LEGAL AID NC

Our Mission

Legal Aid of North Carolina is a statewide, nonprofit law firm that provides free legal services in civil matters to low-income people in order to ensure equal access to justice and to remove legal barriers to economic opportunity.

What Our Clients Say About Us

Hannah faced homelessness after Hurricane Florence.

“ First off, we were told what rights we had as tenants - which none of us were aware of. It was a big sense of relief when Legal Aid came in and helped us out. I would really love for everyone to know that Legal Aid is there to help you. ”

Bestselling novelist John Grisham on civil justice:

“In this land of ours... the land of a million lawyers... there are so many people who face eviction, deportation, violence, hunger, homelessness, loss of rights, loss of benefits, school suspensions... because they don't have lawyers. And if we can't protect these people, then we as a nation, as a society, as a culture, as a people – we are all diminished...”

Dear Friends,

This past year has been one of resilience and determination. We deeply appreciate the support of all our staff, funders, volunteers and partnering organizations. Our funding this year was critical as we took on additional disaster relief cases in the aftermath of Hurricane Florence and as we expanded other crucial programs in order to meet the needs of North Carolina’s most vulnerable communities.

Hurricane Florence

In August we began to proactively prepare for the hurricane season by coordinating with other organizations and reallocating our resources to better serve disaster victims. Immediately after Florence, we sent staff attorneys, health care Navigators and volunteers to recovery centers to educate victims about their rights and the process of applying for relief. Simultaneously, our free helpline prioritized calls from hurricane survivors. Victims were quickly connected to legal professionals who helped them with legal needs such as replacing key documents and filing insurance and FEMA claims.

Our staff and pro bono volunteers worked tirelessly to execute the first stages of our disaster relief response in the fall of 2018, resulting in our opening over 800 disaster-related cases – and that’s just the beginning!

Our disaster relief efforts will continue over the next five years as victims of Hurricane Florence face new obstacles like contract scams, FEMA denials and landlord-tenant issues.

Many impoverished North Carolinians who were hurt by Hurricane Matthew, and who have not yet received relief funds, were once again devastated by Hurricane Florence. Our approach to disaster relief involves not only providing short-term legal staff, but also securing resources for the upcoming years of recovery.

Expanding Access to Health Care and Housing

In addition to our disaster-relief efforts, we continue to expand our eviction diversion and health care enrollment efforts. In 2018, we led a statewide open enrollment effort that provided health insurance coverage to over half a million families – coverage that will help prevent medical bills from condemning families to permanent poverty.

Our successful Eviction Diversion Program and Durham Expunction and Restoration Program attracted funding from the City of Durham. This will be the first time Durham’s city government will directly fund our services in an effort to ensure that all of Durham’s citizens can be a part of the city’s newfound prosperity. Our Eviction Diversion Program is serving as a model for other cities, and we may see more eviction programs in our state in the coming years. In total, we heroically handled 26,437 cases in 2018 and touched the lives of 61,714 North Carolinians.

Thank you for your continued support. Together we can make North Carolina a more just and prosperous state.

Sincerely,

Clayton D. Morgan George R. Hausen, Jr.

What We Do How We Work Our Impact

What We Do

We believe in equal access to justice for all North Carolinians – no matter their income level. When the most vulnerable in our state do not have access to legal support in civil court, they can be robbed of dignity and trapped in cycles of poverty, violence, and poor health. Civil legal help ameliorates the devastating effects of poverty by increasing access to safe and stable housing, income, health care, education and more. Our limited resources demand that we help those with the most dire civil legal needs – survivors of domestic violence, marginalized groups, children and persons with income at 125% of the poverty level or below.

The Need

Almost a quarter of North Carolina’s population struggles to make ends meet. Families all over the state face hardships like inadequate housing, food insecurity, lack of access to benefits and health care, domestic violence, discriminatory treatment, instability after natural disasters, and other obstacles.

An estimated 1.67 million North Carolinians live below the poverty level

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) estimated in 2016 that 71% of low-income families will experience at least one civil legal issue a year including problems with health care, housing conditions, disability access, veterans’ benefits, and domestic violence. The rate is even higher for households with survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault (97%), with parents/guardians of kids under 18 (80%), and with disabled persons (80%.) To make matters worse, most Americans incorrectly believe that they have a right to an attorney in any court case. They are shocked to learn that legal assistance in a civil case is difficult and expensive to attain.

A legal advocate can be life changing for a family. We work strategically with other organizations to educate people about their rights, offer free legal advice and represent clients in legal disputes.

$14,472 is the median annual income for a Legal Aid client and 40% of our clients earn less than $10,000. The federal poverty threshold is $25,750 for a household of four.

Legal intervention can change a household's circumstances, from attaining safe housing that reduces medical problems to custody agreements that ensure survivors of domestic violence can protect their family from future abuse.

Holistic Approach

We are committed to improving our clients' circumstances and helping them to break free from cycles of poverty. Our work improves the quality of life in communities facing hardship and can be instrumental in increasing health and stability. For example, civil legal intervention positively impacts clients' health by increasing the availability of resources to meet daily basic needs, ensuring healthy physical environments, creating equal access to education and employment, and reducing exposure to violence.

We do this by leading the North Carolina Navigator Consortium, which helps consumers enroll in health care coverage on HealthCare.gov. Thanks in part to the efforts of the NC Navigator Consortium, the only navigator group in North Carolina, our state consistently has the third-highest number of enrollments out of the roughly 40 states that use HealthCare.gov.

Our health care work also includes a Medical-Legal Partnership that connects legal and medical professionals in order to tackle the legal factors that prevent patients from becoming healthy. The partnership includes about a dozen health care centers. In conjunction with Medicaid transformation and privatization in North Carolina, we have begun outlining future partnerships with insurance companies to provide legal services to Medicaid patients.

Our commitment to our clients' wellbeing includes providing access to social workers at key offices. Social workers provide additional resources for clients and continue to strengthen our relationships with local organizations. A 2019 goal is to expand our clients' access to social workers across our practice.

Barriers to Equal Justice

Our major obstacle remains a lack of necessary resources to meet the growing need for our services.

About 37% of the state's population is eligible for our services. We can only serve 1 in 10 households who need our help.

Each year we set priorities and guidelines to ensure we serve those who need us the most and for whom legal help can have the largest impact.

This year we stretched our resources to touch the lives of 61,714 North Carolinians including 26,796 children.

For those we cannot represent, we create self-help materials and conduct clinics to expand our impact and empower communities. We conducted more than 1,200 outreach events in 2018. Online, our many self-help videos garnered 22,381 views.

What We Do How We Work Our Impact

How We Work

Legal Aid of North Carolina provides free legal information, legal advice and representation to the disenfranchised and those struggling to make ends meet. We work with clients to remove legal obstacles that trap families in cycles of poverty, violence and instability. Our practice areas help clients fulfill their basic needs, support their economic security, and ensure their safety and stability.

Accessing Basic Needs:

- Preventing Homelessness (unsafe housing, housing discrimination, evictions, foreclosures)
- Accessing Disaster Relief and Government Benefits (FEMA, SNAP, SSI, disability)
- Increasing Access to Health Care (Medicaid, Medicare, Affordable Care Act)

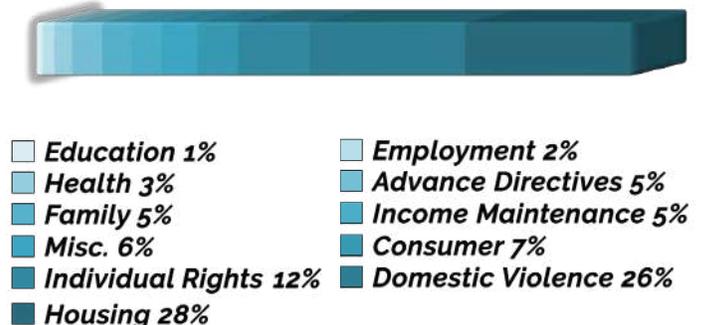

Ensuring Safety and Stability:

- Stopping Violence and Neglect (domestic violence, human trafficking, elder and child abuse)

Our Commitment to Serving All Communities

Our facilities include nineteen local offices. Our local offices ensure that we are close to clients who need us and that we distribute resources throughout the state, including rural areas.

Local offices work hand-in-hand with their communities. For example, the Sylva and Pembroke offices include staff who are able to practice in Tribal court and who are aware of the unique legal obstacles facing Native Americans in North Carolina. In addition to our standard practice areas, we represent two tribes in their pursuit of federal recognition.

Legal Services Corporation estimates that 75% of rural households had at least one civil legal problem in the last year.

In addition to our regional work, we have eleven special projects: Advocates for Children’s Services, Battered Immigrant Project, Domestic Violence Prevention Initiative, Fair Housing Project, Farmworker Unit, Medical-Legal Partnership, Mortgage Foreclosure Project, NC Navigator Consortium, Senior Law Project, The Child’s Advocate, and Veterans Law Project.

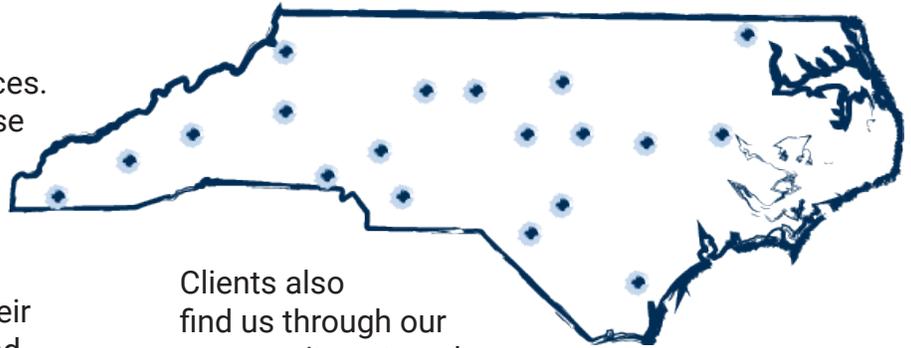

Advocates at our special projects are experts in their practice areas and are uniquely positioned to provide extra support to our local offices. Many of our special projects conduct crucial community outreach to educate vulnerable populations about their rights and build strong relationships with private and public entities.

Our distinctive structure reflects the diversity of our state and the dire need for free civil legal help.

How Clients Reach Us

Clients reach us through referrals from partnering organizations, walk-ins at local offices, calls to our helpline, and applications submitted online.

Our Offices

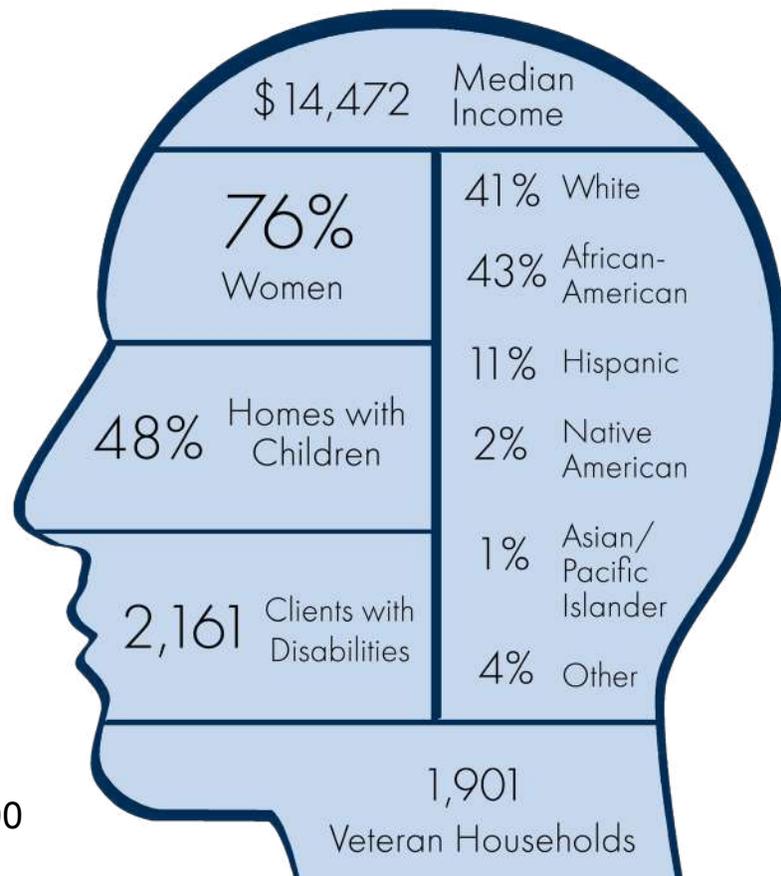

Clients also find us through our community outreach efforts. The majority of potential cases go through our innovative Central Intake Unit (CIU) which received 192,000 calls in 2018. CIU assesses client eligibility and assigns cases to different staff and volunteers.

Clients receive three types of services: informational services such as self-help clinics and educational materials, brief service and advice like a conversation with an attorney, and extended service such as representation in court.

Our informational presentations to clients, potential clients, and community groups benefited 53,529 participants in 2018.

What We Do How We Work Our Impact

Mother and Children Reunited

The Child's Advocate (TCA), one of our special projects, was appointed by Wake County Family Court to represent three children after their father abducted two of them - brothers aged six and ten - from Raleigh and took them to Jordan in violation of a domestic violence protective order. Their mother and 13-year-old sister remained in North Carolina.

TCA worked with the U.S. Attorney's Office, The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, the U.S. State Department, and local law enforcement to determine if there was any way to get the boys back. TCA learned that the best chance of reuniting the children with their mother was to negotiate an agreement between the parents.

Orchestrating an agreement took years. There were numerous obstacles: pending criminal charges, Interpol notices, issues that could lead to the boys being detained on their way home and more. TCA negotiated with the police, the parents' attorneys, the family court judge and the Department of Justice to ensure that the boys' fares home were paid and to grant primary custody to their mother.

The boys returned safely to Raleigh and are now happily reunited with their mother and sister! The children will be seeing a trauma therapist to help them heal after the painful upheaval they endured.

About Our Special Projects That Help Children:
The Child Advocate – court-appointed advocates for children embroiled in custody battles whose role is to ensure that the child's voice is heard
Advocates for Children's Services – advocating for children in the public school system (including children with disabilities, criminal witnesses and children subjected to the school-to-jail pipeline)
Medical Legal Partnership – medical partners refer children and their families to Legal Aid to remove legal barriers that prevent children from leading healthy, happy lives

Our client, Sharon, was able to purchase her dream home outright with the proceeds from a personal injury settlement. Sharon had struggled to make ends meet for years, and the opportunity to finally own a family home was a dream come true.

Lacking experience in home ownership and its obligations, she found herself facing foreclosure from some relatively minor HOA and tax delinquencies. A foreclosure rescue outfit entered the picture and offered Sharon a loan that promised to be the answer to all her prayers. Under this pretext, she signed the “loan” documents – and unwittingly signed away ownership of her home.

After two years of discovery, mediation, and winning some issues on summary judgment, Legal Aid attorneys Jack Lloyd and Sarah Tackett took the case to trial. Sharon had her day in court and was awarded a $1,000,000 judgment. Sharon was tearfully overjoyed – she can now keep her dream home!

Preventing Homelessness in North Carolina

Legal Aid of North Carolina prevents homelessness through several different types of housing cases. Muhammad’s story of unsafe housing and unjust treatment is typical of many of our clients:

Muhammad lived with his three young children in a rental home that was in severe disrepair. Determined to provide a stable and safe home for his family, he asked his landlord to make necessary repairs. The response: vacate in 30 days or be evicted! Afraid of facing homelessness with his three kids in tow and an eviction on his record, he called Legal Aid for help. After hearing about the horrifying conditions of the property, an attorney talked to Muhammad about his rights as a renter. Empowered by his lawyer’s advice, Muhammad filed his own action for damages against the landlord with a pro bono attorney providing expert assistance along the way. Muhammad was successful! He was awarded $5,000 in damages and given enough time to find a suitable new home for his family.

Starting Over After a Storm

With the help of Don Pocock and Chelsea Barnes, both volunteer lawyers from Nelson Mullins Riley & Scarborough LLP in Winston-Salem, Amy from Kernersville can now rebuild her life after a tropical storm destroyed her mobile home.

Before the storm, Amy knew that the dead trees on the mobile home lot were going to cause trouble. She contacted the landlord, who acknowledged that the trees were a problem but refused to cut them down. When Tropical Storm Michael came through in October, a tree inevitably fell on her mobile home - making it unlivable!

That's when Amy contacted Legal Aid. Disaster Legal Services project volunteers Pocock and Barnes heroically took on the case and demanded $12,000 for the client's loss. After some back and forth between the landlord and his insurance company, Amy received a check for the full $12,000. This award will offer Amy the stability she needs to rebuild her home and her life after the storm.

Our Disaster Legal Services Project helps disaster survivors overcome the legal barriers that stand in the way of a full and just recovery.

Veteran Receives Help At Last

Samuel served in the Army in the mid-1970s, and he witnessed the death of a fellow soldier. The traumatic event led to severe mental health consequences for Samuel. He felt immense guilt and needed help in coping with the aftermath.

Samuel's claims for compensation were denied because his military records contained no mention of the other soldier's death. Samuel went to many different sources asking for help - but no one could find proof that the traumatic event took place. It seemed that nobody believed Samuel's story. Desperate, Samuel went to Legal Aid for help.

Veterans Law Project attorney Daniel J. Dore believed Samuel. Dore began a campaign of old-fashioned gumshoe detective work. Eventually he uncovered an evidentiary holy grail in a back page article run in a defunct newspaper's microfiche database on file at a public library. This obscure article led to new evidence and a new claim submitted to the VA.

Samuel's voice was heard! The claim was successful. He will now receive the benefits he earned as a veteran including $45,932 in back payments and an estimated $118,000 over the next ten years.

Samuel can begin a new chapter of his life with the support of Legal Aid of North Carolina and the VA behind him.

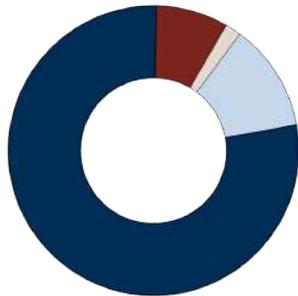

Across all practice areas, nearly 2,000 veteran households were served in 2018

"Civil legal problems – from threatened evictions to other-than-honorable discharges from the military – are often the greatest obstacles to a veteran's health, housing, stability, and productivity." - National Center for Medical-Legal Partnership, The Invisible Battlefield: Veterans Facing Health-Harming Legal Needs in Civilian Life (June 2016)

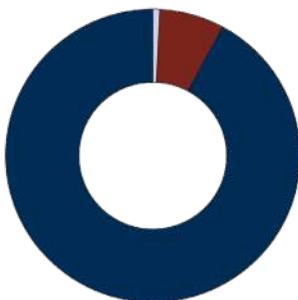

We help low-income veterans overcome legal barriers that prevent them from living fulfilling, successful lives. Veterans are served either by our accomplished generalist attorneys or by our experts at the Veterans Law Project who can assist with service-based issues such as: disability compensation, pension benefits, VA overpayments and discharge upgrades, including upgrades involving post-traumatic stress disorder, traumatic brain injury or military sexual trauma.

LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

About the Legal Services Corporation

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) was established by Congress in 1974 to promote equal access to justice. LSC operates as an independent 501(c)(3) non-profit corporation and currently serves as the single largest funder of civil legal aid for low-income Americans. More than 93% of LSC's total funding is currently distributed to 133 independent non-profit legal aid programs with more than 800 offices across America. LSC's mission is to help provide high-quality civil legal aid to low-income people. To learn more about LSC, please visit www.lsc.gov.

| Executive Summary |

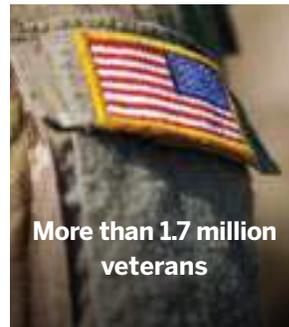

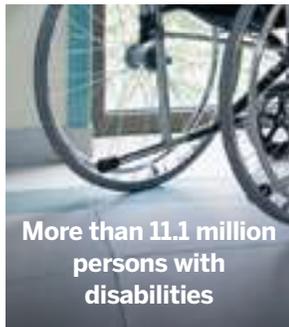

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) contracted with NORC at the University of Chicago to help measure the justice gap among low-income Americans in 2017. LSC defines the justice gap as the difference between the civil legal needs of low-income Americans and the resources available to meet those needs. NORC conducted a survey of approximately 2,000 adults living in households at or below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level (FPL) using its nationally representative, probability-based AmeriSpeak® Panel. This report presents findings based on this survey and additional data LSC collected from the legal aid organizations it funds.

86% of the civil legal problems reported by low-income Americans in the past year received inadequate or no legal help.

In the past year, 71% of low-income households experienced at least one civil legal problem, including problems with domestic violence, veterans' benefits, disability access, housing conditions, and health care.

In 2017, low-income Americans will approach LSC-funded legal aid organizations for support with an estimated 1.7 million problems. They will receive only limited or no legal help for more than half of these problems because of a lack of resources.

More than 60 million Americans have family incomes at or below 125% of FPL, including:

Data Source: U.S. Bureau of the Census, American Community Survey, 2015 1-year estimates

Key Findings: Experience with Civil Legal Problems

Data Source: 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey

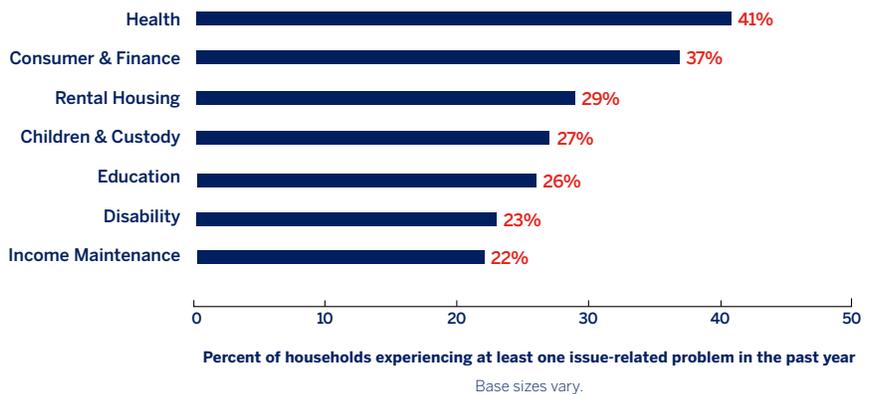

71% of low-income households have experienced a civil legal problem in the past year. The rate is even higher for some: households with survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault (97%), with parents/guardians of kids under 18 (80%), and with disabled persons (80%).

1 in 4 low-income households has experienced 6+ civil legal problems in the past year, including 67% of households with survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault.

7 in 10 low-income Americans with recent personal experience of a civil legal problem say a problem has significantly affected their lives.

71% of households with veterans or other military personnel have experienced a civil legal problem in the past year. They face the same types of problems as others, but 13% also report problems specific to veterans.

Common Civil Legal Problem Areas

Key Findings: Seeking Legal Help

Data Source: 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey

Low-income Americans seek professional legal help for only 20% of the civil legal problems they face.

Top reasons for not seeking professional legal help are:

- Deciding to deal with a problem on one's own
- Not knowing where to look for help or what resources might exist
- Not being sure whether their problem is "legal"

Low-income Americans are most likely to seek professional legal help on problems that are more obviously "legal," like custody issues and wills/estates.

Key Findings: Reports from the Field

Data Source: LSC 2017 Intake Census and LSC 2016 Grantee Activity Reports

The 133 LSC-funded legal aid organizations across the United States, Puerto Rico, and territories will serve an estimated 1 million low-income Americans in 2017, but will be able to fully address the civil legal needs of only about half of them.

Among the low-income Americans receiving help from LSC-funded legal aid organizations, the top three types of civil legal problems relate to family, housing, and income maintenance.

In 2017, low-income Americans will receive limited or no legal help for an estimated 1.1 million eligible problems after seeking help from LSC-funded legal aid organizations.

A lack of available resources accounts for the vast majority (85% - 97%) of civil legal problems that LSC-funded organizations do not fully address.

Special Focus

The Special Focus section of this report presents key findings for several groups of interest.

| Introduction |

The phrase “with liberty and justice for all” in the U.S. Pledge of Allegiance represents the idea that everyone should have access to justice, not just those who can afford legal representation. In criminal cases, legal assistance is a right. Americans accused of a crime are appointed legal counsel if they cannot afford it. As a general matter, however, there is no right to counsel in civil matters. As a result, many low-income Americans “go it alone” without legal representation in disputes where they risk losing their job, their livelihood, their home, or their children, or seek a restraining order against an abuser.

This “justice gap” – the difference between the civil legal needs of low-income Americans and the resources available to meet those needs – has stretched into a gulf.¹ State courts across the country are overwhelmed with unrepresented litigants. In 2015, for example, an estimated 1.8 million people appeared in the New York State courts without a lawyer.² And we know that 98% of tenants in eviction cases and 95% of parents in child support cases were unrepresented in these courts in 2013.³ Comparable numbers can be found in courts across the United States.

This study explores the extent of the justice gap in 2017, describing the volume of civil legal needs faced by low-income Americans, assessing the extent to which they seek and receive help, and measuring the size of the gap between their civil legal needs and the resources available to address these needs.

The justice gap is the difference between the civil legal needs of low-income Americans and the resources available to meet those needs.

Background

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) was created by Congress in 1974 with the mission to expand access to the civil justice system for low-income Americans. LSC supports civil legal aid organizations across the country, which in turn provide legal assistance to low-income Americans grappling with civil legal issues relating to essential human needs, such as safe housing and work environments, access to health care, safeguards against financial exploitation, and assistance with family issues such as protection from abusive relationships, child support, and custody.

In 2005 and 2009, LSC published studies measuring the justice gap.⁴ Both were consistent in finding that about 50% of people who approached LSC-funded legal aid organizations for help did not receive help because of insufficient resources. The 2009 Report, Documenting the Justice Gap in America, also found that many courts were seeing increased numbers of unrepresented litigants.

LSC's two previous reports on the justice gap used three approaches to describe the gap:

- An intake census – a count of people seeking assistance from LSC grantees who were not served because of a lack of resources;
- A review of state-level studies about access to civil justice and about unrepresented litigants in state and local courts; and
- A comparison of the ratio of legal aid attorneys per capita for low-income Americans with the ratio of all private attorneys per capita for all Americans.

These approaches permitted analysis that shed light on the scarcity of resources and the expressed needs that go unmet. But they left key questions unanswered about the civil legal needs experienced by low-income Americans who do not seek professional legal help and about the paths they take when facing a civil legal problem (with or without the help of LSC-funded legal aid organizations).

The 2017 Justice Gap report seeks to answer these questions. It includes analysis of data from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey, which is the first national household survey on the justice gap in over 20 years. The most recent national study that assessed the justice gap with a household survey was conducted by the Institute for Survey Research at Temple University in 1994, with funding from the American Bar Association.⁵ Since that time, a number of individual states have also conducted justice gap studies.⁶ Notably, the Washington State Supreme Court conducted a study in 2014 (refreshing work completed in 2003), which took a comprehensive look at the civil legal needs of the state's low-income households.⁷ The Washington State work served as a point of departure for the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey, which is described in more detail below.

This report also presents analysis of data from LSC's 2017 Intake Census. LSC asked its 133 grantee programs to participate in an "intake census" during a six-week period spanning March and April 2017. As part of this census, grantees tracked the number of individuals approaching them for help with a civil legal problem whom they were unable to serve, able to serve to some extent (but not fully), and able to serve fully. Grantees recorded the type of assistance individuals received and categorized the reasons individuals were not fully served where applicable. LSC sent the resulting data to NORC for analysis. The findings presented in this report are based on data from the LSC grantees that receive Basic Field Grants. See Appendix B4 for more information about the LSC 2017 Intake Census and how the data are used in this report.

In addition to the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey and LSC's 2017 Intake Census, this report uses data from the U.S. Census Bureau's American Community Survey (ACS). More information about the ACS data used can be found in Appendix B1. Finally, this report uses data from LSC's 2016 Grantee Activity Reports, and more information about these data can be found in Appendix B4. Where the report relies on other data sources, this is referenced in endnotes as appropriate.

The 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey

LSC contracted with NORC at the University of Chicago to conduct a survey of more than 2,000 adults living in low-income households using its nationally representative, probability-based AmeriSpeak® Panel. For the purposes of the survey, "low-income households" are households at or below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level (FPL), the income eligibility standard for people seeking assistance from an LSC-funded legal aid program. The survey was administered using telephone and web interview modes, which allowed a flexible survey logic to gather detailed information about low-income Americans' civil legal needs at the individual level, household level, and level of specific civil legal problems.

The survey was designed to accomplish the following goals:

- Measure the prevalence of civil legal problems in low-income households in the past 12 months;
- Assess the degree to which individuals with civil legal problems sought help for those problems;
- Describe the types and sources of help that low-income individuals sought for their civil legal problems;
- Evaluate low-income Americans' attitudes and perceptions about the fairness and efficacy of the civil legal system; and
- Permit analysis of how experiences with civil legal issues, help-seeking behavior, and perceptions vary with demographic characteristics.

This report uses data from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey to provide insight into the extent of the justice gap in 2017. It does not present or discuss all of the findings from the survey. Readers are encouraged to see the accompanying survey report that presents results from the entire 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey. Additionally, the survey instrument and data will be made publicly available.

More details on the survey and the AmeriSpeak® Panel can be found in Appendix A and also at www.lsc.gov/justicegap2017.

The units of analysis and the base sizes for the survey results presented throughout this report vary. Some results are based on respondents (or their households), some are based on their civil legal problems, and others are based on subsets of respondents, households, or problems. Readers are encouraged to pay close attention to information describing the units of analysis and which sets of observations comprise the relevant bases for results. Wherever a result is based on a variable containing a small number of observations ($n < 100$), we indicate this with a special endnote, “SB-X” (where “SB” stands for “small base” and “X” corresponds to the endnote number in this series).

Report Overview

The core findings of this report are organized in four sections:

Section 1: Low-income America | Using current data from the U.S. Census Bureau and other sources, this section describes the low-income population in America. More specifically, it explores how many people live in households below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level (FPL), how they are distributed across the U.S., and how key demographics like education and racial and ethnic background are distributed among them.

Section 2: Experience with Civil Legal Problems | Using data from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey, this section presents findings on the prevalence of civil legal problems among low-income households, the types of problems they face, and the degree to which civil legal problems affect their lives.

Section 3: Seeking Legal Help | Using data from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey, this section presents findings on which types of problems are most likely to receive legal attention, where people turn for legal help, what types of legal assistance they receive, and the reasons why people do not seek legal help.

Section 4: Reports from the Field | Using data from LSC’s 2017 Intake Census and 2016 Grantee Activity Reports, this section presents findings on the assistance low-income Americans receive after seeking help from a legal aid organization funded by LSC.

The report concludes with a “Special Focus” section. This section presents key findings for six groups that are highlighted throughout the report. These groups include seniors, persons with disabilities, veterans, parents and guardians of minor children, rural residents, and survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault. At the end of Sections 1, 2, and 3, we include a page that presents related findings for these groups.⁸ The findings for these highlighted groups are then summarized in this final “Special Focus” section of the report.

Client stories are presented throughout the report. These are meant to help readers understand the types of problems faced by low-income Americans. The stories were collected by LSC, primarily through searches of grantees’ annual reports and websites, but also through specific requests to grantees for such stories. These stories were first edited by LSC’s Government Relations and Public Affairs unit and vetted by the corresponding grantees for accuracy. NORC later completed additional minor edits to the stories in an effort to shorten them for inclusion in this report. In this report, the names have been changed to protect the identity of individuals. Likewise, the accompanying photos are not of the actual clients.

Study Findings in Brief

The findings presented in this report add important, new insights to the growing body of literature on the justice gap. We find that seven of every 10 low-income households have experienced at least one civil legal problem in the past year. A full 70% of low-income Americans with civil legal problems reported that at least one of their problems affected them very much or severely. They seek legal help, however, for only 20% of their civil legal problems. Many who do not seek legal help report concerns about the cost of such help, not being sure if their issues are legal in nature, and not knowing where to look for help.

In 2017, low-income Americans will approach LSC-funded legal aid organizations for help with an estimated 1.7 million civil legal problems. They will receive legal help of some kind for 59% of these problems, but are expected to receive enough help to fully address their legal needs for only 28% to 38% of them. More than half (53% to 70%) of the problems that low-income Americans bring to LSC grantees will receive limited legal help or no legal help at all because of a lack of resources to serve them.

Based on the analysis presented in this report, we have three key findings relating to the magnitude of the justice gap in 2017:

- Eighty-six percent of the civil legal problems faced by low-income Americans in a given year receive inadequate or no legal help (see Section 3);
- Of the estimated 1.7 million civil legal problems for which low-income Americans seek LSC-funded legal aid, 1.0 to 1.2 million (62% to 72%) receive inadequate or no legal assistance (see Section 4),⁹
- In 2017, low-income Americans will likely not get their legal needs fully met for between 907,000 and 1.2 million civil legal problems that they bring to LSC-funded legal aid programs, due to limited resources among LSC grantees. This represents the vast majority (85% to 97%) of all of the problems receiving limited or no legal assistance from LSC grantees (see Section 4).

Low-income America

As a general rule, LSC funds may be used only to serve the legal needs of people with family incomes at or below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level.¹⁰ This section describes this population of Americans. It explores how many people have family incomes at this level, how they are distributed across the U.S., and some key demographics of this population.

About the Data

Most of the population estimates presented in this section come from the 2015 American Community Survey (ACS) Single Year Estimates.¹¹ Note that the ACS reports on people with family incomes below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level rather than at or below this income level (which is how income eligibility for LSC-funded services is defined). Occasionally, other data sources are also used and are noted accordingly. The unit of analysis in this section is individuals.

More than 60 million Americans have family incomes below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level.

A family income below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level (FPL) corresponds to $30,750 per year or less for a family of four.¹² Based on recent estimates from the Census Bureau, nearly one in five Americans (19%) have family incomes below 125% of FPL. This comes to about 60 million people, including approximately 19 million children (0-17 years), 35 million adults aged 18-64 years old, and 6.4 million seniors (65+ years).^{13,14}

As Figure 1 shows, some states have higher proportions of people with family incomes below 125% of FPL. The states with the highest proportions of people in low-income families include Mississippi (28%), New Mexico (26%), Arkansas (25%), and Louisiana (24%). Looking at population counts, a few other states stand out. For example, California alone has 7.7 million people with family incomes below 125% of FPL and Texas has 5.7 million people.¹⁵ Appendix B1 presents the population counts and proportions for all states in the U.S.

Most American adults with family incomes below 125% of FPL do not have any college education.

There is great disparity in education levels by income. About 62% of low-income Americans aged 25 years or older have no more than a high school education. Americans of the same age with higher family incomes are nearly three times more likely to have graduated from college (34% vs. 12%).¹⁷ Existing literature on the justice gap suggests that educational background is important for understanding access to justice.¹⁸

88% of low-income adults do not have a college degree, including 62% who have no more than a high school education.

While low-income Americans come from very diverse racial and ethnic backgrounds, a plurality identify as white (with no Hispanic origin).

Forty-four percent of Americans with family incomes below 125% of FPL identify themselves as white and claim no Hispanic origin. Another 28% identify as Hispanic, and 21% identify as black with no Hispanic origin. Four percent identify as Asian, 1% as American Indian, 8% as another race, and 4% as two or more races.¹⁹ The life experiences of people with different racial and ethnic backgrounds are thought to be important for understanding people's likelihood to trust institutions and to seek civil legal assistance.²⁰

| Special Focus |

Millions of Americans from the various groups highlighted in this report have family incomes below 125% of FPL. This page presents population estimates for the number of low-income people for each group wherever such estimates are available. No such estimates are available for recent survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault, but we cite other information that speaks to rates of such violence among low-income Americans.

Seniors

Approximately 6.4 million seniors have family incomes below 125% of FPL.²¹

Rural Residents

Approximately 10 million people living in rural areas of the U.S. have family incomes below 125% of FPL.²²

Veterans

More than an estimated 1.7 million veterans have family incomes below 125% of FPL.²³

Persons with Disabilities

More than 11.1 million people with a disability have family incomes below 125% of FPL.²⁴

Parents/Guardians of Children under 18

Approximately 18 million families with related children under 18 have incomes below 125% FPL.²⁵

Survivors of Domestic Violence/Sexual Assault

Rates of intimate partner violence among people with family incomes at or below 100% of FPL are about four times the rates among people with incomes at or above 400% of FPL.²⁶

Experience with Civil Legal Problems

A large majority of low-income American households face civil legal problems in their everyday lives. These problems are most often related to basic needs like health care, safety, making ends meet, and housing. Using data from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey of low-income households, this chapter presents findings on the prevalence of civil legal problems among these households, the types of problems they face, and how civil legal problems affect their lives.

About the Data

The findings presented in this section come from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey. Respondents were presented with an extensive list of specific problems that typically raise civil legal issues. They were asked whether they had experienced any of these problems in the past 12 months and whether anyone else in their household had. While not all of the reported problems would be able to be addressed through civil legal action, the resulting data make it possible to estimate how common various civil legal problems are at the household level. A total of 88 distinct problems (divided into 12 main categories) were explored in the survey. The primary unit of analysis in this section is households.

A large majority of low-income American households face civil legal problems.

The 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey assessed the prevalence of various types of problems that typically raise “justiciable civil legal issues,” that is, issues that could be addressed through civil legal action. This is consistent with standard practice in the literature for measuring the prevalence of civil legal problems. While an in-depth interview with a legal professional would reveal that some of the problems reported by respondents are not actually justiciable, most will be. For ease of reporting, and to be consistent with established literature, we refer to these problems as “civil legal problems” throughout this and the next section.

71% of low-income households have experienced at least one civil legal problem in the past year.

Seventy-one percent of low-income households have experienced at least one civil legal problem in the past year. Many of these households have had to deal with several issues. Indeed, more than half (54%) faced at least two civil legal problems and about one in four (24%) has faced six or more in the past year alone. The civil legal problems these Americans face are most often related to basic needs like getting access to health care, staying in their homes, and securing safe living conditions for their families.

Common civil legal problems among low-income households relate to issues of health, finances, rental housing, children and custody, education, income maintenance, and disability.

As Figure 2 shows, civil legal problems related to health and to consumer and finance issues affect more households than any other type of issue. Health issues, for example, affect more than two in five (41%) low-income households. The most common problems in this area include having trouble with debt collection for health procedures (affecting 17% of households), having health insurance that would not cover medically needed care or medications (17%), and being billed incorrectly for medical services (14%).

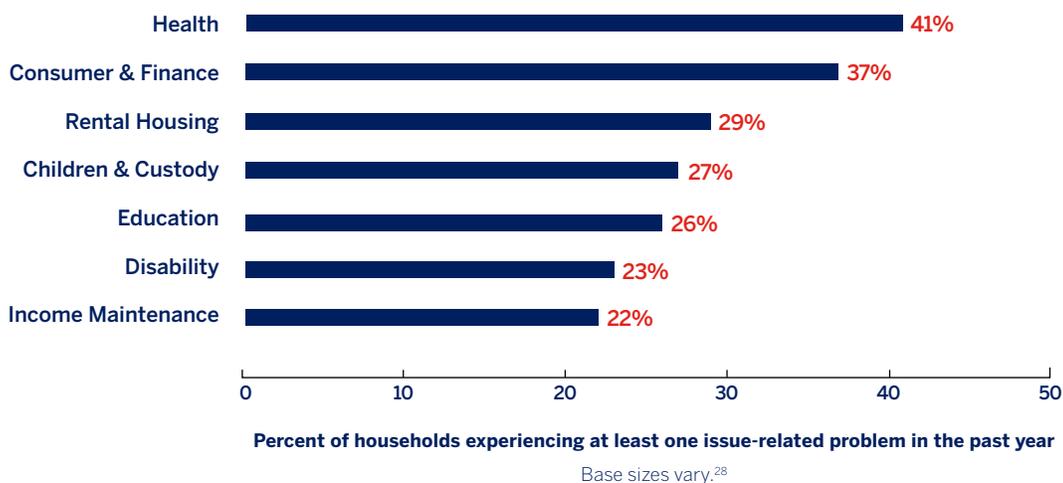

Over one-third (37%) of low-income households have experienced consumer and finance problems in the past year. These issues typically follow from not being able to make payments for debt or utilities on time. The most common issues in this area include difficulties with creditors or collection agencies (affecting 16% of households), having utilities disconnected due to nonpayment or a billing dispute (14%), and having problems buying or paying for a car, including repossession (8%).

Other common categories of civil legal problems include rental housing, children and custody, and education. Each of these problem categories affects more than one in four low-income households in which the issue is relevant (e.g., rental housing problems affect 29% of households living in a rented home). Income maintenance and disability issues affect one in five issue-relevant households.

Ronald | Louisiana | Consumer and Finance | Ronald needed legal help when FEMA filed a claim against him for repayment of disaster funds issued after Hurricane Katrina. He had never even applied for, much less received, any FEMA funds. FEMA seized his income tax refund and told him he had to pay an additional $8,000. With the help of legal aid, Ronald was able to demonstrate that the funds in question had been issued to someone else. FEMA dismissed the claim and returned the money wrongfully seized from Ronald's accounts.

Rental Housing | A full 29% of households living in a rented home have experienced a related civil legal problem in the past year. Such problems include having a landlord fail to provide basic services or repairs (affecting 16% of rental households), having a dispute with a landlord or public housing authority over rules or terms of a lease (11%), and living in unsafe rental housing (9%).

Children and Custody | Twenty-seven percent of households with parents or guardians of children under the age of 18 have experienced a civil legal problem related to children or custody in the past year. Related problems include difficulty collecting child support payments or setting up a child support obligation (affecting 13% of these households), being investigated by Child Protective Services (9%), and having trouble with custody or visitation arrangements (8%).

Education | Twenty-six percent of households with someone who is in school or someone who has a child in school have experienced at least one civil legal problem related to education in the past year. Problems in this area include being denied access to special education services or problems with access to learning accommodations (affecting 15% of these households), attending a school that was unsafe or had problems with bullying (9%), and being suspended from school (7%).

Disability | Twenty-three percent of low-income households where someone lives with disability report at least one civil legal problem related to disability in the past year. The most common problems are being denied state or federal disability benefits or services or having them reduced or terminated (affecting 14% of these households) and being denied or experiencing limited access to public programs, activities, or services because no reasonable accommodation was made (8%).

Income Maintenance | Twenty-two percent of low-income households have experienced at least one problem related to income maintenance in the past year. Related problems include not being approved for state government assistance or having that assistance reduced or terminated (affecting 15% of households), being denied or terminated from Social Security Disability income (SSDI) or Social Security Survivors benefit (6%), and being denied or terminated from Supplemental Security Income (SSI) (6%).

Other Types of Civil Legal Problems

Other areas where low-income Americans report civil legal problems include the following:

Employment. Civil legal problems related to employment affect 19% of all low-income households. Problems include being terminated from a job for unfair reasons (8%), having a workplace grievance not taken seriously or not adequately addressed (7%), and being exposed to working conditions that were physically unsafe or unhealthy (7%).

Family. Civil legal problems related to family affect 17% of all low-income households. Problems include experiencing domestic violence or sexual assault (8%), filing for divorce or legal separation (5%), and situations where a vulnerable adult has been taken advantage of or abused (4%).

Homeownership. Civil legal problems related to homeownership affect 14% of low-income homeowners. Problems include falling several payments behind on a mortgage (9%) and having a home go into foreclosure (5%).

Veterans' Issues. Civil legal problems related to veterans' issues affect 13% of low-income households with veterans or other military personnel. Problems include difficulty getting medical care for service-related health conditions (9%), being denied service-related benefits (8%), and problems with discharge status (4%).

Wills and Estates. Civil legal problems related to wills and estates affect 9% of all low-income households. Problems include needing help drawing up a legal document like a will or advance directive (7%) and needing help with probate or administering an estate, trust, or will (5%).

Civil legal problems affect people's lives.

Civil legal problems can have a substantial impact on people's lives. Many of the civil legal problems low-income Americans face relate to life-essential matters like losing a home, dealing with debt, or managing a health issue. There are also less direct, yet important, ways these problems affect people's lives. For example, other research has shown that the stress of dealing with civil legal issues can lead to mental health conditions like anxiety and depression, which further complicate the situations of the families affected.²⁹ Many civil legal problems, like having unsafe housing and losing benefits to buy food, can also pose a threat to physical health.

For each issue that respondents indicated they had personally experienced within the last 12 months, the survey asked them to rate the effect the problem had on them on a five-point scale from "not at all" to "severe." Seventy percent of low-income Americans who personally experienced a civil legal problem in the past year, say at least one of the problems has affected them "very much" or "severely." This amounts to more than half (55%) of all the problems personally experienced by low-income Americans. The types of problems most likely to have a substantial impact are those related to veterans' issues (85%),^{SB-1} income maintenance (65%), employment (65%), rental housing (63%), and family (62%). See Figure 3 below.

Jill | Indiana | Housing | Jill, a senior and legal guardian of two young granddaughters, faced possible homelessness. Jill's sole income came from Social Security Disability benefits, which qualified her for Section 8 subsidized housing. When Jill's apartment was cited for not meeting Section 8 standards, the landlord refused to make the repairs, and the housing authority stopped its payments. The landlord filed an eviction notice for failure to pay rent despite Jill's attempts to continue paying her portion of the rent. A legal aid attorney represented Jill in small claims court, and Jill and her two granddaughters were allowed to stay in the apartment while she searched for another suitable place to live. Without an eviction on her record, Jill retained her Section 8 eligibility and found a new, safe home for her granddaughters.

With the help of legal aid attorneys, Misty's third application for disability benefits was expedited and shortly thereafter, she received a favorable decision. The decision, which granted her $700 per month, also granted her Medicaid, which allowed her to secure a Ventricular Assist Device that has allowed her to live a more full life with her family again.

| Special Focus | Civil legal problems are common among the groups highlighted in this report, and many have experienced multiple problems. Households with survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault are particularly likely to experience civil legal problems. Ninety-seven percent have experienced at least one problem in addition to their problems related to violence. Additionally, compared to other households, households with survivors tend to face more problems in a year and are more likely to experience problems in most of the issue areas covered in the survey.

Seeking Legal Help

While most low-income Americans face at least one civil legal problem in a given year, only one in five seeks help from a legal professional. Using data from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey, this section presents findings on which types of problems are most likely to receive legal attention, where people turn for legal help, what types of legal assistance they receive, and reasons why so many people do not seek legal help. One noteworthy finding from this section is that 86% of the civil legal problems faced by low-income Americans in a given year receive inadequate or no legal help.

About the Data

The findings presented in this section come from a section of the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey that asked detailed questions about a subset of the civil legal problems reported by respondents. For each respondent, the survey randomly selected up to four personally-experienced problems affecting them more than “not at all.” Due to the low incidence of problems relating to veterans’ issues and disabilities, these problems were always selected if they met the other criteria. Respondents answered questions about what, if any, help they sought to address each of these problems. The unit of analysis in this section is problems.

Low-income Americans do not seek the help of legal professionals for most of their civil legal problems.

Low-income Americans report seeking the help of a legal professional for only 20% of their problems. Interestingly, people are only slightly more likely to seek professional legal help for problems that substantially affect them (24% of problems that affect them very much or severely) compared to problems that do not affect them much (17% of problems that affect them moderately or slightly).

Additionally, while we might expect to see differences in help-seeking behavior across education levels, low-income Americans with less education are only slightly less likely to seek professional legal help for their civil legal problems. Those with no more than a high school education seek professional legal help for 19% of their civil legal problems, and people with more education seek it for 22% of their civil legal problems. In fact, none of the differences observed by educational attainment are statistically significant.

Low-income Americans seek professional legal help for only 20% of the civil legal problems they face.

Low-income Americans get inadequate or no professional legal help for most of the civil legal problems they face.

Low-income Americans say they have received or expect to receive as much legal help as they need for 69% of the problems where they sought professional legal help. While this is a promising result, it is important to remember that they seek professional legal help for only 20% of their problems. Additionally, some respondents indicate that they tried to get professional legal help but were unable to do so.³¹ Taking all of this together, we find that low-income Americans receive inadequate or no professional legal help for 86% of their civil legal problems in a given year.³²

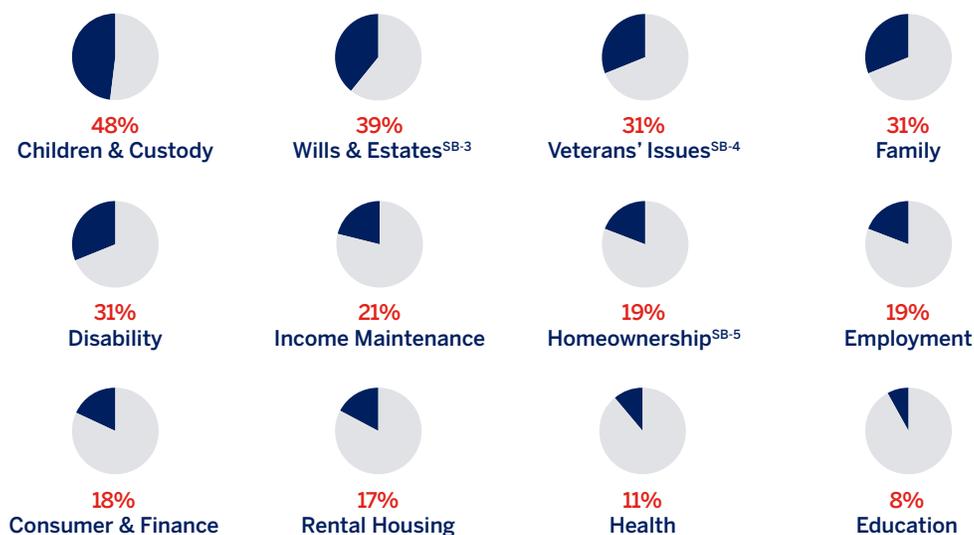

Low-income Americans receive inadequate or no professional legal help for 86% of the civil legal problems they face in a given year.

People are more likely to seek professional legal help for problems that are more plainly “legal” in nature.

People are most likely to seek professional legal help for problems related to children and custodial issues and wills and estates. Low-income Americans seek such help for 48% of their civil legal problems related to children and custody and for 39% of their problems related to wills and estates.^{SB-3} Of all the civil legal problems explored in the survey, the ones in these categories are more obviously “legal.” Issues relating to children and child custody, for example, usually have to be decided or approved by a judge. Similarly, issues dealing with wills and estates involve legal paperwork and often lawyers as well.

While civil legal problems related to health issues and consumer and finance issues are the most commonly experienced problems among low-income Americans, they are not the problem areas most likely to get attention from a legal professional. As Figure 4 shows, people seek professional legal help for only 18% of their civil legal problems related to consumer and finance and for only 11% of those related to health.

Percent of issue-related problems for which professional legal help is sought

Base sizes vary.

Low-income Americans who seek professional legal help rely on a variety of sources and most often receive help in the form of legal advice.

People who seek the help of a legal professional rely on various sources. They most often turn to legal aid organizations (30% of problems), paid private attorneys (29%), and social or human services organizations (24%). They go to volunteer attorneys 11% of the time and to disability service providers 10% of the time. Finally, low-income Americans reach out for help through legal hotlines for 8% of their civil legal problems.

As Figure 5 shows, when people get help from legal professionals, they are most likely to receive this help in the form of legal advice. Two in five (40%) problems receiving some sort of professional legal help are addressed with legal advice. People report receiving assistance filling out legal documents or forms for 21% of these problems, being represented by a legal professional in court for 20% of them, and getting help negotiating a legal case for 14% of them.

The legal services that people receive vary for at least two reasons. Of course, different types of problems require different types of help and to varying degrees. The help people receive also varies according to what resources might be available to help them address their specific civil legal needs. In the next section, discussion about the work of LSC grantees sheds light on how limited resources means that some cases receive more attention from legal aid professionals than others.

Michaela | New Jersey | Veterans | Michaela is a lifelong New Jersey resident, always living there except for six years serving in the armed forces in the 1990s. While stationed in Alabama, she divorced, but a name change was not included in the divorce. As a result, when she returned to New Jersey after her service ended, she was compelled to obtain a driver's license using her married name. Michaela used her maiden name in all other matters, causing issues in the various aspects of her life that involve identification (e.g., finances, utilities, leases, etc.). A legal aid attorney represented Michaela in a name change, permitting her to resume use of her maiden name and to once and for all clarify her identification in all aspects of her life.

When people do not seek professional legal help, they often turn to other resources.

Low-income Americans do not seek professional legal help for 78% of the civil legal problems they face in a given year. When someone does not seek such help, they turn to other resources about half of the time (for 54% of problems for which professional legal help is not sought). They speak with others who are not legal professionals (commonly friends and family members) for 33% of these problems, search for information online for 13% of these problems, or take both of these actions for 8% of these problems. When people search for information online, they often search for legal information about procedures to resolve a specific civil legal problem, legal rights on specific issues, or how to get legal assistance.³⁵

Many people do not seek legal help because they think they can handle their problems on their own or because they do not know where to turn for help.

Combining the survey results on seeking professional legal help with those on searching for legal information online, we find that low-income Americans do not seek either type of legal help for 72% of the civil legal problems they face in a given year. Their reasons for not seeking either type of legal help or information are varied. See Figure 6. The most common reason is that they decide to deal with the problem on their own. This is cited 24% of the time. This is consistent with previous studies that find that many people are inclined to believe they can take care of their civil legal problems on their own.³⁶ The next most common type of reason relates to not knowing where to look for help or what resources might be available. People cite this type of reason 22% of the time.

Not seeing their problem as a “legal” problem is another major barrier to seeking legal help.

We know from other studies related to the justice gap that a major reason people do not seek legal help is because they do not perceive their civil legal problems to be legal.³⁷ We find that low-income Americans cite this reason for one in five (20%) civil legal problems where no legal help was sought. This is also consistent with the findings above showing that people are more likely to seek professional legal help for issues that are more plainly legal in nature like custody issues and wills, and less likely to do so for problems like health and finances, which are not as obviously legal.

Other reasons people give for not seeking legal help are being concerned about the cost of seeking such help (14%), not having time (13%), and being afraid to pursue legal action (12%). See Figure 6.

Views of the justice system do not seem to influence whether or not one seeks legal help.

The survey asked respondents the following three questions to assess their perceptions of the civil legal system:

- To what extent do you think people like you have the ability to use the courts to protect yourself and your family or to enforce your rights?
- To what extent do you think people like you are treated fairly in the civil legal system?
- To what extent do you think the civil legal system can help people like you solve important problems such as those you identified in this survey?

We compared people offering more positive views with those offering more negative views to see if there are any noteworthy differences in their patterns of seeking legal help. More specifically, we compared people to see if those holding certain perceptions would be more or less likely than others to seek legal help for at least one of their civil legal problems explored in depth in the survey. They are not. Low-income Americans who view the system in a more negative light are no more or less likely to seek professional legal help or to search for legal information online. See Figure 7.

| Special Focus | Rates of seeking professional legal help do not vary much across the groups highlighted in this report.⁴⁰ All seek such help for only about one in five of their civil legal problems. For most, the two most common reasons for not seeking legal help are not knowing where to look and deciding to deal with the problem on their own. The only exception is recent survivors of domestic violence or sexual assault, who cite not being sure if a problem was a legal issue 31% of the time. Also noteworthy is that seniors are more likely than others to cite not having time as a reason for not seeking legal help.

Reports from the Field

The previous section explored the demand side of the justice gap. This section explores the supply side. Using data from LSC's 2017 Intake Census, this section presents findings on the assistance low-income Americans receive after seeking help from an LSC-funded legal aid organization. One key finding is that, given the number of low-income Americans who are expected to seek help in 2017, LSC grantees will not be able to provide adequate legal assistance for an estimated 1 million civil legal problems due to a lack of resources.

About the Data

Most of the findings in this section are based on analysis of the data collected during LSC's 2017 Intake Census. For six weeks in March and April 2017, LSC grantees tracked the individuals who contacted them seeking assistance with civil legal problems. Individuals coming to LSC grantees with problems were grouped into three main categories: unable to serve, able to serve to some extent (but not fully), and able to serve fully.⁴¹ The resulting data permit estimates of the rates at which people seeking legal help for a problem from LSC-funded legal aid organizations receive the legal assistance necessary to meet their needs. The unit of analysis in this section is problems.⁴²

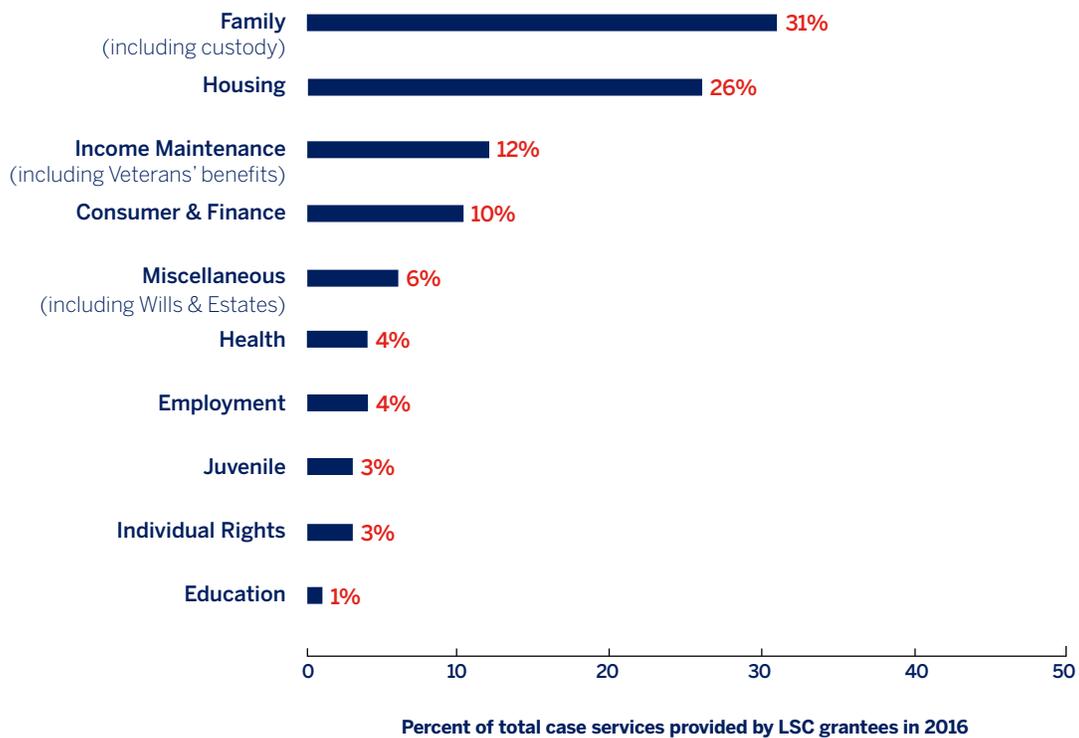

More than half of the problems receiving legal case services from LSC-funded legal aid programs involve family and housing issues.

As a general rule, to be eligible for LSC-funded legal assistance, an individual must have a family income at or below 125% of the Federal Poverty Level (FPL), and their civil legal problem cannot be related to issues for which use of LSC funds is prohibited, like abortion, euthanasia or class-action litigation.⁴³ We will refer to civil legal problems that meet these criteria as “eligible problems” or “eligible civil legal problems” throughout this section.

Not all income-eligible individuals with a legal problem receive the legal assistance they need. To maximize the use of available legal aid resources, LSC grantees develop guidelines on the types of legal problems they prioritize for service. LSC requires grantees to conduct comprehensive legal needs assessments in their communities on a regular basis to inform these guidelines. Some income-eligible individuals have problems that fall within these priority guidelines, but still do not receive the assistance they need for other reasons. We examine these instances throughout this section, trying to assess the extent to which they are shaped by a lack of resources.

The types of problems for which LSC grantees provided case services in 2016 are summarized in Figure 8.⁴⁴ Family problems, including child custody, as well as housing problems like evictions and rental repairs, form the bulk of LSC grantees' casework. The reader will notice that the distribution across the problem categories reported by LSC grantees is different from the distribution of problems experienced by low-income Americans that was presented in Section 2 (see Figure 2). This is due in large part to the types of problems LSC grantees prioritize as well as the fact that people are more likely to seek legal help for certain types of problems, as was discussed in Section 3.

In 2017, low-income Americans are expected to approach LSC-funded legal aid organizations for help with more than 1.7 million civil legal problems.

During LSC's six-week-long Intake Census, low-income Americans approached grantees for assistance to address nearly 196,000 eligible civil legal problems. Based on this, we project that low-income Americans will approach LSC grantees with an estimated 1.7 million eligible civil legal problems in 2017.

Our projection likely underestimates the number of eligible problems that will be brought to LSC grantees. While the vast majority (89%) of reporting grantees said their intake during this six-week period was typical in terms of the number and type of problems brought to them, 12 grantees reported they processed fewer problems than normal due to staff shortages, office closures, or other reasons. Three other grantees reported it was atypical in other ways, including one who says they experienced more traffic than usual. Additionally, one grantee (out of a 133 total grantees) did not report any data for the Intake Census and, thus, the problems they processed during the six-week period are not accounted for in the sample counts nor in the 12-month projections. Finally, LSC grantees counted individuals (not problems or case services) during the Intake Census, and it is possible that one person could seek assistance for more than one civil legal problem.

It is important to keep in mind that these estimated 1.7 million civil legal problems represent less than 6% of the total civil legal problems faced by low-income Americans. Recall from Section 3 that low-income Americans seek professional legal help for only 20% of their civil legal programs, and they turn to legal aid organizations for only 30% of the problems for which they seek such help. Taken together, this means they seek professional legal help from legal aid organizations 6% of the time. Note that this corresponds to help sought from the set of all legal aid organizations in the U.S., not just those funded by LSC.

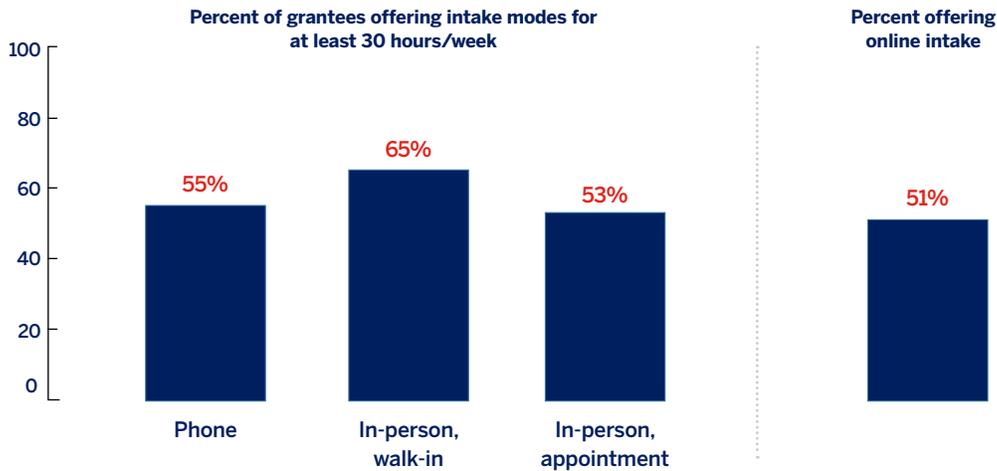

Low-income Americans likely seek the help of legal aid organizations for even more problems that do not get processed for intake.

The estimated 1.7 million problems low-income Americans will bring to LSC grantees in 2017 is more accurately described as the number of problems that LSC grantees will process for intake in 2017. There are likely other problems that people consider bringing or try to bring to an LSC grantee, but are unable to get to or through the point of intake. These situations are not captured in the Intake Census data. It is difficult to know how often this happens, but because legal aid organizations can only offer intake for so many hours and in so many ways, it is bound to happen. The types and availability of various intake modes varies across LSC grantees, depending on the resources they have at their disposal (e.g., staffing, technology, and other resources).

There are three primary intake modes currently offered by LSC-funded legal aid organizations:

- In-person: This a face-to-face interview that takes place at the legal aid program's office. This can happen on a walk-in basis or as the result of an appointment.
- Phone: This involves conducting the screening process over the phone. This often involves a mix of going through an automated process (e.g., "press two if you...") and speaking with a legal aid staff member directly.
- Online: This method involves submitting interview information via an online form or web application.

Most legal aid organizations have set hours for intake, which are scheduled times when new requests for assistance are received. Intake hours can vary for a variety of reasons, including program resources and community needs. Online options are the exception; these screening tools are usually available continuously and monitored regularly by staff during business hours.

When grantees submitted their Intake Census data to LSC, they also indicated how many hours per week they offered various intake modes (on average). Figure 9 presents the percent of LSC grantees that offer various intake modes for at least 30 hours per week and that offer online intake. Sixty-five percent of grantees offer in-person intake on a walk-in basis for at least 30 hours per week; 53% offer in-person intake by appointment for at least 30 hours per week; and 55% offer intake by phone for at least 30 hours per week. About half (51%) of LSC grantees offer online modes of intake.

[CLIENT STORY]

Donna | New York | Domestic Violence | Donna, a rural resident of New York State, suffered from severe mental health problems resulting from domestic violence and the sexual abuse of one of her children. She did not feel comfortable speaking about her situation before contacting an LSC grantee, who helped her address various civil legal problems she was facing. Specifically, the legal aid attorney helped Donna avoid a workfare sanction by the local Department of Social Services and won her SSI appeal, permanently removing her from the county welfare rolls. Donna received over $40,000 in retroactive SSI benefits, which has allowed her to establish her own home and provide a college education for her child.

Low-income Americans receive some kind of legal help for 59% of the eligible civil legal problems they bring to LSC-funded organizations.

In 2017, LSC grantees will provide some form of legal assistance for an estimated 999,600, or 59%, of eligible problems presented by low-income Americans. The type and extent of help vary, depending on the requirements and complexity of a given problem and the resources available. From the Intake Census data, we can group eligible problems for which LSC grantees provide assistance into three main categories: “fully served”; “served, but not fully”; and “served, but extent of service pending” (or, for short, “served, extent pending”). This information is summarized in Table 1 along with corresponding 12-month projections for 2017.

Total problems not served or not served fully (including pending)	72%	141,119	1,226,400

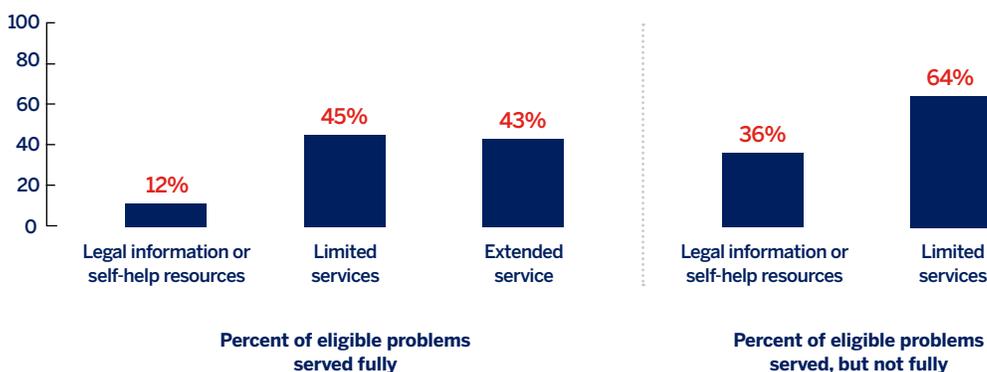

Problems fully served

LSC grantees reported they will be able to “fully serve” at least 28% of all the eligible problems low-income Americans presented during the intake census (see Table 1 above). In these instances, people receive legal assistance expected to fully address their legal needs. This can take the form of providing legal information or self-help resources (12% of fully-served problems) or of “limited services” like providing legal advice, speaking with third parties on behalf of a client, or helping to prepare legal documents (45% of fully-served problems).⁴⁹ Another 43% of fully-served problems receive “extended service,” which includes cases in which a legal aid attorney represents a client in negotiated settlements (with or without litigation), in administrative agency hearings or other administrative processes, or in a court proceeding.⁵⁰ See Figure 10.

Problems served, but not fully

Of all the eligible problems low-income Americans presented to LSC grantees during the intake census, at least 21% will receive some legal assistance, but not to the extent necessary to fully address the clients' legal needs (see Table 1 above). Help for people with these "served, not fully" problems takes the form of providing legal information or self-help resources (36% of problems served, but not fully) and "limited service" like providing legal advice, speaking with third parties on behalf of a client, or help preparing legal documents (64% of problems served, but not fully).⁵¹ See Figure 10.

Problems served, but extent of service pending

At the conclusion of the Intake Census, LSC grantees had not yet determined the level of legal assistance for 10% of eligible problems presented to them.

After seeking legal assistance from LSC grantees, low-income Americans will not receive any legal assistance for an estimated 700,000 eligible problems in 2017.

Forty-one percent of the eligible problems low-income Americans presented to LSC grantees during the intake census will not receive any legal help from grantees. This corresponds to slightly more than an estimated 700,000 problems for 2017. There are many reasons why an individual with an eligible civil legal problem might not receive legal assistance. More than half (54%) of these problems are not served because they fall outside of the guidelines grantees use to prioritize eligible problems due to limited resources. About one in four (24%) eligible problems falls within grantees' priorities, but is not served due to insufficient resources. A small portion (6%) are not served because the grantee has identified a conflict of interest. For example, the organization might already be representing another party to the dispute. Finally, 16% do not receive legal assistance for other reasons, often involving situations where contact with a client is lost.

Low-income Americans will receive insufficient or no legal help for an estimated 1.1 million eligible problems this year alone.

Estimating the number of eligible problems for which low-income Americans will receive insufficient legal help (“underserved”) or no legal help (“unserved”) requires making some assumptions. Because the extent of legal assistance provided for the problems currently categorized as “served, but extent pending” is not known, we cannot provide a simple estimate for the percent of eligible problems that receive insufficient or no legal assistance. However, by making some assumptions about the extent to which these problems will be served, we can arrive at a range of estimates. We find that between 62% and 72% of all eligible problems brought to LSC grantees either receive no legal assistance or receive a level of assistance that is not expected to fully address the client’s legal needs. That corresponds to an estimated 1.1 to 1.2 million eligible civil legal problems expected to go unserved or underserved in 2017 alone.

The 62% figure underestimates the problems unserved or underserved. It treats “served, but extent pending” problems as being “served fully.” Conversely, the 72% figure is an overestimation, treating “served, but extent pending” problems as “served, but not fully.” In reality, the rate will fall somewhere in between. See Table 1 above.

A lack of available resources accounts for the vast majority of eligible civil legal problems that go unserved or underserved.

Civil legal problems that are unserved or underserved due to limited resources account for the vast majority of the problems that do not receive the assistance necessary to fully address the client’s needs. Table 2 presents two estimates of the number of eligible problems that go unserved or underserved for this reason. Overall, we estimate that insufficient resources account for between 85% and 97% of all unserved or underserved eligible problems, representing 53% to 70% of all eligible problems. This corresponds to an estimated range of about 900,000 to 1.2 million problems for which the assistance necessary to meet the legal needs of low-income Americans cannot be provided due to a lack of resources. See Table 2.

The upper-bound estimate of 97% is likely an overestimation. Only problems that involve a conflict of interest between parties are not included, corresponding to 3% of unserved or underserved problems. In this case, we assume the worst-case scenario and count all of the “served, but extent pending” problems as served but not to the full extent necessary and attribute this to a lack of resources.

Table 2: Estimates of Eligible Problems that are Unserved or Underserved Due to a Lack of Resources⁵³

	Lower-bound	Upper-bound
Intake Census sample count	104,364	136,278
12-month projection count	907,000	1,184,300
Percent of all eligible problems	53%	70%
Percent of all eligible problems that are unserved or underserved	85%	97%

Additionally, this 97% estimate treats eligible problems that go unserved due to “other reasons” as unserved due to a lack of resources, because many of the underlying reasons could potentially be resolved or avoided if there were more resources. For example, these reasons often involve situations where legal aid staff lose touch with clients. If there were more resources to facilitate follow-up by legal aid staff or to help clients with transportation to and from meetings, for example, many of these problems would receive the legal assistance needed. To create a simple upper-bound estimate, we assume all of these problems would have received the necessary legal assistance had more resources been available.

The lower-bound estimate of 85% is likely an underestimation. In this case, we assume that all of the “served, but extent pending” problems will be served to the full extent necessary and that none of the problems that are unserved for “other reasons” could have been successfully served had more resources been available.

See Appendix B4 for a detailed explanation of how these estimates were calculated.

In 2107, an estimated 1 million civil legal problems brought to LSC grantees by low-income Americans will not receive the legal assistance required to fully address their needs due to a lack of available resources.

[CLIENT STORY]

Helen | Pennsylvania | Income Maintenance | Helen is a 68-year-old widow whose only income is a monthly Social Security Administration (SSA) widow's benefit. When she sought help from an LSC grantee, she was scared, vulnerable and overwhelmed. She had just received a letter from the SSA indicating they had overpaid her $47,000 and notifying her that they would stop her monthly benefit payment until the debt was repaid. The legal aid attorney found that the overpayment was caused by fraudulent conduct by Helen's late ex-husband that occurred after their divorce and long after they had separated. The attorney helped Helen resolve the situation, and she continued to receive her SSA widow's benefit.

Charles | California | Housing | Charles and his wife care for their elderly parents and grandchildren in their home in rural California. They first experienced financial problems when Charles's employer reduced his work hours. Then he became ill from a life-threatening disease. He and his wife asked their lending bank for help. When the bank did not respond to their modification request, they sought help from an LSC grantee. The legal aid staff succeeded in obtaining a modification that lowered their monthly mortgage payment and established a fixed payment for principal and interest.

Bud | West Virginia | Veteran Benefits | Bud is a 68 year-old Vietnam veteran who had been receiving his Marine pension benefits for the past eight years. After a government clerk keyed in the wrong social security number, his benefits were suspended. Moreover, the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) deemed the money he had been receiving as overpayment and threatened action against him. Bud tried to correct his record, but he was having a difficult time and, meanwhile, his savings were being depleted. An attorney with an LSC grantee's Veteran's Assistance Program worked with the Social Security office, the VA, and the Internal Revenue Service, and was eventually able to establish Bud's identity, win reinstatement of his pension, and resolve the false overpayment issue.

Elinor | New York | Housing | Elinor has a daughter with a disability who had to crawl four flights of stairs each day to their apartment. Her daughter spent about 30 minutes sliding down the steps to reach the wheelchair stashed under the stairwell alcove and more than an hour getting in and out of her building to attend school five days a week. When there was a vacancy on the ground floor, Elinor sought to move there, but the landlord told them “transfers” weren’t allowed. Represented by an LSC grantee lawyer, the family was able to acquire the apartment on the ground floor and maintain their $700 rent for their three-bedroom, rent-controlled apartment.

Patricia | Georgia | Education | Patricia was worried about her 13-year-old daughter, a middle-schooler diagnosed with leukemia. She was being bullied at school and, because she was often ill or hospitalized, she needed help with academics and extra time to complete assignments. After speaking with school officials, Patricia did not feel her concerns were being heard. LSC grantee lawyers worked with the school to develop a special education plan, bringing in an education specialist from the hospital where her daughter was being treated. An individual education plan (IEP) was developed, giving Patricia's daughter the extra support she needed and permission to wear a hat to cover her bald head. School officials also addressed the bullying, making her time in school safer and more productive.

- ⁴² The Intake Census tracked the number of individuals, not the number of problems, but it is fair to assume that the number of individuals approaching LSC grantees is very close to the number of problems presented to them in this six-week period of time. It is possible that an individual had more than one problem, but this is not likely a common occurrence given the short span of time. For the remainder of this section, we assume that the number of individuals and the number of problems tracked during the Intake Census are equivalent, referring to the number of problems for the purposes of analysis. Our estimates are therefore conservative: to the extent individuals and problems are not equivalent, we are underestimating the number of legal problems for which low-income Americans will seek help from LSC grantees in 2017.

Appendix A: 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey Methodology

Readers are encouraged to visit www.lsc.gov/justicegap2017, where they can find the full technical survey report, the questionnaire, and the codebook corresponding to the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey. In this appendix, we present some important methodological information about the survey, including information about sampling, survey structure, survey administration, statistical weighting, and the demographic profile of the sample. Additional methodology details can be found in the full technical survey report.

Sampling

For this study, LSC was specifically interested in surveying approximately 2,000 adults living in households with incomes at or below 125% of the federal poverty threshold. Identifying and interviewing a large number of respondents meeting this criterion via many traditional survey methods would be logistically challenging and costly due to the amount of outreach and screening that would be necessary. To efficiently identify individuals residing in such households and interview them in a cost-effective manner, LSC contracted with NORC to conduct the survey using AmeriSpeak®, which is NORC’s probability-based panel designed to be representative of the entire U.S. household population. The AmeriSpeak Panel is designed to provide a nationally representative sample of US households for public opinion research. AmeriSpeak was built using a rigorous sampling and recruitment methodology based on probability sampling techniques employed by federally sponsored research.

There are three principal design elements responsible for the scientific integrity of AmeriSpeak. First, it is probability-based, meaning that randomly selected households are sampled with a known, non-zero probability of selection from a documented sample frame. (Almost all other commercially available household panels are based on non-probability, convenience sampling.) AmeriSpeak’s sample source is the NORC National Frame, which is an area probability sample designed to provide at least 97% sample coverage of the U.S. population, and allows for increased sample coverage for rural and low-income households. The NORC National Frame is the sample source for landmark NORC surveys such as the General Social Survey and the Survey of Consumer Finance.

Second, AmeriSpeak has the highest American Association for Public Opinion Research (AAPOR) response rate – a key measure of sample quality – among commercially available household panels. The industry-leading response rate for AmeriSpeak is attributable to the extraordinary contact and gaining cooperation techniques used by AmeriSpeak in recruiting randomly sampled US households. The gaining-cooperation techniques rely on traditional methodologies employed in federally sponsored research for decades. Households selected for AmeriSpeak are contacted in English and Spanish, by a series of U.S. mailings and by NORC telephone and field interviewers. Use of field interviewers for in-person recruitment (i.e., face-to-face interviewing) enhances response rates and representativeness for young adults, lower socio-economic households, and non-internet households.

Third, AmeriSpeak in its design facilitates the representation of US households that are commonly under-represented in online panel research. While many panels conduct surveys via the web only, AmeriSpeak recruits households using a combination of telephone and face-to-face methodologies in order to assure that non-internet, “net averse” households, and persons with low literacy levels are represented in AmeriSpeak. Moreover, after joining AmeriSpeak, panelists have the option to participate in the survey program via web or telephone (speaking with NORC’s professional telephone interviewers). Because AmeriSpeak conducts its surveys in both the telephone and web modes of data collection, AmeriSpeak provides data collections for panelists whether they are comfortable or uncomfortable with web-based surveys.

While NORC keeps recently updated income information on file for all AmeriSpeak panelists, it was important to verify each household’s income level relative to the federal poverty guidelines for this study. NORC drew a sample of roughly 10,500 adults age 18 and older who had previously indicated that their household earnings were at or below 200% of the federal poverty level, with the plan to screen these panelists and select only those with current household incomes at or below 125% of the federal poverty threshold as eligible to complete the survey. The 2016 federal poverty guidelines set by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services were used to determine income thresholds for screening households of various sizes.^a

Survey Structure

The household screening portion of the survey consisted of only two questions, which assessed current household size and income level. Following the screening questions, eligible respondents proceeded to a section containing questions about household characteristics. This was followed by the largest portion of the main survey instrument, which contained questions assessing the prevalence of various types of civil legal needs. LSC and NORC worked to refine a list of common civil legal issues to include in this portion of the survey, arriving at a final list of 88 distinct issues. These issues were divided into 12 categories.

Some of the categories of civil legal problems were issues that might affect any low-income family, including employment, health, consumer and finance, income maintenance, family and custodial issues, as well as assistance with wills and estates. Other categories of problems only applied to certain subpopulations – survivors of domestic violence, homeowners, renters, households with children, individuals with disabilities, and veterans, so the survey was structured in a way that used earlier answers about household characteristics to selectively present questions related to those characteristics. For example, survey respondents were asked about their living situations, and those who indicated that they owned their homes were presented with a section covering civil legal problems experienced by homeowners, while those who indicated that their homes were rented were presented with a battery of questions about issues with rental housing instead. In addition, only those respondents who indicated that someone in the household was in school (or had children in school) received the section about civil legal issues related to education, while others did not. Finally, sections about disability issues and veterans’ issues were only presented to respondents who indicated that at least one member of their household had a disability, or were military personnel or veterans, respectively.

Within each section of the survey assessing the prevalence of civil legal problems, respondents were presented with a number of specific issues and asked to indicate for each one whether they personally had experienced the issue and whether someone else in their household had experienced the issue within the last 12 months. Each of these questions allowed for multiple selections, so it was possible for respondents to indicate that the issue had been experienced both by themselves and by others. There was also an option to indicate that no one in the household had experienced the problem in the last 12 months.

To delve further into the problems affecting individual respondents, the survey dynamically presented questions about problem severity at the conclusion of each battery of problems. For each issue that respondents indicated they had personally experienced within the last 12 months, they were asked to rate the effect the problem had on them on a five-point scale from “not at all” to “severe.”

Following the problem prevalence and severity sections, respondents who had reported that they were personally affected by at least one civil legal issue were presented with a section related to help-seeking behaviors. The first item in this section was a multi-part question covering each relevant civil legal problem and asking respondents to indicate whether they had talked to someone about the problem, had looked for information online, both talked to someone and gone online, or not engaged in either of these behaviors. This question covered all personally experienced problems, except for those that were rated as affecting respondents “not at all”.

Next, the survey included detailed questions about help-seeking behaviors for a subset of the problems reported. As to not overburden respondents who had reported a large number of issues, the survey randomly selected a maximum of four problems for follow-up questions. Each respondent looped through this section up to four times, depending on the number of issues he or she had reported earlier in the survey. The detailed questions included items about the current state of each problem, who (if anyone) the respondent had talked to about the problem (including legal professionals), the type of information sought online (if any), the type of legal assistance received (if any), and reasons why help was not sought (if appropriate). The final section of the survey included three questions assessing perceptions about the fairness and efficacy of the civil legal system.

Survey Administration

A total of 2,028 respondents completed the survey between the dates of January 5, and February 10, 2017, including 1,736 who completed via the web and 292 who completed via telephone. Interviews were completed in both English and Spanish, depending on respondent preference. The screener completion rate for this study was 38.5%. The incidence or eligibility rate was 56.4%. The interview completion rate was 89.1%. The final response rate was 11.2%, based on the American Association for Public Opinion Research Response Rate 3 Method.

Statistical Weighting

Statistical weights for the study-eligible respondents were calculated using panel base sampling weights to start. Panel base sampling weights for all sampled housing units are computed as the inverse of probability of selection from the NORC National Sample Frame (the frame used to sample housing units for AmeriSpeak) or address-based sample. The sample design and recruitment protocol for the AmeriSpeak Panel involves subsampling of initial non-respondent housing units. These subsampled non-respondent housing units are selected for an in-person follow up. The subsample of housing units that are selected for the nonresponse follow up have their panel base sampling weights inflated by the inverse of the subsampling rate. The base sampling weights are further adjusted to account for unknown eligibility and nonresponse among eligible housing units. The household-level nonresponse adjusted weights are then post-stratified to external counts for number of households obtained from the Current Population Survey. Then, these household-level post-stratified weights are assigned to each eligible adult in every recruited household. Furthermore, a person-level nonresponse adjustment accounts for nonresponding adults within a recruited household.

Finally, panel weights are raked to external population totals associated with age, sex, education, race/ethnicity, housing tenure, telephone status, and Census division. The external population totals are obtained from the Current Population Survey.

Study-specific base sampling weights are derived using a combination of the final panel weight and the probability of selection associated with the sampled panel member. Since not all sampled panel members respond to the screener interview, an adjustment is needed to account for and adjust for screener non-respondents. This adjustment decreases potential nonresponse bias associated with sampled panel members who did not complete the screener interview for the study.

Furthermore, among eligible sampled panel members (as identified via the survey screener questions), not all complete the survey interview for the study. Thus, the screener nonresponse adjusted weights for the study are adjusted via a raking ratio method to 125% of the federal poverty line population totals associated with the following socio-demographic characteristics: age, sex, education, race/ethnicity, and Census division.

Population totals for the 125% of the federal poverty line sample for the Justice Gap Study were obtained using the screener nonresponse adjusted weight for all eligible respondents from the screener question(s). At the final stage of weighting, any extreme weights were trimmed based on a criterion of minimizing the mean squared error associated with key survey estimates, and then, weights re-raked to the same population totals. The overall margin of sampling error was +/- 3.27 percentage points for a 50% statistic, adjusted for design effect resulting from the complex sample design.

A more detailed description of AmeriSpeak panel recruitment and management methodology, and additional information about the Justice Gap Study methodology, are included in Appendices A and B, respectively.

Sample Demographic Profile

The respondents who completed the survey represent households in the United States with incomes at or below 125% of the federal poverty level, based on the 2016 federal poverty guidelines set by the Department of Health and Human Services. These households include a range of incomes depending on household size, from $14,850 for a single person household to $61,520 for households of 10 or more. For a family of four, the threshold was $30,380. About a quarter (24%) of this group have annual household incomes of $9,999 or less, while 19% have incomes between $10,000 and $14,999, 31% have incomes between $15,000 and $24,999, and 26% have incomes of $25,000 or more.

Roughly one third (34%) of this group are under the age of 35, and the remainder are evenly split between the age groups of 35 to 49 (23%), 50 to 64 (22%), and 65 and older (21%). There are more women than men in low-income households (58% vs. 42%). In terms of racial and ethnic identification, just under half (46%) are white, a quarter are Hispanic, 21% are African-American, and 8% fall into some other category or identify as multi-racial. Eighty-five percent live within a metropolitan area, while 15% live outside of metropolitan areas. Most have at least a high school education, but few have a college degree. Twenty-eight percent have not finished high school, while 35% have a high school diploma or equivalent, 29% have completed some college, 6% have a bachelor's degree, and 2% have a graduate degree. Over a third (35%) are currently employed, but nearly two-thirds (65%) are not working, including 17% who are retired, 13% who are looking for work, and 21% who are not working due to disabilities.

Over a third (34%) reported that the home they live in is owned, and roughly the same number (36%) said they live in a rented home without public assistance, while 17% live in a home that is rented with public assistance, and 13% report having some other housing arrangement. Roughly a quarter are married, and three-quarters are not. Nearly 3 in 10 (28%) live alone, and about half live in households with at least two other members. Four in 10 of these households include parents of children or teenagers under the age of 18 in their households. Six in 10 have internet access at home, at work, or at some other location, while the remaining 4 in 10 only have internet access on a mobile phone or have no access at all.

Appendix B1: Section 1 Data Sources and Methodology

Most of the descriptive data on the population below 125% FPL come from the American Community Survey (ACS) 2015 Single Year Estimates. Most figures are based on data from table S1703: Selected Characteristics of People at Specified Levels of Poverty in the Past 12 Months. At times additional tables were used to provide estimates and are noted in endnotes. To estimate the number of Americans under 125% FPL for each of the groups presented in the report, we used the percent of the population that is estimated to be under 125% FPL and the total number of people estimated to comprise each group. Figures for the estimated number of veterans under 125% FPL are not readily available and had to be calculated. We estimated this figure by calculating ratio of the number of people below 100% FPL and the number of people below 125% FPL nationwide. We applied this ratio to the total number of veterans living below 100% FPL in order to estimate the total number of veterans living below 125% FPL nationwide.

The findings presented in Section 2, “Experience with Civil Legal Problems,” come exclusively from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey. Respondents were presented with an extensive list of specific problems that usually raise civil legal issues. They were asked whether they had experienced any of these problems in the past 12 months and whether anyone else in their household had experienced any of them.

Readers are encouraged to visit www.lsc.gov/justicegap2017, where they can find a document that supplements this appendix called, “Justice Gap Appendix B2 Tables.” This document presents a number of tables with additional information on the survey results presented in Section 2 of this report. For a given set of survey results, the tables present the calculated proportion (or “percent”) along with the standard error of the percent and the unweighted base for the corresponding variable.

