical legal education did not really take hold in law schools until the 1960s and 1970s. A crucial event in the development of clinical pedagogy was the establishment of the Council on Legal Education and Professional Responsibility (CLEPR), by William Pincus, Vice President of the Ford Foundation. The mission of the CLEPR was to provide legal services to the poor, and in order to do so, CLEPR funded several law school clinics, significantly affecting legal education by infusing clinical legal education with a social justice purpose.⁷⁰

Although the initial mission of law school clinics was to provide access to legal services for low-income clients, as clinical pedagogy developed, clinics developed the added function of exposing students to the realities of the legal system, and in particular its limitations for meeting the goals of indigent individuals.⁷¹ Teaching trauma-informed lawyering in clinics reinforces the social justice value of clinical education because it causes students to be exposed to the realities and limits of the legal system.⁷² Teaching trauma enables students to see, though the experiences of their trauma-affected client, how, for that particular individual, legal doctrines, theories, or the litigation system may or may not work to achieve the client's stated goals.⁷³ Recognition that the legal system may not always be an effective mechanism of pursuing the client's goals is particularly relevant when the client has experienced trauma. This statement is particularly true in light of the fact that for a traumatized client, court proceedings may run the risk of causing the client to relive or confront the trauma, and court proceedings themselves may cause further trauma to the client.

⁷⁰ Id. at 338 (“From the beginning of the clinical legal education movement, experiential learning and skills-training were seen as the means for achieving the justice goal articulated by William Pincus, not as ends in themselves.”).

⁷¹ Lauren Carasik, Justice in the Balance: An Evaluation of One Clinic’s Ability to Harmonize Teaching Practical Skills, Ethics, and Professionalism with a Social Justice Mission, 16 S. CAL. REV. L. & SOC. JUST. 23, 39-40 (2006).

⁷² See, e.g., Wizner, supra note 68.

Additionally, teaching students trauma-informed lawyering, and specifically focusing on the ways in which the current legal system may not be able to meet a client's goals, encourages students to think critically about the legal system as it affects litigants who have been subject to trauma in their lives.⁷⁴ By learning about trauma-informed lawyering and thinking critically about the legal system, students will begin to think not only about procedural justice, defined as access to the courts or representation in court, but also about true substantive justice for litigants, a term which "could be perceived to require disassembling the existing power structure in order to precipitate a redistribution of resources."⁷⁵ Thinking critically about the legal system, developing strong professional values, and developing an appreciation for the important role that attorneys play in society are all sub-parts of the larger clinical goal of teaching social justice to law students through their clinical work.⁷⁶

The importance of teaching trauma-informed lawyering to clinic students to further the social justice goal of clinics is underscored by the literature on therapeutic jurisprudence, which focuses on the extent to which the law enhances or inhibits the wellbeing of those who are affected by it.⁷⁷ The practice of trauma-informed lawyering can be a natural extension of the teachings of therapeutic jurisprudence. Therapeutic jurisprudence is a lens for viewing litigation⁷⁸ and concerns itself with the therapeutic and anti-therapeutic goals that flow from legal rules, procedures, and the operation of the legal system.⁷⁹

⁷³ Id. at 351.

⁷⁴ Leigh Goodmark, Clinical Cognitive Dissonance: The Values and Goals of Domestic Violence Clinics, the Legal System, and the Students Caught in the Middle, 20 J. OF LAW & POLICY 301, 314 (2012) (quoting Sue Bryant & Maria Arias, Case Study: A Battered Women's Rights Clinic: Designing a Clinical Program which Encourages a Problem Solving Vision of Lawyering, 42 WASH. U. J. URB. & CONTEMP. L. 207, 212-215 (1992)).

⁷⁵ Carasik supra note 71, at 45 (citing John O. Calmore, "Chasing the Wind": Pursuing Social Justice, Overcoming Legal Mis-Education, and Engaging in Professional Re-Socialization, 37 LOY. L.A. L. REV. 1167, 1175 (2004)).

⁷⁶ Stephen Wizner, Is Social Justice Still Relevant?, 32 B.C. L. J. & SOC. JUST. 345 (2012) (exploring the social justice mission of law school clinics).

⁷⁷ See, e.g., Susan L. Brooks, Using Therapeutic Jurisprudence to Build Effective Relationships with Students, Clients, and Communities, 13 CLIN. L. REV. 213 (2006).

⁷⁸ David B. Wexler, Therapeutic Jurisprudence, 20 TOURO L. REV. 353 (2004).

⁷⁹ Id.

One of the crucial principles is the emphasis on voice and validation for clients. Pursuant to a therapeutic jurisprudence perspective, achieving voice and validation has special significance and importance for survivors of violence.⁸⁰ Survivors need to be accorded a sense of “voice,” the ability to tell their side of the story, and “validation,” the sense that what they have to say is taken seriously. By acknowledging and honoring the client’s trauma experience, lawyers can help give voice to the client’s perspective. Therapeutic jurisprudence scholars emphasize that these survivors should be treated with dignity and respect, which will diminish the extent to which they feel coerced and gives them a sense of voluntary choice.⁸¹ Rather than viewing the client’s trauma experience as a weakness, a therapeutic jurisprudence approach emphasizes the resilience of the client.⁸² Teaching trauma-informed lawyering to clinic students furthers these therapeutic jurisprudence goals and causes students to think more about the meaning of the broader clinical goal of social justice.⁸³

2. Client-Centered Lawyering

Teaching trauma-informed lawyering in clinics also reinforces one of clinical legal education’s central tenets, the importance of client-centered lawyering. Client-centered lawyering focuses on understanding clients’ perspectives, emotions, and values, including the possible effects of prior trauma on a client’s decisions and actions.⁸⁴ Client-centered lawyering is perhaps the central value in many current law school clinics, particularly in clinics where clients are individual litigants. The goals of client-centered lawyering focus on maintaining respect for a client’s decision-making authority within the lawyer-client relationship. In the client-centered lawyering paradigm, the lawyer should remain neutral as to the goals of the representation.⁸⁵ Unlike ⁸⁰ Carolyn S. Salisbury, From Violence and Victimization to Voice and Validation: Incorporating Therapeutic Jurisprudence in A Children’s Law Clinic, 17 ST. THOMAS L. REV. 623, 654-55 (2005).

⁸¹ Bruce J. Winick, Applying the Law Therapeutically in Domestic Violence Cases, 69 UMKC L. REV. 33, 63 (2000).

⁸² Pilar Hernandez & David Gangsei, Vicarious Resilience: A New Concept in Work with Those Who Survive Trauma, 46 FAMILY PROCESS 229 (2007).

⁸³ Closely related to therapeutic jurisprudence is the literature on restorative justice, which focuses on having all of the individuals who have been affected by a particular act come together and agree on how to repair the harm. According to restorative justice principles, the focus of the process is on healing, rather than finding a way to hurt the offender in a way that would be proportional to the victim’s hurt. See John Braithwaite, A Future Where Punishment is Marginalized: Realistic or Utopian? 46 UCLA L. REV. 1727, 1743 (1999).

⁸⁴ Kruse, supra note 68, at 377 (describing the cornerstones of client-centered lawyering).

⁸⁵ Id. at 376.

traditional doctrinal law school classes which focus on appellate court decisions, a clinic with a client-centered philosophy helps the client solve their identified problems, through either legal or non-legal means. The four central tenets of client-centered lawyering can be summarized as follows: 1) it draws attention to the critical importance of non-legal aspects of a client's situation; 2) it cabins the lawyer's role in the representation within limitations set by a sharply circumscribed view of the lawyer's professional expertise; 3) it insists on the primacy of client decision-making; and 4) it places a high value on lawyers' understanding their clients' perspectives, emotions, and values.⁸⁶ A lawyer's principal role in a client-centered lawyering model is to help the client solve a problem, not simply to identify and apply legal rules.⁸⁷ Teaching trauma-informed lawyering to clinic students in law clinics reinforces all of the main tenets of client-centered lawyering.

Teaching trauma-informed practice as part of client-centered lawyering improves the client's experience of representation, by encouraging students to consider the non-legal aspects of a client's situation, and also places a high value on the law student's understanding of a client's perspectives, emotions, and values. Teaching about the possible effects of trauma on clients encourages students to look at the client outside of the narrow context of litigation, and to consider the other effects of her life experiences. Additionally, trauma-informed lawyering, with its emphasis on the effects of prior trauma, persuades students to look at what the client may be seeking from the representation, and to consider whether the litigation process will achieve that goal, or whether that goal is best achieved by non-legal methods. The student must take into account the effect of the trauma on the client and the effect on the client's current decision-making, even though that decision process may be different from the process that the student is using to make a decision as a legal advocate.

The theory behind client-centered law practice is based on the influence of other social sciences on law, particularly psychology, in which empathy is considered a useful skill for supporting clients.⁸⁸ Law students will be better able to incorporate empathy into their interactions with clients if they are trained in trauma. The literature on emotional intelligence and the literature on the clinical pedagogy of teaching empathy focus on the legitimacy of emotions and their relevance to our actions and decisions, and also on the need and manner in which the clinical supervisor facilitates a process through which law students interpret their emotional experiences as advocates, a process which will positively affect the representation.⁸⁹ Trauma-informed clinic students will better empathize with their clients. Empathy can be a key part of the information-gathering function of a client interview and client counseling.⁹⁰ Empathy encompasses several different phenomena: feeling the emotions of another; understanding another's situation or experience; and taking actions based on another's situation.⁹¹ Similarly, the literature regarding teaching empathy to law students in a clinical context explores the concept of "identification." Identification can be defined as taking on the attitudes, behaviors, and perspectives of others.⁹² Identification and empathy allow an attorney to "enter" into the emotional state of the client,⁹³ which provides the attorney with a far more complex understanding of the client and the client's legal needs. With clients in particularly difficult situations, such as clients who have experienced trauma or torture, a student may become overwhelmed by the experiences of suffering and therefore fail to identify and empathize with the client.⁹⁴ Teaching law students to identify trauma and its effects on clients will aid in identification with a client in a situation where identification and empathy might otherwise not be possible, and will enable the student to achieve a greater empathy for and understanding of the client's perspectives and needs. Trauma-informed clinic students will achieve greater empathy with a client, and also will use that empathy to adjust the attorney-client relationship or to adjust the litigation strategy.

⁸⁶ Id. at 377.

⁸⁷ Id. at 376-77 (quoting Binder's textbook).

⁸⁸ Emily Gould, The Empathy Debate: The Role of Empathy in Law, Mediation, and the New Professionalism, 36-FALL VT. B.J. 23, 24 (2010). See also Sarah Buhler, Painful Injustices: Encountering Social Suffering in Clinical Legal Education, 19 CLIN. L. REV. 405 (2013).

Teaching trauma-informed lawyering in law clinics will also encourage students to circumscribe their view of their own expertise, emotional understanding and role as law students in the representation, and will encourage students to focus on the primacy of client decision-making as emphasized in the client-centered lawyering model.⁹⁵ In the client-centered lawyering model, the lawyer and the client work together as problem-solvers, and the client is able to ⁸⁹ See, e.g., Laurel E. Fletcher & Harvey M. Weinstein, When Students Lose Perspective: Clinical Supervision and the Management of Empathy, 9 CLIN. L. REV. 135 (2002); Gould, supra note 88; see also, Silver, supra note 69 at 5.

⁹⁰ Fletcher & Weinstein, supra note 89.

⁹¹ John E. Montgomery, Incorporating Emotional Intelligence Concepts into Legal Education: Strengthening the Professionalism of Law Students, 39 U. TOL. L. REV. 323, 336-37 (2008).

⁹² Id.

⁹³ Id. at 142.

⁹⁴ Fletcher & Weinstein, supra note 89, at 143.

⁹⁵ Kruse, supra note 68, at 377.

choose what s/he wants from the lawyer and the legal system.⁹⁶ A lawyer working in a client-centered model should listen to all of the client's concerns, not just the facts which are deemed legally relevant.⁹⁷

B. Acquisition of Practical Lawyering Skills: Teaching Trauma-Informed Lawyering Makes Students Better Advocates

Another central value in clinical pedagogy is that students should acquire practical lawyering skills, by gaining experience in practice and by participating in the lawyer/client relationship.⁹⁸ Students are generally more motivated to learn because they are given a tremendous amount of responsibility over the case of a real-life individual, and this responsibility leads to greater identification with the client and other individuals who are similarly situated.⁹⁹ Clinics are particularly well-suited for teaching trauma-informed lawyering because students are readily able to put into practice with their clients the trauma-informed lawyering goals of identifying trauma, adjusting the attorney-client relationship, adjusting the litigation strategy, and preventing vicarious trauma.

Clinics are also ideally suited to teaching trauma-informed lawyering to students because clinics are one of the primary vehicles through which law students learn the practical aspects of professional responsibility. The Model Rules of Professional Conduct summarizes the duty of competent representation as follows: "A lawyer shall provide competent representation to a client. Competent representation requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation."¹⁰⁰ When representing clients who have survived trauma in the past, the duty of competent representation requires not only legal knowledge and preparation, but also requires a thorough understanding of the ways in which trauma may present in clients, and of the ways prior trauma may affect the attorney-client relationship and the litigation process. Competent representation may also mean acknowledging the limits of the attorney's role, and using mental health professionals as supports when necessary.

Teaching trauma-informed lawyering will cause students to become better, more effective advocates who are able to fulfill the duty

⁹⁶ Jane Stoeber, Transforming Domestic Violence Representation, 101 KY. L.J. 483, 496 (2012-2013).

⁹⁷ Id. at 498.

⁹⁸ See, e.g., David Binder & Paul Bergman, supra note 68, at 194-95, 198.

⁹⁹ See Carolyn Grose, Beyond Skills Training, Revisited: The Clinical Education Spiral, 19 CLIN. L. REV. 489, 511 (2013) (Grose refers to a student's participation in the lawyer-client relationship as "the heart of clinical pedagogy.").

¹⁰⁰ MODEL RULES OF PROF'L CONDUCT §1.1 (2015).

of competent representation. Through learning about trauma-informed lawyering, law students will become better advocates because they will gain better interviewing skills; more effectively build trust with their clients; and more effectively tackle problems that clients face. Students will also be better prepared for hearings, and better able to prepare their clients for hearings.¹⁰¹ Students who interview clients may be better able to identify signs of such trauma such as: clients experiencing difficulty telling their story in a linear manner; clients describing violent or upsetting events in a flat, detached matter; clients seeming disassociated or emotionally absent during interviews; and clients not remembering key details of abuse.¹⁰²

Here is another example of how law students are able to implement trauma-informed practice to better represent their clients:

Jane¹⁰³ came to the clinic seeking representation for her two family law cases. She had filed a Protection From Abuse (PFA) petition against her boyfriend, Tom, because he had become physically abusive a few months before, and on the last night they were together, beat her and tried to run her over with his car. Jane had a daughter, Anne. When Anne's father, Mark learned of the abuse by Tom, he didn't give Anne back to Jane for a month after a weekend visit. Jane had to involve the police to get Anne back. Mark filed a custody modification petition asking the court to give him primary physical custody of Anne. Jane filed a contempt of custody petition against him for keeping Anne away from her.

Jane missed the first two appointments and arrived two hours late for her third appointment with the law student assigned to her case. During her meeting, which was to begin to prepare for the PFA case against Tom, Jane only wanted to talk about Anne and whether she might lose custody. She became very emotional when talking about the custody case. Jane was angry with Mark for keeping Anne for so long and said that she hoped he would be punished by the Judge for what he did. Jane did not remember when the abuse by Tom began, when he tried to run her over, or when she had gone to the police. She also did not remember when Mark had kept Anne from a month, or the date when she was able to get Anne back.

¹⁰¹ Parker, supra note 2.