The findings presented in Section 3, “Seeking Legal Help,” come exclusively from the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey. More specifically, this section presents findings from a part of the survey that asked detailed questions about a subset of the civil legal problems reported by respondents. For each respondent, the survey randomly selected up to four personally-experienced problems affecting them more than “not at all.” Due to the low incidence of problems relating to veterans’ issues and disabilities, these problems were always selected if they met the other criteria. Respondents answered questions about what, if any, help they sought to address each of these problems. The primary unit of analysis in this section is problems.

Readers are encouraged to visit www.lsc.gov/justicegap2017, where they can find a document that supplements this appendix called, “Justice Gap Appendix B3 Tables.” This document provides additional information on the survey results presented in Section 3 of this report. For a given set of survey results, the table presents the calculated proportion (or “percent”) along with the standard error of the percent and the unweighted base for the corresponding variable. Because the primary unit of analysis in this section is problems, the bases represent a number of problems (with the exception of Appendix Table B3.6, where individuals are the unit of analysis). For reference, we have also included the (unweighted) number of respondents corresponding to those problems.

On the same landing page (www.lsc.gov/justicegap2017), readers can find the full technical survey report, the questionnaire, and the codebook corresponding to the 2017 Justice Gap Measurement Survey.

Appendix B4: Section 4 Data Sources and Methodology

Most of the findings presented in Section 4, “Reports from the Field,” are based on data collected during the Legal Services Corporation’s (LSC) 2017 Intake Census. Additional data used in that section come from LSC’s 2016 Grantee Activity Report. This appendix provides more information about both of these data sources as well as details about the assumptions underlying estimates presented in Section 4.

The Legal Services Corporation 2017 Intake Census

Data Collection

As with LSC's two prior justice gap studies, LSC asked its grantees to conduct an Intake Census by documenting the number of individuals who approached LSC grantees with legal needs that could not be addressed because of insufficient resources. The 2017 Intake Census instrument has more categories than the two previous instruments to yield a more granular analysis of the reasons why an individual may not receive services from a grantee. LSC recognizes that this process is imperfect and will not capture all of the unmet need, which is why LSC pursued the national survey with NORC using the AmeriSpeak Panel in addition to conducting the Intake Census.

From March 6, 2017 to April 14, 2017, LSC grantees tracked and collected data about those individuals who approached their program with a legal problem. The Intake Census Instrument has three main data collection categories: (1) Unable to Serve, (2) Unable to Serve Fully, and (3) Fully Served.

Unable to Serve. An individual may fall into the "Unable to Serve" category for a number reasons, including being financially ineligible for services (with a household income that is too high) or being a non-citizen. Other reasons for placing an individual in this category are that the person's problem was not the type of legal issue the grantee handles on a regular basis (e.g., commercial transactions) or the grantee has insufficient resources to assist the individual with their problem.

The five subcategories within "Unable to Serve" are:

- Unable to Serve – Ineligible
- Unable to Serve – Conflict of Interest
- Unable to Serve – Outside of Program Priorities or Case Acceptance Guidelines
- Unable to Serve – Insufficient Resources
- Unable to Serve – Other Reasons

Unable to Serve Fully. An individual may be placed in the "Unable to Serve Fully" category if the individual received some form of legal information or legal advice to help address their problem. In this category, the grantee assesses if the case would have been appropriate for full representation if the grantee had sufficient funding. The legal information or legal advice the individual received is not expected to fully resolve the individual's case.

The two subcategories within "Unable to Serve Fully" are:

- Unable to Serve Fully – Insufficient Resources – Provision of Legal Information or Pro Se Resources
- Unable to Serve Fully – Insufficient Resources – Provided Limited Service or Closing Code "L"

Fully Served. An individual is categorized as "Fully Served" if the grantee has sufficient resources to fully address the individual's problem at an appropriate level given the facts and nature of the case. The legal assistance provided in these cases can vary from providing brief legal advice, or help filling out a form, to full legal representation in court.

The three subcategories within "Fully Served" are:

- Fully Served – Provision of Legal Information or Pro Se Resources
- Fully Served – Provision of Limited Services or Closing Code L
- Fully Served – Extended Service Case Accepted

Finally, there is an additional category called “Pending,” which includes individuals that will receive legal help of some kind, but for whom program management had not made a final decision on the level of legal assistance they will be able to provide before data collection for the Intake Census had ended. Had data collection continued for a longer period of time, such individuals would most likely have been coded into one of the following subcategories:

- Unable to Serve Fully – Insufficient Resources – Provided Limited Service or Closing Code “L”
- Fully Served – Provision of Limited Services or Closing Code L
- Fully Served – Extended Service Case Accepted

Additional information about the 2017 Intake Census, including the detailed definitions of each of these categories and the data collection instructions given to grantees, can be found at www.lsc.gov/justicegap2017.

A total of 132 LSC grantees (out of 133) submitted 2017 Intake Census data. When submitting their data, grantees were also asked to provide the average number of hours they offer intake to potential clients in various modes (e.g., by phone, online, in-person appointments, walk-in) on a weekly basis. They were also asked to indicate the extent to which the six-week Intake Census period was typical and, where applicable, to elaborate about why intake might have been atypical. Fifteen of the total 132 grantees indicated that this period was atypical for them. Twelve of the 15 who said it was atypical, say they processed fewer people for intake than usual because of holidays, staff shortages, or other reasons.

Data Analysis

Unit of Analysis. It is important to note that while the Intake Census tracked the number of individuals, the analysis in Section 4 uses problems as the unit of analysis. It is fair to assume that the number of individuals approaching LSC grantees is very close to the number of problems presented to them in this six-week period of time. It is possible that an individual had more than one problem, but this is not likely a common occurrence given the short span of time covered during data collection. Throughout Section 4, we assume that the number of individuals and the number of problems tracked during the Intake Census are equivalent, referring to the number of problems for the purposes of analysis. The estimates in this report are therefore conservative: to the extent individuals and problems are not equivalent, we are underestimating the number of legal problems for which low-income Americans will seek help from LSC grantees in 2017.

12-month Projections. Throughout this section, we provide 12-month projection estimates for the total number of problems low-income Americans will present to LSC grantees in 2017 and subsets of those problems. These projections were calculated by multiplying the relevant Intake Census figure by 8.6905 (52.14 weeks divided by 6 weeks) and rounding to the nearest hundred.

Estimating the Number of Problems Unserved and Underserved Due to Lack of Resources. In Section 4, we present a range of estimates for the number of problems presented to LSC grantees that do not receive any legal help (“unserved”) or do not receive enough legal help to fully address the client’s needs (“underserved”). In that section, we describe the assumptions we make to produce these estimates and the reasoning behind them. Here, we lay out these assumptions in terms of the original data collection coding scheme.

To produce the upper-bound estimate, we make the following assumptions:

- All observations coded as “Pending” would eventually be coded as “Unable to Serve Fully” and the reason they would not be “Fully Served” is for reasons related to a lack of resources.

Appendices

- All observations coded in the following categories were “Unable to Serve” for reasons related to a lack of resources:
 - Unable to Serve – Outside of Program Priorities or Case Acceptance Guidelines
 - Unable to Serve – Insufficient Resources
 - Unable to Serve – Other Reasons
- All observations coded in the following subcategories were “Unable to Serve Fully” for reasons related to a lack of resources:
 - Unable to Serve Fully – Insufficient Resources – Provision of Legal Information or Pro Se Resources

Legal Service Corporation Grantee Activity Report

Section 4 presents the distribution of the types of problems for which LSC grantees provided case services in 2016. The data for this come from the Legal Services Corporation Grantee Activity Report (GAR) data. GAR is the largest and longest running data collection effort on civil legal aid in the United States. Dating back to 1976, LSC has recorded and reported data from grantees in a variety of ways. Information from the Grantee Activity Reports is summarized on an annual basis by LSC staff for public reports and for internal use by management and program staff. The data are also publicly available through the Grantee Data Page on the LSC site and as a full dataset at LCS’s DATA.GOV site: <https://catalog.data.gov/organization/legal-services-corporation>.

The data are gathered annually from all grantees on a calendar year basis. Grantees use automated reporting forms that are accessible via the Internet. Grantees report on the conduct of their Basic Field, Agricultural Worker and Native American grant programs to LSC on a calendar year basis, using automated reporting forms that are accessible via the Internet. The reports are collected in January and February of each year.

More information about the GAR can be found at <http://www.lsc.gov/grant-activity-reports>.

INTRODUCTION

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) Office of Program Performance (OPP) conducted a Program Quality Visit (PQV) to Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC) from October 15-24, 2018. OPP's team consisted of LSC program counsel Vanessa Dillen, Lewis Creekmore, Vicki Taitano; Deputy Director Joyce McGee; Director Ed Caspar; and LSC temporary employees John Johnson, Peter Dellinger, and Stephanie Edelstein.

Program Quality Visits are designed to evaluate the extent to which LSC grantees are providing the highest quality legal services to eligible clients. In conducting the evaluation, OPP relies on the LSC Act and regulations, the LSC Performance Criteria, LSC Program Letters, and the ABA Standards for the Provision of Civil Legal Aid. The on-site evaluation was organized to follow the four Performance Areas of the LSC Performance Criteria, which cover needs assessment and priority setting; access to services and engagement with the low-income community; legal work management and the legal work produced; and program management including board governance, leadership, resource development, and coordination within the delivery system.

In conducting its assessment, the team reviewed the documents provided by the program to LSC, including recent applications for funding, technology and PAI plans, workforce analysis charts, and case service and other services reports. The team also reviewed materials requested in advance of the visit, including documents relating to board governance, intake, legal work and case management policies and systems, advocates' writing samples, and the results of an online staff survey.

On-site, the team visited 16 program offices in Raleigh, Durham, Winston-Salem, Asheville, Wilson, Sylva, Morganton, Wilmington, Charlotte, Pembroke, Greensboro, Ahsokie, Pittsboro, and Greenville. Due to time constraints, the team could not visit offices in Boone, Concord, Gastonia, or Hayesville. The team interviewed program leadership, management and administrative staff, advocacy staff, and support staff. The team also interviewed members of the board of directors, judges, other funders, community partner organizations, and other state justice stakeholders. Due to scheduling and time constraints, some interviews were conducted by telephone.

SERVICE AREA and PROGRAM OVERVIEW

Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC) is a statewide legal services program that was developed in 2002 through the merger of three LSC-funded programs.¹ As the largest provider of legal aid in North Carolina, LANC is the fourth largest law firm (public or private) in the state. LANC provides a full range of legal services to all 100 counties in North Carolina with a staff of 337, including 172 attorneys and 44 paralegals.²

² Calculated from 2017 Grant Activity Reports submitted to LSC by LANC.

LANC operates from 19 field offices distributed across the state. Offices range in size from Pembroke, which has six total staff, to Winston-Salem, which has 45. The program also has an administrative office and Central Intake Unit (CIU) office in the state capital of Raleigh.

North Carolina's total population of 10,146,790 includes a poverty population of 1,521,880.³ Roughly 20 percent, or two million, live below 125 percent of the federal poverty level and are considered eligible for services under LSC funding guidelines. LANC's Native American project provides services to two distinct geographical regions. In the western part of the state, the staff serves the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians.⁴ In the southeastern part of the state, the staff serves federally unrecognized tribes.⁵ LANC's agricultural worker program conducts extensive outreach, especially during the peak harvest period from April to late October, to provide legal services to agricultural workers, which includes a poverty population of 55,421. Agricultural workers help farms that produce tobacco, sweet potatoes, Christmas trees, apples, pickle cucumbers, and berries.

With an overall budget of $25 million, LANC receives 51 percent of its funding from LSC. In addition to a basic field grant, LANC receives an Agricultural Worker grant and a Native American grant from LSC. In recent years, LANC has faced marked cuts to its state funding which have been offset by increased private donations, federal funding, and foundation support. For example, LANC's state funding decreased from $3,515,854 in 2013 to $420,106 in 2017 and revenue received from filing fees dropped from $2,582,281 in 2013 to $1,698,944 in 2017.⁶ These steep decreases have been offset in part by federal funding received under the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), which increased from roughly $1.2 million in 2013 to a little more than $3 million in 2017. In addition, LANC received a jump in Title XX Social Security Act funding, which increased from $437,147 in 2013 to $1,345,731 in 2017.

In 2017, LANC closed 17,857 cases, of which 30.4 percent were in the area of family law, 28.8 percent were housing-related, and 12 percent were consumer-related. Staff case closure rates are below the national median for all categories except for contested cases, which are at the national median. A discussion about the program's case closure rates is included in this report under Performance Area 3. Private attorney involvement (PAI) closed cases were above the national median in all categories.

About a month before the visit, Hurricane Florence struck the southeastern region of North Carolina, causing large-scale flooding and damage. Residents in these areas were still recovering from the effects of Hurricane Matthew, which struck the same region two years prior. The program saw an immediate increase in the number of calls from applicants seeking assistance and worked quickly to identify emerging legal issues and expand intake capacity.

⁴ The Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians are descendants of the 805 families that hid in the mountains of western North Carolina to escape forced migration during President Andrew Jackson's Trail of Tears in 1838-1839.

⁵ Federally unrecognized Tribes in the southeastern region of North Carolina have a complex history regarding the search for federal recognition.

SUMMARY of FINDINGS

Legal Aid of North Carolina (LANC) staff are deeply committed to providing legal services to low-income people across the state of North Carolina. Staff are passionate about their work and staff morale is high. The program is led by a strong executive director with 19 years of experience who has skillfully navigated the program through a state funding crisis, is well-respected throughout the state, and is an active collaborator in the state access to justice efforts. He is supported by an engaged board of directors.

While the program has not completed a formal needs assessment since 2008, the Centralized Intake Unit (CIU) provides ongoing information about some emerging legal needs. At the time of the visit, LANC was preparing for a new round of strategic planning. Historically, the executive director has held primary responsibility for implementing the strategic plan, but the program anticipates using Management Information Exchange (MIE) to help facilitate the new process.

The program has one primary hotline, the CIU, and an additional four specialized hotlines: Senior Legal Helpline, Fair Housing Helpline, NC Navigator Helpline, and Battered Immigrant Helpline. The CIU demonstrates a commitment to continuous process improvement and is a model intake program.

LANC produces high-quality legal work. Advocates are split into 10 substantive practice groups and eight special statewide projects. Supervision and training are consistent across the program. While the program consistently pursues cases on appeal, advocates expressed a desire for more transparency about the process of selecting and staffing appellate cases.

Faced with a challenging funding environment, LANC's upper management has focused on maintaining sufficient attorney and advocate staffing levels to continue the delivery of legal services across North Carolina and has put off needed technology upgrades. While perhaps justified, this has created an urgent need to improve technology, as technology challenges have become so severe they have an impact on the ability of staff to deliver legal services.

Funding challenges have also influenced LANC's lean upper management team. The lack of resources and staff at the upper management level has meant that upper management staff could not pursue long-term, big-picture initiatives that could strengthen LANC.

FINDINGS, CONCLUSIONS, AND RECOMMENDATIONS

PERFORMANCE AREA ONE. Effectiveness in identifying the most pressing civil legal needs of low-income people in the service area and targeting resources to address those needs.

Needs Assessment

Finding 1: The annual needs assessment that LANC conducts does not adequately solicit feedback directly from the low-income population.

LANC has not conducted a comprehensive formal needs assessment since 2008. However, the program annually assesses closed cases and outcomes data and the overall demographic breakdown of clients from the previous year. In addition, the program seeks data from community partners and the Client Council and is adding surveys of volunteer lawyers and managing attorneys in 2019. At the conclusion of the annual needs assessment process, the program's litigation director drafts revised priorities which are then presented to the operations committee of the board of directors for review and input. After incorporating any changes from the operations committee, the revised priorities are presented to the full board of directors for approval.

The program supplements the case closure and demographic data analysis and surveys with ongoing data analysis of callers to the CIU. One benefit of the CIU is the ability to carefully track information from callers seeking legal assistance, including location, demographic information, and type of legal problem. By analyzing this data regularly, LANC has ongoing information about long-standing and emerging legal needs across the state.

By only collecting information from CIU callers, LANC is limiting the analysis of legal needs to those who have successfully identified their problem as a legal issue. In LSC's study on the Justice Gap, we found that when low-income people do not seek legal help, in 20 percent of those instances, it was because they did not know that the issue they faced was a legal problem.⁷ This gap in knowledge is one reason the most informative and well-designed needs assessments contain direct surveys of client-eligible populations.

Recommendation I.1.1.1⁸

LANC should conduct a comprehensive legal needs assessment that includes input from the low-income community, input from stakeholders who work with the client-eligible community, relevant data such as U.S. Census data, and any other relevant needs assessments of the low-income population. LANC should consider partnering with an academic institution to design and implement the needs assessment.

Strategic Planning

Finding 2: LANC developed a strategic plan in 2014 and plans to engage in a new strategic planning process, and develop a new strategic plan in 2019.

⁷ Legal Services Corporation. 2017. The Justice Gap: Measuring the Unmet Civil Legal Needs of Low-income Americans. Prepared by NORC at the University of Chicago (formerly known as National Opinion Research Center) for Legal Services Corporation. Washington, DC., pg. 3.

⁸ Recommendations in this report will have a Roman Numeral to identify the Performance Area, followed by three numbers identifying, respectively, the Criterion addressed by the recommendation, the number of the finding and a number designating whether it is the first, second, third, etc., recommendation under that finding. For example, III.2.14.3 designates Performance Area III, Criterion 2, finding 14, and third recommendation under finding 14. There are two levels of recommendations in this report: Tier One and Tier Two. Recommendations that are indicated with an asterisk are Tier One recommendations and are seen as having a greater impact on program quality and/or program performance. In its next Application or Renewal, the program will be asked to report on its implementation of Tier One recommendations.

LANC's most recent strategic plan was completed in March of 2014 and is a five-year plan that expires in March 2019. The 2014 strategic plan was developed through a lengthy process. At the conclusion of a day-long strategic planning meeting, LANC developed five major categories to be considered during the strategic planning process. The program created five subcommittees for each category that included staff and board members. The five subcommittees were: 1) Administrative Governance; 2) Hiring and Retention; 3) Increasing Revenue; 4) Improving Core Competencies; and 5) Technology. Each subcommittee developed key findings in their respective areas of focus. The subcommittees met over eight months and issued formal written recommendations to the board. There were opportunities for other staff involved in strategic planning to comment on the written recommendations. The board articulated top-level findings from each subcommittee and approved the final strategic plan.

The 2014 strategic plan was not well-distributed or shared with the entire staff statewide nor was it used by the staff, management, or the board to strategically guide or track the program's work. Regardless, the program has addressed many of the recommendations in the strategic plan and many staff members are engaged in activities that stem from the 2014 plan despite their unfamiliarity with the document.

Each field office and special project at LANC must create an annual work plan. Typically, the work plan is developed after a day-long meeting of all staff in the field office or special project team, during which staff input is solicited. The work plans are collected and filed for the year. A review of work plans revealed that they vary widely in format and content. While LANC should be commended for the efforts that go into developing work plans for each office and special project, the work plans do not stem from the overall strategic plan and may foster a siloed environment that conflicts with the program's "one law firm" concept.

LANC has plans to engage in a new strategic planning process using staff from the Management Information Exchange (MIE) to help facilitate the process. The new plan is expected to be developed in 2019.

Recommendation I.2.2.1*

LANC should develop a strategic planning process that includes more input from the staff, board, and the community, and develop a timeline for the process.

Recommendation I.2.2.2*

LANC should develop a strategic plan that includes short- and long-term goals for all aspects of the program, including the legal work, intake, resource development, technology, administration, communications (internal and external), human resources, and financial administration. The strategic plan should include goals, tasks, people responsible for tasks, and timelines for completion of tasks.

Recommendation I.2.2.3

Once the new strategic plan is complete and approved by the board, LANC should develop a rollout process to ensure that the staff and board are aware of the plan, its contents, and their respective role in its implementation.

Recommendation I.2.2.4

LANC should appoint a point person within the program who is responsible for regularly tracking progress on the plan and reporting to the executive director, and possibly the board, on the progress that has been made.

Evaluation and Adjustment

Finding 3: LANC’s Central Intake Unit provides the program with ongoing information about emerging legal needs.

Staff at the CIU analyze data weekly, including the legal problem, geographic location, and demographic information of applicants. This allows the program to receive contemporaneous information about emerging legal needs and make adjustments to outreach, community education, and legal strategies to meet those needs. In the aftermath of Hurricane Florence, LANC was able to quickly identify emerging legal needs and created expedited triage systems to effectively route high-priority impact cases. For example, the CIU noticed multiple calls regarding tenants of large multi-apartment complexes being barred from returning to their homes. The CIU assigned a supervising attorney to conduct initial interviews with any affected clients and begin to gather information about the emerging problem.

Finding 4. LANC tracks outcomes in limited and extended services cases but does not meaningfully analyze these outcomes.

LANC tracks outcomes in limited and extended service cases and uses this information to demonstrate overall effectiveness and impact. The program uses extended services outcomes data in presentations to funders to show program effectiveness. However, the “outcomes” tracked for limited cases are not client outcomes as they are simply the tasks completed for the client and do not show the outcome of the client’s legal problem. Some field offices review the total financial benefit to clients from representation as part of the annual work plan process but otherwise do not analyze outcomes.

Recommendation I.4.4.1

LANC should consider using outcome data to evaluate the effectiveness of specific legal strategies and to inform programmatic and strategic decisions.

PERFORMANCE AREA TWO. Effectiveness in engaging in and serving the low-income population throughout the service area.

Dignity and Sensitivity, including intake

Finding 5: The majority of intakes at LANC are handled by the program’s model Central Intake Unit (CIU).

LANC maintains a central toll-free number for legal services, open 8:30 am to 4:30 pm Monday-Friday and 5:30 pm to 8:30 pm on Monday and Thursday. Calls to this hotline are handled by the Central Intake Unit (CIU), which was launched in April 2006 and receives between 170,000 and 200,000 calls per year. The program's approach to developing a centralized intake system was to start by handling intake for a few field offices, and gradually assume more responsibility. The CIU staff collected data from the outset, which allowed for modifications to the intake process as the staff became more efficient and effective. The CIU manager reported that the largest obstacle to implementing centralized intake was ending walk-in intake at local offices. The CIU overcame this resistance through several means. First, the CIU team was consistently open to feedback from field offices. Second, the CIU team collected data and showed that the change would increase the number of extended service cases by 50 percent. As field offices gained trust in and realized the benefits of the new CIU, the conversion eventually reached all offices.

Applicants who call the main number navigate a brief phone tree before hearing an automated message and being placed in a queue, which can handle up to 282 callers. The phone tree includes basic questions about the legal problem being faced by the applicant. Applicants with legal problems clearly outside of program priorities, such as criminal law issues, are directed via the phone tree to an automated message about the North Carolina Bar Association Lawyer Referral Service.

After waiting in the queue, applicants reach an intake screener. Intake screeners ask questions regarding eligibility and the legal problem being faced by the applicant. While interviewing applicants, intake screeners enter information into Legal Files, the program's case management system. At the conclusion of the screening call, the applicant file is passed to the file assignment team. This team sorts the files and directs applicant files to either the Volunteer Lawyer Project (VLP) team or to an intake attorney. This determination is made within a day. Each morning, intake attorneys review the list of clients in their queue. Intake attorneys return calls depending on the level of urgency involved, but always return calls within one week. Most intake attorneys are generalists, although some have expertise in foreclosure law and expungements.

An intake attorney contacts the client to gather additional information and to offer brief advice. If the client's case is resolved, the file is closed. Clients that require more extended services or follow-up are referred to the field offices through Legal Files.

Field offices have varied internal procedures for triaging and assigning cases. Sometimes, the CIU refers to a specific attorney, who follows up directly. In other instances, all referrals within a certain substantive law topic are referred to a supervising attorney for review and assignment. Field offices reported that the client notes they receive from CIU are accurate, detailed and thorough, and there is a high level of coordination and cooperation between the field offices and the CIU.

The intake supervisor estimated that LANC rejects about 50 percent of all calls received, and of those rejections, about 80 percent are referred to the North Carolina Bar Association Lawyer Referral Service. Typically, the rejections are because the case type falls outside of LANC's program priorities. Intake screeners reported that they rarely reject callers for service because the phone tree system sorts out applicants who are clearly ineligible. The intake team has social work interns that have built a detailed list of social service referrals across the service area so callers with non-legal issues can also receive referrals.

Field offices occasionally ask to “close intake” for certain substantive areas, meaning they will accept no additional cases. When this happens, the regional manager must work with the litigation director to see if nearby field offices can handle the overflow cases so there is no disruption of service to clients. In the instance where an intake attorney has an applicant to be referred to a field office closed for intake on that topic, the CIU managing attorney works with the litigation director to ensure services are provided.

The aftermath of Hurricane Florence dramatically increased the number of calls to the intake line. The program normally receives about 80 calls per day and estimated that they were receiving an additional 60 calls per day following the hurricane. This was tripling the wait time for callers from an average of 15 minutes to an average of 45 minutes. To assist with handling the dramatic increase in calls, LANC trained staff at field offices to handle initial screening calls to accommodate the overflow.

LANC’s intake staff members are deeply invested in their work and are dedicated to the continuous improvement of the intake system. The CIU managing attorney encourages feedback and questions from staff at every position and level of experience. For example, at the annual CIU staff retreat, which includes intake and Private Attorney Involvement staff, staff are deeply involved in the discussion and all opinions are heard. Additionally, the staff at all levels of experience are encouraged to propose improvements to the intake system on a continuous basis throughout the year. This focus on continuous improvement contributed to a strong sense of ownership among staff and created a highly efficient intake process.

The CIU extensively uses data to inform decisions about the intake process. For example, staff wanted to develop standards for the length of time between when an applicant first contacts the CIU and when the applicant receives a call back from an intake attorney. To develop these standards, CIU analyzed data that compared applicant wait time against the likelihood that LANC reached the applicant. Through this analysis, the program learned that the likelihood that LANC could reach the applicant at all dropped off dramatically after one week. As a result, the CIU developed the standard that requires intake attorneys to return phone calls within one week.

The CIU focuses on providing detailed, individualized advice from intake attorneys. Intake attorneys spend an average of two hours on each case, and that time includes the time spent talking to the applicant and the research conducted on the case. For foreclosure cases, the average time is closer to three hours. Attorneys have access to Lexis-Nexis and materials such as sample briefs from field offices. Similarly, intake screeners are encouraged to be efficient but may spend as much time as needed on a call. Intake attorneys have individual accountability for the cases they handle. The names of intake screeners are listed on the case and attorneys from field offices are encouraged to contact intake attorneys with questions or feedback. The direct communication between field offices and the intake office enables continuous improvement in the nuance and detail of the legal advice being provided by intake attorneys.

The opportunity to engage in detailed legal work, the high level of accountability, and a strong culture of investment in improvements have lead to high morale and retention.

Finding 7. In addition to the CIU, applicants access LANC via specialized hotlines and direct referrals from agencies.

Some case types are not included in the general CIU process. The program has agreements with local domestic violence and sexual assault agencies throughout the state. Some agencies refer clients to CIU, but the majority are referred directly to the domestic violence unit of the appropriate local office.

LANC maintains a separate hotline for seniors, which is open Monday-Friday from 9:00 to 11:00 am and from 1:00 to 3:00 pm. When applicants contact the senior hotline, they are first screened by a paralegal and then receive a follow-up call from an attorney or paralegal. This separate hotline is a requirement of the grant money received to deliver services directly to seniors. Attorneys who work on this hotline reported that it is a benefit for the senior population to have a separate line because they can make accommodations for seniors, such as offering extended interview times. However, while there may be a benefit to maintaining a separate hotline for seniors and for specific projects, it was not clear whether the non-CIU hotlines have the same data analysis or continuous process improvement as the CIU. There was concern that the information being provided by non-CIU hotline staff was not as detailed or thorough as the CIU.

LANC also provides a separate hotline for the Battered Immigrant Project, which is available on Tuesdays from 3:30 to 7:30 pm and on Thursdays from 9:00 am to 1:00 pm. In addition, LANC maintains two other intake phone lines, one for fair housing issues and one for the NC Navigator project.⁹ Applicants calling these lines are triaged by paralegals and referred directly to field offices for follow up. Staff on all hotlines make use of the internal referral system in Legal Files if an applicant calls the wrong hotline number to eliminate the need for repeated calls.

Very few applicants access LANC via walk-in services—in 2018, walk-ins were less than two percent of all intakes. At the time of the visit, the program did not offer online intake and staff indicated that online intake had been unavailable since February 2018. When online intake was available, the program estimated that only a third of online applicants were accepted for service. LANC anticipates that online intake will be reinstated again sometime between October 2019 and April 2020.

Recommendation II.1.7.1

The program should ensure that all intake portals outside of the CIU provide the same quality of service provided to CIU applicants.

Finding 8: Staff in the Central Intake Unit are well-trained and well-supervised.

The intake office is staffed by a team of 36. The program has nine part-time intake screeners, who are responsible for conducting initial triage and eligibility checks. They are overseen by an intake supervisor. The program has nine full-time intake attorneys, 10 part-time intake attorneys, three intake paralegals, and three support staff. Nine of the full-time intake attorneys have supervisory responsibilities. There is a managing attorney in charge of the CIU.

The intake supervisor found that the ideal schedule for screeners is to work part-time, 25 to 28 hours per week. Each shift is between five and six hours and a screener is scheduled for four to five shifts per week. This allows the program to have flexible staffing to accommodate the highest demand times from callers. The shorter shifts are also helpful in maintaining strong morale and good customer service in a work environment that is often stressful.

The program has been especially successful recruiting attorneys who are parents of young children for part-time positions. Attorneys who are recent law school graduates also find part-time positions appealing. Supervising attorneys mentor and offer ongoing training on substantive law issues and interviewing skills. The mentorship and supervision system is strong, and attorneys newly out of law school or returning to the field find LANC to be a good place to gain experience and knowledge across all poverty law topics.

The Raleigh area, where CIU is located, is home to other call centers, so there is no shortage of qualified applicants for intake screener positions. The program prioritizes hiring Spanish-speaking intake screeners. The intake supervisor estimates that annual turnover is around 25 percent, but that staff leaving CIU typically transfer to other positions within LANC.

All intake attorneys and intake screeners start with two days of training. The remainder of the training is self-paced and takes about two weeks from beginning to end for new intake screeners and two months for new intake attorneys. There are gradual, progressive steps to the training and significant oversight. Once a new intake screener is finished with initial training, the intake supervisor will conduct spot checks for the next three months. This includes listening in on calls for quality control and pulling files.

Lunch and Learn events are held for all CIU staff about once a week, and community legal education events are held about nine times a year. CIU managers respond to staff training needs. For example, after several callers threatened self-harm, a training session was offered within two weeks on suicidality and related staff ethical obligations.

The managing attorney of the intake unit runs Legal Files reports weekly to check that all clients have received timely call-backs. The program's quality control requires a second attorney to look at case files to approve them for closing, even those handled by the managing attorney. If a supervisor finds that the information provided was incomplete, intake attorneys will contact the client either by phone or mail to offer supplemental information.

The CIU managing attorney provides frequent email updates to the CIU team, and staff meets every other week to discuss policies and procedures. Supervisors regularly give performance evaluations, although they happen once every two years instead of annually.

Engagement with and access by the low-income population

Finding 9: LANC's office locations are accessible to client-eligible individuals across the service area.

LANC has 19 field offices distributed across North Carolina. The program periodically reviews data about the distance clients have to travel to get to an office, Census data about the location of low-income people, and CIU data about the geographic location of applicants. Offices are well-marked, have clean and comfortable waiting areas with informational materials, and attorney offices are appropriate and professional. Offices are conveniently located, often in a central location of a particular city or town, and are easily accessible to transportation. However, it was challenging to find the Durham office, because there is no LANC signage at street level.

Finding 10: LANC's Central Intake Unit regularly assesses potential gaps in service and addresses these gaps through targeted outreach.

The intake supervisor at CIU is also responsible for the remote legal clinics offered via video-conferencing, which are discussed in more detail under Finding 23. As part of the development of these clinics, the intake manager regularly reviews data from CIU about the applicant's legal topic, demographic data, and geographical location looking for patterns in calls to assess whether there are gaps in service. To address those gaps, LANC develops additional locations for video-conference clinics, such as community agencies and churches.

The Advocates for Children's Services (ACS) team also conducts direct outreach to parents. Some of the outreach takes place via back to school webinars, although the ACS team feels these are not as effective as in-person contact. The ACS team will occasionally ask an attorney from a field office to attend an in-person event instead. The outreach to the juvenile education network also allows the ACS team to receive updated information about trends and emerging legal needs in the field. Some staff described additional outreach efforts, such as to the Hispanic community or to a homeless shelter. These outreach efforts were coordinated at the level of the field offices or special project team.

Finding 11: The ethnic and racial diversity of the LANC staff generally reflects the diversity of the service area.

Generally, the ethnic and racial diversity of the program's staff reflects the ethnic and racial diversity of the service area, but there are some exceptions. LANC staff is 61 percent Caucasian, 25 percent African American, less than one percent Hispanic, and less than a tenth of a percent Asian. One staff member is Native American. Service area demographics show a poverty population that is 54 percent Caucasian, 33 percent African American, nine percent Hispanic, and two percent Asian.¹⁰

Diversity is well-distributed across the organization. Thirty percent of the legal management staff are African-American, and 25 percent of attorneys and paralegals are African-American. The program acknowledges they make no special efforts to recruit a diverse workforce and has arrived at the current level of diversity organically.

Recommendation III.1.11.1

LANC should regularly assess staff diversity and implement recruitment and retention strategies specifically aimed at ensuring that staff diversity is reflective of the service area.

PERFORMANCE AREA THREE. Effectiveness of legal representation and other program activities intended to benefit the low-income population.

Legal Representation

Staffing and Expertise

Finding 12: While LANC has a diverse workforce with a wide range of experience levels, the program has a concentration of newer attorneys.

Of the 172 attorneys employed by LANC, 80 (46 percent) have less than five years of experience at LANC. Of those 80 attorneys with less than five years of experience, 73 arrived at LANC with no prior attorney experience. The program had 36 attorneys (20 percent) who had between five and ten years of experience at the time of the visit. There are attorneys on staff with considerable depth of experience—42 attorneys (24 percent) have between 11 and 20 years of experience and 14 attorneys (eight percent) have more than 20 years of experience.¹¹

Advocates at LANC tend to specialize in one or two practice areas, although staff at small rural offices are more likely to be generalists out of necessity.

Legal Work Management, Supervision, Training, and Support

Finding 13: LANC offers ample initial and ongoing training to its advocates.

Training, mentorship, and supervision are consistent throughout the program. All new advocate staff members receive a week of orientation and training at the CIU. This training includes an overview of the intake process, a review of substantive law, and a quick orientation regarding human resources and administration. The process includes a mix of training videos and in-person teaching sessions. As part of the training sequence, all new advocates take CIU cases. Staff interviewed gave positive feedback about the training process, which they found to be useful and well-designed.

In addition to the initial week of training, advocate staff members receive ongoing training. Many staff reported attending national conferences such as those offered by National Legal Aid and Defenders Association, National Institute for Trial Advocacy, National Consumer Law Center, and National Organization of Social Security Claimants' Representatives. Training needs are identified through the yearly office work plans and individual work plans. Managing attorneys have attended management training offered by Management Information Exchange. LANC offers frequent Lunch and Learn events and has produced several "in house" training videos. In 2016, the ¹¹ Statistics derived from 2017 Grant Reporting Data, please note that percentages do not equal 100 due to rounding.

American College of Trial Lawyers provided skills training, which was videotaped by LANC and is used as a resource.

LANC maintains practice group listservs, which attorneys throughout the program use widely. These listservs are a way for attorneys to share sample pleadings, discuss emerging issues, and formulate new legal strategies. Advocates also have access to a pleading bank on Sharepoint. In addition to the LANC-only listservs, many advocates also participate in task force listservs, which are open to other legal service agencies and community agencies.

At the time of the visit, LANC was developing a skills training series for attorneys and paralegals, scheduled to launch in 2019. Through this training series, the program hopes to transition all legal secretaries to paralegal positions, develop more case handling paralegals, and teach attorneys about community lawyering. To support this transition, which is a cultural shift at LANC, the program has an attorney skills committee and a paralegal skills committee. Staff members participate in both committees.

Finding 14: Supervision is consistent across the program.

Legal work management and supervision are consistent across all LANC offices. Staff attorneys reported that supervisors conduct regular reviews of open and closed cases and that the substantive work unit regularly meets as a team. Attorneys praised the level of supervision they received. New attorneys described a supervision model that allowed for a gradual increase in autonomy and responsibility. For example, new attorneys receive more frequent case reviews, are often accompanied to their first court hearing by a supervisor, and sometimes develop weekly work plans with their manager.

All field offices are led by a managing attorney. Field offices are grouped into geographic regions, each led by a regional manager, who in most instances is also a managing attorney. However, the regional managers do not directly supervise the managing attorneys. Rather, the role of the regional manager is to coordinate the intake and delivery of legal services across the region.

Attorneys are divided into 10 practice groups, corresponding with the major substantive areas of law covered by LANC. These practice groups are benefits, community economic development, domestic violence, education, employment, family, housing, human trafficking, and veterans. Practice group managers are sometimes, but not always, managing attorneys or regional managers. Practice group managers are responsible for providing substantive training and general supervision of the legal work within their respective practice areas throughout the state.

In addition to the practice groups, LANC has eight statewide projects addressing special populations or legal needs. The statewide projects are advocates for children's services, fair housing, farmworker, senior, domestic violence prevention initiative, battered immigrant project, a medical-legal partnership for children, and the child's advocate. Some special project managers double as practice group managers.

Some staff reported that they have more than one supervisor, or that they report to different supervisors about different aspects of their work. For example, a staff attorney at a field office within a practice group would report to a practice group manager about supervision of their legal work but report to the managing attorney or supervising attorney of the field office regarding administrative issues. However, staff were able to clearly articulate the division of responsibility between supervisors and expressed no challenges with this structure.

Quantity and Quality of Legal Work

Finding 16: Over the past five years, LANC's case closure rates have reflected shifts in funding sources and staffing, as well as an emphasis on providing meaningful assistance in limited-service cases.

LANC's total cases closed have historically been below the national median cases closed per 10,000 poverty population. One reason for the historically low case closures could be the program's strong commitment to representation in complex cases through its heavy appellate work. Another reason could be the extensive time intake staff dedicate to callers who receive limited service. The program's extended cases are 30 percent of its total cases closed. In the past five years, total cases closed remained relatively flat in 2013 (21,535), 2014 (21,383), and 2015 (21,437). The program's total cases closed dropped in 2016 and 2017 from 19,042 to 17,857. The decrease in case numbers is reflective of losses in state funding that resulted in layoffs in 2015. In 2016, LANC had 14 fewer attorneys and eight fewer paralegals than in 2015. While funding has been replaced with Victims of Crime Act and Violence Against Women Act grants, the program is still building its staff back up to the levels it previously had. While this has the benefit of stabilizing overall funding, it has led to a change in the types of cases that LANC handles. This is reflected in its case closure data. Since 2014, LANC has helped declining numbers of clients with Income Maintenance or Employment cases, while Family Law cases have steadily risen (see discussion below under Finding 17).

LANC's extended cases closed per 10,000 poverty population is 33.7, compared to the national median of 39. The program's limited cases closed per 10,000 poverty population is 77.2, compared to the national median of 110. The program's contested cases closed per 10,000 poverty population is 19.5, compared to the national median of 19. LANC's low case numbers seem closely tied to its limited service cases. While extended and contested case numbers have remained relatively stable from year to year, the pattern of limited case closures per 10,000 poverty population decreases in line with overall case closures. LANC quickly and efficiently handles brief advice cases through the CIU and consistently examines data about the intake process to ensure that applicants are processed quickly. However, the CIU has high-quality standards about the legal advice given by attorneys. Even for brief service cases, the CIU emphasizes providing legal advice that is detailed and comprehensive. This level of detail may mean that attorneys are able to handle fewer limited service cases overall, but the legal assistance being provided is likely to have a greater impact on clients.

As indicated above under Finding 16, the elimination of state funding for legal services has led LANC to pursue other forms of funding, namely federal funding under the Victims of Crime Act (VOCA), Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), and Title XX of the Social Security Act.

As might be expected, increased VAWA funding has led to a greater focus on family law. In 2014, LANC staff closed 3,230 family law cases, and family law cases were 19.8 percent of all staff cases closed.¹² In 2017, LANC staff closed 4,192 family law cases, and family law cases were 28.8 percent of all cases closed.¹³ In comparison, staff case closures remained the same or decreased slightly in all other subject areas.

The change in funding and in case types handled has also affected the way LANC approaches litigation. In 2014, LANC reported that 1,233 cases were closed by agency decision. By 2017, this number fell by almost half to 621. The reverse effect was seen in the number of cases closed by uncontested court decision, which almost doubled from 546 in 2014 to 1,046 in 2017.

Finding 18: Advocates at LANC produce high-quality legal work and are involved in multiple innovative projects and access to justice efforts.

A review of sample work submitted by LANC advocates revealed solid, error-free legal work. However, many writing samples illustrated relatively straightforward legal work that lacked complexity. This is somewhat surprising given the overall structure of the legal service delivery model. A large percentage of the program's brief service cases are handled by the CIU. In theory, this should allow field offices to pursue extended representation cases that are more complex. This could be explained by the issues presented by clients simply do not lend themselves to complex litigation.

LANC has several innovative projects focused on systemic issues. The Medical-Legal Partnership for Children is a statewide project embedded in 14 health systems across the state. This project is notable for the deep level of collaboration between the lawyers, medical staff, and social service staff to provide holistic services for low-income children. The Advocates for Children's Services Project addresses education justice issues statewide.

LANC is also involved in impressive access to justice efforts being made in Charlotte regarding eviction rights. Last year, a well-known partner from a private law firm joined LANC. He successfully convinced the Charlotte firm that represents landlords in 80 percent of housing cases to voluntarily distribute informational materials regarding LANC and tenants' rights along with every summons.

Finding 19: Some LANC staff expressed a desire for a more transparent process in the selection of cases to pursue on appeal.

LANC's appellate practice is managed by the litigation director who leads quarterly meetings with regional and practice group managers. Prior to that meeting, regional and practice group managers complete summary reports. The summary reports include a review of open and closed cases, a description of “routine” and “non-routine” cases, and a description of impact cases. The quarterly review enables the program to identify impact cases early and develop those cases appropriately.

The program has a written policy about selecting cases for appeal. The policy states that the trial attorney is responsible for completing and submitting an appeal request form to the litigation director. In practice, the managing or supervising attorney writes a memo to the litigation director. If a case is chosen for appeal, the litigation director assigns a “litigation team” that typically includes the attorney who litigated the underlying case, a mix of experienced and less-experienced attorneys, and sometimes a volunteer attorney from the private bar. There is no written policy regarding the composition of an appellate litigation team.

Attorneys throughout the program described a lack of transparency regarding the staffing of litigation teams and many staff attorneys said they did not know how to indicate their interest in being placed on an appellate litigation team. Several experienced attorneys expressed frustration regarding the process of selecting cases for appeal and wanted more information about the reasons that recommended cases were rejected for appeal. Some attorneys reported they never received an explanation for rejection of a case for appeal, which led to a perception that the process is arbitrary. Staff reported even more concern about the process of assembling litigation teams. Staff indicated that on more than one occasion, the attorney who litigates the underlying case was excluded from the litigation team handling the case on appeal. Staff reported that this was troubling and demoralizing for the staff involved.

LANC should develop a more transparent process for selecting and rejecting cases for appeal that is well-communicated to attorney staff. The policy for staffing appellate cases should be standardized and written and provide staff attorneys with a clear mechanism for indicating interest in appellate work.

Native American Unit

Finding 20: The Native American Unit provides high-quality representation to eligible clients residing in the Qualla Boundary and Robeson County but needs additional resources to support work in support of federally unrecognized tribes.

LANC provides legal outreach and advocacy to the Native American community in two distinct geographical areas. The Sylva office, in the western part of the state, provides services to the Eastern Cherokee Band of Indians (ECBI). In the southeastern part of the state, the Pembroke office provides services to Native Americans that are not members of federally recognized tribes. These two communities have different needs owing to distinct historical factors.

The ECBI are the descendants of the families that hid in the mountains of North Carolina to escape President Andrew Jackson’s forcible removal campaign of 1838-1839, known as the Trail of Tears. The tribe strictly controls membership, limiting it to those who can provide proof they are at least 1/16 (great-grandparent) ECBI, with ancestry tracing back to the original 805 founding families.

In the 1870s, the ECBI bought their land, called the Qualla Boundary, from the U.S. government. Although this land is not a “reservation”, similar to a reservation the land is held in trust by the federal government.¹⁴ The Qualla Boundary has a total land area of almost 83 square miles and a total resident population of 9,018 people.¹⁵ Qualla Boundary land is non-contiguous and is located in five counties in North Carolina. Due to the strict tribal enrollment requirements maintained by the ECBI, many Native Americans living on tribal land are not enrolled members of the tribe.

Enrolled ECBI members receive a per capita share of the profits from the tribe’s casino and hotel. The hotel is the largest hotel in North Carolina. The annual share of profits to tribal members ranges from $6,000-$10,000. For enrolled children, the profits are held in trust until either age 18 for high school graduates or age 21 for non-graduates. The payout once enrolled children become entitled to the money ranges from $100,000-$150,000. The ECBI also use an enrolled member preference system for tribal employment and are the largest single employer in the western part of the state. Most ECBI employees earn too much to qualify for legal services, and LANC’s income guidelines for the ECBI are 200 percent above the federal poverty level.

The influx of money into the tribal land has not spared it from problems. There are high levels of drug trafficking, and drug and alcohol abuse. Crime and domestic violence are consistent problems. Some tribal members lack the financial literacy to manage the share of profits appropriately and are left in poverty. Property disputes are common because only enrolled members may own property, while non-enrolled spouses and children are only allowed a life estate. As is true in many areas with high rates of drug addiction, custody disputes are common, and grandparents are increasingly taking on caretaker roles for children whose parents are in active addiction. Potential adoption cases are complex because of the Indian Child Welfare Act.

LANC’s staff are well-versed in the complex historical, legal, and social issues facing the ECBI and other Native Americans living on tribal land. Attorneys demonstrated a deep knowledge of the relationships between state court and the tribal court system and collaborate successfully with the tribal counterpart, Tribal Legal Services. This knowledge was recently borne out in an important legal case. There is no housing code on the Qualla Boundary, so tenants have no protection. A LANC attorney successfully persuaded a tribal court judge to apply state eviction law to a tribal court eviction case. This is a tremendous outcome not just for North Carolina law, but for Native American law across the country.

In Pembroke, Native Americans face a different set of challenges. Seven tribes have been recognized by the state of North Carolina, but not by the federal government.¹⁶ Most significant is the Lumbee tribe, who if recognized would be the largest tribe on the East Coast. The history of ¹⁴ An important part of ECBI history and heritage concerns the fact that the ECBI bought the Qualla Boundary land, it was not “reserved” for them by the federal government. In order to accurately reflect the history of the Qualla Boundary, the term “tribal land” will be used, as opposed to “reservation”.

the Lumbee claims for recognition is complex.¹⁷ Robeson County, where the Lumbee primarily reside, has the highest poverty rate in North Carolina¹⁸. The attorneys working on Native American issues in the Pembroke office are focused on pursuing federal recognition claims for tribes currently unrecognized. This work has been delayed by the inability of the Robeson office to hire an expert for a relatively modest sum to assist with the tribal recognition process.

LANC should make retention of the identified expert to assist in the tribal recognition process an immediate program priority and set goals and timetables for obtaining federal tribal recognition on behalf of its clients.

Finding 21: LANC agricultural worker staff pursue a variety of legal strategies, including complex litigation, and have designed an effective outreach strategy.

Agricultural Worker Unit

LANC’s agricultural worker unit is based primarily in the Raleigh office. The unit does extensive outreach to connect with agricultural workers across the state during the harvest period, which generally runs from April to late October . The unit conducts outreach in teams during the evenings, Sunday-Thursday. There are generally six to seven teams at any time, made up of LANC staff and bilingual volunteers. Outreach trips generally take place in a 90-100 mile radius from the Raleigh office, with some additional overnight trips to the southeastern part of the state. Overall, the program visits an impressive 200 farms each season.

Clients contact the agricultural worker unit in many ways, including in-person during outreach, via an 800-number established for the agricultural worker unit, agency referrals, and social media. All agricultural worker unit staff and volunteers are bilingual in Spanish, and the unit maintains a spreadsheet of interpreters for 46 other languages, including indigenous languages common to farmworkers such as Mixteco.

The agricultural worker unit focuses on several legal issues. As in other agricultural areas, the program is seeing an increase in H-2A workers and has expertise in the specific legal issues faced by these workers. Specifically, the program is seeing the exploitation of H-2A workers brought from Mexico and Central America via “temporary staffing” companies. These workers are moved from farm to farm, sometimes across state lines. These workers are vulnerable to exploitation and trafficking, and LANC has several federal cases pending regarding this issue. More generally, agricultural workers describe problems including wage issues, substandard housing, and general labor law violations. The agricultural unit has deep expertise in this area, including one attorney who has practiced in agricultural worker law for 20 years. The program diligently pursues cases under federal and state law.

Private Attorney Involvement

Finding 22: LANC is committed to effectively integrating volunteer attorneys in the delivery of legal services to clients throughout North Carolina by offering a range of volunteer opportunities and encouraging and supporting volunteers.

LANC's Private Attorney Involvement (PAI) program has centralized and local elements. LANC has a centralized Volunteer Lawyer Program (VLP) that is co-located with the CIU. This team has eight staff, of whom two are part-time. Staff includes a non-attorney supervising coordinator, who is supervised by the CIU managing attorney. This central VLP office receives cases directly from the CIU. Besides this centralized office, five field offices assign VLP duties to a paralegal who serves as a part-time pro bono coordinator and is supervised by the managing attorney of that field office. At the Charlotte office, VLP work is planned in collaboration with the Charlotte Center for Legal Advocacy (CCLA). LANC plans to move to a centralized VLP structure gradually as pro bono coordinators retire or transition to other positions.

The core centralized pro bono program at LANC offers a wide range of volunteer opportunities, including participation in remote videoconferencing legal clinics, extended service cases, co-counseling cases, and assistance to homeless clients in shelters. LANC has been successful with the Lawyer on the Line project and Law Student on the Line project, both of which allow volunteers to provide telephone advice to eligible clients. Additionally, sometimes volunteer attorneys participate in special projects at LANC. For example, the CIU has launched a statewide expunction relief project. In 2018, pro bono advocates from a range of law firms and corporations launched the Charlotte Triage Pro Bono Project in collaboration with CCLA and LANC's Charlotte office. This collaboration specifically works on eviction defense, expunctions, and healthcare enrollment in the Charlotte area.

LANC has written policies covering every aspect of the VLP program, and the pro bono coordinator has developed flowcharts and models to ensure efficient and consistent placement and oversight of cases.

Volunteers are recruited through CLE offerings, at bar association events, and through the program's website and social media. Volunteer attorneys receive training, reference materials, an attorney mentor from LANC staff, and research materials. Volunteer attorneys reported high satisfaction with the support they received from LANC.

While the centralized VLP program is providing increased efficiency, monitoring, and oversight, some field offices were dissatisfied. Specifically, advocates from multiple field offices expressed that they felt disconnected from efforts to recruit local attorneys. Advocates described regional and local nuances that have clear effects on the willingness of local attorneys to provide volunteer assistance. Other field offices articulated that they did not receive communication from the central VLP office, and that input from field offices was not solicited sufficiently.

LANC should develop a more comprehensive strategy for engaging field offices in local recruitment efforts and for communicating between the centralized VLP and the field offices.

Other program services and activities on behalf of the low-income population

Finding 23: LANC consistently develops new methods of delivering legal information to the client-eligible community.

LANC's primary form of outreach and legal education is the remote video-conferencing legal clinic system. These clinics are broadcast simultaneously to up to 91 locations, including community centers and libraries. The locations and topics are developed in response to a combination of requests from community partners and an analysis of the information requested by callers to the CIU. The remote video-conferencing clinic was started in the biggest counties in the state. Sometimes LANC partners with other statewide organizations—for example, legal clinics are held in 20 offices of North Carolina Works. LANC's intake manager periodically reviews the geographic distribution of the clinics. If gaps are located, the program consults the database of social service providers to find a potential new clinic location. The program reports this is an efficient and effective way to distribute information. Clinics are divided into two major categories. The first is legal information clinics. These summarize a legal topic such as employee rights or tenant rights, and information about how to access legal resources. The second is focused on pro se clinics. These include instructions about how to complete and file court forms, such as divorce or custody forms. At the conclusion of the remote clinics, volunteer attorneys are available to answer questions. The program estimates it serves between 150-200 locations per month.

The CIU offers a wide range of self-help packets on common legal topics, which are available on the LANC website. The program recently developed short informative videos to assist pro se litigants. For example, CIU found that many callers had questions about how to request a continuance in a domestic violence case. In response, the program used a mock trial room and made a video demonstrating correct court procedure.

There are additional local efforts. For example, at the Durham office, the housing unit collaborates with the Duke Civil Justice Clinic to offer an eviction defense clinic at the courthouse every other week. Various projects and field offices conduct additional community education projects. For example, the Advocates for Children's Services (ACS) project provides community education to service providers who interact with juveniles in need, such as juvenile court counselors, juvenile defenders, *guardian ad litem*s, mental health providers, and Department of Social Services social workers.

PERFORMANCE AREA FOUR. Effectiveness of governance, leadership and administration.

Board governance

Finding 24: The board is composed of diverse, engaged members who work actively to handle their duties.

LANC's board has 27 members and demonstrates racial, ethnic, gender, and geographical diversity. Board members are limited to two three-year terms, and bylaws allow a board member to rejoin after a year off the board. The full board meets quarterly, and a quorum is always present at meetings. The board's fiscal committee reviews financial information monthly, including comparing the budget to actual income and expenses. This fiscal committee includes a certified public accountant and the chief financial officer of LANC. The executive committee meets quarterly and the operations committee meets monthly. Other active committees include the personnel committee, fundraising committee, audit committee, client affairs committee, and development committee. Committees include non-board members. Committee assignments are made by the executive director and board chair annually. All committees report back to the full board.

Materials are sent to board members a week prior to each board meeting. Board members may receive the board book electronically. Board orientation is provided for all new board members, and board members frequently attend training sessions, such as the Financial Essentials Training presented by Management Information Exchange.

LANC supplements board meetings with meetings of the Client Council, a group composed of client-eligible board members and members of the community. The Client Council generally meets the day before the board meeting, and overnight accommodations are provided for client-eligible members. The agenda for Client Council meetings is set by the chairperson of the Client Council. Most Client Council members are recruited by existing members, and interviewed by one of the deputy directors before joining the council. Client Council meetings include presentations about available social services and the work of LANC. Client Council members do extensive outreach in their communities.

LANC also maintains a network of Local Advisory Councils (LAC). These local advisory councils were originally formed when organizations merged to form LANC—the councils were the boards of directors of the merged organizations. The local advisory councils have varying levels of activity. Some still meet regularly, while others meet occasionally. The board recently appointed a board liaison to each local advisory council.

The board members interviewed on-site lacked clarity on the evaluation of the executive director. Some board members thought the evaluation had happened, some thought it was upcoming. However, the board has an executive director evaluation policy adopted by the board in June 2014. The evaluation process occurs every other January, on odd-numbered years. The policy details the steps of the evaluation, which include a staff survey, board survey, and self-evaluation. There is a clear process of discussion between the board and executive director, a written evaluation, an option for the executive director to provide a response to the evaluation, and a review of the evaluation by the full board.

Finding 25: Client board members are invested in LANC's work, but not all board members reported that client board members and attorney board members were well integrated.

Client board members were deeply engaged with LANC's mission. The client board members interviewed were invested in promoting LANC to the communities they live and work within. Multiple client-eligible board members described distributing outreach materials and informational pamphlets regularly to community agencies and other key outreach points in their communities.

Client-eligible board members are active in board committees and articulated their board responsibilities well. The Client Council meetings held before board meetings typically include a training element such as a presentation from LANC staff. The chairperson of the Client Council presents at every board meeting.

The PQV team found that some client board members had concerns about interactions with attorney board members. In particular, attorney board members were reported to disengage and become inattentive when client-eligible board members were speaking during board meetings.

Recommendation IV.1.25.1

The board should consider equity and inclusion training, and/or set new expectations about how to value the contributions made by client-eligible members.

Leadership

Finding 26: LANC's executive director is highly-respected within the program and throughout the state justice community, however, he is too deeply involved in all aspects of the organization's day-to-day operations.

The executive director has been in place for over 19 years. In the past several years, he faced difficult choices due to dramatic losses in state funding. He carefully navigated his way around these obstacles and restored stable funding to the organization. Staff at every level expressed their admiration for the executive director and find him an inspiring leader. He is well-known for his impeccable work ethic and the depth of his commitment to legal services. He has a strong reputation in the state justice community and has leveraged his considerable influence to recruit high-quality board members.

The executive director has a heavy role in upper-level management and somewhat routine administrative work. He directly supervises 33 people, including all the managing attorneys and special project managers, and is involved in routine administrative duties such as mileage reimbursement requests. He hires all supervising and managing attorneys and fires any attorneys. The executive director writes almost all grant applications and is deeply involved in human resources and public relations activities. As mentioned below in Finding 35, the administrative office is currently understaffed. Administrative office staff expressed a willingness and ability to take on responsibilities that were more complex.

Some aspects of decision-making seemed to rest solely with the executive director. For example, the executive director solely decided the major topics to be addressed through the most recent strategic planning effort. The executive director seems to meet with his upper-level staff individually, and not as a management team.

Recommendation IV.2.26.1*

The executive director should find opportunities to delegate to his management team and to involve his management team in long-term planning.

Technology Infrastructure and Administration

Finding 27: LANC's underinvestment in technology directly impedes the efficiency of staff and the ability to deliver services to clients.

Staff across the program expressed deep frustration with LANC's technology, particularly the program's unreliable and unstable case management system (CMS). At the time of the visit, staff reported that IT outages were occurring with greater frequency – sometimes lasting a few hours, if not longer -- and that problems with the CMS and other systems impaired their ability complete work. Staff at the CIU and at field offices reported frequent problems, and case handlers expressed concern with entering data into the CMS, as the system would regularly crash and force users to re-enter lost information. LANC's email system is prone to similar slowdowns and crashes, though they appear to be less frequent than the CMS issues. Staff expressed these frustrations in a survey distributed before the LSC visit, and in response, a member of the Technology Initiative Grant team conducted a desk review, which informed these findings and recommendations.

There are several likely reasons for the instability and unreliability of the IT environment. The program has used Legal Files for the past 17 years. Due to funding uncertainty, LANC has not upgraded the system in six to eight years and had not explored alternative products until recently. LANC's legacy version of Legal Files is no longer a good fit for the organization given its size and the needs of its case handlers. A CMS deployed in the early-2000s is not designed to handle the significant data -- including large PDF files and other work product -- that the hundreds of LANC advocates now routinely upload to Legal Files. The program has not purged old CMS records and stores 17 years of case information on Legal Files, which is likely one of the primary reasons users are experiencing so many problems. Similarly, there is at least 10 years' worth of emails stored in its on-premise Microsoft Exchange server, which is likely causing technical problems around users' emails. The current system also doesn't offer the web browser-based mobility that many attorneys require, and the inability to customize it prevents LANC from continuing to offer an online application and exploring helpful enhancements that an up-to-date system could offer users.

Leadership is planning several key upgrades in response to these technology-related problems, including a transition to Legal Server over the next nine to 10 months and a move to Microsoft Office 365 shortly thereafter. While these upgrades should address many of the technology-related problems staff experience, LANC also needs to pursue short-term solutions to mitigate these issues over the transition period. Purging several years of data from Legal Files and Exchange should increase the reliability of these systems and help users work more efficiently over the next year.

The program should develop concrete project plans for transitioning to Legal Server and Office 365 and devote the resources and staff necessary to complete this transition as soon as possible.

Recommendation IV.3.27.2*

The program should develop an electronic document retention plan that allows old case files to be cleared out of Legal Files and systematically remove files according to the plan. They should also remove or archive old emails from Microsoft Exchange.

Finding 28: LANC plans to implement several technological upgrades over the next year, but the program may not have sufficient staffing in place to support these projects.

LANC has begun an ambitious plan to upgrade several of its key technology systems. It has moved many of its offices to a hosted VoIP phone system through Mitel and upgraded bandwidth in several locations. Out of LANC's 25 offices, seven still need to be migrated to the new phone system. As mentioned above, the program is also planning to transition its CMS from Legal Files to Legal Server and move to Microsoft Office 365. Adopting these cloud-based solutions will make the program less reliant on the current virtual desktop infrastructure and the program's wide area network, both of which appear overextended under LANC's current IT approach. The program will use the newer Citrix StoreFront solution to deliver a few local applications when necessary.

The technology changes and upgrades are necessary and should proceed as soon as possible. Considering the overall size of the program (almost 350 employees), the number of offices, and the plan to pursue several projects concurrently, LANC will need to ensure sufficient personnel is in place to roll out these new systems. The technology department has the equivalent of three and a half full-time employees, including the department head. At the time of the visit, the program was planning on hiring a full-time help desk technician. The program also has the equivalent of about one and a half full-time employees through its various IT consultant contracts. Overall, the staffing level during the migration will be about six full-time employees, which may be an appropriate staffing number in the long-term, particularly once the program completes its transition to cloud-based systems that require less in-house maintenance and support.

The short-term technology needs involved in migrating several systems simultaneously will require more staffing, though. The program should consider additional staffing, whether through short-term contracts, temporary employees, or increased consulting services. The consultant groups have not been assessed in over five years, and it would be worthwhile for the program to evaluate the quality and value of these existing arrangements. Finally, the planned initiatives will require significant project management expertise, and LANC should ensure that members of its technology team (either staff or consultants) have that capacity.

The program should examine current technology personnel resources and ensure sufficient resources are in place to support its upcoming major technology initiatives.

Finding 29: The program does not effectively communicate with staff regarding technology.

Staff shared considerable frustration about LANC's IT environment. Exacerbating these feelings was the lack of communication from the central office. When asked about their understanding of the cause of the technology-related problems, staff had little knowledge. Similarly, the staff at the administrative office were not fully aware of the extent to which staff across the program were affected by technology problems, including the staff's growing frustration as key systems continued to decline. LANC did recently ask staff to complete a survey about technology-related problems, which helped lead to some of the planned upgrades, but more work needs to be done to improve communications.

When faced with an issue affecting all staff daily, the technology department should try to understand the extent of the problem, communicate the reasons for the problem, and outline proposed solutions and timeline. While some efforts had been made, it's clear that staff did not find those efforts to be commensurate with technology problems across the organization.

Related to finding number IV.6.36.1 below regarding communication, LANC should develop a plan to regularly update staff program-wide about technology issues and planned technology improvements. The technology department should be consistently updating administrative office staff regarding user experiences.

Finding 30: The program does not sufficiently engage in long-term technology planning. Technology initiatives are not considered as part of strategic planning.

Some staff reported that the technology department holds quarterly meetings, but these meetings had not taken place for a while. There did not seem to be any integration between the technology department and the other strategic initiatives being pursued by LANC. The technology challenges being faced by LANC were foreseeable and could have been addressed at an earlier stage with more rigorous planning. Upper-level management needs more alignment about technology needs and there should be more involvement of technology staff in long-term strategic planning.

The technology department should reinstate quarterly planning meetings. The technology department should consider a regular way of involving other staff in technology planning. The technology team should regularly update the rest of upper-level management.

Finding 31: The program uses technology appropriately to communicate between offices and deliver legal information and pro se services.

Several years ago, LANC received a technology initiative grant to implement a video-conferencing system, which runs on a platform called Zoom. The program implemented Zoom at all offices across the program. This has been very successful and is used regularly to communicate between offices. The program is using the video-conferencing system to deliver legal information clinics to 91 locations simultaneously. The program is planning on creating client-facing document assembly interviews through A2J Author, reinstating online intake, and demonstrates a strong commitment to helping the considerable number of self-represented litigants in North Carolina receive better assistance.

Finding 32: LANC's financial management team conducts appropriate oversight.

The financial management team at LANC is led by a chief financial officer (CFO), who supervises a staff of five, which include a senior accountant, three accountants, and a staff member responsible for accounts payable. The CFO works remotely from Los Angeles. Although unconventional, there did not seem to be any issues with this remote arrangement. The CFO creates initial drafts of the budget and determines the final budget after extensive consultation with the executive director. The CFO provides monthly updates to the finance committee of the board, and quarterly updates to the full board. The program has had clean audits for several years, and the CFO works with the audit committee of the board to hire the auditor and review the audit.

The financial management team does not include a Certified Public Accountant (CPA), but staff have extensive financial management experience and have attended financial training offered by Management Information Exchange. A CPA sits on the audit committee of the board. The financial management team has an accounting manual and uses Blackbaud software. The team manages the accounting needs for 95 funding sources.

Human Resources Administration

Finding 33: The human resources team is highly-skilled but understaffed.

The human resources office is staffed by one full-time director with an MBA and a Professional in Human Resources certificate. Human resources duties are shared by the human resources director, executive director, assistant directors, public relations director and managing attorneys. As mentioned in Finding 26, the executive director takes significant responsibility for hiring and firing of attorneys. The human resources director spends much of her time onboarding new staff, preparing payroll, tracking time on payroll, and responding to staff inquiries about benefits. She has the training and ability to handle other tasks, such as working on recruitment and retention issues, and workplace culture. However, as a one-person department, she does not have the capacity to handle these higher-level human resources issues. The human resources director reported that in 14 years, she has only missed one payroll period. Having other staff available to manage payroll and answer benefits questions would allow the human resources director to perform at her full capacity.

Finding 34: Employees are supported by a generous benefits program and a detailed performance evaluation process, but LANC's low salaries and lack of a formal grievance system are a weakness.

Employees were very satisfied with the benefits offered at LANC. The program is self-insured and has an excellent health insurance plan. Additional benefits include life insurance, long-term disability, and loan repayment. Employer pension contributions have fluctuated in recent years, but the program has consistently contributed between four percent and seven percent. Paid time off is generous, and the program offers a paid sabbatical for employees after seven years of service.

¹⁹ This visit was conducted by the Office of Program Performance (OPP) for the purposes set forth in the Introduction. OPP findings and recommendations under this criterion are limited to staffing, organization, and general functions. Assessment of fiscal operations is conducted by other offices at LSC.

Unfortunately, the staff is not as satisfied with the salary scale and some felt it was a staff retention issue. Relatedly, staff are frustrated that information about the salary scale was no longer available on an internal website. Staff found it difficult to make long-term financial decisions without knowing about potential future salary increases.

Staff described a detailed and thorough performance evaluation process, which for most people occurs annually on their hiring anniversary. However, some staff have been evaluated on more irregular timeframes, and a few staff indicated that they had never received an evaluation. CIU staff are evaluated every two years.

The program had no formal grievance system in place. Employees have the option to submit complaints anonymously via the program website. However, these are all sent automatically to the executive director. There is no formal process by which employees can submit complaints about the executive director.

Recommendation IV.5.34.1

The human resources department should ensure that all staff receives timely performance evaluations.

Recommendation IV.5.34.2

The program should create a formal grievance procedure.

Overall Management and administration

Finding 35: The program's lean staffing model for the administrative office is not providing sufficient support to a program of LANC's size.

The executive director is assisted by two deputy directors and an upper management team, including a human resources director, public relations director, IT director, and finance director. Field offices are managed by managing attorneys and split into five regions covered by regional managers. LANC has very lean overhead. The executive director estimated that overhead is only at eight percent. The administrative office is understaffed given the program's size. This was particularly apparent in the main office administrative team and in the technology, human resources, and public relations departments. In all three departments, staff described being unable to perform at the full range of their skill set because they are tasked with basic and routine administrative tasks necessary to maintain a program of LANC's size.

Recommendation IV.6.35.1*:

LANC should examine staffing levels and, as resources permit, expand staff in the administrative office to appropriately support the program, particularly in the areas of human resources and technology.

Finding 36: Program staff would appreciate more consistent and regular communication from the administrative office.

The PQV team heard repeatedly that staff were unaware of developments from the administrative office. Specifically, the staff was confused about the new skills training program for paralegals and attorneys. Staff also lacked information about the previous strategic plan and forthcoming strategic planning. As mentioned in the discussion of legal work, staff wanted more transparency about how litigation teams were compiled and appellate cases were chosen. Several staff members mentioned that they had no information about the salary scale and that this was troubling to them.

Recommendation IV.6.36.1*:

The administrative office, including the executive director, should engage in consistent, regularly scheduled communication across the program regarding proposed programmatic changes, strategic planning, litigation updates, technology updates, and other issues of concern to staff across the organization.

General Resource Development

Finding 37: The resource development team pursues a range of strategies to increase individual giving.

The resource development team is led by a director of development, who manages three full-time development staff. The program has 95 grants to manage. In 2017, corporate and individual contributions were $750,000, which is around five percent of the program's total budget.

LANC has a diversified funding mix. LSC funds are 51 percent of total funding. Of the other funding that LANC receives, 16 percent is other federal funds, and 10 percent is state and local grants. The remaining 23 percent is a combination of foundation grants, United Way grants, IOLTA grants, Bar Association awards, and private donations.²⁰

The program is strategic about not conducting an annual gala to raise funds in that they consider such an event too low of a return for the investment. Instead, the program focuses on direct appeals to attorneys. The program focuses on retaining donors by writing personalized thank-you cards. The board is involved in this effort and writes thank you cards at every board meeting. This strategy has led to a repeat donor rate of 70 percent. The program has also benefited from large individual donations made as part of planned giving. For the upcoming year, the resource development team plans to pursue strategies including corporate giving, law firm donations, individual donations, and a capital campaign. To assist in this effort, the resource development team uses eTapestry donor management software.

The program collaborates with other legal service agencies regarding fundraising. In the western part of the state, around Asheville, LANC does not pursue fundraising because it does not want to compete with Pisgah Legal Services, a well-known local legal services provider there. In Charlotte, the non-LSC funded program, the Charlotte Center for Legal Advocacy, takes the lead in designing joint fundraising efforts and donates one-third of fundraising proceeds to LANC.

Participation in an Integrated legal services delivery system

Finding 38: LANC is an important and trusted partner in ensuring access to justice in North Carolina.

LANC is by far the largest legal services provider in North Carolina. Other legal services providers in North Carolina serve a limited geographic range or focus on special populations. Stakeholders indicated that LANC is an eager collaborator on statewide and regional access to justice projects. LANC works with the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC). Recently, LANC launched a project around expunctions, and as part of that project conducted research county-by-county on the expunction process. This research was deeply valuable to the AOC, which did not have comprehensive information about county-level procedures.

CONCLUSION

Legal Aid of North Carolina is a unified program with a comprehensive delivery structure aimed at providing access to justice and competent legal representation for low-income North Carolinians. Staff members are dedicated to the mission of the program and trust the program's leadership to continue to guide the program successfully through any upcoming challenges. With increased attention to technology, strategic planning, and the implementation of recommendations in this report, LANC will ensure its continued future as a cornerstone of legal services in North Carolina.

Dear Vanessa,

I hope this finds you well.

We have appended our responses to the outline of findings and recommendations included in the OPP draft report of the Quality Program Visit conducted by your team in October 2018.

The site visit and report were immensely helpful to us and, as you will see in our responses, we took serious issue with very few of the recommendations. We did however attempt to add some context and explanation where we thought that would be useful.

Please let me know if I can add additional information or clarify any responses that we offered. With much appreciation for your thoughtful report, I am

Sincerely,

FINDINGS, CONCLUSIONS, AND RECOMMENDATIONS OUTLINED AND APPENDED WITH RESPONSES

PERFORMANCE AREA ONE. EFFECTIVENESS IN IDENTIFYING THE MOST PRESSING CIVIL LEGAL NEEDS OF LOW-INCOME PEOPLE IN THE SERVICE AREA AND TARGETING RESOURCES TO ADDRESS THOSE NEEDS.

Needs Assessment

Finding 1: The annual needs assessment that LANC conducts does not adequately solicit feedback directly from the low-income population.

Recommendation 1.1.1.1 8-LANC should conduct a comprehensive legal needs assessment that includes input from the low-income community, input from stakeholders who work with the client-eligible community, relevant data such as U.S. Census data, and any other relevant needs assessments of the low-income population. LANC should consider partnering with an academic institution to design and implement the needs assessment.

LANC Response:

LANC conducted a needs assessment survey that was not completed by the time of the QPV. The survey was administered to 5700 respondents comprising members of the bench, bar, and community. Over 500 responses were received. (A copy of the report is attached to the email). The 2008 needs assessment was conducted in conjunction with the NC Equal Access to Justice Commission. In 2012, we conducted a needs assessment in collaboration with First Health, a health care provider that supports LANC MLP work.

To review our annual needs assessment process: LANC annually conducts in each of its twenty-plus offices and twelve statewide projects an individualized work plan for each advocate and for the office or project as a whole. The written reports are essentially work force and capacity reviews, along with anecdotal recommendations on client needs. Every quarter each practice group conducts a review of our work and capacity. In 2018, the practice group managers, under the supervision of the litigation director, undertook a detailed, comprehensive review and restructuring of the LANC priorities that was submitted to the LANC Board for review. In addition to the client members on its statewide board, LANC maintains with two a statewide Clients Council that regularly includes about forty active members who meet throughout the year and in-person in conjunction with LANC Board. Two staff liaisons work with the Clients Council and LANC staff, from various projects, make regular presentations about our work to the Clients Council. In addition, each local office has a Local Advisory Council (LAC) that includes members from the local bar, business leaders, and community members, including clients. Our statewide call center annually receives approximately 200,000 discrete client inquiries concerning legal needs and questions. (See OPP Finding 3, infra.) We track our calls and keep abreast of developing trends in the inquiries and from where they arise.

It is difficult to imagine that the traditional needs assessment model could provide any additional information, especially considering the significant time and expense involved. The client needs and organizational resource allocation and capacity that we develop in this process is more comprehensive, more dynamic and current, and thus more useful than the snapshot created by the traditional needs assessment. LANC, in spite of its size, remains highly flexible and responsive to emerging needs: We have not missed, or been late on, any emerging needs that our clients have experienced. Indeed, our ability to maintain a high-level of quality legal assistance to our clients, while enrolling 500,000 clients into the ACA in each of the last four years and responding thoroughly to the many natural disasters that have hit our state, are significant points of pride for us.

Nonetheless, LANC has begun to reach out to our stakeholders about collaborating with LANC on a needs assessment for our justice community. Last week, our Equal Access to Justice Commission concluded that it could not undertake the project this year. LANC thus will be seeking a collaboration with an academic institution to conduct a needs assessment with funding from our IOLTA program or with the use of the substantial cy pres awards that LANC just received.

Strategic Planning

Finding 2: LANC developed a strategic plan in 2014 and plans to engage in a new strategic planning process, and develop a new strategic plan in 2019.

Recommendation 1.2.2.1-LANC should develop a strategic planning process that includes more input from the staff, board, and the community, and develop a timeline for the process.*

LANC Response:

Although the current LANC strategic plan process initially was designed by a small board committee; i.e., the executive director and a professor from Duke Law School (and the facilitator/reporter for the strategic planning process), the final plan was developed through multiple committees that each included board, staff, clients, and other stakeholders throughout the process. The LANC Board will initiate a new strategic planning process starting with a multi-day retreat process at its June 2019 meeting. We will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented in our process.

Recommendation 1.2.2.2-LANC should develop a strategic plan that includes short- and long-term goals for all aspects of the program, including the legal work, intake, resource development, technology, administration, communications (internal and external), human resources, and financial administration. The strategic plan should include goals, tasks, people responsible for tasks, and timelines for completion of tasks.*

LANC Response:

We will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented into our operation.

Recommendation 1.2.2.3-Once the new strategic plan is complete and approved by the board, LANC should develop a rollout process to ensure that the staff and board are aware of the plan, its contents, and their respective role in its implementation.

LANC Response:

We attribute any general lack of awareness among staff and board to our current strategic planning objectives to the significant turnover in board and staff since the last strategic plan was adopted and implemented. The executive director has reported to the LANC Board on the status and success of the implementation of the strategic plan on numerous occasions. Moreover, the overall objectives in the plan are regularly communicated, even if they are not specifically identified as strategic planning objectives. Nonetheless, we will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented into our operation.

Recommendation I.2.2.4-LANC should appoint a point person within the program who is responsible for regularly tracking progress on the plan and reporting to the executive director, and possibly the board, on the progress that has been made.

LANC Response:

We will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented into our operation.

Evaluation And Adjustment

Finding 3: LANC's Central Intake Unit provides the program with ongoing information about emerging legal needs.

Finding 4. LANC tracks outcomes in limited and extended services cases but does not meaningfully analyze these outcomes.

Recommendation I.4.4.1-LANC should consider using outcome data to evaluate the effectiveness of specific legal strategies and to inform programmatic and strategic decisions.

LANC Response:

We think we are very data and outcome (including economic outcome) driven: managers at every level, including local offices, special projects, and, especially our central intake unit, are extremely data and outcome driven. We would appreciate additional information on this recommendation. Staff from our intake unit has begun a new survey of clients on closed cases. Beyond that, we will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented into our operation.

PERFORMANCE AREA TWO. EFFECTIVENESS IN ENGAGING IN AND SERVING THE LOW-INCOME POPULATION THROUGHOUT THE SERVICE AREA.

Dignity And Sensitivity, Including Intake

Finding 5: The majority of intakes at LANC are handled by the program's model Central Intake Unit (CIU).

Finding 6: LANC's Central Intake Unit is a model intake system.

Finding 7. In addition to the CIU, applicants access LANC via specialized hotlines and direct referrals from agencies.

Recommendation II.1.7.1-The program should ensure that all intake portals outside of the CIU provide the same quality of service provided to CIU applicants.

LANC Response:

We will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented into our operation.

Finding 8: Staff in the Central Intake Unit are well-trained and well-supervised.

Engagement With And Access By The Low-Income Population

Finding 9: LANC's office locations are accessible to client-eligible individuals across the service area.

Finding 11: The ethnic and racial diversity of the LANC staff generally reflects the diversity of the service area.

Recommendation III.1.11.1-LANC should regularly assess staff diversity and implement recruitment and retention strategies specifically aimed at ensuring that staff diversity is reflective of the service area.

LANC Response:

LANC annually analyzes its staff and board diversity and takes seriously its responsibility to inclusiveness, and indeed affirmative action, in its recruitment, hiring, promotion, and training practices. LANC has a very active Diversity Working Group that meets monthly. The Working Group recently revised the LANC Non-discrimination Policy and our EEO Policy, which recommendations were adopted by the LANC Board. Diversity remains an important LANC objective. We will work to ensure that this recommendation is adopted and enacted in our process.

PERFORMANCE AREA THREE. EFFECTIVENESS OF LEGAL REPRESENTATION AND OTHER PROGRAM ACTIVITIES INTENDED TO BENEFIT THE LOW-INCOME POPULATION.

Legal Representation

Staffing and Expertise

Finding 12: While LANC has a diverse workforce with a wide range of experience levels, the program has a concentration of newer attorneys.

Legal Work Management, Supervision, Training, and Support

Finding 13: LANC offers ample initial and ongoing training to its advocates

Finding 14: Supervision is consistent across the program.

Finding 15: The program's management structure combines field offices, practice group units, and special project units.

Quantity and Quality of Legal Work

Finding 16: Over the past five years, LANC's case closure rates have reflected shifts in funding sources and staffing, as well as an emphasis on providing meaningful assistance in limited-service cases.

Finding 17: Changes in funding sources have affected the case types handled by LANC.

Finding 18: Advocates at LANC produce high-quality legal work and are involved in multiple innovative projects and access to justice efforts.

Finding 19: Some LANC staff expressed a desire for a more transparent process in the selection of cases to pursue on appeal.

Native American Unit

Finding 20: The Native American Unit provides high-quality representation to eligible clients residing in the Qualla Boundary and Robeson County but needs additional resources to support work in support of federally unrecognized tribes.

Recommendation III.1.20.1-LANC should make retention of the identified expert to assist in the tribal recognition process an immediate program priority and set goals and timetables for obtaining federal tribal recognition on behalf of its clients.

LANC Response:

A few years ago, LANC retained a consultant, who was an identified expert, to assist our work on behalf of the Lumbee Tribe in its federal recognition efforts, which remains an historic and longstanding priority for that community. The experience did not produce a satisfactory result. LANC management also believes there may be compliance concerns that did and could attenuate our success in this effort. We request additional direction on this recommendation.

Finding 21: LANC agricultural worker staff pursue a variety of legal strategies, including complex litigation, and have designed an effective outreach strategy.

Private Attorney Involvement

Finding 22: LANC is committed to effectively integrating volunteer attorneys in the delivery of legal services to clients throughout North Carolina by offering a range of volunteer opportunities and encouraging and supporting volunteers.

Recommendation III.2.22.1-LANC should develop a more comprehensive strategy for engaging field offices in local recruitment efforts and for communicating between the centralized VLP and the field offices.

LANC Response:

Ironically perhaps, LANC centralized its pro bono efforts a few years ago because local efforts were inconsistent due to our inability to justify individual pro bono staff in areas with small private bar membership. Centralizing the pro bono team dramatically improved results in recruiting, training, and retention of volunteers. This transition came about as a consequence of our highly successful “Lawyer On The Line” project. Centralizing the pro bono effort also substantially improved our ability to place complex cases, the effectiveness and efficiency of our case management and CSR requirements, and our general pro bono administration. Although LANC cannot afford to staff a full time pro bono coordinator in each local office, we recognize that pro bono is, and always will be, a project substantially driven by familiar, i.e., local, relationships. We will work to ensure that this recommendation is adopted and implemented where practical.

Finding 23: LANC consistently develops new methods of delivering legal information to the client-eligible community.

PERFORMANCE AREA FOUR. EFFECTIVENESS OF GOVERNANCE, LEADERSHIP AND ADMINISTRATION.

Board Governance

Finding 24: The board is composed of diverse, engaged members who work actively to handle their duties.

Finding 25: Client board members are invested in LANC’s work, but not all board members reported that client board members and attorney board members were well integrated.

Recommendation IV.1.25.1-The board should consider equity and inclusion training, and/or set new expectations about how to value the contributions made by client-eligible members.

LANC Response:

We will work to ensure that this recommendation is fully adopted and implemented into our operation. We will include this recommendation in our strategic planning.

Leadership

Finding 26: LANC’s executive director is highly-respected within the program and throughout the state justice community, however, he is too deeply involved in all aspects of the organization’s day-to-day operations.

Recommendation IV.2.26.1-The executive director should find opportunities to delegate to his management team and to involve his management team in long-term planning.*

LANC Response:

The LANC team of assistant directors, regional managers, and local managers and supervisors by and large are exceptionally talented and dedicated lawyers. They are professionals with long experience in legal services and in their communities. They need relatively little oversight in their day-to-day management of our work and our objectives.

The executive director is decidedly not a micro-manager, but does try to ensure operational quality, innovation, and fairness in personnel decisions across a large, diverse, and widespread organization. LANC comprises many local offices and special projects, and most of these have distinct office cultures that have evolved over our long history, which includes a thirty-year pre-consolidation period, the crucible for many members of our talented management corps. Moreover, the executive director deliberately stands back from some processes in order to not impinge the discussion and free-flow of ideas and, yes, criticisms of our operation.

The managers of each LANC office and special project are delegated the responsibility not only for day-to-day operations but for annual planning as well. At the moment, long term planning on attorney and paralegal skills and career development are being led by a team of middle managers. The LANC representative to the Alliance, the name of our state's consortium of legal service providers, was an assistant director, who also chaired the group. Our domestic violence, human trafficking, elder law, ACA enrollment, and MLP work are all managed tactically and strategically (with wide latitude for decision-making), by managers who run the day-to-day operations and are the face of our program to the communities in which they work. LANC regularly employs staff committees for developing internal policies on important policy issues such as personnel and career development, operations, diversity, and priorities, along with other long term aspects of the program, in which the executive director plays no committee role.

LANC assistant directors, and all its managers, are highly-motivated, experienced, and creative managers and are given a high degree of autonomy to administer and to be creative in their areas of responsibility. We strive for inclusiveness, and all managers have the freedom to voice concerns and carte blanche to criticize and opine when a problem or issue arises.

Technology Infrastructure and Administration

Finding 27: LANC's underinvestment in technology directly impedes the efficiency of staff and the ability to deliver services to clients.

Recommendation IV.3.27.1-The program should develop concrete project plans for transitioning to Legal Server and Office 365 and devote the resources and staff necessary to complete this transition as soon as possible.*

LANC Response:

(See combined technology response below.)

Recommendation IV.3.27.2-The program should develop an electronic document retention plan that allows old case files to be cleared out of Legal Files and systematically remove files according to the plan. They should also remove or archive old emails from Microsoft Exchange.*

LANC Response:

(See combined technology response below.)

Finding 28: LANC plans to implement several technological upgrades over the next year, but the program may not have sufficient staffing in place to support these projects.

LANC Response:

(See combined technology response below.)

Recommendation IV.3.28.1-The program should examine current technology personnel resources and ensure sufficient resources are in place to support its upcoming major technology initiatives.*

LANC Response:

(See combined technology response below.)

Finding 29: The program does not effectively communicate with staff regarding technology.

LANC Response:

(See combined technology response below.)

Recommendation IV.3.29.1-Related to finding number IV.6.36.1 below regarding communication, LANC should develop a plan to regularly update staff program-wide about technology issues and planned technology improvements. The technology department should be consistently updating administrative office staff regarding user experiences.

Finding 30: The program does not sufficiently engage in long-term technology planning. Technology initiatives are not considered as part of strategic planning.

Recommendation IV.3.30.1-The technology department should reinstate quarterly planning meetings. The technology department should consider a regular way of involving other staff in technology planning. The technology team should regularly update the rest of upper-level management.

LANC Technology Response:

Admittedly, LANC was going through a difficult transitional period with its technology as the OPP was interviewing staff and preparing for its site visit mid-2018. (Due to the complete loss of state legislative funding and the resulting transition to other funding, LANC significantly expanded its staff but could not fund a concomitant tech expansion.) Although we do not dispute the technology findings, much has transpired and our entire technology situation has been improved and transformed since the OPP exit in October of last year.

LANC has formed a committee of managers and staff who have been working successfully with the Legal Server consultants on our case management onboarding, including the complete data mapping and transition of information from Legal Files to Legal Server. We have brought back in Gray Wilson, who retired last year and who managed our case management and reporting for over twenty years, to assist with our onboarding and data mapping.

LANC has negotiated a contract with NetSmart to take over complete maintenance and administration of our network infrastructure and servers. NetSmart was instrumental in resolving the login and stability issues that troubled us in 2018. There have been no issues since we brought them in on (on an ad hoc basis) to troubleshoot last November. The service contract that LANC negotiated with NetSmart is currently awaiting approval from OCE. NetSmart also will assist with firewall and thin client upgrades that are planned system-wide to support all the new software. These upgrades also are awaiting approval from OCE.

NetSmart involvement significantly bolsters our IT department and personnel resources. LANC will have sufficient IT personnel to focus on Legal Server and the attendant supporting upgrades. Nonetheless, LANC is in the process of hiring another staff person for its HelpDesk.

While we think that complaints about “effective communication” were borne out of the frustration from our midyear problems, we agree that we can do a better job of communicating with staff and updating them on system status and technology improvements. The IT staff are designing a notification tree to be used to notify the field when network and system issues arise. LANC will reform its staff technology committee and schedule it to meet quarterly.

We will otherwise work to ensure that these recommendations are fully adopted and implemented into our operations.

Human Resources Administration

Finding 33: The human resources team is highly-skilled but understaffed.

Finding 34: Employees are supported by a generous benefits program and a detailed performance evaluation process, but LANC’s low salaries and lack of a formal grievance system are a weakness.

Recommendation IV.5.34.1-The human resources department should ensure that all staff receives timely performance evaluations.

LANC Response:

Low salaries are indeed a weakness. But LANC already raises its $25M budget in an environment with low IOLTA funding and almost no support from the state legislature, which remains hostile to our work. Our ability to impact this dynamic is limited by the political situation here and our regulations. We have used technology to reach more clients while providing quality and meaningful legal assistance. The choices left for LANC are to maintain services at the current level or to reduce services and pay staff more.

The HR director and the deputy director have devised an improved system for notifying local and project managers of upcoming evaluations and for getting these evaluations completed.

Recommendation IV.5.34.2-The program should create a formal grievance procedure.

LANC Response:

LANC has a grievance policy for employees who feel that they have been subjected to an adverse employment action that they believe violates a personnel or other policy. The LANC Board decided years ago that it regarded personnel determinations as the responsibility of management and would not address such grievances except when the employee reports directly to the executive director.

LANC will review this recommendation.

Overall Management and administration

Finding 35: The program's lean staffing model for the administrative office is not providing sufficient support to a program of LANC's size.

Recommendation IV.6.35.1:LANC should examine staffing levels and, as resources permit, expand staff in the administrative office to appropriately support the program, particularly in the areas of human resources and technology.*

LANC Response:

LANC is undertaking a review of this recommendation. However, other than technology staff, to which we have responded above, the recommendation, fails to identify any shortcomings in our administrative operation as justification for this recommendation. Moreover, at that same time that OPP finds line advocacy salaries to be a weakness, it now recommends hiring additional administrative and back office staff, simply based on our low overhead and administrative cost percentage, without identifying an operational need or deficiency. LANC recently reviewed our 2018 audit with our independent auditors. Ironically, our outside auditors were highly complimentary of our ability to maintain such tight internal controls and to successfully administer our large, geographically decentralized, and varied program with dozens of funding sources and responsibilities while maintaining low, but reasonable, administrative costs. The auditors were baffled by the recommendation.

We feel that unless there are findings of significant operational deficiencies in our administrative operation, this recommendation is unwarranted and, at the very least, does not warrant Tier 1 status.

Finding 36: Program staff would appreciate more consistent and regular communication from the administrative office.

Recommendation IV.6.36.1:The administrative office, including the executive director, should engage in consistent, regularly scheduled communication across the program regarding proposed programmatic changes, strategic planning, litigation updates, technology updates, and other issues of concern to staff across the organization.*

LANC Response:

We will otherwise work to ensure that these recommendations are fully adopted and implemented into our operations.

General Resource Development

Finding 37: The resource development team pursues a range of strategies to increase individual giving.

Participation in an Integrated legal services delivery system

Finding 38: LANC is an important and trusted partner in ensuring access to justice in North Carolina.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

PUBLIC TRUST AND CONFIDENCE IN THE COURTS IS AT ITS HIGHEST WHEN THE COURTS ARE SEEN AS FAIR, ACCESSIBLE, AND EFFECTIVELY MANAGED.

This report contains the final recommendations of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ).

Two decades have passed since the last time North Carolina comprehensively reviewed its court system. In September 2015, increasingly aware of mounting systemic challenges, Chief Justice Mark Martin convened the NCCALJ, a sixty-five member, multidisciplinary commission, requesting that the Commission undertake a comprehensive and independent review of North Carolina’s court system and make recommendations for improving the administration of justice in North Carolina.

The Commission’s membership was divided into five Committees: (1) Civil Justice, (2) Criminal Investigation and Adjudication, (3) Legal Professionalism, (4) Public Trust and Confidence, and (5) Technology.

Each Committee independently made recommendations within its area of study.

Highlights of the recommendations in the five reports include:

- Implementing a strategic technology plan for paperless courthouses, including e-filing
- Raising the juvenile age from sixteen to eighteen years old for crimes other than violent felonies and traffic offenses
- Reducing case delays and improving efficiency based on data analytics
- Assisting the growing number of self-represented litigants in new ways
- Taking steps to change how judges and justices are selected and retained
- Developing new tools to improve pretrial detention decision-making
- Improving the state's indigent defense system
- Surveying the public to better gauge its perception of the courts
- Training court officials to improve procedural fairness and eliminate the possibility of bias
- Creating an entity to confront changes in the market for legal services
- Restoring legal aid funding and loan repayment assistance for public interest lawyers
- Improving civic education in schools and through an active speakers bureau

The NCCALJ, through this report, presents the recommendations of the five Committees to Chief Justice Martin.

PART ONE

“A FREQUENT RECURRENCE TO FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES IS ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY TO PRESERVE THE BLESSINGS OF LIBERTY.”

North Carolina Constitution, Article I, Section 35

INTRODUCTION

For over 200 years, North Carolina’s courts have preserved the rule of law by providing a fair and accessible forum for the resolution of disputes. That solemn duty has not changed.

What has changed is the environment in which North Carolina’s courts fulfill this duty. Driven by developments in technology, our economy, and our demographics, the North Carolina judicial system finds itself facing challenges like never before. Indeed, the pace of change is likely only to accelerate.

The North Carolina Constitution reminds us that “[a] frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty.”¹ Several previous “recurrence[s] to fundamental principles” — in particular, the NCCALJ’s predecessor commissions — made great strides toward improving the quality of justice in North Carolina.

But there is still room to improve. Today, 53% of the public believes that outcomes in the courts are fair only some of the time or not at all; 63% of the public believes that cases are not handled in a timely fashion; and only 42% of the public believes that the courts are sensitive to the needs of the average citizen.²

For any court system, this is a call to action. It is time, once again, for a recurrence to the fundamental principles that provide for the rule of law, fair and accessible courts, and the blessings of liberty.

In September 2015, Chief Justice Mark Martin convened the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice to undertake that vital task. At the time, he reminded the Commission that “the power to administer justice is a sacred public trust that must be guarded carefully by each generation.”

This report documents the work that this generation must do to maintain that trust, both today and in the future.

THE COMMISSION’S WORK

Earlier court reform efforts focused on basic structural issues requiring constitutional changes. The NCCALJ, by contrast, has focused its efforts primarily on improving operations within the existing administrative framework.

Many of the recommendations are within the Judicial Branch’s authority to implement on its own. Other recommendations require the support of the North Carolina General Assembly, through either legislation or appropriations.

The recommendations in this report are data-driven and based on extensive discussion. Each recommendation is important on its own, but the Commission’s body of work as a whole creates a framework for a dramatic, systemic improvement to the administration of justice in North Carolina.

The recommendations cover many aspects of the courts’ work and build on several core values:

- A court system should have the trust and confidence of the people whom it serves.
- The courts exist solely to uphold the rule of law for the people that it serves.
- Court proceedings should be fair, accessible, and effectively managed.

The Commission was structured as an independent, multidisciplinary study group comprised of sixty-five voting members, eight reporters, and over a dozen ex officio members.

Collectively, the Commission comprised a robust and diverse cross section of leaders from the business world, the nonprofit sector, state and local government, the legal profession, and academia, each of whom volunteered a significant amount of time (collectively, more than 4,000 hours) to serve on the Commission.

A LOOK BACK: HOW WE GOT HERE

A Major Restructuring. North Carolina has conducted an in-depth review of its court system only a few times since becoming a state. The first was in the post-Civil War Reconstruction period. That examination led to the replacement of lifetime legislative appointment of judges with public election of judges and to the proliferation of local courts — recorders’ courts, city courts, county courts, mayors’ courts — organized around the needs of each local community. The society served by this system was stable, rural, and agrarian.

The 20th century brought growth in population, mobility, and industry to the state, and with it, new challenges to North Carolina’s courts. The notion of equal justice became strained as the unique structure of each local court system meant that similar cases were not handled similarly in all parts of the state. This patchwork of courts, with their accompanying differences in rules, procedures, and jurisdictional scope, defied understanding to all but insiders. It produced broad disparities in outcomes under what was, at least nominally, the same body of state law. Increasingly, these circumstances eroded and undercut the trust and confidence of the very people that the courts were intended to serve.

By the 1950s, the political, business, and legal leadership of the state decided that something needed to be done and initiated the second statewide court reform effort. The job of the North Carolina Bar Association’s Committee on Improving and Expediting the Administration of Justice in North Carolina was simple: create a system better suited to a modern, industrial state.³ That committee, known popularly as the Bell Commission (so named after its chair, Judge Spencer Bell), provided the framework for the court structure that is still in place today.

“ JUDICIAL REFORM IS NO SPORT FOR THE SHORT-WINDED. ”

Arthur T. Vanderbilt, former Chief Justice of the New Jersey Supreme Court

The Bell Commission envisioned a court system that was unified, uniform, and state funded, and the system that emerged by 1970 accomplished those goals. All local courts were replaced by a uniform system of district court judges and magistrates who joined with the Supreme Court, the superior courts, and the newly created Court of Appeals in a new General Court of Justice. Court costs, jurisdiction of judges, and salaries of all court officials became uniform throughout the state. In addition, the Bell Commission’s work led to the creation of both the Court of Appeals and the Administrative Office of the Courts. It took fifteen years from the creation of the study until full implementation, but the results were profound.

The Bell Commission understood that a unified body of state law required a unified court system to administer justice under the law. The court system in the 1950s had revealed the shortcomings that resulted when local control trumped uniformity. Thus, under the Bell Commission’s leadership, the tension between uniformity and local management was resolved in favor of uniformity to the greatest extent possible.

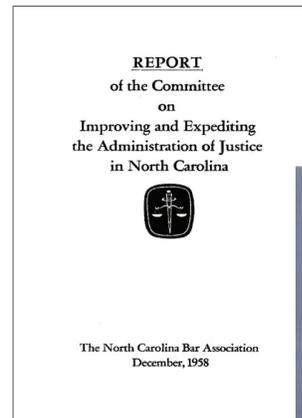

As a result, for the first time in decades, a reasonably informed citizen could understand the system. Access became easier for someone unfamiliar with the judicial system, and cases were no longer dismissed for failure to honor some local rule. In a unified system, a citizen is always in the “right court,” even if his or her case is transferred to a different level within that court system. But uniformity, like justice itself, is always a work in progress.

A New Millennium Approaches. By the 1990s, a court system created in the 1960s was serving a state that had continued to change dramatically, mostly through growth in population and caseload. As the year 2000 approached, the court system engaged in a third comprehensive review, driven by a sense that the public was frustrated by delay, partiality, and lenience on crime. This study, the Commission on the Future of Justice and the Courts in North Carolina, commonly known as the Futures Commission, examined the court system for over two years.⁴

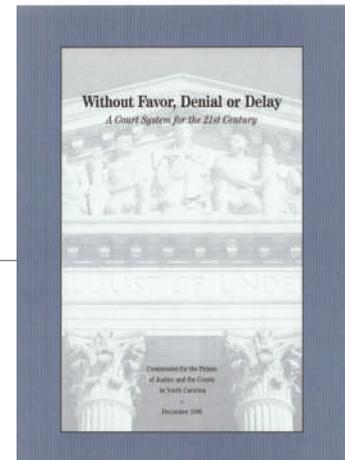

The Futures Commission, which had no then-current judicial employees among its membership, concluded that the system was structurally incapable of responding to ongoing societal change and delivering the quality of justice that the public sought. Its recommendations focused on a number of important tenets:

- Resources should be used effectively.
- Responsibility should be allocated in a way that promotes accountability.
- Courts should be self-governed with citizen input.
- Courts should embrace modern technology.
- Courts should improve services to families.

The resulting recommendations were bold. They included significant structural changes to eliminate jurisdictional distinctions between the trial courts; appointment rather than election of judges and clerks of court; creation of statewide family courts; merger of existing districts into much larger administrative units; and the transfer of much of the governance authority from the legislature to the Judicial Branch.

Futures Commission Report, 1996

Ultimately, however, advocates of the Futures Commission’s recommendations were disappointed. The main recommendations were either not adopted or significantly weakened. An advisory Judicial Council that included citizens was created but lacked formal authority. Family Courts were established only as pilot programs.

The Futures Commission’s 1996 report remains an important document, however. The Commission’s work in identifying structural and operational pressures on the courts and in articulating principles important to the improvement of the judicial system greatly informed the work of the NCCALJ.

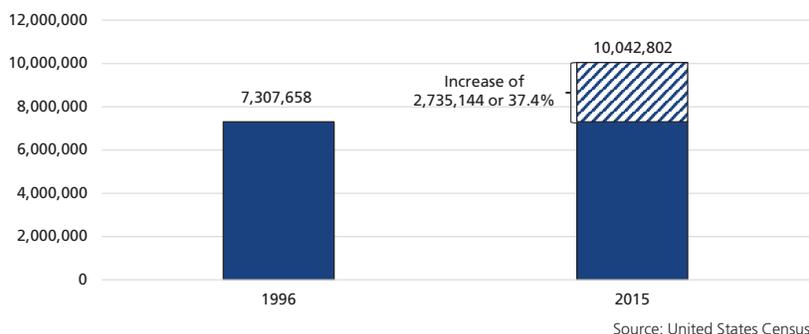

ADAPTING TO A NEW ENVIRONMENT

Today, the basic structure of the North Carolina court system remains largely as it was in the 1960s. But North Carolina itself has continued to change dramatically since the Futures Commission’s report was issued over twenty years ago. Many factors have shaped the NCCALJ’s recommendations.

Population. In the two decades since the Futures Commission’s study, North Carolina’s population

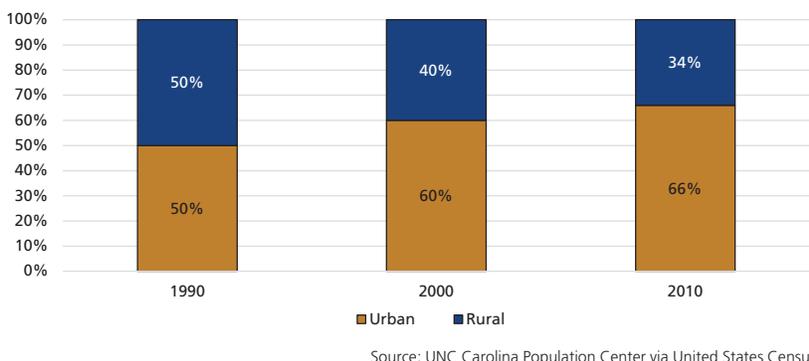

North Carolina Total Population
1996 - 2015

Select Population Demographic Changes
1996 - 2015

North Carolina Urbanization Trend

has grown by more than two million. North Carolina is now the nation’s ninth largest state, and it is more culturally, ethnically, and linguistically diverse than ever before.⁵ Urbanization has created a growing wealth divide across counties and regions. Cities and surrounding areas are growing rapidly while rural areas are not, with some even losing population. Providing uniform court services and a uniform experience for citizens is challenging when the population of the largest county in the state (Mecklenburg) is 258 times greater than that of the smallest (Tyrrell).⁶ In 1970, the population ratio between the largest judicial district and the smallest was four to one; now, it is seventeen to one. The work of the courts in each district is the same, but the population that each district serves is not.

Mobility. North Carolina’s society is also increasingly mobile. Many people live in one county and work one, two, or even three counties away. So when they need to go to the courthouse — and most court appearances must be made in person — it is a major investment of time. Efficient use of that time is more important than ever.

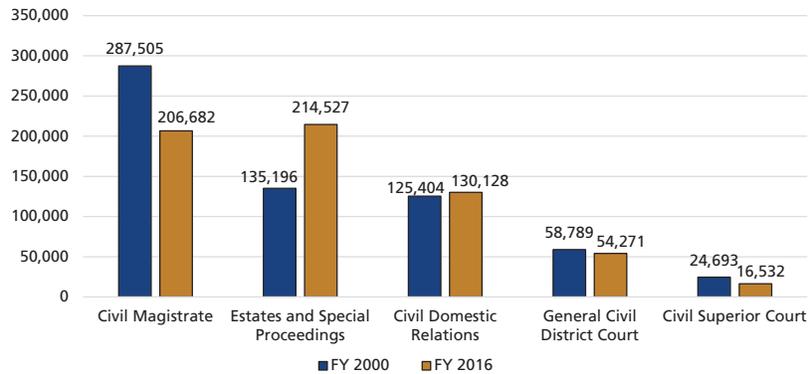

Court workload. A court’s work is the resolution of public and private disputes. One measure of that work is case filings, which range from major felonies, to private disputes involving tens of millions of dollars, to stop sign violations, to small claims actions.

Since 2000, the courts have experienced increases in total filings followed by decreases during the recession years. The peak year for filings was 2007-08, followed by declines in every successive year. In the last two years the courts' caseload has remained relatively stable, mirroring the experiences of other state courts across the country.

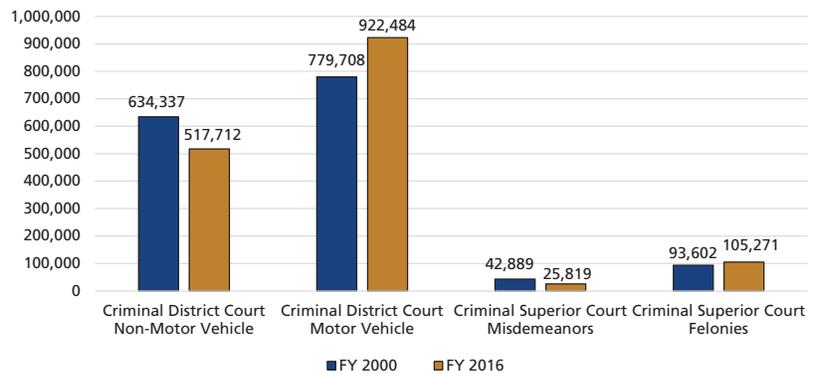

But these declines are not evenly distributed and can paint an inaccurate picture of the courts' workload. The largest declines are in the cases that take the least amount of time — namely, small claims and misdemeanor cases. The types of cases that have become more complex and resource intensive, on the other hand, have not seen significant declines. The factors driving these trends include the increasing complexity of legal and regulatory standards, changes in demographics (e.g., language interpreters are needed more often), and economic pressures on all parties involved. For example, in our traffic courts, which have the highest volume of cases in the system, people are increasingly appearing in court to contest the charges or plead to a lesser offense rather than admitting guilt and paying the penalty remotely.⁷

The Supreme Court conducts discretionary review of appeals directly from the trial courts in cases of significant public interest, in cases involving legal principles of major significance, in cases where delay would cause substantial harm, or in cases where the Court of Appeals docket is unusually full.

8. Appeal of right exists in cases involving certain constitutional questions and in cases in which there has been a dissent in the Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court also conducts discretionary review of appeals from the Court of Appeals in cases of significant public interest, in cases involving legal principles of major significance, in cases where delay would cause substantial harm, or in cases where the Court of Appeals docket is unusually full.
9. Appeals from administrative decisions that do not proceed directly to the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeals.

11. Appeals of final orders of the Utilities Commission in general rate cases.
12. Recommendations from the Commission for removal, suspension, censure, or public reprimand.

*The district and superior courts have concurrent original jurisdiction in civil actions (G.S. 7A-240). The small claims court is the proper division for the trial of civil actions in which the amount in controversy is $10,000 or less, and the district court division is the proper division for matters of $25,000 or less (G.S. 7A-243); the superior court division is the proper division for matters exceeding $25,000 in controversy.

Funding. Just as caseloads have fluctuated, so has court funding. Courts need resources of all types — people, training, hardware and software, postage, filing cabinets, subscription-based references, and books, to name a few. All of these come with a price tag.

The recession that began in 2008 dramatically affected the court system’s state funding. Over four years, the courts sustained overall budget reductions of more than $100 million and the loss of 590 full-time employees statewide.⁸ During that period, pay was frozen.

Technology programs were stalled or eliminated. Travel was restricted. Equipment needs were deferred. Voluntary reductions in force were implemented. Emergency judges volunteered their time to keep cases moving. And some court programs were eliminated.

North Carolina avoided the draconian measures enacted in some states, such as curtailing sessions of civil court or closing courthouses for parts of the week due to furloughs or reduced staffing. Our court leaders were resolute in their efforts to keep the courts functioning while conserving resources. Every expenditure was scrutinized and weighed against the other needs that funding could meet.

Addressing this challenge often meant that court officials and employees assumed the duties of positions that were eliminated and changed their practices to increase efficiency. Leaders throughout the Judicial Branch — judges, clerks of court, magistrates, public defenders, assigned counsel, prosecutors, North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts (NCAOC) staff, and courthouse staff — proved their commitment to the mission of providing fair, accessible, and efficient dispute resolution.

With a strengthening economy, the General Assembly increased court funding in 2013. For the 2015-17 biennium, the General Assembly provided Judicial Branch personnel with their first significant pay increase in many years and restored operational funding to levels that allowed the courts to resume normal operations. Basic services, like travel and equipment replacement, returned to pre-recession levels. As a result, our court system is poised to move past a time of challenges and toward a time of systemic improvement.

Technology. We live in a digital world where computers and mobile devices are ubiquitous and paper is an afterthought. The courts, meanwhile, have lagged behind. For centuries, paper has been essential for court work. In 2016, clerks' offices in North Carolina processed over 31 million pieces of paper, requiring over 4.3 miles of shelving.⁹ That paper gets moved from files to courtrooms, and back again — over and over and over, every day. Each month, hundreds of thousands of these files are pulled from shelves and carried to and from more than 500 courtrooms. The court system is awash in this daily tide of paper.

A major task of every clerk's office is to transmit information from paper onto computers. The data fields captured — who, what, where, when — grow continuously as the courts, government agencies, and the public seek more and more information about what happens in court. The Department of Public Safety, the Division of Motor Vehicles, the Department of Revenue, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are just a few of those who seek improved access to court information.

Another technological challenge for the courts is managing one of the largest cash operations in the state. Clerks' offices processed over $737 million in fiscal year 2015-16.¹⁰ This operation is run with technology that is generations behind industry standards and is siloed independently from other case records and financial management systems.

Pockets of innovation exist where the courts have used technology to improve their management of paperwork and accounting. But the vast majority of court processes are still paper driven. Today's court technology is a hodgepodge of old and new, including workhorses built in COBOL computer programming language from the 1980s, industry-current Java, and WebSphere applications that would be at home in any modern corporate environment. Multi-generational technology complicates innovation and requires a workforce that is skilled both in systems that are state-of-the-art and in systems that are no longer even taught in school. Put simply, the pattern of more paper plus more unintegrated technology plus more data entry must end.

But technology also holds tremendous opportunities for addressing many of the challenges that our judicial system faces. The federal court system migrated to a paperless court system in the 1990s. There, court documents are filed and stored solely within that electronic system. Litigants file them electronically, without having to visit the courthouse, and the public can conveniently access documents for individual cases online. Judges enter orders and judgments online, which are then filed instantly and delivered electronically to all parties. Other states have followed suit as budgets have allowed. Today, most large court systems have completed major parts of this change or are planning to do so.

North Carolina's court system needs to put paper in its place. Our Judicial Branch has been a national leader in electronic appellate filing, in maintaining an electronic warrant repository, and in e-filing traffic tickets from computers in law enforcement officers' vehicles. It is time to commit to using technology to make all kinds of court information readily available online, and to expanding the ways that citizens can interact with the courts remotely.

A FRAMEWORK FOR RECOMMENDATIONS

When Chief Justice Martin convened the Commission, he directed it to evaluate the data and identify areas for systemic improvement. Each Committee produced an independent report that can be found in Part Two of this Final Report. Taken together, the Committee reports constitute a comprehensive action plan for improving the administration of justice in North Carolina.

Each Committee's report stands alone so that the work of implementing the most important recommendations can begin. The final section of Part One suggests initial steps to take toward implementation.

Before discussing implementation, however, we pause to consider the themes that unify this body of recommendations aimed at promoting justice for all. The Committees' reports are grounded in three fundamental principles of sound judicial administration — fairness, accessibility, and efficiency.

THE ULTIMATE GOAL — JUSTICE

Courts exist to administer justice. They ensure that criminals are appropriately punished. They resolve civil disputes ranging from commercial conflicts to the breakdown of the most intimate of personal relationships. They enforce and protect the rights and liberties enshrined in our founding documents. And they do so with diligence, fairness, and impartiality in every case that comes before them.

This is the essence of the rule of law — an independent judiciary that ensures just outcomes under the law, to the greatest extent possible.

A key measure of a court system’s performance of this solemn duty is the trust and confidence that the public has in its courts. To be sure, public trust and confidence is not and cannot be the sole measure for a court system. Courts, after all, are charged with protecting individual rights and liberties — a task that will inevitably require decisions that are unpopular with powerful private interests or popular majorities. But, by and large, the long-term effectiveness of any court system is tied to the credibility of its process in the eyes of the public that it serves.

The charge of this Commission was to look for improvements within the existing administrative framework. An inquiry into the “administration of law and justice” is primarily an inquiry into the processes that a court system uses to achieve justice in the cases that it handles. The Commission’s work identified three central measures by which to evaluate a court’s commitment to process: fairness, access, and efficiency.

How are individuals treated by the courts? How easy is it to get legal help and to interact with the courts? And how effective are the courts in reaching a just resolution in a timely and cost-effective manner?

Our courts make great efforts each and every day to administer justice on behalf of the citizens of North Carolina. But we can do more to strengthen and improve the processes by which they do so, and, as a result, to increase the public’s trust and confidence in our courts. These recommendations put forth a road map to do those very things.

FAIRNESS

Ask citizens what they want from a court system and an immediate answer is likely to be “fairness.”

A system is fair when cases are decided based on the law as applied to the relevant facts. Bias arising from characteristics such as wealth, social class, ethnicity, race, religion, gender, and political affiliation have no place in a fair decision. Citizens should never have to doubt the fairness of their courts' decisions.

Yet, a 2015 national survey conducted by the National Center for State Courts revealed that only 54% of the respondents agreed or strongly agreed that state courts are “unbiased in case decisions.”¹¹ This same survey showed that only 35% of African-American respondents agreed with this statement. State courts should not be satisfied with these numbers.

The Committees' work contains many recommendations that, if implemented, will strengthen fairness in our court system. Three of these are highlighted here, and others appear in Part Two.

Juvenile responsibility for criminal offenses.

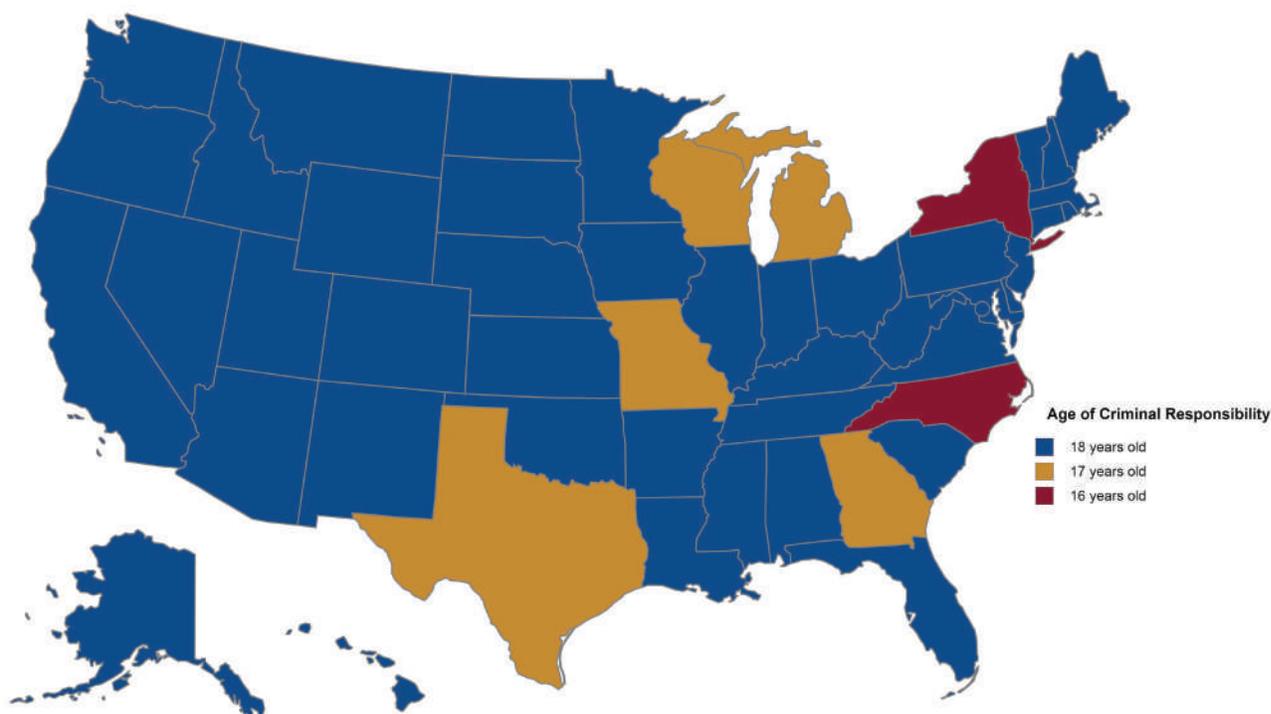

Most discussions about fairness involve questions of how one is treated, and emphasize following the law. But as the Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee found, there is one important situation in which following the law itself may lead to outcomes that are unfair and unwise, even if they are lawful.

North Carolina is one of only two states that treat sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds as adults under our criminal laws.¹² Sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds cannot legally drink alcohol, vote, or enter into a contract, but they can receive adult criminal convictions and a lifelong criminal record. The resulting stigma can have profound consequences for the rest of their lives.

Research on this issue has proliferated — research on crime statistics, brain development, and economic effects — and strongly weighs against

I'M POSITIVE THE AVERAGE CITIZEN OF THIS STATE IS NOT AWARE OF THIS INJUSTICE. I WAS NOT AWARE OF THIS LAW UNTIL MY SIXTEEN-YEAR-OLD SON WAS ARRESTED, AND TO MY SURPRISE, WAS CHARGED AS AN ADULT. BECAUSE OF HIS IMPULSIVE BEHAVIOR, HE HAS SERVED TIME WITH ADULTS, BUT MORE IMPORTANTLY, HE NOW HAS TO FIND A JOB WITH A CRIMINAL RECORD THAT HE WILL TAKE TO HIS GRAVE. HE IS NOT EVEN TWENTY YET, AND HIS FATE IS SEALED ...

... ALL BECAUSE OF A SILLY, STUPID, NON-VIOLENT ACT HE DID AS A SIXTEEN-YEAR-OLD. NO ONE IN OUR STATE SHOULD BE PENALIZED FOR LIFE ... FOR A SENSELESS IMMATURE ACT THAT WAS COMMITTED BEFORE THEY WERE 18.

Citizen Comment Submitted at August Public Hearing on Raising the Juvenile Age applying adult criminal sanctions to youthful offenders. That data prompted the Committee’s recommendation that the age for adult criminal responsibility for all but traffic offenses and the most serious felonies be set at eighteen.

This is a complex proposal, with many implications for both the juvenile and the adult criminal justice systems. Public safety and fiscal impact are vitally important, but the Committee believes that raising the age is consistent both with those factors and with empirical, scientific consensus. The Committee’s proposal, found in Appendix A, seeks to address all of those issues in detail.

This is not a new issue. But stakeholder support for raising the age at this time, in this way is unprecedented. Put simply, it is the right thing to do, and this is the right time to do it.

Promoting procedural fairness and eliminating the possibility of bias. Research suggests that what leaves people satisfied with their court experience more than anything else is not whether they win or lose, but how they are treated during the process.¹³ When people feel that they have been heard and respected, when they receive answers to their questions, and when they perceive that court officials don't play favorites, they are more likely to leave with confidence in the courts — even if they lose their case.

Procedural fairness is neither a new issue in, nor a unique issue to North Carolina. In 2013, the Conference of Chief Justices and the Conference of State Court Administrators urged every state to adopt a program to promote procedural fairness in its courts.

One aspect of procedural fairness that is of particular concern today is that of bias. Concerns about bias exist in many aspects of public life — in the news media, in law enforcement, and in the allocation of government resources.

Courts are not immune to this phenomenon.

In recent opinion polls sponsored by this Commission, 40% of respondents thought that whites were treated the same as everyone else in North Carolina's courts. Those numbers dropped to 33% when asked about the treatment of African-Americans and to 28% when asked about Hispanics.¹⁴ In the same poll, whites were widely viewed as being treated better, while other racial groups were viewed as receiving less favorable treatment.¹⁵

Eliminating the possibility of bias in the decisions that courts make is an essential component of promoting fairness in any court system. Thus, to foster an ongoing system-wide commitment to promoting fairness as a fundamental value, the Public Trust and Confidence Committee recommends renewed system-wide attention to programs that seek to eliminate the possibility of bias and encourage procedural fairness in our courts.

Pretrial Release Pilot. When a person is arrested for a crime, the first big decision in the case is whether and how to grant pretrial release. For most crimes, a defendant is entitled to be released from jail to await the disposition of the case. The decision to release a defendant while his or her case is pending usually comes with strings attached — secured or unsecured bonds, electronic monitoring, ongoing monitoring by pretrial services programs, or a combination thereof, sometimes coupled with specific restrictions on whom the person must avoid and where the person may (or may not) go.

In a society that values the presumption of innocence, these conditions must strike a balance. They are not intended to punish, but to ensure that the accused will appear in court and to prevent the defendant from engaging in harmful behavior before trial. The pretrial release decision is important; it can affect the ability of a defendant to stay employed and participate in the defense of his or her case.

These decisions, along with the balancing required to make them, are largely matters of discretion. That discretion should be exercised with a commitment to fairness. The Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee recommends that a pilot project be implemented to test the use of empirically valid, standardized risk measurement tools and decision matrices to assist judges in making pretrial release decisions that are informed and fair. The Committee's detailed proposal for structuring the pilot project can be found in Appendix C.

ACCESS

The right to an attorney is a core value enshrined in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution, but that right rarely extends beyond criminal defendants. Getting a fair outcome is impossible if a person is not able to take a case to court, or if, upon getting there, the person does not have a lawyer or other legal assistance to help make his or her case. That is why meaningful access to the courts is a second theme that permeates the Commission's recommendations.

Self-represented litigants and pro bono programs. In the American judicial system, a person has the right to represent himself or herself, even if doing so may not be in the person's best interests. Self-representation is a practice that is growing in popularity in recent years. For some, it is because lawyers are too expensive.

Others choose to represent themselves even when they can afford an attorney. In a recent national survey of non-family law civil cases heard without a jury, 76% of the cases involved a self-represented party.¹⁶ In certain categories like family law, debt collection, and landlord-tenant cases, having at least one self-represented party is common.

The Legal Professionalism Committee strongly believes that competent legal representation is the best way to achieve justice when disputes end up in court. Statistics about low-income individuals' access to lawyers are quite discouraging, however — partly because legal aid programs have lost significant funding in recent years. Pro bono (donated legal services) programs have helped some litigants but simply do not have the capacity to come close to being a complete solution.

The Civil Justice, Legal Professionalism, and Public Trust and Confidence Committees have each recommended steps that the court system can take to better accommodate and serve self-represented litigants. Many of these recommendations involve enhanced use of technology, expanded customer assistance, and improved education programs. Some are as basic as recommending that every courthouse have simple, clear signage. Other recommendations touch on increasing language access services. Courts must keep up with the needs of our citizens. The Public Trust and Confidence Committee’s report further addresses these issues.

Other recommendations focus on promoting and enhancing efforts to encourage pro bono service. In 2014, the North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission estimated that private attorneys supplied approximately 18,000 hours of legal services worth more than $3.6 million.¹⁷ The Legal Professionalism Committee recommends expanding those programs where feasible.

The Legal Profession. The legal profession is changing rapidly and faces a striking paradox.

More lawyers are practicing now than ever before, but the legal needs of our citizens are increasingly going unmet. Many reasons account for that, not the least of which is cost. In a recent North Carolina survey, 73% of respondents did not believe that average citizens can afford to hire a lawyer for their legal needs.¹⁸ The forces of supply and demand and other market forces will play a role in addressing this problem, but increasing access to legal services requires other measures as well.

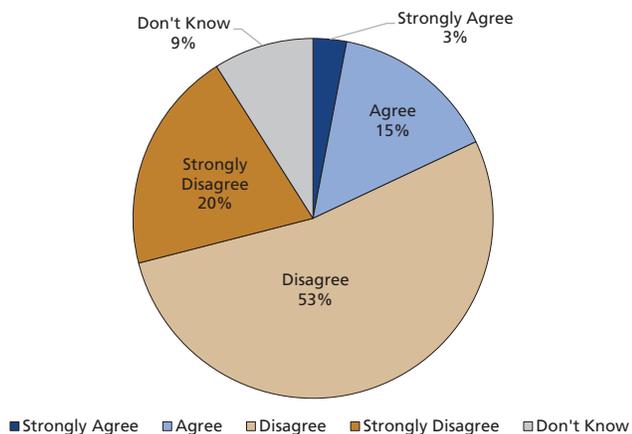

One aspect of increasing access involves the regulation of the legal profession itself.

Lawyers have a noble history. The profession arose to help safeguard the rule of law and to offer specialized skills to help people navigate legal problems. The demands of modern society have altered how the profession can accomplish those goals. Modern lawyers face economic pressures to produce revenue and limit expenses. The cost of legal education, in particular, is an increasingly significant factor. These factors frustrate the selfless, heroic “Atticus Finch” model of a lawyer that is such a part of our culture.

In addition to the challenges facing the economics of legal practice, access problems arise from the increasing variety and complexity of legal issues and from misinformation about the law that is spread through television and the Internet.

Despite significant advances in technology, the law governing the practice of law in our state has not been reviewed or changed in many years; neither have the laws and practices regulating the licensing of lawyers. In this regard, the legal profession has not kept pace with other professions. The medical profession, for example, responded to access-to-healthcare issues by thinking critically about what it means to practice medicine and who should be able to do it. It is time to reconsider what it means to practice law and whether the procedures for being admitted to the profession are fair and working effectively.

Public Perceptions of State Court Accessibility

The Legal Professionalism Committee believes that North Carolina can dramatically enhance access to legal services through modernizing our state’s statutory structure. And we can do so while upholding the fundamental value of protecting the public from incompetent legal practice. Among other things, the Committee recommends creating a Legal Innovation Center to begin the work of confronting the rapid changes in the market for legal services.

Indigent Defense Reforms. The adversarial model of the American justice system relies on the notion that justice occurs in a criminal case when a zealous prosecutor meets a zealous defense lawyer. When a criminal defendant cannot afford his or her own lawyer, the United States Constitution requires the government to provide that person with an attorney. Our society is unwilling to take a person’s liberty without the assurance of fairness that comes from having lawyers on both sides of a case.

Since 2000, the North Carolina Commission on Indigent Defense Services has managed this important function. The system that it manages, however, is a patchwork. In some places, state-salaried public defenders do this work, while in others, private attorneys do the work on contract or on assignment by a judge. Standards of performance vary widely.

The Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee undertook a comprehensive review of the indigent defense system. As presented in Appendix D, the Committee offers specific recommendations for addressing issues that have arisen since the Office of Indigent Defense Services was established. Recommendations include expansion of public defender functions, uniform standards for determining indigency, quality control mechanisms, and budgetary changes.

The report is a road map for improving the quality of these legal services and maximizing the use of the funds provided. The result will be fewer unnecessary delays, fewer reversals, and reduced stress on victims and defendants as cases are handled more efficiently and competently.

EFFICIENCY

Undoubtedly, fairness and accessibility are fundamental values to any court system. But a system that fails to use its resources effectively or manage its work efficiently will not serve justice and will forfeit public trust and confidence.

“Case management” is not glamorous or dramatic like amending the constitution or passing new laws. But when done right, effective case management saves time, promotes good stewardship of taxpayer dollars, and increases the efficiency of the judicial process for all involved. Case management is essential to the success of any 21st century court system.

The good news is that it is largely within the control of the court system itself. Many dedicated court officials work very hard to manage the cases in their courts, and their work provided a solid base for the Commission’s review. The Commission’s Public Trust and Confidence Committee emphasized the need for more timely case dispositions, and both the Civil Justice Committee and Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee spent considerable time developing recommendations for improving case management practices in North Carolina. Part Two contains their specific recommendations.

The basic principles of effective case management are hugely important.

First, the system must measure itself. Typically, time standards help fill that need. North Carolina does have some time standards, but they are not consistent with national best practices and are not as effective as they should be.

Second, the system must have clear lines of accountability. For civil cases, the clear line of accountability is the judge with administrative responsibility for the district. For criminal cases, it is less clear. The district attorney has statutory authority to schedule cases, but the presiding judge assumes responsibility once the calendar is published. That hybrid system presents some challenges, which the Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee’s report addresses.

Third, the system must have the data that it needs to make good decisions. North Carolina’s mix of old and new technology, designed primarily to maintain statistics of what happened in the past, does not work well in an age that seeks to use information in real time to plan for the future. A modern, paperless, integrated court information system designed to meet the needs of case managers is at the forefront of the Technology Committee’s Strategic Plan. Until that is achieved, our courts will lack the ability to use data to improve decision-making and case management in real time.

Fourth, the system must make court appearances meaningful. Public trust and confidence suffers a significant blow every time an individual must appear in court only to learn that his or her case is continued to another appearance.

Fifth, the system must use techniques like “differentiated case management” — treating simple cases simply, and treating complex cases with greater involvement.

Sixth, the system must continually educate its officials about the need for effective case management and the tools necessary to manage well.

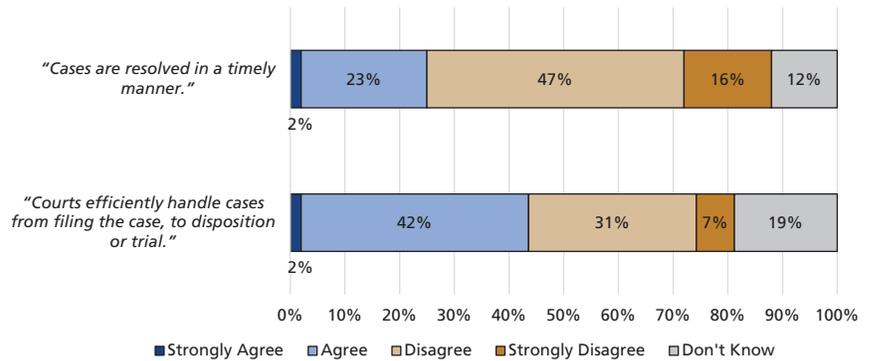

Finally, the system must create a local legal culture that values effective case management. Research demonstrates that what most distinguishes truly effective court management is not systems, technology, or resources, but local legal culture. Court proceedings require a team, and any member of that team can slow the process. When the actors in the local culture expect delays, delays happen. Cultures change slowly, and only with great effort and committed leadership. Expectations must be established, and they must be honored.

Effective case management faces many hurdles in our state. The data needed to make important systemic decisions does not exist today in a user-friendly format. As just one example, the definition of a criminal “case” is not uniform across local jurisdictions. Comparing workloads cannot be meaningful without common units of measurement. The goal of “uniformity” was intended to resolve that very problem.

One particular problem plaguing civil case management is the proliferation of local rules. Unlike the management of the criminal docket, the senior resident superior court judge and the chief district court judge have the responsibility of managing the civil docket. With that responsibility comes the discretion to supplement statewide rules with local rules that apply only in that district. To say that the rules lack uniformity across district lines is a gross understatement. Variation and unpredictability is a primary roadblock to efficient and just outcomes in a mobile society that participates in a global economy.

As identified by the Technology and Civil Justice Committees, better use of modern technology in legal practice and court processes will allow parties and attorneys to communicate by remote appearances instead of having to travel several hours to be physically present in a courtroom or conference room. Rigorous measurement of outcomes will help as well. The tools exist, but they are simply going unused.

The reports of the Technology, Civil Justice, and Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committees contain detailed and specific steps that can lead to more effective case management through improved use of technology and methods to provide uniformity.

If implemented, emphasized, and monitored, these recommendations can substantially improve our justice system. They will fail, however, without commitment from state-level leaders and from court officials in every courthouse. Like justice itself, effective management will always be a work in progress, but it is possible and must be a priority.

NEXT STEPS

Commitment to the principles of fairness, access, and effective case management will help our courts ensure that justice is being done, to the greatest extent possible, in each and every case that comes through the system. Though only a handful of recommendations have been highlighted above, all of the Commission’s recommendations will help build the 21st century court system that North Carolina needs. Some of the recommendations will require legislative action. Others will need the leadership and initiative of the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts (NCAOC) or other bodies, such as the Commission on Indigent Defense Services. Many of the proposals can be implemented by local court officials. The Commission recognizes that all of these groups share a common desire to improve the courts. With this report’s framework in place, great progress is the expectation.

The sheer number of recommendations suggests, however, that giving one office or entity the overall task of implementation would be very helpful in coordinating these initiatives. NCAOC is the logical place for this responsibility, and it has the staffing resources and the system-wide perspective necessary for the task.

The numerous recommendations calling for internal change within the Judicial Branch will require involvement by many of NCAOC’s various offices and divisions, including Technology Services, Research and Planning, Court Services, and Court Programs. NCAOC’s Governmental Affairs Office can be assigned aspects of the Commission’s work that require legislative changes.

NCAOC has already begun work on a number of recommendations, including Juvenile Reinvestment and the Technology Committee’s Strategic Plan. Accordingly, the NCCALJ co-chairs recommend that the Chief Justice have the NCAOC Director take primary responsibility for carrying out the Commission’s work. The Director can then assemble advisory groups and working groups or delegate to other entities as needed to implement recommendations.

IT'S TIME TO BEGIN . . . AGAIN

The recommendations in the five Committee reports that follow, once implemented, will position the North Carolina court system to make historic advances in delivering justice to the people of North Carolina.

The Public Trust and Confidence Committee, however, has identified two additional recommendations that are vital to the future of our courts.

First, it is imperative that the public become better informed about the mission and work of the courts. Educating the public about our courts is simply too important to be left to court television shows. The story of our judicial system needs to be told through improved public awareness, civic education in the schools, judicial outreach programs, and online resources. Many notable efforts are already underway in this regard; they need to be supported and expanded as resources allow. This work is the responsibility of all in the judicial system and should be coordinated by NCAOC to ensure cohesive and consistent messaging.

Finally, this Commission began its work by asking the public, through opinion polls, what it thought about the courts. The answers were sobering but important. They helped guide the work of the Commission. The Public Trust and Confidence Committee recommends asking for the public's advice again. And again. And again. Asking for feedback should not be a one-time exercise. It should be an ongoing effort.

Ensuring that law and justice are effectively administered is not a new task. And it is never finished. As Alexander Hamilton noted in the Federalist Papers: "Justice is the end of government. It is the end of civil society. It ever has been and ever will be pursued until it be obtained, or until liberty be lost in the pursuit."¹⁹

Having recurred to fundamental principles, it's time to strengthen our courts to ensure justice for all.

CIVIL JUSTICE COMMITTEE REPORT

This report contains recommendations for the future direction of the North Carolina court system as developed independently by citizen volunteers. No part of this report constitutes the official policy of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, of the North Carolina Judicial Branch, or of any other constituent official or entity of North Carolina state government.

A MODERN CIVIL JUSTICE SYSTEM SHOULD BE FAIR, ACCESSIBLE, TRANSPARENT, EFFICIENT, AND EFFECTIVE.

INTRODUCTION

The Civil Justice Committee is one of five Committees constituting the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ). The Civil Justice Committee is charged with evaluating the civil justice system in North Carolina, identifying areas of concern, and making preliminary recommendations for reform.

Civil justice is the process by which North Carolina's courts resolve or assist in resolving non-criminal disputes between individuals, private entities, and governmental bodies. The North Carolina civil justice system has many parts, including the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals, the superior court, the district court, the Industrial Commission, the Office of Administrative Hearings, and the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts (NCAOC). Judges, magistrates, clerks, and appointed officials, as well as a support staff that has widely varying duties and skill sets, carry out the responsibilities of this system. Although some courts also have jurisdiction over criminal matters, this Committee's task is to examine only the civil justice system.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES

- The NCCALJ's efforts are focused on how the Judicial Branch can best serve the public, ensuring that the state's court system is one that the public trusts. The Committee developed five guiding principles for our work that are vital to maintaining public trust and confidence in our courts. The Committee believes that a modern civil justice system should be FAIR, ACCESSIBLE, TRANSPARENT, EFFICIENT, and EFFECTIVE.
- A system is EFFICIENT when time and resources expended are proportionate to the needs of the case, and when litigation, lawyers, or courts do not generate unnecessary costs or delay.
- A system is EFFECTIVE when judicial officers have sufficient support, resources, and administrative structures to permit quality and timely decision-making and processing of cases, and when the system generates data to evaluate performance as measured by relevant benchmarks.

What do we mean by these principles?

- A system is FAIR when cases are decided based on the principles of law and justice and the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and not biased by the wealth, political influence, or identity of the parties. Partisanship and prejudice have no place in a fair decision.
- A system is ACCESSIBLE when the courts and court-assisted processes are open and available to all persons who wish to participate, without barriers or costs, financial or otherwise, that are so high as to deter residents from using the courts.
- A system is TRANSPARENT when participants understand how their case will be assigned, processed, and adjudicated, and when records of the proceedings are open and available to the public except when privacy or safety concerns require otherwise.

These are the guiding principles that the Committee believes are essential to a modern civil justice system that is able to meet the needs of and provide justice to the residents of North Carolina. The Committee has used these principles to determine the principal areas of focus for study and improvement, and to develop the recommendations outlined below. Going forward, these principles will inform the relevant benchmarks to be used when assessing progress toward ensuring that all residents of North Carolina have confidence in the civil justice system.

AREAS OF FOCUS

To identify its areas of focus, the Committee held ten public meetings. Among those attending, speaking, or presenting at the meetings were members of the business community; sitting judges on the business court, the superior court, and the district court; court administrators; employees of NCAOC; court executives and judges from other jurisdictions; legal aid professionals; representatives from the North Carolina State Bar; the North Carolina Conference of Clerks of the Superior Court; law students; legislative liaisons; and other members of the public.

After consulting with these stakeholders, experts, and researchers, the Committee decided to focus on the following areas, recognizing that there may be other areas of concern raised by stakeholders or the public not identified here:

- Technology
- Case management and tracking
- Judicial assignment system
- Legally trained support staff
- Legal assistance and self-represented litigation
- Civil fines, fees, and penalties

TECHNOLOGY

North Carolina was once a leader in using technology in its civil justice system but today lags behind other jurisdictions. The federal government's court system and states such as Utah have adopted a uniform and comprehensive electronic filing and document management system. In these jurisdictions, litigants, attorneys, the courts, and the public are able to file, monitor, and review cases from the convenience of their offices or homes. By comparison, electronic filing is available only in select courts and jurisdictions in North Carolina, primarily in the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court, the business court, and certain pilot programs in four of North Carolina's 100 counties. The result is that electronic filing and management of cases is not uniform throughout the North Carolina system and is available for only a fraction of the cases in the system.

For example, more than 200,000 civil cases were filed in the district courts and superior courts in North Carolina in fiscal year 2015-16, and the vast majority of these cases were handled in paper format. Those courts that have electronic filing and case management, such as North Carolina's Business Court and North Carolina's Court of Appeals, together managed approximately 1,800 cases, or one-tenth of the volume of the district and superior courts.

Despite security risks and considerable taxpayer expense in terms of storage and administration, paper filing and documentation remain the norm in most North Carolina courts. An estimated 31,369,840 pages were added to the clerks' case files in 2012-13, or approximately 22,960 linear feet of shelving.¹ Thousands of square feet of space are dedicated for file storage. According to some estimates, a single file room measuring 20 feet by 60 feet can cost $360,000 to construct and $18,000 per year to maintain. Multiplied over North Carolina's 100 counties, these costs compound quickly.

This paper system is also prone to inefficiencies and transcription errors when files are processed or converted to other formats, such as for database entry. Members of the legal aid community observed that the lack of uniform, technology-enhanced filing in North Carolina makes representation of indigent clients burdensome both for lawyers and litigants. The Committee also heard speculation that some potential litigants may not file claims at all because of perceived barriers to access, such as the need to visit a courthouse; the need to read, understand, and complete a legal form; or the need to pay other costs that technology could mitigate. There is agreement that over time, if properly implemented, savings would likely exceed the cost of implementing a technology-based, paperless system. The different stakeholder groups largely agreed that increased use of technology has the potential to substantially improve the civil justice system, both as a whole and for all of its participants: businesses, individuals, lawyers, judges, and court staff. This Committee recognizes the Technology Committee's primary role in developing a strategic plan to address the technology-related needs of the Judicial Branch.

The North Carolina civil justice system currently uses the dollar amount in dispute as a rough estimate for complexity. With some exceptions, whether a case ends up before a magistrate, a clerk, a district court judge, or a superior court judge (including a business court judge) depends largely on how much money is at issue. Once a case is before a certain judicial officer, the case management process, from filing to disposition, depends on a patchwork of statewide rules, local rules, and specific practices of individual courts. For example, cases are managed by agreement of the parties, by court administrators, or by judicial assistants, rather than by a standard case management order. One court administrator referred to the case management system there as “management by event” or “management by the passage of time.” The lack of uniformity also contributes to the difficulty of gathering reliable data about the performance of the civil justice system across the entire state, as comparisons are often inaccurate or misleading. Without standard measures of evaluation, the performance of the state's judicial system cannot be accurately assessed.

The National Center for State Courts has designed ten performance measures for state courts, called CourTools. These measures include measurement tools for time to disposition, age of active pending caseload, and clearance rates. The Supreme Court of North Carolina promulgated time-to-disposition benchmarks in 1996, but neither these benchmarks nor the National Center's performance measures have been widely communicated or used by the court system as a whole.

In the absence of more robust and standard measures of evaluation, the NCAOC supplied the following data regarding case volumes, as well as median days to disposition and median days pending for major case types in the small claims, district, and superior courts. These data points provide some basic information about the current health of the civil justice system in North Carolina.

Examining these disposition data through the lens of case management, it appears that the North Carolina courts do an adequate job of disposing of relatively simple civil cases; however, the median-days-pending metrics suggest that more complex cases often languish. This indicates that the North Carolina civil justice system is ripe for the kind of tiered / track-based case management approach that the Committee recommends, since the system as managed now could likely benefit from a right-sizing of resources on more complex cases.

The primary concern expressed by stakeholders was dissatisfaction with the lack of uniformity across judicial districts and the resulting delays that enter into the system, especially at the superior court level. Panelists and researchers suggested that differences in representation, and costs and time associated with discovery and discovery management, can be drivers of inefficiencies. A recent High Point University survey showed that a majority of North Carolina residents believe that the court system does not resolve cases in a timely manner.² Best practices suggested by the National Center for State Courts, such as “right-sizing” court resources to the complexity of the case, may help resolve some of these issues.

North Carolina’s judicial assignment process is difficult to navigate, particularly for self-represented litigants and others who do not interact regularly with the court system. District court judges are assigned to dockets on a certain date, typically by the chief district court judge. Exceptions to this can be found in some of the state’s district courts that use single-judge case assignments in managing their domestic relations case dockets. Therefore, a case may not have the same judge from the beginning of the case to the end. Superior court judges rotate according to the North Carolina Constitution, which provides that “[t]he principle of rotating Superior Court Judges among the various districts of a division is a salutary one and shall be observed.”⁴ Currently, there are eight divisions and 50 districts across the state. Superior court judges rotate through the districts in their respective divisions on a six-month cycle. As a result, in superior court, as in district court, a single case may be heard by more than one judge. Though the rotation system is intended to avoid favoritism that could result from having a permanent judge in one district, the system can also lead to inefficiency and judge-shopping. The exceptions to the rotation system are the special superior court judges, including those who make up the business court. Under Rule 2.1 of the North Carolina General Rules of Practice, some cases that are not in the business court can be specially designated as “exceptional” by the Chief Justice and receive a single judge throughout the litigation.

The superior court assignment system is implemented primarily through the North Carolina Administrative Office of Courts, working with the office of the Chief Justice. Each district court’s assignment system is typically administered by the chief district court judge. The personnel in these courts work very hard to ensure that cases do not linger, that judicial personnel are assigned to cases as necessary, and that all participants adhere to the six-month rotation system when required and to the extent possible, while also emphasizing access and fairness. The assignment system depends on the competence and integrity of just a few individuals and therefore is sensitive to any change in personnel. The Committee heard mixed reviews from many stakeholders about whether the benefits of the judicial assignment system in North Carolina courts justified its complexity, with no clear consensus across different perspectives.

LEGALLY TRAINED SUPPORT STAFF

At the trial level, only the Business Court uses dedicated staff trained to assist the judges in investigating the law and making legal rulings. Although they may confront complex evidentiary or constitutional issues, superior court judges and district court judges have little to no research support. This lack of legally trained support staff takes place in an environment where significant numbers of law graduates are searching for full-time jobs, suggesting a potential opportunity for matching supply with demand.

LEGAL ASSISTANCE AND SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGATION

For those who cannot afford representation, a number of legal aid organizations, as well as private lawyers, offer free legal counsel in North Carolina. In 2014, the North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission estimated that private attorneys supplied approximately 18,000 hours of legal services worth more than $3.6 million on a pro bono basis — that is, for little or no pay for their time and expertise.⁵ Notwithstanding their efforts, one-half of the approximately 70,000 individuals who seek a lawyer are turned away without one, with 80 percent of the civil legal needs of low-income people in North Carolina going unmet.⁶ Legal aid is supported by private donations, by members of the legal profession, and by federal, state, and local funding. All funding levels have dropped by one-third to one-half since 2008; over the same time period, the need for legal aid has increased by 30 percent, with many clients who present significant literacy and language obstacles to representation. Attorneys working in legal aid face challenges including low wages, high debt burdens from law school, and heavy caseloads.

When litigants do not want, cannot afford, or cannot find a lawyer, they sometimes represent themselves. The number of self-represented litigants has been increasing nationwide. According to Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts, a 2015 report from the National Center for State Courts, in the early 1990s, both litigants were represented by counsel in 97% of jury trials and in 91% of bench trials. However, that percentage has now fallen to 87% for jury trials and 24% for bench trials. The Landscape report went on to note that in more than three-quarters of the nearly one million non-domestic civil cases in the data set, at least one party, typically the defendant, is self-represented.⁷ As in other states, the increase in self-represented litigants is a significant issue in North Carolina.

Because self-represented litigants must navigate complex procedures, they challenge the resources of the court system, which can lead to delays further exacerbated by the same types of literacy and language barriers faced by many legal aid clients. Systemwide data on the number of self-represented litigants, the types of claims most likely to involve self-represented litigants, and comparisons of their cases to others in the system are scarce, partly because of the weaknesses of the technology and case management process outlined above. County-level analyses in the early 2000s and self-reporting by judges suggest that self-represented litigation is concentrated in areas such as domestic relations, housing, and debt collection. Self-represented litigants can account for up to half of the docket in those matters.

CIVIL FINES, FEES, AND PENALTIES

The use of civil fines, fees, and penalties is an area of concern in North Carolina and nationwide, as reflected in recent reports by government agencies and private organizations. Courts that use fines, fees, and penalties to finance their operations, as well as the potential domino effect of unpaid fines, fees, and penalties on residents, can undermine confidence in the judicial system as a whole and potentially create a “destitution pipeline” and debtors’ prison. In North Carolina, court costs and fees currently go into general state revenues. Fees generated during a criminal proceeding may be turned into civil judgments for which the individual is responsible. In 2015, 11,441 of the 794,989 criminal cases in North Carolina, or just under 1.5 percent, saw the total amount of criminal fees and fines converted into a civil judgment, according to the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts.⁸ However, this statistic does not capture the fines and fees that were only partially converted to a civil judgment, or those that are kept as money owed within the criminal, rather than the civil, enforcement mechanism. Although there are constitutional due process prohibitions on jailing persons who are unable to pay debts for their failure to do so, and state constitutional checks on using fees to support local or court budgets, these legal mechanisms are imperfect and not self-executing.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Consistent with the guiding principles and findings outlined above, the Civil Justice Committee offers the following recommendations.

The Committee also observes that, while these recommendations can be debated or adopted separately, some of them may be interlinked with other recommendations from this Committee or from other Committees on the Commission.

- IMPLEMENT
ELECTRONIC FILING AND CASE MANAGEMENT

Electronic filing and case management holds the potential to make the civil justice system more fair, accessible, and efficient. For example, the implementation of electronic case filing and management in Utah led to 30,000 fewer visits to the courthouse and millions of dollars saved in storage and paper.⁹ Court employees were better compensated and enjoyed increased job satisfaction. In addition, electronic filing and case management can generate data that will better enable evaluation of the performance of the entire system according to benchmarks designed to measure progress toward each of the guiding principles outlined above. Adoption of comprehensive electronic filing and case management in Utah and in the federal system can serve as a model for North Carolina. Personnel currently managing a paper system in the judicial system may then be reassigned and retrained, where appropriate, to spend time and resources on other important case management tasks not well suitable for automation. The Committee supports the Technology Committee's work in developing a strategic plan for implementing electronic workflows in the state's courts and clerk of court offices, including e-filing and a fully integrated, centralized case management system.

- CREATE AN EFFICIENT, ONGOING
RULE-MAKING PROCESS FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF ELECTRONIC FILING AND MANAGEMENT

The rule-making process for civil litigation must be suitably flexible to capture fully the substantial cost savings of electronic filing and case management. As the experience of other jurisdictions has shown, adopting an electronic filing and case management system without rules that offer certainty about the legal significance of the electronic filing can generate expense without a corresponding benefit to the civil justice system.¹⁰ Every aspect of civil procedure is affected by the introduction of electronic filing and management. The General Assembly has already provided the courts with rule-making authority in the area of electronic filing, and this authority should extend to developing the rules necessary to integrate technology fully and comprehensively into the civil justice system.¹¹

- INCREASE USE OF TECHNOLOGY FOR REMOTE COMMUNICATIONS

Travel to and from courthouses is difficult for litigants with limited resources and especially burdensome for those who are self-represented. These litigants must take time off from work, find childcare, and secure transportation to come to the courthouse. For judges, travel can be expensive and takes away from time better spent on the study and adjudication of cases. With remote communication technology, in addition to electronic filing and management, the case can be delivered to the judge, rather than the judge having to travel to the case. Use of technology for remote communication (including teleconferencing and videoconferencing) in civil cases, but especially for arbitration, mediation, custody, and domestic relations matters, can be used to reduce travel and expense and make the proceedings more accessible and efficient for everyone.

- CREATE A RULES COMMITTEE TO PROPOSE RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE, TO BE ADOPTED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA, AND SUBJECT TO REVIEW BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Chief Justice should appoint a rules committee modeled on civil rules committees in the federal judiciary and in other states. This committee should have representatives of the bench, bar, and staff of the courts. An academic expert in procedure may be appointed as a reporter for the committee. This committee should examine the civil rules at every level of the civil justice docket, including small claims court and all areas of domestic relations law, to ensure that the rules enable litigants and court officials to dispose of cases efficiently, fairly, and transparently. This committee should propose rules of procedure, including rules concerning the use of communication technology and electronic filing and management. The rules proposed by the committee should then be reviewed for adoption by the Supreme Court and made binding, unless the General Assembly votes to defer, alter, or reject those rules.

- IDENTIFY AND TRACK CASES ACCORDING TO THREE CATEGORIES: SIMPLE, GENERAL, AND COMPLEX

Cases at every level of the civil justice system should be identified early and designated as simple, general, or complex. Allocated resources should match the complexity of the case, and metrics in addition to the amount in dispute should be used to determine which track a case should be in. This “right-sizing” in case management will increase efficiencies throughout the system and ultimately should contribute to greater access as cases and claims are disposed of without expending unnecessary time or resources. “Right-sizing” cases acknowledges the unique nature, complexity, and sensitivity of some types of cases and recognizes that not all cases require the same kind of system resources.

For example, domestic relations cases may require different forms of processing and management than other types of cases, particularly since mandatory mediation is often a part of these cases. Cases with particular features could be referred for alternative dispute resolution processes such as mediation, arbitration, and collaborative law. Data gathered from such a tracking system could also be used for future evaluation of performance of specific tracks and other measures.

- REQUIRE USE OF UNIFORM CASE MANAGEMENT ORDERS IN ALL COURTS

One of the principles and achievements of the Bell Commission of the 1950s was the establishment of a unified court system throughout the state of North Carolina. However, local rules and practice still vary considerably across the different judicial districts and in different levels of court, from magistrate's court to superior court. The Committee believes that efficiency, fairness, and transparency may be furthered by the use of uniform case management procedures and civil rules that are based on best practices. A case assignment system that matches the conduct of the case to the needs of the case will require new rules and case management orders, depending on whether the case is simple, general, or complex. The rules and orders will require modification over time as cases and best practices change. A civil rules committee can help supply the necessary uniformity in and flexibility of case management orders, as one does in the federal system.

- REASSIGN AND RETRAIN AS NECESSARY COURT SUPPORT STAFF, AND SUPPLY JUDGES WITH RESEARCH STAFF

Some of the anticipated savings that the system generates through improved technology and streamlined procedures can be directed to improving the quality of justice delivered in the system as a whole.

The Committee suggests that some portion of expected savings from the transition to technology be used to reassign, retrain, or reinvest in judicial system support staff, including trial court administrators, clerks of court, and pools of research support personnel, so that a more precise, accurate, and efficient disposition can occur in every case.

- RESTORE FUNDING FOR LEGAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS, INCLUDING LOAN REPAYMENT RELIEF

Resources are at the heart of access to justice. Since the 2008 economic downturn, civil legal aid funding has decreased from virtually every source while the number of North Carolinians living in poverty has increased.¹² When individuals are represented by legal aid, they are able to meaningfully access the court system, and their interests are protected regardless of how much money they have. And with skilled advocates who pursue only meritorious cases and settle many matters outside of court, legal aid conserves judicial resources.

Civil legal aid is an excellent investment of state resources that generates more than two dollars in economic benefits for each dollar in funding.¹³ The value of stopping domestic abuse, preventing unnecessary homelessness, and blocking illegal and predatory consumer practices is incalculable. The Committee recommends restoring state legal aid funding, including programs such as NCLEAF, which provides loan repayment assistance for lawyers who serve North Carolinians in need.

- ENHANCE USE OF ONLINE FORMS; EXPLORE USE OF SELF-HELP KIOSKS AND CENTERS

To assist self-represented litigants, forms and instructions should be improved and made available online. These online resources would help streamline common and non-technical matters such as small claims, simple divorces, or simple landlord-tenant cases. Self-help kiosks or centers, online court assistance, and online dispute resolution mechanisms should be explored as a way to match appropriate judicial resources with self-represented litigants. The Committee agrees, however, that none of these resources should be viewed as a substitute for trained, competent counsel in appropriate cases. Through technology-enhanced tools as well as case management orders, self-represented litigants should be notified as early as practicable of the availability of legal services and how to obtain those services. Such a system should be designed to better distribute and designate the limited legal aid and pro bono attorney resources to litigants who are most in need of, and would most benefit from, their services.

- STUDY SINGLE JUDGE ASSIGNMENT IN DISTRICT COURT, AND IN SUPERIOR COURT WITHIN SPIRIT OF ROTATION REQUIRED BY THE NORTH CAROLINA CONSTITUTION

Some specialized courts in North Carolina, such as the Business Court and some family courts, and some specialized procedures, such as Rule 2.1, allow a single judge to be assigned to a case and to preside over that case from its beginning to its conclusion. The cases handled by single-judge assignment typically involve multiple hearings, discovery and discovery motions, motions to dismiss and for summary judgment, and numerous court dates. Single-judge-assigned cases can be complex commercial business matters or difficult and sensitive matters such as domestic relations. In the specialized cases to which it currently applies, litigants, lawyers, and judges are generally satisfied with single-judge case assignment. The Committee believes that the judiciary should further study a method that would identify those disputes, outside of the specialized courts and the procedures currently available, for which single-judge assignment is most efficient, and create a transparent, neutral, and reliable method for making single-judge case assignments. Such a method could comply with the spirit of the state constitutional requirement that superior court judges rotate through districts by assigning such cases on a rotating basis so that the assigned superior court judge has cases from different districts.

The Chief Justice may encourage experimentation and pilot projects in the different districts and divisions to determine what method of assignment is most appropriate to satisfy the guiding principles of fairness, accessibility, transparency, efficiency, and effectiveness. Such pilot projects could build upon the experience of the business court and permit cases to be randomly or otherwise assigned to superior court judges from filing through judgment. Pilot projects should also permit cases to be assigned from filing on a geographical rotation system, permitting the judge to handle cases from different locations on a periodic basis. The pilot projects should include both rural and urban counties and be evaluated after a reasonable and sufficient period of time. Because of their high volume and number of unrepresented litigants, domestic relations cases and other matters related to family law might be an area deserving of special consideration and further study with respect to electronic filing, case management, and tracking.

- ENSURE THAT LAWS AND PROCEDURES RESPECTING CIVIL FINES, FEES, AND PENALTIES DO NOT CAUSE OR AGGRAVATE POVERTY OR INEQUALITY

The Committee believes that further study of the effects of the way in which the civil justice system interacts with problems of inequality and integration into society is necessary. Such a study should be aimed at ensuring that the civil side of the justice system, alone or in combination with the criminal side, is not permitting an inequitable system to take root in North Carolina. This study may include, but is not limited to, a cost-benefit analysis of the practice of converting criminal fines or penalties into civil judgments, the use of fee waivers as an incentive to complete diversionary programs, the process and mechanisms of criminal expungements, and the effect of penalties such as suspension of licenses and criminal sanctions for failure to pay child support.

EVIDENCE-BASED RECOMMENDATIONS TO IMPROVE THE STATE’S CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

COMMITTEE CHARGE & PROCEDURES

The Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ) was charged with identifying areas of concern in the state’s criminal justice system and making evidence-based recommendations for reform. Starting with a comprehensive list of potential areas of inquiry, the Committee narrowed its focus to the four issues identified below. Its inquiry into these issues emphasized data-driven decision-making and a collaborative dialogue among diverse stakeholders. The Committee was composed of representatives from a broad range of stakeholder groups and was supported by a reporter. When additional expertise was needed on an issue, the Committee formed subcommittees (as it did for Juvenile Reinvestment and Indigent Defense) or retained outside expert assistance from nationally recognized organizations (as it did for Criminal Case Management and Pretrial Justice).

The Committee met nine times. The subcommittee on Indigent Defense met four times; the subcommittee on Juvenile Reinvestment met twice. Commissioners heard from interested persons and more than thirty state and national experts and judicial officials. The Committee chair, reporter, and subcommittee members gave presentations to and sought feedback on the Committee’s work from a variety of groups, including for example, the N.C. Sheriffs’ Association, N.C. Senior Resident Superior Court Judges, N.C. Chief District Court Judges, N.C. Police Chiefs, and the governing body of the N.C. Police Benevolent Association. In addition to support from the Committee reporter, NCCALJ staff, the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts’ Research and Planning Division, the National Center for State Courts (NCSC), and the North Carolina Sentencing Policy and Advisory Commission provided data and research. The Committee prepared an interim report, which was presented to the public in August 2016 for online feedback and in-person comments at four public meetings held around the state. That feedback was considered by the Committee in formulating its final recommendations. For more detail on all of the Committee’s recommendations, please see the attached Appendices noted below.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice makes the following evidence-based recommendations to improve the state’s criminal justice system:

- JUVENILE REINVESTMENT

As detailed in Appendix A, the Committee recommends that North Carolina raise the juvenile age to eighteen for all crimes except violent felonies and traffic offenses. Juvenile age refers to the cut-off for when a child is adjudicated in the adult criminal justice system versus the juvenile justice system. Since 1919, North Carolina’s juvenile age has been set at age sixteen; this means that in North Carolina sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds are prosecuted in adult court. Only one other state in the nation still sets the juvenile age at sixteen. Forty-three states plus the District of Columbia set the juvenile age at eighteen; five states set it at seventeen. The Committee found, among other things, that the vast majority of North Carolina’s sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds commit misdemeanors and nonviolent felonies; that raising the age will make North Carolina safer and will yield economic benefit to the state and its citizens; and that raising the age has been successfully implemented in other states, is supported by scientific research, and would remove a competitive disadvantage that North Carolina places on its citizens.

In addition to recommending that North Carolina raise the juvenile age, the Committee’s proposal includes a series of recommendations designed to address concerns that were raised by prosecutors and law enforcement officials and were validated by evidence. These recommendations include, for example, requiring the Division of Juvenile Justice to provide more information to law enforcement officers in the field, providing victims with a right to review certain decisions by juvenile court counselors, and implementing technological upgrades so that prosecutors can have meaningful access to an individual’s juvenile record. Importantly, the Committee’s recommendation is contingent upon full funding. The year-long collaborative process that resulted in this proposal also resulted in historic support from other groups, including the North Carolina Sheriffs’ Association, the North Carolina Association of Chiefs of Police, the North Carolina Police Benevolent Association, the North Carolina Chamber Legal Institute, the John Locke Foundation, and Conservatives for Criminal Justice Reform. Additionally, this issue has received significant public support. Of the 178 comments submitted on it during the NCCALJ public comment period, 96% supported the Committee’s recommendation to raise the age.

- CRIMINAL CASE MANAGEMENT

The Committee recommends that North Carolina engage in a comprehensive criminal case management reform effort, as detailed in the report prepared for the Committee by the National Center for State Courts (NCSC) and included as Appendix B. Article I, section 18 of the North Carolina Constitution provides that “right and justice shall be administered without favor, denial, or delay.” Regarding the latter obligation, North Carolina is failing to meet both model criminal case processing time standards as well as its own more lenient time standards. Case delays undermine public trust and confidence in the judicial system and judicial system actors. When unproductive court dates cause case delays, costs are inflated for both the court system and the indigent defense system by dedicating — sometimes repeatedly — personnel such as judges, courtroom staff, prosecutors, and defense lawyers to hearing and trial dates that do not move the case toward resolution. Unproductive court dates also are costly for witnesses, victims, and defendants and their families, when they miss work and incur travel expenses to attend proceedings. Case delay also is costly for local governments, which must pay the costs for excessive pretrial detentions, pay to transport detainees to court for unproductive hearings, and pay officers for time spent traveling to and attending such hearings. Delay also exacerbates evidence processing backlogs for state and local crime labs and drives up costs for those entities. The report at Appendix B provides a detailed road map for implementing the recommended case management reform effort, including, among other things, adopting or modifying time standards and performance measures, establishing and evaluating pilot projects, and developing caseload management templates. The report, which also recommends that certain key participants be involved in the project and a project timeline, was unanimously adopted by the Committee.

- PRETRIAL JUSTICE

As described in the report included as Appendix C, the Committee unanimously recommends that North Carolina carry out a pilot project to implement and assess legal- and evidence-based pretrial justice practices. In the pretrial period — the time between arrest and when a defendant is brought to trial — most defendants are entitled to conditions of pretrial release. These can include, for example, a written promise to appear in court or a secured bond. The purpose of pretrial conditions is to ensure that the defendant appears in court and commits no harm while on release. Through pretrial conditions, judicial officials seek to “manage” these two pretrial risks. Evidence shows that North Carolina must improve its approach to managing pretrial risk. For example, because the state lacks a preventative detention procedure, the only option for detaining highly dangerous defendants is to set a very high secured bond. However, if a highly dangerous defendant has financial resources — as for example a drug trafficker may — the defendant can “buy” his or her way out of pretrial confinement by satisfying even a very high secured bond. At the other extreme, North Carolina routinely incarcerates pretrial very low risk defendants simply because they are too poor to pay even relatively low secured bonds. In some instances these indigent defendants spend more time in jail during the pretrial phase than they could ever receive if found guilty at trial. These and other problems — and the significant costs that they create for individuals, local and state governments, and society — can be mitigated by a pretrial system that better assesses and manages pretrial risk. Fortunately, harnessing the power of data and analytics, reputable organizations have developed empirically derived pretrial risk assessment tools to help judicial officials better measure a defendant’s pretrial risk. One such tool already has been successfully implemented in one of North Carolina’s largest counties. The recommended pilot project would, among other things, implement and assess more broadly in North Carolina an empirically derived pretrial risk assessment tool and develop an evidence-based decision matrix to help judicial officials best match pretrial conditions to empirically assessed pretrial risk. Such tools hold the potential for a safer and more just North Carolina.

• INDIGENT DEFENSE

As discussed in more detail in Appendix D, the Committee offers a comprehensive set of recommendations to improve the State’s indigent defense system. Defendants who face incarceration in criminal court have a constitutional right to counsel to represent them. If a person lacks the resources to pay for a lawyer, counsel must be provided at state expense. Indigent defense thus refers to the state’s system for providing legal assistance to those unable to pay for counsel themselves. North Carolina’s system is administered by the Office of Indigent Defense Services (IDS). When the State fails to provide effective assistance to indigent defendants, those persons can experience unfair and unjust outcomes. But the costs of failing to provide effective representation are felt by others as well, including victims and communities. Failing to provide effective assistance also creates costs for the criminal justice system as a whole, when problems with indigent defense representation cause trial delays and unnecessary appeals and retrials. While stakeholders agree that IDS has improved the State’s delivery of indigent defense services, they also agree that in some respects the system is in crisis. The attached report makes detailed recommendations to help IDS achieve this central goal: ensuring fair proceedings by providing effective representation in a cost-effective manner. The report recommends, among other things, establishing single district and regional public defender offices statewide; providing oversight, supervision, and support to all counsel providing indigent defense services; implementing uniform indigency standards; implementing uniform training, qualification, and performance standards and workload formulas for all counsel providing indigent services; providing reasonable compensation for all counsel providing indigent defense services; and reducing the cost of indigent defense services to make resources available for needed reforms. Implementation of these recommendations promises to improve fairness and access, reduce case delays, and increase public trust and confidence.

LEGAL PROFESSIONALISM COMMITTEE REPORT

No part of this report constitutes the official policy of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, of the North Carolina Judicial Branch, or of any other constituent official or entity of North Carolina state government.

THE ACCESSIBILITY AND FAIRNESS OF OUR COURT SYSTEM DEPEND, TO A SIGNIFICANT DEGREE, ON THE STRUCTURE AND PERFORMANCE OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION.

INTRODUCTION AND CHARGE OF THE COMMITTEE

This report states the recommendations of the Legal Professionalism Committee of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ).

The following charge has guided the work of this Committee:

The mission of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice is to consider how North Carolina courts can best meet our 21st century legal needs and the expectations of the public, ensuring that we can continue to provide justice for all.

The role of the Legal Professionalism Committee is to consider and evaluate possible changes in our system of delivery of legal services. The Committee will explore ways to address structural challenges that affect access to justice, including the barriers that create a lack of affordable legal services for large segments of our population, the costs and debt associated with a legal education, and the challenges of developing and sustaining a legal career.

Democratic societies are founded on a shared belief in the rule of law and the integrity of the judiciary. Any change that the Committee considers must take into account the core values of our system of justice, including the exercise of independent judgment on behalf of clients, the absence of conflicts, and the confidentiality of client communications.

The Committee will also consider the need to protect the public from unskilled advisors and the effects of unrepresented parties on the court system.

BACKGROUND: ACCESS AND FAIRNESS

Court systems provide a forum to resolve criminal charges and civil disputes. To be effective, a court system must be accessible to people who have disputes. If a court system is to have the confidence of the public it serves, the system must apply fair processes and produce fair outcomes.

The accessibility and fairness of our court system depend, to a significant degree, on the structure and performance of the legal profession. Over the last decade, the market for law-related services has seen rapid change. The statutory framework that governs these services has not kept pace with these changes. This report recommends approaches to these issues that will promote access and fairness in our legal system.

Civil legal services are currently beyond the reach of many North Carolinians. Many of our fellow citizens cannot afford to hire a lawyer for even relatively inexpensive services, such as a will or an uncontested divorce. In a recent North Carolina poll, 73% of respondents disagreed with the statement that most people can afford to bring a case to court.¹

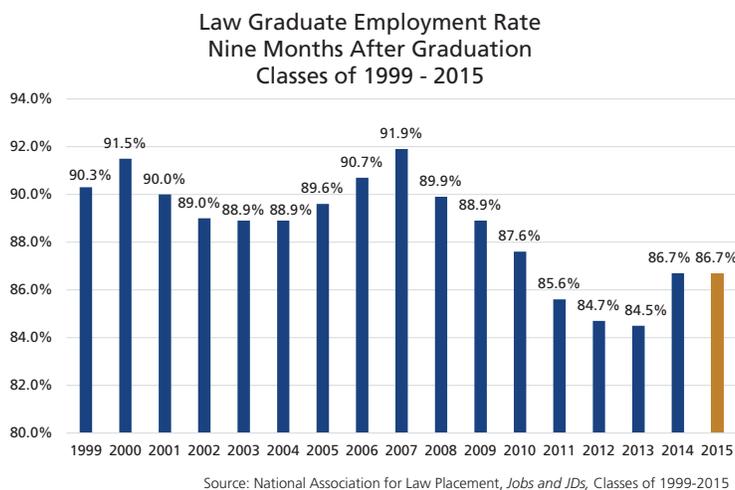

This lack of affordability affects more than indigent people. Small- and medium-sized businesses, for example, find it increasingly unaffordable to hire lawyers to address the legal issues that inevitably arise in a modern business.

These problems have led many parties to try to represent themselves — not only in transactions, but in court as well. A 2015 study by the National Center on State Courts found that “at least one party was self-represented in more than three-quarters of civil [non-domestic] cases.”² Although some of these parties might represent themselves for idiosyncratic reasons, most of them do so because they cannot afford a lawyer (or believe that they cannot).

Access to lawyers has non-economic dimensions as well. Rural areas of North Carolina are losing lawyers to retirement and relocation. From 2004 to 2015, four of the state’s thirty judicial districts saw a net decrease in their populations of practicing lawyers. Over this period, one judicial district lost 60.7% of its lawyers.³ Further, many non-English-speaking North Carolinians have trouble finding lawyers who can advise them in their own languages.

Paradoxically, many clients’ legal needs are going unmet at the same time that many lawyers cannot find stable legal employment. The ranks of these unemployed and underemployed lawyers span the generations. As the following graph illustrates, employment rates for new law graduates in the United States lag behind the rates that prevailed before the 2008 recession:

In addition, many lawyers carry heavy debt burdens that make it untenable for them to offer low-cost legal services.⁴ Law school debt also deters many lawyers from practicing in rural areas of North Carolina.

Opinions vary on the causes of the reduced demand for lawyers. Some of the reduced demand, however, reflects an increasing gap between the services that clients are seeking and the services that lawyers are offering. Because of the Internet, the days when a client had to consult a lawyer to get even basic information on a legal problem are over. In addition, new types of providers are offering law-related services that, at least in some respects, compete with lawyers' services.

For these and other reasons, fewer clients are seeking — or can afford — the customized legal services that most law graduates are trained to provide. This mismatch between client needs and the services lawyers are offering requires careful study and creative solutions.

The legal profession and the court system have a shared duty to promote access to justice. The Committee recognizes that people who cannot afford essential legal services should still be able to access these services. Similarly, people who lack lawyers should still have access to the courts.

Likewise, the legal profession and the court system have a shared duty to ensure that the legal system produces fair outcomes. Protecting the public from incompetent legal services promotes fair processes and fair outcomes in our legal system.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Committee finds that the delivery of law-related services affects the access and fairness goals discussed above. Thus, the Committee has studied the delivery of law-related services in North Carolina and nationwide.

The Committee has identified several issues that are affecting, and will continue to affect, the dynamics of law-related services and the needs of the public. On these issues, the Committee makes the following recommendations:

- A NEW NORTH CAROLINA LEGAL INNOVATION CENTER SHOULD BE CREATED

The innovation center should study (and, if appropriate, propose changes to) the definition of the practice of law in North Carolina and the entities with the authority to adjust that definition. The innovation center's proposals should account for the evolving needs and expectations of the public, as well as the impact of technology on law-related services.

The innovation center should also study whether North Carolina should license or certify any additional categories of providers of law-related services. If the center recommends licensing or certifying any additional categories of providers, the recommendations should address how these providers should be regulated.

REASONS FOR RECOMMENDATION ONE

Currently, large numbers of North Carolinians with law-related needs are not having those needs met by lawyers. The demand for law-related services in North Carolina and the available supply of those services are not aligned.

In our state, the majority of legal services continue to be provided by lawyers in small partnerships or solo practices. In the United States more generally, however, technology and other market forces are expanding the law-related services that are available. Technology companies and entrepreneurs are making efforts to meet the demand for affordable law-related services in new ways.

These technology-based providers offer a variety of services. Some address discrete legal problems, such as preparing wills, deeds, or contracts. Others take on larger projects, such as providing short-term lawyers to corporations, helping companies analyze high-volume contracts, and helping people comply with government regulations.

In addition, some states are experimenting with licensing independent non-lawyers to provide law-related services. These limited-license legal technicians are not admitted to the bar and generally do not have a law degree. Even so, they are authorized to help clients with a strictly defined range of law-related tasks. The goals of allowing and licensing these services include (1) offering an alternative to lawyers' services in discrete areas and (2) regulating the alternative services in the interest of consumer protection.

Chapter 84 of the North Carolina General Statutes defines the practice of law in North Carolina, limits the entities and persons who can provide services within that definition, and provides for the regulation of those persons and entities. The definition of the practice of law is broad: it includes "performing any legal service for any other person, firm or corporation, with or without compensation." N.C. Gen. Stat. § 84-2.1 (2015).

The definition of the practice of law, as well as the statutes that control who can deliver services within that definition, limit the quantity and types of law-related services that are available in North Carolina. Although these statutes affect the balance of supply and demand, the statutes exist for good reasons — most notably, to prevent incompetent or unfit practitioners from harming the public.

In recent years, North Carolina has witnessed intense litigation regarding whether certain online services, such as LegalZoom, involve the unauthorized practice of law. To resolve this litigation, the General Assembly recently amended Chapter 84. These amendments, however, are mostly a tailored response to the issues raised in the LegalZoom cases.⁵

In sum, despite the evolution of the market for law-related services, North Carolina's definition of the practice of law has stayed largely unchanged. A comprehensive reexamination of Chapter 84, in the Committee's view, will be one that (1) addresses the unmet legal needs of many North Carolinians and (2) decides the status of emerging providers of law-related services.

The issues associated with the delivery of legal services are complex. They require a balance between important interests. Further, the social and economic realities that influence the market for legal services are continuing to change. For these reasons, possible changes to the regulation of law-related services in North Carolina require in-depth analysis.

The Committee recommends that North Carolina create a Legal Innovation Center to analyze these and related issues. Such a center could parallel the American Bar Association’s recently created Center for Innovation: a center that seeks new ways to close the civil justice gap and to improve the delivery of law-related services. North Carolina’s Legal Innovation Center might be a purely private organization — perhaps an arm of the North Carolina Bar Association — or it might be a public-private hybrid.

However the North Carolina Legal Innovation Center is composed, it should study possible updates to Chapter 84. Appropriate updates would seek to address the changing nature of law-related services and would seek a better long-term match of supply and demand. In considering possible statutory updates, the center should address the effects of technological change on law-related services, as well as the wide range of law-related services that now exist or are likely to emerge. In addition, any recommended updates to Chapter 84 must protect the public from incompetent or unfit practitioners and from deceptive practices and other forms of exploitation.

- A NEW NORTH CAROLINA LEGAL INNOVATION CENTER SHOULD STUDY (AND, IF APPROPRIATE, PROPOSE CHANGES TO) THE CHOICE OF THE ENTITIES WITH THE AUTHORITY TO REGULATE ENTRY INTO THE PRACTICE OF LAW

Likewise, the innovation center should study (and, if appropriate, propose changes to) the choice of the entities with the authority to regulate the professional conduct of lawyers. If North Carolina decides to regulate any new types of providers of law-related services, the innovation center should study these same questions in relation to the new providers.

REASONS FOR RECOMMENDATION TWO

As noted earlier, Chapter 84 of the North Carolina General Statutes provides that only licensed lawyers can practice law. Chapter 84 also creates the framework for the regulation of law-related services in North Carolina. However, the precise effects of Chapter 84 depend on more than the text of the statutes. Those effects also depend on the choice of the institutions that implement Chapter 84, as well as the decisions and actions of those institutions.

Chapter 84 is implemented by the North Carolina State Bar, the North Carolina Board of Law Examiners, and the courts. The State Bar and the Board of Law Examiners are state agencies.

The State Bar regulates the professional conduct of lawyers by handling disciplinary matters, issuing ethical opinions, and offering information to lawyers and the public. The State Bar is governed by the State Bar Council, which is composed of fifty-nine licensed North Carolina lawyers and three members of the public. The lawyer councilors are elected, within geographic districts, by other licensed lawyers. The State Bar, through its Authorized Practice of Law Committee, makes decisions on whether to pursue unauthorized-practice charges or lawsuits against people or companies that provide law-related services.