¹⁰² See NAT'L CENTER ON DOMESTIC VIOLENCE, TRAUMA & MENTAL HEALTH, SUPPORTING SURVIVORS IN CONTESTED CUSTODY CASES: TRAUMA-INFORMED STRATEGIES FOR BUILDING ON PARENTING STRENGTHS WHERE MENTAL HEALTH IS A FACTOR (March 2014), available at <http://www.nationalcenterdvtraumamh.org/wp-content/uploads/2014/01/Supporting-Survivors-in-Custody-Cases-April-7-FINAL-v3.pdf>.

¹⁰³ This case description is based on the experience of a client represented by Professor Haldar's clinic. Names and identifying information have been changed.

Rather than thinking a client is difficult or uncooperative, a student who has been taught trauma-informed lawyering will be able to recognize the preceding characteristics as signs of trauma, and will develop the skills to counteract the specific trauma symptoms which arise during client interviews.¹⁰⁴ These skills include developing mechanisms to: interview and prepare clients' cases with minimal re-traumatization; work with emotional clients more effectively by validating their feelings; focus or re-focus clients who are avoiding talking about a traumatic experience; help clients remember significant details; anticipate and handle clients who are late to an appointment or who miss the appointment entirely; define the role of the legal advocate, as opposed to a therapist or social worker; and build trust with the client. In short, teaching trauma-informed lawyering will allow students to specifically tailor their interviewing and case preparation to the client's individual circumstances, which include past trauma.

During the first meeting with Jane, the law student recalled the guest lecture by an area psychologist regarding trauma and recognized the indicators of trauma in Jane's actions. He told her that both the abuse by Tom and having Anne taken away from her must have been very difficult for her. He told her that during that first meeting, they would talk about what she most wanted to discuss, and then he and Jane together planned a timeline of appointments to get ready for both the PFA hearing and the custody hearing. The law student explained the purpose of each hearing and how the Judge would make a decision in each case. The law student let Jane know what documents she needed to bring to each meeting.

Additionally, the law student was able to use the police report filed when Jane got Anne back to determine when Mark had taken her and returned her. He also looked at Tom's date of arrest and Jane's PFA petition to get a rough timeframe of when the abuse happened, and Jane was able to supplement that information.

During a later meeting to prepare for the custody hearing, Jane revealed that as part of the abuse, Tom had forced her to join him in his drug use. Substance abuse was particularly emotionally difficult for Jane to discuss, because she and Anne's father Mark both had severe addiction issues when they were together, and they both stopped using when Jane became pregnant with Anne. Because the law student had this important bit of information, he was able to inform Jane that it was very common for custody judges to ask litigants to take drug tests, particularly if there is a history of drug abuse. He also discussed with her the importance of continuing to attend her substance abuse meetings, ¹⁰⁴ Parker, supra note 2, at 182.

Spring 2016]

Teaching Trauma-Informed Lawyering

381

which served as a support for her in staying drug-free.

The law student went over Jane's direct examination with her several times before each hearing. He stressed the importance of being on time for the hearing, told her exactly who would be in the courtroom, and what each party might say. He emphasized that although she felt very emotional about the events, it was important to remember to answer only the questions asked of her in court. The law student reminded her the day before each time she had to be in court, and would meet her just inside the entrance to the courthouse. The custody judge decided not to modify the order in Jane's custody case with Mark, and the Protection From Abuse judge granted Jane a final protection order.

The enhanced interview skills that students learn when taught trauma-informed lawyering can help to nurture a trusting relationship between the client and the student lawyer. The law student and the client can then analyze risks, review and develop safety plans, and devise legal strategies together. Building this kind of a trusting relationship may help avoid a situation in which a client does not reveal crucial information. In addition to hearings, building a trusting relationship between a client and a law student recognizes the fact that advocating effectively for a client may not always involve an adversarial, court-centered litigation strategy. In fact, any form of litigation may not be the best way for the client to achieve her goals. Encouraging a client to speak as freely as possible about the past trauma, as well as her current experiences, can lead both parties to exchange important information so that they can most productively discuss the next steps to take in a client's case. Students will also be able to more effectively prepare for hearings if they are trained in trauma-informed lawyering. Once students understand which types of events can trigger the trauma of a client, they can work to lessen that potential.¹⁰⁵

Additionally, teaching trauma-informed lawyering will also cause students to more effectively tackle clients' trauma-related problems. For example, in family law cases, two of the most significant problems with the domestic violence survivor client population are mental health issues, often caused or exacerbated by the trauma and more recent trauma-related triggers, and substance abuse, which may also be cause or heightened by a traumatic situation. A crucial aspect of trauma-informed legal practice is recognizing the limits of lawyers' professional role, and knowing when to help the client seek behavioral health supports. Particularly for law students who are in the midst of cultivating their professional identities, and are still developing their competency at lawyering skills, it is important to underscore their professional boundaries.

¹⁰⁵ See Parker, supra note 2, at 177-178 (discussing the importance of credible testimony in political asylum cases, where a traumatized client may have difficult expressing emotion).

An additional important aspect of clinical pedagogy is the importance of teaching students how to integrate being lawyers with the rest of their lives as they move forward as practicing attorneys. Recent research indicates that attorneys exhibited a higher level of vicarious traumatization compared to mental health professionals, at least in part because they felt that they had not received systemic education regarding the effects of trauma in their clients and themselves.¹⁰⁶ If explicitly taught trauma-informed lawyering, law clinic students will be more effectively prepared to handle their own feelings upon hearing their clients' traumatic stories, and will as a result suffer less from vicarious trauma and burnout.¹⁰⁷ Teaching trauma-informed lawyering in clinics creates foundations for students for positive self-care as they pursue and develop their legal careers.

III. THE PEDAGOGY OF TRAUMA-INFORMED LAWYERING: HOW TO TEACH TRAUMA-INFORMED LAWYERING IN LAW CLINICS

While acknowledging that teaching trauma-informed practice is an important goal, clinical law professors may struggle with how to integrate it into their clinics. This section will first describe four key hallmarks of trauma-informed lawyering: (1) identifying trauma; (2) adjusting the attorney-client relationship; (3) adapting litigation strategy; and (4) preventing vicarious trauma. The following section will give concrete examples of how to teach these hallmarks in law clinics.

A. The Hallmarks of Trauma-Informed Lawyering

The authors have identified four teaching goals that we believe are the key hallmarks of trauma-informed lawyering:

Identifying Trauma. Simply learning to identify trauma can go a long way in making an attorney more effective. Arguably, an attorney's ability to communicate with clients and develop a relationship of trust with clients is critical to attorney competence.¹⁰⁸ An attorney need not be a mental health expert to recognize that what the client is describing, or behavior the client in exhibiting, is indicative of trauma. Unless the law student has a previous professional background in ¹⁰⁶ See, e.g., Andrew P. Levin & Scott Greisberg, Vicarious Trauma in Attorneys, 24 PACE L. REV. 245, 252 (2003).

¹⁰⁷ Id. at 251-252.

¹⁰⁸ Fines & Madsen, supra note 62.

trauma-related practice, law students tend not to be particularly aware of how trauma is defined or presents. A client who has experienced trauma needs to be able to feel safe in the attorney-client relationship, and an attorney who can be both affirming and empathetic to the client will help create that feeling of safety.

Adjusting Attorney-Client Relationship. Once an attorney has recognized that a client has experience with trauma, the attorney can adjust the attorney-client relationship accordingly. Trauma may affect the attorney's ability to get the whole story, and law students need training in these techniques. Because trauma manifests differently in different people, the attorney should be versed in a variety of strategies to work with the client. For example, the client may be very withdrawn, and the attorney will need to help the client gain a sense of trust and safety in order to get necessary information to prepare the case.¹⁰⁹ Another client might be highly emotional, flooding the attorney with a lot of information; the attorney will need to employ strategies to focus the client on key facts pertinent to the representation.¹¹⁰ Another client may be angry or suspicious, and the attorney will need to put continued focus on transparency and trust.¹¹¹ Cultivating these strategies will make the attorney more effective in developing a relationship with clients and handling their cases.

Adapting Litigation Strategy. The client's trauma experience may also change the attorney's litigation strategy in a variety of ways. Court can be overwhelming or frightening to many clients, but a client with a trauma history may have a particularly difficult time coping.¹¹² Law students need to be introduced to these topics to effectively prepare their clients. To the extent the client needs to testify about the traumatic events, the client may have difficulty telling the story consistently and credibly. The attorney can help the client by making the situation as predictable as possible by de-sensitizing the client by rehearsing.¹¹³ The attorney may make certain adaptations for the client, like making a plan to take a break if the testimony becomes too trying, or enlisting the support of a mental health provider or other support person in preparing for or attending court.¹¹⁴ Finally, the ¹⁰⁹ Judy I. Eidelson, Representing Traumatized Clients, Phila. Bar Assoc. Family Law Section, Nov. 4, 2013.

¹¹⁰ Id.

¹¹¹ Id.

¹¹² See generally Ann E. Freedman, Fact-Finding in Civil Domestic Violence Cases: Secondary Traumatic Stress & the Need for Compassionate Witnesses, 11 AM. U.J. GENDER SOC. POL'Y & L. 567 (2003).

¹¹³ Eidelson, supra note 109, at slide 13.

¹¹⁴ Id.

attorney may need to give extra thought to how the client will be able to testify about the traumatic experiences in court.¹¹⁵ By employing these strategies, the attorney may make court more palatable for the client and simultaneously more successfully advocate for the client's position.

Preventing Vicarious Trauma. Attorneys working with clients who have experienced severe trauma can also take preventive measures to avoid vicarious trauma. The risks of vicarious trauma for attorneys working with survivors of trauma may be even higher than those in other helping professions, because those in the legal profession tend to have higher caseloads,¹¹⁶ and to not be trained in the dynamics of trauma.¹¹⁷ Particularly in a high volume practice, with limited resources, attorneys are at a high risk of developing clinically significant symptoms of vicarious trauma.¹¹⁸ Although it is unlikely that law students in a clinic practice setting will develop vicarious trauma, it is important that they become aware of the risks and prevention measures at the start of their practice experience. One of the most important preventive measures for attorneys is to diversify and manage case load, so that the attorney has the opportunity to work with trauma survivors as well as clients who have not experienced severe trauma, and so the attorney does not become overwhelmed with too many cases.¹¹⁹ Further, attorneys can create a workplace culture that acknowledges the potential for vicarious trauma. This can include creating spaces for supervision and peer support, and encouraging open communication about the effect of the work.¹²⁰

B. Incorporating the Hallmarks of Trauma-Informed Lawyering as Teaching Goals

This next section will give concrete examples of how to achieve the teaching goals of (1) identifying trauma; (2) adjusting the attorney-client relationship; (3) adapting litigation strategy; and (4) preventing vicarious trauma.

Consider the examples of the clients Victoria and Jane, from the perspective of the clinical professor. The law students who worked ¹¹⁵ Id.

¹¹⁶ Levin, supra note 106.

¹¹⁷ Fines & Madsen, supra note 62, at 992. See also Yael Fischman, Secondary trauma in the legal professions, a clinical perspective, 18 TORTURE 107 (2008).

¹¹⁸ Andrew P. Levin et al., Secondary Traumatic Stress in Attorneys and their Administrative Support Staff Working With Trauma-Exposed Clients, 199 J. OF NERVOUS & MENTAL DISEASE 946, 953 (2011).

¹¹⁹ Fines & Madsen, supra note 62, at 993.

¹²⁰ Id. at 994.

R
R

R

with Victoria and Jane had been introduced to the concepts of trauma-informed practice in clinical seminar. The clinical professor had informed the students at orientation that learning to identify trauma, understand the effect of trauma on clients' behavior, and alter the attorney-client relationship and litigation strategy accordingly, were part of the teaching goals for the clinic. The clinical professor brought in an outside speaker to talk to the class about the dynamics of intimate partner violence, and also brought in a psychologist to discuss the impact of trauma on the brain, and how it may manifest. The clinical professor reinforced these lessons through reflection exercises such as case rounds, journaling, supervision and evaluation. And finally, the clinical professor introduced the concept of vicarious trauma, and educated the law students on how to prevent it, by focusing on creating confidential space to talk about the effect the work and clients had on the students, as well as underscoring the importance of good self care. By incorporating these teaching methods into the clinic, the professor created an environment where clients like Victoria and Jane can feel supported and empowered through the experience of representation by the clinic, and the law students are prepared to be excellent advocates on their behalf.

1. Identifying Trauma

To teach law students to identify trauma, the students must learn the definition of trauma and why it is relevant to the practice area in the clinic. Law students may incorrectly assume that in teaching about trauma, we are asking them to step outside the bounds of their role as attorney; in contrast, the purpose is to enhance their capacity to build an effective attorney-client relationship.¹²¹ In the context of family law clinics, whether the clinic has a specific domestic violence focus or not, identifying trauma can be introduced by contextualizing what we know about the population that relies on family courts to resolve disputes, specifically that there is a high prevalence of family violence.¹²² In other clinical settings, there may be other common types of trauma with which clients present; for example in an immigration clinic, there may be high rates of clients who witnessed family members or other individuals be harmed in tragic ways. In a child or family advocacy clinic, there may be many clients who have experienced severe child abuse or neglect.

¹²¹ Parker, supra note 2, at 169.

¹²² Janet Johnson et al., supra note 22. The link between child custody decisions and domestic violence is one that has been acknowledged by state legislatures and courts. See Naomi R. Cahn, Civil Images of Battered Women: The Impact of Domestic Violence on Child Custody Decisions, 44 VAND. L. REV. 1041, 1062 (1991).

It is important to help the students shape what is meant when we refer to trauma. The word “trauma” is tossed around a lot (“My favorite tv show is on summer hiatus and I am SO traumatized!”; “My child was lost in the department store for 10 minutes and I was so traumatized!”). Although trauma is subjective to a specific individual’s ability to cope, not every bad experience is a traumatic one. And not every client who has experienced trauma carries a diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder. Further, in teaching about trauma, there is a risk that students will essentialize clients’ experiences, assuming they all share common histories or characteristics. By focusing on the particular commonalities and needs of the population served by the clinic, the professor can guide students toward being alert to relevant information in the client’s history and/or experience which may have an effect on the nature of the representation.

To teach students to identify trauma, the professor may elect to bring in a psychiatrist or psychologist to class, who can speak about how trauma presents and how it affects the brain. With some research and preparation, the clinical professor may also elect to teach this information on her own. The outside speaker or the professor can also focus on some of the common ways trauma presents in the population served by the clinic, and suggest or model strategies for working with these types of clients. For some clients the content of the representation will be specific to the trauma experience, such as representation in a protection order matter regarding abuse perpetrated by the opposing party, or representation in a custody matter about child abuse perpetrated by the opposing party. There are also times where the student may have to deduce that a backdrop of trauma is affecting the client’s demeanor or ability to relate to the student, such as representation in a child welfare case concerning allegations of mother’s mental health issues. With a basic understanding of how trauma may present, the student can develop greater sensitivity toward the client, and be alert to (sometimes subtle) indications that the client has experienced trauma.

Frequently, students have preconceived notions about how a survivor will present; the student expects the client to be forthcoming and compliant in relaying her story. An effective way to teach law students to identify trauma is to incorporate this learning goal into exercises focused on learning interviewing skills. For example toward the beginning of the semester, the authors utilize Laurie Shanks’ storytelling exercise to teach students about how difficult it sometimes is for clients to share intimate details of their lives.¹²³ In this exercise, students are paired in class and then asked to tell a story to each other about something that changed their life; the other student is then charged with telling her partner's story to the rest of the class, and a discussion ensues about the challenges and obstacles of telling someone else's narrative.¹²⁴ Although not specifically a trauma-related exercise, it can create a forum to underscore some of the barriers to effective fact gathering with clients who have experienced trauma. As Psychologist Judy Eidelson has hypothesized, some of these internal barriers for the interviewer may include fear of what we might have to hear, fear of not knowing how to respond, fear of losing composure, our own moral judgments, and idealization of the trauma survivor followed by disillusionment.¹²⁵

¹²³ Laurie Shanks, Whose Story is it, Anyway? – Guiding Students to Client-Centered Interviewing Through Storytelling, 14 CLIN. L. REV. 509, 516-517 (2008).