The State Bar investigates complaints of professional misconduct, then prosecutes cases before a statutorily created tribunal called the Disciplinary Hearing Commission. Twelve of the twenty members of this commission are lawyers appointed by the State Bar Council. The other eight members are non-lawyer citizens of North Carolina who are appointed by the Governor and the General Assembly. Each panel of the Disciplinary Hearing Commission consists of two lawyers and a public member.

The North Carolina courts, too, play a role in regulating the practice of law in this state. The courts have inherent authority to regulate the conduct of lawyers who appear before them. This authority operates in parallel with the authority of the State Bar. In addition, the North Carolina courts play a role in shaping the law on professional conduct when they decide appeals from decisions of the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, as well as lawsuits that are filed in the state trial courts in the first instance. Lawsuits alleging unauthorized practice are generally filed in the North Carolina trial courts. Decisions in those cases, as well as decisions of the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, are appealable to the North Carolina appellate courts.

The State Bar adopts rules that govern the practice of law. These rules include the Rules of Professional Conduct. The Supreme Court of North Carolina has the authority to approve, change, or reject these rules. The State Bar also administers certain programs that the Supreme Court of North Carolina has created, such as the Interest on Lawyers' Trust Accounts program and the Client Security Fund.

In the wake of North Carolina State Board of Dental Examiners v. FTC, 135 S. Ct. 1101 (2015), courts and federal antitrust agencies are scrutinizing the makeup, authority, and actions of state agencies that regulate licensed professionals. Our Committee expresses no opinion on how North Carolina's entities that regulate entry into the practice of law would fare under the standards in the Dental Board decision.

The prospect of a Dental Board analysis, however, makes it appropriate to study the makeup, roles, and histories of the entities involved and what steps they can take to manage and avoid potential antitrust risks. Those who study these issues should consider whether there is a policy basis for recommending any change in the interaction of these entities. This study will complement possible changes to Chapter 84.

The Committee recommends that the new North Carolina Legal Innovation Center study these issues as well. The institutional roles discussed in Recommendation Two overlap with the regulatory issues discussed in Recommendation One. In view of these overlaps, it will be most efficient for the same body to study these issues together.

- AN APPROPRIATE ORGANIZATION SHOULD STUDY THE STANDARDS AND METHODS THAT NORTH CAROLINA SHOULD USE IN THE FUTURE TO ASSESS CANDIDATES FOR THE PRACTICE OF LAW, AS WELL AS THE ENTITIES THAT SHOULD CARRY OUT THESE ASSESSMENTS

This study should address the evolving scope of the practice of law, recent and future changes in the dynamics of law-related services, and the legal needs of the public. If North Carolina decides to regulate any new types of providers of law-related services, an appropriate organization should study these same questions in relation to the new providers.

REASONS FOR RECOMMENDATION THREE

Another factor that affects the supply and quality of law-related services in North Carolina is the way that the state assesses new candidates for law practice.

With narrow exceptions, all candidates for law licensure in North Carolina must be graduates of law schools approved by the State Bar Council. This list of law schools is limited to law schools accredited by the American Bar Association.

The North Carolina Board of Law Examiners administers a two-day written exam that seeks to ensure that a law graduate has a reasonable level of competence as a lawyer. One day of this exam consists of essays on selected aspects of North Carolina substantive law. The other day consists of the multiple-choice Multistate Bar Examination. Bar applicants must also pass the Multistate Professional Responsibility Examination. Further, they must undergo an extensive background check and must demonstrate good character to the satisfaction of the Board of Law Examiners.

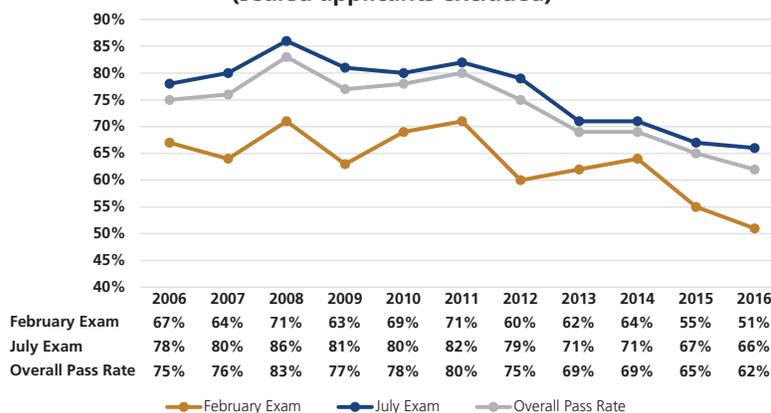

North Carolina allows licensed lawyers from thirty-six states and the District of Columbia to apply for admission by comity — that is, without taking the North Carolina Bar Examination. These admissions require an extensive application process. Rulings on comity applications often take several months.

In contrast, under Chapter 84A of the General Statutes, North Carolina allows lawyers whose only law license is from another country (or from Puerto Rico, Guam, or the U.S. Virgin Islands) to practice law independently in this state. To do so, these foreign legal consultants, as they are called, need not be admitted to the bar of any U.S. state. However, the statute limits them to a scope of practice that is narrower than the scope allowed for North Carolina-licensed lawyers.

North Carolina’s methods of assessing candidates have remained essentially the same for decades. Over the past few years, however, the percentage of candidates who have passed the bar exam has been falling. The following table illustrates the drop:

North Carolina Bar Examination
First-Time Test Takers Pass Rate 2006 - 2016
(sealed applicants excluded)

Source: North Carolina Board of Law Examiners

There has also been a sharp increase in the percentage of candidates who have experienced problems during character-and-fitness inquiries.

For example, the following table compares, from 2012 to 2015, the percentage of North Carolina bar applicants who have a nondisclosure issue on their bar applications, incidents of DWI or driving after consuming alcohol, or multiple DWIs.⁶

Character and Fitness Issues Among North Carolina Bar Applicants, 2012-15

Character and Fitness Issue	Percentage of 2012 Applicants	Percentage of 2015 Applicants	Change from 2012 – 2015
Nondisclosure	30%	52%	+22%
DWI / DUI Incident	23%	43%	+20%
Multiple DWIs / DUIs	5%	18%	+13%

Source: North Carolina Board of Law Examiners, Dec. 2015

Many states have begun reassessing their methods for assessing candidates for the practice of law. Currently, twenty-five states have adopted the Uniform Bar Examination. Each state that adopts the Uniform Bar Examination has the option of adding a state-specific component to the exam. The Uniform Bar Examination is administered and graded according to uniform guidelines created by the National Conference of Bar Examiners. The exam results in a score that is portable among any of the participating states.

Some states require bar candidates to take assessments at specified points during law school.

In addition, some states are experimenting with performance-based methods of testing bar applicants. For example, a majority of states administer the Multistate Performance Test, an exam that requires an applicant to carry out simulated lawyering for a simulated client.

In October 2016, the North Carolina Board of Law Examiners recommended that North Carolina begin administering the Uniform Bar Examination, including the Multistate Performance Test, in 2019.⁷ The Board also recommended that North Carolina supplement the Uniform Bar Examination with North Carolina-specific components that will be specified in the future. To take effect, this recommendation will need the approval of the State Bar Council and the Supreme Court of North Carolina.

The criteria and methods for admission to the practice of law must balance a number of important considerations, such as:

- The criteria must bear a reasonable relationship to the knowledge and skills that today’s and tomorrow’s clients should expect their lawyers to have.
- The criteria and methods must be calibrated to screen out applicants who would become incompetent, unfit, or dishonest lawyers. Although perfect calibration is impossible, the criteria and methods must never slight the consumer-protection function of bar admissions.
- At the same time, the criteria and methods must be fair and reasonably objective.
- The criteria and methods must be practical and cost-effective.
- The criteria and methods must be transparent. The legal profession must be able to predict — and explain — the results produced by the criteria and methods.

For many years, North Carolina has used essentially the same criteria and methods to assess candidates for the practice of law. This fact suggests that it would be beneficial to study, and possibly update, those criteria and methods. Recent circumstances reinforce that conclusion:

- Clients are seeking a wider range of services from lawyers. In some cases, they are seeking new or more limited services, such as “unbundled” strategic and technical advice, document review, or form completion.
- As shown above, pass rates on the North Carolina Bar Examination have dropped in recent years. The pass rates have dropped even though the bar exam is, in a sense, graded on a curve.
- More bar candidates present serious issues with character and fitness than in earlier eras.
- Many states are considering alternatives to the traditional bar exam, including performance-based exams and apprenticeship-like systems.

If the definition of the practice of law in North Carolina changes, this change will call for further adaptation of the skills and other characteristics required of lawyers. Moreover, if North Carolina decides to license or certify any non-lawyer providers of law-related services, the state will need to find ways to assess candidates for those roles.

Finally, the above changes suggest that an appropriate body should also study the choice of the entity that assesses candidates. Applying new standards and methods, and assessing non-lawyer providers of law-related services, might require expertise beyond the current capabilities of the Board of Law Examiners.

Bar examiners and lawyer regulators nationwide are currently studying the policy issues in this area. A qualified body — one with expertise in legal education and test methods — should study these issues in North Carolina as well.

A new North Carolina Legal Innovation Center might or might not have the above expertise. If it does, the innovation center would be a good choice to carry out this analysis. If not, another appropriate body should be chosen or created.

- THE COMMITTEE
ENDORSES THE
WORK OF THE
NORTH CAROLINA
EQUAL ACCESS TO JUSTICE COMMISSION

The Committee recommends that the Equal Access to Justice Commission explore ways to increase the help offered to self-represented litigants throughout North Carolina. The Committee also endorses the work of the related North Carolina Pro Bono Resource Center, which seeks to increase pro bono services provided by North Carolina lawyers.

REASONS FOR RECOMMENDATION FOUR

As an unfortunate side effect of North Carolina's current system for delivery of legal services, many North Carolinians have law-related needs but cannot afford lawyers.

Accommodating self-represented litigants is one of the most pressing challenges that face the North Carolina courts. Most aspects of the court system are not designed for use by people who litigate without the help of a lawyer. Most self-represented litigants have only a limited understanding of the substantive law involved in their cases, the meaning of legal terms, the rules of evidence and procedure, and filing deadlines. They face challenges at every step, including filing a lawsuit, serving process, conducting and responding to discovery, and more. These litigants are often tripped up by procedural rules and other features of our complex legal system. In sum, the absence of a lawyer makes it unlikely that unrepresented parties can achieve their objectives in court. These difficulties can erode public trust and confidence in the court system.

As another concern, when unrepresented parties try to file papers, interact with court officials and opposing counsel, and appear in court, their efforts often strain the resources of the court system and cause difficulties in the litigation process. Judges and court officials often face difficult choices about how much they can help unrepresented parties.

Self-represented litigants in North Carolina also face problems because of county-to-county variations in trial courts' forms and local rules. For example, a 2016 study found that, across a sample of twelve North Carolina counties, child custody cases triggered a total of twenty-eight different local rules.⁸ These local rules applied over and above the statewide rules that govern these cases.

The number and complexity of these rules make it extremely difficult for self-represented litigants to understand and comply with court procedures. The variations also make it difficult for pro bono lawyers to represent litigants across county lines.

Further, North Carolina court forms are not as readily accessible as they might be, especially for self-represented litigants.

To ease these challenges, courts in some states have started efforts to make the court system more user-friendly for self-represented litigants. For example, the state courts of Utah and California have launched self-help websites that provide forms, explanations of basic procedural steps, and links to the most commonly encountered substantive law.⁹ These types of resources are useful for many litigants, but less useful for litigants with limited education, English skills, or computer skills.

Courthouse navigators are an even more useful resource for self-represented litigants. These programs, currently in place in New York and Arizona, allow trained non-lawyers to help self-represented litigants without giving legal advice. Courthouse navigators use computers to retrieve information, research information about the law, collect documents needed for individual cases, and, if needed, respond to judges' or court officials' questions about a particular case. Navigators reduce the confusion of self-represented litigants, but they do more than that. They also help cases flow more efficiently through the court system. Further, navigators insulate judges and court clerks from the dilemmas that they face when self-represented litigants turn to them for advice.

After hearing about these initiatives in other states, the Committee discussed a wide range of possible direct initiatives to fill the justice gap in North Carolina. The Committee received especially valuable information from the North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission. For several years, the Equal Access to Justice Commission has been studying the causes of the justice gap and possible solutions. Our Committee considers it important for North Carolina to speak with one voice on these issues. Thus, we endorse the work and recommendations of the Equal Access to Justice Commission.

Although all of the Equal Access to Justice Commission's work is important, the Committee would like to highlight and endorse the Equal Access to Justice Commission's initiatives in two areas: meeting the needs of self-represented litigants and increasing lawyers' pro bono services.

Finding Ways to Accommodate Self-Represented Litigants

The Committee encourages the Equal Access to Justice Commission to recommend measures that will reduce the burdens faced by self-represented parties and volunteer lawyers. Although the Committee defers to the Equal Access to Justice Commission on the best choice of measures, worthwhile efforts might include those listed in Exhibit 1 of this report.

None of these measures, however, should be viewed as a substitute for trained, competent counsel in appropriate cases. Through technology-enhanced tools and case management orders, the court system should notify self-represented litigants, as early as is practical in a given case, what free or low-cost legal services might be available and how to obtain them. These systems should be designed to direct legal-aid resources and volunteer lawyers' services to the litigants who need them the most and would benefit from them the most.

Many of the initiatives recommended here, of course, cost money. This reality highlights the need for adequate funding of the North Carolina court system.

Advancing Pro Bono Efforts

Although pro bono lawyering alone is unlikely to fill the entire civil-justice gap, it has the potential to fill part of the gap.

Rule 6.1 of North Carolina's Rules of Professional Conduct affirms that each lawyer has a professional obligation to provide legal services to those who are unable to pay. The rule urges all lawyers, regardless of their professional roles, "to render at least (50) hours of pro bono public legal services per year."

Since the adoption of Rule 6.1 in 2010, however, there have been only limited efforts to educate North Carolina lawyers on their ethical duty to provide pro bono legal services. Although pro bono lawyers alone cannot serve the needs of all clients who seek help, pro bono programs and dedicated pro bono volunteer lawyers can play a crucial role in bridging the justice gap and helping legal aid organizations serve those most in need.

In 2014, the Equal Access to Justice Commission surveyed lawyers across the state to identify current pro bono activities and barriers to increasing pro bono services. According to the survey, the resources that would be most likely to encourage pro bono services include (1) an online portal to review and select pro bono opportunities, (2) manuals on skills and best practices, and (3) a statewide agency to connect lawyers with organizations that administer pro bono activities.¹⁰

In 2016, the Equal Access to Justice Commission established the North Carolina Pro Bono Resource Center with the goal of increasing pro bono participation statewide. The initial activities of the Pro Bono Resource Center include:

- Providing support for existing pro bono activities through recruitment, training, and opportunities for collaboration;
- Communicating to lawyers statewide about pro bono projects;
- Developing pro bono projects, with an initial focus on projects to deploy recent law school graduates to meet unmet legal needs in Wake and Mecklenburg counties;
- Implementing voluntary pro bono reporting; and
- Recognizing lawyers' pro bono service statewide.

The Committee endorses these efforts. In Exhibit 1 of this report, the Committee suggests further possible initiatives for the Pro Bono Resource Center.

Suggested Initiatives for the North Carolina Equal Access to Justice Commission

- Analyzing whether the North Carolina court system is accessible to and usable by self-represented litigants. This analysis should consider whether the current level of access raises any due process issues.
- Urging the North Carolina courts to implement a “courthouse navigator” system statewide.
- Creating a statewide action plan for self-represented litigants.
- Identifying ways to streamline commonly encountered court processes to make them easier for self-represented litigants to handle.
- Standardizing forms and templates for self-represented litigants across North Carolina.
- Studying trial courts’ local rules and identifying ways to standardize or consolidate these rules as much as is reasonable.
- Creating websites with user-friendly court information and online forms, with links to live assistance from court personnel.
- Providing online triage services that give self-represented litigants routes for pursuing their cases and, at the same time, help the courts process and track cases.
- Offering standard training to help judges and court personnel work with self-represented litigants.
- Forging agreements with law schools’ clinical programs, in an effort to involve law students (under supervision) in client services.
- Developing court assistance offices, self-help centers, and courtroom-based resources to help self-represented litigants.
- Collaborating with public libraries and law libraries to help self-represented litigants.
- Collecting and analyzing data on the barriers facing unrepresented litigants, how unrepresented litigants fare in court, and the impact of efforts to help them.

Suggested Initiatives for the North Carolina Pro Bono Resource Center

- Developing a statewide campaign to educate North Carolina lawyers about their responsibility to provide pro bono legal services under Rule 6.1 of North Carolina’s Rules of Professional Conduct.
- Working with local bar organizations to develop pro bono projects throughout North Carolina.
- Expanding training opportunities for lawyers who volunteer to provide pro bono legal services.
- Supporting efforts to track and recognize North Carolina lawyers’ pro bono service.

PUBLIC TRUST AND CONFIDENCE

COMMITTEE REPORT

This report contains recommendations for the future direction of the North Carolina court system as developed independently by citizen volunteers. No part of this report constitutes the official policy of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, of the North Carolina Judicial Branch, or of any other constituent official or entity of North Carolina state government.

“OUR STATE’S CONSTITUTION REQUIRES THAT JUSTICE ‘BE ADMINISTERED WITHOUT FAVOR, DENIAL, OR DELAY.’”
North Carolina Constitution, Article I, Section 18

INTRODUCTION

North Carolina’s Judicial Branch serves a unique and distinctive role in the state’s system of government and in our society. The Judicial Branch’s courts interpret laws, settle disputes between citizens, and conduct criminal proceedings. Our state’s constitution requires that this duty to administer justice be exercised “without favor, denial, or delay.”¹

It is vitally important that the Judicial Branch maintain the public’s trust and confidence in our court system’s ability to provide justice for all.

According to Court Review in 1999: “A court that does not have the trust or confidence of the public cannot expect to function for long as an effective resolver of disputes, a respected issuer of punishments, or a valued deliberative body.”² If the people of North Carolina lose faith in the courts of our state, where else can they turn for impartial and timely justice?

As articulated in Part One of this Final Report, the ultimate goal of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ) has been to improve our court system’s ability to achieve just outcomes and, in so doing, to increase the trust and confidence that North Carolinians have in their courts. To that end, the recommendations of the NCCALJ’s Public Trust and Confidence Committee articulate broad policy aims for the Judicial Branch, many of which are echoed in greater detail within the more limited scope of the final reports of the NCCALJ’s other four Committees.

MISSION STATEMENT AND GUIDING PRINCIPLES

The mission of the NCCALJ is to address how North Carolina courts can best meet 21st century legal needs and public expectations. The role of the Committee is to identify and evaluate factors that influence public trust and confidence in the judicial system and to recommend actions that enhance this trust and confidence.

The Committee began its work by endeavoring to understand the current state of public perception of the state courts. Through a partnership with Elon University Poll and High Point University Survey Research Center, the Committee sanctioned live-caller public opinion phone surveys in October and November 2015.

After delving into the results of the surveys, the Committee identified a number of foundational principles that our state courts must abide by to enhance the trust and confidence of the public that they serve. Those principles describe a state court system that must:

- Be ACCESSIBLE to the people;
- Be an EFFICIENT user of the public’s most precious commodity, its time;
- Ensure outcomes that are both FAIR and IMPARTIAL;

- Be ACCOUNTABLE to the public as the ultimate stakeholder group; and
- Engage in regular and ongoing SELF-EVALUATION to make improvements where needed.

These guiding principles led the Committee to focus on the following goals aimed at increasing public trust and confidence in the courts of North Carolina, listed here and discussed in greater detail within this report: conducting recurring public opinion surveys; promoting fair and equal access to the courts; eliminating actual and perceived bias in the courts; providing for the just, timely, and economical scheduling and disposition of cases; enhancing access to information and court records; recommending a selection process that ensures well-qualified and independent judges; and strengthening civics education.

These goals are discussed in the body of this report, followed by a set of specific action items recommended by the Committee to meet these goals, organized by goal and by principle. Pursuit of these goals will foster the reform and commitment necessary for the North Carolina judicial system to promote the utmost public trust and confidence.

Throughout its work, the Committee held ten public meetings during which experts and judicial stakeholders gave presentations related to public perceptions, court performance, judicial selection, access, and fairness. The information shared in these presentations educated the commissioners and provided a launching point for further inquiry, discussion, and consideration. A list of the presentations and presenters is available on the NCCALJ website at www.nccalj.org.

GOALS

ENSURING WELL-QUALIFIED AND INDEPENDENT JUDGES

Nothing is more fundamental to our system of justice than having qualified, independent judges to settle disputes. While 60% of respondents in the 2015 surveys agree that judges make decisions based on facts, 76% do not believe that courts are free from political influence. Respondents generally believe that judges' decisions are influenced by political parties (76%) and by the fact that they must run for election (75%). Moreover, judges' salaries often lag behind the salaries of their attorney counterparts with equivalent years of experience in the legal profession, and inadequate salaries threaten the Judicial Branch's ability to attract and retain qualified judges.³

In order to enhance and preserve the highest degree of judicial integrity, fairness, and impartiality, the Committee recommends that the General Assembly take steps to minimize the perceived impact of judicial elections on our system of justice by changing how judges and justices are selected and retained. The Committee further recommends that the General Assembly take action to secure sufficient funding for the Judicial Branch to ensure that judges and justices are provided competitive compensation packages to attract and retain qualified judges.⁴

The Committee also urges the General Assembly to tie the number of judges and justices on a given court to the workload of the relevant court. The use of other non-empirically based considerations to determine the number of judges and justices threatens public trust and confidence.

CONDUCTING A RECURRING PUBLIC OPINION SURVEY

To more effectively serve the public and to maintain and increase public trust and confidence, the Judicial Branch must periodically gauge how the public perceives North Carolina's courts. The best source of the public's perception of the Judicial Branch is the public itself. The 2015 surveys conducted by Elon University Poll and High Point University Survey Research Center have been instrumental in shaping the work of the Committee.⁵

The Committee recommends that the Judicial Branch establish and conduct a survey once every two years to measure public opinion regarding the operation of the courts. The survey should seek to measure the public's perception of fairness, timeliness, administrative efficiency, and general operation, among other factors that may be identified. The survey also must be sensitive to varying perceptions among different demographic groups. By evaluating the survey results from year to year, the Judicial Branch will be in a strong position to address perceived weaknesses, either substantively or through public relations; to track progress over time; and to capitalize on acknowledged strengths. The Judicial Branch also should engage in systematic surveying of court system users through periodic in-person courthouse surveys and continuous online surveys for those accessing the court system through its public website, www.NCcourts.org.

PROMOTING FAIR AND EQUAL ACCESS TO THE COURTS

North Carolina's courts must be accessible to the people of our state, regardless of economic, social, or ethnic background. Yet the 2015 surveys found that a majority of respondents (73%) do not believe that most people can afford to bring a case to court. Moreover, 76% of survey respondents believe that people who have no lawyer representing them receive somewhat worse or far worse treatment in the courts. Much needs to be done to increase public confidence in equal access to the courts.

The Committee recommends that the Judicial Branch take steps to identify and remove barriers that impede fair and equal access to the courts. These barriers include physical impediments, cost factors, language issues, and the complexity of the judicial process. Courthouses must be able to accommodate persons with disabilities and eliminate any physical impediments that prohibit full access to all courthouse facilities and operations. Citizens who cannot afford an attorney should be able to access forms, educational materials, and other resources that help them understand and navigate the complicated judicial process. Court costs should be affordable for the average citizen, and the system must erase cultural and language barriers.

Fair and equal access requires simplification of court processes where possible, manageable court costs, cultural competence, and full physical access.

ELIMINATING ACTUAL AND PERCEIVED BIAS IN THE COURTS

A substantial number of respondents in the 2015 surveys believe that certain groups generally receive better treatment than others in North Carolina courts — a perception that undermines the Judicial Branch's commitment to the fair administration of justice for all. Eighty percent (80%) of respondents believe that the wealthy receive better treatment, while 48% believe that white people receive better treatment. Conversely, a significant number of respondents believe that low-income people (64%), non-English speaking individuals (53%), African Americans (46%), and Hispanics (46%) receive worse treatment in the courts. If justice is to be served without favor, denial, or delay, the Judicial Branch must create an atmosphere in which every person serving in the Judicial Branch understands the importance of bias-free courts, and every person who interacts with the Judicial Branch experiences a bias-free environment.

Empirical studies recognize the potential for disparate treatment based on demographic factors, such as race, religion, gender, primary language, economic status, or other factors.⁶ That potential bias may sometimes manifest itself unintentionally and unconsciously.⁷ To ensure a fair and impartial process, the Judicial Branch must acknowledge the potential for bias and train court personnel and judicial officials to recognize and rectify it. Uniform policies and procedures, together with consistent decision-making processes, will help minimize disparate treatment among similarly situated parties.⁸ Finally, a workforce that reflects the diversity of the people who interact with the judicial system is critical to promoting greater understanding and acceptance of cultural differences and reducing the potential for bias.⁹

The fair administration of justice requires a commitment to uniform policies and procedures, impartial decision-making, cultural competence, a diverse workforce, and an overall bias-free environment.

PROVIDING FOR THE JUST, TIMELY, AND ECONOMICAL SCHEDULING AND DISPOSITION OF CASES

As stewards of public resources and individual citizens' time, Judicial Branch officials must strive to operate a court system that facilitates the just, timely, and economical scheduling and disposition of cases. This includes a commitment to minimizing trips to the courthouse by citizens and attorneys when feasible. Public perception is that the state's courts fail to achieve this goal, as only 25% of survey respondents agree that cases are resolved in a timely manner.

The Committee recommends that the Judicial Branch evaluate methods and take actions to encourage the just, timely, and economical scheduling and disposition of cases. Such actions include evaluation of case management strategies that encourage more efficient handling of cases by a single judge, the timely and efficient resolution of hearings and matters before the court, and the increased use of firm scheduling orders and deadlines. Using improved technology and performance metrics, the Judicial Branch should be well poised to regularly monitor court performance, identify areas for improvement, minimize inefficiency, and encourage best practices among jurisdictions. The Judicial Branch also should focus on improving the efficiency of its interaction with public actors by eliminating unnecessary trips to the courthouse for jurors, witnesses, parties, and attorneys.

In addition, in an effort to assist the state's federal court counterparts in the just, timely, and economical resolution of their cases, North Carolina should consider whether to adopt a process by which federal courts may certify questions of North Carolina law to the Supreme Court of North Carolina. North Carolina is the only state that does not have such a process.¹⁰

ENHANCING ACCESS TO INFORMATION AND COURT RECORDS

Participation in the judicial process can be challenging, even for those with knowledge of the law. For those without such knowledge, the process can be especially difficult to navigate. People seeking general information may be unaware of what information is available and how to access it. Parties and self-represented litigants may lack sufficient information and resources to guide them through a sometimes complicated process. Information is power, but channeling that power requires open access to information and resources.

The Committee recommends that the Judicial Branch enhance access to court records, information, and resources to the greatest extent possible. The courts must use technology to increase the availability of electronic records and information and to minimize the need to visit the physical courthouse. Judicial stakeholders should explore ways to expand the availability of legal assistance for low- and moderate-income individuals and to create staffed self-help centers to provide assistance for self-represented litigants. In addition, general information about court processes, procedures, and operations should be readily available electronically.

The fair administration of justice depends on an informed citizenry equipped with understandable legal forms, convenient access to public records, and information and resources that help them to navigate complicated judicial processes.

STRENGTHENING CIVICS EDUCATION

A low percentage of respondents in the 2015 surveys (13%) indicated that they were very knowledgeable about our state courts. Increased citizen understanding of the administration of the state court system is strongly and positively correlated with the public’s trust and confidence in the day-to-day functioning of our state courts. Civics education serves to foster citizen engagement and increase transparency — two overarching principles that are widely recognized to enhance the public’s trust in its government institutions.

The Committee recommends that the Judicial Branch strengthen civics education in North Carolina among school-aged children and adults through curricula enhancements, programmatic materials, increased social media, and court-user information at first point of contact with the court system. School-aged children should learn early on the importance of a well-functioning court system as one of the three co-equal branches of government. Adult citizens should understand how an effective and efficient court system affects their lives, even if they never come into contact with the system itself. The Judicial Branch should empower its officials and court staff to engage in public service efforts related to civics education.

Lastly, when feasible, jurors, witnesses, litigants, and others interacting with the court system should be provided relevant background information on the work of the courts and their respective roles in the judicial process.

CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

The Public Trust and Confidence Committee has relied on presentations from experts, consultations with judicial stakeholders, and public input in shaping its work and developing its recommendations. The expectation is that these recommendations will result in changes that improve the user experience in state courts and enhance the overall level of public trust and confidence in the North Carolina Judicial Branch.

- ENSURING WELL-QUALIFIED AND INDEPENDENT JUDGES

GUIDING PRINCIPLE — Impartiality

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

Separation of Powers

- The General Assembly should ensure adequate funding for all Judicial Branch functions as requested by the Judicial Branch.

- The Judicial Branch should submit its aggregate budget needs directly to the executive and legislative branches for incorporation into their respective budget documents.
- The Judicial Branch should have full authority to manage its budget and allocate its resources with a minimum of legislative and executive branch controls, including a budget with minimal line items.¹¹
- The General Assembly should make policy recommendations related to the administration of justice, but funding should not depend on actual implementation of recommended initiatives or policies.
- The General Assembly should use empirical workload data to determine the need for expansion of the number of judges or justices on a given court.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES — Accountability, Impartiality

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

Secure Tenure and Salary

- The General Assembly should evaluate the salaries, benefits, and retirement plans offered to judges and justices to ensure a competitive compensation package for qualified judicial candidates designed to attract and retain the highest caliber of judges and justices.¹²
- In order to enhance and preserve the highest degree of judicial integrity, fairness, and impartiality, the General Assembly should develop a selection process that ensures the highest caliber of judges and justices and minimizes the potential impact of campaigning and fundraising on judicial independence and public accountability.

GUIDING PRINCIPLE — Accountability

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

Qualifications and Experience

- The General Assembly should establish minimum levels of qualifications and experience to qualify for service as a district court judge, superior court judge, court of appeals judge, or supreme court justice.
- The Judicial Branch should establish minimum levels of qualifications and experience for candidates appointed to fill judicial vacancies.

• CONDUCTING A RECURRING PUBLIC OPINION SURVEY

GUIDING PRINCIPLES — Accountability, Self-Evaluation

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

- The Judicial Branch should work with the National Center for State Courts to establish a set of survey questions aimed at gaining an understanding of how people view North Carolina courts and judges.

- The Judicial Branch should conduct a statewide, statistically valid survey every other year.
- The Judicial Branch should compare survey results to results from prior surveys and issue a report assessing the results, areas needed for improvement, possible causes of certain trends, and other relevant factors identified by the survey results.
- The Judicial Branch should conduct participant surveys, including surveys of jurors, at county courthouses to determine participants' satisfaction with the courts.
- The Judicial Branch should adopt survey methodologies that ensure the integrity of the data collected and provide the opportunity for meaningful analysis.
- The Judicial Branch should ensure that information related to the physical addresses and locations of courthouses are easy to find and should provide directions to the courthouses and available parking areas.
- The Judicial Branch should work with county officials to ensure that each courthouse posts appropriate signage to help citizens navigate easily throughout the courthouse.
- The Judicial Branch should work with county officials and local law enforcement to ensure the safety of all employees and citizens who enter the courthouse.
- The Judicial Branch should maximize efforts to create online service options that do not require a trip to the courthouse, such as electronic filing, online payment, and disposition of compliance offenses.

- FAIR AND EQUAL ACCESS TO THE COURTS

GUIDING PRINCIPLE — Access

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

Physical Access

- The Judicial Branch should work with county officials to eliminate physical impediments that hinder access to the courts and should take appropriate steps to accommodate persons with disabilities.

Enhanced Convenience

- The Judicial Branch should work with local judicial officials and county officials in each county to evaluate whether the public might be better served by providing court services outside of normal business hours, and, if warranted, should work with county government officials to establish regular hours outside of normal business hours in order to better serve the public.
- The Judicial Branch should work with local judicial officials and county officials in each county to evaluate whether it is feasible to offer childcare services at the courthouse in order to enhance the public’s ability to participate in the judicial process.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES — Access, Fairness

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

Cultural Barriers

- The Judicial Branch should continue to work to eliminate language barriers that hinder equal access to justice by individuals with limited English proficiency and should improve efficiencies in the provision of interpreting services.
- The Judicial Branch should educate employees on cultural competence and develop initiatives to improve cultural competence in the judicial system.
- The Judicial Branch should promote a diverse workforce that reflects the diversity of those who interact with the judicial system.
- Before requiring participation in a court-ordered program, treatment, or service offered outside the judicial process, the judicial official should make sure that the program, treatment, or service provider provides appropriate language access services to ensure meaningful participation by the party.

Evaluating the Costs of Justice

- The Judicial Branch should evaluate costs and fees to determine whether those costs and fees preclude meaningful access to the courts or prohibit citizens from participating in the judicial process. If warranted, the Judicial Branch should seek legislative changes to modify current costs and fees.

- The Judicial Branch should evaluate the collateral consequences of costs, fines, and fees on offenders who lack the ability to pay and develop policies to minimize negative consequences based solely on inability to pay.

• ELIMINATING ACTUAL AND PERCEIVED BIAS IN THE COURTS

GUIDING PRINCIPLE — Fairness

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

- The Judicial Branch should develop consistent processes and procedures that strengthen adherence to the four principles of procedural fairness — voice, neutrality, respect, and trust.

- The Judicial Branch should ensure that public surveys include questions aimed at measuring how well individual judicial officials and court employees, and the Judicial Branch as a whole, are adhering to the principles of procedural fairness.
- The Judicial Branch should develop a pledge of fairness that should be prominently displayed as a manifestation of its commitment to the principles of procedural fairness.
- The Judicial Branch should establish an ongoing peer review process that provides judicial officials and court employees with continuing feedback about adherence to the principles of procedural fairness and recommendations for improvement.

- The Judicial Branch should develop processes and procedures that minimize the effects of implicit bias in each case.

Institutionalizing a Bias-Free Environment

- The Judicial Branch should collect and analyze data to identify areas in which there is a disparate impact in outcomes based on identifiable demographics, evaluate the causes of such disparate impact, and identify strategies to combat it.
- The Judicial Branch should provide judicial officials, court personnel, volunteers, and other judicial stakeholders with training and education focused on ensuring cultural awareness and sensitivity in the judicial process in order to create an atmosphere in which every person who participates in the judicial process understands the importance of cultural competence and bias-free behavior in the courts.
- The Judicial Branch should develop an evaluation process that allows peer groups to observe court proceedings and interactions, and should provide feedback about adherence to the principles of procedural fairness.
- The Judicial Branch should work with stakeholder organizations to create training opportunities for court personnel to increase cultural awareness and attain a better understanding of diversity issues.
- The Judicial Branch should enhance efforts to make members of the public aware of complaint procedures against judicial officers and court personnel, and should make sure that investigations are transparent and fair.

- PROVIDING FOR THE JUST, TIMELY, AND ECONOMICAL SCHEDULING AND DISPOSITION OF CASES

GUIDING PRINCIPLE — Efficiency

RECOMMENDED ACTION STEPS

Case Management

- The Judicial Branch should continue to evaluate circumstances under which mandatory early mediation or other Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) processes may resolve disputes before significant litigation is in process.
- The Judicial Branch should evaluate technology and / or policies that would permit resolution of certain motions without hearings.
- The Judicial Branch should continue to evaluate the efficacy of specialty courts where appropriate.
- The Judicial Branch should evaluate the use of realistic, firm scheduling deadlines for both criminal and civil cases at the outset of the case, which may be extended only for good cause.
- The Judicial Branch should evaluate whether procedures can be put in place to allow certain civil and / or criminal cases to proceed on a “fast-track” basis.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES —

Accountability, Self-Evaluation

- The Judicial Branch should explore the development of document assembly programs that provide capability for electronic completion and filing of forms in case types with a high volume of self-represented litigants.

“ADVANCES IN TECHNOLOGY ... GIVE US THE CHANCE TO REIMAGINE HOW COURTS AND CITIZENS INTERACT WITH EACH OTHER.”

Chief Justice Mark Martin

INTRODUCTION

Innovative use of technology can revolutionize the way that organizations and people conduct business and live their lives. Recent examples of the technology revolution include Amazon’s transformation of retail shopping as well as the development of smartphones and mobile apps that support banking and payment transactions.

Similarly, innovative technology has been utilized both in state and federal courts to dramatically improve the administration of justice. It is critical for North Carolina’s Judicial Branch to employ additional technology to achieve its constitutionally mandated mission.

The implementation of technological change brings with it the promise of a truly uniform statewide court system as first envisioned by the Bell Commission almost sixty years ago. That uniformity will empower local and statewide judicial officials to better manage court performance through improved data-driven decision-making, thus promoting greater stewardship of judicial resources. It will also remove many of the local barriers to court access for self-represented litigants and will increase the service capacity of low-income legal service providers. Additionally, through a uniform Judicial Branch online presence, the courts can meet and exceed expectations for public access to courts.

People once interacted with court officials at courthouses, face-to-face, with documents printed on paper and no ability to make instantaneous or remote contact. Due to its age, our current technology reflects these traditional practices. The preference for quick and comprehensive online access has emerged relatively recently, but there is no doubt that it is here to stay. As a recent study shows, about 76% of Americans are willing to do some court business online. That number jumps to 86% for those under 40 years old.¹

This new preference for immediate access presents us with an opportunity. Advances in technology, together with the desire to reduce costs and improve the public's access to court services, give us the chance to reimagine how courts and citizens interact with each other. For instance, we can aim to drastically reduce manual processes and reliance on paper documents. Many state court systems have successfully transformed themselves in a similar way, leading to both increased efficiency and collaboration among court officials and the legal profession.

THE TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE AND ITS WORK

The North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ) is an independent, multidisciplinary advisory body convened by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina to recommend improvements to the judicial system. The Technology Committee is one of five Committees of this Commission. As the Commission's convener, Chief Justice Mark Martin, recently noted, "We need to make these changes because courts are essential — as essential as grocery stores or the Internet. Let's never forget the role that judicial expertise and judicial independence play in safeguarding the rule of law — a role that no one else can do better, or even equally well. If we lose business to other methods of dispute resolution, society at large will suffer. Courts are too indispensable to yield in the face of better technology, so we have to stay technologically up-to-date." The Technology Committee has focused on identifying significant ways that technology can support the Judicial Branch's mission of providing a fair, independent, and accessible forum for the just, timely, and economical resolution of the legal affairs of the public.

The Judicial Branch's 6,000 employees work hard each day to carry out the Branch's mission. The Technology Committee's goal is to recommend ways that technology can enhance our court officials' and staffs' efficiency and effectiveness, and the timeliness of court processes, while at the same time meeting the public's expectations for accessibility and transparency. The Committee's challenge is to reimagine the courthouse and to produce a strategic plan to deliver on that vision.

The Committee held nine public meetings and heard presentations from states that are already using innovative technology to address the needs of their citizens, from national court technology experts, and from current North Carolina judicial officials, as well as from other members of the public. In early 2016, the consulting group BerryDunn was retained to assist the Committee with the legislatively mandated need to create a strategic plan for eCourts.² The goal of an eCourts system is to increase both the efficiency and effectiveness of court processes by converting the courts' current paper-driven workflow to an electronic one, including processes such as filing and payment that have public interfaces. An eCourts system will provide the foundation for further innovation throughout the court system.

To understand the current state of the Judicial Branch's technology, BerryDunn conducted an online survey of court employees and members of the public, collecting responses from over 1,000 individuals. In addition, BerryDunn organized in-person interviews with more than 200 Judicial Branch employees and members of the bar from across the state.

Having heard from these end users, BerryDunn then reviewed the Judicial Branch's infrastructure and capabilities, and fielded reports from the other Committees of the Commission about the role that technology should play in their areas of reform.

ISSUES IMPACTING TECHNOLOGY

The Technology Services Division (TSD) of the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts is primarily responsible for the Judicial Branch's technology needs. TSD provides network infrastructure, hardware, software applications, technical support, and services to more than 500 courtrooms and offices spread throughout all 100 North Carolina counties. Included in the Judicial Branch are nearly 550 independently elected judges, district attorneys, and clerks of court. With the ninth largest population in the United States, the courts of our state handle roughly 2.7 million cases each year.

The approximately 200 permanent employees of TSD support more than 200 Judicial Branch software applications. They also provide ancillary services to two dozen government agencies, vendors, and private entities that interface with the court system's technology and data. The result is an extensive, statewide, inter-agency technology operation.

Within this context, the Committee and BerryDunn preliminarily identified four overarching elements that are relevant when considering the transition to greater technological functionality in North Carolina's court system:

- Technology management and governance;
- The business environment: inconsistent and paper-based;
- Technology development: software applications; and
- Anytime, anywhere access to services.

TECHNOLOGY MANAGEMENT AND GOVERNANCE

Technology management and governance address how core technology initiatives are identified, analyzed, prioritized, and budgeted within the Judicial Branch. Without a governance process in place, important technology needs may be overlooked, less important technology projects may be prioritized, limited technology resources may be diluted or misdirected, and project completions may be delayed because of short-term changes in technology priorities. It is equally important that a governance system considers user input when developing software applications. Incorporating user input will foster effective implementation and inspire confidence in the integrity of the progress. The Committee concluded that best practices within the technology industry include a governance process that involves users and fact-based decision-making, maintains the installed technology base, and increases simplicity.

The Judicial Branch's technology governance process has historically been unstructured, irregular, and lacking external transparency. Initiatives originate haphazardly from a combination of internal ideas, field demands, executive branch or local government requests, and legislative mandates. A lack of formal technology governance has hindered the effectiveness of technology innovation and execution by being vulnerable to repeated course changes, thus making accurate and consistent budgeting and time management of technology projects difficult, if not impossible. A plan for structured governance was developed by court stakeholders in 2014 and reported to the Committee at an early meeting in 2015. The Committee has recommended that such a governance process be formalized to ensure a smooth transition through the eCourts process.

THE BUSINESS ENVIRONMENT: INCONSISTENT AND PAPER-BASED

Because the purpose of technology is to solve business problems and improve business processes, any use of technology must be considered within the context of the state courts' business environment. North Carolina's court system is unified, but there remains a clear lack of uniformity with respect to the business processes that individual courts and courthouses use. Courts are managed based on local jurisdictional needs, and with 100 counties and more than 500 independently elected officials, the result is that business processes vary dramatically from courthouse to courthouse, placing an unnecessary barrier to transparent use of court services. Implementing technology improvements that accommodate a multitude of variations in local business processes would be too costly, with respect to both time and financial resources. For technology initiatives to be effective and transparent, they must be accompanied by increased business process uniformity. Systems must be designed to provide a comprehensive, vigorous, and consistent set of technology initiatives, with local variation discouraged and not centrally supported.

Another barrier to efficiency in the current North Carolina court business environment is that current processes are primarily paper driven. Over 30 million individual pages of paper are added to state court case files each year. Official legal records are almost entirely in paper form. System actors describe challenges resulting from an essentially paper-based case filing system. Those challenges include the fact that official decisions and notes are recorded on paper files during court and later transposed into one of the many supported software applications to create an electronic index of the same actions, leading to constant duplication of effort.

Maintaining organization of and ongoing access to court files is labor intensive because of the constraints of the paper environment.

Additionally, individuals report instances in which the only record of a case disposition is recorded on the outside of the court file before filing it in a box or filing cabinet, never to be entered into an electronic system for easy future reference. Continued reliance on a paper-based system creates data entry redundancies and limits payment processes related to cases. Simultaneous access to case files by multiple parties (e.g., judges and clerks) as well as access across county or jurisdictional lines is difficult, if not impossible.

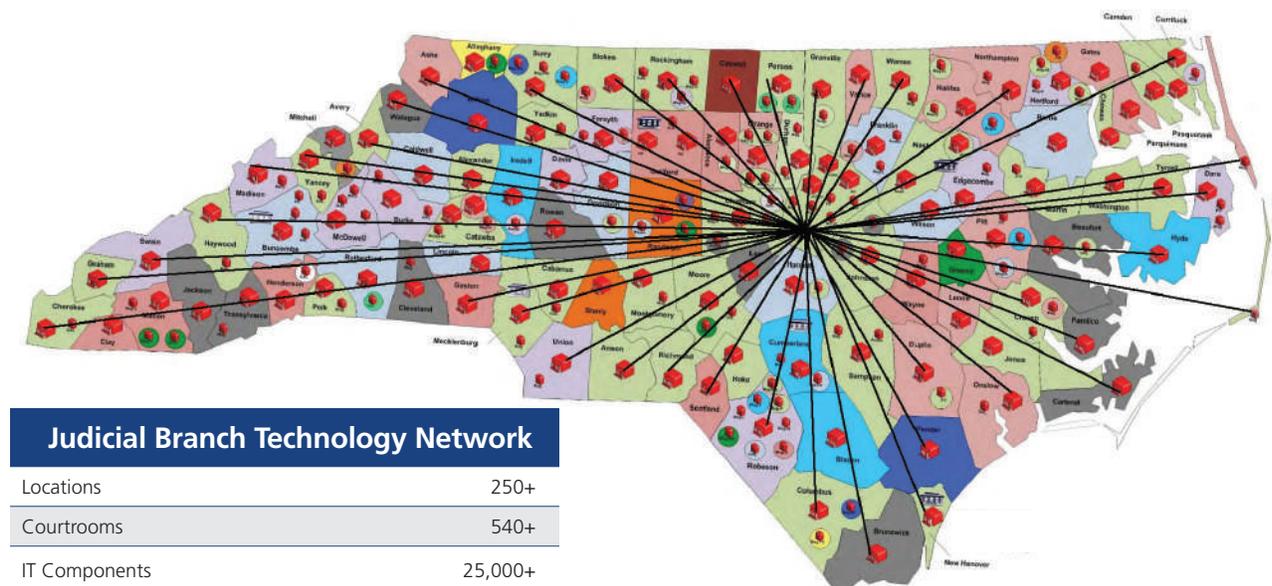

The physical impact of maintaining a paper-based system also merits scrutiny. Each year, more than four miles of shelving is needed to maintain the new case files generated during that year. Counties use attics, basements, and off-site arrangements for storage.³ Either old files must be promptly archived into microfilm or digital formats to create shelf space, or new space must be obtained. While the staffs of clerks' offices have electronic indexing systems for some case information and management tasks, paper files still serve as the primary tool for court personnel to manage cases. Case files must be physically transported throughout courthouses, no matter what the size.

This highly paper-driven business environment is rife with opportunity for technological innovation, but the lack of uniformity across local business processes is an obstacle that needs to be thoughtfully addressed.

TECHNOLOGY DEVELOPMENT: SOFTWARE APPLICATIONS

Software applications will require an initial infusion of resources for development and implementation in addition to continuous ongoing maintenance. Software applications can be: (1) developed in house by TSD staff and contractors, (2) purchased off the shelf from third-party vendors, or (3) a combination that heavily customizes a commercial application. For example, the state's workhorse Criminal Case Information System (CCIS) was developed in house and is tied closely to North Carolina law and procedure. Microsoft Office products like Word, Excel, and Outlook are off-the-shelf. And the clerks’ Financial Management System (FMS) is a heavily customized vendor general ledger accounting product.

The vast majority of the Judicial Branch’s 200 applications have been developed in house because they filled niche needs. This approach has provided for a greater level of technology customization interfacing with external government agencies and their various technology platforms and has allowed projects to be slowed or accelerated as agendas and funding changed. The in house approach, however, has also resulted in a proliferation of aging applications that are increasingly difficult to maintain as underlying technologies become obsolete, that require maintenance by developers who are aging out of the workforce, and that do not necessarily interface well with each other or provide the transparency that stakeholders expect and deserve.

ANYTIME, ANYWHERE ACCESS TO SERVICES

The 21st century public expects to manage their lives, their finances, their health, and a host of other things remotely from their smartphones and other electronic devices. When considering the business environment as it relates to public use of technology, the predominance of the need for online information and supporting mobile technology cannot be overstated. Calendars, maps, and instructions for parties, witnesses, and jurors must be easy to access. Software applications must facilitate communications with key offices, electronic payment options, and e-filing of documents. Software applications with a public-interfacing component must be accessible across multiple types of devices, including desktops, tablets, and phones. Compatibility with smartphones is particularly important because their widespread use throughout populations of varying income levels will help reduce barriers to court access. The importance of equal access to justice has been a focal point in the Technology Committee as well as in each of the NCCALJ’s four other Committees.

STRATEGIC PLAN PRIORITIES

BerryDunn’s field work and subsequent analysis showed nearly universal Judicial Branch employee and outside user support for innovative technological improvements to increase the effectiveness, efficiency, and timeliness of court processes. The Committee, in consultation with BerryDunn, identified the following initiatives that should be addressed in order for North Carolina’s Judicial Branch to meet the technology needs of its stakeholders. These initiatives are not ranked because a number of them are interdependent and may need to be developed in conjunction with one another. The initiatives are:

- Governance;
- Metrics;
- Reporting and analytics;
- Enterprise Information Management System (EIMS);
- Integrated Case Management System (ICMS);
- e-Filing;
- Financial Management System (FMS);
- Electronic public access; and
- Judicial workbench.

A more extensive, technical, and detailed analysis of each of these initiatives has been provided by BerryDunn and can be found in the strategic plan attached in Appendix E. Below is an overview and summary of each of the initiatives.

• GOVERNANCE

As stated earlier, the Committee recognized at the beginning of the process the need for a principled governance model to implement the sweeping technology changes on the horizon. The strategic plan specifically recommends that the Judicial Branch operationalize the IT Governance Charter referenced above and implement a best-practice portfolio management framework to include all NCAOC technology initiatives in the eCourts project. It is imperative that governance principles be established at the earliest opportunity in order to facilitate a smooth transition throughout the rest of the technology acquisition and deployment process.

• METRICS, REPORTING, AND ANALYTICS

The Judicial Branch's data system initially was developed to collect and compile statistics about the number of cases in the system. A master index of criminal convictions was later added. Systems were not conceived with the objective of supporting the daily management of high volume workflows. For local officials and Judicial Branch leadership to measure court performance effectively, replicate successes, and identify weaknesses, the court system must be able to collect, manage, and provide data in a useful format. That ability does not currently exist. In addition, policymakers and the public will benefit from more insight into what the aggregate data can show about the evolution of the court system through a variety of different metrics, such as changes to statutes, changes in case filing patterns, and how long it takes to resolve a particular type of case.

Initially, the strategic plan states that the Judicial Branch must identify the metrics by which to measure and run the baseline analysis — by internally determining metrics, perhaps using elements of the National Center for State Court's CourTools, defining data elements, and ensuring standardization across the state. Only after establishing baseline metrics will meaningful reporting and analytics be widely available for internal and external judicial system stakeholders.

Case counting remains the underlying purpose for many of the Judicial Branch’s case tracking systems, and, although it provides valuable information about the status of a case, it affords little information about the case’s progression through the system. This hampers effective data-informed management decisions because system actors are unable to determine points in the case management process that require improvement. In addition, many data fields in the current case tracking systems lack standard written definitions, and this lack of uniformity in data entry creates barriers to meaningful analysis of the data that has been collected. Finally, as previously noted, much of the information pertaining to a case that would be valuable for the purpose of analysis is maintained only on paper. As a result, it is difficult, if not impossible as a practical matter, to access simple data.

These burdens on data availability prevent effective management of both the overall court system and the local needs of judicial system stakeholders across the state. Ineffective management can result in delays, inconsistent outcomes for parties, and legislative concern regarding stewardship of resources. Several of the NCCALJ’s companion Committees have stressed the importance of improving the timeliness and efficiencies of our courts. Public polling data from the Public Trust and Confidence Committee shows that the public is deeply concerned about delays in the administration of justice. Good stewardship of the courts supported by good data will positively affect every aspect of the Judicial Branch.

Significantly, Judicial Branch employees note that when data is in a format that allows for reporting, the reports provided are both useful and informative. However, they also observe that current reporting must be accomplished by requesting new reports to be developed by TSD and the Research and Planning Division, which gets back to the issue of governance. Access to self-service information is limited in the courts, requiring days of staff time to produce and execute a report. Innovative technology solutions should offer real-time performance dashboards, providing both baseline data measurements and additional analytical modification for use by local officials and the public alike. The NCCALJ’s Public Trust and Confidence Committee has also emphasized greater access to information, because the court system’s inability to respond to its perceived shortcomings negatively affects public trust.

The demand for data in a usable format will only continue to grow. It is important for data to be available, complete, accurate, timely, and consistent throughout the court system. Similarly, use of standardized definitions is essential as the Judicial Branch implements court performance measures, such as CourTools. As the emphasis on data shifts to predictive analytics, such as assessing at case initiation whether a civil case will be simple, general, or complex in order to determine likely resourcing needs, the integrity of the data and the use of standardized definitions become increasingly important.

- ENTERPRISE
INFORMATION
SYSTEM (EIMS)

TSD has procured a document management system or EIMS — a secure electronic repository, which will be integrated with other eCourts elements, used to store, retrieve, archive, and associate a variety of documents with cases. The current process of relying upon physical access to court documents must give way to digital access in order for the system to progress.

Electronic document management provides a critical foundation for the remainder of the system and should support the transition from paper-based to digital files over time, while increasing electronic access to those files from anywhere at any time by both court employees and the public.

- INTEGRATED CASE MANAGEMENT SYSTEM (ICMS)

More than one million criminal and non-criminal citations — primarily traffic-related — enter the courthouse electronically each year.⁴ In most instances, however, this information is then printed out and a physical file is created. This manual process contributes significantly to the estimated 30 million pieces of paper that are added to state court case files annually.

In addition, selected data from paper files is manually keyed by authorized personnel into one or more of the Judicial Branch databases, to be accessed by various software applications. Lack of a single repository for case data significantly decreases efficiency, requires redundant data entry, and requires users to log into multiple systems, often toggling between them, to complete a business process. A single, integrated case management system would save valuable employee hours as well as reduce data entry errors.

An Integrated Case Management System (ICMS) will allow electronic processing functionality for all case types to record, track, and manage events from case initiation through case disposition, using thorough, flexible workflows that generate automated reminders and electronic notifications. The process of calendaring cases could benefit greatly from this system. To create, update, and distribute calendar information is time consuming, often requiring redundant data entry, and resulting in some courts creating their own “workarounds” (e.g., Google calendars). An electronic calendaring system that is automatically populated through a case management system would be easily accessible by both court employees and the public.

- CENTRALIZED ELECTRONIC FILING

Electronic filing is a means to submit documents and / or information into the EIMS and ICMS. This may occur through fillable forms or scanned documents. The e-filing system could evaluate and respond to events or initiate tasks in the ICMS. Electronic filing without robust EIMS and ICMS is of little value to the court system. Today, electronic filing is nominally an option with North Carolina’s appellate courts, the business courts, and four pilot sites for civil cases.⁵

North Carolina’s unified court system will be strengthened by the implementation of mandatory statewide electronic filing. In the near term, high-volume and forms-driven case types may present the greatest opportunity for significant and immediate savings and convenience. While some filings may still require paper to be converted to an electronic format for storage at a later date, the document should be retrievable through an integrated case management system. A case should be maintained by an electronic workflow that allows varied dashboard views for court officials and parties, depending upon their role within the court system. Functionality should give individuals the ability to manipulate documents and information at the case level. The Civil Justice Committee has observed that uniform, technology-enhanced filing has the potential to make representation of indigent clients less burdensome for both the lawyers and the litigants themselves.

The use of electronic filing and electronic information management systems will require a thorough review and revision of filing and recordkeeping rules prior to implementation. This will ensure that all parties — including self-represented litigants — have equal access and understanding. It will also ensure that the rules address changes necessitated by electronic filing. Training both internal and external Judicial Branch stakeholders will be essential and may be accomplished by a combination of in-person training and the creation of web-based instructional videos. Developing integrated e-filing, EIMS, and ICMS is critical in order to achieve the successful modernization of the court system.

- FINANCIAL
SYSTEM (FMS)

The Judicial Branch should determine the requirements for a financial management system, which will integrate with ICMS, make real-time adjustments at the clerk’s office cashier’s window, support multiple charge codes, accept payment through multiple means, generate a statement, produce management reports, export and transmit transaction activity, and provide the ability to maintain case-related transaction activity. Staff using the current Financial Management System (FMS) report significant redundancies and inefficiencies with the system. Specifically, the system does not integrate well with the case management systems, requiring paper printouts of financial obligations and access to multiple systems (FMS and a case management system) to cross-reference the obligations. The Committee sees substantial benefits from rolling the financial management system into a single integrated case management system, and the recommendations from the strategic plan have the opportunity to yield significant benefits for clerks and their staffs, as well as for the public.

- ELECTRONIC PUBLIC ACCESS

Electronic public access will provide the public with access to available Judicial Branch information (including information from ICMS) through self-service kiosks and personal devices; web-based capabilities will provide the ability to conduct online searches of publicly available court records and documents, submit online payments, complete online forms, etc.

Many clerks interviewed during BerryDunn’s focus groups reported that a majority of their time is spent servicing public requests for information — information that is a public record but is not readily available to the public without calling or visiting a clerk’s office. This service is important but is also interruption-driven, causing clerks to spend time “reorienting” themselves to the task that they were working on before the inquiry. A statewide effort to make basic, relevant courthouse information available online will improve clerk’s office productivity, customer service, and transparency. In addition to making information available online, the clerk’s office should be able to provide the public with the option to conduct many other routine transactions online.

From a customer service standpoint, maintaining information available online saves individuals from having to take time off of work to drive to the courthouse. Making forms available online, creating portals for the submission of documents to the courthouse electronically, and providing for online payment of court costs and fees are just three examples of the level of online access the 21st century public has come to expect from its institutions. As the NCCALJ’s Public Trust and Confidence Committee notes, increased access to the courts and to information about the courts has the potential to foster greater confidence in our courts.

The Judicial Branch is currently involved in a complete overhaul of its website. In the near future, public access to basic information such as forms, directories, calendars, etc. should be more easily available. Availability across platforms focusing on mobile devices is being prioritized.

• JUDICIAL WORKBENCH

Judicial Workbench, or a workbench for any courthouse actor, will serve as a dashboard / portal application that provides the electronic tools to meet the specific case processing, judicial decision-making, and management needs of trial court judges on the bench and in chambers. Dashboards should enable staff to interact digitally regarding all types of matters handled within the courthouse.

CONCLUSION

The Technology Committee has gathered a tremendous amount of information during the last fifteen months. The Committee envisions a court system that will fulfill the vision of a 21st century courthouse — where technology is used to enhance efficiency, effectiveness, and timeliness of process, leading to greater public access to and increased confidence in the courts.

As we look to that future, let us continue to bear in mind three principles to guide us in the tasks ahead. First, we must continue to be responsible stewards of the resources that we have been given, and that we will eventually pass on to the next generation. Second, we must work to restore public trust and confidence in the judicial process and in our courts. Finally, it is of vital importance that we always look to improve access to justice for all citizens.

We live in a time of great transition in our society, and our courts play an important role in this changing environment. The digital age has brought new ways to connect to each other and to the world around us. But it also has led to new dispute resolution options for the people that we serve. Our goal should be to modernize our courts to keep up with the digital revolution, and to make it as easy as possible for our stakeholders to interact with the court system and conduct business with our courts. If we intend to keep pace with the competition, we need to view litigants the way that we would view customers in a marketplace — not in a way that shortchanges justice, but in a way that recognizes that people have choices. And if our courts are too costly, too complicated, or too slow, the citizens that we serve will try to address their legal needs outside of the court system, often to their own detriment.

By modernizing the resources that we have, we can continue to be responsible stewards of those resources. By working toward greater access to justice for all, we can all do our part to secure equal justice under law. And not incidentally, we can increase public trust and confidence in our courts through these efforts. As our courts do justice in every case — as they treat every citizen and every party with fairness and respect — prospective litigants will entrust more of their disputes to us, further promoting justice and fairness.

As Chief Justice Mark Martin recently remarked, “Advances in technology, together with the desire to reduce costs and improve the public’s access to court services, give us the chance to reimagine how courts and citizens interact with each other.” With the adoption of this technology plan, North Carolina will join the ranks of those other states on the vanguard of technology. North Carolina’s citizens should expect no less.

Executive Summary

North Carolina stands alone in its treatment of 16- and 17-year-olds (“youthful offenders”) like adults for purposes of the criminal justice system. In 1919, North Carolina determined that juvenile court jurisdiction would extend only to those under 16 years old.¹ A substantial body of evidence suggests that both youthful offenders and society benefit when persons under 18 years old are treated in the juvenile justice system rather than the criminal justice system. In response to this evidence, other states have raised the juvenile age. Notwithstanding recommendations from two legislatively-mandated studies of the issue, positive experiences in other states that have raised the age, and two cost-benefit studies showing that raising the age would benefit the state economically, North Carolina has yet to take action on this issue.

After careful review, the Committee² recommends that North Carolina raise the age of juvenile court jurisdiction to include youthful offenders aged 16 and 17 years old for all crimes except Class A through E felonies and traffic offenses.³ This recommendation is contingent on:

- (1) Maintaining the existing procedure in G.S. 7B-2200 to transfer juveniles to adult criminal court,⁴ except that Class A through E felony charges against 16- and 17-year olds will be automatically transferred to superior court after a finding of probable cause or by indictment.⁵
- (2) Amending G.S. 7B-3000(b) to provide that the juvenile court counselor must, upon request, disclose to a sworn North Carolina law enforcement officer information about a juvenile's record and prior law enforcement consultations with a juvenile court counselor about the juvenile, for the limited purpose of assisting the officer in ² See infra pp. 24-25 for a list of Committee members and other participants.

³ Traffic offenses are excluded because of the resources involved with transferring the large volume of such crimes to juvenile court. This recommendation parallels those made by others who have examined the issue. See NORTH CAROLINA SENTENCING AND POLICY ADVISORY COMMISSION, REPORT ON STUDY OF YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS PURSUANT TO SESSION LAW 2006-248, Sections 34.1 and 34.2 (2007) [hereinafter 2007 SENTENCING COMMISSION REPORT] (excluding traffic offenses from its recommendation to raise the age); YOUTH ACCOUNTABILITY PLANNING TASK FORCE, FINAL REPORT TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF NORTH CAROLINA (Jan., 2011) [hereinafter YOUTH ACCOUNTABILITY TASK FORCE REPORT] (same). Consistent with prior recommendations, the Committee suggests that transferring youthful offenders who commit traffic offenses be examined at a later date. See 2007 SENTENCING COMMISSION REPORT, at 8 (so suggesting).

While prior working groups have recommended staggered implementation for 16- and 17-year olds, the Committee recommends implementing the change for both ages at once.

⁴ Under the existing provision, the court may transfer jurisdiction over a juvenile who is at least 13 years of age and is alleged to have committed a felony to superior court, where the juvenile will be tried as an adult. G.S. 7B-2200. A motion to transfer may be made by the prosecutor, the juvenile's attorney, or the court. Id. If the juvenile is alleged to have committed a Class A felony at age 13 or older, jurisdiction must be transferred to superior court if probable cause is found in juvenile court. Id.

Automatic transfer to superior court means that the district court judge has no discretion to retain Class A-E felony charges against 16- and 17-year olds in juvenile court. Providing for transfer by indictment meets the prosecutors' interest in being able to avoid requiring fragile victims to testify at a probable cause hearing within days of a violent crime. The Conference of District Attorneys subsequently revised its position to make support of the proposal contingent on the district attorney being given sole discretion (without judicial review) to prosecute juveniles aged 13-17 and charged with Class A-E felonies in adult criminal court. As discussed infra at pp. 22-24, the Committee demurred on this approach.

The Committee contemplated a statutory exclusion for Class A-E felonies but adopted this approach primarily for two reasons. First, it simplifies detention decisions for law enforcement officers. Under this approach when a juvenile is arrested for any crime, there will be no uncertainty with respect to custody: custody always will be with the Division of Juvenile Justice. To help implement this change, the Division of Juvenile Justice has committed to provide transportation to all juveniles from local jails to juvenile facilities (currently law enforcement is responsible for this transportation). Second, this procedure protects juveniles who are prosecuted in adult court but are found not guilty or their charges are reduced or dismissed, perhaps because of an error in charging. See State v. Collins, __ N.C. App. __, 783 S.E.2d 9 (2016) (with respect to three charges, the juvenile improperly was charged as an adult because of a mistake with respect to his age).

- exercising his or her discretion about how to handle an incident being investigated by the officer which could result in the filing of a complaint.⁶
- (3) Requiring the Division of Juvenile Justice to (a) track all consultations with law enforcement officers about a juvenile⁷ and (b) provide more information to complainants and victims about dismissed, closed, and diverted complaints.⁸
 - (4) Amending G.S. 7B-1704 to provide that the victim has a right to seek review by the prosecutor of a juvenile court counselor's decision not to approve the filing of a petition.⁹
 - (5) Improving computer systems to give the prosecutor and the juvenile's attorney electronic access to an individual's juvenile delinquency record statewide.¹⁰
 - (6) Full funding to implement the recommended changes.¹¹

Consistent with the existing statutory provision that the prosecutor may not allow an officer to photocopy any part of the record, the Committee recommends that the counselor share this information orally only. To preserve confidentiality, if this information is included in a report or record created by the officer, such report or record must be designated and treated as confidential, in the same way that all law enforcement records pertaining to juveniles currently are so designated and treated.

⁷ This recommendation is necessary to implement recommendation (2) above.

⁸ In response to Committee discussions the Division of Juvenile Justice already has revised the Complainant/Victim Letter used for this purpose and presented the revision to the Committee for feedback.

¹⁰ G.S. 7B-3000(b) already provides that the prosecutor and the juvenile's attorney may examine the juvenile's record and obtain copies of written parts of the juvenile record without a court order. Section 12 of the Rules of Recordkeeping defines that record as the case file (the file folder containing all paper documents) and the electronic data. Currently the electronic data is maintained in the J Wise computer system, an electronic index of the juvenile record. Without access to this computer system, prosecutors encounter logistical hurdles to accessing the juvenile record to inform decisions regarding charging, plea negotiations, etc. Allowing prosecutors access to the relevant computer system removes these impediments. The prosecutor's access to computer system information should be limited to juvenile delinquency information and may not include other protected information contained in that system, such as that pertaining to abuse neglect and dependency or termination of parental rights. Additionally, the J Wise system currently allows only for county-by-county searches; it does not allow for a statewide search. Given the mobility of North Carolina's citizens, there is a need for statewide searches. To allow for meaningful access to a juvenile's delinquency record, the computer system must be improved to allow for statewide searching.

To ensure parity of access, if the prosecutor is given access to the juvenile record in the relevant computer system, the same access must be given to the juvenile's attorney. As with prosecutors, G.S. 7B-3000 already allows the attorney to have access to the record without a court order; but as with the prosecutor, lack of access to the computer system makes this logistically impossible.

Existing law prohibiting photocopying any part of the juvenile record, G.S. 7B-3000(c), would be maintained and apply to computer system records.

¹¹ Two separate studies have examined the costs of raise the age legislation. See infra pp. 11-12 (discussing studies).

This last contingency bears special emphasis: The stakeholders are unanimous in the view that full funding must be provided to implement these recommendations and that an unfunded or partially unfunded mandate to raise the age will be detrimental to the court system and community safety.

To ameliorate implementation costs to the juvenile justice system associated with raise the age legislation, the Committee recommends that North Carolina expand state-wide existing programs to reduce school-based referrals to the juvenile justice system.¹²

Finally the Committee recommends requiring regular juvenile justice training for sworn law enforcement officers and forming a limited term standing committee of juvenile justice stakeholders to review implementation of these recommendations and make additional recommendations if needed.¹³

A Brief Comparison of Juvenile & Criminal Proceedings

When there is probable cause that a North Carolina youthful offender has committed a crime, that person is charged like any adult. If not released before trial, the youthful offender is detained in the local jail and at risk of being victimized by sexual violence.¹⁴ The youthful offender is tried in adult criminal court and if found guilty, is convicted of a crime. Although a minor's parent or guardian must be informed when the child is charged or taken into custody,¹⁵ the criminal case proceeds without any additional requirement of notice to the parent or parental involvement. If convicted and sentenced to prison, the youthful offender serves the sentence in an adult prison facility.¹⁶ In prison, youthful offenders are significantly more likely than other inmates to be victimized by physical violence.¹⁷ The criminal proceeding and all records, including the record of arrest and conviction, are available to the public, even if the youthful offender is found not guilty. All collateral consequences that apply to adult defendants apply to youthful offenders. These consequences

¹² See infra pp. 18-19 (discussing such programs).

¹³ The Standing Committee should include, among others: a district court judge; a superior court judge; a prosecutor who handles juvenile matters; a victims' advocate; and representatives from the law enforcement community, the Division of Juvenile Justice, and the Office of the Juvenile Defender.

¹⁴ A report for the John Locke Foundation supporting raising the juvenile age notes: "one national survey of jails found that in one year, minors were the victims of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence 21 percent of the time, even though they only made up less than one percent of jail inmates." include, among other things, ineligibility for employment, professional licensure, public education, college financial aid, and public housing.¹⁸

Fig. 1. Current age of legal jurisdiction.

By contrast, when a person under 16 years old is believed to have committed acts that would constitute a crime if committed by an adult, a complaint is filed in the juvenile justice system alleging the juvenile to be delinquent.¹⁹ A juvenile court counselor conducts a preliminary review of the complaint to determine, in part, whether it states facts that constitute a delinquent offense;²⁰ essentially this determination looks at whether the elements of a crime have been alleged. If the juvenile court has no jurisdiction over the matter or if the complaint is frivolous, the juvenile court counselor must refuse to file the complaint as a petition.²¹ Once the juvenile court counselor determines that the complaint is legally sufficient, he or she decides whether it should be filed as a petition, diverted, or resolved without further action.²² This evaluation can involve interviews with the complainant and victim and the juvenile and his or her parents.²³ “Non-divertable” offenses, however, are not subject to this inquiry; the juvenile court counselor must approve as a petition a complaint alleging a non-divertable offense once legal sufficiency is established.²⁴ Non-divertable offenses include murder, rape, sexual offense, and other serious offenses designated by the statute.²⁵ For all other offenses, the case may be diverted with the stipulation that the juvenile and his or her family comply with requirements agreed upon in a diversion plan or contract, such as participation in mediation, counseling, or teen court.²⁶ The diversion plan or contract can be in effect for up to six months, during which time the court counselor conducts periodic reviews to ensure compliance by the juvenile and the juvenile’s parent, guardian, or custodian.²⁷ If diversion is unsuccessful, the complaint may be filed as a petition.²⁸ If successful, the juvenile court counselor may close the case at an appropriate time.²⁹ The Division of Adult Correction and Juvenile Justice reports that for calendar years 2008-2011, 21% of complaints were diverted and 18% were closed at intake.³⁰ 76% of those diverted did not acquire new juvenile complaints within two years.³¹ If the counselor approves a complaint as a petition, the case is calendared for juvenile court. If the counselor declines to so approve a complaint, the complainant can request that the prosecutor review that decision.³² In certain circumstances, such as where the juvenile presents a danger to the community, a district court judge may order that the juvenile be taken into secure custody.³³

For cases that go to court, the child's parent, guardian, or custodian is made a party to the proceeding and is required to attend court hearings.³⁴ If the child is adjudicated delinquent, a dispositional hearing is held after which the judge enters a disposition that provides "appropriate consequences, treatment, training, and rehabilitation to assist the juvenile toward becoming a nonoffending, responsible, and productive member of the community."³⁵ Interventions that can be imposed on delinquent youth array on a continuum. Lower level sanctions include things like restitution, community service, and supervised day programs.³⁶ Intermediate sanctions include things like placement in a residential treatment facility and house arrest.³⁷ In certain circumstances, the judge's dispositional order may require the child to be committed into State custody, in which case the child will be held in a youth development center (YDC), housing only those adjudicated as juveniles.³⁸ Upon commitment to and placement in a YDC, the juvenile undergoes a "screening and assessment of developmental, educational, medical, neurocognitive, mental health, psychosocial and relationship strengths and needs."³⁹ This and other information is used to develop an individualized service plan "outlining commitment services, including plans for education, mental health services, medical services and treatment programming as indicated."⁴⁰ A service planning team meets at least monthly to monitor the juvenile's progress.⁴¹ In contrast to the adult prison setting and because YDCs deal exclusively with juvenile populations, all of their programming is age- and developmentally-appropriate for juveniles. Because of the focus on rehabilitation, and in contrast to a judge's authority in the criminal system, the juvenile dispositional order can require action by the child's parent, guardian, or custodian, such as attending parental responsibility classes,⁴² or participation in the child's psychological treatment.⁴³ Because the juvenile record is confidential and not part of the public record,⁴⁴ barriers to employment, education, college financial aid, and other collateral consequences associated with a criminal conviction do not attach to the same extent.

system. The most recent states to join this majority approach are Louisiana and South Carolina; both of those states raised the juvenile age to 18 in 2016.⁴⁶ Raise the age legislation received unanimous support in South Carolina’s legislature.⁴⁷ Five states set the age of criminal responsibility at age 17.⁴⁸ This leaves North Carolina and one other state—New York—as the only jurisdictions that prosecute both 16- and 17-year olds in adult criminal court.⁴⁹ New York’s procedure, however, is much more flexible than North Carolina’s in that it has a reverse waiver provision allowing a youthful offender to petition the court to be tried as a juvenile.⁵⁰ While other states have moved⁵¹—and continue to move⁵²—to increase juvenile age, North Carolina has not followed suit.

Most North Carolina Youthful Offenders Commit Misdemeanors & Non-Violent Felonies

Consistent with data from other states, stable data shows that only a small number of North Carolina’s 16- and 17-year-olds are convicted of violent felonies.⁵³ Of the 5,689 16-and 17-year olds convicted in 2014,⁵⁴ only 187—3.3% of the total—were convicted of violent felonies (Class A-E).⁵⁵ The vast majority of these youthful offenders—80.4%—were convicted of misdemeanors.⁵⁶ The remaining 16.3% were convicted of non-violent felonies.⁵⁷

The fact that such a small percentage of youthful offenders commit violent felonies caused Newt Gingrich to argue, in support of raising the age in New York, that “[i]t is commonsense to design the system around what is appropriate for the majority, while providing exceptions for the most serious cases.”⁵⁸ Likewise, a report on raising the age prepared by the John Locke Foundation notes, “[w]hile there are a small number of very serious juvenile offenders who should be tried as adults due to the nature of their crimes, in the aggregate, the limited available evidence . . . suggests that placing all 16 year-olds in the adult criminal justice system is not the most effective strategy for deterring crime or successfully rehabilitating and protecting these youngsters.”⁵⁹ Consistent with these arguments, the Committee recommends a policy that is appropriate for the majority of youthful offenders, with two safeguards for ensuring community safety with respect to the minority of youthful offenders who commit violent crimes: (1) requiring that youthful offenders charged with Class A through E felonies be tried in adult criminal court and (2) maintaining the existing procedure that allows other cases to be transferred to adult court when appropriate.⁶⁰

Raising the Age Will Make North Carolina Safer

As noted in the John Locke Foundation report supporting raising the juvenile age in North Carolina, “[r]esearch consistently shows that rehabilitation of juveniles is more effectively obtained in juvenile justice systems and juvenile facilities, as measured by recidivism rates.”⁶¹ Recidivism refers to an individual’s relapse into criminal behavior, after having experienced intervention for a previous crime,⁶² such as a conviction and prison sentence. Lower rates of recidivism means less crime and safer communities. Both North Carolina and national data suggest that prosecuting youthful offenders as adults results in higher rates of recidivism than when youthful offenders are treated in the juvenile system. Thus, raising the age is likely to result in lower recidivism, less crime, and increased safety.

North Carolina data shows a significant 7.5% decrease in recidivism when teens are adjudicated in the juvenile versus the adult system.⁶³ Experts suggest that youthful offenders have a higher recidivism rate when prosecuted in the adult criminal system because, unlike the juvenile system, the criminal system lacks the ability to implement the most targeted, juvenile-specific, effective interventions for rehabilitation within a framework of parental and community involvement to include mental health, education, and social services participation in the continuum of care.⁶⁴ North Carolina data also shows that when youthful offenders are prosecuted in the adult system, they recidivate at a rate that is 12.6% higher than the overall population.⁶⁵ Also, individuals with deeper involvement in the criminal justice system generally recidivate at higher rates than those with less involvement (for example, a sentence of probation versus one of imprisonment).⁶⁶ Contrary to the conventional rule, in North Carolina youthful offenders who receive probation recidivate at a higher rate than defendants who are released after a prison sentence.⁶⁷ These last two data points indicate that North Carolina's treatment of youthful offenders is inconsistent with reducing crime and promoting community safety. Overall, North Carolina data is consistent with data nationwide: recidivism rates are higher when juveniles are prosecuted in adult criminal court.⁶⁸

Additionally, evidence shows that youth receive more supervision in the juvenile system than the adult system. Because they typically present in the adult system with low-level offenses, charges against youthful offenders often are dismissed.⁶⁹ Even when youthful offenders are convicted, because they typically have little or no prior criminal record,⁷⁰ sentences are often light.⁷¹ As Newt Gingrich observed when supporting raise the age legislation in New York, "because most minors are charged with low-level offenses, the adult system often imposes no punishment whatsoever, teaching a dangerous lesson: You won't be held accountable for breaking the law."⁷²

Some assert that prosecuting youthful offenders in criminal court has an important deterrent effect. However, as noted in a John Locke Foundation report supporting raising the age in North Carolina, studies show that prosecuting juveniles in adult court does not in fact deter crime.⁷³ That report continues:

The studies all show that, perhaps due to minors' lack of maturity or less-than-developed frontal cortex, which controls reasoning, legislative efforts to inflict ⁶⁷ COMPARATIVE STATISTICAL PROFILE, supra note 54, at Table 9 (showing that while recidivism for overall prison releases is 48.6%, recidivism rates for youthful offenders sentenced to probation is 49.3%).

⁶⁸ As noted by Newt Gingrich when arguing in favor of raise the age legislation in New York:

Research shows that prosecuting youths as adults increases the chances that they will commit more serious crimes. A Columbia University study compared minors arrested in New Jersey (where the age of adulthood is 18) with those in New York. New York teens were more likely to be rearrested than those processed in New Jersey's juvenile court for identical crimes. For violent crimes, rearrests were 39 percent greater. Studies in other states have yielded similar results, leading experts at the Centers for Disease Control to recommend keeping kids out of adult court to combat community violence.

criminal court jurisdiction and punishments upon minors have not deterred crime. Even more than adult offenders, the very problem with juvenile offenders is that too often they do not think carefully before committing their misdeeds, and they rarely, if ever, review the statutory framework to determine the consequences.⁷⁴

Other researchers agree that adult criminal sanctions do not deter youth crime.⁷⁵

Some have suggested that raising the age will give gang members additional youth to recruit for illegal activities. However, the Division of Juvenile Justice reports that only 7-8% of all youth in the juvenile justice system are “gang involved.” This figure includes youth who are recruited by gang members to help drug or other criminal activity. While this percentage is not insignificant, it shows that only a small proportion of all juveniles who enter the system are connected with gang crimes. Also, the number of juveniles who are alleged to have committed acts that constitute a gang crime offense is very, very small; from 2009-2016, only 20 juveniles in the entire system were alleged to have perpetrated such acts.⁷⁶ Finally, there is reason to believe that youth with gang connections are likely to do better in the juvenile system than the adult system. Juveniles in the YDCs are exposed to gang awareness educational and intervention programs, as well as substance abuse programming. Youth processed in the adult system and incarcerated in adult prison have no access to that crucial programming.

It should be noted that the Committee’s recommendation has built-in protections to deal with violent juveniles: (1) requiring that youthful offenders charged with Class A through E felonies be tried in adult criminal court⁷⁷ and (2) maintaining the existing procedure that allows other cases to be transferred to adult court when appropriate.⁷⁸ Notably, North Carolina’s existing transfer provision has been used for 13, 14, and 15-year-olds for many years, with no empirical evidence suggesting that violent or gang-involved youth are falling through the cracks.⁷⁹

Finally, studies show when states have implemented raise the age legislation, public safety has improved.⁸⁰

Raising the Age Will Yield Economic Benefit to North Carolina & Its Citizens

Two separate studies authorized by the North Carolina General Assembly indicate that raising the juvenile age will produce significant economic benefits for North Carolina and its citizens:

- (1) In 2009, the Governor’s Crime Commission Juvenile Age Study submitted to the General Assembly included a cost-benefit analysis of raising the age of juvenile court jurisdiction to 18. The analysis, done by ESTIS Group, LLC, found that the age change would result in a net benefit to the state of $7.1 million.⁸¹
- (2) In 2011, the Youth Accountability Planning Task Force submitted its final report to the General Assembly. The Task Force’s report included a cost-benefit analysis, done by the Vera Institute of Justice, of prosecuting 16 and 17-year-old misdemeanants and low-level felons in juvenile court. That report estimated net benefits of $52.3 million.⁸²

Much of the estimated cost savings would result from reduced recidivism, which “eliminates future costs associated with youth ‘graduating’ to the adult criminal system, and increased lifetime earnings for youth who will not have the burden of a criminal record.”⁸³ Cost savings from reduced recidivism has been cited in the national discourse on raising the juvenile age. As noted by Newt Gingrich when arguing in favor of raise the age legislation in New York:

Recidivism is expensive. There are direct losses to victims, the public costs of law enforcement and incarceration and the lost economic contribution of someone not engaged in law-abiding work. When Connecticut raised the age for adult prosecution to 18, crime rates quickly dropped and officials were able to close an adult prison. Researchers calculated the lifetime gain of helping a youth graduate high school and avoid becoming a career criminal or drug user at $2.5 million to $3.4 million for just one person. An adult record permanently limits youth prospects; it becomes harder to gain acceptance to a good school, get a job or serve in the military. Juvenile records are sealed and provide more opportunity. It’s only fair to give a young person who has paid his debt to society a fresh start. It is in our best interest that youth go on to contribute to the economy, rather than becoming a drain through serial incarceration or dependence on public assistance.⁸⁴

And as noted in a John Locke Foundation report supporting raising the juvenile age, “North Carolina is not merely relying on the projections, but can look to the proven experience of other states.”⁸⁵ That report continues: “Some 48 other states from Massachusetts to Mississippi have successfully raised the age and implemented this policy change effectively and without significant complications. Many states, including Connecticut and Illinois, have found that the transition can be accomplished largely by reallocating funds and resources among the adult and juvenile systems.”⁸⁶

The Committee recognizes that its recommendations will require a significant outlay of taxpayer funds, with benefits achieved long-term. However, there are good reasons to believe that costs will be lower than estimated in the analyses noted above. First, the 2011 Vera Institute cost-benefit analysis estimated costs with FY 2007/08 juvenile arrest data. However, as shown in Figure 2 below, juvenile arrest rates have decreased dramatically from 2008.⁸⁷

Fig. 2. Falling arrest rates for juveniles under age 18.

Source: North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation, Crime in North Carolina – 2014, 7 (Nov. 2015).

These declining arrest numbers for all persons under 18 years old suggest that system costs may be lower than those estimated based on FY 2007/08 data.⁸⁸

Additionally, no prior cost analysis on the juvenile age issue has accounted for cost reductions associated with statewide implementation of pilot programs that reduce admissions into the juvenile system, as recommended by the Committee.⁸⁹ For these reasons North Carolina may experience actual costs that are less than those that have been predicted. This in fact would be consistent with the experiences of other states that have raised the juvenile age.⁹⁰

Finally, prior examination of fiscal impact may not have sufficiently taken into account current standards linked to the federal Prison Rape Elimination Act (PREA) that “are likely to raise costs in the adult justice system as county jails and state prisons spend more in areas such as staffing, programming, and facilities.”⁹¹ Thus, “[e]ven the apparent short-term cost advantages of the adult justice system will diminish.”⁹² With respect to staffing costs, male 16- and 17-year-old criminal defendants are housed at Foothills Correctional Center; females at North Carolina Correctional Institution for Women.⁹³ The Division of Juvenile Justice reports that Foothills currently houses 65 juveniles; the Institution for Women houses three. In order to comply with the sight and sound segregation requirements of PREA, every time juveniles are moved within those adult facilities, the facilities must be in lock down, with obvious staffing costs.

⁸⁸ A 2013 fiscal note prepared in connection with HB 725 used data from FY 2012/13. Division of Juvenile Justice Already Has Produced Cost Savings to Pay for Raise the Age

Although raising the age will yield long-term economic benefit to North Carolina and its citizens, it will require a significant outlay of taxpayer funds. In its 2011 report, the Youth Accountability Planning Task Force estimated that the annual taxpayer cost of the then-considered proposal to be $49.2 million.⁹⁴ Although there is reason to believe that actual costs may be lower than estimated in that analysis,⁹⁵ even if cost reductions are not realized, the Division of Juvenile Justice already has produced cost savings of over $44 million that can be used to pay for raise the age.

Between fiscal year 2008-2009 and fiscal year 2015-2016, the Division of Juvenile Justice's budget was reduced from $168,523,752 to $123,782,978.⁹⁶ This cost savings of $44,740,774 can be attributed to several Division changes:

- 1) Reduction in Juvenile Pretrial Detentions through the Use of a Detention Assessment Tool. The Division's implementation of a detention assessment tool has reduced the number of juveniles housed in detention, instead placing low risk juveniles in less expensive diversion programming and secure custody alternatives that assess juveniles' needs and provide targeted referrals and resources.⁹⁷ Specifically, detention center admissions fell from 6,246 in 2010 to 3,229 in 2015. By way of a benchmark, the annual cost per child for diversion programming is $857; the annual cost per child of a detention center bed is $57,593.⁹⁸
- 2) Reduction in Commitments to Youth Development Centers. As a result of the juvenile reform act and better utilization of less expensive community-based options for lower risk juveniles, the Division has significantly reduced the number of juveniles committed to youth development centers.⁹⁹ Because it costs $125,000/year to confine a juvenile in a youth development center, this reduction in commitments has yielded significant savings to the state.¹⁰⁰
- 3) Facility Closures: Due to the reduction in pretrial detentions and commitments to youth development centers noted above, the Division has been able to close a number of detention center and youth development center facilities,¹⁰¹ repurposing portions of these facilities to ⁹⁴ See YOUTH ACCOUNTABILITY TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3.

- Perquimans detention center; closed November 15, 2012; approximately $1 million savings

- Richmond detention center; closed July 1, 2013; approximately $1.5 million savings
- Samarkand youth development center; closed July 1, 2011; approximately $3.1 million savings
- Swannanoa Valley youth development center; closed March 1, 2011; approximately $4.5 million savings provide assessment services and crisis intervention. These closures reduced annual operational costs by $14.1 million.¹⁰²

- 4) Decreased Delinquency Rate. Consistent with national trends, North Carolina has experienced a reduction in its juvenile delinquency rate.¹⁰³ Specifically, the rate of delinquent complaints per 1,000 youth age 6-15 went from 27.55 in 2010 to 20.78 in 2015. This reduced delinquency rate has reduced cost to the Division.¹⁰⁴

The Committee recommends reinvesting the $44 million in cost savings already achieved by the Division of Juvenile Justice to support raise the age.

Raising the Age Has Been Successfully Implemented in Other States

Other states have enacted raise the age legislation, over vigorous objections that doing so would negatively affect public safety, create staggering caseloads and overcrowded detention facilities, and result in unmanageable fiscal costs.¹⁰⁵ As it turns out, none of the predicted negative consequences have come to pass. For example, in 2009 Illinois moved 17-year-olds charged with misdemeanors from the adult to the juvenile system.¹⁰⁶ Among other things, Illinois reported:

- The juvenile system did not “crash.”
- Public safety did not suffer.
- County juvenile detention centers and state juvenile incarceration facilities were not overrun. In fact, three facilities were closed and the state reported excess capacity statewide.¹⁰⁷

The Illinois experience was so positive that in July 2013, that state expanded its raise the age legislation to include all 17-year-olds in the juvenile justice system, including those charged with felonies.¹⁰⁸

Connecticut’s experience was similarly positive. In 2007, Connecticut enacted legislation to raise the age of juvenile jurisdiction from 16 to 18, effective 2010 for 16-year-olds and 2012 for 17-year olds.¹⁰⁹ After the change, juvenile caseloads grew at a lower-than-expected rate and the state spent nearly $12 million less than budgeted in the two years following the change.¹¹⁰ A report on Connecticut’s experience gives this bottom line for that state’s experience: “Cost savings and improved public safety.”¹¹¹ As has been noted, 48 other states have increased the juvenile age “without significant complications.”¹¹²

While raise the age efforts have proved to be successful, lower the age campaigns have proved unworkable. In 2007, Rhode Island lowered its juvenile age, pulling 17-year-olds out of the juvenile system and requiring that they be prosecuted as adults.¹¹³ Proponents asserted that the change would save the state $3.6 million because 17-year-olds would be housed in adult prisons rather than training schools. But the experiment was a failure. As it turned out, youths sentenced to adult prison had to be, for safety reasons, housed in super max custody facilities at the cost of more than $100,000 per year.¹¹⁴ Just months later Rhode Island abandoned course and rescinded the law.¹¹⁵

Raising the Age Strengthens Families

Suppose that 16-year-old high school junior Bobby is charged with assault, after a fight at school over a girl. Because North Carolina treats Bobby as an adult, his case can proceed to completion with no parental involvement or input. This led Newt Gingrich to assert, when arguing for raise the age legislation in New York:

[L]aws that undermine the family harm society. When a 16- or 17-year-old is arrested [he or she] . . . can be interviewed alone and can even agree to plea bargains without parental consent. What parent would not want the chance to intervene, to set better boundaries or simply be a parent? The current law denies them that right.¹¹⁶

While the criminal justice system cuts parents out of the process, the juvenile system requires their participation¹¹⁷ and thus serves to strengthen parents’ influence on their teens.

Raising the Age is Supported by Science

Although North Carolina treats its youthful offenders as adults, widely accepted science reveals that adolescent brains are not fully developed.¹¹⁸ Among other things, research teaches that:

- Interactions between neurobiological systems in the adolescent brain cause teens to engage in greater risk-taking behavior.¹¹⁹
- Increases in reward- and sensation-seeking behavior precede the maturation of brain systems that govern self-regulation and impulse control.¹²⁰

- Despite the fact that many adolescents may appear as intelligent as adults, their ability to regulate their behavior is more limited.¹²¹
- Teens are more responsive to peer influence than adults.¹²²
- Relative to adults, adolescents have a lesser capacity to weigh long-term consequences;¹²³ as they mature into adults, they become more future oriented, with increases in their consideration of future consequences, concern about the future, and ability to plan ahead.¹²⁴
- As compared to adults, adolescents are more sensitive to rewards, especially immediate rewards.¹²⁵
- Adolescents are less able than adults to control impulsive behaviors and choices.¹²⁶
- Adolescents are less responsive to the threat of criminal sanctions.¹²⁷

This research and related data has significant implications for justice system policy. First, it suggests that adolescents are less culpable than adults.¹²⁸ If the relative immaturity of a 16-year-old's brain prevents him from controlling his impulses, he is less culpable than an adult who possesses that capability but acts nevertheless.¹²⁹ Second, the vast majority of adolescents who commit antisocial acts desist from such activity as they mature into adulthood.¹³⁰ Rather than creating a lifetime disability for youthful offenders (e.g., public record of arrest and conviction; ineligibility for employment and college financial aid, etc.), sanctions for delinquent youth should take into account the fact that most juvenile offenders “mature out of crime,”¹³¹ growing up to be law-abiding citizens. Third, response systems that “attend to the lessons of developmental psychology” are more effective in reducing recidivism among adolescents than the punitive criminal justice model.¹³² Research shows that active interventions focused on strengthening family support systems and improving abilities in the areas of self-control, academic performance, and job skills are more effective than strictly punitive measures in reducing crime.¹³³ While these type of interventions can be and are implemented in the juvenile system, they are virtually unavailable in the adult criminal justice system. Finally, because adolescents are particularly susceptible to peer influence, outcomes are likely to be better when individuals in a formative stage of development are placed in an environment with an authoritative parent or guardian and prosocial peers rather than with adult criminals.¹³⁴ adults. First, in Roper v. Simmons,¹³⁵ the Court held that the Eighth Amendment bars imposing capital punishment on juveniles. Next, in Graham v. Florida,¹³⁶ it held that same amendment prohibits a sentence of life without the possibility of parole for juveniles who commit non-homicide offenses. Then, in Miller v. Alabama,¹³⁷ the Court held that mandatory life without parole for those under the age of 18 at the time of their crimes violates the Eighth Amendment. Citing the type of science and social science research discussed in this report,¹³⁸ the Court recognized that juvenile offenders are less culpable than adults, have a greater capacity than adults for rehabilitation, and are less responsive than adults to the threat of criminal sanctions.¹³⁹ The Court found persuasive research “showing that only a relatively small proportion of adolescents who engage in illegal activity develop entrenched patterns of problem behavior,”¹⁴⁰ stating:

[Y]outh is more than a chronological fact. It is a time of immaturity, irresponsibility, impetuosity[,] and recklessness. It is a moment and condition of life when a person may be most susceptible to influence and to psychological damage. And its signature qualities are all transient.¹⁴¹

And just this year, in Montgomery v. Louisiana,¹⁴² the Court took the extraordinary step of holding that the Miller rule applied retroactively to cases that became final before it was decided. The Montgomery Court recognized that the “vast majority of juvenile offenders” are not permanently incorrigible, and that only the “rarest” of juveniles can be so categorized.¹⁴³ The Court again noted that most juvenile crime “reflect[s] the transient immaturity of youth.”¹⁴⁴

The Court’s reasoning in these cases supports raising the age of juvenile court jurisdiction.

Raising the Age Removes a Competitive Disadvantage NC Places on its Youth

Suppose two candidates apply for a job. Both have the same credentials. Both got into fights at school when they were 16 years old, triggering involvement with the judicial system. But because one of the candidates, Sam, lives in Tennessee, his juvenile delinquency adjudication is confidential and cannot be discovered by his potential employer. The other candidate, Tom, is from North Carolina. Because of that, his interaction with the justice system resulted in a criminal conviction for affray. Tom’s entire criminal record is discovered by his potential employer. Who is more likely to get the job?

As this scenario illustrates, saddling North Carolina’s youth with arrest and conviction records puts them at a competitive disadvantage as compared to youth from other states.¹⁴⁵ Although some have suggested that expunction can be used to remove teens’ criminal records, there are significant barriers to expunction, such as legal fees. One district court judge reported to the Committee that expunctions for youthful offenders represent only a “tiny fraction” of the total convictions.¹⁴⁶ Additionally, even if expunction is available to remove the official criminal record, it does nothing to delete information about a youthful offender’s arrest or conviction as reported on the internet by news outlets, private companies, and social media.

Reducing School-Based Referrals Can Mitigate the Costs of Raising the Age

In North Carolina, school-based complaints account for almost half of the referrals to the juvenile justice system.¹⁴⁷ This phenomenon is asserted to be part of the “school to prison pipeline,” through which children are referred to the court system for classroom misbehavior that a generation ago would have been handled in the schools. Concerns have been raised nationally and in North Carolina that excessive punishment of public school students for routine misbehavior is counterproductive and out of sync with what science and social science teach about the most effective corrective action.¹⁴⁸ Some have suggested that such referrals unnecessarily burden the juvenile justice system with frivolous complaints.¹⁴⁹

Responding to these concerns, individuals and groups throughout the nation have developed models to stem the flow of school-based referrals to the court system, instead addressing school misconduct immediately and effectively when and where it happens. In 2004, Juvenile Court Judge Steven Teske of Georgia developed one such model, in which school officials, local law enforcement, and others signed on to a cooperative agreement. The agreement provides, among other things, that “misdemeanor delinquent acts,” like disrupting school and disorderly conduct do not result in the filing of a court complaint unless the student commits a third or subsequent similar offense during the school year, and the principal conducts a review of the student’s behavior plan. Youth first receive warnings and after a second offense, they are referred to mediation or school conflict training programs. Elementary students cannot be referred to law enforcement for “misdemeanor delinquent acts” at all. Teske’s program reports an 83% reduction in school referrals to the justice system.¹⁵⁰ It also reports another significant outcome: a 24% increase in graduation rates.¹⁵¹ Two other states that have adopted similar programs—commonly referred to as school-justice partnerships—have experienced similar results.¹⁵² In fact, Connecticut has enacted a state law requiring all school systems that use law enforcement officers on campus to create school-justice partnerships.¹⁵³

North Carolina already has one such program in place. Modeled on Teske’s program, Chief District Court Judge J.H. Corpening II, has implemented a school-justice partnership program in Wilmington, North Carolina. Like Teske’s program, the Wilmington program requires that official responses to school-based disciplinary issues conform to what science and social science teaches is effective for juveniles.¹⁵⁴ The program was crafted with participation from local law enforcement, prosecutors, court counselors, the chief public defender, school officials, and community members. The group developed an approach that deals with school discipline in a consistent and positive way through a graduated discipline model.¹⁵⁵ The goal is for the schools to take a greater role in addressing misbehavior when and where it happens, rather than referring minor matters to the court system, with its delayed response. Officials in North Carolina’s Juvenile Justice system view the program as a “huge step forward” with respect to reducing school-based referrals.¹⁵⁶ Because Wilmington’s program is so new, data on its effectiveness is not available. However, based on data from other jurisdictions, statewide implementation of school-justice partnerships based on the Georgia model promises to reduce referrals to the juvenile system and thus mitigate costs associated with raising the juvenile age.

North Carolina Department of Juvenile Justice Stands Ready to Implement Raise the Age Legislation

Increasing the juvenile age will increase the number of juveniles in the juvenile justice system. Notwithstanding this, the North Carolina Division of Adult Correction and Juvenile Justice supports this recommendation and stands ready to implement raise the age legislation.¹⁵⁷ Speaking to the Committee, Commissioner Guice indicated that he was very supportive of raising the age and emphasized that North Carolina already has done the studies and developed the data on the issue. Additionally, he noted that other states have led the way and their experience with raise the age legislation suggests that “there is no reason why we can’t address this in North Carolina.” In fact, he urged the Committee, not to “back away from doing what is right” on this issue.

Every North Carolina Study Has Made the Same Recommendation: Raise the Age

In recent history, the General Assembly has commissioned two studies of raise the age legislation. Both came to the same conclusion: North Carolina should join the majority of states in the nation and raise the juvenile age. First, in 2007, pursuant to legislation passed by the General Assembly, the North Carolina Sentencing and Policy Advisory Commission submitted its Report on Study of Youthful Offenders recommending, in part, that North Carolina increase the age of juvenile jurisdiction to 18.¹⁵⁸ Second, in 2011, pursuant to legislation passed by the General Assembly, the Youth Accountability Task Force submitted its final report to the General Assembly recommending, among other things, moving youthful offenders to the juvenile justice system.¹⁵⁹ Additionally, in December 2012, the Legislative Research Commission submitted its report to the 2013 General Assembly, supporting a raise the age proposal.¹⁶⁰

Law Enforcement, Business, Bi-Partisan & Public Support for Raise the Age

The Committee's proposal, as contained in this report, has received historic law enforcement support. In August 2016, the North Carolina Division of the Police Benevolent Association, the state's largest law enforcement association, issued a press release supporting the Committee's raise the age proposal.¹⁶¹ In November 2016, Sheriff Graham Atkinson, President of the North Carolina Sheriffs' Association, formally notified the Committee that the Sheriffs' Association supports the Committee's proposal. Sheriff Atkinson's letter, attached as Exhibit A, notes that the Committee's proposal is "tremendously different from previous proposals to raise the juvenile age," in part because it tackles problems in the juvenile justice system identified by sheriffs and other law enforcement professionals. Sheriff Atkinson praised the Committee for its "willingness to thoroughly research the issue, engage all interested parties in frank and open factually based discussions, genuinely receive input from the sheriffs of North Carolina and . . . address the practical real world concerns identified by the sheriffs." In December 2016, the Committee's lengthy, collaborative process yielded still further law enforcement support, with an endorsement of its proposal by the North Carolina Association of Chiefs of Police.

In fact, the Committee's proposal has received historic support from a broad range of groups, including the North Carolina Chamber Legal Institute. In a letter attached as Exhibit B giving "full support" to the Committee's proposal, the Chamber notes:

[The] evidence objectively demonstrates that dealing with young offenders through the juvenile system, as opposed to prosecuting them as adults, is associated with lower rates of recidivism. It is not difficult to foresee how this outcome would, in turn, foster reduced crime rates, improved public safety, and that it would favorably impact workforce issues with resulting tangible economic benefits for North Carolina's economy.

The Committee's proposal has received support from the John Locke Foundation¹⁶² and Conservatives for Criminal Justice Reform.¹⁶³ The Locke Foundation's statement, attached as Exhibit C, applauds the Committee's "well-researched and well-reasoned proposal for raising the age of juvenile jurisdiction in North Carolina." The Locke Foundation offers only one "minor quibble," specifically that the Committee's proposal does not go far enough; the Locke Foundation supports expansive raise the age reform that include even juveniles charged with violent felonies.

In fact, efforts to raise North Carolina's juvenile age to 18 date back at least until the 1950s. NC JUVENILE JUSTICE: A HISTORY, supra note 1, at 17-18 (in 1955, the Commission on Juvenile Courts and Correctional Institutions recommended that the age limit should be so increased); id. at 21-22 (in 1956, the preliminary report of the Governor's Youth Service Commission made the same recommendation); id. at 23-24 (a 1956 study by the National Probation and Parole Association noted "the unreasonableness of classifying a sixteen or seventeen year-old youngster as an adult in connection with offenses against society" (quotation omitted)).

Public support for raise the age in North Carolina is high. In August 2016, the Commission held public hearings to receive comments on its interim reports, including the Committee's raise the age proposal. 423 people attended those hearings, with 131 offering oral comments.¹⁶⁴ An additional 208 people submitted written comments to the Commission, as did various organizations, such as the NC Conference of Superior Court Judges and the NC Magistrates Association.¹⁶⁵ 96% of the comments submitted on this issue supported the Committee's raise the age proposal.¹⁶⁶

It is noteworthy that bills to raise the juvenile age have been introduced and supported in North Carolina by lawmakers from both sides of the aisle.¹⁶⁷ Raise the age proposals and related efforts to remove non-violent juveniles from the adult criminal justice system have enjoyed bipartisan support around the nation,¹⁶⁸ as well as support from groups such as the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC).¹⁶⁹

A Balanced, Evidence-Based Proposal

As noted in the letter from the North Carolina Sheriffs' Association supporting the Committee's proposal and attached as Exhibit A, this report includes more than a raise the age recommendation; it includes ten other provisions, most of which are designed to address important, legitimate concerns raised by law enforcement and prosecutors, such as the need to provide more information to officers about juveniles with whom they interact and ensuring that prosecutors have access to information about an individual's juvenile record.¹⁷⁰ Although other proposals have been made to raise the age in North Carolina, no other proposal has been as attentive as this one to the needs, interests, and concerns of those who have historically opposed this reform.¹⁷¹

¹⁷¹ Committee membership included the Past President of the North Carolina Sheriffs' Association, the President of the N.C. Police Benevolent Association and the then-President of the N.C. Conference of District Attorneys. See infra pp. 24-25. Another elected District Attorney served on the Subcommittee on Juvenile Age and the Executive Vice President & General Counsel of the North Carolina Sheriffs' Association was actively involved in all meetings and conversations. Id. The Committee Chair, Committee Reporter, and the Deputy Commissioner of Juvenile Justice presented the Committee's proposal and received feedback on it at the Sheriffs' Association conference and numerous meetings and conversations occurred with that group's leadership. Outreach was made to the N.C. Police Chiefs' Association, whose leadership attended meetings, discussed the proposal with the Committee Chair and Reporter, heard from the Committee Reporter and

Although the Committee sought to accommodate all concerns, it declined to adopt a position raised by the Conference of District Attorneys: that the District Attorney be given sole authority to decide whether juveniles aged 13-17 and charged with Class A-E felonies would be prosecuted in adult court, without any judicial review. The original rationale for this proposal was that under current procedures, prosecutors are unable to successfully transfer juveniles charged with Class A-E felonies to adult court. Under the existing transfer provision, the district court may transfer jurisdiction over a juvenile who is at least 13 years of age and is alleged to have committed a felony to superior court.¹⁷² A motion to transfer may be made by the prosecutor, the juvenile's attorney, or the court.¹⁷³ If the juvenile is alleged to have committed a Class A felony at age 13 or older, jurisdiction must be transferred to superior court if probable cause is found in juvenile court.¹⁷⁴ The Committee's proposal recommends maintaining the existing procedure and providing that Class A-E felony charges against 16- and 17-year olds will be automatically transferred to superior court after a finding of probable cause or by indictment.¹⁷⁵ The Committee found that the evidence did not support the prosecutors' request for sole discretion to decide whether 13-17 year olds would be prosecuted in adult court. Specifically, the Division of Juvenile Justice reports that for the 12-year period from 2004-2016:

- Transfer was sought for 487 13-, 14-, and 15-year-olds charged with Class A-E felonies. Of those, 66% were transferred to adult court; 34% were retained in juvenile court. Ninety-one of the juveniles transferred were subject to mandatory transfer for Class A felonies. Removing this number from the data set reveals that 232 discretionary transfer motions were granted, a 58% prosecution success rate.
- Focusing on 14-year olds, transfer was sought for 101 juveniles charged with Class A-E felonies. Of those, 57% were transferred to adult court; 43% were retained in juvenile court. Twenty-four of the juveniles transferred were subject to mandatory transfer for Class A felonies. Removing this number from the data set reveals that 34 discretionary transfer motions were granted, a 44% prosecution success rate.
- Focusing on 15-year-olds, transfer was sought for 341 juveniles charged with Class A-E felonies. Of those, 71% were transferred to adult court; 29% were retained in juvenile court. Sixty-one of the juveniles transferred were subject to the existing mandatory transfer for Class A felonies. Removing this number from the data set reveals that 182 discretionary transfer motions were granted, a 65% prosecution success rate.

Thus, long-term statewide data does not support the suggestion that the prosecution is unable to obtain transfer of 13-, 14-, and 15-year-old juveniles charged with A-E felonies to adult court. After this data was presented, it was suggested that the problem was isolated and judge-specific. The evidence, however, does not support that suggestion. Data from the Division of Juvenile Justice's NC-JOIN database reveals that for the 12-year period from 2004-2016, five judges denied all transfers brought to them. None of those judges, however, had more than 8 juveniles presented (the number of juveniles presented to these five judges were respectively: 8; 7; 7; 6; 6). At the other end of the spectrum four judges granted all transfers brought to them for a much larger population of juveniles (the number of juveniles presented to these four judges (and transferred to adult court) were respectively: 50, 42, 29, 24). All other judges had mixed results on transfers for the 2004-2016 period. Thus, if this data is read to suggest an issue with some judges always denying transfer motions it also must be read to suggest an even more significant issue with some judges always granting them.¹⁷⁶

Deputy Commissioner at a conference, and submitted feedback to the Committee. The Committee Reporter presented the proposal to the Executive Board of the N.C. Police Benevolent Association and responded to inquiries and feedback thereafter. Finally, the Committee Reporter prepared a seven-page briefing paper for law enforcement officers addressing common issues or concerns raised about raise the age. These efforts at engagement contributed to the balanced nature of this proposal.

In formal comments to the Committee, the Conference of District Attorneys offered this explanation for its request: “District Attorneys have the most intimate knowledge of the facts of each case and working with law enforcement, are able to determine when there is significant public safety risk and when the more appropriate venue for a particular juvenile would be adult court.”¹⁷⁷ It was added that “[t]his is exemplified in the processes of at least 19 other states.”¹⁷⁸ The Committee disagrees with the first point and concludes that justice is best served when a judge—the only neutral party to the proceeding—determines, according to prescribed statutory factors, whether the protection of the public and the juvenile’s needs warrant transfer to adult court, as is done under the current juvenile code.¹⁷⁹ This determination is consistent with a policy decision that the General Assembly already has made: that public safety is best protected by vesting transfer authority with judges. In enacting the existing juvenile code, the General Assembly decided that the code should be interpreted and construed so as to implement several purposes including “protect[ing] the public.”¹⁸⁰ With this purpose in mind, the General Assembly opted to vest transfer authority with judges not prosecutors. Additionally, affording prosecutors—one side in criminal litigation—sole discretion to decide this significant procedural issue conflicts with core concepts of procedural fairness¹⁸¹ and is unwarranted in light of the evidence presented above. As to the second point raised by the District Attorneys, the National Conference of State Legislatures reports that a national trend in juvenile law includes reforms of transfer, waiver and direct file statutes, “placing decisions about rehabilitation and appropriate treatment in the hands of the juvenile court.”¹⁸²

Although the Committee was open to discuss a variety of alternative procedures that might meet the prosecutors’ concerns, such as a right to appeal a denial of a transfer request, having a superior court judge determine the transfer motion, or a reverse transfer procedure, exploration of these alternatives ceased when it became clear that further discussion would not be productive.

¹⁷⁶ The Committee’s prosecutor member also suggested that the data does not fairly represent the prosecution’s experience with transfer because some prosecutors have “given up” trying to transfer cases after experience a high failure rate. This suggestion, however, is inconsistent with the data presented above regarding prosecutor’s historical success rate on transfer motions.

RE: Juvenile Reinvestment Report – October, 2016

Dear Judge Webb,

At the early November meeting of the North Carolina Sheriffs' Association, the Association adopted a position in support of the proposal from the NCCALJ Committee on Criminal Investigation and Adjudication to raise the juvenile age in North Carolina from 16 to 18 for all crimes except Class A through E felonies and traffic offenses. The Association's support is contingent on items (1) through (6) contained in the Committee's Juvenile Reinvestment report. As noted in the Committee's report, it bears special emphasis that "full funding must be provided to implement these recommendations and that an unfunded or partially unfunded mandate to raise the age will be detrimental to the court system and community safety."

The sheriffs of North Carolina commend you as Committee Chair and the other members of your committee, and especially the members of the Juvenile Age Subcommittee, for the willingness to thoroughly research the issue, engage all interested parties in frank and open factually based discussions, genuinely receive input from the sheriffs of North Carolina and your willingness to address the practical real world concerns identified by the sheriffs.

Specific accolades are owed to William (Billy) Lassiter, Deputy Commissioner for Juvenile Justice and Jessica Smith, W. R. Kenan, Jr., Distinguished Professor, School of Government, UNC – Chapel Hill, who served as the Committee Reporter. Both of these individuals were exceptionally committed to learning about and helping to address the real world practical concerns with the current juvenile justice system and the impact on that system of raising the juvenile age.

The proposal from your Committee is tremendously different from previous proposals to raise the juvenile age. Previous legislation that has been vigorously opposed by the Association merely deleted the number 16 and replaced it with the number 18, did not have a plan for implementation, did not have adequate funding and did not include solutions to the existing problems with the juvenile justice system identified by sheriffs and other law enforcement professionals. The report of your Committee is significantly different in that it does address the current deficiencies in the juvenile justice system that have been identified by the sheriffs and other law enforcement professionals and it makes it clear that the report is contingent on "full funding to implement the recommended changes."

The North Carolina Sheriffs' Association looks forward to working with you, Chief Justice Mark Martin and others to support this legislative proposal, and the contingencies detailed in the report, during the upcoming session of the North Carolina General Assembly.

Dear Chief Justice Martin:

As you know, it is the primary mission of the North Carolina Chamber Legal Institute to examine potential solutions for improving North Carolina's business legal climate and to support those policy solutions in alignment with the overall priorities identified by the statewide business community in North Carolina Vision 2030, the North Carolina Chamber Foundation's long-term strategy for securing our state's competitive future. To that end, I am pleased to report that the Chamber Legal Institute fully supports and urges legislative action to enact the reforms recommended in "Juvenile Reinvestment," released recently by the Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee, chaired by Judge William Webb, of Your Honor's North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice.

The essential recommendation contained in this report, if acted upon by the State of North Carolina, would "raise the age of juvenile court jurisdiction to include youthful offenders aged 16 and 17." This is a worthy goal for a number of reasons which are persuasively set forth in the report. We were fully persuaded by the substantial body of factual evidence presented in your committee's report. Most importantly, this evidence objectively demonstrates that dealing with young offenders through the juvenile system, as opposed to prosecuting them as adults, is associated with lower rates of recidivism. It is not difficult to foresee how this outcome would, in turn, foster reduced crime rates, improved public safety, and that it would favorably impact workforce issues with resulting tangible economic benefits for North Carolina's economy.

The first and second of the four "Pillars of a Secure Future" outlined in North Carolina Vision 2030 emphasize respectively the need to continually strengthen our state's education and talent supply systems, and the necessity to consistently strive for the most competitive business climate possible for attracting new economic opportunities to the state. The "Juvenile Reinvestment" report provides compelling evidence that raising the age of juvenile jurisdiction in North Carolina would bolster each of these pillars, both by increasing reform opportunities for juvenile offenders and thus improving their future chances of contributing their talents to a world-class workforce, as well as through the reduced cost and administrative burdens that would result from fewer repeat offenders clogging up the criminal justice system.

As noted in the Committee's report, a broad array of national stakeholders, from legislative policy organizations like the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) to bipartisan coalitions of elected leaders, have supported similar proposals in other states. Here in North Carolina, we commend your Committee for its hard work in developing broad ranging bipartisan support from law enforcement advocacy groups including the North Carolina Division of Police Benevolent Association and the North Carolina Sheriffs' Association, the John Locke Foundation, Conservatives for Criminal Justice Reform, as well as the vast majority (96 percent) of those responding to requests for comment in public hearings held by the Committee earlier this year.

The North Carolina Chamber Legal Institute prides itself on advancing forward-thinking solutions to turn challenges into opportunities and to further secure North Carolina's economic competitiveness and business legal climate. We are pleased to give our full support to the "Juvenile Reinvestment" report and are grateful for your leadership and your Committee's hard work.

Exhibit C: Statement of Support from the John Locke Foundation

Statement Regarding the NCCALJ's "Juvenile Reinvestment" Report By Jon Guze, Director of Legal Studies, John Locke Foundation

The Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee of the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice has released a draft report entitled "Juvenile Reinvestment." By preparing and publishing this report, the Committee has taken a major step towards achieving a goal that the John Locke Foundation has advocated for many years—raising the age of juvenile jurisdiction in North Carolina.

The report begins by stating:

After careful review and with historic support of all stakeholders, the Committee recommends that North Carolina raise the age of juvenile court jurisdiction to include youthful offenders aged 16 and 17.

In support of this recommendation, the report presents a large body of factual findings. One of the most important of these findings is that recidivism rates are lower when young offenders are dealt with through the juvenile system than when they are prosecuted as adults. As the report explains, this is the primary reason why raising the age is likely to reduce crime, promote public safety, and yield substantial economic benefits.

The report states that the recommendation to raise the age is contingent on adequate funding and on a number of complimentary changes to the juvenile justice system. The Committee is certainly right to insist on adequate funding, and most of the changes to the juvenile justice system that it suggests seem eminently sensible. However, the suggestion that all 16- and 17-year olds who are charged with Class A-E felonies should automatically be transferred to adult jurisdiction may be an exception. These are serious crimes that merit severe punishment. However, precisely because of they are so serious, reducing the rate of recidivism by young offenders who commit such crimes is particularly desirable. The existing statutory provision provides for the automatic transfer of juveniles who are charged with Class A felonies while leaving the decision of whether to transfer juveniles charged with other serious crimes to the discretion of the court. Leaving this provision unchanged may be the best way to achieve an appropriate balance between the goals of providing adequate punishment, incapacitation, and deterrence on the one hand, and the goal of reducing recidivism on the other.

Given that fewer than 3% of young offenders are charged with serious felonies, the preceding discussion of how best to deal with such charges is a minor quibble with what is in every other way a remarkable achievement. By bringing all the relevant stake-holders together in support of this well-researched and well-reasoned proposal for raising the age of juvenile jurisdiction in North Carolina, the Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee has performed a valuable public service.

Dear Will:

District Attorneys across North Carolina have joined with citizens, other legal professionals and Chief Justice Mark Martin in the Commission’s comprehensive evaluation of our judicial system. As such, both Elected District Attorneys and assistant district attorneys have participated in discussions on numerous committees and subcommittees. Now at this interim juncture, the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys, consisting of the 44 Elected District Attorneys, would like to offer comment on the Commission’s work.

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION AND ADJUDICATION COMMITTEE

Juvenile Age: The Conference of District Attorneys supports the Committee’s recommendation to raise the juvenile age for 16 and 17 year olds with two priority conditions:

1. District Attorney have bind over discretion (without transfer hearings) for all juveniles 13-17 who commit A-E felonies. District Attorneys are elected by the citizens and charged with administering justice to hold the guilty accountable, protect the innocent, and ensure public safety. While juvenile courts are structured to protect the juveniles and provide opportunities for second chances and rehabilitation, they do not possess the tools to deal with the small, but violent, sector of juveniles. That is not to say that all violent juveniles should be adjudicated through adult court, but there are times when it is appropriate. District Attorneys have the most intimate knowledge of the facts of each case and working with law enforcement, are able to determine when there is significant public safety risk and when the more appropriate venue for a particular juvenile would be adult court. This is exemplified in the processes of at least 19 other states.
2. Funding is provided for processing the increased numbers of juveniles through juvenile court. Previous fiscal analyses for raising the juvenile age have only addressed the increased needs of the Division of Juvenile Justice; never the needs of the courts. This must be factored into any appropriations that are provided. Current workload formulas, which are antiquated, indicate District Attorneys are already operating at a personnel deficit of 60 assistant district attorneys, statewide. Juvenile court is much more time-consuming than adult court. This need must be met before changes to the current system are made. Raising the age will require more judges, more prosecutors and most likely more clerks to cover the additional juvenile courts required.

Only with both of these conditions met, will the District Attorneys support raising the juvenile age for 16 and 17 year olds.

Introduction

The North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (Commission) was convened by Chief Justice Mark Martin in September 2015 as an independent, multidisciplinary commission that is undertaking a comprehensive evaluation of the North Carolina judicial system and will be making recommendations for strengthening the courts.

Chief Justice Martin intends for the Commission's work to provide a basis for discussion with the General Assembly to help ensure North Carolina's Judicial Branch meets the needs of its citizens and their expectations for a modern court system. The Commission will finalize its findings and recommendations in a series of reports that will be presented to the Chief Justice and made available to the public in early 2017.

The Commission includes a number of committees. This report is made to the Committee on Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee. The Committee identified Criminal Case Management and a number of other issues for further exploration.

The mission of the North Carolina Judicial Branch is:

To protect and preserve the rights and liberties of all the people, as guaranteed by the Constitutions and laws of the United States and North Carolina, by providing a fair, independent, and accessible forum for the just, timely, and economical resolution of their legal affairs.¹

The Superior and District Court divisions are the trial court divisions that hold trials to determine the facts of cases. The Superior Court division houses the Superior Court, which is the court with general trial jurisdiction. Generally, the Superior Court hears felony criminal cases and the District Court hears misdemeanor criminal cases and infractions. The Superior Court holds court in one location in the county, whereas some District Courts hold court in multiple places in the county. Judges for both courts are elected in non-partisan elections.

Each Superior Court district has a Senior Resident Superior Court Judge who manages the administrative duties of the court. Judges are assigned to a judicial district for a six-month period and then rotated to another district for the same time period. Each District Court district has a Chief District Court Judge who manages the administrative duties of the court.

The National Center for State Courts (NCSC) is an independent, nonprofit court improvement organization founded at the urging of Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court Warren E. Burger. He envisioned NCSC as a clearinghouse for research information and comparative data to support improvement in judicial administration in state courts.

The Commission contracted with the NCSC to prepare this report for the Committee.

The NCSC consultant provided general background work for this report to the Committee at its March 11, 2016 meeting² on criminal case management and then began a review of data and reports provided by the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) and made a follow up call with AOC staff. This information helped identify trends or issues that impact criminal case management. This preliminary work was followed by interviews in Raleigh with trial and appellate court judges, district attorneys, defense counsel and public defenders, court administrators, and AOC staff listed in Appendix H.

These interviews provided the NCSC consultant with a better understanding of the perspective of various stakeholders, identified major trends or issues specific to criminal case management, assessed current information collection and reporting capabilities, and determined the feasibility of creating criminal caseflow performance measures. These interviews also afforded an opportunity to discuss the AOC's capacity to support statewide implementation of a criminal caseflow plan and identify additional resources from either the trial courts or the AOC that could support this effort.

This report begins with an overview of caseflow management principles and practices and the current application of those principles in North Carolina. It then presents evidence indicating that North Carolina is ripe for criminal caseflow management reform. It also reviews how key caseflow management tools may improve case management in North Carolina. The report continues with a discussion of the potential benefits of engaging in caseflow management reform, and concludes with a rubric for North Carolina to engage in a statewide criminal caseflow management improvement project.

Justice Delayed is Justice Denied

It is a legal maxim that "justice delayed is justice denied." As Chief Justice Burger noted in an address to the American Bar Association in 1970: "A sense of confidence in the courts is essential to maintain the fabric of ordered liberty for a free people and three things could destroy that confidence and do incalculable damage to society: that people come to believe that inefficiency and delay will drain even a just judgment of its value; that people who have long been exploited in the smaller transactions of daily life come to believe that courts cannot vindicate their legal rights from fraud and over-reaching; [and] that people come to believe the law – in the larger sense – cannot fulfill its primary function to protect them and their families in their homes, at their work, and on the public streets"³ (emphasis added).

This concept – that Justice Delayed is Justice Denied – is embedded in Section 18 of North Carolina's Constitution:

All courts shall be open; every person for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due course of law; and right and justice shall be administered without favor, denial, or delay.

In North Carolina, just as justice may be denied as a result of problems with providing the effective assistance of counsel, justice may be denied by delays in the processing of criminal cases in the trial courts. Indications of potential problems are described below and throughout this report. Generally, delays in the processing of cases may create problems for:

- Pre-trial detainees who sit in the county jail while waiting for the prosecution to prove to a judge or jury that they violated the law, and in the meantime cannot earn income or support their family.
- Pre-trial detainees who choose to plead guilty to a charge in order to obtain the short-term gain of getting out of jail but then must face the long term consequences of a conviction, including difficulty finding employment and, in the case of a felony, loss of voting rights.
- Victims of crimes who need resolution of their case in order to receive restitution and/or to put the emotional damage of the crime behind them.
- Witnesses who over time may become unavailable and less likely to provide credible testimony.
- Institutions and individuals who will expend additional time and cost to resolve cases.

Summary of Findings and Recommendations

Key Issues

The following is a summary of the key issues that NCSC was asked to address in this report, along with major recommendations resulting from the study:

1. Identify Indicators Suggesting That North Carolina Should Undertake Efforts to Improve the Management of Criminal Cases Through Better Caseflow Management

As detailed in this report, justice requires that North Carolina must undertake new efforts to improve the management of criminal cases.

As a first step, North Carolina needs to gather accurate information in order to determine the extent of delay in the trial courts. Current reports give a sense of the delay – median time or number not disposed within time standard goals – but they do not provide information on whether some cases are so delayed that they cause injustice to the defendants to victims, nor do the reports give any indication on the causes of that delay. Part of the challenge in obtaining accurate data includes the following:

- Courts now define cases differently, making it impossible to interpret the AOC reports or compare delay in courts within the state or with other states.
- Courts do report median time to disposition, but the median time could be influenced by the number of cases resolved at the first appearance. Reports do not make it easy for the District Attorney (DA) or the Court to determine how many cases are older than two times the time standard or four times the time standard or longer.
- There are no reports on how many cases involve pre-trial detained defendants, on how many detained defendants have had all their charges eventually dismissed, on the sentences imposed on pre-trial detainees and whether those sentences are greater than the time served as detained defendants, or on the number of detainees who plead guilty to charges that they did not commit solely because they and their loved ones could not financially or emotionally afford for them to remain in the county jail.
- There is no systematic collection of information on the number or type of hearings set per case, the number or type of hearings held, the number of hearings continued or the reason for the continuance.
- There is limited information regarding the interval between the time that the defendant, attorneys, witnesses and victims are told the case is scheduled for hearing and the time that the case is actually called for hearing.

For more detail on these issues, see the section on “Information Needed for North Carolina to Know Whether its Trial Courts Are Achieving Timely Resolution of Criminal Cases” on page 40 of this report.

North Carolina must find and allocate the resources to gather this and additional data in order to determine whether its courts are now providing timely justice, and if not, who in its population is being denied justice. Once accurate data is gathered and analyzed, North Carolina can adopt a caseflow management plan that follows the fundamentals of such plans described in this report, which will reduce any injustice now occurring.

2. Discuss Potential Benefits to the State for Addressing Criminal Caseflow Management, Including Cost Savings, Improvements in Public Trust and Confidence, and Improved User Perception of Satisfaction with, and Fairness of, Criminal Proceedings

a. Cost Savings

As described in this report, North Carolina could benefit in many ways by implementing an effective caseflow management program. Jurisdictions that have successfully implemented caseflow management practices have achieved cost savings by, for example:

- Reducing the cost of pretrial detention by reducing the length of time that defendants are jailed while they await resolution of their cases. A recent Committee study of six North Carolina counties found that, depending on the charge, the average length of pretrial detention on the study date ranged from 35 to 193 days and the cost of detention ranged from $40 to $60 per day.⁴ As stated above, to measure cost savings in North Carolina, the court must know and be able to report the number and age of pending cases with detained defendants. An effective case management system using differentiated case tracking can establish reduced time standards for cases involving detainees and can expedite scheduling of their cases.
- Reducing the cost of pretrial detention by reducing the time that Superior Court defendants are incarcerated while they await their first hearing in Superior Court. Detainees can now wait in jail until the DA calendars an administrative setting or first trial date.
- Reducing the cost and security risks of transporting detainees to court for unproductive hearings.
- Reducing the number of court settings per case, thereby reducing the taxpayer dollars spent on judges, prosecutors, law enforcement officers, public defenders, and court reporters and court personnel who must appear in court for unproductive hearings. As stated above, an effective case management system will result in fewer case settings per case and fewer continuances. Reducing the number of court setting will also reduce the cost to victims, witnesses and families of defendants who travel to court and may need to take time from their work and families.
- Providing more efficient coordination of individuals and tasks associated with complicated cases by utilizing early screening to allocate sufficient time and resources to resolve them.

For more detail on these issues, see the section on “Potential Benefits of Improved Criminal Case Management” on page 43 of this report.

In addition, effective caseflow management practices can save victims, defendants and their families the costs associated with taking off from work and travelling to the courthouse to attend superfluous hearings and the cost to defendants paying legal fees for private counsel. If an effective caseflow management program is implemented, the probability that every court hearing will be a meaningful event will increase, resulting in a major reduction of times that cases are scheduled for hearing and major savings in costs to taxpayers, victims and defendants.

b. Public Trust and Confidence and Improvements in User Satisfaction

NCSC conducts national surveys on public trust and confidence in the nation's courts. Surveys confirm that citizens often believe that the legal system takes too long and costs too much overall. In the most recent assessment of satisfaction, focus group participants expressed their belief that there is collusion in the judicial process, particularly by attorneys, to defer or delay court decisions. Participants also expressed concerns that the financial interests of some parties work against the efficient administration of justice.⁵

The 2015 joint Elon University and High Point University poll of citizen confidence in public institutions done for the Commission's Public Trust and Confidence Committee sheds light on the public perception of the North Carolina courts and other institutions.⁶ Public confidence in North Carolina is quite high regarding the local police or sheriff, with 81% of those surveyed expressing the opinion that they are "somewhat or very confident" in this local institution. North Carolina state courts followed with nearly 66% of respondents stating they were "somewhat or very confident" in this state institution. Approximately 40% indicated that they believe people "usually" receive a fair outcome when they deal with the court, and a small percentage (3%) answered "always."

Many respondents to the Elon/High Point poll perceive that wealthy individuals and white residents receive better treatment by the state courts than do black, Hispanic, or low income residents. Further, more than half of the respondents believe people without attorneys and those who don't speak English receive somewhat worse or far worse treatment than others in the court system.

While the impact of delay on the public may be difficult to quantify and link directly to public opinion, individuals who appear in court as parties, witnesses, and victims are certainly impacted by delay. The NCSC has noted that one of the most frequent responses to public satisfaction surveys are concerns about starting court on time and complaints about the amount of time it takes to resolve cases.

An effective caseflow management program will result in the timely resolution of criminal cases and will enable the DA and the courts to document that timely resolution. This, over time, will enhance public trust and confidence in the courts.

3. Review the Fundamental Principles of Criminal Caseflow Management and Their Application in the North Carolina Trial Courts

On pages 10 through 30, this report provides a comprehensive overview of caseflow management principles and practices and a review of their current application in North Carolina's trial courts. North Carolina is unique in the practice of prosecutorial control over setting of cases, as opposed to the principle of early and continuous court control. As discussed further in the report, North Carolina law does promote a cooperative approach to scheduling, which is in keeping with the principle of communication between the court, opposing parties and other criminal justice agencies.

Comments from interview participants and recent studies suggest that many courts experience problems with scheduling productive and meaningful court events. High rates of continuances are the primary indicator that jurisdictions are having difficulty ensuring that all parties are ready to proceed when they appear in court. Many of the reasons for continuances (such as delays in obtaining drug and alcohol test results, overscheduling of cases, attorney scheduling conflicts and lack of preparation) are not unique to the North Carolina courts, and many jurisdictions have taken steps to address these issues through greater coordination between parties and improved scheduling practices.

4. Identify Key Components of Effective Criminal Caseflow Management That Could Be Employed in North Carolina Such as Differentiated Case Management, Performance Metrics, Evaluation, and Feedback

As discussed in this report, a set of well-established performance measures relating to caseflow management are in use across the country, and several of these are published by their respective administrative offices. Information on time to disposition, pending case age, and disposition rates was provided by the NC AOC for this report. Problems remain, however, with the accuracy of case information due to differences in how courts count cases and report dispositions. While these limitations should not inhibit progress toward developing a comprehensive caseflow management program, they will need to be addressed. In the short term, efforts to improve consistency at the local level are needed, and more long term efforts are currently underway to move to a next generation of case management software which should provide better information and reporting capabilities.

5. Propose a Step-By-Step Plan to Guide Statewide Planning Toward Improving Criminal Case Management, Including Major Activities, Key Players, and a Timeline

A number of recommendations are provided below which relate to improving the management of criminal cases. Some of these can be implemented on an individual basis, but the greatest benefit and impact would be gained through a coordinated, state-wide effort led by the Supreme Court and managed by the AOC in order to improve case information and reporting, to promote the adoption of principles through sharing of best practices and establishment of pilot projects, and to provide on-going education and monitoring to sustain the effort. The final section of this report includes an outline and sample timetable for a state-wide caseflow management improvement effort based on experiences in other states.

Key Recommendations

The following recommendations are offered for consideration:

1. The Supreme Court, a revived Judicial Council, Senior Resident Superior Court Judges, Chief District Court Judges and the AOC should exercise leadership in communicating the importance of timely resolution of cases and adoption of caseflow management principles and practices.
2. The Supreme Court should assess the suitability of current time guidelines by directing the AOC ensure that all courts use a single definition of a case and then compare current time to disposition results against the guidelines. The Court should consider modifying the guidelines based on these results, using the Model Time Standards referred to in this report as a guide.

3. The Supreme Court should endorse the use of time guidelines as a tool to help justice system leaders actively manage criminal caseloads.
4. A revived Judicial Council, or a new multi-disciplinary body created by the Supreme Court to address caseflow management, and the AOC should review the data and information needs identified in this report and develop new measures to capture and analyze the effectiveness of scheduling practices in resolving cases within established time standards.
5. The Supreme Court should consider authorizing pilot courts to test and demonstrate the benefits of criminal caseflow management best practices which have the potential for state-wide adoption.
6. The North Carolina Supreme Court should ask the AOC to develop caseflow management plan templates for adoption by courts and district attorneys that emphasize local communication and collaboration between justice system partners. A template may specify elements that should be contained in every plan, while allowing flexibility for each court to develop language that meets local needs.
7. The AOC should continue its efforts to promote data consistency with a particular emphasis on consistent and accurate caseload counts and dispositions to ensure the accuracy of reports and performance measures. This begins with a clear definition of a case and requires the assurance that all persons entering data into the system do so correctly.
8. Along with efforts to improve data accuracy and consistency, the AOC should provide prosecutors and courts with regular caseflow management reports that provide general management information, as well as more detailed information to assist judges and prosecutors who manage individual dockets and cases.
9. The AOC should provide DAs and the courts access to caseflow management reports that contain accurate information on the age and status of pending cases to enable DAs to calendar cases and enable judicial branch leaders and the public to monitor the progress of cases.
10. The AOC should conduct studies designed to further assess the status of criminal case management across the state, which should include such questions as:
 - a. What is the frequency of continuances and their impact on case age?
 - b. What are the primary reasons for continuances?
 - c. What factors account for the wide range of time to disposition across the state?
11. The AOC should develop expertise and information to assist courts in implementing caseflow management practices.
12. Caseflow management topics should be incorporated into training programs for judges, district attorneys, the defense bar, clerks, and court administrative personnel.
13. District attorneys and judges should take steps to ensure that every court hearing is a meaningful event by calendaring and conducting an effective administrative setting in Superior Court within 60 days as required by state statute,⁷ and that a similar practice be established for most criminal cases in District Court. An effective administrative setting will ⁷ N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-49.4.

- resolve all pretrial issues and then set the case for trial only after discovery is complete, pretrial motions are resolved and final plea negotiations have been completed.
14. The DAs and Judicial Branch leaders should review current calendaring practices, such as “bulk” scheduling, and adopt practices that reduce the number of court settings, the number of continuances and other related delays.
 15. The DAs and Judicial Branch leaders should review the practice of setting cases solely on monthly officer court days in District Court.
 16. The Supreme Court should consider whether District Judges should be authorized to calendar administrative settings for detained Superior Court defendants during the defendants’ first appearance.
 17. The Supreme Court should consider whether magistrates should be authorized and required to make a determination of indigence and assignment of a public defender at the defendant’s first appearance.
 18. The Supreme Court should assign responsibility to the Judicial Council or create a new multi-disciplinary steering committee with the responsibility and authority for providing overall caseflow management strategy and direction to implement the preceding recommendations.

Caseflow Management Principles and Practices

Caseflow management is the coordination of court processes and resources used to ensure that cases progress in a timely fashion from filing to disposition. Judges and managers in control of case scheduling can enhance justice when they supervise case progress early and continuously, set meaningful events and deadlines throughout the life of a case, and provide credible trial dates. Proven elements of practices in caseflow management include case-disposition time standards, use of differentiated case management, meaningful pretrial events and schedules, limiting continuances, time-sensitive calendaring and docketing practices, effective information systems that monitor age and status of cases, and control of post-disposition case events.

Effective caseflow management makes justice possible both in individual cases and across judicial systems and courts. It helps ensure that every litigant receives procedural due process and equal protection. Caseflow supervision is strictly a management process. The resolution of each case on its legal merits is never compromised by an effective caseflow management system.

The Impact of Local Legal Culture

The first comprehensive and rigorous national study of delay in state courts was conducted by the NCSC. In 1976, Thomas Church and fellow researchers examined civil and criminal cases disposed in 21 state trial courts of general jurisdiction. They concluded that the speed of disposition of civil and criminal litigation in a court cannot be ascribed in any simple sense to the length of its backlog, any more than court size, caseload, or trial rate can explain it. Rather, both quantitative and qualitative data generated in this research strongly suggest that both speed and backlog are determined in large part by established expectations, practices, and informal rules of behavior of judges and attorneys. For want of a better term, this cluster of related factors was labeled the “local legal culture.”

Court systems become adapted to a given pace of civil and criminal litigation. That pace has a court backlog of pending cases associated with it. It also has an accompanying backlog of open files in attorneys' offices. These expectations and practices, together with court and attorney backlog, must be overcome in any successful attempt to increase the pace of litigation. Church and his colleagues observed that trial court delay is not inevitable, but that "changes in case processing speed will necessarily require changes in the attitudes and practices of all members of a legal community." In accelerating the pace of litigation in a court, they noted, "the crucial element . . . is concern on the part of judges [and in North Carolina, the District Attorney as well,] with the problem of court delay and a firm commitment to do something about it." They found that attempts to alter the caseloads of individual judges by adding judges or decreasing filings are not likely to increase either productivity or speed. To reduce pretrial delay, they recommended that courts:

- Establish management systems by which the court, and not the attorneys, controls the progress of cases.
- Use trial-scheduling practices and continuance policies that create an expectation on the part of all concerned that a trial will begin on the first trial date scheduled.
- Emphasize readiness to try (rather than negotiate plea agreements) as a means to induce settlements.
- Increase effectiveness of speedy-trial standards for criminal cases through the introduction of operational consequences for violation of the standards and through reduced ease of waiver by defendants.⁸

Efforts to improve caseload management do not just serve the paramount goal of providing prompt justice. In fact, they are critically important in saving time and work for all participants in the justice system, from litigants to lawyers. Effective caseload management promotes predictability, improves lawyering, and engenders respect for the court and justice system. As an example, when trust is enhanced among lawyers, their jobs get easier. Reliability and consistency means lawyers only have to prepare once. Lawyers' reputations, as well as that of the court, are elevated when events and decisions occur as forecasted.

Improved caseload management means better time management for lawyers, too. One of the laments of both public and private attorneys is the inordinate amount of time they must spend in court, reappearing on the same case on multiple occasions. Effective caseload management can and does reduce unnecessary appearances by lawyers and litigants, saving time and inconvenience for everyone. Clients and the general public are more satisfied when they sense lawyers and the justice system aren't wasting their time.

Lastly, a little known result of more efficient caseload is improved attorney competence. NCSC's research has shown that efficient attorneys are more likely to be viewed as competent and timely, meaning that they did not delay case disposition for lack of preparation or frivolous reasons to gain time⁹ by opposing counsel, judges and court staff.¹⁰ As a result, efficiency and preparedness become virtues expected of not only judges, but the practicing bar as well. In turn, the local legal culture changes for the better.

The ABA Standards for Criminal Cases: Speedy Trial; Timely Resolution¹¹

These standards relative to speedy trial and timely resolution of criminal cases were published by the American Bar Association with commentary in 2004. They reflect the ABA's support for the principles and objectives of effective criminal case management:

Standard 12-1.4 Systems Approach

The process for timely case resolution should take into account the perspectives of the defendants, the public, including victims and witnesses, courts, prosecutors and defense counsel and law enforcement agencies.

Standard 12-3.1 The Public's Interest in Timely Case Resolution

The interest of the public, including victims and witnesses, in timely resolution of criminal cases ... should be recognized through formal adoption of policies and standards that are designed to achieve timely disposition of criminal cases regardless of whether the defendant demands a speedy trial ... increasing public trust and confidence in the justice system.

Standard 12-3.2 Goals for Timely Case Resolution

- Each jurisdiction should establish goals for timely resolution of cases that address (1) the period from the commencement of the case (by arrest, issuance of citation, or direct filing of indictment or information) to disposition; and (2) the time periods between major case events.
- Goals for timely resolution should be developed collaboratively.
- The jurisdiction's goals for timely resolution should address at least the following time periods:
 - Arrest/citation to first appearance.
 - First appearance to completion of pretrial processes (i.e., completion of all discovery, motions, pretrial conferences, and plea, dismissal, or other disposition in cases that will not go to trial).
 - Completion of pretrial processes to commencement of trial or to non-trial disposition of the case.
 - Verdict or plea of guilty to imposition of sentence.
 - Arrest or issuance of citation to disposition, defined for this purpose as plea of guilty, entry into a diversion program, dismissal, or commencement of trial.
- Goals for timely resolution intended to provide guidance. The establishment of such goals should not create any rights for defendants or others.

Standard 12-4.3 Jurisdictional Plans for Effective Criminal Caseflow: Essential Elements

Elements of a plan for effective overall criminal caseflow management in a local jurisdiction should include:

- Incident Reports: Rapid preparation and transmission, to the prosecutor, of good quality police incident/arrest reports.
- Test Results: Rapid turnaround of forensic laboratory test results.
- Case Screening: Effective early case screening and realistic charging by prosecutors.
- Appointment of Counsel: Early appointment of defense counsel for eligible defendants.
- Discovery: Early provision of discovery.
- Pleas/Sentence Negotiations: Early discussions between the prosecutor and the defense counsel concerning possible non-trial disposition of the case.

¹¹American Bar Association (2004). ABA Standards for Criminal Justice: Speedy Trial and Timely Resolution of Criminal Cases.
http://www.americanbar.org/publications/criminal_justice_section_archive/crimjust_standards_speedytrial_toc.html

- Case Scheduling Conference: Early case scheduling conference conducted by the assigned judicial officer to:
 - Review the status of discovery and negotiations concerning possible non-trial disposition;
 - Schedule motions; and
 - Make any orders needed.
- Pre-Trial Caseflow Orders: Case timetables addressing the time periods allowed for completion of discovery, filing of motions, and other case events that are set at an early stage of the case by the judge in consultation with the prosecutor and defense counsel.
- Motions: Early filing and disposition of motions, including motions requiring evidentiary hearings.
- Monitoring: Close monitoring of the size and age of pending caseloads, by the court and the prosecutor's office, to ensure that case processing times in individual cases do not exceed the requirements of the speedy trial rule and that case processing time standards are being met for the overall caseload.
- Continuances: A policy of granting continuances of trials and other court events only upon a showing of good cause and only for so long as is necessary, taking into account not only the request of the prosecution or defense, but also the public interest in prompt disposition of the cases.
- Backlog Reduction Plan: Elimination of existing case backlogs (i.e., cases pending longer than the established case processing time standards), following a backlog reduction plan developed collaboratively by the court, prosecutor's office, defense bar, law enforcement and other criminal justice agencies involved in and affected by criminal case processing.

Standard 12-4.5 Court Responsibility for Management of Calendars and Caseloads

- Control Over the Trial Calendar: Control over the trial calendar, and over all other calendars on which a case may be placed, should be vested in the court. Continuances should be granted only by a judicial officer, on the record. The court should grant a continuance only upon a showing of good cause and only for so long as is necessary. In ruling on requests for continuances, the court should take into account not only the request or consent of the prosecution or defense, but also the public interest in timely resolution of cases. If a ruling on the request for a continuance will have the effect of extending the time within which the defendant must be brought to trial, the judge should state on the record the new speedy trial time limit date and should seek confirmation of this date by the prosecution and the defense.
- Caseflow Management Reports: Reports on the age and status of pending cases should be prepared regularly for the chief judge of the court and made available to leaders of other organizational entities involved in criminal case processing.

Fundamental Principles of Caseflow Management

Research and practical experience have identified fundamental principles that characterize successful caseflow management, which are outlined below.

Definition of a Case

In order to process cases to disposition and in order to report and compare the number of cases that need to be disposed and the number that have exceeded time standards with other courts and over time in the same court, the court should have a clear definition of what constitutes a case and all courts in a state must consistently use that definition when counting cases. A “case” could be defined in a number of ways, such as:

- A single defendant,
- A single complaint/information/indictment (charge) for one defendant, or
- All charges filed against a single defendant for a single first court appearance (arraignment).

For example, when a law enforcement officer stops a driver and charges the driver with careless and negligent driving, driving with a suspended license and disorderly conduct and then the person appears in court for a first appearance on all three charges, a court may decide to count the three charges as one case or as three cases. If the defendant pleads guilty to driving with a suspended license as a plea agreement so that the prosecutor will dismiss the disorderly conduct and careless and negligent driving charges, the court may decide to report one case resolved by plea or may decide to report one case resolved by plea and two cases dismissed.

In some states, a “case” is defined as all charges filed against a single defendant for the same initial appearance on court date. A criminal justice system cannot count and manage its cases or compare how it is doing with other states or compare how its counties are doing compared to the other counties until it first defines a “case” and ensures that all counties in the state use the same definition and enter the information into the case management system in accordance with the definition.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

The Administrative Office of the Courts has defined a “case” as one file number. However, according to the AOC, there is inconsistency across counties regarding how this is handled with respect to multiple charges. In some counties each charge will be a new file number, while in others, there may be multiple charges under the same file number (case).¹²

Without a single definition that is consistently used in every North Carolina court, it is impossible to compare the number of cases filed, the age of pending cases, the number of cases closed within the time standards, or the number of cases disposed by plea or trial within North Carolina or with other states across the country.

The AOC is in the process of changing its definition of a “case” to use the defendant (or incident) as the unit of measure, rather than the ‘case.’ This new AOC definition of a case conforms with the NCSC State Court Guide to Statistical Reporting (Guide), a standardized reporting framework for state court caseload statistics designed to promote informed comparisons among state courts. The Guide directs that courts count the defendant and all charges involved in a single incident as a single case.

Changing this definition will be a major improvement as long as the AOC and Branch leadership take steps to ensure that all courts consistently enter data using this new definition. It will enable North Carolina to compare the degree of trial court timeliness with other states across the country.

Early Court Intervention and Continuous Control of Cases

A fundamental principle of caseflow management is that the court, and not the litigants, controls the progress of a case from filing to disposition. The rationale for court control of calendaring and the pace of the adjudicatory process is based on the principle that in a democratic system of justice, the court is the only neutral party capable of resolving a dispute brought to the government in a fair, unbiased, and independent manner. All other parties have a vested interest in the outcome of a case. The court's only interest is in justice.

Early court intervention means that the court monitors the progress of the case as soon as charges are initiated and again at established intervals to ensure that the case is continuing to progress along an established time track.

Early court control involves conducting early case conferences. These conferences may be called status conferences, pre-trial conferences, or as in North Carolina, administrative settings. A successful early case conference enables the judicial officer to review the status of discovery, learn of negotiations concerning possible non-trial disposition, schedule motions and make any orders needed to advance the case to disposition.

Court control must also be continuous, meaning that every case should have a next scheduled event. This prevents the case from being delayed because of inattention by litigants or the court.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

Prosecutor/Court Control of the Docket in North Carolina: While the principles of caseflow management recommend that the court, and not the attorneys, control the progress of the cases, the North Carolina legislature has decided that the District Attorney is responsible for calendaring criminal cases. Docketing of superior court criminal cases is governed by North Carolina General Statutes § 7A-49.4. Paragraph (a) refers to the establishment of a "criminal case docketing plan developed by the district attorney for each superior court district in consultation with the superior court judges residing in that district and after opportunity for comment by members of the bar" (emphasis added). Paragraph (b) (1) places responsibility for setting of deadlines with the court, as well as paragraphs (4) and (5) which designate the court's authority to set and defer rulings on motions, and establish the necessary number of administrative hearings to achieve fair and timely administration of justice.

While the responsibility for setting the trial calendar rests with the DA, the DA no longer has total control of the process, as the prosecutors pointed out in their presentation to the Committee at one of its meetings. Calendaring in North Carolina is a hybrid and consultative process, with docket plans developed by the DA with consultation with the Superior Court and local bar. Concerns remain that about the inequity of having one party in litigation with control over initial scheduling and the potential for using delay as a tactic to influence case outcomes.

Persons charged with a felony who are detained must be brought before a district judge within 96 hours for a first appearance at which the district judge reviews bail and conditions of release and then determines whether to assign counsel. It is possible that a defendant can then sit in jail indefinitely until the DA gets around to calendaring a trial date.

While changes in this statute should be considered as part of any improvements to criminal case management, the current practice of calendaring authority resting with prosecution does not preclude moving forward with an effort to improve criminal caseflow management on a state-wide basis by employing the techniques and best practices noted in this report. Ideally, however, the court should be responsible for case control throughout the life of a criminal case, including initial scheduling.

Under the present arrangement, the DA's Office must have the information it needs to ensure every event is meaningful and is productively moving a case toward resolution. The DA's Office does not now have the data or information needed to effectively fulfill its responsibilities. In many other jurisdictions across the country where the Clerk's Office, judicial support staff or a Court Administrator is responsible for calendaring and caseflow management, those officials use information in the Court's database to schedule and continually monitor cases to promote fair and timely resolutions. This is the case with the schedule of civil cases. The DAs in North Carolina do not have such access.

The ABA Standards recommend that the office responsible for calendaring cases has access to caseflow management reports that contain the age and status of pending cases. For the DA to calendar cases and for the Court to monitor the progress of its cases, the DA and the Court need access to data and reports that provide:

- The number, age, and identity of all active pending cases.
- The number, age, and identity of all inactive pending cases.
 - An inactive case is one that cannot be scheduled for hearing for reasons such as the defendant cannot be found (an order for arrest has been issued) or the defendant is incarcerated on another matter and cannot be transferred to court.
- A list of all cases that are ready for trial, with the date that the case was filed and the date that it became trial ready. The NCSC project team recommends that a case be considered as "trial ready" only after a pre-trial conference has been held and the parties agree (or the DA certifies) that:
 - Discovery is complete. The DA has filed a certificate that all discovery has been provided to defense counsel.
 - All pre-trial motions have been filed. Motions have either been disposed or the parties agree that they can be heard at the beginning of the trial.
 - The DA and defense counsel have completed or are completing everything needed to apply mitigating factors at sentencing (or have been given reasonable time to do so).
 - The ADA and defense counsel have discussed an appropriate sentence to recommend to the Court or have agreed that the sentence can be determined by the judge, pursuant to a plea of guilty by the defendant.
- The court schedule for all cases in the District and Superior Court in a format that enables the DA to identify conflicts, i.e. any other cases calendared for the defense attorney.

Differentiated Case Management: A Case Management Tool

Differentiated Case Management (DCM) is a technique that recognizes that not all cases are created equal when it comes to scheduling and case management, since various types of cases can differ substantially in terms of the time and resources required to achieve fair and timely disposition. Some cases can be disposed of expeditiously, with little or no discovery and few intermediate events. Other cases require extensive court supervision and may include expert witnesses, highly technical issues, or difficult plea negotiations.

One of the main elements of DCM is a process for early case screening which allows for the court to prioritize cases for disposition based on factors such as prosecutorial priorities, age or physical condition of the parties or witnesses, or local public policy issues. Regardless of the criteria chosen for differentiating among cases or the case assignment system in use, two goals and four resulting objectives characterize DCM. The authors of the DCM Implementation Manual suggest the following two goals:¹³

¹³ Solomon, Maureen and Holly Bakke (1993) Differentiated Case Management Implementation Manual. Bureau of Justice Assistance, Washington D.C.

1. Timely and just disposition of all cases consistent with each case's preparation and case management needs.
2. Improved use of judicial system resources by tailoring their application to the dispositional requirements of each case.

To achieve these goals, which are consistent with overall caseflow management goals, a DCM program should have the following objectives:

1. Creation of multiple tracks or paths for case disposition, with differing procedural requirements and timeframes geared to the processing requirements of the cases that will be assigned to that track.
2. Provision for court screening of each case shortly after filing so that each will be assigned to the proper track according to defined criteria.
3. Continuous court monitoring of case progress within each track to ensure that it adheres to track deadlines and requirements.
4. Procedures for changing the track assignment in the event the management characteristics of a case change during the pretrial process.

The development of meaningful DCM track criteria requires the identification of factors that determine the extent of party preparation and court oversight required to achieve case resolution. Some courts differentiate on the basis of the seriousness of the case, such as the nature of the charges and whether the defendant could be sentenced to death or life in prison. Other relevant factors may include: likely defenses; the need for time to prepare and present forensic testimony or a psychiatric evaluation; or the number of defendants and the amount of discovery anticipated. Some courts have developed time tracks solely on the basis of case type while others use more complex criteria that employ a combination of these approaches. (see Vermont, Boston, Massachusetts, and Pierce County, Washington, below) Whatever approach is used, it is important that courts continually assess the effectiveness of their DCM program and make adjustments as needed to the process to ensure ongoing success.

The following are examples of how various jurisdictions have implemented time standards and DCM systems:

The Vermont Supreme Court adopted Criminal Case Disposition Guidelines in 2010.¹⁴ The guidelines use the principles of DCM to establish two tracks for misdemeanor cases: a standard track with a guideline of 100% disposed within 120 days, and a complex track, with a guideline of 100% disposed within 180 days.

Additionally, the guidelines establish three tracks for felonies:

- A standard track with a guideline of 100% disposed in 180 days
- A complex track with a guideline of 100% disposed in 365 days
- A super-complex track with a guideline of 100% disposed in 455 days

Finally, the Vermont Supreme Court identified complexity factors:

- Misdemeanor complex factors: interpreter, competency evaluation, jury trial, public defender conflict at or after the first calendar call.

- Felony complex factors: interpreter, competency evaluation, jury trial, public defender conflict at or after the first calendar call, pro se defendant, juvenile victim, multiple victims, out of state witnesses, co-defendants, pre-sentence investigation.
- Felony super-complex track: fatality or possible life sentence.

The Vermont Supreme Court also adopted interim time standards for the two misdemeanor tracks and the three felony tracks, with guidelines for the number of days between key events, such as arraignment, status conference, motion filing deadline, motion hearing, motion decision, jury draw/trial and sentence.

The District Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has established performance goals for case management for the entire criminal caseload. The Boston Municipal Court Department of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has adopted time standards for its misdemeanor criminal cases, with two tracks, designated in accordance with the misdemeanor's maximum period of incarceration.

The Pierce County, Washington Superior Court developed a DCM program to promote the speedy disposition of drug cases and to reduce jail overcrowding. The prosecutor and public defender were responsible for making a DCM plan designation and accompanying schedule for case events, subject to court review and approval. Three tracks were developed, including a fast track of 30 days to disposition, intermediate track that followed statutory speedy-trial requirements of 60 days for in-custody and 90 days for out-of-custody defendants, and a complex track in which the speedy trial rule was waived and cases were assigned to an individual judge for monitoring. Despite a 53% increase in criminal filings over a five-year period, average time to disposition dropped from 210 days to 90 days.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

North Carolina has not adopted differentiated case management on a system-wide basis.

Productive and Meaningful Events

The scheduling of hearings should balance the need for reasonable preparation time by parties with the necessity for prompt resolution of the case. The court should take an active role in encouraging hearing readiness by parties and lawyers and creating the expectation that court events will occur as scheduled and will be productive. Hearings should be scheduled within relatively short intervals. When hearing preparation is expected to take a particularly long time, the court may wish to schedule intermediate "status" hearings to ensure that the preparation process is proceeding. Good communication between judges and lawyers is important in order to:

- Give attorneys reasonable advance notice of deadlines and procedural requirements.
- Notify lawyers that all requests for continuance must be made in advance of a deadline date and upon showing of good cause.
- Take consistent action in response to non-compliance of parties with deadlines.

Attorneys and litigants should expect that events will occur as scheduled. These participants may not appear or be prepared at a scheduled hearing if the certainty of the hearing being held is in doubt. This means that the court provides advance notice in the event of judicial absence or provides a back-up judge if possible. Further, court scheduling practices should ensure that the calendar is not so over-scheduled as to create delays or continuances. Creating and enforcing firm continuance policies also improves the likelihood that hearings will be held as scheduled.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

In North Carolina, the number of continuances and the number of hearings per case indicate that not all scheduled hearings are meaningful events.

Stakeholders reported to the NCSC consultant that continuances regularly occur in North Carolina because of:

- Lack of party preparation;
- Discovery issues;
- Scheduling conflicts;
- Overscheduling of the calendar;
- Need for additional time to determine restitution; and
- Delays in obtaining toxicology and other expert reports.

Law Enforcement Officers' Monthly Court Day

It is a common practice in North Carolina's District Court for DA's to schedule first appearances and subsequent hearings on the law enforcement officer's monthly court day. These subsequent hearing are often scheduled as trials.

This practice enables law enforcement departments to know officer availability when making their assignments to the community. However, this practice has clear implications on the ability of the DA to schedule cases for timely disposition and creates implications for the defendant having timely access to counsel.

If a defendant is arrested, the defendant initially appears before a Magistrate for a determination of probable cause and for determination of pretrial release. If a defendant charged with a felony is detained, the magistrate assigns a first court date to be held within 96 hours. If a defendant charged with a misdemeanor is detained, the magistrate assigns the officer's next court date as the first court date – this could be one to five weeks later. If the officer has a conflict (i.e. a training program), the case is rescheduled to one month later. The magistrate does not make a determination of whether to assign counsel at that time. The defendant will then be jailed until his/her first appearance before a District Court Judge.¹⁵

This practice has major implications on the delivery of justice to the defendant and major implications on the cost to taxpayers for the presumed innocent defendant's detention. As discussed below, it also has implications on the time needed to resolve the case.

The NCSC recently conducted a review of scheduling practices in one of North Carolina's District Courts – Wake County.¹⁶ In 2015, the Wake County District Attorney's Office (DA) contracted with NCSC to provide suggestions and recommendations to the DA, the District Court, defense attorneys, and law enforcement agencies on how impaired driving cases (DWIs) can be better calendared and processed in order to obtain a fair and timely disposition.

In Wake County (and presumably in most of North Carolina's District Courts), cases are scheduled for a first appearance and for trial on the law enforcement officers' monthly court dates. The second court setting will be one month after the first appearance and subsequent trial dates will be one month after the previous one. Cases needing six court sessions to resolve will therefore have six trial settings over six months. Each subsequent setting requires attendance and involvement by the law enforcement officer, the ADA, the defense attorney, the defendant, the Judge and court staff. In some cases, the defendant's family and victim also appear. Few cases are resolved within six months despite having six court settings. In Wake County, half of the DWI cases have at least six trial court settings and continuances.

Because the case is set for trial, if the law enforcement officer does not appear at the hearing, defense attorneys will often move to dismiss the case. Otherwise, cases are routinely continued, because the State or the defense or the Court is not ready to proceed.

In Wake County and in some other counties in North Carolina, different judges will preside over trial settings over the life of the case. The judge sitting on a case in month 1 will not necessarily be the judge who sits on the case in month 2. The NCSC project team learned during its visit to Wake County that some defense attorneys, when considering whether to advise their clients to plead guilty to the charge believe that some judges may be more inclined to apply mitigating factors and impose a lighter sentence than others. These attorneys often observe which District Judge is assigned to court that day as they decide whether to advise their client to plead guilty or request a continuance, knowing that there will likely be a different District Judge presiding over the next court appearance.

Most Wake County DWI cases are routinely continued – cases average six and a half case settings and continuances before they are resolved; some are continued twice that many times.

It is important when monitoring continuances for the DA and Court to record who requested the delay, the length of the delay, the reason for the delay, and the age of the case at the time the continuance was granted. Data on postponed and reset cases are critical in determining the location and reasons for bottlenecks in the movement of cases from filing to disposition. More difficult to ascertain is the extent to which there is delay in setting a case for initial hearing since this remains under exclusive control of the DA.

Most egregious are situations in which cases are put on the calendar and offenders and lawyers are required to appear when it is known in advance that the case is not ready for trial. While there was no aggregate data on continuances available at the time of this study, a North Carolina Office of Indigent Defense Services (IDS) report¹⁷ sheds some light on the extent of the problem. Some 75% of those responding to the IDS survey estimated that there were at least three continuances for the average district court case. Clerks estimated that most cases have six or more continuances.

In rural courts with relatively low caseloads the impact of continuances is amplified when the available court dates are limited. It was noted that in some jurisdictions the administrative calendar is scheduled quarterly (or less), so that only a few continuances can add a substantial amount of time to reach final disposition. Although the extent to which the limitations of facilities, and in particular courtroom availability, impacts readiness is not known, the consultants' experience in other states has been that problems with facilities, such as inadequate security for high-profile cases, insufficient jury courtrooms, and other factors contribute to delay. These conditions are often more common in rural jurisdictions.

Court Wait Time

Another practice noted during the North Carolina stakeholder interviews, and common in many courts nationwide, is scheduling all cases at a single time, typically 9:00 am. This causes two problems: First, it creates long waiting times for those whose cases are last to be called. Second, litigants quickly realize that they do not need to be prepared as they will correctly assume that with so many cases on the docket it will not matter if their case is postponed.

Existing research on and data from North Carolina suggests that wait time contributes to court system costs. For example, the IDS sought to estimate the cost of paying for private appointed counsel (PAC) waiting-in-court time. The report found public defenders had an average of 4.55 hours of wait time per case. Wait times create problems for victims and family members who take time from their work and family obligations to sit in court for half a day to observe a five to ten-minute hearing.

The DAs and Judicial Branch leaders should review the practice of setting cases on officer court days and of setting an entire morning's cases at 9:00 AM, and should develop alternative practices that enhance timely case resolution and user satisfaction without reducing department ability to provide community safety and without creating "downtime" in the courtroom or reducing the number of matters that can be heard in a day. One alternative practice suggestion would be setting one-third of the morning's cases at 9:00 AM, one-third at 10:00 AM and one-third at 11:00 AM.

Implementing practices that result in courts conducting only meaningful hearings will reduce the number of case settings and provide judges with the time to hear cases in a more orderly scheduled manner.

Multiple Unproductive Case Settings

The practice of multiple case settings (aka "churning") is costly in many ways. There is a financial cost for defendants, their families and their victims who take a day off from work or who must pay for travel to the courthouse. Defendants must pay private counsel. Taxpayers pay for the time that judges, DAs, public defenders attend multiple hearings. There is a cost for transporting detainees, and there are major safety issues related to transporting detainees.

There are also justice implications. Multiple hearings could mean that defendants who must pay private counsel and/or defendants who are detained and not able to earn income, and who cannot support their family financially or emotionally while incarcerated, may decide that it is less costly to plead guilty to an offense that they did not commit, and to suffer the collateral consequences, than it is to require the DAs to take the time to prove their case before a Judge or jury.

In addition, because the first court appearance for most cases in District Court is on the date of the law enforcement officer's monthly court date, a defendant detained after appearing before a Magistrate could sit in the county jail for up to 30 days before their first appearance in court and their first contact with defense counsel.

Despite these challenges, a number of effective practices were identified during the interviews as having been put into place by some of North Carolina's DA's and in some of North Carolina districts to help better manage cases. Examples of these practices include:

- Early discovery and plea offers;
- Informal scheduling orders that are enforced;
- Plea discussions prior to scheduled court dates;

- Staggered setting of cases to avoid docket overcrowding;
- Continuance monitoring by the prosecutor;
- Schedule coordination and posting of office hours by the DA;
- Electronic sharing of discovery materials;
- Setting aside prosecutor and defense counsel consultation time before court begins; and
- Effective use of administrative dockets to resolve cases.

Efficient Motions Practice

If parties file pretrial motions, early court action on these motions will promote earlier case resolution. The court should decide all substantive pretrial motions before the date of trial. Some suggestions for managing the motions process include:

- Scheduling contested and uncontested motions separately to increase judicial time for hearing and deciding motions that could substantially impact the outcome of the case.
- Requiring attorneys to attach a stipulated order or certification that identifies uncontested motions.
- Setting time limits for responses to motions, and setting these deadlines just prior to the hearing date.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

While problems with delay related to motions were not specifically identified by the small sample of individuals interviewed in the preparation of this report, they may or may not be a significant factor in overall delay. Efficient motions practice is a fundamental principle of effective criminal case management and thus should be examined as part of any criminal caseflow management reform effort.

Trial Preparation and Management

Effective use of the time between filing of charges and the first scheduled trial date is critical to successful trial management. During this time, the judge makes various decisions regarding the evidence to be introduced and an estimate of the time required to hear the case. Some states set pretrial conferences or status conferences to bring parties together for the purpose of determining issues in dispute, determining whether discovery is complete, seeking consensus on evidence and witness presentation, completing discovery, and setting a next court date. Proven trial management techniques include:

- Resolving pretrial motions before the first trial date is scheduled;
- Conducting a trial management conference shortly before a trial starts;
- Reducing unnecessary or repetitive evidence; and
- Fully utilizing the time available in a day to conduct the trial.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

North Carolina has taken steps to enhance trial preparation and management. State statute (N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-49.4) requires that an administrative setting must be calendared in the Superior Court for each felony within 60 days at which:

- (1) The court shall determine the status of the defendant's representation by counsel.

- (2) After hearing from the parties, the court shall set deadlines for the delivery of discovery, arraignment (if necessary), and filing of motions.
- (3) If the district attorney has made a determination regarding a plea arrangement, the district attorney shall inform the defendant as to whether a plea arrangement will be offered and the terms of any proposed plea arrangement, and the court may conduct a plea conference if supported by the interest of justice.
- (4) The court may hear pending pretrial motions, set such motions for hearing on a certain date, or defer ruling on motions until the trial of the case.

The court may schedule more than one administrative setting if requested by the parties or if it is found to be necessary to promote the fair administration of justice in a timely manner. At the conclusion of the last administrative setting, the DA may schedule a trial date unless the court determines that the interests of justice require the setting of a different date.

Conducting effective administrative settings can reduce the number of cases set on a particular date for trial, create trial date certainty, reduce the number of cases dismissed on the trial date, reduce the number of persons who plead guilty on the trial date, and reduce the many instances where attorneys show up for trial unprepared to proceed with the trial.

Unfortunately, all indications are that the trial courts are not effectively using administrative settings. The initial impression that the NCSC gained from discussions with various stakeholders and examples of calendars suggests that the scheduling of cases for trial is particularly problematic in North Carolina. This is an indication that administrative settings are not successful at achieving what they were set up to accomplish.

Experience shows that successful caseflow management involves leadership, commitment, communication, and the creation of a learning environment. These factors may ultimately determine whether a state is successful in its effort to provide fair and timely disposition of its cases.

Leadership

Visible support from both local judicial leadership and the Supreme Court is essential for success. Those in leadership positions should be able to articulate a vision of how case management will improve the system, explain the anticipated benefits, and show an ongoing commitment to the effort. Leaders should be advocates for the program and should work to build consensus and support from both within the court and from those individuals and organizations that do business with the court. Courts should seek to gain support from members of the bar and the justice community. Being a part of the leadership team also includes setting and enforcing expectations once the initial consultation has occurred.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

Chief Justice Mark Martin has shown leadership through his creation of the Commission, which studies and provides recommendations to ensure that the Judicial Branch meets the needs of its citizens and their expectations for a functional court system.

On paper, North Carolina has established leadership responsibilities for the administration of the trial courts, for the management of cases, and for record keeping in the courts. In practice, those who could exercise leadership in monitoring and enhancing caseflow management, as well as in scheduling cases to timely disposition, are not doing so.

The Supreme Court has taken some steps toward ensuring that the Judicial Branch meets the needs of its' citizens by adopting general rules of practice pursuant to its statutory authority to do so; which include the oversight of the following roles.¹⁸

The Senior Resident Superior Court Judge in each administrative Superior Court District (the most senior judge in years of service) is responsible for various administrative duties, including appointing magistrates and some other court officials, and managing the scheduling of civil, but not criminal, cases for trial.

The Chief District Court Judge in each District Court is appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, rather than being determined by years of service. Among other duties, the Chief District Court Judge is responsible for creating the schedule of District Court sessions for the district, assigning District Court Judges to preside over those sessions and supervising the magistrates for each county in the district.

The AOC is responsible for developing the uniform rules, forms and methods for keeping the records of the courts, particularly those records maintained by the clerks of Superior Court.

The State Judicial Council was created by the General Assembly in 1999 to promote overall improvement in the Judicial Branch. Its duties include recommending guidelines for the assignment and management of cases and monitoring the effectiveness of the Judicial Branch in serving the public.

In 2003, the State Judicial Council exercised leadership in this area by endorsing the development of trial court case processing measures. Otherwise, based on interviews and in its research, the NCSC did not learn of any steps taken by the Judicial Council or any Chief Judges to communicate the importance of implementing caseflow management plans to enable the trial courts to resolve cases within given time standards.

While the AOC has provided direction on record keeping and, in particular, how to count and report cases, workload, and the age of cases, the AOC has not taken steps to ensure that all courts are following record keeping standards.

While the Supreme Court has adopted general rules of practice, the Supreme Court has not adopted rules that establish effective case management for state trial courts.

Communication

Good communication is essential for any effort to implement change in the organization. Chances of success are improved through frequent and sustained communication between judges and court staff, as well as consultation among judges, prosecutors, and defense counsel. Communication ensures that all participants have a solid understanding of what the change is, why it is needed, and what their respective roles are with regard to court filings, providing discovery, filing motions, negotiating fair disposition and preparing for trial.

¹⁸N.C. Gen. Stat § 7A-34. Rules of practice and procedure in trial courts.

The Supreme Court is hereby authorized to prescribe rules of practice and procedure for the superior and district courts supplementary to, and not inconsistent with, acts of the General Assembly.

Several stakeholders interviewed during this project described the benefits of communication between local justice system partners through regular meetings and consultations that helped to identify and resolve problems at the local level. These individuals cited examples of how efforts to work collectively at the local level have improved criminal case management. In most cases this is realized through regular meetings that include representatives of the bench, prosecution, defense, law enforcement, and clerk's office. One challenge in North Carolina is the absence of public defender offices in many of the rural areas, which can make it difficult to achieve this level of local collaboration.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

The NCSC has identified two examples of good communication among participants in North Carolina's local criminal justice systems:

In Mecklenburg County, a monthly debrief to review performance goals is scheduled with the prosecutor, defense attorneys, and law enforcement. The court administrator's office plays a substantial role in coordinating criminal cases following indictment. More informal approaches, such as the bar lunch meetings conducted concurrent with each administrative session in District 30B (Hayward and Jackson Counties) also are employed.

In Wake County, the District Attorney and Chief Judge of the District Court started a workgroup made up of prosecutors, judges and defense attorneys to develop and monitor a plan to implement recommendations provided by the NCSC on DWI caseflow management. The plan's goal is a system that "sets DWIs only for meaningful initial settings, administrative settings and trial date."

Learning Environment

The successful implementation of caseflow management, whether in the local court setting or statewide, depends on judges, court staff, and outside participants understanding why and how the caseflow management program works and the benefits that can be achieved from the program.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

Although the principles have been in practice for decades, a sustained effort to educate and update new judges, staff, and litigators is needed. NCSC did not learn of any programs on caseflow management being conducted as a regular part of training for justice system officials, court clerks, prosecutors and defense counsel. The development of caseflow management curricula should be considered.

Case Management Measures

As previously identified (see ABA Standard for Criminal Case Timely Resolution 12-3.2), "Each jurisdiction should establish goals for timely resolution of cases that address (1) the period from the commencement of the case to disposition and (2) the time periods between major events." These events could include arrest/citation to first appearance, first appearance to completion of the pretrial process, completion of pretrial process to trial or to non-trial disposition (plea/sentence or dismissal).

NCSC *CourTools*¹⁹ Caseflow Management Measures

The NCSC, concerned with trial court delay, has developed a set of ten balanced and realistic performance measures that are practical to implement and use. Understanding the steps involved in performance measurement can make the task easier and more likely to succeed. CourTools supports efforts made to improve court performance by helping clarify performance goals, developing a measurement plan, and documenting success.

Effective measurement is key to managing court resources efficiently, letting the public know what your court has achieved, and helping identify the benefits of improved court performance. The NCSC developed CourTools by integrating the major performance areas defined by the Trial Court Performance Standards with relevant concepts from other successful public and private sector performance measurement systems. This balanced set of court performance measures provides the judiciary with the tools to demonstrate effective stewardship of public resources. Being responsive and accountable is critical to maintaining the independence courts need to deliver fair and equal justice to the public.

Each of the ten CourTools measures follows a similar sequence, with steps supporting one another. These steps include a clear definition and statement of purpose, a measurement plan with instruments and data collection methods, and strategies for reporting results. Published in a visual format, CourTools uses illustrations, examples, and jargon-free language to make the measures clear and easy to understand.

CourTools measures these four aspects of trial court delay:

- Clearance Rates: The number of outgoing cases as a percentage of the number of incoming cases.
 - Clearance rates measure whether the court is keeping up with its incoming caseload. If cases are not disposed in a timely manner, a backlog of cases awaiting disposition will grow. This measure is a single number that can be compared within the court for any and all case types, on a monthly or yearly basis, or between one court and another. Knowledge of clearance rates by case type can help a court pinpoint emerging problems and determine where improvements can be made.
- Time to Disposition: The percentage of cases disposed or otherwise resolved within established time frames.
 - This measure, used in conjunction with Clearance Rates and Age of Pending Caseload (below), is a fundamental management tool that assesses the length of time it takes a court to process cases. It compares a court's performance with local, state, or national guidelines for timely case processing.
- Age of Pending Caseload: The age of the active cases pending before the court, measured as the number of days from filing until the time of measurement.
 - Having a complete and accurate inventory of active pending cases and tracking their progress is important because this pool of cases potentially requires court action. Examining the age of pending cases makes clear, for example, the cases drawing near or about to surpass the court's case processing time standards. This information helps focus attention on what is required to resolve cases within reasonable timeframes.
- Trial Date Certainty: The number of times cases disposed by trial are scheduled for trial.
 - A court's ability to hold trials on the first date they are scheduled to be heard (trial date certainty) is closely associated with timely case disposition. This measure provides a tool to evaluate the effectiveness of calendaring and continuance practices. For this measure, “trials” includes jury trials, bench trials (also known as non-jury or court trials), and adjudicatory hearings in juvenile cases.

Adoption of CourTools: Durham County, North Carolina’s 14th Judicial District, has adopted CourTools as a model for its performance accountability system.

Time Standards in North Carolina: Both the National Center for State Courts (Model Time Standards) and the North Carolina Supreme Court have established time standards for the trial courts. The following chart compares the average statewide time to disposition for FY 2014²⁰ with the current North Carolina standards and the Model Time Standards:

The 98 percent threshold in the new model time standards is an acknowledgment that even under the best of circumstances some cases will remain unresolved. As this chart illustrates, the model standards, particularly for general jurisdiction courts, are more stringent than the standards previously adopted by North Carolina. North Carolina has not adopted interim time standards.

North Carolina's Court Performance Management System (CPMS)²²

In 2001, as recommended by the State Judicial Council, Chief Justice I. Beverly Lake, Jr., adopted a trial court performance standards system developed by the NCSC. This system is designed to help trial courts identify and set guidelines for their operations, measure their performance, and make improvements to better meet the needs and expectations of the public.

In 2003 the State Judicial Council endorsed the development of five specific trial court case processing measures. Since then the AOC has developed, tested and implemented a web-based system that provides court officials with up-to-date data for three of those measures:

- Case clearance (cases disposed as a percentage of cases filed).
- On-time processing (percentage of cases disposed within time guidelines, based on those adopted by the Supreme Court in 1996).
- Aging case index/backlog (percentage of cases older than times listed in the guidelines).

The CPMS gathers current data (within one month) from the AOC's civil and criminal automated systems and organizes this data allowing for a search and query of the information, for various case types, in any county or district. The CPMS includes both the three percentage-based measures above, plus extensive statistical data, such as the disposition rate for Superior Court criminal or civil cases in a certain county in the past 12 months, or the backlog of all District Courts within the state.

The CPMS "help" pages provide more detailed information about future plans to enhance the CPMS with expanded case types and additional performance measures and statistics, which will eventually eliminate the need for the printing and distribution of paper management reports. The anticipated next two performance measures (subject to enhancements to automated systems) are the number of times a case is put on a court calendar before being disposed, and a measure that will be designed to assess collection of restitution. The CPMS is also an important factor in the planning and development of court technology and information systems.

According to the North Carolina AOC report, four of the eighteen Superior Courts disposed of more than 80% of their cases within the time standard, and seven disposed of less than two-thirds of their cases within the time standard. Few District Courts disposed of less than 50% of their misdemeanors within the time standards.

Many of the stakeholders interviewed for this report were unaware of North Carolina's current overall time standards, and there was considerable divergence in opinion regarding their utility. Concerns included how the results might be interpreted by those outside the courts, as well as their overall usefulness in managing individual caseloads.

Post-Judgment Issues with Criminal Cases

Most of the emphasis in caseflow management has been on achieving reasonable times to disposition. Increasingly, courts are also looking at how the post-judgment phase can be better managed. Post-judgment issues with criminal cases include enforcement of sentence terms and orders of probation, as well as the appeals and post-conviction process. Few, if any, states have established post-judgment time standards in criminal cases.

²² <http://www1.aoc.state.nc.us/cpms/login.do>.