The law student should ensure that her representation creates no additional harm.¹²⁶ Clients' trauma history may affect representation by making it difficult to get the whole story (because of avoidance) and to get a consistent story (traumatic memories get stored in the brain in disconnected ways).¹²⁷ In addition to disruptions to the client's memory of the relevant events, the client may experience shame, hopelessness, traumatic flashbacks and/or distrust in being asked about the traumatic events.¹²⁸ Because trauma presents differently, it is helpful to make students aware that it is quite common for a trauma survivor to present as withdrawn and with flat emotion, or to flood with an overload of information, or to be angry and/or suspicious.¹²⁹ Through hypotheticals or role plays, the professor can brainstorm with the students effective strategies for working with each type of client. For example, with the withdrawn client, the client may feel more in control of the interview if the law student affirms how difficult it is to share the information.¹³⁰ With the flooding client, it can be valuable to be upfront and transparent about the goals and focus of the interview.¹³¹ With the angry or suspicious client, it can be beneficial to validate the client's frustration while not getting defensive.¹³²

All of the above teaching strategies can be reinforced throughout the students' work in the clinic through supervision and reflection. The student may need help or feedback around why a particular client interview did not go as smoothly as planned, or assistance with ¹²⁴ Id. at 518-526.

¹²⁵ Eidelson, supra note 109.

¹²⁶ SEIGHMAN ET AL., supra note 63, at 5., at 5.

¹²⁷ Eidelson, supra note 109, at slide 3.

¹²⁸ Id.

¹²⁹ Id. at slides 6-11.

¹³⁰ Id. at slide 7.

¹³¹ Id. at slide 9.

¹³² Id. at slide 10.

strategizing how to most effectively handle a particularly challenging client interview. Not every student will immediately draw the connection between the lessons learned about trauma in class and a client's particular behavior. For example, the student may feel frustrated by a client's repeated cancellation of appointments, or unwillingness to talk about key events in her history. By introducing trauma-informed practice early, the clinical professor can redirect the student to these lessons. In the authors' clinics, we frequently revisit how a client's trauma history may be affecting the law student-client relationship through supervision and case rounds.

2. Adjusting the Attorney Client Relationship

Once students learn to identify trauma in their clients, the next step is to enable the student to make adjustments to their strategy for building an attorney-client relationship. As mentioned above, an outside speaker or the clinical professor can teach students about how trauma or indicators of trauma may manifest in clients. In the family law context, both Professor Katz and Professor Haldar bring in outside speakers from a local domestic violence agency, who can talk about the dynamics of domestic violence. These speakers introduce the students to basic concepts like the idea that domestic violence is about power and control,¹³³ and that there is a cycle of abuse.¹³⁴ Without this backdrop, it can be hard for students to understand why their clients behave in certain ways: *Why did she decide to drop this protection order?*¹³⁵ *Why didn't she show up to court, I thought this case was important to her!*¹³⁶

Once students are informed about the effects their clients' trauma experience may have on the client's behavior, the clinical professor can help the students develop strategies for working with these clients. Such strategies can be integrated into lessons on client counseling through hypotheticals or simulations, as well as addressed through supervision and reflection. Because trauma presents differently in different clients, students need to be versed in a wide array of strategies. Students should learn that working with clients with trauma experience requires investing extra time in the attorney-client relationship, perhaps scheduling more in-person meetings than might otherwise be usual practice, and being particularly patient and consistent with the ¹³³ See generally LENORE E. WALKER, THE BATTERED WOMAN (1979).

¹³⁴ Id.

¹³⁵ James C. Roberts, Loreen Wolfer & Marie Mele, Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders, 23 J. FAM. VIOL. 369 (2008).

¹³⁶ Avoidance or withdrawal are common ways for clients' trauma to manifest. See Eidelson, supra note 109, at slides 6-7.

client. Student can also help the client identify and acknowledge how the trauma experience impacts their interactions with their law student, the opposing party or the judge. Transparently engaging the client in developing solutions can be empowering to the client and lays a strong foundation for a meaningful attorney-client relationship.¹³⁷ The student can also become versed in contemplating non-legal solutions with the client, such as referrals to trauma-informed therapy, connections to other social services or supports, or reliance on trusted family or friends.

Clinical professors should be aware that students, just like clients, may also present with their own trauma history. Working with particular clients may present triggers for certain students. While this will be addressed further in the discussion of vicarious trauma in Section III. B. 4., infra, the clinical professor can help students be mindful that the experience of listening to someone else's trauma history is not neutral. The students can be encouraged to be reflective with regard to their own reactions and responses to clients.

3. Adapting Litigation Strategy

Preparing a client with trauma experience for court requires particularized strategies which law students can learn through a clinic. The experience of going to court in and of itself can be re-traumatizing, particularly because the trier of fact may not know the client has a trauma history, or may not be aware of how trauma presents. To the extent that the client may have to testify about the traumatic events, many triers of fact might assume that if something really horrible happened that the client will be able to testify about it with great specificity.¹³⁸ In contrast, clients with trauma experience can make terrible witnesses for a variety of reasons.¹³⁹ First, because the brain stores memories in mismatched ways, the client may be unable to present a linear narrative.¹⁴⁰ Second, the client may not remember key elements of what occurred; while this may make a trier of fact question client's credibility, it is a normal trauma reaction.¹⁴¹ Third, a client's emotions or lack thereof may unnerve or misguide the trier of ¹³⁷ SEIGHMAN ET AL., supra note 63, at 7.

¹³⁸ Joan Meier, Symposium: Domestic Violence, Child Custody & Child Protection: Understanding Judicial Resistance And Imagining Solutions, 11 AM. U. J. GENDER SOC. POL'Y 657, 662 (2003) ("The failure of many courts to apply new understandings of domestic violence in cases concerning custody actually contrasts sharply with the demonstrable increases over the past ten years in judicial awareness and sensitivity to domestic violence in more standard 'domestic violence' cases, such as civil protection orders or criminal prosecutions.").

¹³⁹ Parker, supra note 2, at 171.

¹⁴⁰ Eidelson, supra note 109.

¹⁴¹ Parker, supra note 2, at 171.

fact: the client may appear with a flat affect; or the client may want to tell the full story in a rush of hysterical emotion; or the client may appear angry (thus making her seem like the aggressor) or the client may simply disassociate and not be able to articulate what happened at all.¹⁴²

Extra time spent on preparation can go a long way in making the litigation process palatable for clients with trauma experience. The student can spend extra time preparing the client for what to expect in the courtroom, reviewing details as mundane as where everyone will sit or stand, to what types of questions will be asked. The more the experience of court can become normalized and predictable for a client, the more likely they will be able to cope. In addition, because constantly re-telling the story of the traumatic events can be re-traumatizing for the client, dividing the preparation into shorter sessions can help minimize the risk of re-traumatization.¹⁴³

Students can utilize extra preparation time to work on mental safety-planning with the client. For example, the student can work with the client around how they will handle being asked difficult questions, or where to focus their energy when the opposing party is talking. The student and client can set up a safety signal, whereby the student can ask for a break in the testimony should it become too overwhelming for the client. Allowing the client to be an active participant in planning for how to handle going to court can help empower the client and normalize the experience of the court hearing.

The student can spend extra time preparing the client for the worst possible case outcomes (e.g. The worst thing that may happen is that the judge grants his petition for shared custody). Being able to visualize the possible results will help normalize the experience of court.

Finally, although difficult, students can seek to educate the trier of fact about dynamics of trauma through the litigation process. Some resources exist for training judges in a more systemic manner.¹⁴⁴

4. Preventing Vicarious Trauma

Perhaps the most crucial aspect of the pedagogy of teaching trauma-informed lawyering in law clinics, and certainly the aspect that students have the greatest need to carry forward with them in their legal practice, is the awareness of vicarious trauma and the need ¹⁴² Eidelson, supra note 109. One client in Professor Katz's clinic, after repeated questioning in court about the history of intimate partner violence between the parties simply blurted out "he has a hand problem!" (meaning "he puts his hands on me").

¹⁴³ Parker, supra note 2, at 176.

¹⁴⁴ SAMSHA, supra note 8.

R

R

R

to take preventive measures against its effects. While students may not be likely to experience vicarious trauma in their clinical work, it is important that they learn about the risks, and are able to implement preventive measures starting with their clinical legal work. Preventive measures can be implemented in a number of ways. First, in the authors' clinical courses, the possibility and effects of vicarious trauma are explicitly taught and the authors are each transparent with their students about the preventive measures that are being implemented. When new students begin, as mentioned previously, a psychologist speaks with the students about the effects of trauma on clients, but also discusses the issue of vicarious trauma and how to identify vicarious trauma symptoms and also to protect oneself against vicarious trauma. Students read material about the effects of trauma and the effects of vicarious trauma on professionals who work with trauma survivors, and discuss the effects of vicarious trauma in class.¹⁴⁵

It is also possible and crucial to consider vicarious trauma when structuring clinical courses. One of the best ways to prevent vicarious trauma is balance and limit caseloads.¹⁴⁶ For example, cases should be distributed among students such that the cases involving clients with significant trauma histories are evenly distributed among the students. In Professor Haldar's clinic, where students handle both Protection From Abuse and custody cases, students are assigned both kinds of cases to increase the chance that each student will have at least a few clients who have not recently experienced traumatic events. Thus, every effort is made to ensure that no one student will have only clients who have recent trauma histories, and this balance is a significant factor to protect against vicarious traumatization.

Another recognized prevention technique is to create safe space for practitioners to talk about the effects of working with their clients with trauma histories on a regular basis.¹⁴⁷ In a law school clinic, this can be accomplished through supervision and reflection, and through effective use of case rounds. Both Professor Haldar and Professor Katz ask students to reflect upon vicarious trauma-related topics specifically in their journal assignments. The journal entries call for students to think specifically about whether and how they are being ¹⁴⁵ In addition to journal assignments, sample assignments might include role playing a client interview session when a client discusses a traumatic past event or reading articles about the effects of vicarious trauma in the therapy context and discussing in class the similarities and differences in the legal context.

¹⁴⁶ T. Bober and C.D. Regehr, Strategies for Reducing Secondary or Vicarious Trauma: Do They Work?, 6 BRIEF TREATMENT AND CRISIS INTERVENTION 1-9, 7 available at <http://dx.doi.org/10.1093/brief-treatment/mhj001> (last viewed Dec. 20, 2015).

¹⁴⁷ Barbara Dane, Child Welfare Workers: An Innovative Approach for Interacting with Secondary Trauma, 36 (1) J. OF SOC. WORK EDUC., 27, 34-35 (2000).

affected by their clients' trauma histories, and whether they are experiencing vicarious trauma symptoms.

In clinics, students should be taught explicit strategies to prevent vicarious trauma that they can carry forward with them into their legal practices. One very effective way to teach students about preventing vicarious trauma is to encourage good self-care and model good self-care. Self-care, in the sense of setting appropriate boundaries between the advocate and the client, is recognized to be a protective factor against vicarious trauma.¹⁴⁸ Sandra Bloom divides self-care into several components: personal physical; personal psychological; personal social; personal moral; professional; organizational/work setting; societal.¹⁴⁹ In the beginning of the semester, along with a discussion of vicarious trauma, clinical professors may choose to encourage their students to develop their own self-care plans, incorporating all of the different components of self-care. In case rounds and supervision, students and the professor can refer back to these self-care plans as needed, especially when working with clients with trauma histories.

Clinical professors may also find it helpful to themselves model good self-care techniques for students. For instance, professors can be transparent about making sure they themselves get to exercise regularly, or about using mental health counseling if needed. Specific discussion of mental health services, and of their availability, may also help students to avoid the effects of vicarious trauma, as knowledge of mental health services is a protective factor.¹⁵⁰

Although not strictly vicarious trauma, it is also important to note here that students often come to our clinics with their own trauma histories; in fact, it is often a student's own trauma history which motivates them to enroll in the clinic to assist clients with similar issues. Of course, working with clients with trauma histories can be triggering for students with their own trauma histories. A crucial aspect of the ¹⁴⁸ Prof. Katz gives the following prompt: Vicarious trauma, also sometimes called compassion fatigue or secondary trauma, is a term for the effect that working with survivors of trauma may have on counselors, therapists, doctors, lawyers and others who directly help them. Vicarious traumatization refers to harmful changes that occur in professionals' views of themselves, others, and the world, as a result of exposure to the graphic and/or traumatic experiences of their clients. Vicarious trauma occurs in someone who is not the primary person experiencing the trauma. Vicarious trauma happens when a secondary person is exposed to the original victim or offender, likely in the course of their profession.

In the practice of family law, our clients share some of the most painful and intimate details of their lives. Please use this journal entry to reflect on how you manage your reactions to these stories, and coping mechanisms you are developing to maintain balance as you move through this work.

¹⁴⁹ Sandra L. Bloom, Caring for the Caregiver: Avoiding and Treating Vicarious Traumatization, in SEXUAL ASSAULT: VICTIMIZATION ACROSS THE LIFESPAN – A CLINICAL GUIDE 459, 466-467 (A.P. Giardino, E. M. Datner, and J.B. Asher eds.) (2003).

¹⁵⁰ Parker, supra note 2, at 178, 198.

Spring 2016]

Teaching Trauma-Informed Lawyering

393 pedagogy of trauma-informed lawyering consists of acknowledging for law students that they may have their own trauma histories that have an effect on them as they proceed in their legal careers, particularly in working with clients with trauma histories. It is important to create a space for students to talk about and/or reflect on their own trauma experience as needed, as they proceed in working with clients with trauma histories.

CONCLUSION

As this article explains, teaching trauma-informed lawyering is a critical aspect of law students' education in the clinical legal educational setting, particularly in clinics which focus on practice areas where clients' trauma experiences are the direct subject of the representation. This article is not meant to be an exhaustive treatise on how to teach these subjects in law school clinics. Rather the message is simple: a little knowledge about trauma goes a long way in helping students adjust their practice skills to competently and zealously represent clients who have experienced trauma. By implementing the four hallmark teaching goals of trauma-informed lawyering, clinical law professors can not only enhance the advocacy of their students while in the clinic, but also convey lasting skills which will set their students on the path to being excellent lawyers throughout their careers.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 39

Trauma-Informed Lawyering

Vivianne Mbaku, Justice in Aging

Introduction

A trauma-informed legal practice aims to reduce re-traumatization and recognize the role trauma plays in the lawyer-client relationship. Integrating trauma-informed practices provides lawyers with the opportunity to increase connections to their clients and improve advocacy.

Key Lessons

1. The widespread prevalence of trauma underlines the importance of civil legal aid attorneys adopting trauma-informed practices.
2. Trauma-informed lawyering leads to better communication between the lawyer and client, discovery of additional legal issues, and better referrals.
3. Trauma-informed lawyering is generally free of cost, but will take additional lawyer time.