Application of the Principle in North Carolina

It was noted during interviews with North Carolina stakeholders that problems with court transcription resources are contributing to delay in the post-judgment period. This issue has arisen in other states where problems with the availability of qualified personnel to prepare transcripts or restrictions on third party transcription have created delay.

The Current Caseload in North Carolina's Trial Courts

As stated before, it is impossible to describe the current landscape in North Carolina because the courts are not using a single, consistent definition of a case. This makes it impossible to accurately provide the number of case filings, the number of cases resolved within time standards, the number of cases resolved by trial, by plea, or by dismissal; or to compare the North Carolina courts with each other or with courts in other states. It is crucial that the North Carolina Judiciary make sure that all courts in the state use a single definition of a case when entering information into the case management system or generating reports or workload or backlog. This is a crucial first step to examining and then improving caseload management in the trial courts.

The following information on caseload filing and disposition is provided to the Committee in this report because it is the best information available. NCSC cautions the Commission to not make any decisions based on this information other than a decision to take steps to ensure the future commissions will be able to review accurate and consistent data.

This report uses a number of measures to define the current landscape: case filings, case dispositions, clearance rates, time to disposition, age of pending cases, and trial date certainty.

District Court – non-traffic cases
18,192 were disposed by trial
162,821 were disposed by plea
13,199 were dismissed with leave to re-file
264,360 were dismissed without leave
16,034 were dismissed after deferred prosecution
115,471 – Other

The number of dismissals is extraordinarily large compared to other states. NCSC assumes, but has not attempted to verify, that the reason for this variance is that a defendant may, in some districts, be charged with four offenses which are counted as four separate cases. A defendant then pleads guilty to one offense with an agreement that the other three offenses will be dismissed, and that court then reports one case disposed by plea and three dismissed. It is common in other states to count dispositions as the AOC defines a case: one disposition by plea.

This creates a problem because it is in the interest of promoting justice for the public to know how many defendants that are arrested and are detained pre-trial are subsequently cleared of all charges by the prosecutor or by the court, or who are “cleared” of some charges as long as they plead guilty to one charge.

Similarly, it is important to know how many cases go to trial and to compare that number with other courts in North Carolina and across the country. NCSC research has found a general downward trend in the percentage of cases which actually go to trial, with no more than one to five percent of criminal misdemeanor cases going to trial nationally.²⁴ This is the case in North Carolina as well, where only a small number of cases were actually disposed of by trial last year.

Clearance Rates

One of the indicators of court caseflow performance is represented by the following NCSC CourTools measure:

CourTool 2: Clearance Rates – The number of outgoing cases as a percentage of the number of incoming cases.

The case clearance measure relates to the court’s success at resolving as many cases as are filed. For example, if during the time period being measured, 100 cases were filed and 98 were disposed, the case clearance measure is 98% (98/100). This is an important tool for courts that are resolving cases timely and do not have backlogs, as this could signal that the court may be starting to accumulate a backlog.

The North Carolina clearance rate in FY2014 was greater than 100% for all case types. This in no way should be interpreted to mean that North Carolina is providing timely justice.

- Because not all courts in North Carolina define a case as a defendant, a clearance rate of greater than 100 % does not necessarily mean that the court is resolving all cases for as many defendants as are being charged.
- Because cases in North Carolina’s courts may currently be delayed, resolving as many or even more cases as those filed does not mean that they are being resolved timely. A 100% clearance rate can be used by a court and the criminal justice community to justify the status quo.

Time to Disposition and Age of Pending Cases

Time to disposition is a CourTool measure that provides information on a court's ability to provide timely resolution of disputes:

CourTool 3: Time to Disposition – The percentage of cases disposed or otherwise resolved within established time frames.

If North Carolina consistently counted cases in accordance with the AOC's definition, the CourTool would enable comparison with other courts in the state and with state or national guidelines for timely case processing.

Many states have adopted recommended time guidelines similar to those established by the American Bar Association in 1992,²⁵ more recently updated as the Model Time Standards. The 98% threshold in the model time standards is an acknowledgment that even under the best of circumstances, some cases will remain unresolved. As the comparative table of time guidelines illustrates, the model standards, particularly for general jurisdiction courts, are more stringent than the standards previously adopted by North Carolina.

Another performance measure relating to case age is the age of active pending cases:

CourTool 4: Age of Active Pending Caseload – The age of pending active cases on which court action can be taken.

Pending cases are those that have been filed but not disposed. An accurate inventory of pending cases as well as information about their age and status helps the court manage pending matters by identifying overall trends and identifying specific cases which may be exceeding time guidelines so that action can be taken to resolve them. Typically, courts will produce reports that calculate the time, in days, from filing to the date of the report. Overall results can be reviewed, along with a detailed report listing open cases chronologically, beginning with the oldest pending case. Most states also report individual cases that are over time guidelines for judges to review and take action on those cases, if necessary.

Detailed information provided by the AOC regarding the age of both disposed and pending cases by prosecutorial district is provided in tables found in Appendix D. These tables detail the average age of cases which are pending and disposed over a two-year period by prosecutorial district. The following table summarizes the range of case age for both disposed and pending cases for the prior two years:

Fiscal Year	Range of Age of Disposed Cases	Range of Age of Pending Cases
2013	145 - 419	129 - 455
2014	126 - 496	149 - 374

Table 2: Range of Superior Felony Case Age (in days) by Prosecuting District - Last Two Years

The summary table illustrates the wide range of results between the North Carolina judicial districts. While it is helpful to know that in 2014 some cases took as long as 496 days to resolve, or that some cases were pending for as long as 374 days; this information alone is not helpful. Because the courts define and report cases differently, the summary table does not provide information on how many persons are awaiting disposition in each prosecutorial district. Additionally, North Carolina has set goals for disposition within 120, 180, 365 and 540 days. It would be more helpful to understand the nature of the backlog and to compare courts within the state for courts to accurately and consistently report the number of pending cases within each of those time intervals.

The reasons for district differences in the time to disposition may be the result of a variety of factors, including prosecutorial philosophy, availability of judicial resources, scheduling practices, continuance policies, etc. There does not appear to be any clear relationship between the workload of the court and age of pending or disposed cases based on the data available for fiscal years 2013 and 2014.

Trial Date Certainty

The fifth CourTool performance measure relating to caseflow management looks at the efficiency of trial scheduling practices:

CourTool 5: Trial Date Certainty – The number of cases resolved by trial or scheduled for trial.

A court's ability to hold trials on the date they are scheduled is another indicator of caseflow management effectiveness. The measure is calculated by identifying all cases disposed by trial during a given time period, and determining how many times the trial event has been set for each case. By identifying specific cases in which trials were continued the court can further investigate the reasons for delay and take steps to remedy them.

In the NCSC's experience working with numerous jurisdictions, there can be a variety of internal and external factors that cause trial certainty problems. Internal court factors include lack of judicial resources (often due to trial overscheduling), a shortage of jurors, and unavailability of special resources such as interpreters or court reporters. External factors are similar to those that cause delay in general, including lack of preparation by parties, witness availability, delays with exchange of discovery, etc. The unpredictability of trial scheduling causes many courts to schedule a large number of trials on a given day and time, knowing that most will resolve beforehand but with the expectation that a small number will proceed and therefore not leave judges with empty calendars.

One important way to promote trial date certainty is to be realistic in setting trial calendars. This can be accomplished by using data on outcomes of recent trial settings or status conferences to anticipate the percentage of cases set for trial that may be resolved and that must be continued (even under a firm policy limiting continuances), while still trying and disposing enough cases to meet both case clearance goals and time standards.²⁶ As noted previously, the overwhelming number of cases never go to trial, so efforts dedicated to trial readiness should also include techniques to improve the probability of a timely non-trial resolution.

With the practice of scheduling all hearings after the first appearance as trials (as NCSC learned occurs in Wake County District Court) it is no surprise that trial date certainty does not exist in North Carolina. Courts should set cases for trial only after it has been found in an administrative setting or at a status conference that discovery is complete, that all motions that need to be resolved pre-trial have been filed and decided, and that all witnesses are available.

Information Needed for North Carolina to Know Whether its Trial Courts Are Achieving Timely Resolution of Criminal Cases

Quality information is critical for knowing whether courts are achieving timely resolution of cases, whether any injustice is resulting from delay and whether changes need to be made to enhance the effectiveness of the court's caseflow management program.

As stated above, as a first step to having quality information, North Carolina must ensure that all courts use a single definition of a case when entering data into the case management system and when counting filings, pending cases and dispositions.

North Carolina needs to gather accurate information in order to determine the extent of delay in the trial courts. Current reports give a sense of the delay – median time and number of cases not disposed within time standard goals – but they do not provide information on whether some cases are so delayed that they cause injustice to the defendants or victims, nor do the reports give any indication on the causes of that delay.

- Courts do report median time to disposition, but the median time could be influenced by the number of cases resolved at the first appearance. Reports do not make it easy for the DA or the Court to determine how many cases are older than two or four times the time standard or longer.
- There are no reports on how many of the courts' cases involve pre-trial detained defendants, and in particular how many defendants are detained in the county jail for longer than the time standard.
- There are no reports on how many detained defendants have had all their charges dismissed, nor how long they were detained while awaiting the dropped charges.
- There are no reports on the sentence imposed on pre-trial detainees who are eventually convicted and whether that sentence is greater than the time served as a detainee.
- There are no reports on the number of detainees who plead guilty to charges that they did not commit solely because they could not financially or emotionally afford to remain in the county jail.
- There are no reports on the number or type of hearings set per case, the number or type of hearings held, the number of hearings continued, nor the reason for the continuance.
- There are no reports on the wait time between the time that the defendant, attorneys, witnesses and victims are told the case is scheduled for hearing and the time that the case is actually called for hearing.

Inventory of Pending Cases

Judges, prosecutors and court clerks need to know the inventory of pending cases. To schedule cases and to be able to report on the court's inventory, DAs and courts must be able to identify and report:

- The status and age of each individual case. Does the case need a status conference/administrative setting, a motion hearing, or a trial date?
- Court caseload and performance information such as clearance rates, the number of pending cases, the age of disposed cases, the number of cases older than the time disposition goal, the number of cases twice and three times as old as the time disposition goal, the number of hearings set per case, and the number of continuances in the case.

While automation is not a pre-requisite to caseflow management, the existence of an electronic case management system that includes the ability to track cases, events, and dispositions provides the most efficient way to monitor performance. Useful information for case management includes the following:

For each case:

- Its current status.
 - Is the case active, or has an order for arrest been issued?
- The detention status of the defendant.
- The last scheduled event and date.
- The next event and date.
- The number of times that the case has been scheduled for a hearing.
- The number of hearings actually held.
- The number of times a case has been continued, and the reasons behind the continuances.
- The age of the case at disposition.

For all cases at the court:

- The number and type of cases filed in a time period.
- The number, type and age of cases disposed of in a time period.
- The number, type and age of cases pending each next meaningful event.
- The number of cases continued prior to a scheduled trial date and on a scheduled trial date and the reasons for those continuances.

Both aggregate and case-specific information should be available for judges and court managers to assess overall program performance and to manage individual cases effectively. Judging from the information provided by the AOC for this report, some of this information appears to be available, though a great deal of this information is unavailable.

Interest by Stakeholders in Improving Caseflow Management

The issue of prosecutorial control over setting of calendars was prominent during the interviews. District attorneys believe the current system can work and note that the law provides safeguards and priority to older cases. With judges rotating through districts, they note that the district attorneys are the most consistent element of caseflow management. They also observed that good case management depends on the expectations of judges, regardless of who sets the calendar or preparation by all parties involved. The perceptions of defense counsel are quite different. They question whether the system is really a “level playing field” since the district attorney can potentially keep cases off the docket to put pressure on the defense. It was apparent from the conversations that the philosophy and approach of the district attorney may be a determining factor in successful caseflow management. Several participants noted that regular meetings and communication have helped facilitate better calendar control and coordination. In a limited number of courts, most prominently Mecklenburg County, the court administrator’s office plays a key role in managing the calendar. Calendar management by court support staff, such as court administrators, clerk’s office or judicial assistants, is more typical in other states.

In terms of reasons for delays noted during the interviews, practitioners (district attorneys and defense counsel) noted many of the same reasons. External factors such as difficulty in obtaining timely lab reports and incomplete investigative information top the list. Lack of preparation by opposing counsel was also cited. These factors, along with overscheduling of cases and schedule conflicts for attorneys are contributing to high rates of continuances. At least one district attorney who participated in the interviews has developed an internal system for tracking continuances and the reasons for delay. Another noted that his assistants regularly report the outcome of case events for better management. From the perspective of magistrates, missed court dates by defendants is another factor. They attribute this to defendant’s having to call in for a court date, as well as problems that attorneys have in contacting their clients early in the court process.

Whatever the reason, there was general agreement among all the interviewees directly involved in case processing that delay is a significant problem. It was noted that more rural counties where judicial rotations are less frequent may experience greater delay, although some courts have allowed criminal matters to be set on a civil session day if needed, and in some courts district court judges have been authorized to take superior court pleas. Magistrates cited delays in blood kit processing for DUI offenders and the limited number of misdemeanor probation violation hearing dates in some courts (which results in defendants sitting in jail while waiting for a hearing) as significant issues. Magistrates suggested that the expanded use of video conferencing capabilities could reduce delay in certain situations.

There were mixed responses to the utility of time guidelines and performance measures among those interviewed. There is a perception among some that time guidelines may focus too much on processing cases efficiently at the expense of quality. Defense attorneys were more in favor of implementing time guidelines than their counterparts in prosecution. Some courts are regularly looking at case data to manage calendars and continuances, though they are likely the exception. There appears to be very little awareness of the existence of the North Carolina time guidelines, although individual courts have adopted time standards as part of a caseflow management plan. Court administrators were particularly critical of the lack of reporting tools for management.

Problems with data quality and lack of case tracking tools were noted by judges and administrative personnel. Court Services staff acknowledged that there are often inconsistencies in the recording of dispositions and entering counts, and that a standard for bills of indictment is needed to obtain more accurate figures. In terms of case management reports, Court Services staff noted that the number of continuances granted can be recorded and that filters are available in the current system for district attorneys to track case age. Clerks also noted that they are able to track continuances if necessary.

Overall, those interviewed acknowledged that delay is a significant problem. There is agreement that there are a number of systemic issues that need to be addressed, and that better local communication and collaboration is an effective strategy to improve criminal case management, along with better tools and more accurate data. There remains disagreement over the issue of prosecutorial control of calendars, and the utility of performance measures, specifically time guidelines.

Potential Benefits of Improved Criminal Case Management

Cost Savings

In the post-recession era, legislative bodies are particularly keen to reduce the cost of providing government services. Several recent analyses reviewed by the NCSC in the preparation of this report provided insight on areas where savings might be realized by other agencies through more efficient management of criminal dockets.

Effective caseflow management practices can reduce costs in several areas. Jurisdictions that have successfully implemented caseflow management practices have achieved cost savings by, for example:

- Reducing the cost of pretrial detention by reducing the length of time that defendants are jailed while they await resolution of their cases. As previously stated, to measure cost savings in North Carolina, the court must know and be able to report the number and age of pending cases with detained defendants. An effective case management system using differentiated case tracking can establish reduced time standards for cases involving detainees and can expedite scheduling of their cases.

- Reducing the cost and safety risks of transporting detainees to court for unproductive hearings.
- Reducing taxpayer dollars spent on judges, prosecutors, public defenders, and court reporters and court personnel at unproductive events. As previously stated, an effective case management system will result in fewer case settings per case and fewer continuances.
- Reducing the number of failure to appear bench warrants and related cost to law enforcement due to shorter time between court events and greater event predictability.
- Reducing clerical time and costs spent making docket entries and sending notices to parties by reducing the number of scheduled hearings and eliminating unnecessary continuances.
- Saving witness costs, including those related to police overtime through reduced waiting times and continuances.
- More efficient coordination of individuals and tasks associated with complicated cases by completing early screening to allocate sufficient time and resources to resolve them.

In addition, effective caseflow management practices can save victims, defendants and their families the costs associated with taking off from work and traveling to the courthouse to attend a hearing, as well as the cost of defendants paying legal fees for private counsel.

While the research is dated, in the early 1980's the National Institute of Justice funded a study of the cost of continuances to prosecution and defense agencies and witnesses in felony and misdemeanor cases. The study included courts in North Carolina, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Researchers found that continuances added 12 to 24 percent more work to each prosecution or public defense agency. In fiscal year 1983/84, this increase translated into additional labor costs ranging from $78,000 to $1.1 million at the time. Although the dollar amounts are likely to be quite different today, the finding that continuances are quite costly would not be different.²⁷

The NCSC's Vice President for External Affairs, Jesse Rutledge, summarized some of the recent findings regarding public satisfaction with the courts nationally. He noted that previous surveys confirmed that citizens often believe that the legal system takes too long and costs too much overall. In the most recent assessment of satisfaction, focus group participants expressed their belief that there is collusion in the judicial process, particularly by attorneys, to defer or delay court decisions. Participants also expressed concerns that the financial interests of some parties work against the efficient administration of justice.²⁸

The 2015 joint Elon University and High Point University poll of citizen confidence in public institutions, completed for the Commission's Public Trust and Confidence Committee, sheds light on the public perception of the North Carolina courts and other institutions.²⁹ Public confidence in North Carolina is quite high regarding the local police or sheriff, with 81% of those surveyed expressing the opinion that they are "somewhat or very confident" in this local institution. North Carolina State Courts followed with nearly 66% of respondents stating they were "somewhat or very confident" in this state institution.

²⁹Elon University (2015). Elon University Poll. Accessed May 28, 2016 at: <http://www.elon.edu/web/elonpoll/111915.xhtml>.

Approximately 40% indicated that they believe people “usually” receive a fair outcome when they deal with the court, and a small percentage (3%) answered “always.”

Many respondents to the Elon/High Point poll perceive that wealthy individuals and white residents receive better treatment by the state courts than do black or Hispanic residents, low-income defendants, or those without a lawyer. Further, more than half of the respondents believe people without attorneys, low-income people, and those who don’t speak English receive somewhat or far worse treatment than others in the court system.

While the impact of delay on the public may be difficult to quantify and link directly to public opinion, individuals who appear in court as parties, witnesses, and victims are certainly impacted by delay. The NCSC has noted that one of the most frequent responses to public satisfaction surveys are concerns about starting court on time and complaints about the amount of time it takes to resolve cases. Many studies have concluded that these perceptions are important to the overall level of trust and confidence that the public places in courts as institutions.

An effective caseflow management program will result in timely resolution of criminal cases and will enable the DA and the courts to document that timely resolution. This, over time, will enhance public trust and confidence in the courts.

A Rubric for North Carolina to Engage in Statewide Caseflow Management Improvement

Accomplishing Effective Implementation – A Cultural Shift

For a number of reasons identified below, even when judges, DA’s and defense counsel agree that the status quo is not working and that change is needed to effectuate more fair and timely resolution of court cases, accomplishing change in the courts is often difficult.

NCSC research related to legal culture suggests that the organizational character of courts inhibits judges from reaching consensus on obtaining a more active role in the management of criminal cases. Lack of agreement on the judicial role in managing cases underlies the long-standing research problem of what explains substantial differences in criminal case processing times among courts. Explanations that seem obvious, such as workloads and resources, have not been found to consistently impact resolution.³⁰ Rather, it appears that the broader concept of court culture is a driving force.

Finally, achieving even minimal coordination among judges, prosecutors, law enforcement, and criminal defense attorneys is for some court leaders a substantial departure from the traditional way of doing business. This may be in part rooted in the adversarial nature of the system, in which the court remains neutral while prosecutors are committed to the protection of society and defense attorneys to the protection of their client’s constitutional rights. However, this view fails to recognize the mutual interest in the fair and timely resolution of criminal cases shared by all participants in the process. Collaboration between all concerned institutions and leaders is critical to successful case management.

Key Steps

Numerous states have engaged in statewide efforts of improving caseflow management systems. The approaches have varied to some extent and have depended on the degree of court unification and the role of the administrative office in each state. Some states have already been through several iterations of caseflow planning, revising and updating plans concurrent with revisions to time guidelines. It is important to note that the improvement of caseflow management is an ongoing process in which continuous feedback is necessary to assess the effectiveness of new approaches and to account for inevitable changes in statutes and operational practices. Courts must compile, analyze and continually monitor case information, such as the data identified elsewhere in this report, before making necessary modifications to improve results. Notwithstanding the various approaches taken across the country, there are several key steps outlined below that are typically followed by states engaging in caseflow management improvement efforts.

Adopt or Modify Time Standards/Performance Measures

Whether to begin a statewide effort with the adoption of time and performance standards or delay adopting such standards until more is known about the existing state of caseflow management is a chicken and egg question. Many states have employed published performance measures as a first step and proceeded to develop information and programs to help courts meet the standards. Others have delayed creating or updating time standards pending the collection of background data to assess the current state of caseflow management.

The threshold question is whether information systems can provide sufficiently accurate and reliable information to enable courts and the AOC to determine with reasonable confidence the age and status of criminal cases. Since North Carolina already has published time standards, one approach might be to assess how courts currently stack up against the existing standards before deciding what direction to take with regards to a revised set of standards.

As stated earlier, the court must have confidence that data is reliable before it engages in a process to adopt, implement and monitor compliance with time standards. The Judicial Branch must first make sure that all districts consistently use a definition of a case established by the AOC. This will require leadership and oversight by the Chief Justice, a revived Judicial Council, the Senior Resident Superior Court Judges, and the Chief District Court Judges.

In terms of general performance measures, the NCSC's CourTools are a good starting point for developing quality performance measures. The measurement process and recommended instruments in CourTools are based on a self-administered format with instructions and suggested report forms. The AOC's Court Performance Management System has already implemented a web-based system that provides information on the following three of CourTools' ten performance measures:

- Case clearance rate.
- On-time processing (percent disposed within 1996 time guidelines).
- Aging case index (cases pending over time guidelines).

As noted in the next section, data is gathered in the AOC's criminal automated system and can be searched by case type, county, or district. Additional statistical data, such as the disposition rate for superior court criminal cases by county in the past 12 months, and district court backlogs are also available.

The measures found in the NCSC's CourTools suite are by no means exclusive. The Judicial Council (or other body) and the AOC could also adopt other measures that have been developed as part of the original Trial Court Performance Standards or develop in-house measures and standards to meet local needs. These could include measuring some of the cost-related factors mentioned in this report such as juror utilization and jail and prisoner transport costs. Appendix F provides an extensive listing of criminal caseflow benchmarks and indicators.

The AOC and a revived Judicial Council (or a new multi-disciplinary body) should review the data and information needs identified in this report and develop new measures to capture and analyze the effectiveness of scheduling practices in resolving cases within established time standards.

Collect Information on Current Practices and Conditions

It may be that some North Carolina districts are substantially better than others when it comes to timely resolution. Interviews with stakeholders (i.e. those in Mecklenburg and Wake County) in connection with this report revealed that judges, prosecutors, and defense attorneys are already involved in innovative and successful approaches to managing criminal cases that may be appropriate for wider application. Identifying and sharing best practices, including the circumstances under which they appear to be most effective, is an essential step in implementing a plan. For example, as part of its caseflow management improvement effort, the North Dakota Court Administrator's Office surveyed judges and district administrators regarding successful practices that are already in place and shared this information on a special project web site.

In addition to looking at best practices within the state, lessons also can be learned from other jurisdictions. From 2011 through 2014, the NCSC conducted over 20 training and technical assistance projects across the country funded by the Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA). One project specifically targeted felony caseflow management, and the NCSC worked with courts to identify and resolve felony caseflow issues. The results of successful caseflow management practices and strategies documented during the project are summarized in Appendix E.

The Supreme Court and the AOC should consider requesting technical assistance from the NCSC or another court organization to help North Carolina develop and implement a caseflow management plan. State Justice Institute funds may be available to help reduce the cost to North Carolina's budget.

Identify Additional Information Needs

As discussed above, accurate and timely information is essential to both the management of individual cases and overall policy. The AOC's current information systems supporting record keeping, calendaring and financial management appear to have been developed incrementally and are falling short of user expectations and needs. The AOC is currently engaged in a "gap analysis" to assess current and future automation capabilities. Future opportunities to capture and utilize performance-related information should be included in this analysis.

Realizing that an overhaul of judicial branch information systems is a long-term project, for the time being efforts should focus on getting the best data possible from the current systems. This includes improving the consistency of data entry across jurisdictions by establishing clear definitions for "cases" and disposition types (i.e. dismissed by DA, dismissed by court, guilty or not guilty by bench or jury trial, plea to the original charge or to an amended charge). This will enable courts to count case settings, hearing types, continuances and reasons for the continuances, and to capture and report on the age and detainee status of pending cases.

Plans are already underway to improve performance measure reporting. As noted on the AOC web site, the current version is scaled-down to introduce the system to court officials, and with their input, improvements will be implemented. Some of the enhancements under consideration include:³¹

- Counting criminal cases with the defendant (or incident) as the unit of measure, rather than each charge (there can be many related charges against the same defendants in different cases, and now these related cases are counted as several cases, instead of just one).
- Aging criminal cases in superior court from the time of original arrest or service of process rather than the time of transfer to superior court.
- Including workload measures for cases in post-disposition status, especially criminal “motions for appropriate relief” and probation violation proceedings, as post-conviction activity comprises a considerable workload for court officials.
- Expanding the display of statistical data (numbers of cases) and eventually eliminating the printing and distribution of paper “management” reports (data on manners of disposition is the principal type of statistical data not yet in the CPMS, but that data is currently in printed reports).
- Removing cases from pending status in appropriate circumstances, such as when a deferred prosecution is being given a chance to work. This will not allow these cases, which can become “old” for good reason, to inappropriately skew or increase overall aging data.
- Adding measures that have already been approved by the judicial branch, but for which automated systems must be enhanced; including the number of times a case is calendared before being tried, as well as the total amount of restitution recovered for victims compared to the amount ordered.
- Breaking down the existing case categories into more specific case types.

These improvements, along with capturing additional data identified in this report, will resolve many of the current issues with data reliability that impact performance measurement and expand into the area of post-judgment performance management.

Establish and Evaluate Pilot Projects

Pilot projects allow courts to test new policies and procedures before engaging in a major change effort. They allow policy makers to try various options, identify costs and benefits, and determine obstacles to implementation. Pilots can serve as a testing ground to evaluate efficiency and effectiveness, and can be applied on a broader basis if proven to be successful. An essential element of implementing change is obtaining support and consensus about both the need for improvement and the solutions that will be effective.

Pilot projects help in the early stages of reform by providing visible examples of how new methods of work can be effective and beneficial. In some cases, courts may need to be granted temporary authorization to implement procedures that are not currently specified by law. For example, in the mid-1990s the Michigan Supreme Court authorized the cross assignment of judges to temporarily create pilot projects to test the impact of court unification. The results of this effort eventually lead to legislation that allowed local consolidation plans.

³¹ Source: <http://www1.aoc.state.nc.us/cpms/pages/help/FuturePlans.jsp> Accessed June 11, 2016.

The IDS report³² on scheduling noted that there was considerable interest among survey respondents in pilot testing a new district court scheduling system. Given the close relationship of this study to caseflow management in general, there is likely similar interest in establishing pilot projects for caseflow management. In addition, the AOC has relied in the past on the pilot approach to roll out changes to technology and is therefore in a good position to manage this process.

Many of the individuals interviewed for this report emphasized that “one size doesn’t fit” all jurisdictions and accordingly, any effort to implement a statewide program should take this into account. This is where careful thought as to the selection of pilot projects and assessment of existing best practices is needed.

Review/Modify Existing Court Rules, Statutes, and Procedures

Improving case management often requires a re-assessment of existing court rules and statutes. Typically, recommendations for changes will follow an assessment of pilot projects or other means of identifying where existing language either impedes case management or where additional language would provide better clarity or authority. In addition, some changes may be called for in existing work flows and procedures. Often, efforts to improve case management will identify procedural bottlenecks or problems with forms that can be easily remedied. As the AOC considers the development or purchase of next generation case management software, opportunities may exist to improve the efficiency of case processing through functionality that allows better monitoring and management of case events.

Develop Caseflow Management Planning Templates and Resources

One tool that has been successful in many courts is a local caseflow management plan. A good example of a comprehensive plan is Mecklenburg County’s plan, which was developed by a careful analysis of caseflow management data and implemented through a series of stakeholder reviews.³³ Caseflow management plans are most effective when they are developed with input from the individuals and agencies impacted by the plan, such as prosecutors, the defense bar, law enforcement, and corrections officials.

While the court should take the lead in developing the plan, it should be done in a collaborative environment. Plans should also be periodically reviewed, particularly when significant changes in court rules or statutes that impact case processing occur or there are changes in organizational leadership. A benefit of this process, which should be an ongoing effort, is that in many jurisdictions this will be the first time that all criminal justice system actors have come together to focus on improving the judicial process.

Plans are often adopted as local administrative orders. To achieve greater consistency across the state, the North Carolina Supreme Court should ask the AOC to create plan templates for courts to follow. A template may specify elements that should be contained in every plan, while allowing flexibility for each court to develop language that meets local needs. The following are examples of elements found in criminal caseflow plans across the country:

- Case assignment and scheduling.

- Continuance policies.
- Status or scheduling conferences.
- Motions practices.
- Discovery.
- Diversion.
- Probation violations.
- Time standards.
- Meetings and consultations.

A number of plans from other states are available from the NCSC.

Finalize Reporting and Information Requirements

Any changes or enhancements to reports and other information should be tested before being finalized. In many cases, an unintended consequence of paying greater attention to case reports is the discovery of problems with data quality. The problems most frequently encountered in electronic case management systems are due to clerical errors, such as incorrect date or event entry and failure to close out cases. These kinds of problems typically cause inaccurate case age and disposition counts. Audits and other checks should be performed by the clerk or court to identify errors that impact the reliability of reports.

Decisions regarding who should receive reports, and how often, will need to be made. Caseflow management reports generally fall into one of two broad categories, aggregate and other reports. Aggregate reports provide information on overall trends and conditions, such as clearance rate, time to disposition, and pending inventories statewide and by district. Other reports are designed for the management of individual cases, such as listings of pending cases and cases over time guidelines. Again, the future case management system should be designed with caseflow management information and reporting needs in mind.

Additionally, thought should be given to how performance reports will be monitored and whether any follow up will be conducted to assist jurisdictions where potential problems are indicated. This could be the function of the Senior Resident Judges, the Chief Judges, the AOC and the District Attorney's Office.

Provide Training and Technical Assistance

To ensure consistent adoption of new policies and approaches, education and technical assistance can improve the sustainability of a statewide effort. The AOC Court Services division currently provides assistance to courts around the state, primarily trouble-shooting and training on current applications. With additional qualified staff resources, this office could perform several functions as part of a statewide roll out, including monitoring pilot projects, offering technical assistance, providing resources, and collection and follow-up of performance reports.

There are a number of resources and tools available to help individual courts assess current caseflow management effectiveness, which are available from the Bureau of Justice Assistance and NCSC:

- Improving Caseflow Management: A Brief Guide
<http://cdm16501.contentdm.oclc.org/cdm/ref/collection/ctadmin/id/1022>

In addition, the NCSC has over twenty presentations and technical assistance reports created as a result of a three-year BJA funded project to improve felony caseflow management. Appendix G includes two examples of training program agendas from the project. One of those programs in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, included a broad range of local criminal justice professionals, such as prosecutors, defense counsel, judges and court clerks. The second program in Williamsburg, Virginia, focused on judges and court administrative staff and was designed to help participants develop a caseflow management action plan for their jurisdictions.

Feedback and technical assistance efforts in other states are often tied to regular caseflow management reports provided to the courts and monitored by the administrative office of courts. Trial court services divisions and/or regional administrative offices in many states provide direct technical assistance to courts in this area. The North Carolina AOC would need to assess whether this is a function that could be within the scope of Court Services' responsibilities. Additionally, as the primary training provider for the judiciary, the University of North Carolina School of Government may be engaged to incorporate caseflow management topics in training agendas for the judiciary.

Sustained Support through Leadership and Collaboration

It has been argued that successful reforms are 90% leadership and 10% management. Research and practical experience with caseflow management efforts, both at the state and local levels, is most successful when there is clear and sustained support from leadership. This includes a high-level endorsement by the Supreme Court as well as leadership and collaboration between prosecutors, local judges, and the defense bar.

Key Participants

Direction from judiciary leadership and participation by stakeholder representatives is essential throughout a project of this nature. North Carolina's unique combination of prosecutorial, judicial, and public defense services under one roof should facilitate overall coordination. The following major tasks are associated with a state-wide implementation along with key participants, based on NCSC's experience in other jurisdictions:

Project Oversight

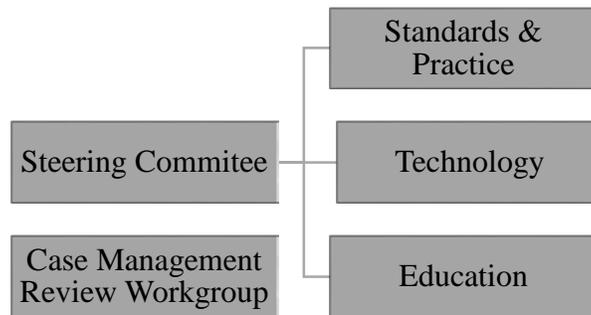

The Supreme Court should assign responsibility to the Judicial Council (or create a new steering committee or similar body) charged with the responsibility of overall project strategy and direction. The committee should be composed of high-level representatives from judicial branch agencies or organizations and the criminal justice community. For example:

- Supreme Court Justice or designee
- Director of the Administrative Office of the Courts or designee
- Trial Court Administrator

- Superior Court Judge
- District Court Judge
- Clerk of Court
- Prosecutor
- Public Defender
- Criminal defense bar
- Law enforcement officials

The committee may establish various working groups to address specific issues such as rule and statutory revisions, technology, communication and education. Participants in working groups will depend on the subject matter, and typically will include individuals with specific expertise or experience. Working groups will be involved in developing specific recommendations and action steps for approval by the steering committee.

As an example, the following is the organizational structure of an effort currently underway in the state of North Dakota to revise the current time guidelines and implement best practices in caseflow management. In this case, the project steering committee has appointed a primary workgroup to manage three topical sub-groups which are responsible for most of the work. The workgroup is responsible for managing project communications and has set up a website for this purpose. North Dakota's effort does not include pilot projects, although courts throughout the state have been asked for their input regarding best practices.

Project Management

An individual or office should be designated to act as project manager for the effort and should report directly to the steering committee. This position will work closely with the working groups, monitor pilot sites, manage the project budget, and provide general administrative support throughout the project. Typically, a staff person or unit from the administrative office of courts, such as a court services division, is designated for this purpose.

Evaluation

If a pilot project approach is taken, it is particularly important to have resources available for ongoing monitoring and evaluation. This is a function that could be managed by AOC staff along with the assistance of the University of North Carolina School of Government or similar external organization with research and evaluation experience. AOC technical staff will also need to be closely engaged with the evaluation of the pilot project.

Education and Training

The sustainability of this effort will be greatly enhanced by establishing a communication strategy throughout the project to educate the criminal justice community about the goals and intended outcomes. This also includes the development of caseflow management training resources for inclusion in programs for judges, clerks, prosecutors and defense counsel.

Suggested Timeline

The following is a hypothetical timeline for implementation of a statewide plan utilizing a pilot project approach to identify best practices over a two-year period:

ACTIVITY	Year 1				Year 2
Adopt or modify time standards/performance measures	■
Collect information on current practices and conditions	■
Identify additional information needs	■	■
Establish and evaluate pilot projects	■	■	■	■	■	■
Review/modify existing court rules, statutes, and procedures				■	■	■
Develop caseflow management planning templates and resources					■	■
Finalize reporting and information requirements					■	■
Provide training and technical assistance (ongoing)		■	■	■	■	■	■	■
Revise time standards (as needed)								■

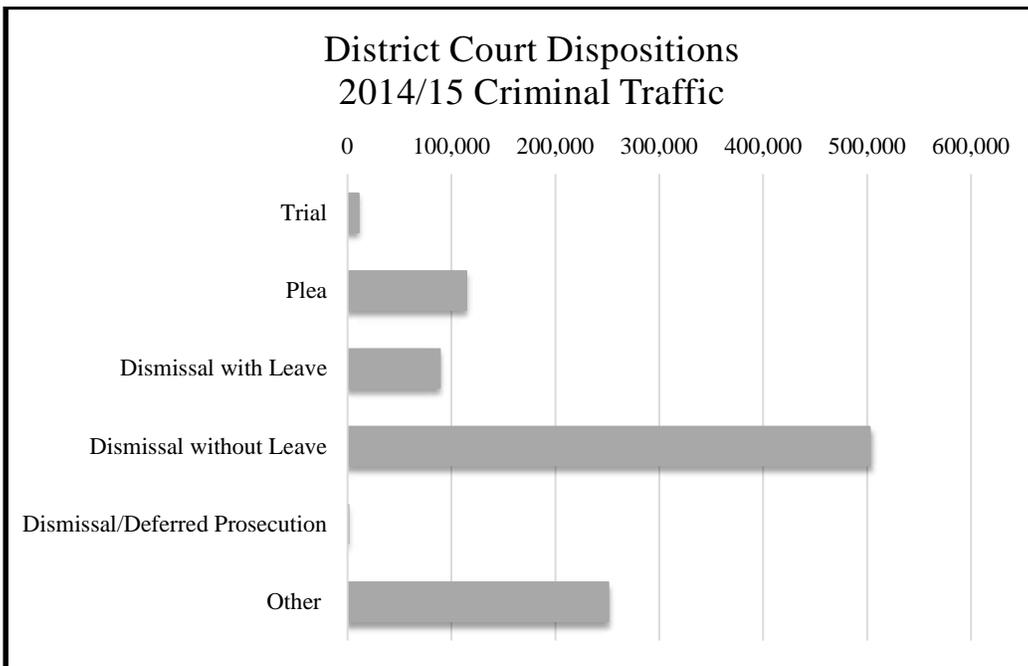

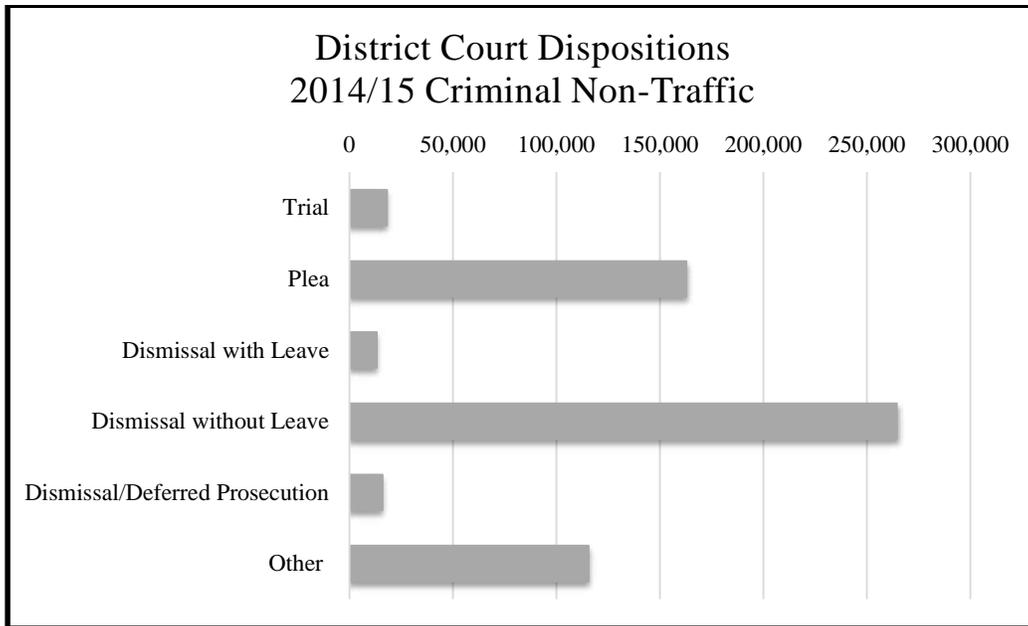

This timeline assumes the creation of pilot projects early in the effort and that changes to rules, statutes and procedures will be identified as a result of the lessons learned in the pilots. As the pilots wind down and receive a final evaluation after a year in operation, specific resource and informational needs can be finalized. This schedule includes an ongoing communication effort during the course of the project, along with the development of education and training materials that will become a standard part of the training curricula.

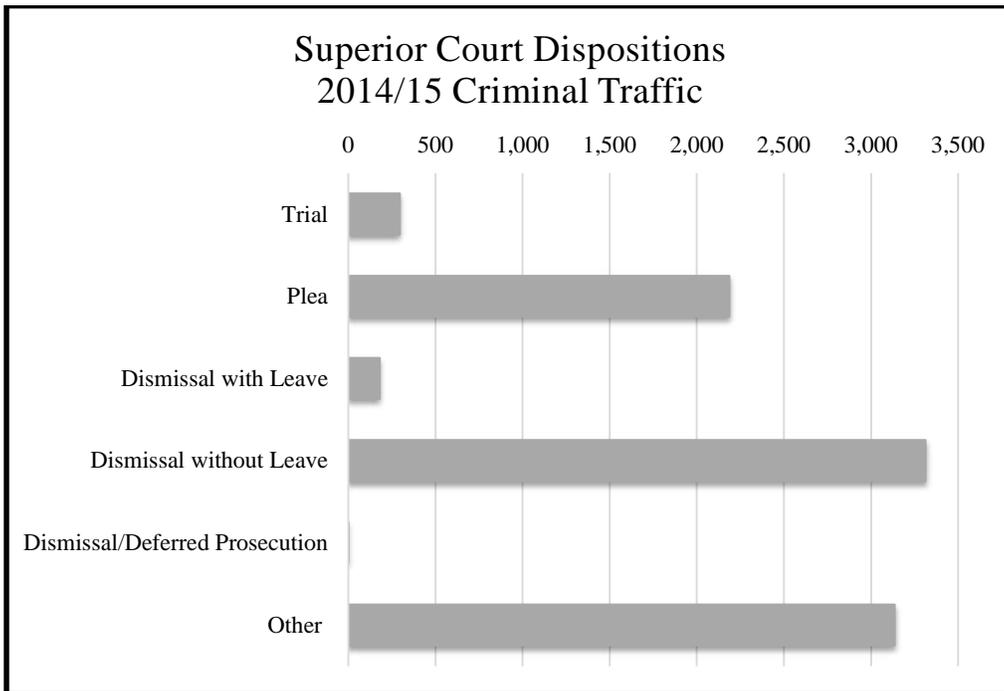

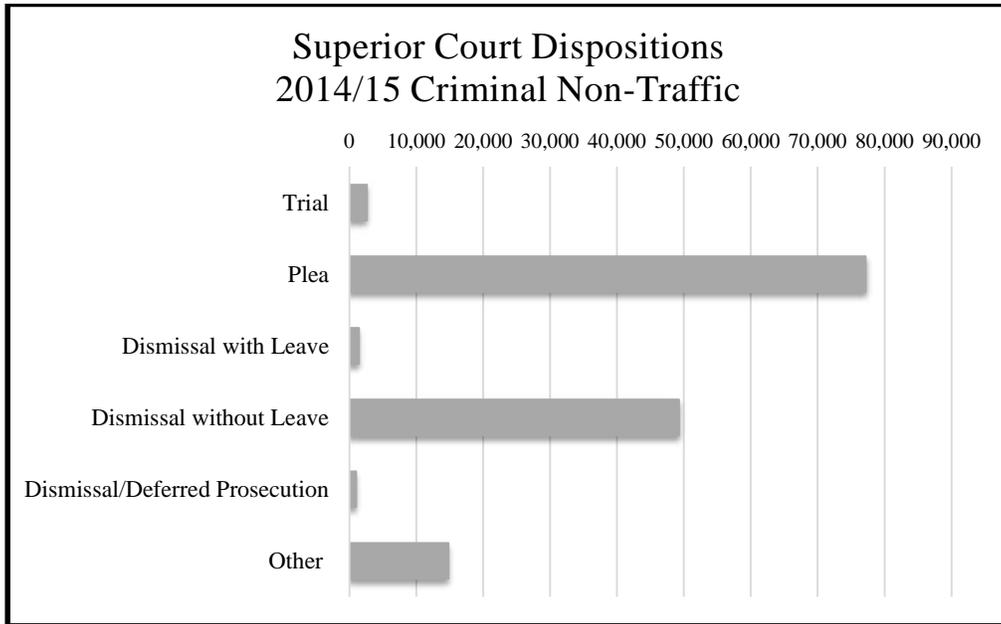

The actual timeline for deployment of a major caseflow management initiative will depend on a number of factors, including whether pilot projects are established before major changes are implemented, the time required to secure enabling legislation or changes to court rules, and the availability of additional staff resources to support the effort.

PRETRIAL JUSTICE
Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee
October 2016

PRETRIAL JUSTICE REFORM FOR NORTH CAROLINA

NCCALJ COMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION & ADJUDICATION REPORT

OCTOBER 2016

The Committee unanimously recommends that the Chief Justice appoint a Pretrial Justice Study Team (Study Team) to carry out a Pilot Project to implement and assess legal- and evidence-based pretrial justice practices. As used here, the term legal- and evidence-based pretrial justice practices refers to practices that comport with the law and that are driven by research. Such practices have been endorsed by many justice system stakeholder groups, including the Conference of Chief Justices; the Conference of State Court Administrators; the International Association of Chiefs of Police; the National Sheriffs' Association; the Association of Prosecuting Attorneys; the National Legal Aid and Defenders Association; the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers; the National Association of Counties; and the American Bar Association. Their use has been shown to produce excellent results. With one exception, legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices are not in place in North Carolina. Although one North Carolina jurisdiction—Mecklenburg County—has implemented some of these practices, all such practices are not in place in that jurisdiction and to date rigorous evaluation of their implementation has not been done. The Committee recommends implementing and evaluating the full range of legal- and evidence-based pretrial justice practices identified below in North Carolina through a Pilot Project in five to seven counties.

Background

After identifying pretrial justice reform as a top priority for its work, in February 2016, the Committee received an overview of how pretrial release currently works in North Carolina; heard from John Clark, senior manager, Technical Assistance, Pretrial Justice Institute (PJI) and a team of PJI experts about current research and developments in pretrial risk assessment and risk management; received a briefing on Mecklenburg County's experience with pretrial justice reform; and heard a briefing on the Commonwealth of Virginia's experience with the same. In the Spring of 2016, the Committee issued a Request for Expert Assistance on Pretrial Release Reform. Subsequently the Commission, through the National Center for State Courts, contracted with PJI to provide the requested assistance. Additionally, the Committee received and considered an 88-page response from the North Carolina Bail Agents Association, and heard from that Association's President and members at its October 2016 meeting.

Pilot Project

The recommended Pilot Project should include, at a minimum, the following legal- and evidence-based pretrial justice practices. All of these practices are discussed in more detail in the PJI report, from which much of this content is directly drawn.ⁱ

- The use of an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool by the magistrate and all subsequent decisionmakers. Implementing an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool is the keystone to a 21st century, legal and evidence-based pretrial release system. First, research demonstrates that such tools are highly effective in sorting defendants into categories showing their probabilities of success on pretrial release in terms of public safety and court appearance. Second, such tools can track any disparate impacts that might result through their use on racial and ethnic groups; if disparities arise, they can be easily identified, which is the first step in addressing them. Third, using an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool allows a jurisdiction to make valid comparisons between different types of release or specific conditions of release. Fourth, knowing the risk levels of defendants who are in jail helps a jurisdiction assess whether it is using its expensive jail resources for those who need to be there because of their risks. Fifth, knowing the risk levels of defendants coming through the system can help officials plan for, and justify to taxpayers, the resources needed to address the risks. Recognizing these benefits, at least seven states – Colorado, Delaware, Hawaii, Kentucky, New Jersey, Virginia, and West Virginia – have passed laws requiring the use of statewide empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tools. The Committee recommends use of the Arnold Foundation’s PSA-Court tool, in part because it already has been successfully implemented in Mecklenburg County, North Carolina.

- The development of a decision matrix to help magistrates and judges make pretrial release decisions. Once the risk assessment is completed on a defendant, the next step is to determine how to use that information to make a release/detention decision. Research is providing guidance on how to do that, matching identified risk levels with appropriate risk management strategies. For example, defendants who are found to be low risk have very high rates of success on pretrial release. Research has shown that these already high rates cannot be improved by imposing restrictive conditions of release on low risk defendants. Also, it must be recognized that although the charge may provide little information on a defendant’s risk to public safety or to fail to appear in court, the impact of new criminal activity or failing to appear on the more serious charge is perceived to be much greater. Therefore, many jurisdictions using empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tools have developed matrices that combine the risk level with charge types, for example, non-violent misdemeanor, violent misdemeanor, non-violent felony, and violent felony. The resulting intersection of the risk level and charge type produces a suggested release/detention decision. The decision itself remains within the discretion of the judge or magistrate after considering the risk assessment, the matrix, and any other relevant factors.
- The implementation of risk management strategies aimed at matching risk levels with the most appropriate level of support or supervision. Put another way: any conditions set on a defendant’s pretrial release should be related to the risk identified for that individual defendant.
- A constitutionally valid preventative detention procedure to ensure that wealthy defendants who present an unacceptable risk cannot secure release simply by paying a money bond.
- Encouraging use of criminal process that does not require arrest for low-risk defendants.
- Early involvement by the prosecutor and defense counsel in the setting of conditions of pretrial release.
- Procedures for timely review, in every case, by a judge or a magistrate’s pretrial release determination for in-custody defendants.
- Evaluation of a variety of conditions of pretrial release (including but not limited to: secured bonds, unsecured bonds, pretrial services, electronic monitoring, and court date reminder systems) for defendants based on their assessed risk.
- Training for all Pilot Project participants.
- Robust, uniform empirical evaluation of all components of the Pilot Project that takes into consideration the three goals of the pretrial release decision-making process: to provide reasonable assurance of the safety of the community; to provide reasonable assurance of appearance in court; and to maximize pretrial release.

- Recommendations by the Study Team regarding whether or not any of the components of the Pilot Project should be implemented more broadly or statewide.

The Committee recommends that the Study Team be chaired by a North Carolina judicial official and be supported by technical assistance from a well-regarded and nationally known entity in the field of pretrial justice reform as well as full-time administrative staff. In its first phase, the Study Team should identify, for the Director of the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts, any changes to statutes or court rules that are required to carry out the Pilot Study.

PREFACE

The North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice contracted, through the National Center for State Courts with the Pretrial Justice Institute (PJI) to produce a report containing evidence-based recommendations to improve North Carolina’s pretrial justice system.

The Pretrial Justice Institute is a market-driven organization that advances safe, fair and effective pretrial justice that honors and protects all people. We do this by monitoring the state of policy and practice across the states, convening communities of practice to reach common goals, communicating about the law and research to diverse groups of people, demonstrating that moving from resource- to risk-based decision-making is possible, and operating with business discipline.

Below are several terms that appear in this report, and definitions for how those terms are used.

Bail: Based on legal and historical research as well as accepted notions underlying pretrial social science research, “bail” is defined as a process of conditional pretrial release.¹ Technically, bail is not money. States should not be faulted for blurring the concepts of money (a condition of release) and bail (release) because for roughly 1,500 years, paying money (or giving up property before that) was the only condition used in England and America to provide reasonable assurance of court appearance. Nevertheless, recognizing that bail is not money helps states move forward in their efforts to improve pretrial justice without unnecessary confusion.

North Carolina defines bail as money, (G.S. 15A-531(4); G.S. 58-71-1(2)), but this definition does not appear to pose the major problems we see in other states, such as constitutional “right to bail” provisions. When trying to articulate the right that North Carolina defendants enjoy, however, at least some local pretrial release policies contain quotes from U.S. Supreme court opinions equating the “right to bail” with the “right to release” before trial and the “right to freedom before conviction.” Making sense of these and other statements made about bail throughout its history requires an understanding that bail means release.

At its core, pretrial justice is simply an attempt to release and detain the right defendants, using legal and evidence-based practices to create rational, fair, and transparent pretrial processes. Except when necessary to make some point, this report will mostly avoid using the word “bail” in favor of the term “release.” When the term bail is used, however, such as describing “money-based bail practices” or making various references to the bail literature, the reader should recognize that the authors define “bail” as a process of conditional pretrial release.

¹ Timothy R. Schnacke, Fundamentals of Bail: A Resource Guide for Pretrial Practitioners and a Framework for American Pretrial Reform, National Institute of Corrections, (2014), [hereinafter Fundamentals].

Empirically-derived risk assessment: A core element of evidence-based pretrial justice practices is the use of an objective risk assessment tool that has been constructed and tested on the basis of research demonstrating the tool’s success in sorting defendants into categories showing their probabilities of appearance in court and of completing the pretrial period without any arrests for new criminal activity. This paper uses the term “empirically-derived risk assessment” to describe such tools.

Legal and evidence-based practices: Legal and evidence-based practices are “interventions and practices that are consistent with the pretrial legal foundation, applicable laws, and methods research has proven to be effective in decreasing failures to appear in court and danger to the community during the pretrial stage. The term is intended to reinforce the uniqueness of the field of pretrial services and ensure that criminal justice professionals remain mindful that program practices are often driven by law and when driven by research, they must be consistent with the pretrial legal foundation and the underlying legal principles.”²

Secured bond: As used in this report, a secured bond is one that requires a financial condition be met before a defendant can be released from custody. That condition can be met by payment of the bond amount by the defendant or others (e.g., family or friends) or by guarantee of payment by a licensed commercial bail bonding company.

Unsecured bond: An unsecured bond is one in which the defendant pays no money to the court in order to be released, but is liable for the full amount of the bond upon his or her failure to appear in court.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This report focuses on helping North Carolina officials work toward a balanced approach to achieving the three goals of the pretrial release decision-making process: to provide reasonable assurance of the safety of the community; to provide reasonable assurance of appearance in court; and to maximize pretrial release. It does so by focusing on legal and evidence-based practices—ones that fully comport with the law and that are driven by research. The use of such practices has been fully endorsed by all the key justice system stakeholder groups, including: the Conference of Chief Justices; the Conference of State Court Administrators; the International Association of Chiefs of Police; the National Sheriffs' Association; the Association of Prosecuting Attorneys; the National Legal Aid and Defenders Association; the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers; the National Association of Counties; and the American Bar Association. And the use of such practices has been shown to produce excellent results.

Except for very promising work being done in Mecklenburg County, legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices are not in place in North Carolina. Magistrates and judges in the state place significant emphasis on an antiquated tool—bond guidelines—which several federal courts around the country have recently called unconstitutional. Courts also rely heavily on a release option—the secured bond—that was established in the 19th Century to address a problem that was unique to that time; the ability of a criminal defendant to flee into the vast wilderness of America's growing frontier and simply disappear, never to face prosecution. And only 40 of the state's 100 counties are served by pretrial services programs that can provide supervision of defendants released by the court with conditions of pretrial release. Many of these programs have very limited supervision capacity.

The model for legal and evidence-based pretrial release practices in North Carolina includes the use of an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool, the development of a decision matrix that would help magistrates and judges make pretrial release decisions, the implementation of risk management strategies aimed at matching risk levels with the most appropriate level of support or supervision, the expanded use of citation releases by law enforcement, the very early involvement of the prosecutor and defense, and the initiation of automatic bond reviews for in-custody misdemeanor defendants.

Implementing such a model of legal and evidence-based practices in North Carolina would be greatly facilitated by changes in the state's laws. Current North Carolina law does not expressly provide for a right to actual pretrial release—it is crafted only in terms of setting or not setting conditions—nor does it articulate a procedure for preventive detention of high risk defendants. A right merely to have conditions set, coupled with the statutory provisions discussing those conditions as well as no decent process for risk-based detention, naturally moves North Carolina magistrates and judges toward using secured money conditions to address risk for both court appearance and public safety, and toward attempting to use unattainable money conditions to detain defendants posing extremely high pretrial risk. In addition, although the statute speaks of pretrial risk, it makes determinations of who is entitled to having release conditions set based primarily on charge as a proxy for risk, and subtly points judicial officials toward using the money condition to address risk. The better practice would be to set forth a right to release for all except extremely high-risk defendants (or defendants who are not as risky but who also face extremely serious charges, or both), provide for a lawful and transparent detention provision based on risk to allow pretrial detention with no conditions, and then create mechanisms so that persons released pretrial are released immediately.

Based on this review of pretrial justice in North Carolina, the following actions are recommended.

Short-Term Recommendations:

- Judicial officials should immediately begin issuing unsecured bonds for pretrial release instead of secured bonds.
- State officials should appoint a Legal and Evidence-Based Practices Implementation Team to oversee the implementation of the recommendations of this report.
- The Implementation Team should develop a vision statement for a state-wide, data-driven pretrial justice system in North Carolina.
- The Implementation Team should develop an Implementation Plan based upon the vision statement, with a focus on initially implementing the plan in 5 to 7 pilot counties.
- The Implementation Team should incorporate the following elements in its plan:
 - The use of an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool by every magistrate in every criminal case at the initial appearance
 - The use of a release/detention matrix that factors risk level and charge type
 - The development of differentiated risk management procedures that match the identified risk to the appropriate supervision level
 - The expanded use of citations by law enforcement
 - Early involvement of prosecutor and defense counsel
 - The institution of automatic bond review procedures for misdemeanor defendants
 - Uniform data reporting standards.
- The Implementation Team should draft language for bills or proposed court rules that incorporate the changes in law needed to implement the plan in the pilot counties.
 - The Implementation Team should develop a preventive detention framework for defendants who present unacceptably high risk
 - The Implementation Team should develop a release framework for defendants who are not detained
 - The Implementation Team should draft other legislation and/or court rules needed to implement the recommendations in this report

Mid-Term Recommendations:

- The Implementation Team should fully implement the plan in the pilot counties.

- The Implementation Team should ensure that all staff with a role in implementing the plan are fully informed of its purpose and rationale and trained for successful implementation.
- The Implementation Team should establish a data dashboard to monitor outcomes and regularly review the data and make appropriate adjustments to the plan.

Long-Term Recommendations:

- The Implementation Team should begin implementing the plan in the remaining counties of the state.
- The Implementation Team should develop a plan for sustaining changes that have been made and holding accountable those who make the changes.
- North Carolina officials should consider what role, if any, secured bonds should continue to play in the state's pretrial system, and draft appropriate proposals for statutory or court rule amendments.

As the Commission recognizes, implementing these recommendations will not be easy, but the benefits that will flow from doing so will be worth the effort. A well-functioning legal and evidence-based pretrial release process benefits justice system officials who can better see, and thus have greater control over, the process and the extent to which it is achieving the three goals of the pretrial release decision. It also benefits defendants going through the system, reducing instances of racial disparities, giving all defendants a sense of procedural justice, and upholding their Constitutional rights. It benefits victims, giving them perceptions of safety and predictability, and improving their chances of experiencing reparations for harm done to them. Finally, it benefits taxpayers, who have a better understanding of how their taxes are being spent and what outcomes they are getting.

I. ACHIEVING A BALANCED APPROACH TO PRETRIAL RELEASE THROUGH LEGAL AND EVIDENCE-BASED PRACTICES

There are three goals of the pretrial release decision: (1) to provide reasonable assurance of the safety of the public; (2) to provide reasonable assurance of the appearance of defendants in court; and (3) to provide due process for those accused of a crime, with “[t]he law favor[ing] the release of defendants pending adjudication of charges.”³ When jurisdictions focus on one or two of these goals at the expense of a balanced approach considering all three, the inevitable result is a dysfunctional system where many defendants who could be safely released remain in jail and many others who pose unacceptably high risks are released.

It is becoming increasingly clear that an option developed in the 19th Century – the secured bond – is inherently incapable of achieving the balanced approach that effective 21st Century public policy demands. When first introduced, the assumption that a secured bond provided a financial incentive for a defendant to appear in court gave justice system officials some hope in addressing at least one of the three goals of pretrial release. And since the capability to empirically test this assumption did not exist, this assumption became an article of faith, and it remains so today in many jurisdictions. In accepting this assumption, courts developed tools, such as those currently used in many North Carolina local pretrial release policies, that assume that the maximum sentence that defendants face defines their level of risk, and that a dollar amount that falls within a suggested range is the best way to address those risks.

Justice system officials across the country have relied on the secured bond option so often and for so long, not because there was evidence that it was effective, but because familiarity has bred acceptance – and because the commercial bail bonds industry that has benefited financially from its continued use has fought against any proposals or actions to implement new, evidence-based practices.⁴

Information showing how ill-suited secured bonds are in achieving the goals of the pretrial release decision can no longer be ignored. Science has provided new, evidence-based tools that show how to achieve the balanced approach, and do so in a way that aligns with the requirements of the law. States around the country, including, now, North Carolina, are looking at the science with the aim of creating a balanced system of pretrial justice that is supported by research and that honors the spirit and the letter of the law.

The law requires a balanced approach

The law favors the release of defendants pending trial. As summed up by U.S. Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson in a 1951 case:

The practice of admission to bail, as it has evolved in Anglo-American law, is not a device for keeping persons in jail upon mere accusation until it is found convenient to give them a trial. On the contrary, the spirit of the procedure is to enable them to stay out of jail until a trial has found them guilty. Without this conditional privilege, even those wrongly accused are punished by a period of imprisonment while awaiting trial and are handicapped in consulting counsel, searching for evidence and witnesses, and preparing a defense.⁵

But the law also recognizes that some defendants pose unmanageable risks to public safety and non-appearance, and can, if strict procedural steps are followed, be held without bond.⁶

An examination of the history of bail and pretrial release reveals that for centuries, dating back to Medieval England, bail was an “in or out” proposition. Defendants who were bailable under the law were to be released, and those who were non-bailable were to be detained. This system carried over from England to this country during the colonial period and after independence. It was in the mid-1800’s, when defendants found it easy to flee and disappear into parts of the growing country that the idea of secured bonds came about. By 1900, the secured bond system had given rise to the for-profit bail bonding industry. Almost immediately afterwards, and numerous times since, analysts drew attention to the dysfunctions of the pretrial release system that relied on secured bonds.⁷ As one researcher noted almost 90 years ago: “In too many instances, the present system neither guarantees security to society nor safeguards the rights of the accused. It is lax with those with whom it should be stringent and stringent with those with whom it could safely be less severe.”⁸

The legal issues raised by the use of secured bonds are now receiving attention by the federal courts. In the past two years, number of cases have been filed in federal courts challenging the use of secured bonds on the grounds that requiring indigent defendants to post financial bonds as a pre-condition to release violates their 14th Amendment equal protection rights. The civil rights law firm Equal Justice Under Law (EJUL) has amassed almost a dozen victories in class action challenges to money bail systems in several states, including Alabama, Georgia, Kansas, Louisiana, Missouri, and Mississippi.⁹ These suits have forced the courts in those jurisdictions to drastically reform their bail-setting practices.

The empirical evidence supports a balanced approach

The research has clearly identified several negative consequences of using an unbalanced approach to pretrial release. The first of these consequences is the large number of bailable defendants who remain in jail for either a portion or the entirety of the pretrial period because they cannot meet the condition of their release – posting a secured bond. According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, approximately 460,000 persons were being held in jails throughout the United States on June 30, 2014 awaiting disposition of their charges, representing 63% of all jail inmates.¹⁰ While not all of these defendants are bailable, most are. 89% of detained felony defendants in a national survey remained in custody throughout the pretrial period on secured bonds that were never posted.¹¹ As shown in Section II of this report, there are large numbers of persons sitting in North Carolina jails because of inability to meet their release condition – posting a secured bond.

A second consequence of using an unbalanced approach is the impact of short-term incarceration – the few days it may take a person who does have the financial resources to post a secured bond to come up with the money to do so. One study found that, when controlling for other factors, defendants who had scored as low risk on the empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool and who were held in jail for just 2-3 days after arrest were 39% more likely to be arrested on a new charge while the first case was pending than those who were released on the first day, and 22% more likely to fail to appear. Low risk defendants who were held 4-7 days were 50% more likely to be arrested, and 22% more likely to fail to appear; those held -14 days were 56% more likely to have a new charge and 41% more likely to have a failure to appear. The same patterns held for medium risk defendants who were in jail for short periods.¹² While the study did not explore why short-term incarceration leads to these findings, they may simply reflect the disruption caused to people’s lives by being in jail for just a few days.

In short, being held in jail for just a few days while making financial arrangements for a secured bond negatively impacts all three goals of the pretrial release decision: it delays release, it leads to higher rates of new criminal activity, and it leads to higher rates of failure to appear in court.

There are also major consequences for low and moderate risk defendants who remain incarcerated throughout the pretrial period, unable to post secured bonds. The same study also found that, again controlling for other factors, low risk defendants who were held in jail throughout the pretrial period due to their inability to post their bonds were 28% more likely to recidivate within 24 months after adjudication than low risk defendants who were released pretrial. Medium risk defendants detained throughout the pretrial period were 30% more likely to recidivate within the following two years.¹³

Such results might be palatable if secured money bonds were found to be more effective in terms of public safety and court appearance. The for-profit bail bonding industry routinely cites studies purporting to show that that is the case, relying on data collected by the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS). Despite repeated claims to the contrary by the commercial bail bonding industry, the BJS data survey was not designed to make assessments of the effectiveness of one type of bond over any other type.¹⁴ As a result of these claims by the bail bonding industry, BJS took the highly unusual step of issuing a Data Advisory, warning that its “data are insufficient to explain causal associations between the patterns reported, such as the efficacy of one type of pretrial release over another.”¹⁵

One study, however, overcomes the methodological flaws of research cited by the bonding industry, by controlling for risk levels and allowing for valid comparisons. That study found that, across all risk levels, there were no statistically significant differences in outcomes (i.e. court appearance and public safety rates) between defendants released without having to post financial bonds and those released after posting such a bond. The study also looked at the jail bed usage of defendants on the two types of bonds. Defendants who did not have to post financial bonds before being released spent far less time in jail than defendants who had to post. This is not surprising, since defendants with secured bonds must find the money to satisfy the bond or make arrangements with a bail bonding company in order to obtain release. Also, 39% of defendants with secured bonds were never able to raise the money and spent the entire pretrial period in jail. In summary, the study found that unsecured bonds, which do not require defendants to post money before being released, offer the same public safety and court appearance benefits as secured bonds, but do so with substantially less use of jail bed space.¹⁶ Unlike any of the studies cited by the for-profit bail bonding industry, this study looked at all three goals of the pretrial release decision – safety, appearance, and release.

It is not surprising that secured money bonds have no impact on public safety rates. Secured bonds allow defendants who have access to money to purchase their pretrial release, regardless of the risk they may pose to public safety. Ironically, under

The State Court Processing Statistics Project collected data on the processing of felony cases in 40 on the nation’s 75 largest counties. Among the data elements collected were: was the defendant released during the pretrial period; if so, what type of release; and what was the failure to appear rate and rate of new criminal activity by type of release. The project’s methodology was not designed to make sure that the release type groups were similar when looking at failure to appear and new criminal activity rates by release type, which is why the Bureau of Justice Statistics issued the Advisory to make clear that any such comparisons were invalid.

this system, magistrates and judges actually may make it easier for defendants deemed to pose unacceptable public safety risks to get out, when, to address those risks, they set high secured bond amounts. While the intent of the judicial officer may be that the defendant will not be able to post the bond, the economic reality is that the higher the bond amount, the higher the profit margin for the bonding company that does business with a high-danger-risk defendant. For example, a commercial bail bonding company might make $1,500 from a $10,000 bond, but the company can earn $15,000 from a $100,000 bond, giving the company a greater incentive to write a higher bond.¹⁷

And since the bonding company is only liable for bond forfeiture if the defendant fails to appear in court – not if the defendant is arrested for new criminal activity while on pretrial release – bonding out high-danger-risk, high-bond defendants is a no-risk venture for the company. It is not surprising that research shows that about half of high-danger risk defendants get out of jail pending trial.¹⁸

An unbalanced approach adversely impacts defendants, particularly those of color, and taxpayers

Research has consistently shown that, all else being equal, defendants who are detained throughout the pretrial period receive much harsher outcomes than those who obtain release.¹⁹ A recent study quantified just how harsh these outcomes are for those found by an empirically-derived risk assessment tool to be low and moderate risk. The study found that low risk defendants who were detained throughout the pretrial period were five times more likely to get a jail sentence and four times more likely to get a prison sentence than their low risk counterparts who were released pretrial. Medium risk defendants who were detained pretrial were four times more likely to get a jail sentence and three times more likely to get a prison sentence. Both low and medium risk defendants who were detained pretrial also received much longer jail and prison sentences than their counterparts who spent the pretrial period in the community.²⁰

Disparities unleashed by secured money bonds fall most heavily on racial minorities. Studies have consistently shown that African American defendants have higher secured bond amounts and are detained on secured bonds at higher rates than white defendants, a factor contributing to the disproportionate confinement of persons of color.²¹

Requiring defendants to post financial bonds as a pre-condition to being released pretrial has obvious implications for those of low economic means – even when they are able to pay the bondsman’s fees, usually about 15% of the full value of the bond. The money may have come out of family funds for groceries or the next month’s rent. And, of course, those who are unable to make a bond payment may fall into deeper economic despair through the loss of jobs and housing while in pretrial confinement.

North Carolina citizens seem to understand how the state’s justice system impacts those with little money, and those of certain racial and ethnic groups. A 2015 survey of state residents showed that 64% of respondents believe that low-income people are likely to receive unfair treatment from the courts. Forty-seven percent felt that African Americans were treated more harshly, including 67% of African American respondents who felt that way, and 46% of respondents felt that Hispanics received worse treatment.²²

Detaining persons pretrial also greatly impacts taxpayers, with no return benefit. It has been estimated that budgets for the operation of county jails rose from $5.7 billion in 1983 to $22.2 billion in 2011. These figures do not, however, take into consideration the costs that come out of other county budget lines, such as employee pension benefits and contracted health care to jail inmates, leaving the total costs to taxpayers unknown. “Because the costs provided are too often incomplete, policymakers and the public are seldom aware of the full extent of their community’s financial commitment to the operations of the local jail. Given the outsize role that jails play in the country’s criminal justice system – incarcerating millions of people annually – it is striking that the national price tag for jails remains unknown and that taxpayers who foot most of the bill remain unaware of what their dollars are buying.”²³ And given the significant growth in jail spending, it is not surprising that 40% of jails in a national survey state that reducing jail costs is one of their most serious issues.²⁴

In short, the current system produces no discernable benefits for anyone, except for one group – the for-profit bail bonding industry. It is not surprising, then, that the industry fights every effort to introduce legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices.

A national movement for legal and evidence-based pretrial justice is underway

Ignoring the protests of the commercial bail bonding industry, over the past four years, there have been significant and unprecedented calls from key and diverse justice system stakeholders for implementing legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices aimed at making sure that only those who pose unmanageable risks are detained pretrial.

For example, in 2012, after a year of study, the Conference of State Court Administrators issued a Policy Paper concluding that “[m]any of those incarcerated pretrial do not present a substantial risk of failure to appear or a threat to public safety, but do lack the financial means to be released. Conversely, some with financial means are released despite a risk of flight or threat to public safety, ...” The Policy Paper went on to say that “[e]vidence-based assessment of the risk a defendant will fail to appear or will endanger others if released can increase successful pretrial release without financial conditions that many defendants are unable to meet. Imposing conditions on a defendant that are appropriate for that individual following a valid pretrial assessment substantially reduces pretrial detention without impairing the judicial process or threatening public safety.”²⁵

Endorsing this Policy Paper, the Conference of Chief Justices issued a resolution that “urge(d) that court leaders promote, collaborate, and accomplish the adoption of evidence-based assessment of risk in setting pretrial release conditions and advocate for the presumptive use of non-financial release conditions to the greatest degree consistent with evidence-based assessment of flight risk and threat to public safety and to victims of crime.”²⁶

Several other national associations also have issued policy statements or resolutions calling for bail reform. These include: the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the National Sheriffs’ Association, the American Jail Association, the Association of Prosecuting Attorneys, the National Legal Aid and Defenders Association, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the American Probation and Parole Association, and the National Association of Counties.²⁷

These organizations, along with the National Judicial College, the National Center for State Courts, the American Bar Association, the National Association of Court Management, the National Criminal Justice Association, the Global Board of Church and Society of the United Methodist Church, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the Council of State Governments, the National Organization for Victim Assistance, along with dozens of other groups and individuals, are members of a Pretrial Justice Working Group, convened by the PJI and the Bureau of Justice Assistance of the U.S. Department of Justice to pursue legal and evidence-based enhancements to pretrial justice.²⁸

North Carolina is not alone in exploring bail reform. Legislatures in four states – Colorado, Kentucky, New Jersey and Alaska – recently re-wrote their bail laws to bring them in line with legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices.²⁹ Several other states, including Arizona, Indiana, Maine, Maryland, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, and Utah, have commissions or task forces examining statutory or court rule changes needed to incorporate legal and evidence-based practices.³⁰

Legal and evidence-based practices produce excellent results

Interest is growing in legal and evidence-based practices because they work. The District of Columbia provides one example of what can happen when a jurisdiction implements such practices. In DC, the pretrial services program, using an empirically-derived risk assessment tool, either recommends non-financial release – with or without conditions, depending on the assessed risk level – or that a hearing be held to determine whether the defendant should be held without bond. The program never recommends a monetary bond. The program also supervises conditions of release imposed by the court and sends court date reminder notices to all released defendants. The outcomes are impressive – 80% of defendants are released on non-monetary bonds and 15% are held without bond. The remaining 5% are held on other charges. Of those released, during FY 2012, 89% made all of their court appearances and 88% were not rearrested on new charges while their cases are pending. Only 1% was rearrested for a violent offense. Moreover, 88% of defendants remained on release at the conclusion of their cases without a revocation for non-compliance with release conditions.³¹ These results were achieved without the use of secured money bonds.

Kentucky provides another example. In 2011, Kentucky began implementing the latest in legal and evidence-based practices, including reducing reliance on monetary bonds and basing recommendations on the results of an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool. In the first two years after introducing these practices, the non-financial pretrial release rate went from 50% to 66%, with no negative impact on court appearance and public safety rates. In fact, the court appearance rate inched up from 89% to 91% and the public safety rate from 91% to 92%.³² In 2013, Kentucky's statewide pretrial services program began using an empirically-derived risk assessment tool developed and tested by the Laura and John Arnold Foundation, the Public Safety Assessment–Court (PSA–Court). This tool was constructed after a study of over a million cases from jurisdictions all across the country. It is designed to be universal; that is, it can perform well in every jurisdiction in the country. A study conducted after the first six months of use in Kentucky showed that pretrial release rates rose to 70% of all defendants, and the increased release rate was accompanied by a 15% reduction in new criminal activity of defendants on pretrial release.³³

In North Carolina, Mecklenburg County has been using the Arnold Foundation's PSA–Court tool since 2014. Mecklenburg County's pretrial services program, which administers this tool, also has developed a release matrix that combines a risk score and charge severity to arrive at a recommendation by the program regarding release.³⁴ An analysis of how PSA–Court was performing in Mecklenburg County after the first three months showed that it was successfully sorting defendants into risk categories for both new criminal activity and failure to appear. For both of these outcomes, failure rates were lowest for those defendants scored by the tool as low risk, rising in step as the risk levels rose. The data also showed that pretrial release rates were highest for the lowest risk group, and declined in step with the rises in risk, meaning that judicial officials were using the results of the risk assessment tool to help make decisions. These actions resulted in a 93% public safety rate and a 98% court appearance rate in 2015,³⁵ with no increase in reported crime.

II. PRETRIAL JUSTICE IN NORTH CAROLINA: CURRENT PRACTICES

This section discusses the state of pretrial release in North Carolina with a review of available data and a discussion of the pretrial release process.

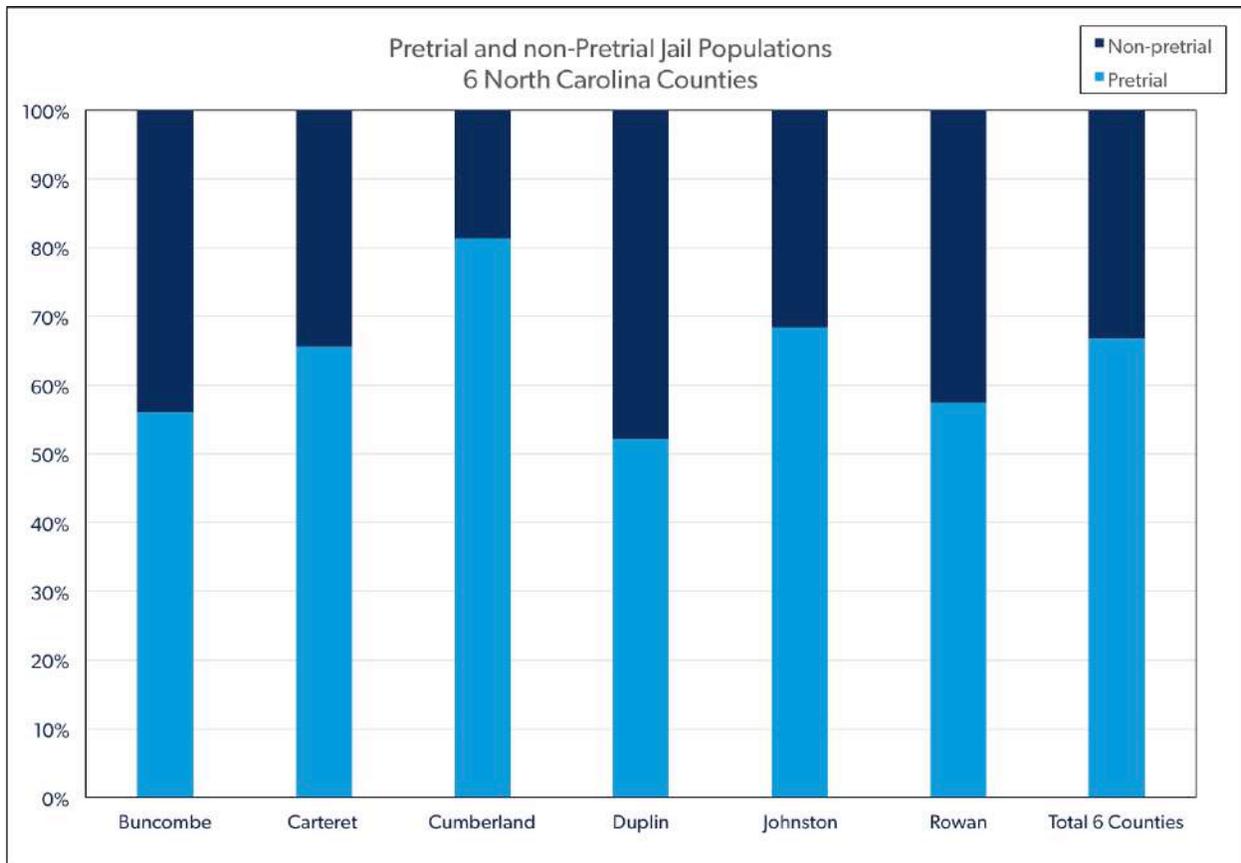

Analysis of Jail Data

Commission staff submitted for analysis jail data for six North Carolina counties. The six counties represent 10.3% of North Carolina’s population and are a diverse demographic and geographic mix. They include Buncombe, Cumberland, Johnston and Rowan Counties, all part of larger metropolitan statistical areas, along with less densely populated and rural Carteret and Duplin Counties. The data comprised a “snapshot” of the jail populations in each of the six counties on a recent date.

Overall, on the date that the snapshots were taken, the jails were at 80% capacity (Column Graph 1), ranging from 48% in Duplin County to over-capacity at 111% in Carteret County.

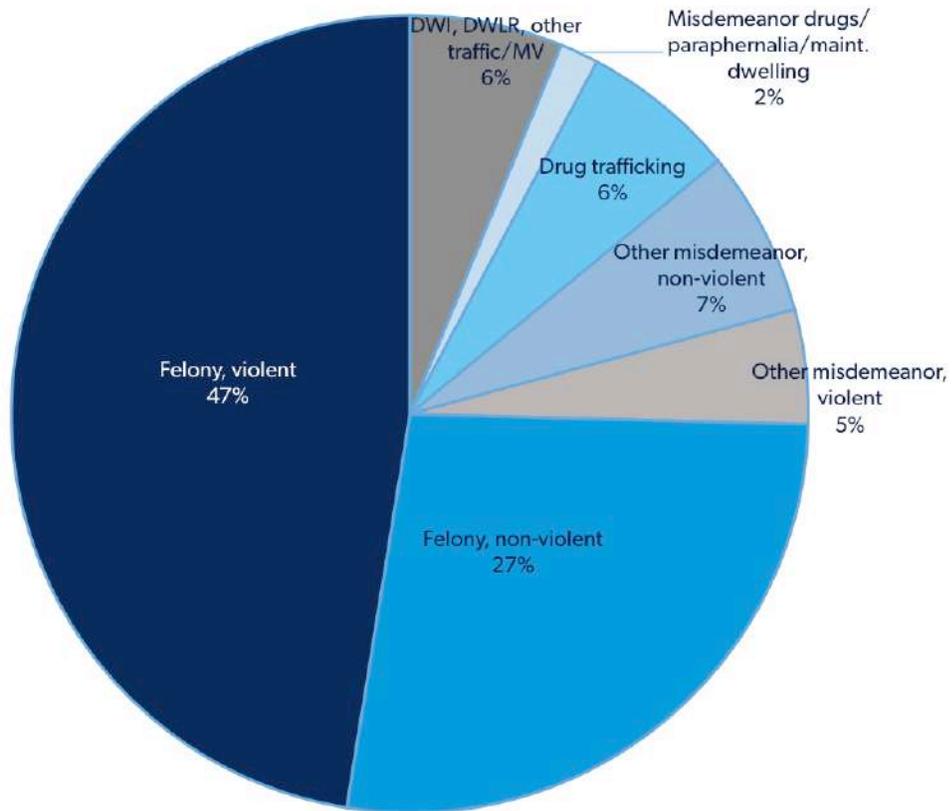

Across the six counties, on the dates of the snapshots, 67% of inmates were pretrial, ranging from a low of 52% in Duplin County to a high of 81% in Cumberland County (column graph below).

Virtually all pretrial detainees (1,268 out of 1,338 or 95%) were detained on cash or secured bond. The remaining 5% (70 detainees) who were being held without bond fell into three offense categories: violent misdemeanors, non-violent felonies, and violent felonies. Most of these (64) belonged to the violent felony category, with many of these being first degree homicide cases.

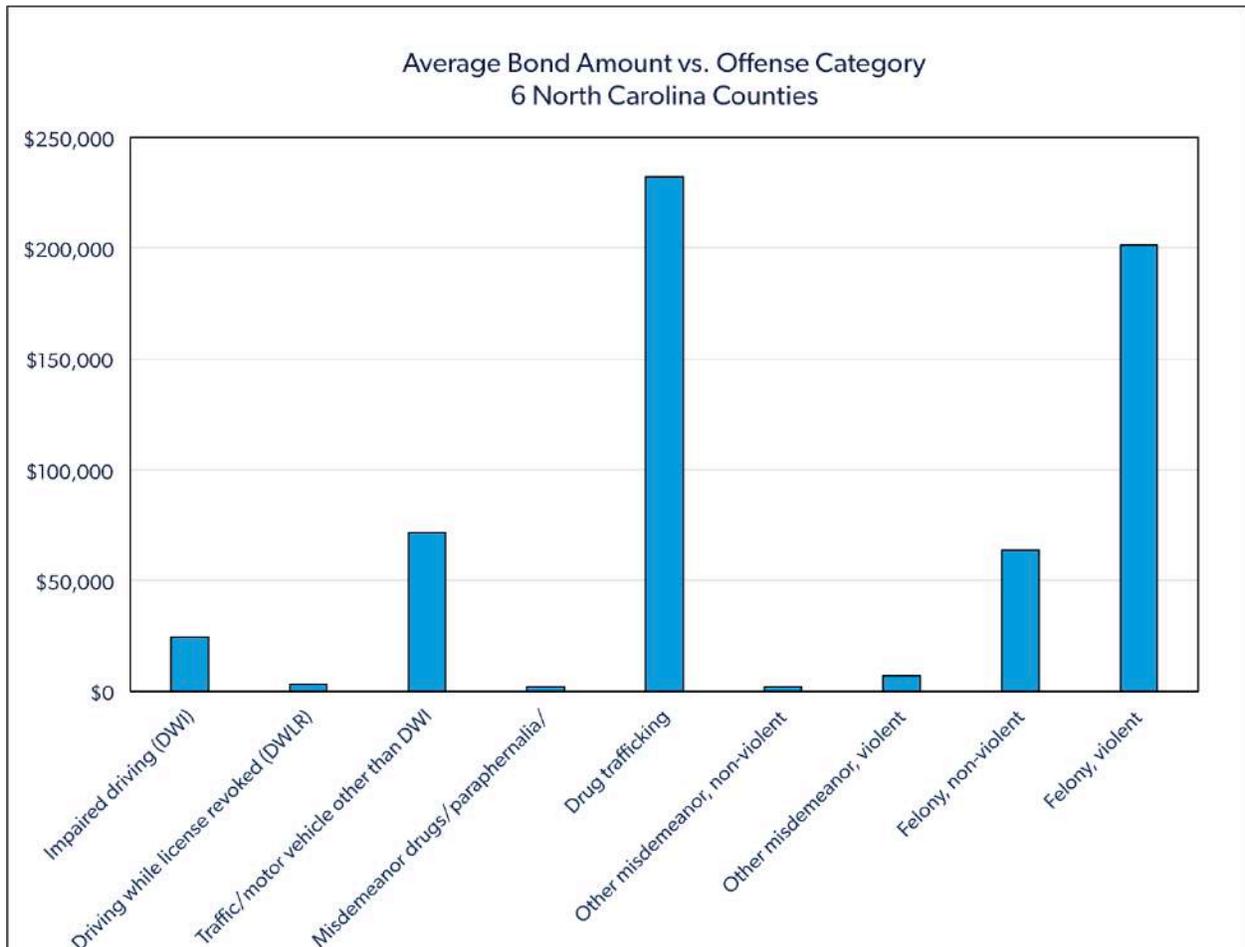

The top charge for a majority (75%) of pretrial detainees was either a violent (47.5%) or non-violent (27.1%) felony (pie chart below). As discussed in Section IV, by just knowing the top charge, and not the risk levels, of detained defendants, it is not possible to assess whether holding these defendants is a good use of jail space.

Pretrial Detainees by Offense Type 6 North Carolina Counties

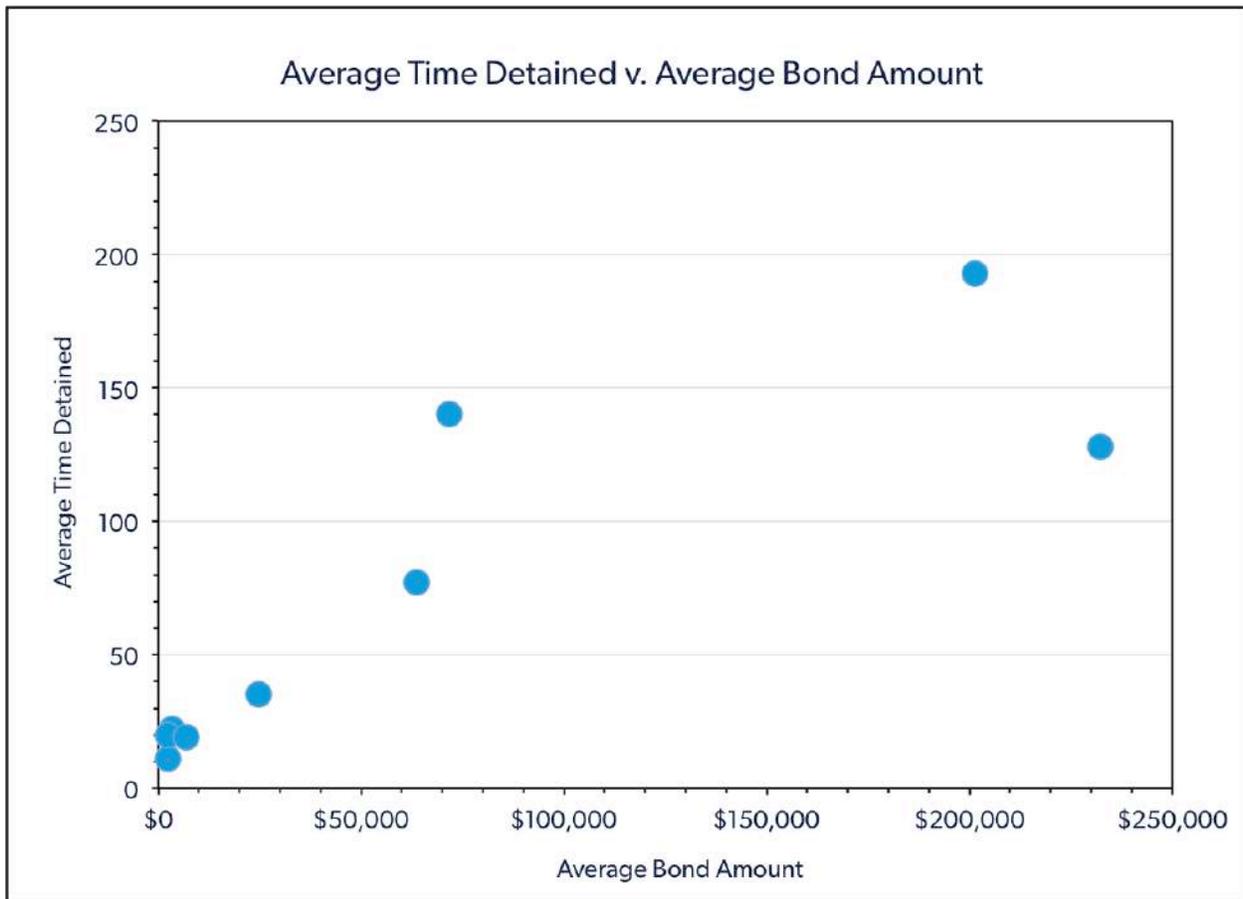

Information regarding the average, high and low bond amount for each of 9 offense categories was provided. In general, the more serious the offense, the higher the bond amount (Table below). However, the ranges were large for all offense categories. For example, bond amounts for individuals charged with a non-violent felony ranged from $100 to $2,000,000, violent felonies $1,000 to $3,000,000, and drug trafficking $8,000 to $2,000,000. The highest average bond amounts (graph below) were for drug trafficking ($232,131) and violent felonies ($201,261).

Offense Category	Lowest cash or secured bond amount	Highest cash or secured bond amount	Average cash or secured bond amount
Impaired driving (DWI), any type	$1,000	$200,000	$24,610
Driving while license revoked (DWLR), any type	$500	$10,000	$3,286
Traffic/motor vehicle other than DWI or DWLR	$500	$800,000	$71,827
Misdemeanor drugs/paraphernalia/maint. dwelling	$200	$20,000	$2,248
Drug trafficking	$8,000	$2,000,000	$232,131
Other misdemeanor, non-violent	$200	$25,000	$2,288
Other misdemeanor, violent	$100	$75,000	$6,997
Felony, non-violent	$100	$2,000,000	$63,688
Felony, violent	$1,000	$3,000,000	$201,261

The next chart looks at average days detained. The snapshots that were taken to collect these data show who was in jail on the date of the snapshot for each of the six counties. As such, the data can only show how long defendants were in custody in pretrial status on the date of the snapshot. It cannot show their total length of stay – which would be a more meaningful measure.³⁶ With that caveat in mind, as the chart below shows, the average number of days detained is directly correlated to the average amount of the bond, that is, individuals stay longer in jail as bond amounts increase. These data must be viewed with the recognition that, as noted earlier, a snapshot of a jail population on a given date can only say how long each person had been in custody as of that date. It cannot provide the total length of stay, which is a much more meaningful figure to know.

African Americans were disproportionately represented in the pretrial population (chart below); although they make up only 18.2% of the population sample, they comprise 47.1% of pretrial detainees. As mentioned above in the discussion of the offense type, it is difficult to know how to put these data into context without knowing the risk level of defendants. This is discussed more in the next section.

Analysis of Process

Persons arrested in North Carolina are brought “without unnecessary delay” before a magistrate for an initial appearance.³⁷ At this hearing, with limited exceptions,³⁸ defendants are entitled to have a pretrial release condition set. In determining those conditions, magistrates must impose the least of the following: written promise to appear; release to the custody of a designated person or organization; unsecured bond; secured bond; and house arrest with electronic monitoring, which must be used with a secured bond.³⁹

While the analysis of the jail data suggests that there are large numbers of defendants in North Carolina jails on release conditions that they cannot meet, data are not available for this report to show the extent to which each of the options that are available to the magistrate and judge (i.e., written promise to appear, unsecured bond, secured bond) are used, nor on the ultimate pretrial release rate, rate of new criminal ³⁸ Exceptions include capital cases, certain drug trafficking cases, certain fugitives, certain firearm offenses, certain gang-related offenses, parole violations, and certain probation violations. activity while on pretrial release, and rate of non-appearance in court. As a result, it is not possible to assess the extent to which the three goals of the pretrial release process – release, public safety, and court appearance – are being met in North Carolina.

It is, however, possible to look at the pretrial release practices that are used in the state, and compare them to legal and evidence-based practices. There are several areas of concern regarding the present process.

First, each judicial district has its own local pretrial release policy, and these policies mirror what is in the statute. However, many of these policies also include bond guidelines, which match the charge classification or the maximum penalty the defendant would face if convicted with a dollar secured bond amount or a range of amounts. Such policies make two assumptions, both of which legal and evidence-based practices show are false: (1) that the charge classification or maximum penalty defines the risks to public safety and court appearance that the defendant poses and (2) that money is the best way to address those risks. The pretrial risk assessment research shows that multiple factors, when considered together, provide the best models for predicting probability of success on pretrial release.⁴⁰ And, as noted earlier, research shows that, when controlling for risk levels, defendants who are not required to post a secured bond as a condition of pretrial release have the same public safety and court appearance rates as those who do, but without consuming the expensive jail bed resources used by many of those with secured bonds.⁴¹

Second, an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool is used currently in only one of the state's 100 counties – Mecklenburg County. As discussed in the next section, the use of an empirically-derived risk assessment is a critical component of legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices.

Third, only about 40 counties in the state are served by pretrial services entities, which supervise defendants on pretrial release.⁴² Even in those counties where pretrial services exist, the statute specifies that the senior resident superior court judge may order that defendants can be released to the supervision of the program if both the defendant and the pretrial services program agree.⁴³ This approach undermines legal and evidence-based practices. If the empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool suggests that a particular defendant should be supervised on pretrial release, the judicial official should have the authority to order such supervision. Neither the defendant nor the pretrial services program should have the ability to, in effect, veto the judicial official's desired action. A potentially dangerous defendant should never be given the option of choosing whether to be supervised in the community or to buy his way out of jail with no supervision.

⁴¹ Unsecured Bonds, supra note 16.

⁴² According to a 2007 report, at that time there were 33 pretrial services programs operating within North Carolina, serving 40 of the state's 100 counties. Pretrial Services Programs in North Carolina: A Process and Impact Assessment, N.C. Governor's Crime Commission (2007), at 2.

⁴³ G.S. 15A-535(b).

Fourth, the law requires a formal process for bond review for felony defendants who remain incarcerated on a secured bond, but no such process is required for detained misdemeanor defendants. As a result, many misdemeanor defendants remain in jail for periods exceeding the sentence they could receive if convicted, and many plead guilty just so that they can be released. A new study of misdemeanor defendants from Harris County, Texas shows the serious consequences that can flow when holding misdemeanor defendants on secured bonds.⁴⁴ The study, which was conducted by the Rand Corporation and the University of Pennsylvania and which controlled for a wide range of other factors, found that, compared to their released counterparts, detained misdemeanor defendants were 25% more likely to plead guilty, and 43% more likely to be sentenced to jail, with jail sentences more than double of released defendants with a jail sentence. Researchers also found that, again controlling for other factors, detained misdemeanor defendants experienced a 30% increase in felony arrests within 18 months after completion of the case, and a 20% increase in misdemeanors, replicating the findings of research described earlier on the criminogenic effects of pretrial detention.⁴⁵ Based on these findings, researchers estimated that if Harris County had released on personal bond just those misdemeanor detainees who were held on bonds of $500 or less “the county would have released 40,000 additional defendants pretrial, and these individuals would have avoided approximately 5,900 criminal convictions, many of which would have come through erroneous guilty pleas. Incarceration days in the county jail – severely overcrowded as of April 2016 – would have been reduced by at least 400,000. Over the next 18 months post release, these defendants would have committed 1,600 fewer felonies and 2,400 fewer misdemeanors.... Thus, with better pretrial detention policy, Harris County could save millions of dollars per year, increase public safety, and likely reduce wrongful convictions.”⁴⁶

III. LEGAL AND EVIDENCE-BASED PRETRIAL JUSTICE PRACTICES: MODELS FOR NORTH CAROLINA

This section describes the elements of a legal and evidence-based pretrial release system, and discusses how the implementation of these elements in North Carolina can bring the state’s pretrial justice practices into the 21st Century.

Risk assessment

For a number of reasons, having an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool is the keystone to a 21st century, legal and evidence-based pretrial release system. First, research demonstrates that such tools are highly effective in sorting defendants into categories showing their probabilities of success on pretrial release in terms of public safety and court appearance. The table below shows the results of the Colorado Pretrial Assessment Tool (CPAT) in Denver, Colorado.⁴⁷ As the table shows, for both safety and appearance, the success rates fall as the risk levels rise. Using the CPAT when making a pretrial release decision, a judicial officer in Denver knows a defendant scoring as a Risk Level 1 has a 96% probability of completing the pretrial period without being charged with new criminal activity while on pretrial release, and a 95% probability of making all court appearances. There is nothing in the risk assessment approach currently used by most North Carolina counties – the bond guidelines – that can produce such quantitative information.

Risk Assessment Outcomes, Denver, Colorado

2	93%	86%
4	80%	77%

Second, such tools can track any disparate impacts that might result through their use on racial and ethnic groups. If disparities do arise, they can be easily identified, which is the first step in addressing them. The chart below shows a breakdown by race and risk level of the Arnold Foundation’s PSA-Court risk assessment tool, the same tool being used currently in Mecklenburg County. In developing this tool, researchers ran statistical tests designed to identify disparities. As the chart shows, there has been very little variation in risk levels among African American versus white defendants using the PSA-Court tool.⁴⁸ The tool currently used in most North Carolina counties – the bond guidelines – provide no similar opportunity to test for any built-in biases of the tool, or to monitor for disparate outcomes. And, as noted above, data from North Carolina jails show that there are a large number of African Americans, disproportionate to their population in the community, who are in jail pretrial.⁴⁹ With an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool – one that has been tested for disparities – North Carolina officials would be able to contextualize the race data presented earlier and begin to address any identified issues.

Third, having an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool allows a jurisdiction to make valid comparisons between different types of release, or specific conditions of release. For example, as noted earlier, the for-profit bail bonding industry touts studies showing that defendants released through commercial bonds have higher appearance rates than defendants released through other means. But without knowing the risk levels of defendants it is not possible to know whether defendants in one group are comparable, in terms of risk, to defendants in another group. Such comparisons cannot presently be made in most North Carolina jurisdictions, but they can be made in jurisdictions that have implemented empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment.

Fourth, knowing the risk levels of defendants who are in jail helps a jurisdiction assess whether it is using its expensive jail resources for those who need to be there because of their risks. The data presented in Section II from the six North Carolina counties shows the charges of those who were in jail during the day the snapshot was taken, but since their risk level was unknown, it is very difficult to assess whether this was a good use of jail space.⁵⁰ When Mesa County, Colorado officials first implemented the Colorado risk assessment tool, they leaped at the opportunity to look at the risk levels of the pretrial defendants they were holding, and they found that there were high percentages of low risk defendants in jail. County officials have been using the risk assessment levels to track progress in addressing that situation. As the chart below shows, officials can now report to their community how they are using the jail for the pretrial population – 80% of the pretrial detainees are scored in the two highest risk categories. Before implementing the risk assessment tool, county officials were in the same position as North Carolina officials – they could only point to data showing that there were large numbers of persons in jail pretrial on low level offenses or low bonds – without any knowledge of their risk levels.

⁴⁹ Supra pp. 15-16.

Source: Data provided by Mesa County, Colorado.

Fifth, knowing the risk levels of defendants coming through the system can help officials plan for, and justify to taxpayers, the resources needed to address the risks. Numerous pretrial risk assessment studies have demonstrated that the overwhelming majority of defendants fall into low or medium risk categories, meaning that they should require minimal resources for monitoring in the community. Knowing risk levels can help budget officers better project funding needs.⁵¹

⁵¹ An analysis of costs in the federal system found that detaining a defendant pretrial costed an average of $19,000 per defendant, while the costs for supervising a defendant in the community ranged from $3,100 to $4,600 per defendant. The analysis took into consideration the costs of supervision, any treatment, and any costs associated with law enforcement returning defendants who had failed to appear for court. Marie VanNostrand and Gina Keebler, Pretrial Risk Assessment in the Federal Court, 73 FED. PROB., (2009), at 6.

Recognizing these benefits, at least seven states – Colorado, Delaware, Hawaii, Kentucky, New Jersey, Virginia, and West Virginia – have passed laws requiring the use of statewide empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tools.⁵²

The Arnold Foundation’s PSA-Court tool offers several benefits for use in North Carolina. First, it is presently being used in Mecklenburg County, so there is in-state experience with the tool, giving judges, prosecutors and defenders from around the state the opportunity to speak with their counterparts in Mecklenburg County about their experience working with the tool.

Second, the PSA–Court tool has been validated using data from 1.5 million cases from over 300 local, state and federal jurisdictions all across the country, meaning that it is the most universal pretrial risk assessment tool in existence. Currently 29 jurisdictions, including three states – Arizona, Kentucky and New Jersey – use the tool.⁵³ This should give North Carolina officials confidence that it will perform well in North Carolina.

Third, the risk assessment can be completed using information typically available at the time of the initial appearance before the magistrate.⁵⁴ It does not require an interview with the defendant by a pretrial services program or other entity. This is important given that most North Carolina counties, even those that have pretrial services programs, do not presently have the capacity to interview defendants prior to the initial appearance before the magistrate.

As a result, this report recommends that officials explore implementing Arnold’s PSA-Court tool in jurisdictions throughout North Carolina.⁵⁵ Since the tool is not yet publicly available and a timeline for its availability is uncertain, as a backup this report recommends that North Carolina use the Virginia Pretrial Risk Assessment instrument (VPRAI). The VPRAI was first developed in Virginia in 2003 after a study of data from seven diverse jurisdictions throughout the state.⁵⁶ It was re-validated in 2009 from nine diverse Virginia jurisdictions.⁵⁷ A copy of the Virginia Pretrial Risk Assessment instrument is in Appendix A.

Release/Detention Matrix

Once the risk assessment is completed on a defendant, the next step is to determine how to use that information to make a release/detention decision. Research is providing guidance on how to do that, matching identified risk levels with appropriate risk management strategies. For example, defendants who are found to be low risk have very high rates of success on pretrial release. Research has shown that these already high rates cannot be improved by imposing restrictive conditions of release on low risk defendants.⁵⁸ The research shows that the only result to expect when imposing restrictive conditions of release on low risk defendants is an increase in technical violations.⁵⁹ Instead, the most appropriate response is to release these low risk defendants on personal bonds with no specific conditions, and no supervision other than to receive a reminder notice of their court dates.⁶⁰

Other studies have found that high risk defendants who are released with supervision have higher rates of success on pretrial release than similarly-situated unsupervised defendants. For example, one study found that, when controlling for other factors, high risk defendants who were released with supervision were 33% less likely to fail to appear in court than their unsupervised counterparts.⁶¹

A reality that any jurisdiction faces is that, even though the charge or type of charge may provide little information on a defendant's risk to public safety or to fail to appear in court, the impact of new criminal activity or failing to appear on the more serious charge is perceived to be much greater. Therefore, many jurisdictions that use empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tools have developed matrices that combine the risk level with charge types, for example, non-violent misdemeanor, violent misdemeanor, non-violent felony, and violent felony. The resulting intersection of the risk level and charge type produces a suggested release/detention decision. The decision itself remains within the discretion of the judge or magistrate after considering the risk assessment, the matrix, and any other relevant factors.

A copy of the matrix used in Virginia, based on the VPRAI, is in Appendix B. If North Carolina adopts the VPRAI, this matrix, called the Pretrial Praxis, should be used in concert with the VPRAI.

Risk Management

Any conditions set on a defendant's pretrial release should be related to the risk identified for that individual defendant and should be the least restrictive necessary to reasonably assure the safety of the public and appearance in court.⁶² The research on risk management is not as advanced as it is on risk assessment. With the current state of research, it is not possible to identify which conditions of release work best for all defendants. But there is some research to guide policy makers.

As noted above, research has shown that putting conditions of non-financial release on low risk defendants actually increases their likelihood of failure on pretrial release. Rather, the most appropriate response is to release these low risk defendants on personal recognizance with no specific conditions.⁶³

Several studies have shown that simply reminding defendants of their upcoming court dates can have a dramatic impact on reducing the likelihood of failure to appear. One study found that calling and speaking with defendants to remind them about their court dates cut the failure to appear rate from 21% to 8%.⁶⁴ Another study tested the impact of a pilot court date reminder project that using an automated telephone dialing system to contact defendants. The study found that the project led to a 31% drop in the failure to appear rate and an annual cost saving of $1.55 million.⁶⁵

Two studies that have considered the defendant's risk level, as determined by an empirically-derived risk assessment tool, have found that supervision results in lower rates of failure to appear and new criminal activity when compared to their risk-level counterparts who received no supervision.⁶⁶

The Virginia Pretrial Praxis⁶⁷ takes all of this research into consideration, incorporating different options for managing any identified risks. These include release on personal recognizance or unsecured bonds with no conditions of release other than to receive a court date reminder, followed by release on gradually increasing levels of supervision based on identified risks.⁶⁸ enforcement of the law. This policy should be implemented by statutes of statewide applicability.”⁶⁹

At least one state has changed its laws recently, expanding the use of citation releases. In 2012, Maryland enacted legislation mandating that law enforcement officers issue a citation in lieu of custodial arrest when the officer has grounds to make a warrantless arrest for persons facing misdemeanor or ordinance offenses that carry a maximum penalty of 90 days or less, and for possession of marijuana. The law allows the law enforcement officer to fingerprint and photograph the individual before the citation release. In the year after the law went into effect, there was an 80% increase in the number of citations issued in the state and nearly 20,000 fewer initial appearances in court. “From a cost perspective, the further expansion of criminal citations has the potential to save money by reducing arrests and booking costs.”⁷⁰

Prosecutor involvement at the initial hearing

Ideally, prosecutors should review criminal charges immediately after arrest, prior to the initial bail hearing before a judicial officer, to weed out those cases not likely to advance. Many cases are dropped after review by prosecutors – one study found that 25% of all felony cases are ultimately dropped.⁷¹ Experienced prosecutors, those who have extensive trial experience and who know what is needed to get a conviction, are best equipped to do a review of cases before the initial appearance than less experienced prosecutors. The District of Columbia prosecutor’s office has been doing this for many years. In 2012, of the 27,000 cases brought to the office by law enforcement, 8,000 were declined before the initial appearance before a judicial officer – thus stopping at the front door of the courts about 30% of all new arrests, cases that would have needlessly bogged down the system.⁷²

In addition to screening cases early, prosecutors should be present at the initial appearance of the defendant before the magistrate. At the hearing, the prosecutor should make appropriate representations on behalf of the state on the issue of pretrial release. As the National District Attorneys Association standards state, at that hearing “[p]rosecutors should recommend bail decisions that facilitate pretrial release rather than detention.”⁷³

In North Carolina, prosecutors are not routinely present at the initial appearance before the magistrate.

The U.S. Supreme Court has said that “a criminal defendant’s initial appearance before a judicial officer, where he learns the charge against him and his liberty is subject to restriction, marks the start of the adversary judicial proceedings that trigger attachment of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.”⁷⁴ The Court stopped short of saying that an attorney must be present at the hearing, only that the right to counsel attaches at that time.

The American Council of Chief Defenders, however, calls on all public defender offices to “dedicate sufficient resources to the bail hearing and/or first appearance, where the pretrial release terms are set.” At that hearing, public defenders should “obtain and use crucial risk assessment information for making relevant and persuasive arguments regarding appropriate release conditions for their clients.”⁷⁵ Research has shown that indigent defendants who are represented by counsel at the bail hearing are released non-financially at about 2½ times the rate of those who were unrepresented.⁷⁶

Defense attorneys do not presently represent indigent defendants at the initial appearance before the magistrate in North Carolina. In many North Carolina jurisdictions, the defendant first receives counsel at the first appearance in District Court.

Bond review of defendants unable to post bond

As noted in Section II, current North Carolina law requires a first appearance (which includes a review of pretrial conditions) before a district court judge for in-custody defendants charged with a felony. However, no such hearing is required for in-custody defendants charged with misdemeanors. This can, and often does, result in misdemeanor defendants remaining in pretrial confinement for periods longer than they might serve as a sentence if convicted. This “gap” in the law seems to be unique to North Carolina. In other states, a defendant who remains in custody after an initial hearing before a magistrate will appear before a judge the next court business day for a bond review hearing, regardless of the charge level.

Data/performance measures

Collecting data on the impact and outcomes of evidence-based practices is crucial for 21st Century pretrial justice. Jurisdictions should be able to report on data on all criminal cases relating the three goals of the bail decision:

- Public safety rate (defendants not arrested for new criminal activity while on pretrial release) for all released defendants, broken down risk level and by release type.

- Court appearance rate for all released defendants (percentage of defendants who did not fail to appear for all scheduled hearings, resulting in the issuance of a warrant or order for arrest), broken down by risk level and by release type.
- Pretrial release rate, broken down by risk level, release type, and time between arrest and release.

Other important measures include:

- Number of defendants released by citation, broken down by charge and by police department and/or sheriff's office.
- Percent of defendants for whom an actuarial risk assessment was scored prior to the release-or-detain decision by the magistrate, broken down by county or judicial district.
- Percent of cases reviewed by an experienced prosecutor prior to the initial appearance before a magistrate, broken down by county or judicial district.
- Percent of initial appearances before the magistrate in which the prosecution and defense participate, broken down by county or judicial district.
- Percent of cases in which the magistrate's decision matches that suggestion of the pretrial matrix, broken down by county and by magistrate.
- Percent of detained defendants who were detained as a result of a detention hearing, broken down by county or judicial district.
- Percent of detained defendants who were held on a secured bond, broken down by risk level and by county or other appropriate jurisdiction.
- Length of stay in jail for detained defendants who were held on a secured bond, broken down by risk level, bond amount, and county or other appropriate jurisdiction.

IV. PRETRIAL JUSTICE IN NORTH CAROLINA: THE LEGAL STRUCTURE

Prerequisites to Understanding the Legal Analysis

Understanding any legal analysis designed to guide decision makers toward implementing legal and evidence-based practices requires first knowing three broad concepts. First, every jurisdiction in America already has many essential elements of a pretrial system, even if that system does not function optimally. For example, each jurisdiction does a version of risk assessment. In some jurisdictions, however, risk assessment is done simply by glancing at a defendant's top charge. Other jurisdictions use empirically-derived risk assessment instruments, validated to their populations, which help predict the chances of a defendant's pretrial misbehavior. Likewise, all jurisdictions do some sort of risk management, from merely hoping that a defendant will come back to court and stay out of trouble during the pretrial phase to using dedicated professional pretrial services agencies designed to further the lawful purposes of release and detention. In the same way, every state has a legal structure to effectuate pretrial release and detention that works at some level. Nevertheless, sometimes that structure can actually hinder what we know today are "best-practices" in pretrial release and detention. Understanding this allows us to acknowledge that "bail reform" is not necessarily a daunting task; indeed, it often means merely improving existing systems, even if those improvements are comprehensive.

Second, we are learning that a great deal of education is necessary to fully understand what those improvements should be. Pretrial release and detention is deceptively complex, and yet suffers from decades of neglect in our colleges, universities, and law schools. It is simply not enough to take on a topic like pretrial release and detention with the traditional and existing knowledge of criminal justice stakeholders. Some specialized education must take place. Fortunately, to help jurisdictions obtain the knowledge necessary to advance pretrial justice, there are numerous documents and programs available today through the Pretrial Justice Institute and other leading organizations that can provide education, advice, and assistance. Even though decision-makers in particular jurisdictions may believe that they lack data and information, in this generation of bail reform we have virtually every answer to the significant questions that have nagged America over the past 100 years – answers that can lead to substantial progress toward pretrial justice. Due to time and space limitations given for this report, it will be up to North Carolina criminal justice leaders to read beyond this report to fully learn the additional material that points to those answers.⁷⁷

⁷⁷ North Carolina stakeholders should begin by reading Fundamentals of Bail, supra note 1, and Timothy R. Schnacke, Money as a Criminal Justice Stakeholder: The Judge's Decision to Release or Detain a Defendant Pretrial, Nat'l Inst. Corr. (2014), and references cited therein. By doing so, stakeholders will learn that broad reports (such as this one) concerning the state of pretrial release and detention in any particular state can often only provide the impetus for continued conversations over legal and evidence-based practices based on research, which, in turn, is being published at an increasingly rapid pace.

Third, the knowledge gained from deep bail education often illustrates that certain assumptions underlying a state's existing release and detention laws, policies, and practices are flawed, and that the solutions to perceived issues at bail are counterintuitive in our current culture. For example, for over 100 years, courts in America have assumed that defendants pose higher pretrial risks when facing higher charges, and our laws and practices are set up to effectuate release based on that assumption. However, the pretrial research is demonstrating that certain misdemeanor defendants often pose higher risk than felony defendants and that many felony defendants pose little risk at all. Likewise, jurisdictions often assume that money helps to keep citizens safe, but the research, the history, and the law all tell us that this is not so. Understanding the somewhat counterintuitive nature of certain pretrial justice change efforts helps us to understand and possibly change the current culture surrounding pretrial release and detention.

The History of Bail and the Fundamental Legal Principles

Understanding any legal analysis also requires having at least some familiarity with the history of bail (release) and no bail (detention) – considered to be a “fundamental” or “core” element that jurisdictions must understand to make improvements in pretrial justice. Generally speaking, the history of bail shows that in roughly 1900, America moved from a system of pretrial release using personal sureties administering unsecured bonds to a system relying on commercial sureties administering mostly secured bonds. Justice system professionals and researchers in America very quickly learned that the infusion of profit, indemnification, and security into bail led to continued and, indeed, increased unnecessary detention of bailable defendants,⁷⁸ but not before states had already adopted the “charge-and-secured money” legal systems we still see today.

At the time, many courts in America believed that using commercial sureties and secured bonds would help get most defendants out of jail pretrial, but it only made things worse. Today, after two generations of bail reform in America designed to fix the problems with the charge-and-secured money release system, we find ourselves in yet another generation of reform hoping to fix it once again because secured money bonds continue to interfere with rational release and detention.

Moreover, understanding any legal analysis requires knowing how the fundamental legal principles underlying American pretrial release and detention have been molded by history and have, in many ways and until very recently, failed in fixing the problems brought on by the changes in 1900. Knowing the law for bail and no bail means knowing that the law has been largely ignored for decades, allowing states to craft legal schemes that are now being successfully challenged in the courts. Generally speaking, many state bail laws are simply unlawful when measured against the larger American legal principles, such as procedural due process and equal protection, and this alone is causing many states to make substantial changes to those laws to allow for legal and evidence-based practices in pretrial release and detention.⁷⁹

Current North Carolina Legal Structure

Unlike many states, North Carolina has a detailed recitation of existing laws, and that recitation has served as a useful tool for the instant report.⁸⁰ This analysis seeks to go beyond that recitation to assess whether the legal structure helps or hinders best pretrial practices. Due to time limits, this overview of the North Carolina legal structure must be viewed only as the beginning of a conversation about holding up the state's laws to the broader legal principles, the history of bail, the pretrial research, and the national standards on best practices to assess every element affecting pretrial justice. Pretrial reform often involves making improvements to all decisions and practices from the initial police stop to sentencing. Reviewing those decisions and practices, looking at the associated legal and evidence-based literature for each, holding them up to some model and to existing laws while comparing those laws to other sources, and making recommendations for possible changes, while fruitful, would be laborious and lead to an overwhelmingly lengthy document. Accordingly, this report will examine in detail only the most crucial issues facing North Carolina at this time, which mostly deal with the judicial official's decision to release or detain a defendant pretrial.⁸¹

Nevertheless, the people of North Carolina should see the benefits of looking at other decision points or practices in the process. For example, a crucial element in pretrial justice is diversion, and while the author saw references to a variety of local diversion programs, such as "jail diversion," mental health courts, and public and private diversion for certain first offenders in North Carolina, other state's statutes provide many more opportunities for structured pretrial diversion, and base those programs on their own literatures concerning best practices. Likewise, even though there did not appear to be anything legally hindering defense counsel providing assistance at initial appearances, this does not appear to be the practice in North Carolina even though at the initial appearance defendants are facing significant deprivations of liberty.⁸² By briefly reviewing the North Carolina laws, the author also saw potential issues concerning: (1) police issuing citations versus arresting persons and courts issuing summonses versus warrants for arrests (laws can be amended to encourage or even require the use of citations and summonses so that arrest is only ⁷⁹ As only one example, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals recently struck down as unconstitutional an Arizona "no bail" provision enacted in its constitution. See Lopez-Valenzuela v. Arpaio, 770 F.3d 772 (2014). Until very recently, people have mistakenly inferred the lawfulness of certain bail practices due simply to the lack of opinions expressly declaring them to be unlawful.

⁸⁰ See Criminal Proceedings, supra note 37.

⁸¹ A more detailed legal analysis would also look deeply into North Carolina case law, which was not done for purposes of this report.

reserved as a last resort):⁸³ (2) practices such as requiring fingerprinting and DNA testing that might lead to unnecessary arrests; (3) the potentially inefficient practice surrounding the use of appearance bonds for infractions; (4) certain laws that allow for delays in holding the initial appearance (such as tasks required of officers arresting defendants on implied consent offenses) or that hinder the immediate release of low and medium defendants present at that appearance (the pretrial research, which follows the law, would point to dealing with the vast majority of defendants rapidly, and especially low and medium risk defendants because keeping those defendants unnecessarily detained can actually lead to more crime and failures to appear for court); (5) speedy trial for detained defendants; (6) potential problems with implementing risk assessment into a legal scheme already containing various untested risk factors that judicial officials “must” consider;⁸⁴ and (7) collecting data and performance measures (data collection is crucial to understanding the efficacy of any pretrial system, and many states are now enacting requirements for such things into their laws).

Moreover, when considering changes to the release and detention decision, most jurisdictions recognize that empirically-derived risk assessment and evidence-based risk management are crucial elements, if not prerequisites, to those changes. Only by knowing defendants’ risk can courts follow the law and the evidence by immediately releasing the majority of pretrial defendants under varying levels of research-supported supervision to both protect the public and bring people back to court, while providing for extreme public safety risk management through the ability to detain certain defendants in a fair and transparent procedure. The laws must allow for these elements, and if they do not, they must be changed.

The largest issue facing North Carolina, however, deals with the laws surrounding the judicial official’s decision to release or detain a defendant pretrial. North Carolina currently has a legal scheme with elements based firmly in a charge-and-secured money bond system and with somewhat faulty assumptions about both money and charge.

To assess North Carolina’s laws for how it deals with the release and detention decision, this section examines the following: (1) how the North Carolina laws operate broadly as compared to other states, focusing primarily on its statutory release/detention eligibility framework; (2) certain assumptions that seem to buttress ⁸³ Current North Carolina law appears to allow an officer to issue a citation for a misdemeanor or infraction, but there is no preference or mandatory language. G.S. § 15A-302. The law concerning summonses apparently allows the issuance of a summons for felonies in addition to misdemeanors and infractions (also with no preference), but because the AOC criminal summons form has been drafted not to charge a felony, persons have apparently been advised not to issue one for felonies. See id. §15A-303(a); Criminal Proceedings, supra note 37, at 4. Other jurisdictions have shown that requiring the arrest of felony defendants is not always necessary, and the trend across America appears to be the use of mechanisms that gradually ratchet up criminal process and that incorporate every means possible to compel court appearance before resorting to arrest. To the extent that warrants (or OFA’s in North Carolina) use financial conditions of release on their face, that practice should be made part of any discussion to reduce or eliminate secured financial conditions generally. To the extent that North Carolina can discuss the appropriate use of arrests for violations of release conditions, it should do so also. Finally, to the extent that North Carolina can adopt the evidence-based practice of court date notification in all of its courts, it should do so.

existing laws and that might make change difficult; (3) provisions setting out the detention process; (4) provisions setting out the release process; and (5) issues gleaned from a reading of various local pretrial release policies.

North Carolina Laws: The Right to Release and Authority to Preventively Detain High Risk Defendants Generally

Current North Carolina law does not expressly provide for a right to actual pretrial release or articulate a procedure for preventive detention of high risk defendants. As discussed below, both omissions create barriers to pretrial reform.

North Carolina eliminated the right to bail provision in its constitution of 1868.⁸⁵ North Carolina is thus like eight other states and the federal system, all of which operate without a constitutional right to bail, which means that certain changes to the system of release and detention will not be hindered by constitutional right to bail hurdles.⁸⁶ From a legal standpoint, states with no constitutional right to bail can more easily implement both release and detention provisions that follow legal and evidence-based practices than states with such a constitutional right.

This is not to say that North Carolina does not have a right to release pretrial, and, indeed, there are good arguments for why a state could never completely eliminate any right to pretrial release. But in North Carolina, it appears that the right is somewhat confused. Unlike in other states' laws, there is no explicit delineation of precisely who should actually be released or detained. Although Section 15A-533 is entitled, "Right to pretrial release in capital and noncapital cases,"⁸⁷ the body of the statute is crafted only in terms of setting or not setting conditions. Various local pretrial release policies quote cases articulating a right to pretrial release,⁸⁸ and even interpreting § 15A-533 to provide for a "right to release,"⁸⁹ but while the statute's title speaks of a right to release, the statute both generally and specifically points only to a "right to have one's conditions set," which is far from actual release.⁹⁰

⁸⁵ The previous constitution stated: "All prisoners shall beailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offenses, when the proof is evident, or the presumption great." N.C. Const. art. 39 (1776).

⁸⁷ G.S. § 15A-533.

⁸⁸ See, e.g., In the Matter of Promulgating Local Rules Relating to Bail and Pretrial Release for Judicial District 8A, at 5-6 (quoting Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1 (1951)).

⁸⁹ See, e.g., Policies Relating to Bail and Pre-Trial Release Second Judicial District, at 2.

⁹⁰ G.S. §§ 15A-533(b) (stating that "[a] defendant charged with a noncapital offense must have conditions or pretrial release determined"). The relevant treatise also speaks only of a right to have conditions set,

Moreover, the statute has no discernable process for detention of the sort approved in the U.S. Supreme Court’s opinion in United States v. Salerno,⁹¹ which guides states in crafting such provisions. Existing North Carolina law creates rebuttable presumptions that “no conditions or combination of conditions” will provide reasonable assurance of public safety and court appearance for defendants charged with certain offenses with certain preconditions,⁹² but those provisions only testify to the notion that other cases, even without the presumptions, are potentially cases in which “no condition or combination of conditions” would suffice; obviously, presumptions toward a certain result in some cases means that there should be a broader set of cases allowing the presumptive subset to exist, yet the statute has no provisions to deal with them. There are simply no statutory provisions setting forth exactly what to do in a typical case where a defendant is deemed extremely high risk and unmanageable outside of secure detention and falls outside of the rebuttable presumption cases.

As discussed below, a right merely to have conditions set, coupled with the statutory provisions discussing those conditions as well as no decent process for risk-based detention, naturally moves North Carolina judicial officials toward using secured money conditions to address risk for both court appearance and public safety, and toward attempting to use unattainable money conditions to detain defendants posing extremely high pretrial risk. By contrast, “model” release and detention schemes would expressly articulate who is releasable, who potentially is not, and provide mechanisms to make sure that the in-or-out decision is made purposefully, transparently, and fairly, and with nothing (such as money) interfering with the decision.⁹³

In addition to not being entirely clear on what right North Carolina defendants actually enjoy as well as not providing for a due-process laden detention process, North Carolina law overall illustrates the same issues facing virtually every other state in America: the legal scheme is based on a charge and secured-money model, and this core issue can hinder attempts to improve the system without statutory changes. Specifically, although the statute speaks of pretrial risk (something other state statutes often do not do), it makes determinations of who is entitled to having release conditions set based primarily on charge as a proxy for risk, and subtly points judicial officials toward using and provides as exceptions those cases in which defendants don’t enjoy a right to have conditions set. Criminal Proceedings, supra note 74, at 27.

⁹³ There are few exemplary statutes that currently do this. However, the D.C. bail statute, D.C. Code Ann. §§ 23-1301-09, 1321-33, which reflects principles articulated in the American Bar Association Standards on Pretrial Release, has been used by many jurisdictions as a model to begin conversations about statutory reform.

the money condition to address risk.⁹⁴ The better practice would be to set forth a right to release for all except extremely high risk defendants (or defendants who are not as risky but who also face extremely serious charges, or both), provide for a lawful and transparent detention provision based on risk to allow pretrial detention with no conditions, and then create mechanisms so that persons released pretrial are released immediately. Rebuttable presumptions, though perhaps not made entirely unnecessary by the move toward infusing risk into charge-based systems, can be crafted to use both risk and charge in ways that support the law and the research.

North Carolina Law: Underlying Assumptions

Many jurisdictions have learned that overcoming flawed assumptions concerning pretrial release and detention is necessary before making improvements to the process. In addition to the flawed assumption that the right to bail is merely a right to have one's conditions set, or the equally flawed assumption that higher charge necessarily equals higher risk, there are two additional significant assumptions that should be addressed. These assumptions are not unique to North Carolina; indeed, they are seen across the country and illustrate a much more pressing problem with bail reform in America, which is that many pretrial improvements involve thinking about release and detention in an entirely different way. This means that bail reform involves “adaptive change,” which involves overcoming faulty assumptions driving the way we think about any particular topic.⁹⁵

One assumption found throughout the North Carolina laws appears to be that money at bail affects public safety. It is found either explicitly, as in G.S. §15A-534(d2)(1), which requires judicial officials to impose a secured bond or house arrest (which includes a secured bond) “[i]f the judicial official determines that the defendant poses a danger to the public,” or implicitly, as in G.S. § 15A-534(d3), which allows a judicial official to double the amount of money condition for defendants who commit crimes while on pretrial release, presumably to better protect the public from future crimes. Money does not protect the public, however, unless it is used unlawfully to detain an otherwise releasable defendant.⁹⁶

⁹⁴ For example, although the statute includes an express presumption for non-secured releases, G.S. § 15A-534 (b), later provisions do not mandate and also place significant limitations on pretrial services supervision, which might lead judicial officials to set more secured bonds. Likewise, various provisions throughout the statute equating secured money amounts with public safety might nudge any particular judicial official toward setting a secured bond since a finding of “a danger of injury to any person” is one reason for overcoming the presumption of non-secured release. The fact that the statute requires judicial officials to set conditions for high risk defendants falling outside of the “no conditions” exceptions, also necessarily moves those officials toward using secured money bonds to at least respond to extremely high risk.

⁹⁵ Bail reform has only recently begun to understand that the improvements involved require system changes as well as changes in people's beliefs and core understandings of certain concepts. For information on how adaptive change can be addressed at bail, go to <http://transformingcorrections.com/about/>.

⁹⁶ Using money to detain defendants pretrial would obviously implicate a state's right to bail or release provision, but the practice can also lead to claims concerning both substantive and procedural due process, equal protection, and excessive bail.

In many states, using money to protect the public is expressly unlawful, but even in a state like North Carolina, it is irrational and thus implicitly unlawful. North Carolina G.S. § 15A-544.3 makes failure to appear for court the only event that can lead to forfeiture of money on a bail bond. Thus, when a defendant commits a new crime while on pretrial release, the money is not forfeited. Accordingly, it is irrational to set money to motivate defendant behavior concerning criminal activity because the money cannot lawfully act as a motivator. Setting a condition of release that cannot lawfully do what one intends it to do is irrational, and thus likely unlawful based on any legal theory that requires courts to use rationality or reason in its actions.⁹⁷ Likewise, no research has ever shown money to protect the public. In fact, the research on secured money bail shows that setting secured bonds leading to the detention of low and medium risk defendants actually causes them to become higher risk for both new criminal activity and failure to appear for court.⁹⁸ Setting a condition of release that leads to the opposite of what a court intends is even more irrational than setting one that simply doesn't work.

Finally, no matter how high the amount, any particular extremely dangerous defendant might still be able to pay it, leading to the potential for some horrific yet avoidable crime during the pretrial period. This public safety problem is exacerbated by North Carolina law, which appears to limit a judicial officer's ability to set a "cash only" bond.⁹⁹ Because commercial sureties cannot lose money due to new criminal activity, in many states those sureties help extremely high risk defendants obtain easy release by using no-money-down and payment plan options.

Another assumption found in North Carolina law (including the local pretrial release policies) that potentially hinders the adoption of legal and evidence-based practices appears to be an assumption that release to pretrial services agency supervision should be reserved only for low level crimes or low risk defendants.¹⁰⁰ In fact, the use of pretrial services functions are part of a high functioning pretrial system, and such agencies are often best when overseeing defendants posing high risk or charged with more serious crimes.

⁹⁷ For example, even using its lowest level of scrutiny, due process analysis requires the means of government action to be rationally related to some legitimate end. There should be no doubt that all government action must be rational and non-arbitrary.

⁹⁸ See, e.g., Hidden Costs, supra note 12.

⁹⁹ See Criminal Proceedings, supra note 37, at 39.

¹⁰⁰ See G.S. § 15A-535(b) (allowing, but not requiring pretrial services programs, requiring defendant consent before they are used, and allowing them only in lieu of release under condition options (1), (2), or (3) of G.S. §15A-434(a). Apparently, very few North Carolina judicial districts have pretrial services agency programs, and at least one that does puts a wide variety of further restrictions on using them, including a long list of exclusionary criteria and excluded offenses that most people would describe as "serious." See Bail Policy for Twenty Sixth Judicial District at 5, 23-33. Together, these factors suggest an assumption that pretrial services supervision is only inappropriate for certain low level crimes or low risk defendants. This assumption is often tied to the first concerning money and public safety; jurisdictions that believe money is the best way to manage pretrial risk often believe that pretrial services supervision should be reserved only for those cases in which money is unnecessary.

North Carolina Law: Preventive Detention of High Risk Defendants

As noted above, North Carolina law does not expressly establish a procedure for the preventive detention of high risk defendants. Moreover, the rebuttable presumption provisions allowing for “no conditions” are, in most cases, quite narrow, and there appears to be some confusion as to whether persons other than those statutorily separated out for no conditions can be detained, even if, in their particular cases, no conditions or combination of conditions would suffice to provide reasonable assurance of public safety or court appearance. Combined with the assumption that money protects the public and the various statutory provisions subtly leading judicial officials to use money to respond to risk, the lack of a risk-based detention process likely means that many – if not most – defendants who are perceived to be high risk are being detained purposefully through the unwise and potentially unlawful¹⁰¹ process of using unattainable secured money bonds. Indeed, an Internet search reveals numerous North Carolina cases of defendants being held bonds in amounts of millions or even tens of millions of dollars, at least suggesting judicial intent to detain. Moreover, one local pretrial release policy reported a “modification” of recommended bond amounts because, “Those who pose the greatest threat [to the community] must not be allowed to roam free while keeping in mind the presumption of innocence.”¹⁰² This statement clearly indicates the use of money to detain.

While it is unclear whether individual judicial districts would, or even could, create a lawful and transparent detention process like the one reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Salerno,¹⁰³ such a process could be fairly easily created in the North Carolina statutes. Because detaining someone pretrial involves jailing someone for something the person may or may not do in the future, the Supreme Court has cautioned that pretrial detention provisions must be carefully limited and fair by incorporating numerous procedural due process elements.¹⁰⁴ Detention through the use of money – a practice apparently used widely throughout North Carolina – simply does not measure up to that standard.

The closest North Carolina law comes to providing the required due process fairness elements to its detention procedure is through the fairly limited findings necessary for its rebuttable presumption cases, and the mandate in G.S. § 15A-434 (b) that judicial officials record in writing the reasons for imposing a secured bond, but only to the extent required by local pretrial release policies. Thus, while G.S. § 15A-535(a) requires the creation of such local policies, it merely allows districts to decide whether to include a further requirement that judicial officials make written records.¹⁰⁵ None of the local pretrial release policies reviewed by this author contain detention provisions remotely similar to the provisions favorably reviewed in Salerno, which were described by the Court as a “full blown adversary hearing.”¹⁰⁶ Moreover, at least one local pretrial release policy requires judicial officials to provide reasons only for secured amounts falling above those provided in the schedule of recommended amounts.¹⁰⁷ Others provide check-box forms for the required reasons.¹⁰⁸ Still others appear to have no record requirement at all.

¹⁰¹ As mentioned previously, using the release process to detain defendants by using money potentially violates both substantive and procedural due process, equal protection notions, and the prohibition against excessive bail.

North Carolina Law: The Release Process

Looking at the release processes broadly, North Carolina’s law is like most other states’ bail laws, in that it is charge-based, overly reliant upon financial conditions, does not include provisions for empirical risk assessment, has limits upon pretrial services agency supervision, and tends naturally to point to the use of mostly secured money bonds administered by commercial sureties. The North Carolina statute does not have the feel of a statute cobbled together over the decades; indeed, it appears to have much more direction and cohesive intent than most other state’s bail laws. Nevertheless, it also appears to have grown over time simply to respond to the various crimes separated out for different pretrial treatment.¹⁰⁹ Like most states, there are some good provisions, such as an express presumption for release on recognizance or unsecured bond,¹¹⁰ but there are also some bad ones, such as those requiring money to address public safety and permitting “bond doubling.”¹¹¹

As previously noted, believing that the legal right that defendants enjoy pretrial is a right merely to have “conditions set” can lead to significant hindrances when secured money remains one of those conditions. Quite broadly, secured money conditions cause the two most significant problems we see in the field of pretrial justice: (1) the unnecessary and often unlawful detention of low and medium risk defendants for failure to pay the security necessary for release; and (2) the unwise release of extremely high risk defendants who have the money necessary to obtain release. People often equate the first problem as one representing a lack of fairness, but North Carolina should realize that detaining low and medium risk persons unnecessarily for even short periods of time also causes increases in new criminal activity and failures to appear for court both short- and long-term. Thus, the more that the North Carolina release process can be improved to quickly assess and release all eligible defendants, but especially low and medium risk defendants, the more public safety will be enhanced.

The statute currently attempts to do this through its presumption of release under either a written promise to appear or an unsecured bond,¹¹² but because there exist no provisions concerning the use of empirically-derived risk assessment instruments, North Carolina judicial officials must attempt to assess risk mostly clinically – that is, based on their experience, with untested and unweighted statutory factors and with a series of possibly faulty assumptions about the pretrial process.¹¹³ Accordingly, the presumption of release on a written promise or unsecured bond¹¹⁴ can be easily and possibly incorrectly overcome with little evidence.

Empirically-derived risk assessment is considered to be a prerequisite to effective reform because knowing pretrial risk is the first step toward placing the right defendants in the right places during the pretrial phase of a criminal case. A second prerequisite is risk management. In many jurisdictions, risk management is done most effectively through the use of pretrial services agencies, which assess defendants for pretrial risk, make recommendations to courts, and then supervise defendants using minimal to intensive supervision techniques. In North Carolina, the statute mentions such programs,¹¹⁵ but places severe limitations on their use by requiring both the pretrial entity to accept defendants into the program and the defendants to consent to be placed under supervision. The far better practice using both of these prerequisites is for judicial officials to base their release and detention decisions on empirically-derived risk assessment, and then to order released defendants to pretrial supervision, which might range from a simple phone call reminder to more intensive supervision, depending on the risk.

The primary bail-setting provision in North Carolina involves judicial officials setting at least one of five main conditions, from a written promise to appear to house arrest with a secured bond,¹¹⁶ but, again, the lack of empirical risk assessment and the proper use of pretrial services agency supervision likely pushes judicial officials toward the more restrictive of these conditions to address mostly subjective notions of pretrial risk.

Making sure that the release or detention decision is structured properly and done right in the first instance can virtually eliminate any acute need for review of unattainable conditions. Nevertheless, there is often still some need for a failsafe to make sure the decision is effectuated, and it is absolutely crucial in any system that has not yet made improvements reducing the need for later review. In North Carolina, magistrates may modify a pretrial release order at any time prior to the first appearance

¹¹⁴ The presumption also includes release on option number three, release to the custody of a designated person or organization, but if a judicial official chooses this option, defendants are allowed to choose to post a secured bond instead. See G.S. § 15A-534(a).

before a judge,¹¹⁷ but it appears that there is no formal process for subsequent mandatory review of bonds for misdemeanor defendants who are not released in the first instance.¹¹⁸ This appears to be a significant gap in the North Carolina statute that must be fixed regardless of any additional improvements.

North Carolina Law: The Role of Local Pretrial Release Policies

North Carolina G.S. § 15A-535(a) requires senior resident superior court judges to create and issue local pretrial release policies to help in “determining whether, and upon what conditions, a defendant may be released before trial.” This statutory language indicates that policies might be drafted to potentially supplement various elements missing from the statute, including important elements as a process to detain extremely high risk defendants. Overall, however, the various local pretrial release policies reviewed for this report illustrate mostly varying re-statements of the current statutory requirements along with the inclusion of money-based bail schedules. The policies vary widely in length, in age, in amounts included in the schedules, and, unfortunately, even in articulation of what should be uniform statements of the purposes of pretrial release and detention. Some local pretrial release policies would be rated as very good when held up to legal and evidence-based practices, but others most certainly would not. One frequent problem observed throughout the policies is an articulation of assumptions or rationales based primarily on experience rather than research or the law, and thus policies seeking only to follow the law and the pretrial research would likely look significantly different than the policies this author reviewed. Indeed, even elements within the various policies incorporated without any rationale (indicating, perhaps, universal acceptance), such as monetary bail bond schedules, would likely be eliminated after a review of the law and the evidence.

While there may be a place in pretrial justice for local determination of various details surrounding release and detention, the mechanism incorporated in North Carolina to do so could be improved. This notion should not be read merely to suggest the need for uniformity among the various bail schedules because the use of a traditional money bail schedule is simply not a legal or evidence-based practice. Instead, it should be read to indicate recognition that some local control could be built into a statewide pretrial justice system, but only after statewide issues are fully understood and addressed. Only after a thorough study of bail and no bail in North Carolina can the state likely assess which elements must be addressed in the statute and which can be left to individual judicial districts.¹¹⁹

¹¹⁸ See id. §15A-601(a) (limiting the first appearance provisions to felony defendants); § 15A-614 (requiring release eligibility review for felony defendants).

¹¹⁹ As one example, a state might allow local flexibility in determining the “cut-offs” on a particular risk instrument, but only after that state determines broadly who should be released and detained pretrial, decides to use an empirical risk instrument, determines which instrument to use, and then decides that cut-off flexibility within a given range is even desirable.

Legal Framework Needed to Implement Legal and Evidence-Based Practices in North Carolina

Incorporating legal and evidence-based practices into a state's pretrial release laws typically requires substantial revision to those laws. Knowledge of legal and evidence-based practices often leads to a series of discreet changes, which quickly add up to large-scale revisions. Moreover, simply trying to incorporate a single element of bail reform – such as, for example, risk assessment – can lead to the need to address multiple statutory sections using charge as its primary proxy for risk. Thus, even targeted reforms can require significant statutory changes. Rather than attempting to re-write North Carolina's pretrial statutes, this report recommends broad statutory changes that will need to be fine-tuned by the people of North Carolina. For example, while this report recommends creating a preventive detention provision based on risk, it leaves to North Carolina the determination of who, exactly, should be detained and how best to make that happen.¹²⁰

North Carolina officials likely wish to know both what they can accomplish with little or no changes to the law as well as what changes are absolutely necessary to create a legal and evidence-based system of release and detention. To determine this, we look primarily at the two crucial elements of legal and evidence-based pretrial practices: (1) risk assessment; and (2) risk management surrounding both release and detention, including the elimination of a secured money bond's potential to interfere with either release or detention.

Risk Assessment: Without any statutory alteration, local pretrial release policies could incorporate empirically-derived risk assessment into their decision-making framework.¹²¹ This change would serve to better inform judicial officials as to which defendants should be released and which should be detained pretrial. However, it would also likely further highlight deficiencies in the current statutory release and detention scheme based, in large part, on criminal charge and secured-money bail (especially to purposefully detain high risk defendants).

Incorporating empirically-derived assessment could also be done without altering the current statutory risk factors that are neither tested nor weighted for prediction of pretrial risk.¹²² However, it can cause confusion to have two sets of factors to assess risk. Moreover, having two sources for risk assessment can lead to an unacceptable number of unnecessary overrides to the empirical instrument, and can also lead to decisions that are actually less accurate than when based on the empirical set alone.

¹²⁰ General recommendations can, however, be quite useful as a starting point. In Colorado, for example, the State Crime Commission released three broad recommendations concerning pretrial release (increase the use of evidence-based practices including empirical risk assessment, increase the use of pretrial services agencies, and reduce the use of money), and those three recommendations led to a comprehensive, line-by-line overhaul of the bail statute.

¹²¹ Indeed, this has apparently already been done to some extent in Judicial District 26, which has adopted the Arnold Foundation's PSA-Court tool.

¹²² See G.S. § 15A-534(c).

For these reasons, in addition to empirical risk assessment's importance as a prerequisite to pretrial improvements, North Carolina should consider ways to encourage (if not mandate) and optimize, through its laws, the use of empirically-derived risk assessment instruments statewide.

Risk Management – Release: Without statutory amendment, judicial officials could also initially release virtually all (in the aggregate) low and medium risk defendants (as well as some high risk defendants deemed safe enough to manage outside of secure detention) on a written promise to appear or an unsecured bond, which would eliminate the tendency for secured bonds to interfere with the release of defendants deemed suitable for supervision in the community. Like risk assessment, however, there are strong reasons (including various assumptions surrounding the efficacy of money) for North Carolina to enact proactive statutory changes to dramatically reduce, if not eliminate, the use of secured money at bail.

Moreover, a key element of risk management for released defendants is pretrial supervision using differential supervision techniques based on the risk principle for both public safety and court appearance. However, the statute currently places restrictions on that supervision by not mandating such programs and by not making such supervision mandatory when the judicial official believes it necessary.¹²³ Thus, even if judicial districts created their own pretrial release programs, the various limitations might make it likely that few defendants would participate. Accordingly, while judicial districts might make progress on their own, statutory guidance and/or mandates are likely necessary.

Risk Management – Detention: Judicial officials must also have the ability to detain pretrial extremely high risk defendants through a due process-laden procedure complying with the principles articulated in United States v. Salerno.¹²⁴ Because North Carolina law does not currently allow this (instead, it requires conditions of release to be set for all defendants except for those not entitled to conditions pursuant to statute based primarily on charge), the law must be changed.

Pretrial detention using unattainable money amounts is likely unlawful under multiple legal theories. Accordingly, even if a judicial district incorporates significant procedural due process protections before setting an unattainable money bond, that bond might still be challenged under other theories, such as substantive due process, excessive bail, or equal protection grounds.¹²⁵ As noted previously, money at bail can also pose significant public safety problems, and when money is used to detain, its use tends also to bleed into cases with defendants posing lower risk, leading to additional issues of fairness. Moreover, even states having robust preventive detention provisions often see those provisions ignored when secured money is left in the process.¹²⁶ The only way to leave money in the system and yet make sure that it does nothing to hinder either release or detention of defendants pretrial is to incorporate a mandate that the amount not lead to detention,¹²⁷ which, in turn, highlights the importance of creating a proper risk-based detention provision to begin with.

¹²⁵ For example, recent federal lawsuits challenging the use of unattainable financial conditions on equal protection grounds have led to settlements practically eliminating the use of secured financial conditions. Any jurisdiction looking into pretrial justice must always consider the possibility that secured money bonds as a condition of release might one day be simply removed as a lawful alternative.

Accordingly, there is much that can be done without legislation, but it would require massively coordinated efforts by all judicial districts (and judicial officials within those districts) and an almost inconceivable change in current judicial and public culture. For example, under current law, judicial districts could incorporate risk instruments into their decision-making frameworks, create pretrial services programs to perform evidence-based risk management functions, systematically release all low and medium risk defendants on written promises to appear or unsecured bonds, convince those defendants to agree to pretrial services agency supervision, and use unattainable secured bonds, albeit likely unlawfully, to detain defendants with unmanageable risk and who fall outside of the categories of cases eligible for “no conditions.” Such a system would resemble a “model” pretrial release and detention system, but having such a system arise organically across North Carolina is highly unlikely to happen. And even if it did, the option of using money to detain might be challenged and curtailed or eliminated, forcing North Carolina to once again revisit its laws concerning release and detention. The better option is for North Carolina to instead consider comprehensive changes to its laws now, prior to potentially being forced.

¹²⁶ For example, numerous officials from Wisconsin have report privately that their preventive detention provision is not used primarily because it is cumbersome compared to using secured money bail. In Colorado, judges routinely avoid using a much less robust provision and rely, instead, on secured money bonds to detain high risk defendants.

¹²⁷ The relevant American Bar Association Pretrial Release Standard states: “The judicial officer should not impose a financial condition that results in the pretrial detention of the defendant solely due to an inability to pay.” American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice (3rd Ed.) Pretrial Release (2007) Std. 10-5.3 (a) at 110. The federal and the District of Columbia statutes each have provisions prohibiting judges from ordering financial conditions that result in the pretrial detention of the defendant. See 18 U.S.C. § 3142 (c)(2); D.C. Stat. § 23-1321(c)(3).

V. RECOMMENDATIONS

North Carolina should implement the following recommendations for achieving a 21st Century legal and evidence-based pretrial release system that will allow for the simultaneous movement toward all three goals of the pretrial release decision – public safety, court appearance, and release for bailable defendants.¹²⁸ The recommendations are presented as short-term (to be accomplished in the next 18 months), mid-term (to be accomplished within three years), and long-term (to be accomplished within the next five years.)

Short-Term Recommendations

Judicial officials should immediately begin issuing unsecured bonds for pretrial release instead of secured bonds.

Current law allows for a number of pretrial release options, including the issuance of unsecured bonds—those that require payment only upon a defendant’s failure to appear in court. As noted in this report, judicial officials have relied on secured bonds more out of habit than evidence.¹²⁹ But as noted earlier, research has demonstrated that unsecured bonds are equally as effective at assuring public safety and appearance as secured bonds.¹³⁰ Unsecured bonds offer the additional benefit of resulting in substantially less pretrial detention than secured bonds.¹³¹ Given that research, plus the North Carolina statute requiring that judicial officials select the least restrictive release option,¹³² there is no reason why unsecured bonds could not immediately begin replacing secured bonds. The expanded use of unsecured bonds will go a long way to eliminating poverty-based incarceration in the state.

Appoint a Legal and Evidence-Based Practices Implementation Team to oversee the implementation of the recommendations of this report.

The purpose of the Implementation Team would be to collaboratively identify and guide a data-driven approach to pretrial justice that works for North Carolina, incorporating the law and the best empirical research to best achieve the three goals of the pretrial release decision. Team members should be well-respected leaders of their stakeholder groups, capable getting buy-in from their colleagues, and fully committed to implementing legal and evidence-based pretrial release practices in the state. The Team should be comprised of representatives of the judiciary, court administration, prosecution, defense, law enforcement, jail administrators, victims, state legislators, and county elected officials.

¹²⁸ See Section I (discussing the importance of a balanced approach to pretrial justice).

¹³⁰ Supra, note 16.

¹³² G.S. 15A-534(b).

The Implementation Team should be authorized to appoint sub-committees, and members to those subcommittees, to help implement these recommendations.

The Implementation Team should develop a vision statement for a state-wide, data-driven pretrial justice system in North Carolina.

Guided by the information and recommendations in this report, the Implementation Team should create a vision statement that describes a legal and evidence-based pretrial justice system for North Carolina that encompasses the three goals of the pretrial release decision. (See Appendix D for examples of vision statements of jurisdictions working to implement legal and evidence-based pretrial justice practices.)

The Implementation Team should develop an Implementation Plan based upon the vision statement with a focus on initially implementing the plan in 5 to 7 pilot counties.

Achieving the vision in a timely manner will require an implementation plan that will serve as a roadmap and timeline for putting vision components into practice. In keeping with recognized implementation science and strategy, it is recommended that the Implementation Team focus on implementing this plan in 5 to 7 of the state's counties (i.e., a mix of urban, suburban and rural). This will allow for "pilot" testing of the tools and policies and procedures, so that wrinkles in implementation can be ironed out before a statewide roll-out of the plan.

The Implementation Team should incorporate the following elements in its plan:

The use of an empirically-derived pretrial risk assessment tool by every magistrate in every criminal case at the initial appearance.

Given the benefits of the Arnold Foundation's PSA-Court tool, as described earlier,¹³³ this tool should be the first choice for North Carolina. As noted earlier, the tool is not publicly available yet, but the Implementation Team should work with the Arnold Foundation to try to approximate a time when it might be available to the state. If the tool will not be available when the team is otherwise ready to begin implementing this plan in the pilot counties, then the Virginia Pretrial Risk Assessment Instrument (VPRAI) should offer a workable alternative.¹³⁴ The VPRAI was empirically tested in multiple jurisdictions in a state that borders North Carolina, which should provide some confidence that it would perform well in North Carolina. Whatever tool is selected should be subjected to a validation study.

¹³³ Supra, p. 22.

¹³⁴ The Committee received information about the VPRAI at its February 12, 2016 Committee meeting from Kenneth Rose, Pretrial Coordinator, VA Department of Criminal Justice Studies. Information presented by Mr. Rose is posted on the NCCALJ's website (<http://nccalj.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/02/Commission-Presentation-1.pdf>).

The use of a release/detention matrix that factors risk level and charge type.

The Implementation Team should seek consensus on a matrix that would provide guidance to magistrates and judges in pretrial release decision-making.¹³⁵

The development of differentiated risk management procedures that match the identified risk to the appropriate supervision level.

As noted in the report, about 60% of North Carolina counties are not served by pretrial services programs.¹³⁶ Even in many of those counties that have such programs, supervision capacity is limited. With 100 counties in the state, many that are rural, implementing legal and evidence-based pretrial risk management practices in every part of the state is a challenge that the Implementation Team must address. There are two different approaches that the Team should explore.

The first approach would be establishing a statewide pretrial services program, with the capacity to supervise defendants released by the court with conditions in every part of the state. Kentucky has had statewide pretrial services since the 1970s, and New Jersey is in the process of implementing statewide pretrial services. A statewide pretrial services would offer several benefits: (1) it would assure supervision services are provided uniformly throughout the state; (2) it would assure standardized supervision practices; and (3) it would require a standardized data system for recording supervision activities and outcomes.

The second approach would be for the counties to run but the states to fully or substantially fund pretrial services programs in the state. This approach is used in Virginia, where the Virginia Department of Criminal Justice Services provides funding for 29 pretrial services programs that serve 97 of Virginia's 133 localities.¹³⁷ This arrangement is authorized by statute.¹³⁸

Regardless of the approach used, the Implementation Team should remember that supervision services should be reserved only for those defendants who need them, given their risk levels. As noted earlier, supervising low risk defendants has no beneficial impact on increasing their already high rates of success.¹³⁹

One intervention that all defendants, regardless of their risk level, should receive is a court date reminder. The research, cited earlier, has made clear that the simple act of reminding defendants of their upcoming court dates has a significant impact on improving court appearance rates.¹⁴⁰ The technology is available, and is becoming increasingly affordable, to establish automated systems that can call or text such reminder notices.

The expanded use of citations by law enforcement

As discussed above, expanding the use of citations in lieu of arrest in appropriate cases is an important strategy for achieving a balanced approach to pretrial justice, and it already has been successfully implemented in at least one state.¹⁴¹ North Carolina law already allows law enforcement to issue a citation for any misdemeanor or infraction.¹⁴² The Implementation Team should work with law enforcement agencies throughout the state to identify the opportunities for expanding the use of citations, and to see if the obstacles that exist to doing so can be addressed.

Early involvement of prosecutor and defense counsel

Given the benefits, described in Section III, of having a prosecutor screen cases before the initial pretrial release decision and for both prosecution and defense to be present at that hearing, the Implementation Team should identify how to make this happen. The State of Delaware, which, like North Carolina, has a 24/7 magistrate system, already is seeking to do this. Officials have set up special procedures for persons charged with certain felony offenses in that state's largest jurisdiction – Wilmington. Instead of having Magistrate Court 24/7 for those defendants, one court session is held at 8am and another at 8pm. This makes it easier for prosecution and defense to be present and making appropriate representations to the magistrate on the issue of pretrial release. Officials will take what they learn from this pilot effort to see if they can overcome the challenges presented by staffing initial appearances with prosecutors and defenders for indigent defendants.

The institution of automatic bond review procedures for misdemeanor defendants.

As discussed above, some in-custody defendants do not receive timely review of their release conditions.¹⁴³ Misdemeanor defendants who are in custody on secured bonds set by the magistrate should have an automatic review of that decision at the next regular session of district court. The Implementation Team should assess whether making this happen will require a statutory change, a change in court rules, a policy directive, or some other action.

Uniform data reporting standards

Collecting the data elements listed in Section IV and required for an effective pretrial justice system would involve every state law enforcement agency, and jail and the court system. To achieve the purposes of data collection for implementing this plan, it would be ideal if there was a uniform data system among all law enforcement agencies and a uniform system among all jails. This may or may not be a practical option. Another approach may be to develop data reporting standards that the appropriate entities would follow. For example, every law enforcement agency would report to a central entity every month how many citations were issued, and for what charges. Every jail would report monthly on the percent of the total population that is held on secured bonds, and the length of stay of those persons, by their risk level.¹⁴⁴ The Implementation Team should work with the state's law enforcement agencies and jails to assess the best ways to implement such data reporting standards.

¹⁴¹ Supra pp. 24-25.

¹⁴³ Supra p. 26.

The Implementation Team should draft language for bills or proposed court rules that incorporate the changes in law needed to implement the plan in the pilot counties.

The Implementation Team should develop a preventive detention framework for defendants who present unacceptably high risk.

As noted above, North Carolina does not have a preventive detention statute that allows for the detention of defendants who present unacceptably high risk.¹⁴⁵ As a result, very risky defendants with resources can buy their way out jail, even when very high bonds are set. The Implementation Team should draft proposed legislation and court rules to establish a preventive detention provision similar to the provision reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court in *United States v. Salerno*¹⁴⁶ (albeit incorporating risk).

The Implementation Team should develop a release framework for defendants who are not detained.

For releasable defendants, the Implementation Team should draft and North Carolina should enact legislation and court rules to give North Carolina judicial officials broad discretion to use legal and evidence-based practices to: (1) effectuate release quickly; (2) successfully manage defendants in the community through conditions and supervision techniques shown by research to be effective at achieving the purposes of pretrial release and; and (3) respond to pretrial failure that does not lead to detention. If money is to be left in such a system, the state should enact a provision mandating that no condition of release lead to the detention of an otherwise releasable defendant. The law should expressly articulate the use of "least restrictive" conditions, and encourage courts to monitor defendants to increase or decrease the use of conditions to respond to changes in risk. Moreover, the law should be changed to provide that no otherwise releasable defendant may be detained for failure to meet a release condition.

The Implementation Team should draft other legislation and/or court rules needed to implement the recommendations in this report.

The Implementation Team should draft and the state should enact provisions mandating the use of the chosen empirically-derived risk assessment instrument, the adoption of a decision-making framework (possibly statewide) designed to guide release and detention decision-making, and the creation of pretrial services programs to use differential supervision methods on all defendants for both public safety and court appearance.¹⁴⁷ It should eliminate the use of traditional money bail bond schedules based on charge. It should enact provisions for the speedy review of pretrial conditions in all cases. It should amend or repeal those provisions in North Carolina law not compatible with these recommendations. And finally, it should actively oppose any future legislation that runs counter to these recommendations.

¹⁴⁴ See supra pp. 26-27 (listing other data needs).

¹⁴⁵ See supra pp. 36-37 (discussing this).

¹⁴⁶ See supra note 89.

Mid-Term Recommendations

The Implementation Team should fully implement the plan in the pilot counties.

While some aspects of the plan may be implemented during the short-term period, the Implementation Team should make every effort to implement the full plan in the pilot sites during this period.

The Implementation Team should ensure that all staff with a role in implementing the plan are fully informed of its purpose and rationale and trained for successful implementation.

One of the most important keys to successful implementation of any plan is fidelity by those responsible for carrying out the plan day-to-day. If the plan is not executed as intended, the intended results will not be achieved.

Training should be included as a key part in the implementation plan. At a minimum, information and training sessions should be directed to bail-setting judicial officials, law enforcement officers, assistant district attorneys, assistant public defenders, and pretrial services staff or others who have a role in pretrial supervision.

The Implementation Team should establish a data dashboard to monitor outcomes and regularly review the data and make appropriate adjustments to the plan

The team should assess what changes need to be made to the data infrastructure in place in county jails and the courts to be able to gather the data elements listed in Section III of this report.

Long-Term Recommendations

The Implementation Team should begin implementing the plan in the remaining counties of the state.

¹⁴⁷ Although it is perhaps ideal, pretrial services functions do not necessarily have to be performed by government entities. For example, in Colorado, two entities – one for-profit and one nonprofit – help jurisdictions with release using methods that are similar, if not identical to, public pretrial agency functions. It bears repeating, however, that legal and evidence based pretrial supervision does not include supervision through a commercial surety using a financially-based contract.

Based on the experiences of the pilot projects, the Team should start implementing the plan throughout the state.

The Implementation Team should develop a plan for sustaining changes that have been made and holding accountable those that make the changes.

Sustaining change can be very difficult, particularly as those who pushed for the changes move on. North Carolina leaders and stakeholders should be mindful of this and develop a plan for sustaining reforms. This involves ensuring that statutes and court rules codify these policies. It also involves robust reporting systems and transparency for the public about the risk profile of North Carolina's arrestee population, how risk assessments are used, and how risk-based supervision strategies are being employed and the results they are producing regarding public safety and appearance in court.

North Carolina officials should consider what role, if any, secured bonds should continue to play in the state's pretrial system, and draft appropriate proposals for statutory or court rule amendments.

As North Carolina's plan for a legal and evidence-based approach to pretrial justice unfolds, it should become increasingly clear that the continued use of secured bonds is incompatible with that approach, and it will be much easier to make the case for completely replacing secured bonds with recognizance or unsecured-bond releases.

APPENDIX D. EXAMPLES OF VISION STATEMENTS

Vision Statement of the Delaware Smart Pretrial Policy Team

We envision a fair pretrial system that relies on individualized decisions based on risk and the effective use of resources to honor individual rights, protect public safety and promote the administration of justice.

Ten things we know to be true...

1. We can work well together.
2. Delaware's small size is an asset.
3. Reliable data driven decisions lead to a more objective and reliable system.
4. Meaningful options for supervision will make a better pretrial system.
5. We want to live in a safe community.
6. We must move forward with a risk-based system.
7. More information for bail decisions is better than less.
8. Lack of community-based mental health and substance abuse services contribute to our pretrial detentioner population.
9. Innovation does not have to come at a cost.
10. Sustainability requires commitment.

In our ideal system we would...

Work together,
Protect an individual's right to liberty,
Protect the safety of our community,
Use resources efficiently,
Make risk informed choices,
Utilize meaningful evidence based supervision options for our pretrial system, and Recognize the impact that pretrial decisions have on individuals, the community, and the judicial process.

Vision Statement of the Denver, Colorado Smart Pretrial Policy Team

Pretrial decisions are equitable, fiscally responsible, and data informed; they recognize the presumption of release and reasonably ensure appearance in court with a commitment to public safety.

Guiding Principles

- 1) Release and detain decisions for all defendants should be risk based, individualized, and consider the safety and needs of the community. Release decisions shall be informed by an empirical pretrial risk assessment.
- 2) Pretrial processes shall maintain the presumption of release, equality, justice, and due process.
- 3) Pretrial risk can be lessened for some risk levels with the use of appropriate pretrial supervision conditions.

- 4) Pretrial system decisions should be research based and evaluated based on continuing data outcome evaluation.
- 5) The collaboration of the stakeholders in the pretrial justice process is essential to establish system best practices.

Vision Statement of the Yakima County, Washington Smart Pretrial Policy Team

The vision of Yakima County is to operate a pretrial system that is safe, fair, and effective and which maximizes public safety, court appearance, and appropriate use of release, supervision, and detention.

Executive Summary

As the United States Supreme Court recently declared: “No one doubts the fundamental character of a criminal defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to the ‘Assistance of Counsel.’”¹ This right is so critical that the high Court has deemed its wrongful deprivation to constitute “structural” error, affecting the very “framework within which the trial proceeds.”² For indigent defendants, this fundamental right to effective assistance of counsel must be provided at state expense.³ When the system fails to provide this right, it denies indigent defendants justice. That denial has very real consequences for defendants, including excessive pretrial detention, increased pressure on innocent persons to plead guilty, wrongful convictions, and excessive sentences.⁴

There are, however, other costs associated with the State’s failure to provide effective assistance, including costs to victims, families, communities, taxpayers and the criminal justice system as a whole.⁵ Costs to the criminal justice system include trial delays and an increased number of appeals and post-conviction challenges, all of which must be funded by North Carolina taxpayers, as are costly retrials when those challenges are successful.⁶ As has been noted: “Justice works best when all players within the system are competent and have access to adequate resources. When the system includes well-trained public defenders, cases move faster (helping the court manage growing caseloads), and the system tends to generate and implement innovative programs.”⁷

Trial delay is not merely a theoretical danger; it is an actual one. District Attorneys forcefully asserted to the Committee that an erosion of the quality of North Carolina’s indigent defense bar was impairing their ability to deliver justice in the state’s criminal courts.⁸

In comments to the Committee, Justice Rhoda Billings emphasized that wrongful convictions deny justice to victims and put North Carolina’s citizens in danger by allowing the real criminal to remain at large, free to perpetrate crime on others.⁹ Additionally, families of wrongfully convicted defendants suffer, not just from the loss of a family member who may be incarcerated, but from the dramatic collateral consequences that follow as a result of any criminal conviction, including barriers to obtaining employment, joining the military, or receiving financial aid to pursue higher education.¹⁰ These collateral consequences impair the person's ability to support both himself and his family, often necessitating public assistance and thus additional taxpayer support.

In addition to paying for the cost of an inefficient justice system, taxpayers pick up the tab for ineffective assistance in other ways. When inadequate lawyering results in excessive pretrial detentions and sentences and in incarceration for convictions that are later reversed, the costs of such detentions are paid by North Carolina's citizens.¹¹

Finally — and perhaps most importantly — another cost of failing to provide an effective indigent defense system is a loss of public confidence in the court system's ability to administer justice.¹² Inadequate indigent defense services compromise the integrity of the justice system,¹³ by calling its fairness into question.¹⁴ Because people in the lowest income groups are most likely to require indigent defense services, failures in the indigent defense system are felt most acutely by these individuals.¹⁵ As Justice Billings noted to the Committee: Americans strongly believe that the amount of money a person has should not affect the amount of justice he or she receives; any perception of fairness vanishes if our citizens believe that a poor person is placed at a significant disadvantage in the justice system.¹⁶ In fact, evidence indicates that a majority of citizens already believe that poor people are at such a disadvantage: A recent survey of North Carolinians shows that 64% of respondents believe that low-income people fare worse than others in our state court system.¹⁷

Sixteen years ago the North Carolina General Assembly created the state's existing indigent defense system. While stakeholders agree that North Carolina has benefited greatly from the creation of the Office of Indigent Defense Services (IDS) and the Commission on Indigent Defense Services (IDS Commission),¹⁸ the potential that IDS and the IDS Commission hold for providing uniform quality, cost-effective representation statewide has yet to be fully achieved. North Carolina is not alone in this respect. Just last year, Tim Lynch, Director of the CATO Institute Project on Criminal Justice, noted that “indigent defense in America today is in a state of crisis” and that “[f]or the indigent, the right to counsel too often has been illusory.”¹⁹ Similarly, a recent Heritage Foundation program noted that fulfilling the promise of providing indigent defense services remains a “continuing challenge.”²⁰ Nor is North Carolina alone in its desire to improve indigent defense. In a statement accompanying a major grant to the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (NACDL), Charles G. Koch, chairman and CEO of Koch Industries, expressed support for “NACDL’s efforts to make the Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of an individual’s right to counsel a reality for all Americans, especially those who are the most disadvantaged in our society.”²¹ Support for these efforts crosses traditional ideological lines.²² As noted in a 2012 report on indigent defense reform by the American Bar Association and the NACDL, conservatives and liberals “share the belief that people should be protected by counsel when liberty is taken away.”²³

This report aims to help North Carolina strengthen the protections it offers to indigent people when their liberty is at stake. It begins with a brief background. It then defines the critical characteristics of an effective indigent defense system and makes recommendations regarding how to best achieve those characteristics in North Carolina. Key recommendations include:

- Establishing single district and regional public defender offices throughout the state.
- Providing oversight, supervision and support to all counsel providing indigent defense services.
- Implementing uniform indigency standards.

With respect to improvements in cost-effectiveness in the delivery of indigent defense services, the Commission reports that “overall IDS demand (spending and current-year obligations) since IDS was created has averaged 4.3%, which is significantly below the average annual increase (more than 11%) during the seven years prior to IDS’ creation.” REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON INDIGENT DEFENSE SERVICES 1 (Submitted to the N.C. General Assembly Mar. 1, 2016) [hereinafter IDS REPORT], <http://www.ncids.org/Reports%20&%20Data/Prior%20GA%20Reports/LegislatureReport2016.pdf>. The Commission reports that although indigent defense per disposition expenditures fluctuate from year to year, “overall per disposition costs during fiscal year 2014-15 were only $9.67 more than per disposition costs the year before IDS was established (fiscal year 2000-01).” Id. It further reports that while there have been modest increases in average per case costs for some case types over the past 15 years, the overall increases in demand on the fund are primarily due to an expanding indigent caseload. Id.

- Implementing uniform training, qualification, and performance standards and workload formulas for all counsel providing indigent services.
- Providing reasonable compensation for all counsel providing indigent defense services.
- Developing a long-term plan for the delivery of indigent defense services in the state.
- Ensuring that the indigent defense function is directly accountable to the legislature but independent of the conflicts created by judicial control.
- Reducing the cost of indigent defense services to make resources available for needed reforms.

The NCCALJ²⁴ Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee (Committee)²⁵ recognizes that these recommendations cannot be implemented all at once. It hopes however that they will serve as a long-term blueprint for changes to the state's indigent defense system. In the short term, the Committee hopes that these recommendations will serve as important touchstones for evaluating the merits of new legislative proposals, and that legislation advancing the blueprint, as drawn here, will be adopted and that legislation at odds with it will be averted. It is important to note that many of the Committee's recommendations are interdependent. For example, this report recommends both establishing single district and regional public defender offices statewide and that IDS provide oversight, supervision and support to all counsel providing indigent defense services. The vehicle for implementing the latter recommendation is the offices created by the former.

The Committee's work was limited by both time and resources. As a result, while civil proceedings for which indigent defense services are required are mentioned in this report, its focus is on criminal cases. The Committee suggests that further study be done to make recommendations for improving indigent defense representation in non-criminal cases.

This report begins with background information regarding IDS and the IDS Commission. It then defines the characteristics of an effective indigent defense system. Finally, it makes recommendations to bring North Carolina's indigent defense system in line with those characteristics so that it can best achieve its mission: ensuring fair proceedings by providing effective representation in a cost-effective manner.

Background

Creation of IDS & IDS Commission

In August 2000, the North Carolina General Assembly passed the Indigent Defense Services Act,²⁶ creating the Office of Indigent Defense Services (IDS) and the IDS Commission and charging them with overseeing the provision of legal representation to indigent persons entitled to counsel at state expense. On July 1, 2001, IDS formally assumed its responsibilities under the Act.²⁷

The impetus for the Indigent Defense Services Act included findings from a 1998 legislative study commission that indigent defense in North Carolina suffered – with regards to both cost-effectiveness and quality – from a lack of a centralized agency to provide coordinated planning, oversight, and management. Among other things, the study commission found that the indigent defense function should be independent of judicial control; that an independent centralized agency would be more accountable to the legislature and taxpayers; and that the quality of indigent defense services was unequal across the state, and was at times poor.²⁸

IDS Commission

The IDS Commission oversees IDS as well as the Offices of the Juvenile Defender, Appellate Defender, and Capital Defender. The Commission's 13 members are appointed by the Chief Justice, Governor, Senate, House, State Bar, Bar Association, Public Defenders Association, Advocates for Justice, Association of Black Lawyers, Association of Women Lawyers, and the Commission itself.²⁹

The IDS Commission has substantial authority, including the power to appoint the IDS Executive Director, Appellate Defender, Capital Defender, and Juvenile Defender and to set standards of representation and rates of compensation.³⁰ In 2011, authority to appoint Chief Public Defenders was transferred from local senior resident superior court judges to the IDS Commission;³¹ in 2013, that appointing authority was returned to the local senior resident superior court judges.³²

²⁸ INDIGENT DEFENSE STUDY COMMISSION, REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS (Submitted to the N.C. General Assembly May 1, 2000) [hereinafter LEGISLATIVE STUDY COMMISSION REPORT], http://www.ncids.org/home/ids_study_commission_report.pdf.

²⁹ G.S. 7A-498.4. Commissioners serve a 4-year term, with an optional one-time reappointment. Id. Commissioners must have significant experience in the defense of cases subject to the IDS Act, or have a demonstrated commitment to quality representation in indigent cases. G.S. 7A-498.4(d).

³⁰ G.S. 7A-498.5.

³¹ S.L. 2011-145, sec. 15.16(b) (amending G.S. 7A-498.7(b); requires the local bar to nominate two to three candidates, from which the IDS Commission will make its selection).

³² S.L. 2013-360, sec. 18A.5(a).

The authority to appoint the Public Defender has been vested in different persons and in a combination of persons over time. When the State's first two Public Defender offices were created in 1970, the Governor was given authority to appoint the Public Defender. S.L. 1969-1013. In 1973, a third office was created in District 28 (Buncombe County); while the Governor retained appointment authority with respect to the first two offices, the senior resident superior court judge was given appointment authority for the new office. S.L. 1973-799, sec. 2. From 1975 to 1981, additional offices were created, with the Governor designated as appointing authority. S.L. 1975-956, sec. 14; S.L. 1979-1284, sec. 2; S.L. 1981-1282, sec. 73. Then, in 1985, appointment authority was transferred to the senior resident superior court judge for all offices. S.L. 1985-698, sec. 22.1. In 1987, two new offices were created in Districts 16A (Scotland and Hoke Counties) and 16B (Robeson County). S.L. 1987-1056, sec. 8. The senior resident superior court judge was given appointment authority in District 16A; however, appointment authority for District 16B was vested with "the resident superior court judge of superior court district 16B other than the senior resident superior court judge." Id. at sec. 10. This arrangement continued until the Senior Resident Superior Court Judge in District 16B, Joe Freeman Britt, left the bench in 1997, at which time appointment authority in the district was given to the senior resident superior court judge. S.L. 1997-175. Meanwhile, when a new office was created in District 14 (Durham County), appointment authority went to the senior resident superior court judge. S.L. 1989-1066, sec. 127(b). Thus, by the time IDS and the IDS Commission were created, appointment authority for all Chief Public Defenders resided with the senior resident superior court judge. Although the report of the legislative study commission that led to the Indigent Services Act recommended that the IDS Commission be vested with authority to appoint Chief Public Defenders, LEGISLATIVE STUDY COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 28, at 2, when the IDS Commission was created, appointing authority was left with the senior resident judges. The IDS Commission was first vested with that authority in 2011; specifically, the IDS Commission was authorized to select the Chief Public Defender from a list of two or three attorneys nominated by the local bar. S.L. 2011-145, sec. 15.16(b). Then, effective August 1, 2013, responsibility for appointing Chief Public Defenders was transferred back to the local senior resident superior court judges. S.L. 2013-360, sec. 18A.5(a).

IDS

As initially created in 2001, IDS was an independent agency within the Judicial Department. However, the 2015 Appropriations Act provides that IDS is a sub-agency of the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts (NCAOC).³³ That Act also provides that the IDS budget is part of the NCAOC budget, that the NCAOC shall conduct an annual audit of the IDS budget, and that the NCAOC director has the authority to modify the IDS budget without approval of the IDS Commission.³⁴

The IDS office includes the executive director and administrative staff.³⁵ It is responsible for administration and implementation of policy as directed by the Commission. The executive director has direct oversight of the Office of the Special Counsel, and fiscal authority over the 16 public defender offices.³⁶ The IDS office also has statutory reporting requirements.³⁷

The NCAOC provides general administrative support to IDS,³⁸ in the form of purchasing and personnel functions and technology and telecommunications support.³⁹

³⁵ IDS REPORT, supra note 18. IDS' administrative offices accounted for less than 2% of IDS' overall budget in fiscal year 2014-15. Id. at 4.

³⁶ Public defender offices are located in the following areas: District 1& 2: Camden, Chowan, Currituck, Dare, Gates, Pasquotank, Perquimans Counties and Beaufort, Hyde, Martin, Tyrrell, and Washington Counties; District 3A: Pitt County; District 3B: Carteret County; District 5: New Hanover County; District 10: Wake County; District 12: Cumberland County; District 14: Durham County; District 15B: Orange & Chatham Counties; District 16A: Scotland & Hoke Counties; District 16B: Robeson County; District 18: Guilford County; District 21: Forsyth County; District 26: Mecklenburg County; District 27A: Gaston County; District 28: Buncombe County; District 29B: Henderson, Polk & Transylvania. IDS REPORT, supra note 18.

³⁷ IDS must report annually to the Chairs of the Joint Legislative Oversight Committee on Justice and Public Safety and to the Chairs of the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Justice and Public Safety and the Senate Appropriations Committee on Justice and Public Safety on: the volume and cost of cases handled in each district by assigned counsel or public defenders; actions taken to improve the cost-effectiveness and quality of indigent defense services, including the capital case program; plans for changes in rules, standards, or regulations in the upcoming year; and any recommended changes in law or funding procedures that would assist IDS in improving the management of indigent defense services funds, including recommendations concerning the feasibility and desirability of establishing regional public defender offices. G.S. 7A-498.9. Also, IDS must report annually on contracts with local governments for additional assistant public defender positions. G.S. 7A-346.2(a).

In fiscal year 2014-15, IDS handled 320,489 cases.⁴⁰ Based on NCAOC data, IDS handled 53.7% of all non-traffic criminal filings in North Carolina in that year.⁴¹ However, IDS handled a greater percentage of non-traffic superior court criminal dispositions (71%) than non-traffic district court criminal dispositions (49.4%).⁴²

IDS has responsibility for a wider range of cases than do North Carolina’s prosecutors. In North Carolina, prosecutors handle only trial level criminal cases and some post-conviction matters. Unlike IDS, the prosecution is not responsible for criminal appeals; advocacy for the State in criminal appeals is handled by the Attorney General’s office. And unlike IDS, the prosecution is not involved in any civil cases.

Funding & Budget

Indigent defense services primarily are funded through State appropriations from the General Fund and budgeted recoupment revenues.⁴³ Budget appropriations for the fiscal biennium ending June 30, 2017 are shown in Figure 3 below. Recoupment revenue is shown in Figure 4 below. In addition to state funds, IDS pursues grant funding to support special projects.⁴⁴ Also, two counties —

Characteristics of an Effective Indigent Defense System

Agreement as to the characteristics of an effective indigent defense system is a necessary prerequisite to any recommendations regarding North Carolina's indigent defense system. Without agreement as to what the system should provide, there is no baseline against which to assess its components. The characteristics presented here derive from this overall goal for North Carolina's indigent defense system:

The goal of North Carolina's indigent defense system is to ensure fair proceedings by providing effective representation in a cost-effective manner.