One-Third of Adults Experience Severe Trauma in Their Lifetime

The American Psychological Association defines trauma as “an emotional response to a terrible event like an accident, rape, or natural disaster.”¹ An event is defined as traumatic when it renders an individual’s internal and external resources inadequate, making effective coping impossible.² Trauma is very common, with an estimated one third of the U.S. population expected to experience severe trauma in their lifetime.³ Women are much more likely than men to experience traumatic events like rape and stalking, and consequently more likely to report an impact on their functioning related to the traumatic event.⁴ Further, new research connects higher rates of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) among racial and ethnic minorities to the traumatic experience of racism.⁵

Trauma-Informed Lawyering Improves Legal Advocacy

Trauma-informed care recognizes the widespread prevalence of trauma and its impact while aiming to reduce re-traumatization.⁶ The term ‘trauma-informed’ was coined in 2001 by PhD researchers Maxine Harris and Roger Fallot.⁷ Trauma-informed lawyering “asks clients not ‘what is wrong with you?’ but instead, ‘what happened to you?’”⁸

The central goals of trauma-informed lawyering are to reduce re-traumatization and to improve legal advocacy by recognizing the role trauma plays in the lawyer-client relationship. Considering high rates of trauma among the general population, it is imperative that civil legal aid attorneys integrate trauma-informed practices to reduce re-traumatization. Common examples of trauma-informed practice include providing accommodations for client interviewing or extensive witness preparation to alleviate client anxiety. Regardless of

1 American Psychological Association, “Trauma,” available at: apa.org/topics/trauma.

2 Sarah Katz & Deeya Haldard, The Pedagogy of Trauma-Informed Lawyering, 22 CLINICAL L. REV. 359, 364.

3 Id.

4 Id. at 365

5 American Psychological Association, “Uncovering the Trauma of Racism” apa.org/pubs/highlights/spotlight/issue-128.

6 Trauma-Informed Legal Advocacy Project of the National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health, available at: nationalcenterdvtraumamh.org/trainingta/trauma-informed-legal-advocacy-tila-project/.

7 Trauma-Informed Legal Advocacy Project of the National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health, available at: nationalcenterdvtraumamh.org/trainingta/trauma-informed-legal-advocacy-tila-project/.

8 Sarah Katz & Deeya Haldard, The Pedagogy of Trauma-Informed Lawyering, 22 CLINICAL L. REV. 359, 363.

its form, a trauma-informed practice assists lawyers in connecting to their clients, creating better legal outcomes and more robust advocacy.

Self-Care is Important to Counterbalance Secondary Trauma

Integral to trauma-informed lawyering is the practice of “employing modes of self-care to counterbalance the effect [a] client’s trauma experience may have on the practitioner.”⁹ The concept of ‘vicarious/secondary trauma’ or ‘compassion fatigue’ has been explored extensively within the legal field. This condition resembles post traumatic stress disorder and is “caused by being indirectly exposed to someone else’s trauma.”¹⁰ Secondary trauma can manifest as avoidance, black and white thinking, and frustration with clients or losing empathy towards clients.¹¹ Further, direct exposure to clients experiencing trauma is not the only way to be affected by secondary trauma. Secondary trauma can develop from listening to others recount a traumatic event or working with others who are dealing with secondary trauma.¹²

The Trauma-Informed Legal Advocacy Project (TILA) of the National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health encourages reflective practice to help counteract the effect that a client’s traumatic experiences may have on their attorney.¹³ A reflective practice includes “regularly engaging in reflection, both in the context of individual interactions and after big successes or losses.”¹⁴ Changes in organizational culture to foster discussion of secondary traumatic stress and encourage employees to take breaks from work can assist in mitigating the effects of secondary trauma.¹⁵

Here is more information on secondary trauma and tools to better support employees.

Clients Benefit from Transparency and Trust in Trauma Informed Lawyering

A trauma-informed practice provides many benefits to both the attorney and client. Clients benefit from more transparency in the lawyer-client relationship, leading to higher levels of trust in lawyers.

Many clients have had negative experiences with the legal system and may not understand the process. Lawyers are also prone to not explaining their motivations or process during representation. By explaining their role, the role of others in the court, and what can happen during the course of representation, lawyers can alleviate the stress and anxiety of the process. Lawyers should start interviewing by explaining the nature of the meeting and providing as much information about what will happen to ease anxiety. By starting with transparency, the lawyer establishes trust with the client. When the client feels comfortable, they are more likely to share sensitive information that may be integral to their case. Lawyers can then provide proper referrals to additional services and better prepare cases for settlement or trial.

9 Id. at 359.

10 American Bar Association, “Understanding Secondary Trauma: A guide for Lawyers Working with Child Victims”, September 10, 2015, available at: americanbar.org/groups/public_interest/child_law/resources/child_law_practiceonline/child_law_practice/vol-34/september-2015/understanding-secondary-trauma--a-guide-for-lawyers-working-with/.

11 Id.

12 Id.

13 Trauma-Informed Legal Advocacy Project of the National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health, “Practice Scenarios Series”, available at: nationalcenterdvtraumamh.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/08/TILA_ReflectivePractice_Apr22.pdf.

14 Id.

15 American Bar Association, “Understanding Secondary Trauma: A guide for Lawyers Working with Child Victims”, September 10, 2015, available at: americanbar.org/groups/public_interest/child_law/resources/child_law_practiceonline/child_law_practice/vol-34/september-2015/understanding-secondary-trauma--a-guide-for-lawyers-working-with/.

PRACTICE TIP

The trauma-informed practice takes place in two steps. First, identifying the trauma, and second, adjusting the lawyer-client relationship in relation to the trauma.¹⁶ It is important for attorneys to remember that this process does not include diagnosing a client or trying to be a “therapist” for clients. Attorneys should make proper referrals to mental health services for any client who is struggling.

Identifying Trauma and Adjusting the Relationship

In the first step of identifying the trauma, trauma might be easily identified because it is related to the nature of the legal relationship, i.e. the client seeking assistance with an elder abuse protective order. In other cases, the existence of trauma may not be readily apparent. Lawyers should make efforts to note their client’s body language, tone, and general demeanor. Trauma manifests differently in everyone, and it “may affect the attorney’s ability to get the whole story.”¹⁷ A client may seem closed off, uneasy, agitated, or annoyed. Acknowledging any discomfort is encouraged, as it gives your client the opportunity to voice needs or concerns. Lawyers can then accommodate clients’ needs, and adjust their techniques to provide a better environment for the client. The key here is to not fall back on assumptions, wondering “what is wrong with this person? Why are they so _____?” but to embrace “what is going on with them, what happened? How can I make them more comfortable?”

The second step of adjusting the lawyer-client relationship in relation to the trauma, can take many forms. Offering options to clients to accommodate their reactions to their traumatic experience is one of the easiest changes to the lawyer-client relationship to make. Options like flexibility with meeting time and place, seating arrangements, or whether the door is closed or open are simple ways to adjust the lawyer client relationship while building trust.¹⁸

The Trauma-Informed Legal Advocacy Project also outlines the following strategies as other helpful best practices:¹⁹

- Take breaks. Breaks provide a client with the space they need to stay present during a meeting or interview. Offer breaks not only at the beginning of the meeting but also periodically throughout.
- Explain the process. Be open about what you are doing, such as taking notes, and ask permission before taking notes. During the interview, use open body language to help avoid creating an objectifying experience. After the interview, summarize the notes you took with the client.

Validate feelings. Clients should know that their feelings matter. By verbally validating, you can help the client become aware of what is happening with them.

CASE EXAMPLE

Len is a new client coming in for assistance with a debt collection case. As you ask him questions, you realize his leg is literally “jumping” he is shaking so much. He seems a bit withdrawn and keeps looking towards the door. You stop legal questioning and note that he seems uncomfortable, and ask if there is anything you can do to make him feel more comfortable. Len shares that he was a victim of torture in his home country and ¹⁶ Katz at 382.

¹⁷ Katz, at 383.

¹⁸ Trauma-Informed Legal Advocacy Project of the National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health, available at: nationalcenterdvtraumamh.org/trainingta/trauma-informed-legal-advocacy-tila-project/.

¹⁹ Id.

feels tremendous anxiety when he is seated so far from the door. He also does not like being in rooms with closed doors as he feels he cannot escape. You readjust the seating and move the open conference room in your office. You assure Len that if he had any other concerns to let you know.

Strategies for helping the client feel comfortable:

- You stop legal questioning and note that he seems uncomfortable. You realize that you jumped into the interview without really explaining your role or what you will be doing today.
- You acknowledge that Len seems uncomfortable and ask if there is anything you can do to make him more comfortable.
- Len shares that he was a victim of torture in his home country and feels tremendous anxiety when he is seated so far from the door. He also does not like being in rooms with closed doors as he feels he cannot escape.
- You readjust the seating and move to the open conference room in your office. You assure Len that if he had any other concerns to let you know.
- You then explain the process and what will happen at this interview. You let Len know that if he needs breaks or anything else to let you know.

Conclusion

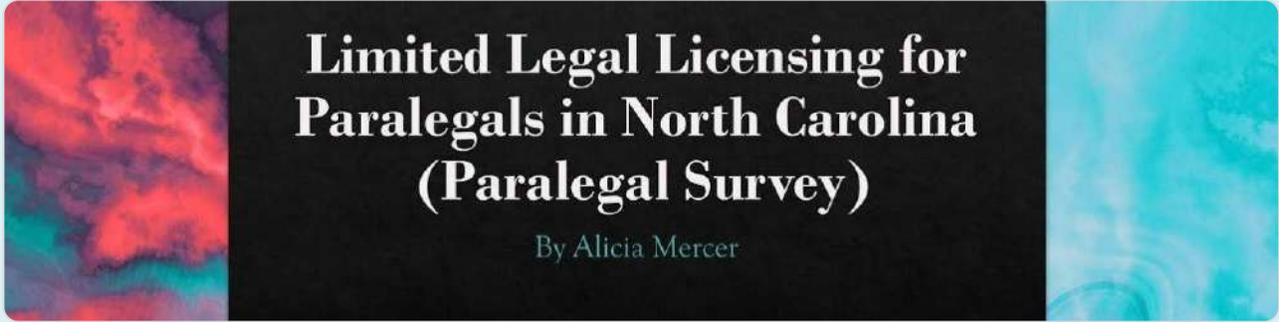

A trauma-informed legal practice not only reduces re-traumatization, it also makes better lawyers. A lawyer who is able to recognize the role trauma plays in the lawyer-client relationship is able to be a better advocate.

Please contact ConsultNCLER@acl.hhs.gov for free case consultation assistance. Sign up for our email list and access more resources at NCLER.acl.gov.

This Tip Sheet was supported by contract with the National Center on Law and Elder Rights, contract number HHSP233201650076A, from the U.S. Administration on Community Living, Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, D.C. 20201.

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 40

Limited Legal Licensing for Paralegals in North Carolina (Paralegal Survey)

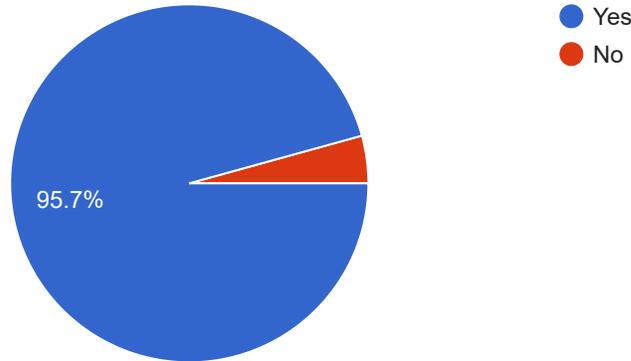

537 responses

Publish analytics

A large, empty table with 10 rows and 1 column, representing a data visualization area. The table is light gray and has a vertical scrollbar on the right side.

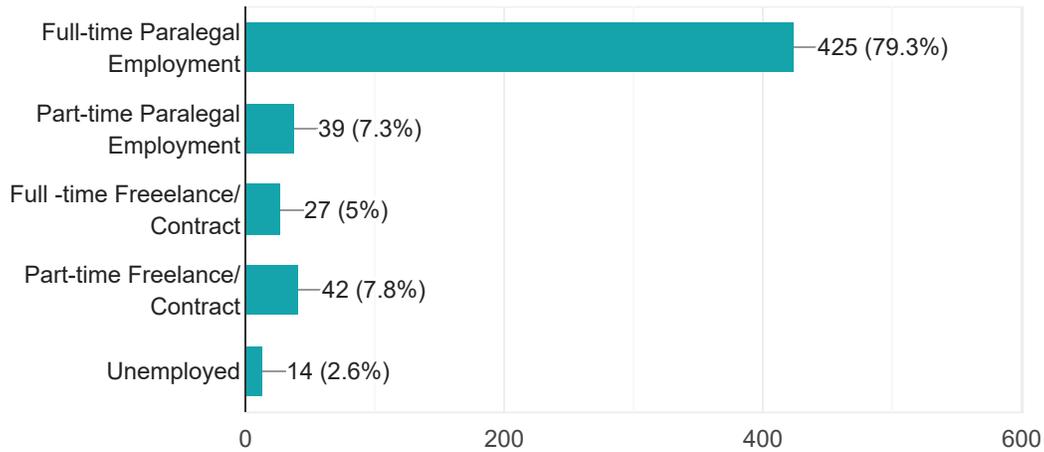

Are you a paralegal or other legal professional engaged substantially in paralegal work? According to the ABA, a paralegal is a person, qualified by education, training or work experience who is employed or retained by a lawyer, law office, corporation, governmental agency or other entity and who performs specifically delegated substantive legal work for which a lawyer is responsible.

536 responses

How are you presently employed?

536 responses

Personal Information

Placeholder for a table or list of data, currently blank.

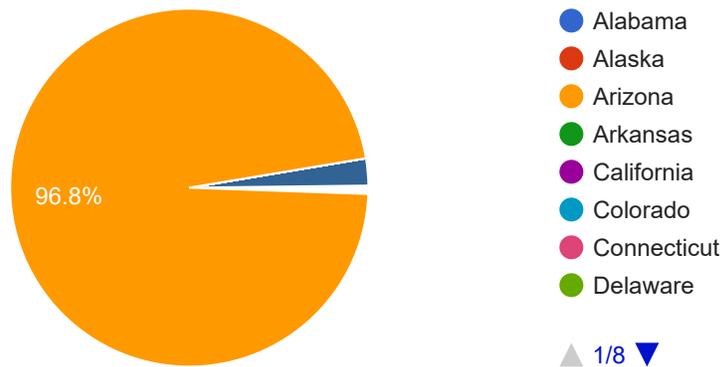

City:

516 responses

- Charlotte
- Raleigh
- Greensboro
- Charlotte
- Durham
- Wilmington
- Cary
- Raleigh
- Wake Forest

Resident State (or U.S. Territory):

532 responses

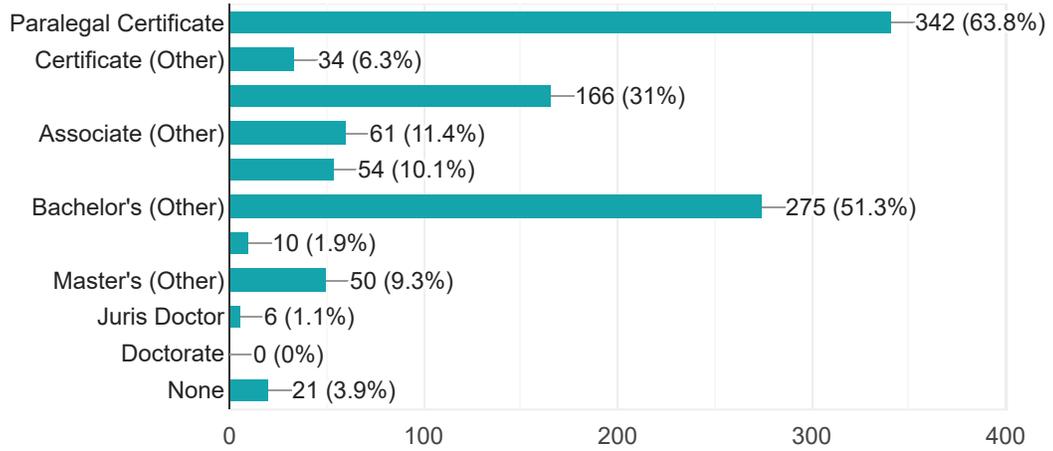

Basic Work History & Education

Education:

536 responses

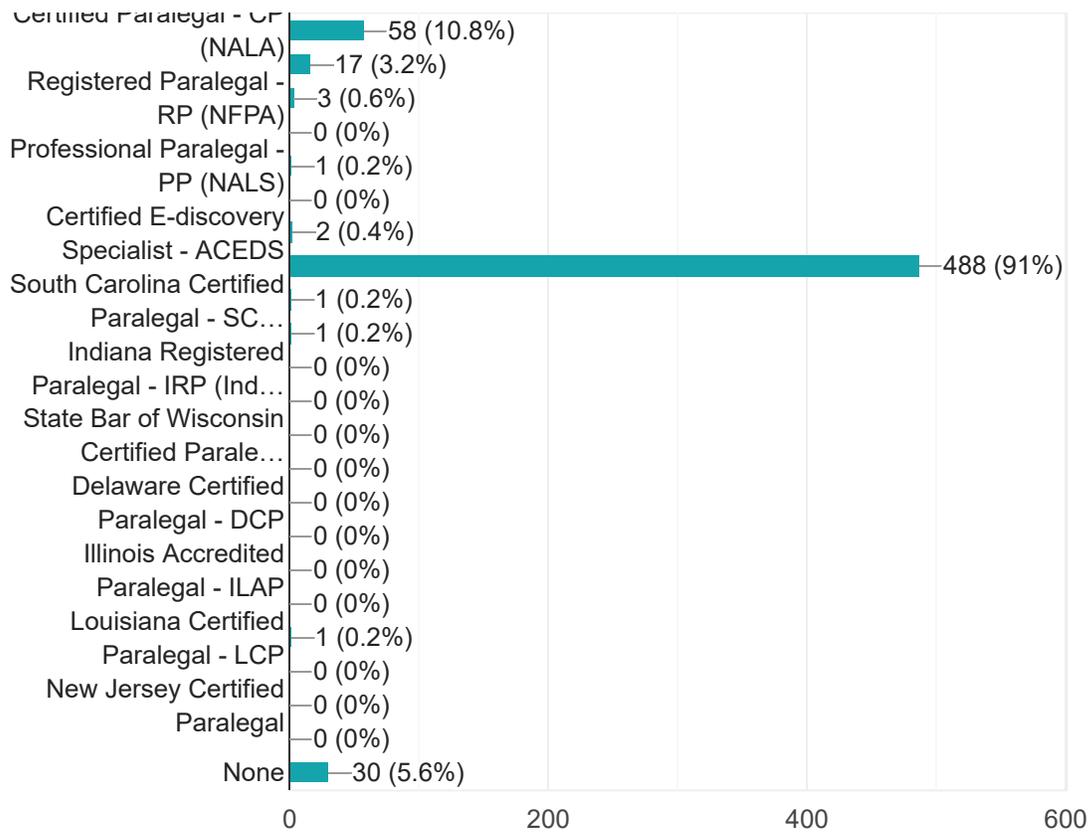

Paralegal Certifications

Paralegal Certifications:

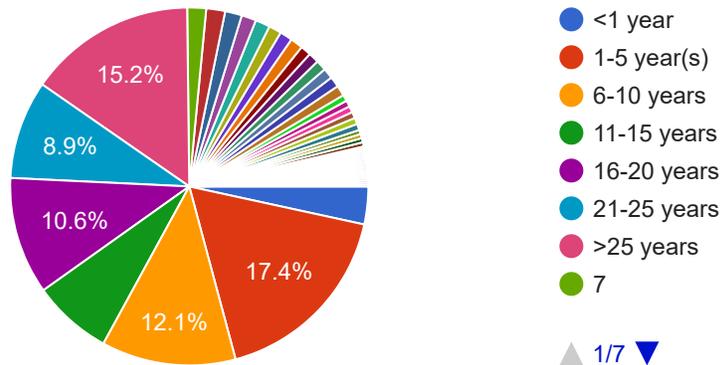

536 responses

Experience

Years of Paralegal Experience:

528 responses

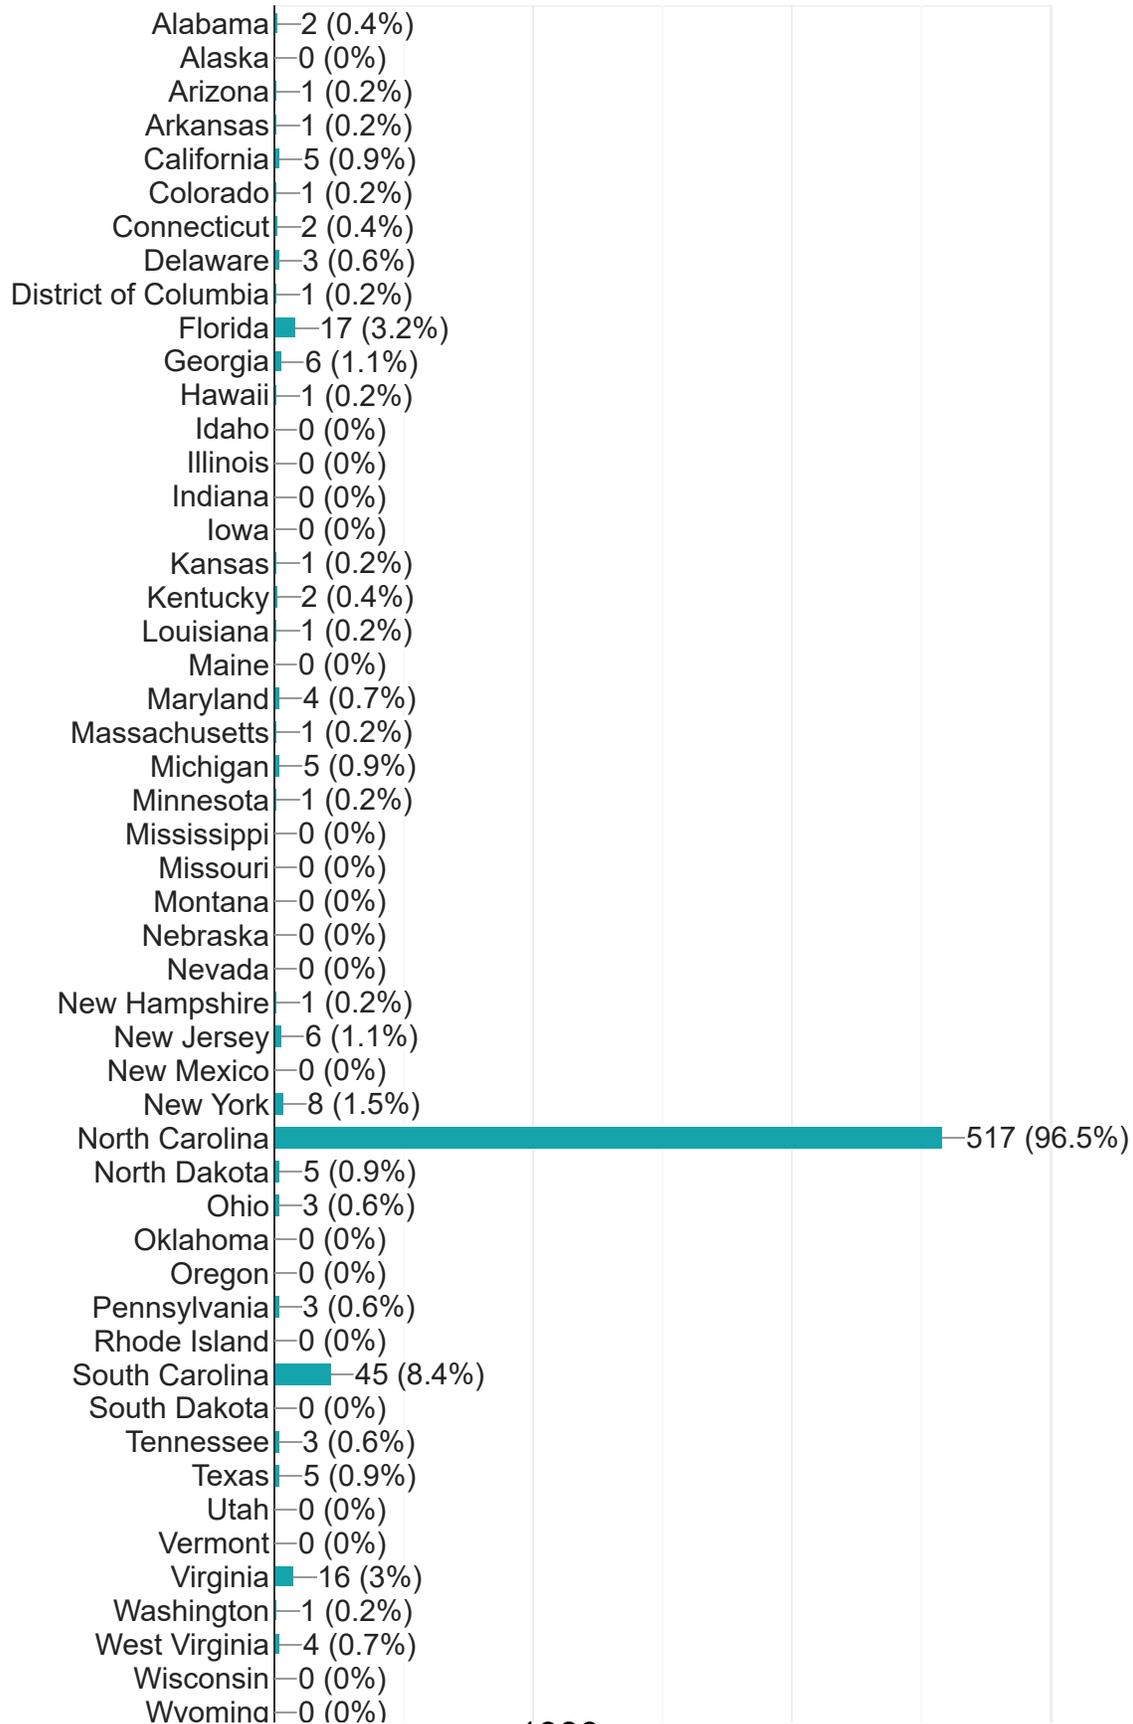

- <1 year
- 1-5 year(s)
- 6-10 years
- 11-15 years
- 16-20 years
- 21-25 years
- >25 years
- 7

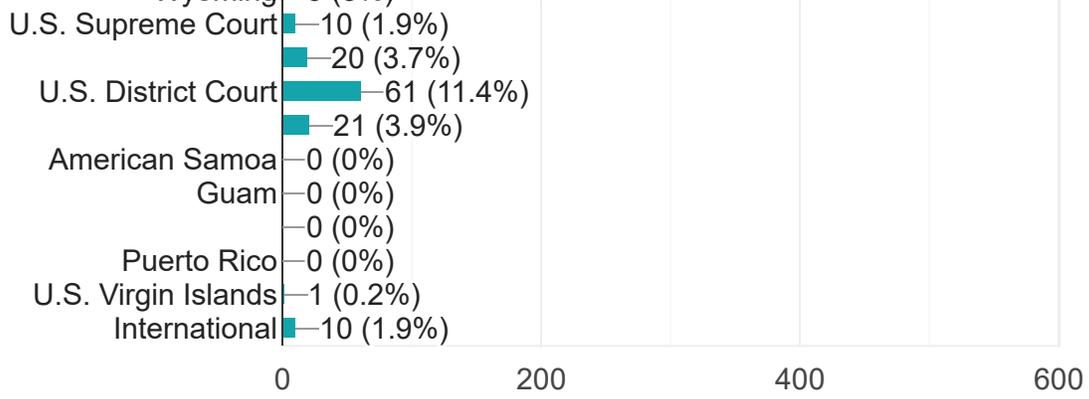

▲ 1/7 ▼

Check all state, federal, and international jurisdictions in which you have recent and significant practice area experience.

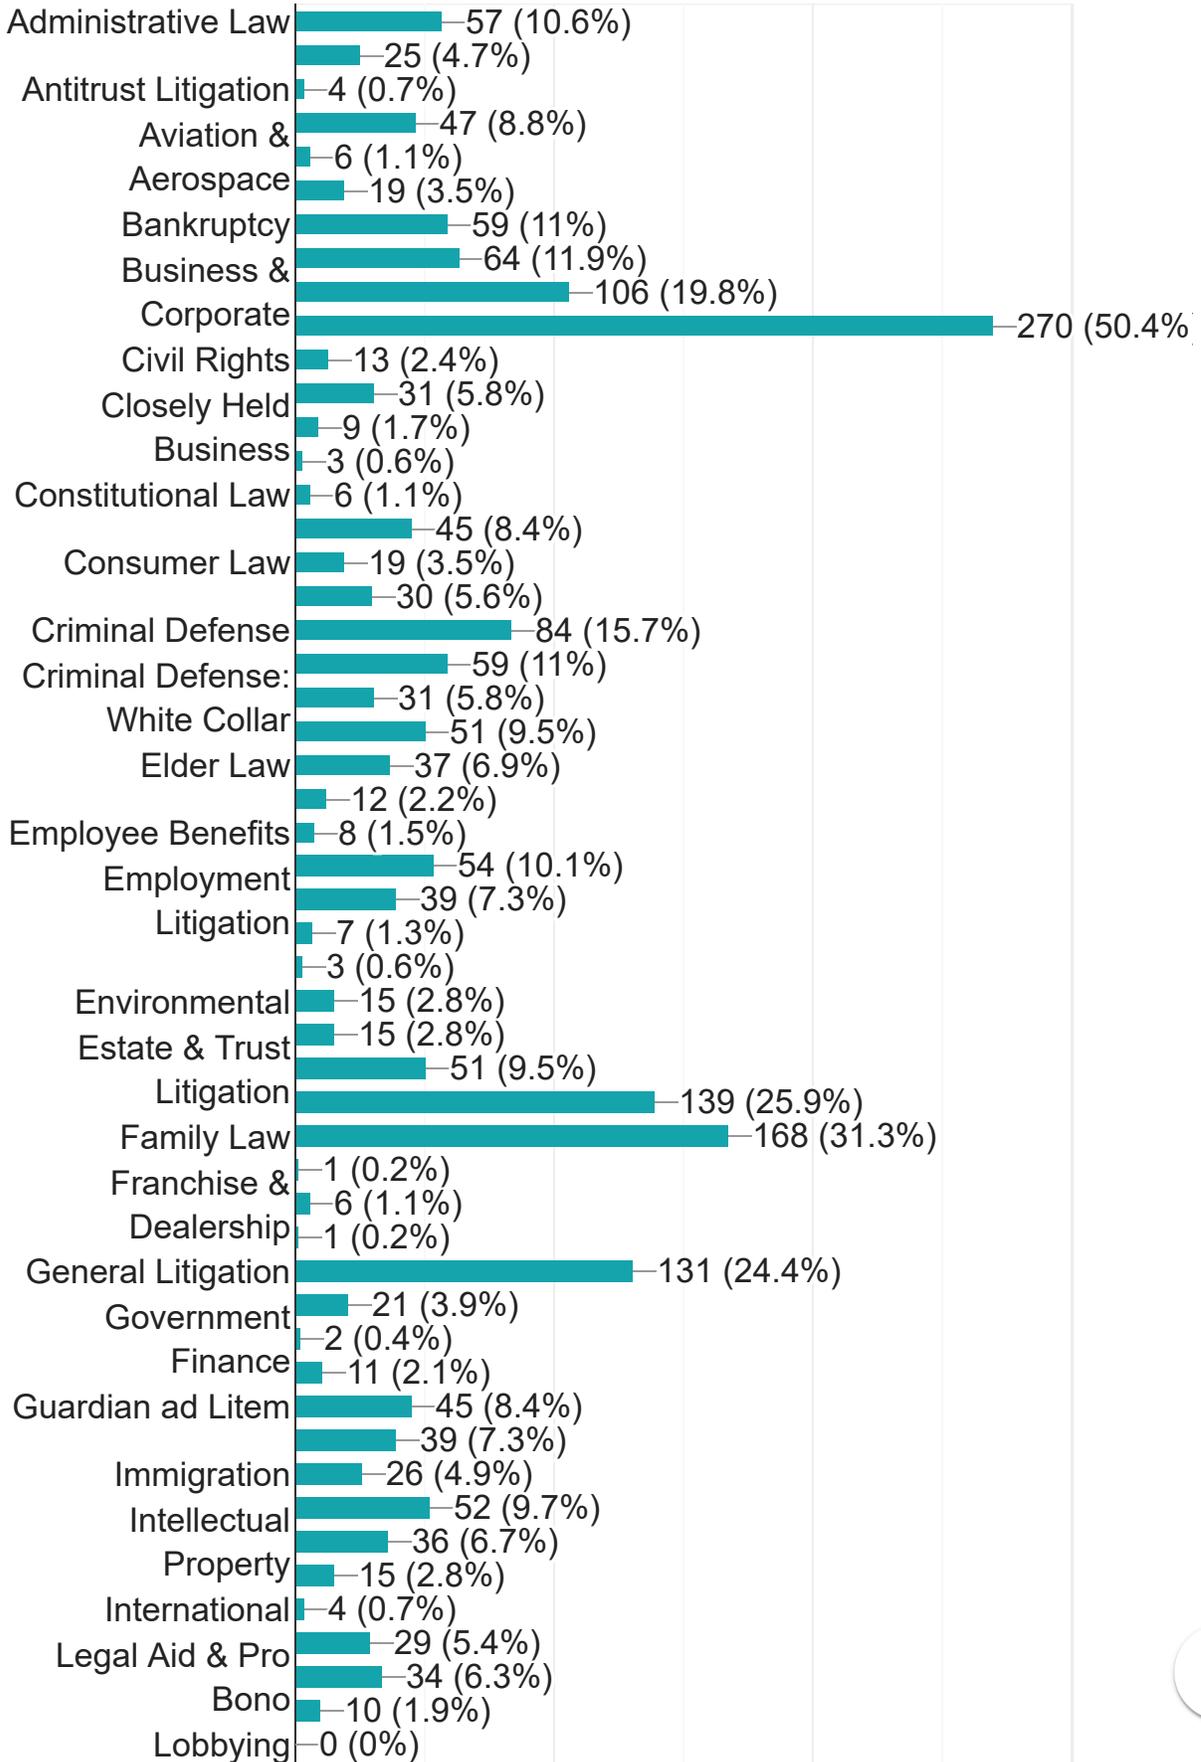

536 responses

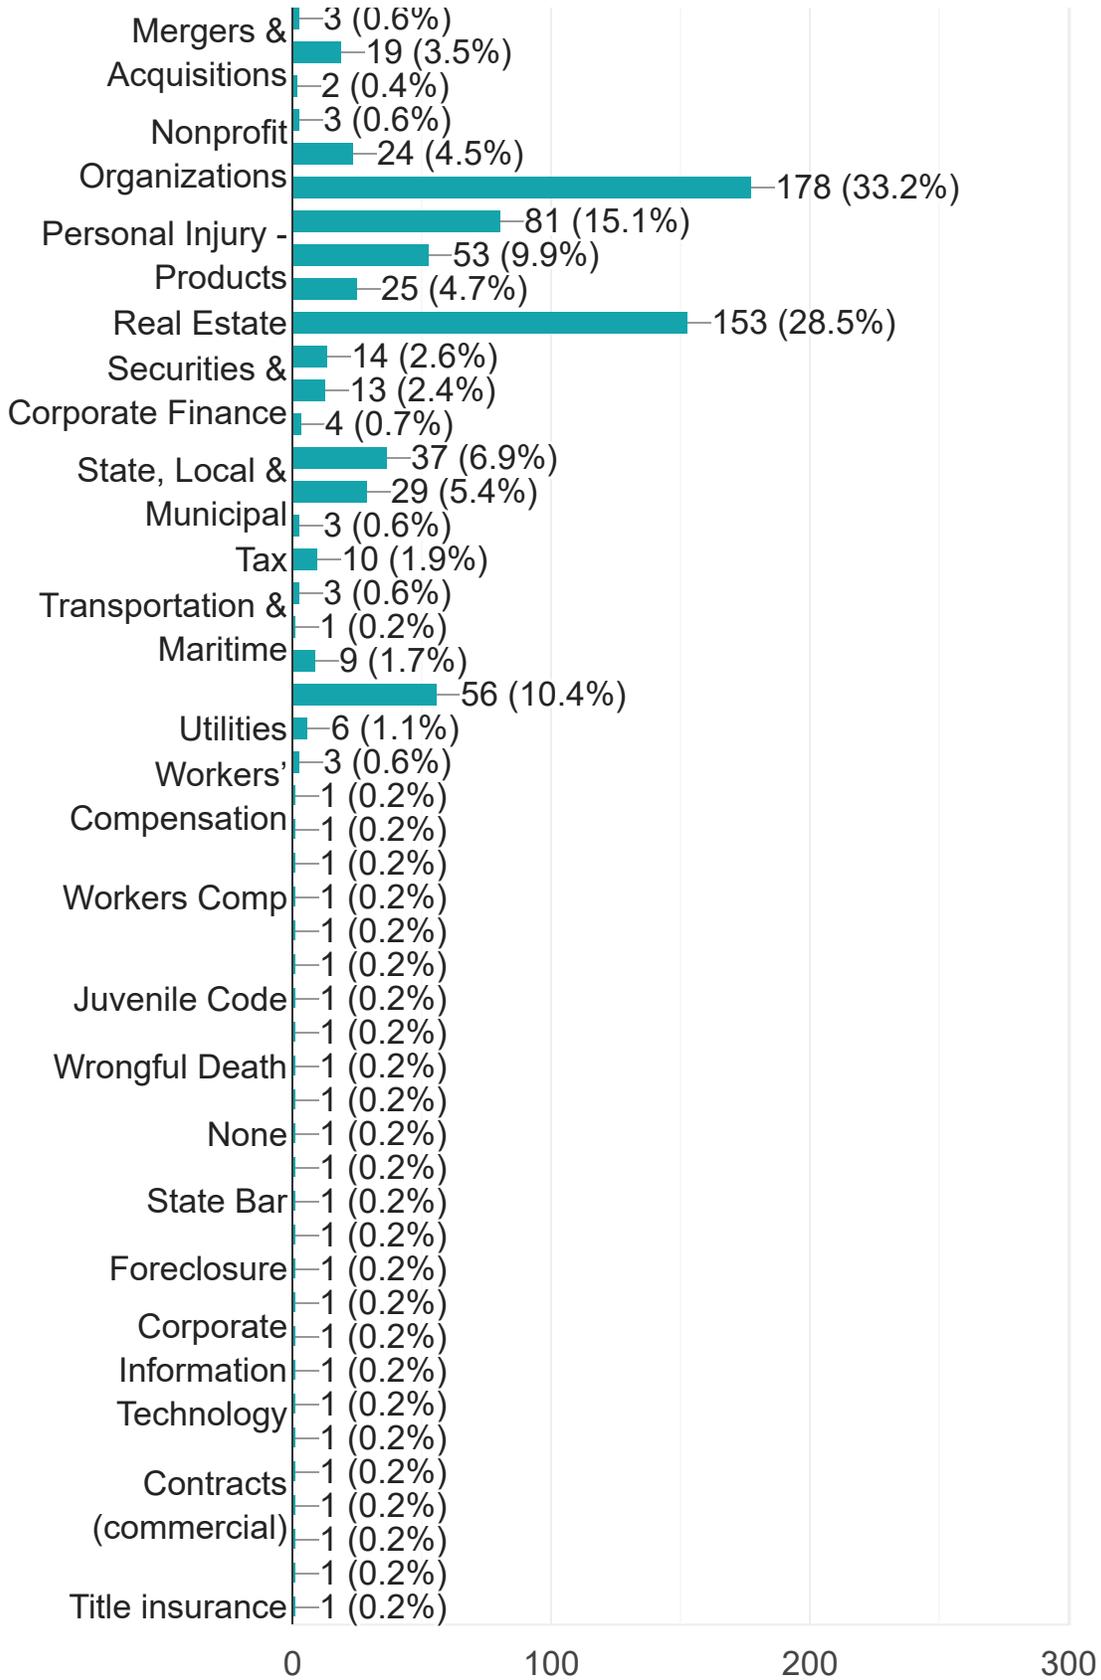

Practice Area Experience:

536 responses

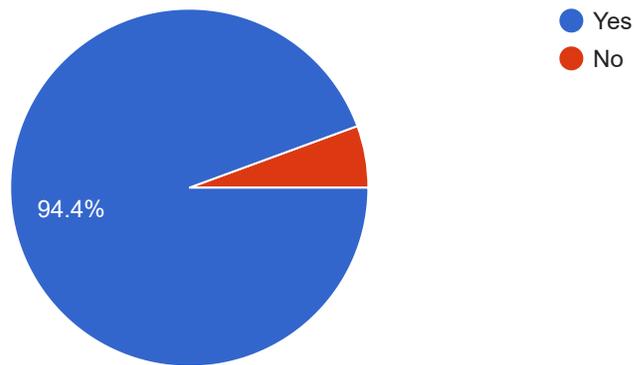

The Limited License Technician Concept

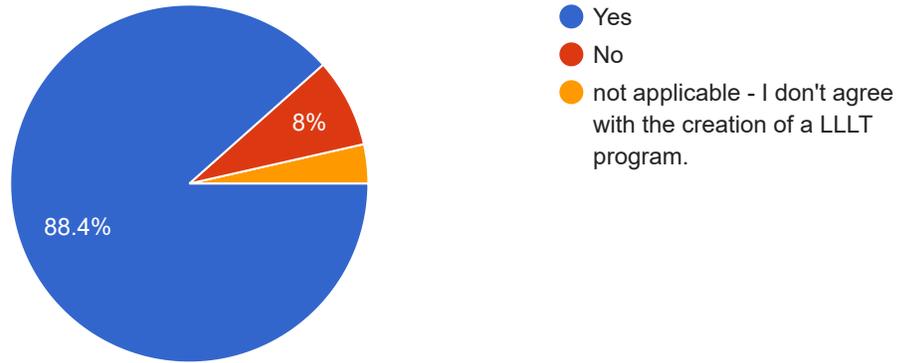

Do you believe that creating a limited license technician program in North Carolina would be beneficial to the general public (bridging the access to justice gap) and the legal community.

536 responses

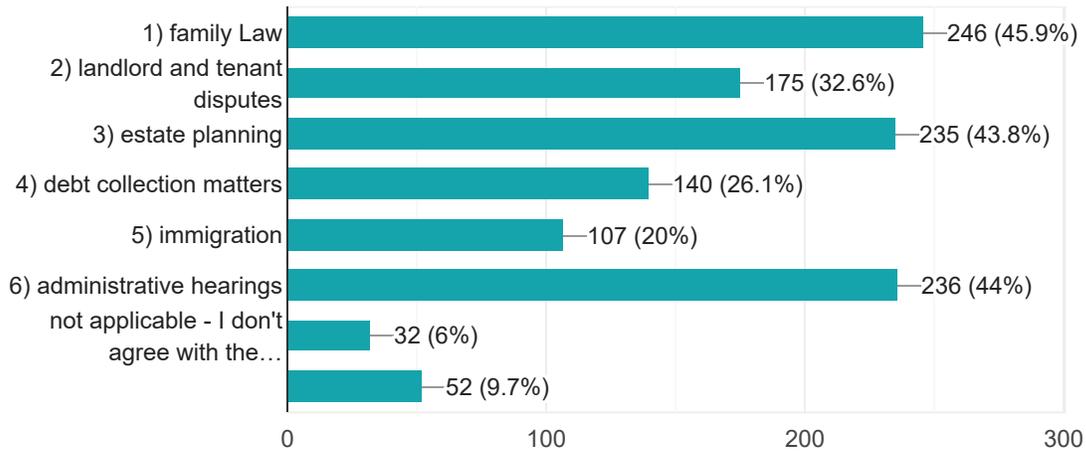

If the state of North Carolina were to permit limited licensing of nonlawyers to serve the general public in limited practice areas, the cost was "reasonable," proper training/education was received/required, and you met the licensing requirements, would you consider pursuing licensure? Please consider the question carefully.

536 responses

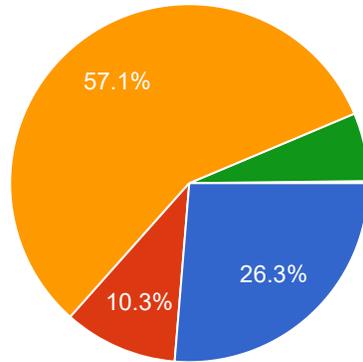

If you were to pursue limited licensing, which areas of practice would you consider?

536 responses

If you were to achieve limited licensing, would you be more likely to use your credential within a law firm / legal department or establish an independent business?

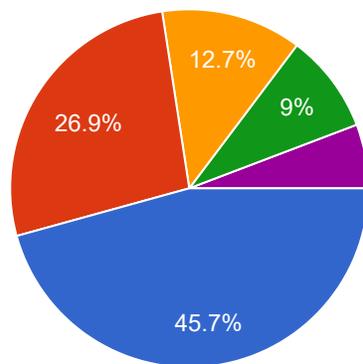

536 responses

- within a law firm or legal department
- establish an independent business
- perhaps both options above, if ethically permitted
- not applicable - I don't agree with the creation of a LLLT pr...
- Perhaps, both if allowed with no conflicts of interest

What application/licensing fee would you consider reasonable when paying for initial licensure? Please consider that any limited licensing program would likely need to be financially self-sustaining in order to be approved. Choose a response that reflects what you would be willing to pay and not what you would prefer the price to be.

536 responses

- $200.00 - $299.99
- $300.00 - $399.99
- $400.00 - $499.99
- $500.00 - $599.99
- not applicable - I don't agree with the creation of a LLLT program.

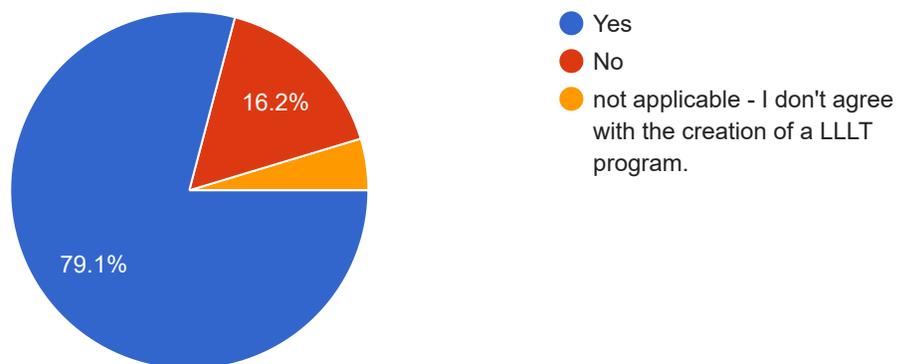

What fee would you consider reasonable for annual dues? Please consider that any limited licensing program would likely need to be financially self-sustaining in order to be approved. Choose a response that reflects what you would be willing to pay and not what you would prefer the price to be.

536 responses

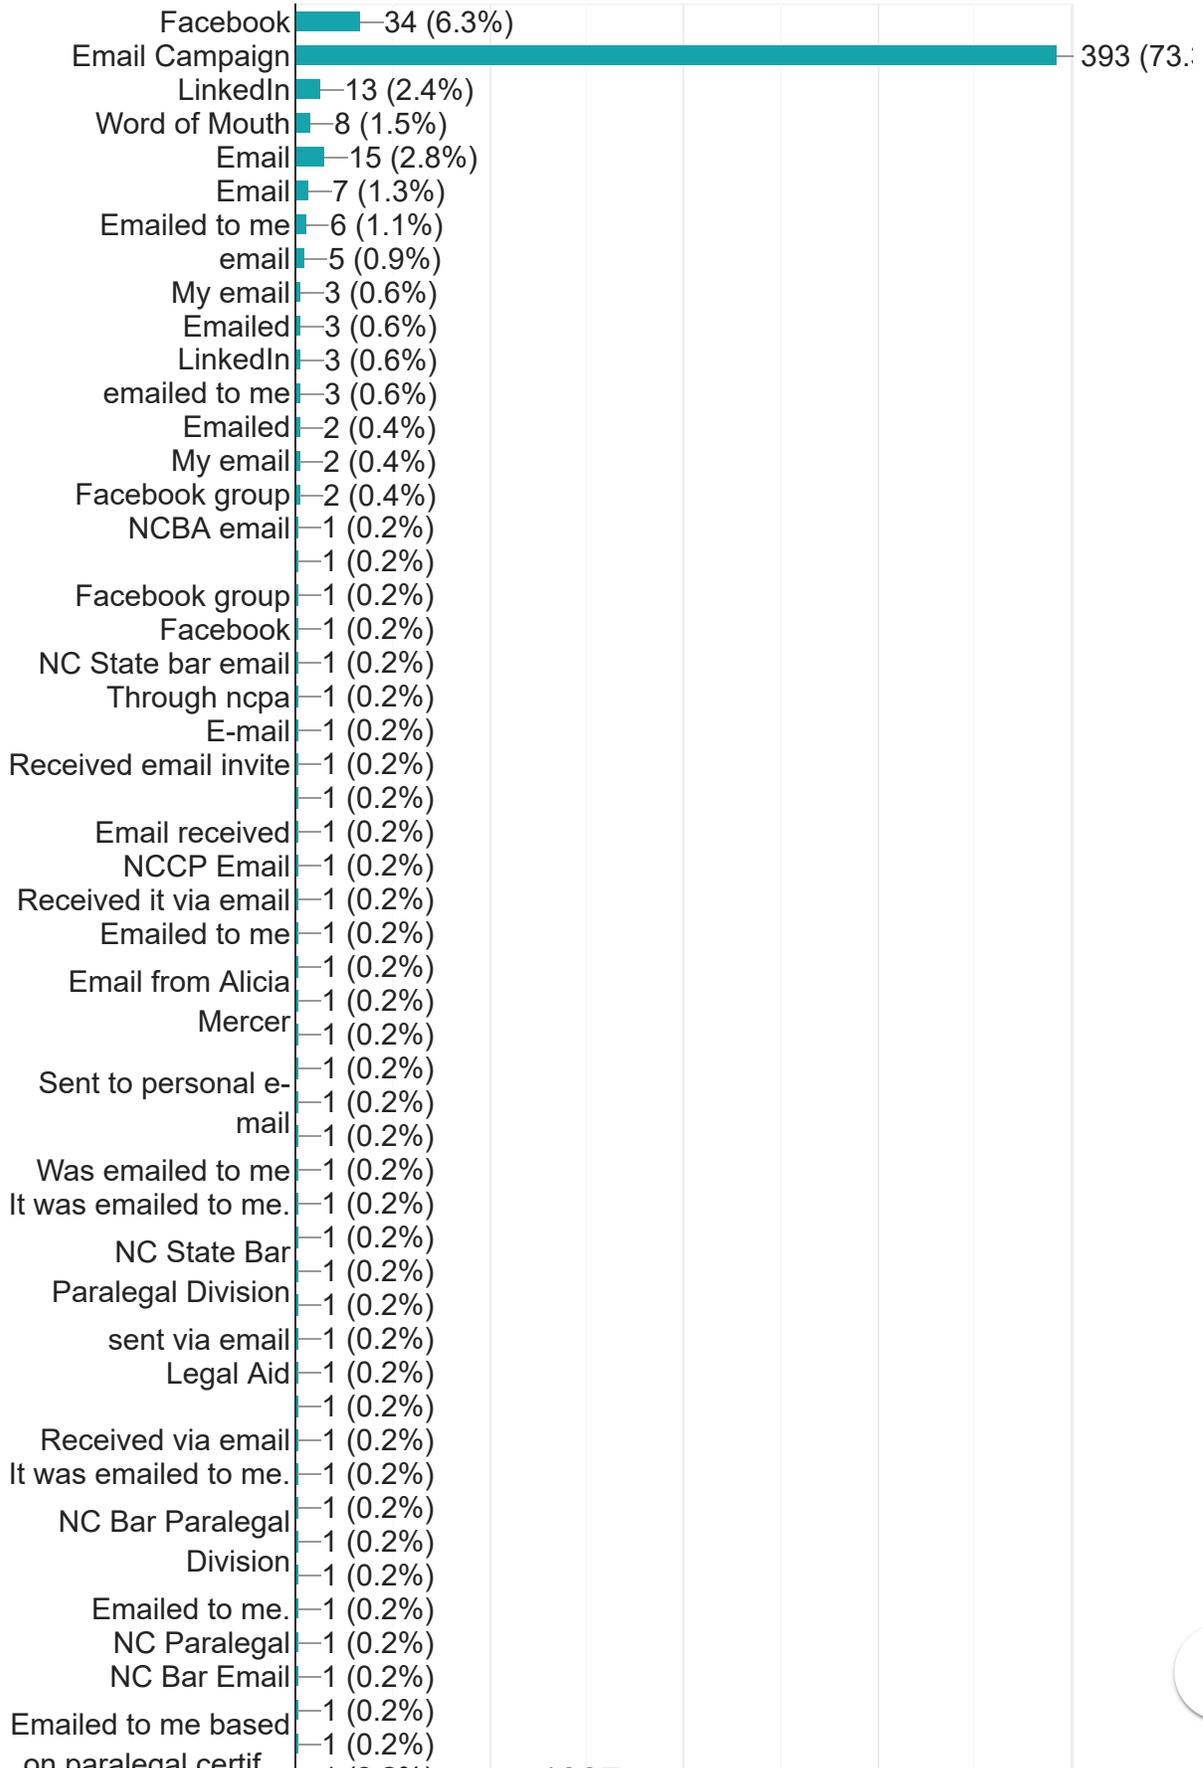

Do you believe that limited licensing should only be available to North Carolina Certified Paralegals? Or, to put it another way, do you think passing the North Carolina Certified Paralegal exam should be a prerequisite to licensure?

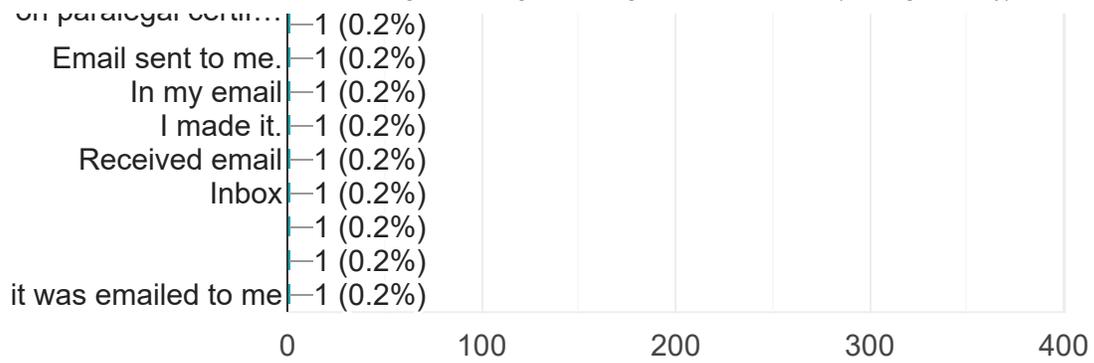

536 responses

Where did you find this survey?

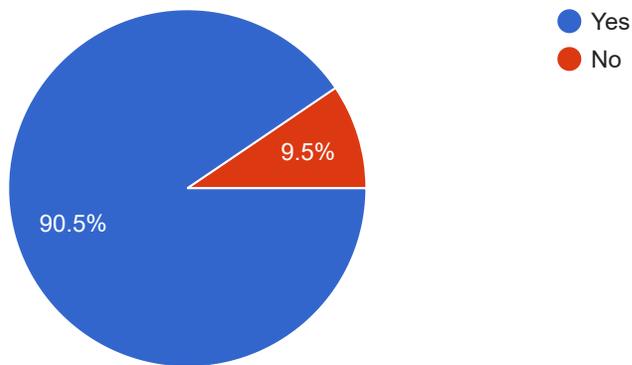

536 responses

Would you like to receive a copy of the LLLT proposal by email after it is sent to the NC State Bar?

517 responses

Do you have any additional comments or information you'd like to add? Your comments (but no personally identifiable information) may be shared with the NC Bar?

536 responses

- No
- None
- N/A
- no
- No.
- n/a
- N/a
- Na
- Not at this time

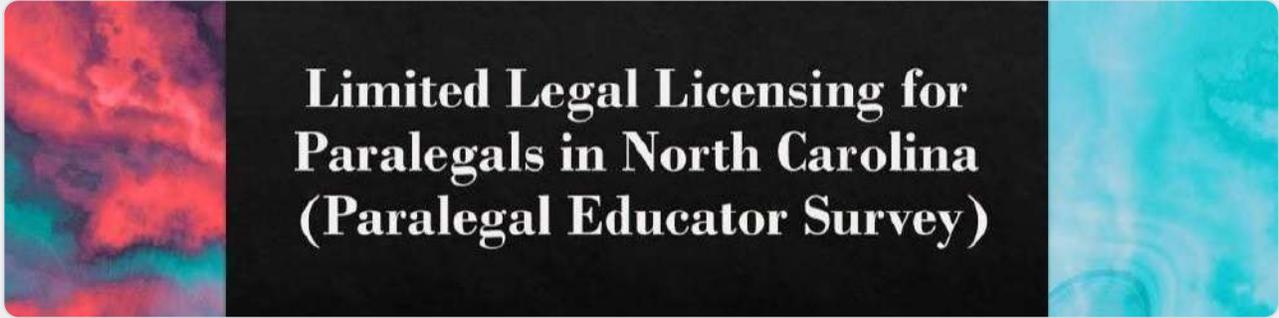

This content is neither created nor endorsed by Google. Report Abuse - Terms of Service - Privacy Policy

Google Forms

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 41

Limited Legal Licensing for Paralegals in North Carolina (Paralegal Educator Survey)

8 responses

Publish analytics

Name:

8 responses

Are you a paralegal educator?

8 responses

What educational institution do you represent (or work for)?

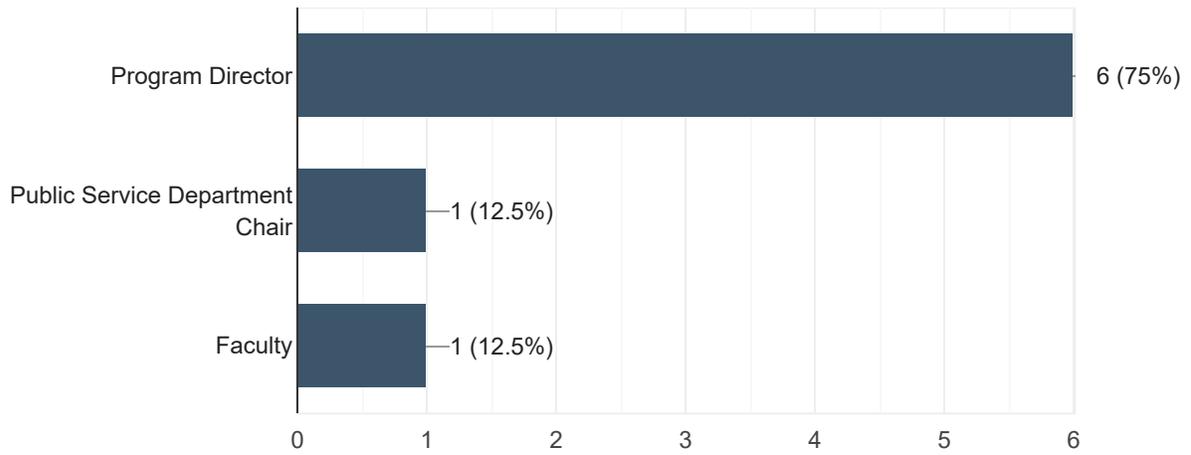

8 responses

A list of 8 empty text input fields for providing the name of the educational institution.

What is your job title?

8 responses

Email address:

8 responses

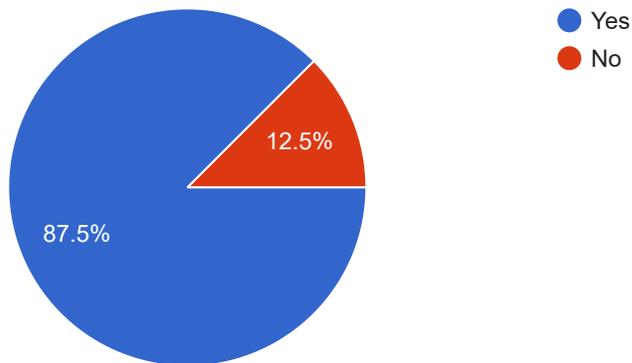

8 empty text input fields for email addresses.

The Limited License Legal Technician Concept

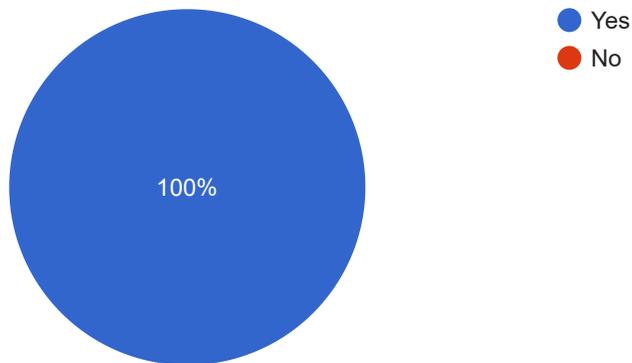

Are you familiar with the access to justice issues facing North Carolinians, which were briefly addressed in our survey description above?

8 responses

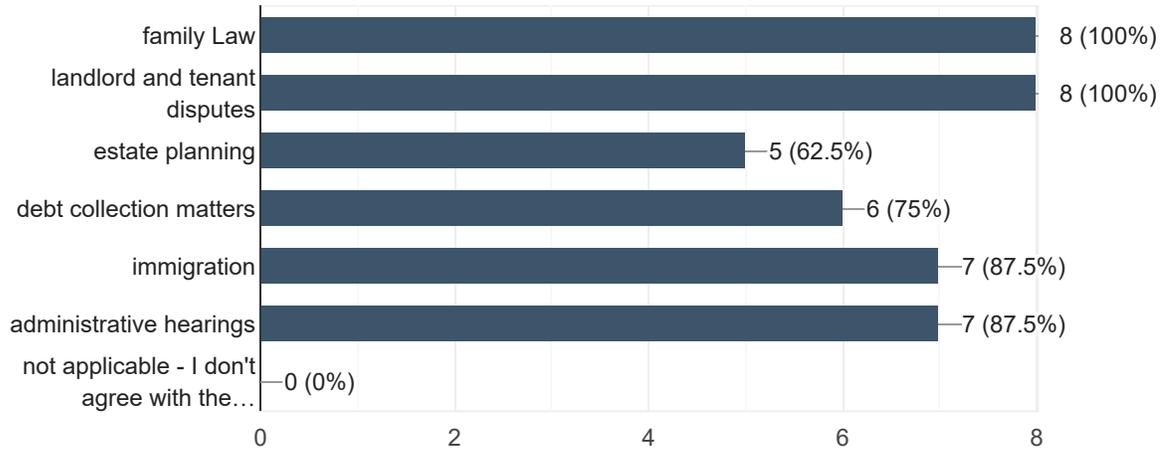

Do you believe that creating a limited license legal technician program in North Carolina would be beneficial to the general public (bridging the access to justice gap) and the legal community?

8 responses

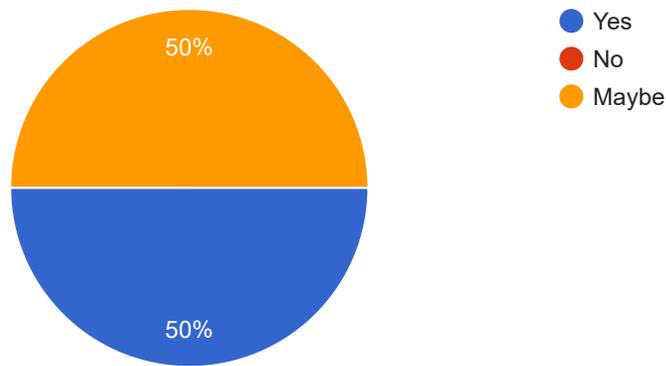

If the state bar were to pursue limited licensing, which areas of practice would you suggest for the program?

8 responses

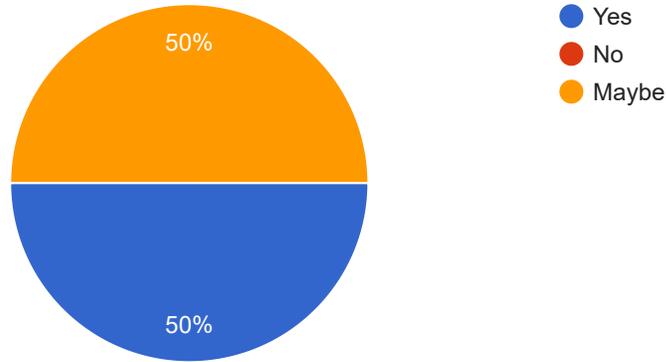

Would your educational institution be willing to work with the state bar to develop curriculum, if necessary, to facilitate the licensing process?

8 responses

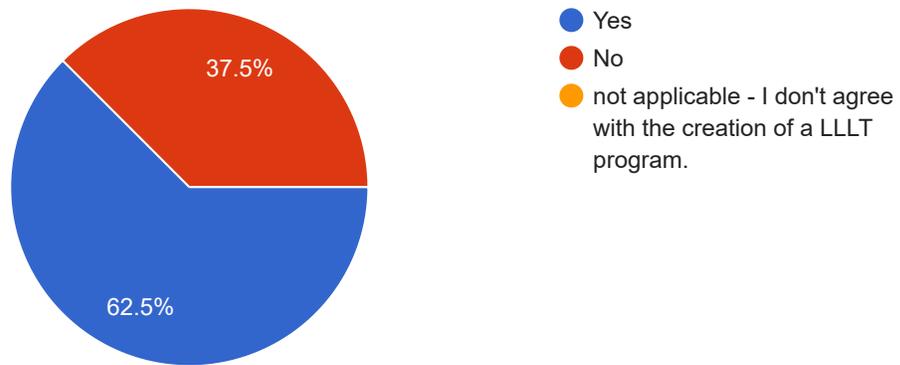

Would your educational institution be interested in developing a state-bar "approved" program for purposes of teaching content related to limited licensing?

8 responses

Do you believe that limited licensing should be limited to North Carolina Certified Paralegals?

8 responses

How did you find this survey?

8 responses

Forwarded from my department chair

Email

Not difficult at all

email

email to me

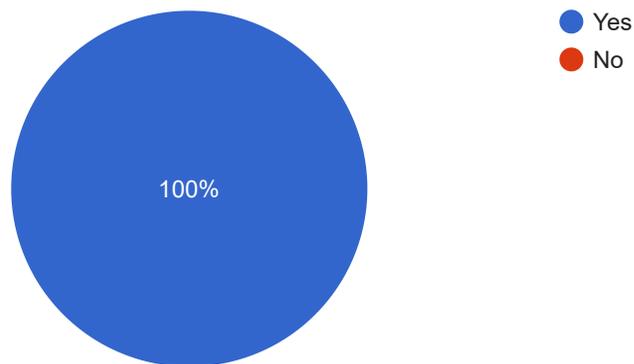

it was emailed to me

LinkedIn Rachel Royal, NCCP and WCC e-mail from Alicia Mitchell-Mercer and S.M. Kernodle (Paralegals)

It was sent to me via email.

Would you like to receive a copy of the LLLT proposal after it has been submitted to the North Carolina State Bar?

8 responses

Is there anything we should have asked? Do you have any additional comments or information you'd like to add?

8 responses

I think this presents an excellent opportunity to needed legal services more accessible to those who need them and to further professionally develop participating paralegals or legal servants.

Nothing I can think to add.

I really would like to see the state do this. So many individuals need legal help especially in family law.

Some of the states with this program no longer support it and have removed it. AAFPE has had numerous discussions through the Listserv about this issue. I would suggest contacting AAFPE for information on these discussions.

What is the opinion of the state bar regarding this LLLT?, Would the legal technician be working under the supervision of an active licensed attorney?

I would love to support this effort in any way I can. I'm on the Access to Justice Committee for AAFPE.

This content is neither created nor endorsed by Google. Report Abuse - Terms of Service - Privacy Policy

Google Forms

APPENDIX
ATTACHMENT 42

Comments Regarding ATILS 16 Concept Options for Possible Regulatory Changes

Submitted by:

The National Center for Access to Justice at Fordham University School of Law

David Udell, Executive Director Chris Albin-Lackey, Legal & Policy Director

September 23, 2019

Introduction

The National Center for Access to Justice (NCAJ) is dedicated to expanding access to justice. We are a source of research and guidance on best policies for assuring access to justice for those who are most vulnerable in our society.¹ We have long supported the authorization of new roles for non-lawyers to provide critically important civil legal services to individuals, families and communities with the greatest need.² It is through this lens and with an eye toward these goals, that NCAJ submits these comments in response to the call by the California State Bar Task Force on Access Through Innovation of Legal Services (ATILS) for public comment on its regulatory recommendations for enhancing the delivery of, and access to, legal services.

Comments

I. America's Access to Justice Crisis

Access to justice – the meaningful opportunity to be heard – is unavailable to the majority of low income people in the United States even though it is essential to their well-being and enjoyment of their fundamental rights.³ Access to justice can make the difference in keeping a family together, preserving the roof over one's head, having enough to eat, and securing refuge from physical and emotional harm. Access to justice is important to everyone, but it is especially elusive for the poor, people of color, and other marginalized communities.

The grim reality is that civil justice problems cost countless Americans their homes, their children, their jobs, their life savings, and even their physical and emotional safety. Each year, millions of people in America are drawn into civil proceedings without any legal representation or other assistance, and the law itself is often stacked against them. Millions more struggle with legal problems without ever reaching a court. The damage caused by these failures of justice is broad, accelerating poverty and incarceration rates, fracturing families and communities, and undermining confidence in our laws and system of government.

Too often, low income and vulnerable people are unable to obtain the legal help they need, and are not allowed to seek that assistance from the individuals they want to help them. Services essential to people in low income and vulnerable communities are out of reach, reserved to professional attorneys who are neither in the communities that most need their services nor offering their services at rates that could ever be affordable to low-income people. The law prevents people, no matter how critical their unmet needs, from obtaining legal advice or legal representation from anyone who has not acquired a degree in law and obtained authorization by the bar to practice law. As a consequence, people have no opportunity to secure legal assistance of any kind. They are left at unnecessary risk of harm not only in legal proceedings against powerful adversaries, but also in numerous other scenarios that arise outside of courtrooms in which legal expertise, were it available, could make a difference.

Among the kinds of civil legal matters in which individuals risk unnecessary harm are high stakes disputes that include evictions; foreclosures; job terminations; determinations of child custody and child support obligations; and efforts to secure essential medical coverage, access to food, and even physical or emotional safety. These matters involve some of the most basic necessities of life, and the outcomes, when adverse, routinely turn people's lives upside down.

II. Incremental Reforms and Inadequate Progress

We know that initiatives are being pursued by many stakeholders on many fronts to better position low income and vulnerable people to respond to civil legal problems. These include, among many others:

- expanding the provision of free legal assistance and promoting the adoption of a civil right to counsel in areas of law that implicate basic human needs;
- increasing opportunities for alternative dispute resolution;
- simplifying procedural and substantive law;
- adopting innovative models of judging that allow decision-makers to be increasingly proactive in explaining legal and evidentiary issues to unrepresented people;
- training court officials and clerks to respond to the needs of disadvantaged and unrepresented people;
- improving the qualifications of interpreters;
- waiving filing fees; and
- offering clearer notices to educate people with disabilities about their rights.

Some of these approaches, and many others, are described in the NCAJ's Justice Index, an online resource that tracks states' progress, relative to each other, in adopting best policies that improve access to justice. The Index seeks to illuminate for state officials and reformers the best policies for assuring access to justice, and to encourage these stakeholders to replicate these policies in their respective states across the country.⁴

In our view, the diverse reform initiatives that are moving forward in the states to expand access to justice, despite increased attention and best efforts, are not equal to the task of ensuring meaningful access to justice for all. Even where positive steps are taken, the access to justice gap remains something more akin to a chasm, with seemingly no agreeable solutions among members or the bar in sight.

It is with all of this in mind – the severity of the access to justice crisis and the enormity of the system’s failure to resolve it – that we recommend developing and testing new models for authorizing practice by non-lawyers. As the California Bar has recognized, in some jurisdictions courts have already allowed experimentation with models in which certain classes of trained non-lawyers, termed “navigators,” have been authorized to offer information and limited forms of assistance to people facing civil legal problems. Washington State and Utah have gone further, adopting innovative models that authorize certified individuals to offer a greater level of service than navigators in family law cases. But even these steps forward are designed to be limited in scope, and make no pretense of being equal to the task of bridging the justice gap. Much more must be done.

III. NCAJ’s Support for Recommendation 2.0

The California proposal, as drafted, contemplates the development of models within attendant standards that, potentially, can expand access to justice for low-income individuals, families, and communities. The proposals, though tentative, are comprehensive, and NCAJ’s comments do not, at this time, address all of them. Rather, NCAJ would like to express support for the specific provision calling for extending to non-lawyers the authorization to provide legal advice and services. Specifically, NCAJ supports the following proposal:

- 2.0 – Non-lawyers will be authorized to provide specified legal advice and services as an exemption to UPL with appropriate regulation.

We recognize that many arguments have been advanced in public comments, and in literature on the subject, against proposals to narrow prohibitions on unauthorized practice of law. These include concerns that such reforms risk enshrining a two-tier system of justice; that litigants will suffer harm through the provision of incompetent or otherwise inadequate legal services; and that proposals tend to erode the position and societal value of the bar as a profession.

Our response to these and other concerns is twofold. First, we argue quite simply that the scale and severity of the access to justice problem weigh even more heavily than the concerns. Second, we acknowledge that these concerns are real, important, and often advanced in good faith. California will bear a heavy responsibility to develop models of service delivery, regulation, and oversight adequate to mitigate these concerns. We advise that the California Bar look, in particular, at the risk-based, consumer-focused model being advanced by the Utah Supreme Court. The present proposals have generated an understandable degree of alarm because they essentially leave these vital questions for another day. With all this in mind, we would urge adherence to the following principles as reform goes forward:

- Ensure that everyone has access to the help they need at a cost they can afford – Consideration of reform models should advance this broad idea that people have a right to receive legal assistance within a legal system that is fundamentally not designed to be understandable and navigable by individuals without legal representation. This is an error in the design of the legal system, not a failure of those who are subject to it.

- Ensure a match between skill of practitioners and complexity of tasks – Many tasks involved in the practice of law can be performed as well or better by those who have experienced these issues themselves and benefit from the training needed to resolve them, but who have not attended four years of undergraduate education and an additional three years of law school. Other more complex tasks draw more heavily on formal legal training, which is where lawyers should focus their unique expertise. At the same time, too little is known about the specific types of knowledge and skills that are needed to perform certain legal tasks, in large part because regulatory restrictions on non-lawyer advocacy have prevented these models from being developed. More study is needed, however this is not a reason to fail to go forward with reform; indeed, it is a reason to encourage experimentation. Much as in medicine, the field will discover over time the tasks that individuals are competent to address, the tasks that should be carried out under supervision by lawyers (or referred to lawyers), and the tasks that can effectively be handled by non-lawyers with specific training to conduct specific tasks. The risk that nearly all low-income people face in not having their legal needs addressed is greater, we submit, than the risks that may be associated with developing trained, non-lawyer community advocates empowered to help them.
- Ensure transparency of qualifications of those offering assistance – Much as occurs now, the state should require all practitioners to disclose accurately and prominently the type of training and qualifications they possess. This could include degrees, training certificates and other qualified credentials to alert the consumer to their actual expertise. Individuals should not be allowed to claim they are attorneys when they are not.
- Reduce costs and other barriers to entry – As the California Bar has acknowledged, the regulation of legal services provision is a delicate and important matter, and while it must not be given short shrift, nor should the state err on the side of erecting unnecessary regulatory barriers that require so much education, or such great costs, as to practically prevent the provision by non-lawyers of more widely accessible legal services.
- Do not burden nonprofit organizations with excessive new regulatory requirements that will interfere with existing services to the poor – A top rule of reform in California should be to do no harm to the vulnerable, nor to those nonprofit entities that are providing effective service important in low income communities. In pursuit of a new framework to regulate companies that provide their services through for-profit models, the state must be vigilant to avoid imposing excessive regulatory requirements on non-profit organizations that are already effective in providing services to the poor. Indeed, the Bar should consider an expansive non-profit exemption to any rules that are intended to specifically regulate risks imposed by commercial entities, with the understanding that such non-profits would still be subject to both laws regulating their status as nonprofits as well as existing consumer protection laws.

- Recognize a definition of access to justice to guide reform – To assure that new models expand access to justice, the NCAJ recommends that the state of California measure the claimed merit of new models against a definition of access to justice which contains the following elements:
 - that individuals and groups
 - especially those with the fewest resources who are the most vulnerable
 - understand their rights
 - can act effectively to protect their important needs and interests (home, family, sustenance, safety, savings, health, more)
 - through a formal or informal process
 - with a neutral and non-discriminatory decision-maker (or, possibly, through a process with no decision-maker if the proceeding is informal)
 - to produce a fair resolution (where necessary, determining the facts, applying the law, shaping the law)
 - and enforce the result.

[Dated 9-23-19]

¹ See NCAJ’s organizational website, ncforaj.org, and its Justice Index, justiceindex.org.

² See Richard Zorza and David Udell, New Roles For Non-Lawyers To Increase Access To Justice, 41 Fordham Urb. L.J. 1259 (2014), available at <https://ir.lawnet.fordham.edu/ulj/vol41/iss4/8>; Narrowing the “Justice Gap”: Roles for Nonlawyer Practitioners, Committee on Professional Responsibility, Association of the Bar of the City of New York (June 2013)(David Udell, Chair, Access to Justice Sub-Committee), available at <https://www2.nycbar.org/pdf/report/uploads/20072450-RolesforNonlawyerPractitioners.pdf>; Press Release, Chief Judge Names Members of Committee Charged With Examining How Non-Lawyer Advocates Can Help Narrow New York’s Justice Gap, New York State Unified Court System (May 28, 2013), available at, http://ww2.nycourts.gov/sites/default/files/document/files/2018-05/PR13_07.pdf.

³ The Justice Gap: Measuring the Unmet Civil Legal Needs of Low-income Americans, Legal Services Corporation (June 2017), available at <https://www.lsc.gov/sites/default/files/images/TheJusticeGap-FullReport.pdf>.

⁴ Justice Index (2016), justiceindex.org. See also, Overview of Justice Index (July 25, 2019), available at <https://ncforaj.org/wp-content/uploads/2019/07/Introduction-to-the-Justice-Index-7-25-19-pdf.pdf>