⁴⁵ Id. at 42; Email from Thomas K. Maher, Executive Director, NC IDS to Committee Reporter, Oct. 3, 2016 (on file with Reporter).

[T]he 2013 state tax reforms were accompanied by changes in the withholding tables that are resulting in 40% to 50% fewer people receiving state income tax refunds. One-third of IDS' previous recoupment revenues came from intercepted state tax refunds, and revenues have declined significantly as a result of the tax changes.

Meaningful Access to Counsel

Types of Cases

The United States and North Carolina Constitutions require the State to provide indigent defense services for felony cases and misdemeanor cases if an active or suspended sentence is imposed and in specified other proceedings.⁴⁷ North Carolina’s lawmakers, however, have long recognized that there are good reasons to provide indigent defense services in additional case types above the constitutional floor,⁴⁸ such as promoting efficient case management and ensuring fairness and confidence in the court system. In addition to constitutionally required services, an effective indigent defense program provides services in proceedings arising from or connected with a criminal action in which the defendant may be deprived of liberty or otherwise subjected to serious deprivations⁴⁹ or resulting in significant collateral consequences.⁵⁰

Determination of Indigency

The system must promptly and meaningfully screen clients for eligibility⁵¹ and decision makers must have clear and easily implemented written uniform standards for assessing indigency.⁵² For example, one guideline might state that a defendant who is incarcerated or receiving food stamps is presumed to be indigent.⁵³ Use of presumptions streamlines the process and reduces the cost of indigency screening.⁵⁴ For those not presumed to be indigent, indigency should be determined based on standards that compare “the individual’s available income and resources to the actual price of retaining a private attorney.”⁵⁵ “Non-liquid assets, income needed for living expenses, and

⁵³ ELIGIBLE FOR JUSTICE, supra note 51, at 21-22. income and assets of family and friends should not be considered available for purposes of this determination.”⁵⁶ The standard should not determine individuals ineligible based on strict income or asset cut-offs.⁵⁷

Although uniform standards are the goal, geographic variations in the cost of living and the price of obtaining a lawyer may require local adjustments.⁵⁸

Uniform eligibility standards provide several benefits. First, they help the state predict future costs of indigent defense services.⁵⁹ Second, they help ensure that state funds are used only for persons who are in fact indigent.⁶⁰ Third, they “raise the quality of defense services by concentrating communities’ limited resources where they are truly needed.”⁶¹ Fourth, uniform standards promote fairness by ensuring that similarly situated persons are treated similarly.⁶² And finally, uniform standards promote due process by guarding against arbitrary eligibility determinations.⁶³

Eligibility determinations should not be done by individuals affiliated with the indigent defense services program or any entity that has a conflict of interest in the indigency determination.⁶⁴ Consistent with this principle, a number of people can serve as screeners, such as the magistrate, court personnel, or a judge other than the presiding judge.⁶⁵

Eligibility standards should be regularly updated to account for, among other factors, inflation and increases in the cost of living.⁶⁶ To ensure appropriate use of taxpayer funds, the system must regularly verify, through auditing or other techniques, that the screening tool ensures that services are being provided only to indigent persons.

Timely Appointment of Counsel

Timely appointment of counsel is a key component of an effective indigent defense delivery system.⁶⁷ Timely appointment is necessary for several reasons, one of which is to advocate on the client’s behalf with respect to pretrial release.⁶⁸ Relatedly, early appointment of counsel may

Access to Counsel

Whether in custody or released, indigent defendants must have meaningful access to counsel. Among other things, counsel must be available to interview the defendant prior to court appearances, discuss plea options, identify relevant evidence and key witnesses, and prepare the defendant for hearings and trial. Access also requires that counsel have an office in or near the jurisdiction⁷⁴ or be able to demonstrate that counsel will be available to the court and to the defendant.

A Brief Overview and Suggestions for Future Research*, 78 ALBANY L. REV. 1317, 1322 (2015) [hereinafter Empirical Research on Indigent Defense] (discussing studies showing that involvement of counsel has positive impacts on pretrial release determinations). The importance of securing early pretrial release cannot be overstated. For example, one recent study found that, controlling for all other factors, “when held 2-3 days, low-risk defendants were almost 40 percent more likely to commit new crimes before trial than equivalent defendants held no more than 24 hours.” Laura and John Arnold Foundation, Pretrial Criminal Justice Research (LJAF Research Summary) Nov. 2013, at 4, http://www.arnoldfoundation.org/wp-content/uploads/2014/02/LJAF-Pretrial-CJ-Research-brief_FNL.pdf.

⁷² Billings Comments, supra note 4 (noting that if a defendant is not allowed pretrial release, his or her ability to aid in the defense is greatly inhibited).

⁷³ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5-6.1 (“as soon as feasible”); see also JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 13 (expressly recommending that “defense lawyers should be provided as soon as feasible after accused persons are arrested, detained, or request counsel”); Billings Comments, supra note 4 (right to counsel must begin with the initiation of criminal process and noting that the report of the National Right to Counsel Committee so recommended). Some standards suggest that counsel typically should be provided within 24 hours of such events. ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Commentary to Principle 3.

⁷⁴ Exceptions to the general rule may be appropriate in some proceedings, such as appellate litigation and capital and other serious cases requiring specialized expertise that may not be available locally.

Counsel is Qualified

The system must provide qualified counsel uniformly throughout the state.⁷⁵ In order to meet this obligation, the system must provide appropriate supervision, oversight and support to counsel, as detailed below.

Supervision & Oversight

National standards recognize that supervision and oversight of counsel is essential to ensure that the system is providing effective representation.⁷⁶ Such supervision and oversight should be done by system-employed supervisors.⁷⁷

Initial Selection of Counsel

In an effective indigent defense system, counsel’s “ability, training, and experience match the complexity of the case.”⁷⁸ To provide this guarantee, the system must have uniform statewide standards specifying the prerequisite skills and experience counsel must possess to handle each type of case for which indigent services are provided.⁷⁹ These standards should specify, at a minimum, training requirements (what topics; how much; acceptable providers; how recent, etc.) and required litigation experience (types of cases; how many; how recent, etc.). “A meaningful assessment of attorney qualifications, however, should go beyond objective quantitative measures.”⁸⁰ Appointment standards should be regularly reviewed and modified, as needed, based on developments in the law, science, technology and other disciplines relevant to criminal defense practice.

If there is an insufficient number of qualified counsel to handle caseloads in any geographic area or for any particular type of case, the system should devote resources and develop programs for counsel to gain the necessary skills and experience.

⁷⁵ As has been noted:

No system of public defense representation for indigent persons can be successful unless the lawyers who provide the representation are capable of rendering quality representation. Regardless of whether assigned counsel, contract attorneys, or public defenders provide the defense services, states should require that the attorneys be well-qualified to do so.

JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 191.

⁷⁶ ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 10 (“[d]efense counsel is supervised and systematically reviewed for quality and efficiency”); see also JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 12 (expressly recommending that the statewide board or commission “should ensure that all attorneys who provide defense representation are effectively supervised and remove those defense attorneys who fail to provide quality services”); id. at 91 (it is “essential” that counsel “be appropriately . . . supervised”); SYSTEM OVERLOAD, supra note 5, at 10; ROBERT C. BORUCHOWITZ ET AL., MINOR CRIMES, MASSIVE WASTE: THE TERRIBLE TOLL OF AMERICA’S BROKEN MISDEMEANOR COURTS 40-41 (2009) [hereinafter MINOR CRIMES, MASSIVE WASTE] (“Supervision of misdemeanor defenders is sorely lacking and, often, performance reviews are non-existent”; recommending that such lawyers be actively supervised).

⁷⁷ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 192.

⁷⁸ ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 6.

⁷⁹ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 191 (recommending that the Commission establish and enforce qualification standards and specifying: “A tiered system of qualifications for appointment to different levels of cases, depending on the training and experience of the lawyers, will help to ensure that the defender has the requisite knowledge and skills to deliver high quality legal services, whether the charge is juvenile delinquency, a simple misdemeanor, or a complex felony.”).

⁸⁰ Id. (so stating and noting that “States should also implement other more substantive screening tools, including audits of prior performance, in-court observations, inspection of motions and other written work, and peer assessments”).

To ensure that counsel's ability, training, and experience match the complexity of the case assigned, supervision is required with respect to selection of counsel for each case. Supervision also is required to avoid conflicts, both at initial appointment and as the case develops.⁸¹ And it is required to ensure that counsel has appropriate resources to handle the case, such as office space, office support, access to research tools, etc.⁸²

Ongoing Evaluation of Counsel

The fact that counsel is determined at the outset to have the necessary ability, skills, and experience to handle the case is insufficient to ensure that he or she is delivering effective representation.⁸³ The system should have uniform performance standards for all types of cases.⁸⁴ Evaluation against those standards should involve observations of counsel's in-court performance and client and witness interviews; reviewing counsel's legal filings; and soliciting input from judges, prosecutors, clients and peers.⁸⁵ Evaluation should involve an opportunity for the supervisor to give counsel feedback and develop a remediation plan for any deficiencies.

Ability to Reward & Sanction

In order to incentivize excellence, supervisors must be able to reward good performance. Additionally, system-employed supervisors must have authority to remove or disqualify counsel who provide deficient performance, pursuant to established criteria.⁸⁶ Because peers may be reluctant to remove or disqualify a colleague, this authority should not reside with volunteer local bar committees. To preserve counsel's independence,⁸⁷ authority to remove or disqualify counsel from performing indigent defense services should not lie with the judge, except in cases where removal is required by law or pursuant to the court's inherent authority to discipline counsel.

Monitoring Workload

To ensure that counsel has sufficient time to spend on each case, system supervisors should monitor and adjust workloads for all counsel providing indigent defense services. Monitoring and adjustment should be made pursuant to uniform, statewide workload formulas, as discussed below.⁸⁸

⁸¹ For a discussion of the types of conflicts to be avoided, see OFFICE OF INDIGENT DEFENSE SERVICES, REPORT ON PUBLIC DEFENDER CONFLICTS FOR FISCAL YEAR 2014-15 (2015).

Resources

Even the most qualified and dedicated counsel cannot provide effective assistance if counsel lacks necessary resources,⁸⁹ as outlined below.

Time

Having appropriate time to handle a case is essential to providing a quality defense.⁹⁰ Counsel cannot provide effective representation when caseloads are excessive and counsel lacks time to perform critical tasks, including interviewing clients and witnesses; conducting legal research; writing and responding to motions; accessing and preparing experts, and preparing to advocate on the client's behalf at hearings, trial and sentencing.⁹¹ The costs of ineffective assistance to defendants, victims, the court system and the citizens of North Carolina are detailed above.⁹² Additionally, problems with excessive caseloads can compound: "Eventually, working under such conditions on a daily basis undermines attorney morale and leads to turnover, which in turn, contributes to excessive caseloads for the remaining defenders and increases the likelihood that a new, inexperienced attorney will be assigned to handle at least part of the caseload."⁹³ Thus, national standards emphasize the need for defense counsel to have manageable case and workloads.⁹⁴

Workload Formulas

To ensure that counsel has sufficient time to handle indigent cases and is prepared when the case is called for hearing or trial, the system should have workload formulas in place for all indigent defense providers.⁹⁵ The workload formulas should be more sophisticated than simple caseload limits,⁹⁶ taking into consideration factors such as case complexity, administrative responsibilities⁹⁷ and counsel's skill and experience. Workload formulas should balance quality and efficiency.⁹⁸

⁸⁹ Billings Comments, supra note 4 (when an attorney is overburdened with cases and does not have adequate resources (e.g., for investigators), even the most competent attorney cannot be effective).

⁹⁰ Id.; ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 5 ("Defense counsel's workload is controlled to permit the rendering of quality representation."); SYSTEM OVERLOAD, supra note 5, at 10, 13.

⁹² See supra pp. 3-5.

⁹⁴ ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 5.

⁹⁵ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 12 (expressly recommending that the board or commission "should establish and enforce workload limits for defense attorneys"); id. at 68 ("High caseloads often force attorneys to continue cases."); id. at 194 ("The issue of workload is important not only to public defenders but also to assigned counsel and to private attorneys who provide services pursuant to contracts. In the case of private attorneys, this should include oversight of the extent of their practice in order to ensure that they have adequate time to devote to their indigent cases.").

⁹⁶ There is, however, some evidence that even caseload caps improve the quality of representation. Geoff Burkhart, How to Improve Your Public Defense Office, CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Spring 2016, at 56, 57 (noting that a study by the Center for Court Innovation found that New York City's caseload caps resulted in "highly positive" results).

⁹⁷ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Commentary to Standard 5-5.3 (simple caseload limits are insufficient); JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 12 (expressly recommending that workload limits should take into account other responsibilities in addition to client representation); id. at 192-93.

⁹⁸ See ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 5 ("Defense counsel's workload is controlled to permit the rendering of quality representation.").

Additionally, procedures must be in place to ensure that defense counsel has adequate time to provide quality representation at the time of appointment and throughout representation.⁹⁹

Access to Investigators, Experts & Other Support

Counsel must have access to necessary experts, such as mental health and forensic experts¹⁰⁰ and investigators and interpreters.¹⁰¹ Access must be timely so that counsel can prepare for pretrial hearings, such as bail and competency hearings. Counsel must have access to specialized legal resources, such as forensic resources and immigration counsel. Counsel must have necessary office support, such as a suitable location to work, a private location for client and witness meetings, computer and internet access, telephone services, and access to pattern jury instructions and online legal research tools.¹⁰² While the system should endeavor to provide such access when possible, counsel without such resources should not be allowed to provide indigent defense services.

Compensation

Reasonable compensation is required to ensure that the State can sustainably provide effective indigent defense services.¹⁰³ When compensation falls below reasonable levels, lawyers who can be reasonably compensated elsewhere flee the system. An insufficient number of competent lawyers threatens the system's ability to guarantee effective assistance of counsel, both because of the quality of counsel available and because of higher caseloads for quality counsel still performing indigent work.¹⁰⁴ All of the other costs of failing to provide effective assistance also attach, such as wrongful convictions and case delays.¹⁰⁵

⁹⁹ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 65 (noting that NLADA guidelines so require and that withdrawal should be sought when counsel has insufficient time to provide quality representation).

¹⁰⁰ Experts often are necessary to present an effective defense, test physical evidence, or provide an opinion independent of the prosecution's state-supplied expert. JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 93-94. For an indigent defendant's legal right to such assistance, see Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985) (right to mental health expert) and JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 25 & n.36.

¹⁰¹ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5.14 ("The legal representation plan should provide for investigatory, expert, and other services necessary to quality legal representation."); JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 13, 93-95 ("The outcome of a criminal case can hinge on retaining an appropriate expert or conducting a thorough fact investigation. In the case of non-English speaking clients, qualified interpreters are critical for attorney-client communication."); SYSTEM OVERLOAD, supra note 5, at 10, 13; Billings Comments, supra note 4.

Investigators are needed to interview witnesses and collect physical evidence. JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 93. The Committee notes that access to investigators may reduce the cost of indigent defense services. ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Commentary to Standard 5-1.4 ("If the defense attorney must personally conduct factual investigations, the financial cost to the justice system is likely to be greater because the defender's time is generally more valuable than the investigator's.").

¹⁰² ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Commentary to Standard 5-1.4 (importance of, among other things, secretarial support, computers, telephones, and copying and mailing facilities); id., Commentary to Standard 5-4.3 (it is "essential" that facilities be provided in which clients can be interviewed in privacy and that counsel have necessary office equipment and legal research tools); see also JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 8 (lawyers must have access to technology and data).

¹⁰³ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 12 (expressly recommending that fair compensation should be provided); id. at 195 (noting that the ABA urges "reasonable" compensation).

¹⁰⁴ IDS REPORT, supra note 18, at 15.

¹⁰⁵ See supra pp. 3-5 (discussing these costs).

Training

Having access to training is essential to providing a quality defense.¹⁰⁶ Training is necessary not just for new lawyers, but for experienced lawyers,¹⁰⁷ so that they can keep abreast of changes in the law, science, technology, and other related disciplines.¹⁰⁸ It is also essential for support staff, such as investigators.¹⁰⁹

Feedback on Performance & Remediation Services

As noted above, evaluation of counsel's performance should involve an opportunity for the evaluator to give counsel feedback and to support counsel by developing a remediation plan to address any deficiencies.¹¹⁰

System Is Actively Managed
Collect & Use Data in Decision-Making

Lack of data is an obstacle to improving public defense systems.¹¹¹ Good data informs decision making and leads to better results. In an effective public defense system, data is gathered, maintained consistently over time, and plays a key role in decision making. Data needs in indigent defense are wide and varied and include, among other things:

- Measuring the quality of representation provided through various delivery methods
- Measuring the cost and cost effectiveness of various delivery mechanisms
- Assessing implications on performance of changes in procedures or standards
- Measuring cost implications of procedural or system changes
- Measuring workloads
- Measuring the effectiveness of training and other support systems
- Predicting future funding needs

Long-Term Planning

The system should have a long-term plan for providing indigent defense services that articulates discrete, measurable objectives. The plan should be evidence-based, in that it accounts for among other things: anticipated demographic changes, including geographic in- and out-migration;

¹⁰⁶ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5-1.5 (“The legal representation plan should provide for the effective training, professional development and continuing education of all counsel and staff involved in providing defense services.”); id. Commentary to Standard 5-1.5 (“Adequate and frequent training programs are a key component in the provision of quality representation by defense attorneys.”); ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 9 (“Defense counsel is provided with and required to attend continuing legal education.”); JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 91 (it is “essential” that counsel “be appropriately trained”); SYSTEM OVERLOAD, supra note 5, at 10, 15; MINOR CRIMES, MASSIVE WASTE, supra note 76, at 39-40 (“Appropriate training is critical to practice, regardless of level”; recommending that defense counsel be required to attend training on trial skills, substantive and procedural laws and collateral consequences before being allowed to represent misdemeanor defendants).

¹⁰⁷ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5-1.5 (“The legal representation plan should provide for . . . continuing education of all counsel and staff”); id. Commentary to Standard 5-1.5 (“programs should be established for both beginning and advanced practitioners”).

¹⁰⁸ ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Commentary to Principle 9 (training should be “comprehensive”).

¹⁰⁹ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5-1.5 (“The legal representation plan should provide for the effective training . . . of all counsel and staff”).

¹¹¹ What Policymakers Need to Know, supra note 7, at 1.

predicted changes in crime rates; expectations regarding availability of counsel in geographic areas; and expected technology changes.

This type of long-term planning allows the system and the State to better predict resources needed for indigent defense services. It also allows for an evaluation of the overall system. Additionally, long-term planning permits the system to undertake systemic reform that requires longer lead and implementation time. And finally, when the system's long-term plan is endorsed by lawmakers, it allows the system to focus on accepted long-term objectives, rather than devoting resources to respond to short-term changes in sentiment.

Managed for Efficiency

As noted, the goal of North Carolina's indigent defense system is to ensure fair proceedings by providing effective representation in a cost-effective manner.¹¹² The system must be gathering and using data to make evidence-based decisions about cost-effective ways of delivering services. This should involve evaluation of existing and alternative systems. The system should stay abreast of developments in other jurisdictions and new ideas that may yield efficiencies. When appropriate, pilot studies should be used to test new systems.

Reporting & Accountability

To ensure transparency and confidence, the system should report regularly to the funding authority, courts, the bar, and the public, providing evidence-based assessments of system performance against discrete, measurable objectives.¹¹³ The system should be audited regularly to ensure appropriate use of funds. The system should be directly accountable to the funding authority.

System Affords Appropriate Independence from the Judiciary

Independence is a key component of an effective indigent defense system.¹¹⁴ At the micro level independence refers to the ability of counsel to zealously advocate for the client, unimpeded by conflicts of interest, or control by the prosecutor or judge, except with respect to legal rulings and the trial court's inherent authority to discipline lawyers. To preserve independence at the micro level, direct supervisory authority over counsel should lie with system-employed supervisors. Although it is sometimes asserted that judges can provide the necessary supervision, allowing judges to supervise lawyers providing indigent defense services creates "[s]everal serious problems," including putting "constraints on zealous representation which do not exist for prosecutors or lawyers representing non-indigent clients."¹¹⁵ Additionally, "[i]n general, judges lack ¹¹² See supra p. 12.

¹¹³ ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Commentary to Standard 5-1.2 ("[T]hose responsible for the administration of defense services programs . . . should render periodic reports on operations, and these reports should be made available to the funding source, to the courts, to the bar, and to the public. Regular reports help to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the services provided . . .").

¹¹⁴ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 7 (lack of independence is an impediment to a successful indigent defense program); id. at 80-84.

¹¹⁵ LEGISLATIVE STUDY COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 28, at 7; see also ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5-1.3 (lawyers providing indigent services "should be subject to judicial supervision only in the same manner and to the same extent as are lawyers in private practice"); JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 7 (when there is a lack of independence from the judiciary, "[l]awyers deemed to be too aggressive may be excluded from appointments, or favoritism may be shown to certain lawyers, who are appointed to a disproportionate share of the cases"); Holder, supra note 6 (a statewide survey of Nebraska judges raised concerns about judges who refused to reappoint lawyers who requested too many trials).

the time and information to exercise uniform or coordinated management, or monitor or control the quality of representation.”¹¹⁶ This sentiment was echoed by stakeholders who spoke to the Committee,¹¹⁷ and is consistent with national guidelines.¹¹⁸

At the macro level, independence refers to the independence of the statewide indigent defense system. Assuring an appropriate level of system independence has long been understood to be a critical component of an effective indigent defense system.¹¹⁹ Independence allows the system to set priorities statewide based on its overall goal of ensuring fair proceedings by providing effective representation in a cost-effective manner, as opposed to other court system goals that may undermine that objective, such as increasing case clearance rates. Additionally, an independent system serves as an important counterweight to pressures by individual actors in the court system, such as a district attorney who pressures a lawyer to resolve cases in a certain manner or a judge who unreasonably reduces a lawyer’s fees. Thus, the Report of the National Right to Counsel Committee “urge[d] that the state’s commission be an independent agency of state government and that its placement within any branch of government be for administrative purposes only.”¹²⁰

System Involved in Policy Discussions

As a critical stakeholder in the system with valuable information and experience, the indigent system and indigent defense providers should be involved in policy decisions that affect the delivery of indigent defense services.¹²¹

¹¹⁶ LEGISLATIVE STUDY COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 28, at 7.

¹¹⁷ Comments of Superior Court Judge Anna Mills Wagoner, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (noting difficulties because of Superior Court Judge rotation).

¹¹⁸ See ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Principle 1 (“The public defense function, including the selection, funding, and payment of defense counsel, is independent.”); see id. Commentary to Principle 1 (“The public defense function should be independent from political influence and subject to judicial supervision only in the same manner and to the same extent as retained counsel.”).

Issues of independence also can arise with respect to selection of Chief Public Defenders. The report of the study commission that led to the creation of IDS noted that “serious problems arise by placing authorities over appointment of public defenders . . . with judges;” it thus recommended that appointment authority be vested with the IDS Commission. LEGISLATIVE STUDY COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 28, at 7. Additionally, a 2007 performance audit of IDS by the North Carolina State Auditor noted that because chief public defenders were appointed by the senior resident Superior Court judge of the district those lawyers suffered from a lack of independence from the judiciary. OFFICE OF THE STATE AUDITOR OF NORTH CAROLINA, PERFORMANCE AUDIT—OFFICE OF INDIGENT DEFENSE SERVICES 6-7 (2007). That report stated: “Since it is reasonable to assume that each public defender has an interest in being reappointed to the next four-year term and would like to remain in the judge’s favor during the interim, neither the public defender, his or her staff, nor the private counsel they appoint can be considered free from judicial influence.” Id. at 7. Likewise, national standards emphasize the need for the indigent defense function to be independent of the judiciary and recommend that “[s]election of the chief defender . . . by judges should be prohibited.” ABA STANDARDS, supra note 49, Standard 5-4.1; id. Commentary to Standard 5-4.1 (“What is not deemed satisfactory is for the chief defender to be chosen by judges, because that method fails to guarantee that the program will remain free of judicial supervision. North Carolina’s shifting approach on this issue is detailed in footnote 32 above.

Recommendations

The Committee offers these recommendations for improving North Carolina’s indigent defense system, all of which flow from the characteristics set forth above and are designed to achieve the system’s overall goal: ensuring fair proceedings by providing effective representation in a cost-effective manner.

Organizational Structure & Management

Ensure Accountability to General Assembly & Independence from Judiciary

Retain Existing Commission Structure

The report of the legislative study commission that led to the Indigent Services Act recommended the establishment of an independent commission to oversee IDS.¹²² That recommendation was accepted and the IDS Commission was created. A Commission structure is the majority approach in the country,¹²³ is recognized as the preferred structure for an indigent defense system,¹²⁴ ensures critical independence and accountability,¹²⁵ and should be maintained.¹²⁶

Members of the Commission should be appointed by a diverse group of officials and organizations, with no single person or organization authorized to appoint a majority of Commissioners.¹²⁷ All members of the Commission should be committed to the delivery of quality indigent defense services, and a majority should have prior experience in providing indigent defense representation.¹²⁸ Under current law, a private defense lawyer may serve on the Commission but a full-time Public Defender or employee of the public defender’s officer may not so serve.¹²⁹ Because Public Defenders and their employees can add important perspectives and experience, this restriction should be removed.

The Commission should have a responsibility to hire the Executive Director of IDS and remove him or her for cause.¹³⁰ ¹³⁰ JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 189. Currently, the statute provides that the Commission may remove the Director by a vote of two-thirds of all of the Commission members, G.S. 7A-498.6(a), without specifying that cause is required.

Financial Matters

Budget

The report of the study commission that led to the creation of IDS found that the indigent defense function must be “free of the influences and priorities the NCAOC must set for core court functions, prosecutorial operations, and other programs under the NCAOC” and recommended that the NCAOC should “not have control over policy or budgetary decisions.”¹³¹ National commissions have come out similarly on this issue. The Report of the National Right to Counsel Committee concluded, in part:

If a state’s indigent defense system is financed primarily by the state, it is especially important that its budget remain separate from those of other agencies, including the courts, so that resources directed towards indigent defense are not seen as having a negative impact on other worthwhile spending. For example, if the agency is housed in the judicial branch and is part of the judiciary’s budget, the judiciary may be less likely to advocate for increased indigent defense funding if it means less money will be available for judges, court personnel, and facilities.¹³²

IDS was created as an independent agency within the Judicial Department. As noted above, however, in 2015 the General Assembly made IDS a sub-agency of the judicial branch and gave the NCAOC authority to modify the IDS budget without approval of the IDS Commission.¹³³

Although current NCAOC leadership has indicated that it does not intend to exercise this new budgetary authority, leadership and policies can change. Thus, to preserve appropriate independence from the judiciary, the Committee believes that the pre-2015 standard is preferable with respect to IDS’s status and budgetary authority.

Compensation Methods for Private Assigned Counsel (PAC)

Consistent with the recommendations below regarding PAC compensation methods,¹³⁴ IDS should have flexibility to determine the most appropriate methods of compensating PAC to achieve the overall system goal of ensuring fairness by providing effective indigent defense services in the most cost-effective manner.¹³⁵

Resource Flexibility

The report of the study commission that led to the creation of IDS noted that one deficiency of the then-existing system was that “[c]rucial decisions that could be made flexibly for the most effective ways to provide services are instead fixed in legislation.”¹³⁶ To some extent this deficiency still exists. For example, in 2011, the General Assembly mandated that IDS implement a contract payment system for PAC statewide. The Committee recommends that IDS be afforded flexibility in managing its resources, subject to required reporting and accountability directly to the General Assembly.

That same report recommended that IDS have authority to “determine and implement the best approaches to provide representation in each area of the state among public defender offices, private counsel systems, and/or contracts.”¹³⁷ The Committee concurs and recommends that IDS have broad authority to implement the best approaches to providing representation, including the creation of new Public Defender offices. It further notes that historically the General Assembly has given IDS authority to create a certain number of new attorney and support staff positions within existing defender programs,¹³⁸ and supports continuation of this flexibility.

Direct Accountability to the General Assembly

Consistent with the recommendations of the legislative study commission that led to the creation of IDS, the Committee believes that IDS should be directly accountable to the General Assembly.¹³⁹

System Is Actively Managed

Development of Indigency Standards

The legislative study commission report that led to the creation of IDS noted that “[n]o statewide uniform standards exist for determination of indigency.”¹⁴⁰ Thus, G.S. 7A-498.5(c)(8) was enacted, directing the IDS Commission to develop standards governing the provision of services under the IDS Act, including “[s]tandards for determining indigency.” Notwithstanding this provision, no such standards currently exist. Instead, defendants submit affidavits of indigency¹⁴¹ and each judge makes his or her own determination as to whether or not individuals qualify as indigent. Although IDS has suggested that “it will be very challenging to develop indigency standards that would be both meaningful and flexible enough to take into account the wide variety of financial situations facing defendants and respondents,”¹⁴² the Committee believes that in spite of this difficulty developing such standards will benefit the system. It thus recommends that the Commission develop easily implemented uniform standards for indigency. To promote efficiency, it further recommends that those standards employ presumptions of indigency to avoid a full screening in every case.¹⁴³

Based on evidence suggesting that indigency verification may not be cost-effective,¹⁴⁴ the Committee declines to recommend such a procedure for all cases. The Committee notes that it is a Class I felony to make a false material statement about one’s indigency¹⁴⁵ and that attorneys have a statutory obligation to inform the court if they believe an assigned client has the resources to hire

¹⁴⁰ Id. at 1. G.S. 7A-450(a) defines an indigent person as one “who is financially unable to secure legal representation and to provide all other necessary expenses of representation.”

¹⁴² IDS REPORT, supra note 18, at 7.

¹⁴⁴ As reported by IDS,

[T]he North Carolina court system employed indigency screening staff in the 1990s and found that they were not cost effective. In addition, a 2007 study of indigency verification in Nebraska found that the process detected inaccurate information in approximately 5% of applications for court appointed counsel. However, only 4% of the 5% that included misstatements (or only 1 in every 500 applications) led to the appointment of counsel in cases in which counsel otherwise would not have been provided. A more significant percentage of the inaccurate applications overstated the applicants’ financial resources. If the same holds true in North Carolina, it is highly unlikely that additional screening or verification of financial information in affidavits of indigency would pay for itself.

an attorney.¹⁴⁶ However, to ensure appropriate use of taxpayer funds, IDS should regularly verify, through auditing or other techniques, that the screening tool ensures that indigent defense services are being provided only to persons who are in fact indigent.

Development of Workload Formulas

As noted above, an effective indigent defense system employs workload formulas to ensure that counsel has sufficient time to spend on indigent cases and that cases are tried on time.¹⁴⁷ Additionally, workload formulas can help assess system capacity and future needs.

Except for caseload limits for private counsel handling potentially capital cases,¹⁴⁸ and some case limitations that apply to attorneys handling contracts,¹⁴⁹ IDS does not have workload formulas for counsel providing indigent defense services.¹⁵⁰ The Committee recommends that IDS develop and use workload formulas for public defenders and PAC. The workload formulas should balance quality and efficiency. Consistent with national standards, IDS should contractually limit PAC's participation in private cases that would exceed the workload formulas given existing indigent assignments.¹⁵¹ Workload formulas should be regularly updated based on changes in case processing, technology, and other developments.

Although the Committee defers to IDS on the creation of the appropriate workload formulas, within these broad requirements, it notes that a number of systems have set caseload limits to help maintain quality representation.¹⁵² Reference to these standards may facilitate creation of standards for North Carolina. In no event, however, should national caseload standards be exceeded.¹⁵³ North Carolina's workload formulas should adjust caseloads by complexity, Caseload refers to the number of cases assigned to an attorney at a given time. Id. Workload by contrast is the total of all work performed by counsel; it includes the number of cases assigned but also includes other administrative or supervisory work, and adjusts caseload for complexity. Id.

¹⁵¹ ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Commentary to Principle 5 ("Counsel's workload, including appointed and other work, should never be so large as to interfere with the rendering of quality representation or lead to the breach of ethical obligations, and counsel is obligated to decline appointments above such levels." (emphasis added)).

¹⁵² SYSTEM OVERLOAD, supra note 5, at 11-12 (discussing caseload limits in place in Seattle, Washington DC, among others).

¹⁵³ ABA TEN PRINCIPLES, supra note 51, Commentary to Principle 5 ("National caseload standards should in no event be exceeded . . ."). Like others, the Committee expresses caution with respect to the national maximum caseload numbers suggested by the National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals in 1973. As has been noted, those standards are decades old and were never empirically based. JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 66 (asserting that those standards "should be viewed with considerable caution" because of their age, lack of empirical support, and the fact that since they were developed the practice of criminal and juvenile law has become "far more complicated and time-consuming"; those 1973 standards set caseload limits at: 150 felonies; 400 misdemeanors; 200 juvenile cases; 200 mental health cases; or 25 appeals). For one set of more recent standards, see DOTTIE CARMICHAEL ET AL., GUIDELINES FOR INDIGENT DEFENSE CASELOADS: A REPORT TO THE TEXAS INDIGENT DEFENSE COMMISSION (2015) ("for the delivery of reasonably competent and effective representation attorneys should carry an annual full-time equivalent caseload of no more than" 236 Class B Misdemeanors; 216 Class A Misdemeanors; 175 State Jail Felonies; 144 Third Degree Felonies; 105 incorporate counsel's administrative responsibilities to the system,¹⁵⁴ and account for variations in local practice that may affect efficiency.¹⁵⁵

Robust Local Supervision

As noted above, an effective indigent defense system requires rigorous supervision and oversight of its indigent defense service providers.¹⁵⁶ To ensure appropriate independence, counsel should be supervised by local system-employed supervisors.¹⁵⁷ In public defender offices, the structure and personnel exist to provide such supervision and oversight to assistant public defenders and staff. However, such supervision and oversight is not carried out uniformly in all public defender offices. To address that, IDS should develop uniform standards regarding supervision and oversight, consistent with the characteristics of an effective indigent defense delivery system as stated above.¹⁵⁸

The appropriate structure and personnel do not exist to provide the necessary supervision and oversight of PAC. Currently, these attorneys are supervised, if at all, by volunteer local bar committees, or for those doing contract work, by IDS's regional defenders. Volunteer bar committees are unable to provide the requisite level of supervision. First, they lack the infrastructure and capacity to do so. Second, perhaps because bar committee members may find it difficult to sanction a peer in the local community, such sanctions rarely occur, indicating a lack of rigor in this peer review system. While IDS's regional defenders provide important oversight for contract attorneys,¹⁵⁹ only two such positions exist, responsible for oversight of 218 contract lawyers.¹⁶⁰ This workload precludes the type of rigorous review required for an effective indigent defense system.

In light of this and consistent with national standards,¹⁶¹ the Committee recommends the use of local PAC supervisors housed within single district, regional or conflict public defender offices¹⁶² and afforded the required time and resources to provide the necessary oversight and supervision pursuant to uniform policies adopted by IDS. Consistent with national standards, the local ¹⁵⁴ See supra p. 18 (discussing factors that should be incorporated into a workload formula).

supervisors should be lawyers with experience in North Carolina criminal law.¹⁶³ The local supervisors would replace the current supervisory role of volunteer local bar committees and would ensure implementation of uniform workload, training, and performance standards as well as provide required support to PAC.¹⁶⁴

Uniform Training Standards

As noted above, training is a key component of an effective indigent defense system.¹⁶⁵ Currently, IDS has no uniform training requirements for new defense counsel or continuing education requirements for experienced lawyers. To the extent training requirements exist,¹⁶⁶ they vary by jurisdiction, as set forth in the jurisdiction's appointment plan.¹⁶⁷ Some local plans were waived in when IDS was created and have not been updated since; given the age of these plans it is not possible to believe that their training requirements are currently appropriate, given changes in law, science, and technology. In jurisdictions without a public defender office it is not clear how or if training requirements are enforced by the local bar committee. Public defenders receive more regular training through an IDS/UNC School of Government partnership,¹⁶⁸ but training opportunities still vary, with some offices offering robust in-house training and others offering none.

To ensure that counsel has the necessary ability and skills to handle indigent cases, IDS should develop uniform training requirements for all defense counsel, setting out training prerequisites for particular cases (type of training, hours, how recent), continuing education requirements, and acceptable training providers. The Committee further recommends that these standards be enforced by local supervisors.

If at any time the system lacks qualified lawyers in a particular jurisdiction or for any particular type of case, IDS should develop programs for counsel to gain the necessary skills and experience, such as a second chair program or collaboration with law school clinical programs.

Uniform Qualification Standards

As noted above, in an effective indigent defense system, counsel's ability, training, and experience match the complexity of the case; to provide this guarantee, the system must have uniform standards specifying the prerequisite skills and experience counsel must possess to handle each type of case for which indigent services are provided.¹⁶⁹ North Carolina has no such uniform

¹⁶⁵ See supra p. 19 (so noting); see generally MINOR CRIMES, MASSIVE WASTE, supra note 76 at 40-41 ("Supervision of misdemeanor defenders is sorely lacking and, often, performance reviews are non-existent."; recommending that such lawyers be actively supervised).

¹⁶⁶ Some appointment plans fail to state any training requirements for handling serious cases. See, e.g., Vance County Appointment Plan (specifying no training requirements to serve on the list to handle Class F through I felonies), http://www.ncids.org/IndigentApptPlans/Non-PD Appt Plans/Vance County.pdf; District 1 Appointment Plan (specifying no training requirements to serve on the list for Class A through E felonies), http://www.ncids.org/IndigentApptPlans/PD Appointment Plans/1st judicial district.pdf.

standards in place.¹⁷⁰ The Committee recommends that, in addition to establishing and enforcing through local supervisors uniform training requirements as discussed immediately above, IDS develop and enforce in the same manner standards specifying required litigation experience (types of cases; how many; how recent, etc.) for each IDS case type.¹⁷¹ The Committee further recommends that these standards be regularly reviewed and modified, as needed, based on developments in the law, science, technology and other disciplines relevant to criminal defense practice.

Uniform Performance Standards

The IDS Commission is required by law to establish “[s]tandards for the performance of public defenders and appointed counsel.”¹⁷² To date, the IDS Commission has developed and published performance guidelines for attorneys representing:

- indigent defendants in non-capital criminal cases at the trial level¹⁷³
- juveniles in delinquency proceedings,¹⁷⁴
- indigent parent respondents in abuse, neglect, and dependency cases,¹⁷⁵ and
- indigent parents in termination of parental rights cases.¹⁷⁶

The policy pertaining to non-capital criminal cases was adopted twelve years ago; the others were adopted nine years ago.¹⁷⁷

IDS reports that because of the close supervision afforded in the offices of the Capital Defender, Appellate Defender and the Center for Death Penalty Litigation and because it screens the qualifications of lawyers who handle capital and appellate cases, it has not devoted resources to developing performance standards for potentially capital, appellate, or post-conviction capital cases.¹⁷⁸ IDS reports that it has not devoted resources to developing best practices in post-conviction non-capital cases because of the small number of such cases that the system handles outside of North Carolina Prisoner Legal Services.

Notwithstanding this, to ensure consistent quality throughout the state, IDS should establish uniform standards for performance of counsel for all cases in which it provides services.¹⁷⁹ These standards are necessary both to support counsel (e.g., in training and as resources for new counsel) and so that local supervisors can adequately assess their work. Additionally, IDS should develop a regular schedule for review of its performance standards; at a minimum, standards should be reviewed every seven years.

Data Collected & Maintained; Evidence-Based Decisions

As recommended throughout this report, IDS should move towards uniform measures and standards. IDS's long-term planning and short-term decisions should be based on objective data as evaluated against these measures and standards.¹⁸⁰

Long Term Plan for Indigent Defense Services

North Carolina currently does not have a long-term plan for the delivery of indigent defense services. The Commission heard evidence about expected changes in North Carolina's demographics.¹⁸¹ North Carolina needs a long-term plan for providing indigent defense services that accounts for these demographic and other changes.¹⁸² Such a plan may forecast shifting resources from areas where population is expected to decrease to those expected to increase. Having such a plan will aid not only IDS and the IDS Commission but also legislators as they plan for needed resources. Additionally, because such a plan will include discrete, measurable objectives,¹⁸³ it will allow for evaluation of the system.

Access to Counsel Types of Cases

As noted above, an effective indigent defense program provides services in criminal cases and in proceedings arising from or connected with a criminal action against the defendant and in which the defendant may be deprived of liberty or subjected to serious deprivations or collateral consequences.¹⁸⁴ In light of this, indigent defense services should be expanded to defendants filing petitions for removal from the sex offender registry,¹⁸⁵ based on the severity of the consequences that attach when such a petition is denied.¹⁸⁶

¹⁸⁰ The Committee notes that IDS currently has a Systems Evaluation Project underway. Details of that project are provided in the IDS Commission's 2016 Report to the General Assembly. See IDS REPORT, supra note 18, at 40-42.

¹⁸⁶ The Indigent Defense Subcommittee also raised the issue of extending indigent defense services to all misdemeanor prosecutions against 16- and 17-year-olds because of the severe collateral consequences that attach to young persons upon conviction. However, because of the Committee's separate recommendation to raise the juvenile age, see JUVENILE REINVESTMENT, NCCALJ CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION & ADJUDICATION COMMITTEE REPORT, this issue is not addressed here. If the Committee's raise the age recommendation is not implemented, counsel should be provided in all misdemeanor prosecutions against juveniles.

Time for Appointment

As noted above, timely appointment of counsel is a key component of an effective indigent defense system.¹⁸⁷ Many public defender offices assign staff to regularly review jail populations to ensure that appointments are timely made for in-custody defendants. In areas without a public defender office, no system or infrastructure exists to conduct such a review. As explained below, the Committee recommends that all areas of the state be served by either a single-district or regional public defender office.¹⁸⁸ Creation of such offices will provide the infrastructure for such reviews. IDS should, by policy or rule, require frequent review of jail populations by assigned staff in single-district and regional public defender offices to ensure timely appointment of counsel.¹⁸⁹ Additionally, to ensure that all in-custody indigent defendants receive counsel as soon as possible after detention, the Committee further recommends that the first appearance statute be amended to require a first appearance for all in-custody defendants within 48 hours or the next day that district court is open.¹⁹⁰

Waiver of Counsel

Current law allows certain magistrates to accept waivers of counsel.¹⁹¹ Although the Committee believes that magistrates can make initial indigency determinations using a uniform indigency screening tool,¹⁹² it believes that only a judge should be authorized to take a waiver of constitutional rights¹⁹³ and that current law should be amended accordingly.

¹⁸⁷ See supra p. 14.

¹⁸⁸ See infra pp. 33-34.

¹⁸⁹ Under G.S. 7A-453, a custodian must inform authorities when that person has custody of someone who is without counsel for more than 48 hours. In public defender districts, notification is made to the public defender office. Id.; Rules of the Commission on Indigent Defense Services, Rule 1.3(b). In areas without such an office, notification is made to the clerk of superior court. G.S. 7A-453. In the latter situation, it is not clear whether such notifications are uniformly occurring or what happens after such notification is made.

State law requires a first appearance to be held within 96 hours after a felony defendant is taken into custody. G.S. 15A-601. A counsel determination is made at that proceeding. G.S. 15A-603. A first appearance is not, however, required for in-custody misdemeanor defendants.

Recent research shows that controlling for other factors, even a short pretrial detention can have negative consequences for a defendant. See supra note 68.

For all of these reasons, the Committee recommends frequent review of jail rosters as explained in the text above.

¹⁹⁰ Under existing law, a first appearance need only be held for in-custody felony defendants; it must be held within 96 hours after the defendant is taken into custody or at the first regular session of district court, whichever is earlier. G.S. 15A-601. Because the statute does not afford a first appearance for in-custody misdemeanor defendants, these individuals sometimes remain in pretrial detention, without any court hearing, until their first court date, which then must be continued because they do not have counsel. In some instances, a misdemeanor defendant will spend more time in pretrial detention than could be imposed as a sentence if he or she is found guilty. Additionally, as noted above, recent research shows that controlling for other factors, even short pretrial detentions can have negative consequences for a defendant. See supra note 68.

¹⁹¹ G.S. 7A-146(11) (chief district court judge may designate certain magistrates to accept waivers of counsel in all cases except potentially capital cases).

¹⁹² ELIGIBLE FOR JUSTICE, supra note 51, at 8 (noting that a magistrate is one of several court personnel who appropriately can serve as an indigency screener); see supra pp. 25-26 (recommending uniform indigency standards).

¹⁹³ The procedure of taking a constitutionally valid waiver of counsel is exacting, see Jessica Smith, Counsel Issues, in NC SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES' BENCHBOOK (Jessica Smith, Editor), <http://benchbook.sog.unc.edu/criminal/counsel-issues>, and failure to take a proper waiver of counsel results in reversal. See JESSICA SMITH, CRIMINAL CASE COMPENDIUM, <https://www.sog.unc.edu/resources/legal->

Ability to Meet and Communicate with Counsel

As noted above, indigent defendants must have timely access to counsel.¹⁹⁴ This is a particular problem with in-custody defendants. IDS reported to the Committee that some jail rules and policies create barriers to counsel's confidential access to in-custody defendants, including strict visitation hours, guards who will not afford privacy for client meetings, and long wait times for visitation. IDS should document these difficulties and advocate for rule and policy changes to facilitate counsel's access to in-custody defendants.

Because geographic distances can make it difficult for lawyers and clients to meet face to face,¹⁹⁵ the Committee recommends that PAC assignments take into account, whenever possible, this access issue.

Delivery Systems Preference for Public Defender Offices

For the following reasons, the Committee believes that the best delivery system for indigent defense services in North Carolina is a public defender office:

- A public defender office provides personnel and infrastructure to offer the oversight, supervision, and support of counsel (both within the office and PAC) required for an effective indigent defense delivery system.¹⁹⁶
- Strong stakeholder support for services delivered by public defender offices.¹⁹⁷
- Empirical research showing that, on average, public defenders provide better services than PAC.¹⁹⁸

Brooks, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (when a public defender office is monitoring the appointed list, quality is improved); Comments of District Attorney Seth Edwards, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (comparing the quality of representation provided by public defenders versus PAC and noting that the public defender office enforces a requirement that counsel meet with the defendant within a specific number of hours whereas PAC sometimes come to court never having met with their clients; noting that the new public defender office in the district has raised the quality of counsel and "has done a great job").

¹⁹⁸ See Radha Iyengar, An Analysis of the Performance of Federal Indigent Defense Counsel, (National Bureau of Economic Research, Working Paper No. 13187, 2007) (compares federal public defenders and appointed counsel and finds that defendants represented by appointed counsel are more likely to be found guilty and to receive longer prison sentences than those represented by a public defender), <http://www.nber.org/papers/w13187.pdf>; JAMES M. - National standards, which express a preference for public defender offices.¹⁹⁹
- Efficiencies that can be obtained by using providers who devote all of their efforts to indigent cases.²⁰⁰
- The fact that a public defender office is typically in the best position to supply counsel to indigent persons in a timely manner.²⁰¹

Recognizing that resources are not unlimited, the Committee recommends that where caseload is sufficiently high or where quality indigent defense services are unavailable, a single district public defender office, where economically feasible, is the preferred delivery system for indigent defense services. In assessing economic feasibility, reasonable PAC compensation rates should be used. Using the current unsustainably low rates²⁰² in such an analysis is unlikely to ever make creation of a new single district public defender office appear cost effective or cost neutral.

Regional Public Defender Offices When Single District Office Is Not Feasible

To ensure a level playing field, a public defender office should exist in every jurisdiction that has a prosecutor's office. Having such parity should be the long-term goal of the system. Until that long-term goal can be achieved and to effectuate the Committee's preference for public defender offices while doing so in a cost-effective manner, the Committee recommends, consistent with national standards,²⁰³ that where an individual district's caseload does not warrant creation of a public defender office or it is not cost effective to do so, a regional public defender office should be created to serve a multi-district or multi-county area. The Committee notes that IDS already has successfully implemented one such regional defender office in Districts 1 and 2.²⁰⁴ The personnel

Early data from IDS's outcomes research confirms these national results, showing that for key performance indicators (KPIs), North Carolina public defenders outperform PAC. For example, with respect to KPI I (Non-conviction), public defenders achieved 3-year client favorable outcomes 48.9% of the time in high exposure cases; the comparable figure for PAC was 41.6%; for low exposure cases those percentages were 72.4% and 64.0% respectively. See Margaret Gressens, Indigent Defense Milestone: A Comparison of Delivery Systems in North Carolina (May 2016) (PowerPoint presentation on file with Committee Reporter). For KPI V (convicted of highest charge), public defenders had lower client unfavorable outcomes than did PAC, as measured by 3-year averages for both high exposure and low exposure cases, again suggesting better performance. Id. Public defenders also had lower client unfavorable results with respect to KPI VI (Alternative to incarceration convictions ended in supervised probation) than PAC with respect to high exposure cases; with respect to low exposure cases the two groups had comparable results. Id. For KPI III (Felony cases ending in a conviction that end in misdemeanor conviction) public defenders outperformed PAC in client favorable results. Id. Although PAC outperformed public defenders with respect to KPI VIII (failure to appear) (client unfavorable outcome), id., further research is needed to validate these results; for example, research should test whether public defender clients experience higher failure to appear rates as compared to PAC because public defenders are more effective in securing pretrial release for their clients). A similar question must be resolved with respect to KPI VIIa (Percentage of convictions that were time served) where PAC outperformed public defenders. Id.

and infrastructure that such an office would provide would allow for the oversight, supervision, and support necessary to an effective indigent defense delivery system.²⁰⁵

Conflict Defender Offices Where Caseloads Warrant

For the same reasons that the Committee favors single district and regional public defender offices as the primary vehicles for delivery of indigent defense services, the Committee recommends the creation of conflict defender offices where sufficient volume exists to sustain such an office. Currently only a small number of districts have sufficient volume to support such an office. However, given expected demographic changes, additional offices may be justified over time.²⁰⁶

The Committee notes that G.S. 7A-498.7(f1) provides that, whenever practical, public defender offices should seek to assign conflict cases to another office in the region, rather than to PAC. However, as IDS has explained, “with the possible exception of very serious felony cases and excluding the Gaston County conflict attorney who is housed in the Mecklenburg County office, it is rare for an assignment to a neighboring office to be practical because of the additional time it would take assistant public defenders to travel to a neighboring county and because of the disruption to their regular in-county caseloads.”²⁰⁷ Establishing conflict defender offices within the jurisdiction would eliminate this logistical problem.

Pilot Use of Part-Time Public Defenders

State law currently prohibits practicing lawyers to serve as part-time public defenders.²⁰⁸ Allowing part-time defenders to serve in regular, regional, or conflict public defender offices offers benefits to the system, including:

- Administrative flexibility and cost effectiveness in offices where caseloads warrant additional staff less than a full-time employee.
- Administrative flexibility in terms of being able to split one full-time position into two part-time positions and thus cover a larger geographic territory.

Although the Committee notes that part-time defenders will pose challenges, these challenges can be managed with oversight and supervision, including strict adherence to workload formulas.²⁰⁹ It further notes that although some national standards advise against the use of part-time defenders, others endorse their use.²¹⁰ Thus, the Committee recommends that state law be amended to allow for the use of part-time defenders, when and where IDS determines them to be appropriate. In no instance however should a lawyer be hired as a part-time defender if he or she maintains a significant private practice in areas outside of those assigned by the indigent defense system.²¹¹ IDS

Formal Assigned Counsel System for PAC

Even if North Carolina had single district and regional public defender offices covering the entire state, conflict and overload cases will require continued active participation by the private bar.²¹³ Currently, almost 2,600 PAC handle indigent defense cases.²¹⁴ In part because of the large number of PAC doing indigent work, the system is unable to adequately supervise and support these lawyers.²¹⁵ This problem is not new. In fact, the lack of “statewide uniform standards . . . for . . . appointment, qualifications . . . or performance of counsel” was cited as a reason supporting the creation of IDS.²¹⁶ These deficiencies continue to exist. In districts with a public defender office, IDS and the Commission have “worked with the chief public defenders to develop plans for the appointment of counsel in non-capital criminal and non-criminal cases . . . , which provide for more significant oversight by the public defenders over the quality and efficiency of local indigent representation and contain qualification and performance standards for attorneys on the district indigent lists.”²¹⁷ In districts without a public defender office, IDS and the Commission have developed a model indigent appointment plan that includes qualification standards for the various indigent lists, provides for oversight by a local indigent committee, and includes some basic reporting requirements to the IDS Office.²¹⁸ Although districts are required to adopt appointment plans, they have some discretion regarding the content of their plans.²¹⁹ IDS reports that as it implements contracts pursuant to legislative mandates, local appointment plans are being supplemented or superseded by contractor appointment instructions that IDS issues in consultation with local court system actors.²²⁰

The Committee finds that the existing method of supervising PAC is deficient in the following respects:

attorney maintains a private practice involving civil cases”). See generally supra p. 10 (listing the civil cases for which indigent defense services are provided). Although the authority cited here focuses on lawyers who maintain a civil practice beyond that served by the indigent defense system, similar concerns arise where the lawyer’s private criminal practice is outside of the area handled in his or her indigent cases.

²²⁰ IDS REPORT, supra note 18, at 5.

- Because appointment plans vary by jurisdiction, there is no uniform statewide standard with respect to the ability, training, and experience required for indigent cases.²²¹
- Some appointment plans fail to state minimum training requirements²²² or litigation experience or fail to state those requirements with the necessary specificity.²²³
- No uniform requirement is in place for the regular review and updating of appointment plans.²²⁴ According to IDS, some appointment plans have not been updated since the 1980s.
- No infrastructure or systems exist to address a shortage of qualified PAC to handle caseloads in particular areas or for particular types of cases.²²⁵
- No infrastructure or systems exist to verify that PAC meets the minimum standards required to handle the particular case (e.g., training and experience).²²⁶
- No infrastructure or systems exist to help PAC identify and report conflicts when a case is initially assigned and as it progresses.²²⁷
- The plans do not require and no infrastructure or systems exist to ensure that counsel has appropriate resources to handle the case, such as office space, office support, access to research tools, etc.²²⁸
- The plans do not require and no infrastructure or systems exist for ongoing evaluation of PAC's performance, including observations of PAC's in-court performance and client and witness interviews; reviewing PAC's legal filings; and soliciting input from judges, prosecutors, clients and peers.²²⁹
- The plans do not require and no infrastructure or systems exist for the evaluator to give PAC feedback and develop a remediation plan for any deficiencies.²³⁰
- Vesting supervisory authority over PAC with volunteer local bar committees does not provide the required rigor of review.²³¹

²²¹ See supra pp. 15-16 (noting that in an effective indigent defense system, counsel's ability, training, and experience matches the complexity of the case and that to provide this guarantee, the system must have uniform statewide standards identifying the prerequisite skills and experience counsel must possess to handle each type of case for which indigent defense services are provided).

²²² See e.g., District 1 Appointment Plan, supra note 166, at 11 (stating no training requirements for counsel to handle Class A through E felony cases).

²²³ See supra pp. 15-16 (noting that standards should specify, at a minimum, training requirements and required litigation experience); see, e.g., District 1 Appointment Plan, supra note 166, at 11 (stating that to handle Class A through E felonies, counsel "must have tried as lead counsel or individually at least three jury trials to verdict" but not specifying what type of trial experience is necessary (case type) or how recent such experience must be).

²²⁵ See supra p. 16 (noting that when this occurs, the system should devote resources and develop programs for counsel to gain the necessary skills and experience).

²²⁶ See supra p. 16 (noting that to ensure that counsel's ability, training, and experience match the complexity of the case assigned, supervision is required with respect to selection of counsel).

²²⁷ See supra p. 16 (noting that supervision is required to avoid conflicts, both at initial appointment and as the case develops).

²²⁸ See supra pp. 18-19 (noting that in an effective indigent defense system such resources are required).

²²⁹ See supra p. 16 (noting that in an effective indigent defense system such an evaluation is provided).

²³⁰ See supra p. 16 (noting that in an effective indigent defense system such activities would occur).

²³¹ See supra p. 17 (noting that volunteer attorneys may be reluctant to sanction a colleague and suggesting that sanctioning authority should be vested with local supervisors); LEGISLATIVE STUDY COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 28, at 7 ("Some local district bar committees do a poor job managing the local lists of attorneys that can be appointed to provide representation, particularly with regard to monitoring and when necessary sanctioning the performance of local attorneys.").

- The plans do not provide for and no infrastructure or systems exist to develop, monitor and enforce workload requirements.²³²
- With the exception of services provided by IDS's Forensic Resource Counsel,²³³ few if any resources are provided to help PAC access necessary expertise and support, such as investigators and experts or access to individuals with specialized expertise in certain subject areas.²³⁴
- No infrastructure or systems exist to provide timely, high quality, relevant, skills based training to all PAC.²³⁵

In light of this and consistent with national standards,²³⁶ PAC should be employed through a formal assigned counsel system where a local supervisor housed within the single district, regional or conflict public defender office provides the requisite supervision, oversight and support pursuant to uniform performance and workload standards developed by IDS.

Budget & Funding Issues

Consistent with other states' experiences,²³⁷ stakeholders across North Carolina acknowledge that the State's indigent defense system is woefully underfunded.²³⁸ In this section, the Committee makes recommendations regarding budget and funding issues.

Continue State Funding of Indigent Defense

North Carolina should retain its current state-funded indigent defense program. State funding is the majority approach in the country.²³⁹ Additionally, and as numerous studies have shown, a state funded model avoids the inevitable inequities that develop with locally-funded programs²⁴⁰ and thus promotes uniformity in the delivery of justice in the state's criminal courts. Funding should come from the General Fund or other stable revenue source; to ensure that the State honors its constitutional obligation to provide counsel to indigent persons, funding from unpredictable revenue sources should be avoided.²⁴¹

²³² See supra p. 18 (noting the importance of such requirements for an effective indigent defense delivery system).

Funding to Meet Obligations on Annual Basis

As shown in Figure 5 below, IDS repeatedly has been unable to pay its obligations on an annual basis. IDS has accurately predicted its funding needs; end-of-year deficits have resulted from appropriations at levels lower than predicted demand.²⁴²

Recurring budget shortfalls result in payment delays and hardship for PAC, most of whom are solo practitioners in small law firms.²⁴³ The Committee concurs with IDS' assertion that regularly allowing it to run short of funds and stop payments to PAC leads to a deterioration in the quality of lawyers willing to do assigned work.²⁴⁴ Consistent with national standards,²⁴⁵ the Committee recommends that IDS be funded adequately so that it can consistently meet its obligations on an annual basis.²⁴⁶

Compensation of Providers

Compensation Should Be Reasonable

Counsel providing indigent defense services should receive reasonable compensation.²⁴⁷ Doing so ensures that the State can sustainably provide effective indigent defense services.²⁴⁸ Stakeholders agree that compensation for assistant public defenders, like that of assistant district attorneys and other judicial branch employees, is insufficient.²⁴⁹ With respect to compensation for PAC, prosecutors, defense counsel, and judicial stakeholders agree that all current compensation systems (hourly, flat fee, and contract) are unsustainable in terms of ensuring that competent lawyers are available to do indigent defense work²⁵⁰ and as a result, qualified lawyers are declining such work.²⁵¹

In fact, evidence indicates that private lawyers plan to decline or already have declined to do indigent work because of low pay.²⁵² An insufficient number of competent lawyers threatens the system in several ways:

²⁵⁰ TRIAL JUDGES’ PERCEPTIONS OF IDS, supra note 18, at 18-19 (by a two-to-one margin, judges responded that they had seen impacts on the quality of representation due to reduction in PAC hourly rates, with the vast majority of judges indicating that the quality of representation had suffered).

²⁵¹ See, e.g., IDS REPORT, supra note 18, at 2; Comments of Superior Court Judge Henry W. Hight, Jr., Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (noting that lawyers are leaving indigent work because it no longer is financially feasible); Comments of District Attorney Michael Waters, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (because of low payment rates, many PAC no longer handle misdemeanor or high level felony cases; this has eroded quality); Comments of District Attorney Lorrin Freeman, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (at current rates the contract system is not sustainable; a number of people have dropped out of the contract system because of low pay; expressing grave concerns about the quality of lawyers who will continue to do contract work); TRIAL JUDGES’ PERCEPTIONS OF IDS, supra note 18 (noting that in a follow-up question, 59 of 66 survey respondents indicated that the quality of representation had suffered primarily due to fewer experienced attorneys being willing to take indigent cases, as a result of a reduction in PAC hourly rates); id. at 16-17 (survey respondent indicated that “fees are such that more experienced attorneys will not accept the cases”; several judges urged IDS to lobby the legislature to approve rate increases).

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON INDIGENT DEFENSE SERVICES 13 (Submitted to the N.C. General Assembly Feb. 1, 2015), <http://www.ncids.org/Reports%20&%20Data/Prior%20GA%20Reports/LegislatureReport2015.pdf>.

²⁵² In a January 2015 survey, 41.8% of PAC said that rate cuts were the primary cause of changes in their state court practice since May 2011. IDS REPORT, supra note 18, at 17. When asked if they will stop accepting indigent cases in the next two years if the rates remain at current levels, 41.7% said they either definitely will or there is a strong possibility that they will, and 39.5% said they are considering that change. Id.; see also Comments of Desmond McCallum, Attorney, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (noting that he can no longer afford to handle misdemeanors at current rates and that he has seen a number of lawyers in his jurisdiction leave because of low compensation); Comments of Chief Public Defender James Williams, Committee Meeting

- The State may be unable to fulfill its constitutional obligation to provide defendants with effective assistance of counsel.
- The State may experience higher caseloads as a result of ineffective assistance of counsel claims asserted on appeal and in post-conviction motions.
- The State may experience trial delays as a result of overburdened or unprepared lawyers.
- The State may wrongfully convict defendants, with negative consequences for those persons, their families, victims, taxpayers, and the justice system.²⁵³

In light of this, the Committee recommends that IDS develop a clear, objective method for determining reasonable compensation of PAC and a long-term plan for obtaining and implementing reasonable compensation statewide.

Compensation Should Ensure Parity with Prosecution Function

The importance of parity in funding with the prosecution has been articulated in national standards, by the Department of Justice, the United States Supreme Court and other experts.²⁵⁴ The Committee recommends that compensation for indigent defense providers should be commensurate with that provided to prosecutors.²⁵⁵

Compensation Methods Should Not Create Negative Incentives or Disincentives

Contracts

Since 2003 IDS has been exploring the use of contracts to pay for indigent defense services provided by PAC.²⁵⁶ In fiscal year 2014-15, IDS had individually negotiated contracts with 44 different attorneys in a range of counties and covering a variety of case types, including adult criminal; juvenile delinquency; abuse, neglect and dependency; termination of parental rights; civil commitment; guardianship; Industrial Commission contempt; and treatment court proceedings.²⁵⁷ Additionally, IDS contracts with over 200 attorneys through its separate Request for Proposal contract system.²⁵⁸ IDS supports the use of contracts, noting that “carefully planned and tailored contracts can result in greater efficiencies and savings while improving the quality of services being delivered.”²⁵⁹

Nov. 23, 2015 (noting that two of the most experienced lawyers in his district ceased handling serious cases because of low contract rates); supra note 251.

²⁵³ See supra pp. 3-5 (discussing the costs to defendants, victims, taxpayers and the court system when the State is unable to provide effective assistance of counsel for indigent persons).

²⁵⁵ Unlike the experience in other states, see JUSTICE DENIED, supra note 4, at 63 (noting that “throughout the country, public defender salaries are often significantly below those of prosecutors”), current data suggest that rough parity—at least in terms of assistant public defender and assistant district attorney pay—currently exists. See Summary of average APD and ADA Pay, Provided to Committee Reporter by Susan Brooks, IDS Public Defender Administrator, April 4, 2016 (on file with Committee Reporter).

A full analysis of parity would go beyond a comparison of salary and would examine all resources (e.g., support staff such as investigators and outside funding) supporting the defense and prosecution functions and compared to workload. See supra p. 10 (discussing the differences between indigent defense and prosecution case types).

In light of this and consistent with national standards,²⁶⁰ the Committee supports IDS’s strategic use of contracts when²⁶¹ and where appropriate.²⁶² However, to ensure effective representation contracts should:

- Not be awarded primarily on the basis of cost; quality must be a consideration²⁶³
- Set minimum attorney qualifications, including training requirements²⁶⁴
- Separately fund expert, investigative and other litigation support services²⁶⁵
- Specify performance standards²⁶⁶
- Provide independent oversight and monitoring²⁶⁷
- Provide workload caps²⁶⁸
- Provide limitations on the practice of law outside of the contract²⁶⁹
- Provide an overflow or funding mechanism for excess, unusual or complex cases²⁷⁰
- Contain management and tracking requirements²⁷¹

²⁶² Stakeholders report that contracts work best in areas with high case volume; they emphasized difficulties contracts pose in low volume areas, including exacerbating court date conflicts because a small number of lawyers are handling a bulk of the indigent docket. Comments of Superior Court Judge Henry W. Hight, Jr., Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (because a small number of lawyers are handling a large portion of the docket, court conflicts result); Comments of Jeff Cutler, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (contracts work well in Wake County but not in rural areas); Comments of District Attorney Michael Waters, Committee Meeting Nov. 23, 2015 (court conflicts are common because the contract system has reduced the number of lawyers available to do the work).

- Provide a mechanism for oversight and evaluation²⁷²
- Specify grounds for terminating the contract²⁷³
- Provide for the completion of cases if the contract is terminated, breached, or not renewed²⁷⁴

IDS should avoid the following characteristics, associated with a deficient contract system:

- Rewarding low rather than realistic bids²⁷⁵
- Placing cost containment before quality²⁷⁶
- Creating incentives to plead cases out early rather than go to trial,²⁷⁷ when a plea is not in the client’s best interest
- Resulting in lawyers with fewer qualifications and less training doing a greater percentage of the work²⁷⁸
- Offering limited training, supervision, or continuing education to counsel²⁷⁹
- Providing unrealistic caseload limits or no limits at all²⁸⁰
- Failing to provide resources for investigative or expert services²⁸¹
- Resulting in case dumping that shifts cost burdens back to the institutional defender²⁸²
- Failing to provide for independent monitoring or evaluation of performance outside of costs per case²⁸³
- Failing to include a case tracking or case management system and failing to incorporate a strategy for case weighting²⁸⁴

Importantly, contracts should never be a separate, “stand-alone” delivery system; contracts always must be administered under a formal assigned counsel system that allows for appropriate oversight, supervision, and support.²⁸⁵

Flat Fee

A flat fee system offers payment per case or per session. North Carolina has experience with flat fee compensation. Specifically, when IDS was created, it approved two preexisting flat per case fee systems for district court cases in Cabarrus and Rowan counties.²⁸⁶ Additionally, in 2016, the General Assembly directed the NCAOC and IDS to implement a flat fee pilot project in one or more counties in at least six judicial districts.²⁸⁷

As compared to contracts, flat fee arrangements involve lower administrative costs, allow for greater participation by the private bar, give greater flexibility for private lawyers who may not want to take a large number of indigent cases as part of a contract and provide certainty to the client regarding the potential amount of attorney fees that he or she may be ordered to pay. However, national standards discourage the use of flat fees,²⁸⁸ explaining: “The possible effect of such rates is to discourage lawyers from doing more than what is minimally necessary to qualify for the flat payment.”²⁸⁹ This disincentive to providing an effective defense is particularly acute when the flat fee arrangement does not allow for additional payment in exceptional cases.²⁹⁰ More importantly, a 2011 study by IDS found that “case outcomes, both in terms of determination of guilt and disposition or sentence, for PAC DWI and misdemeanor cases under the hourly rate system were significantly more favorable than outcomes under the flat fee systems in Cabarrus and Rowan [Counties].”²⁹¹ A more recent IDS study confirmed those results.²⁹²

In light of concerns about flat fee arrangements and existing evidence showing that outcomes for North Carolina cases compensated under a flat fee method are less favorable than for those compensated on an hourly basis, the Committee recommends that any decisions about continued use or expansion of flat fee payment systems should be evidence-based, relying on fiscal and outcomes data generated from the new flat fee pilot program.

Just one of the findings of that study was that for high exposure cases, public defender offices achieved a 48.9% 3-year average of client favorable outcomes; for the same group of cases over the same period, flat fee arrangements yielded 21.8% client favorable outcomes. See supra note 198 (discussing IDS’s outcomes research and data for key performance indicators).

Hourly Fees

A benefit to an hourly fee compensation method²⁹³ is that payment is directly tied to case complexity. Thus, this compensation method does not create a disincentive for counsel to spend an appropriate amount of time on the case.

One potential problem with an hourly fee compensation method is that it creates an incentive to “overwork” a case to increase hours and thus compensation.²⁹⁴ In North Carolina, however, there seems to be no evidence of widespread overbilling under the hourly fee method. In fact, the average hours claimed by PAC for adult criminal cases in fiscal year 2012 was only 4.56 hours.²⁹⁵ Average hours claimed by PAC ranged from a low of 3.31 hours for district court misdemeanor non-traffic cases to a high of 7.59 hours for superior court Class I felony cases.²⁹⁶ Nevertheless, to ensure appropriate use of taxpayer funds and confidence in the indigent defense program, IDS should develop a system to flag high fee submissions by PAC in individual cases and a system for appropriate auditing.

Numerous stakeholders expressed concern that current depressed compensation rates are negatively impacting the criminal justice system and are unsustainable long term.²⁹⁷ As noted above, the Committee recommends that IDS develop a clear, objective method for determining reasonable compensation of PAC and a long term plan to obtain and implement reasonable compensation statewide.

Voucher & Client Choice Systems

Under a voucher system, the indigent defendant is given a voucher for a specified sum and is instructed to hire his or her own counsel. This payment method is not currently in place in North Carolina. Nor did research reveal any other state or jurisdiction that has employed such a system. Although a pilot program in Comal County Texas (population 116,524) sometimes is cited as an example of a voucher system, the Comal pilot is not a true voucher program. Rather, clients chose lawyers from an approved list of lawyers and in felony cases the judge sets the compensation rate within a specified range; as such, the Comal pilot may be better described as a client choice model.²⁹⁸ Some suggest that by providing client choice, voucher systems will improve outcomes for defendants and the system.²⁹⁹ The Committee, however, identified difficulties presented by a voucher system including:

- what to do with a case when the client-selected lawyer later is dismissed or removed;
- how to provide resources to pretrial detainees so that they can make informed choices regarding counsel and can contact counsel to discuss representation;

²⁹³ For current hourly PAC compensation rates, see note 251.

²⁹⁷ See supra pp. 39-40.

²⁹⁸ See Schulhofer, supra note 289, at 545-46 (judges must approve assigned counsel vouchers; in felony cases judges have wide discretion to select the compensation rate they consider appropriate within an authorized range; separately describing misdemeanor vouchers).

²⁹⁹ See id. (arguing for client choice); Stephen J. Schulhofer & David D. Friedman, Reforming Indigent Defense: How Free Market Principles Can Help to Fix a Broken System (CATO Institute Policy Analysis, Sept. 1, 2010), <http://object.cato.org/sites/cato.org/files/pubs/pdf/pa666.pdf>.

- what to do when the client is unable to find a lawyer who will accept the voucher;³⁰⁰
- how to address the negative incentives that are inherent in any flat fee arrangement, such as a voucher system;³⁰¹ and
- what to do when voucher recipients flock to a popular lawyer, resulting in case conflicts and delays.

Perhaps most importantly, however, the Committee has identified a lack of supervision and support of PAC to be a key deficiency with the state’s existing indigent program and has recommended system changes to address this deficiency, such as uniform qualification standards for PAC.³⁰² By placing no limits on who can serve as counsel, a voucher system undercuts core recommendations in this Report.

For these reasons, the Committee recommends against implementing a true voucher system in North Carolina. However, it recognizes that client choice—allowing defendants the option of choosing counsel from an approved list—may promote the lawyer-client relationship. It thus recommends that IDS evaluate the outcome of the Texas pilot program to determine whether to pilot the use of a client choice model in North Carolina.

Debt Forgiveness

Programs that allow for forgiveness of law school student loan debt in exchange for working for a specified period of time in a public defender office may be a valuable tool to attract qualified new law school graduates to indigent defense practice.³⁰³ The Committee recommends that IDS and the NCAOC pursue such programs with North Carolina’s law schools and through the North Carolina Legal Education Assistance Foundation,³⁰⁴ to attract candidates to public defense positions, positions in the prosecutor’s office, and to other public service positions within the judicial branch.

Strategies to Reduce Indigent Defense Expenses

A number of the Committee’s recommendations will require additional resources. To reduce the taxpayer funds required to implement these recommendations, the Committee recommends the following strategies to reduce indigent defense expenses to create capacity to implement recommended reforms.

Reclassify Minor Crimes

Unlike prosecutors, who can exercise discretion with respect to which cases and defendants they wish to prosecute, IDS does not have discretion to refuse to provide indigent defense services once charges have been initiated. IDS must provide qualified counsel for every indigent person who has a right to representation. As noted, both the United States and North Carolina Constitutions require the State to provide indigent defense services for misdemeanor cases whenever an active or ³⁰⁰ A defendant cannot be required to proceed pro se unless the defendant (1) knowingly, voluntarily and intelligently waives the right to counsel, Iowa v. Tovar, 541 U.S. 77, 88 (2004); or (2) forfeits the right to counsel. See Jessica Smith, Counsel Issues, in NC SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES’ BENCHBOOK (Jessica Smith, Editor), <http://benchbook.sog.unc.edu/criminal/counsel-issues>. suspended sentence is imposed.³⁰⁵ Thus, one way to reduce indigent defense caseloads—and indigent defense costs—is to repeal minor, non-violent misdemeanors or reclassify them as civil infractions for which defendants are subjected only to fines.³⁰⁶ If the potential for incarceration is eliminated with reclassification, counsel is not required under the constitution.³⁰⁷ Reclassification of minor offenses is recommended in the Report of the National Right to Counsel Committee as a tool to reduce pressures on indigent defense systems³⁰⁸ and has been implemented in some jurisdictions.³⁰⁹ Although commonly associated with liberals, supporters of reclassification come from across the political spectrum and include former Texas Governor and 2012 Republican presidential candidate Rick Perry, evangelical minister Pat Robertson, and the Cato Institute.³¹⁰

In March 2011, IDS released a study designed to identify misdemeanor offenses that could be reclassified as infractions without negatively impacting public safety and to estimate potential cost savings to the state’s indigent defense system if these offenses were reclassified as infractions.³¹¹ That study found, in part, that the state’s court system has a high volume of minor misdemeanor cases, especially misdemeanor traffic cases.³¹² Specifically, in 2009, 55.2% of the 1.498 million cases disposed of by the state’s court system were cases where the highest charge was either a Class 2 or 3 misdemeanor.³¹³ Focusing on thirty-one specific misdemeanor offenses, the study found that:

- 12 of the offenses resulted in dismissal without leave at least 75% of the time;
- 21 resulted in dismissal without leave at least 50% of the time; and
- for all but 2 offenses, active time was imposed in less than 1% of cases.³¹⁴

After reviewing cost savings associated with reclassifying the identified offenses, the study concludes: “The data shows that the North Carolina court system is handling a high volume of low level misdemeanor cases and suggests that the North Carolina court system could save significant money and relieve over-burdened courts by reclassifying many minor misdemeanor offenses as infractions.”³¹⁵ Specifically, it concluded that the state could save approximately $2.25 million just in counsel fees if all thirty-one studied offenses were reclassified as infractions.³¹⁶ Of course, overall savings to the court system would be much greater.

In light of this, repeal and/or reclassification are promising tools to reduce indigent defense costs without sacrificing public safety.³¹⁷ The Committee thus recommends that the North Carolina Sentencing and Policy Advisory Commission³¹⁸ be charged with the responsibility of identifying—on a regular basis—criminal offenses that should be considered for repeal or reclassification as fine-only infractions, because, for example, charges are routinely dismissed or rarely result in an active sentence.³¹⁹

³¹⁹ The Sentencing and Policy Advisory Commission already provides a detailed annual analysis of convictions and sentences imposed by class of crime. See, e.g., NORTH CAROLINA SENTENCING AND POLICY ADVISORY COMMISSION, STRUCTURED SENTENCING STATISTICAL REPORT FOR FELONIES AND MISDEMEANORS: FISCAL YEAR 2014/15 (2016), http://www.nccourts.org/Courts/CRS/Councils/spac/Documents/statisticalrpt_fy14-15.pdf.

The Committee notes that in 2013, the General Assembly reclassified certain misdemeanors as infractions. See Robert L. Farb, 2013 Legislation Affecting Criminal Law and Procedure 25-26 (rev. Nov. 2013), <https://www.sog.unc.edu/sites/www.sog.unc.edu/files/reports/2013CriminalLegislation%20Revised%20Nov%202013.pdf> (discussing these changes). Thus, the General Assembly has recent experience with the type of reclassification discussed here. That same 2013 legislation also reclassified certain Class 1 and 2 misdemeanors as Class 3 misdemeanor offenses. Id. The Committee notes that when low-level crimes are reclassified as fine-only Class 3 misdemeanors, the crimes remain criminal offenses but because the possibility of incarceration is removed, so too is the right to counsel. Such an approach is sometimes thought of as a “win-win,” in that it relieves the defendant of the threat of incarceration while saving the state millions of dollar in defense and other justice system costs. Misdemeanor Decriminalization, supra note 306, at 1058-59 (noting that some so characterize such reforms but asserting that collateral and other consequences that attach to fine-only misdemeanors suggest otherwise). However, fine-only misdemeanors are still crimes and as such still trigger a panoply of burdens, including arrest, fines, criminal records and, importantly, all of the collateral consequences that attach to any criminal conviction, id., including barriers to obtaining employment, joining the military, or receiving financial aid to pursue higher education. See supra note 10 (North Carolina’s Collateral Consequences Assessment Tool). As noted above, an effective indigent defense program provides services in proceedings arising from or connected with a criminal action resulting in significant collateral consequences. See supra p. 12. Because significant collateral consequences attach to any criminal conviction, including fine-only misdemeanors, an approach that reclassifies minor misdemeanors as fine-only crimes violates a core characteristic of an effective indigent defense program and thus is not preferred. Misdemeanor Decriminalization, supra note 306, at 1058-59 (noting the collateral consequences that attach to fine-only misdemeanors and observing: “These burdens, moreover, can be imposed on offenders quickly, informally, and without counsel, so that the standard procedural safeguards against wrongful conviction and overpunishment are lessened, if not eliminated altogether.”); THE SPANGENBERG PROJECT REPORT, supra note 306, at 11-12 (discussing the dangers of uncounseled misdemeanor convictions); MINOR CRIMES, MASSIVE WASTE, supra note 76.

lawyers to be appointed to assist with the defense; the hourly rate for potentially capital cases is higher than the rate for non-capital cases; potentially capital cases require more hours to both prepare and litigate; and most potentially capital cases require additional support services, such as private investigators, mitigation specialists, experts and attorney support services (e.g., paralegals).

That same study also found that although most alleged intentional homicides are charged as first-degree or undesignated murder, more than 83% of these cases are eventually disposed as second-degree murder or less.³²⁵ Specifically, of all potentially capital cases disposed between 2007 and 2015:

- 83.6% ended in a conviction of second degree-murder or less.
- 11.7% ended in a voluntary dismissal, no true bill, or no probable cause finding.
- 45.7% ended in a conviction of less than second-degree murder.³²⁶

For proceeded capital cases:

- 58.1% ended in a conviction of second-degree murder or less.
- 20.1% ended in a conviction of less than second-degree murder.
- 2.2% ended in a death verdict.³²⁷

That report posits that “North Carolina is spending unnecessary taxpayer dollars by charging cases as first-degree or undesignated murder and prosecuting them as potentially capital cases when most are disposed at a much lower level.”³²⁸ The Committee finds this data compelling and recommends, consistent with a study required by the 2016 Appropriations Act,³²⁹ that IDS work

Maintain Open File Discovery

North Carolina was a leader in adopting open file discovery.³³⁰ Open file discovery should be maintained for a number of reasons, one being that it reduces indigent defense costs.³³¹

Executive Summary

The North Carolina Judicial Branch has been a unified court system for over 50 years and is among 26 legally defined unified court systems in the United States. The North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts (NCAOC) was established to provide administrative services in this unified system, including court programs and management services; information technology (IT) support; human resources; financial, legal, and legislative services; research and planning services; court services; and purchasing services. Elements of the Judicial Department Act of 1965, which established the unified court system, include:

- Consolidation of a multiplicity of lower courts into a two-tier trial court system
- Centralization of judicial administration for the State's courts
- Centralized rule-making authority
- State funding of the court system
- State-level budgeting of State funds for court expenses

Overview of the Current Environment

The IT environment in the Judicial Branch in North Carolina has evolved over the course of more than 30 years. Throughout this time, steady progress has been made in providing judicial and law enforcement professionals with a comprehensive suite of applications and tools to use in the performance of their duties. Most of these systems were developed by NCAOC staff using technologies considered to be “modern” at the time they were developed. The design of these systems was influenced by many factors, including, but not limited to:

- Funding pressures
- Court-specific practices and policies
- Policy and statute changes
- Requirements of specific user populations, such as judges, district attorneys (DAs), clerks, public defenders, magistrates, and law enforcement
- The dynamic information needs of Judicial Branch and legislative leadership
- The dynamic and evolving nature of available technology

North Carolina can boast an inventory of modern, sector-leading applications. However, the technology used to develop them applications spans more than three decades. In recent years, the NCAOC Technology Services Division (TSD) has interconnected many of the applications with sophisticated and complex application program interfaces (APIs), web services, and message queues. These methods have greatly increased the usability of the application portfolio, but have also created an intricate environment to support and maintain.

Many of these technologies have aged to the point that the skills required to maintain them have become scarce. During the last decade, there has been a substantial movement toward integration of the various system components across judicial and law enforcement functions, as well as toward the need to provide seamless access to the information that is housed within those systems.

Drivers for the Development of an e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan

Pursuant to S.L. 2015-241, the NCAOC set out to develop an e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan. Section 18A.21.(a) of S.L. 2015-241 is defined below.

SECTION 18A.21.(a) The Administrative Office of the Courts shall establish a strategic plan for the design and implementation of its e-Courts information technology initiative by February 1, 2016. The e-Courts initiative, when fully implemented, will provide for the automation of all court processes, including the electronic filing, retrieval, and processing of documents. The strategic plan shall:

- (1) Clearly articulate the requirements for the e-Courts system, including well-defined milestones, costs parameters, and performance measures*
- (2) Prioritize the funding needs for implementation of the various elements of the system, after consultation with the e-Courts advisory committee established by subsection (c) of this section*
- (3) Identify any potential issues that may arise in the development of the system and plans for mitigating those issues*
- (4) Address the potential for incorporating any currently existing resources into the e-Courts system*

Additionally, the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law & Justice (NCCALJ) was already established as an independent, multidisciplinary commission to undertake a comprehensive evaluation of the North Carolina judicial system and make recommendations for strengthening its courts within the existing administrative framework. The NCCALJ includes five committees designed to focus on five areas of inquiry:

- Civil Justice
- Criminal Investigation and Adjudication
- Legal Professionalism
- Public Trust and Confidence
- Technology

The NCCALJ Technology Committee governed the development and approval of the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan and served as the e-Courts Advisory Committee. The other four committees provided interim progress reports to the Technology Committee. Many of these reports included technology requirements supporting the committees' charters. These technology requirements were considered during the development of the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan.

The North Carolina Judicial Branch has expressed a growing need for "anywhere, anytime" access to information. Whether within the courtroom, chambers, office, police car, or home, judicial and law enforcement officials and the public have expressed the desire to interact with court processes and data seamlessly, interactively, and remotely. This desire is a fairly recent divergence from traditional interactions with courts in the stakeholders' geography and is aligned with modern expectations to interact with government and private services providers electronically. Historically, local judicial officials interacted with citizens on a face-to-face basis, with information and data (mostly paper-based) being the sole province of those officials; legacy applications reflect these traditional practices.

Advances in technology, together with the desire to reduce costs and improve access to court services by the public, provide the opportunity to reimagine how court officials and citizens interact with each other. The Judicial Branch desires to drastically reduce manual processes and reliance on paper documents. The federal government and many state court systems have successfully undergone similar technology transformations. These advancements in technology have led to increased efficiencies and collaboration among court officials and the legal profession.

In an effort to support this vision, and in order to support a more cohesive, unified court system, the NCAOC retained BerryDunn in January 2016 to assist in an assessment of the current IT environment and to produce a multiyear strategic plan for e-Courts in North Carolina (e-Courts Strategic Technology Planning Project). The resulting plan is the cornerstone for the evolution of technology in support of North Carolina’s e-Courts vision.

Success Factors

The e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan is designed to significantly impact the operations of the Judicial Branch and its services. One of the critical success factors for the implementation of the Plan is continued active executive engagement for the initiatives described in the Plan and a disciplined approach to identifying, approving, and managing major technology initiatives. This will help to ensure that projects outside the scope of this Plan are thoroughly evaluated before adjusting the existing priorities of the initiatives described herein.

Another critical success factor entails committing appropriate resources toward the completion of initiatives. Resources may include, but are not limited to, funding, contractors, and Judicial Branch staff. In many cases, the use of external resources (e.g., contractors) is required. Factors determining the use of external resources may include availability of TSD, NCAOC, and Judicial Branch staff; urgency of initiative completion (relative to availability of TSD, NCAOC, and Judicial Branch staff); and the need for long-term knowledge of a specific technology.

New e-Courts technologies create significant opportunities to change how the Judicial Branch manages daily operations. The Judicial Branch must plan for significant business process changes that streamline operations and focus on using technology to improve customer service. In planning for the implementation of recommendations from this Plan, the Judicial Branch should consider the following:

- Active executive and management involvement and sponsorship will be critical to the successful adoption and continued support of the Plan.
- Implementing a successful e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan will require significant planning, increased capital investment, and human resources.
- A rigorous communication plan should be established to communicate project goals and objectives to stakeholders prior to, during, and after the implementation of the initiatives .
- Current business processes should be evaluated and redesigned where necessary to take advantage of new technologies.
- Many changes will be non-technical, cultural shifts—e.g., process changes—that should be facilitated by structured change management and policy and procedure adjustments.
- Departments must work cooperatively and collaboratively to facilitate effective change that is in the best interest of the Judicial Branch.
- Technical support staff will be critical to the success of the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan's implementation.
- Internal stakeholders must be ready, willing, and able to use new technology to facilitate effective change.

1.0 Introduction

1.1 Project Background and Approach

The NCAOC has established an e-Courts vision that includes virtual courthouses; electronic filing, retrieval, and processing of documents; convenient access to services and information for the public; integration of financial and case data; judicial decision support; and caseload administration tools. This vision is encapsulated in the expression:

In support of this vision, the NCAOC will create an environment in which court technology is advanced, making it easier for the public and stakeholders to access court services, while minimizing the need to physically travel to a courthouse.

The approved Project Charter for the e-Courts Strategic Technology Planning Project provides a set of objectives to be achieved as a result of an e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan. These objectives are provided in Table 1.1 and support the need to remain current in advances in technology, to reduce costs, to improve access to the court services, and to eliminate wasteful, manual processes.

Table 1.1: NCAOC Project Objectives and Anticipated Value

No.	NCAOC Project Objectives
1	Improve access to justice for North Carolinians
2	Improve efficiencies for public safety and law enforcement partners
3	Capture data that supports metrics the Judicial Branch may use to gauge performance
4	Reduce reliance on paper and the other constraints that a paper-based system imposes
5	Increase the quality of data collected and maintained, and improve its usefulness
6	Promote the use of the electronic flow of funds over physical methods, both with regard to collections and disbursements
No.	Anticipated Value
1	Improve faith and confidence by the public in judiciary operations
2	Improve the ability to dialog effectively and confidently with the legislature and the public
3	Increase buy-in and support from Judicial Branch stakeholders regarding initiatives that are presented as enablers of process improvement
4	Ensure security of non-public data

This e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan supports these objectives and the e-Courts vision and promotes a more cohesive, unified court system. This Plan is the cornerstone for the evolution of technology in support of North Carolina’s e-Courts vision.

To develop the e-Courts Strategic Plan, BerryDunn utilized a proven bottom-up strategic planning methodology, which began by identifying bottlenecks and barriers inhibiting the maturity of the Judicial Branch's court technology. This approach involved in-person interviews with over 240 Judicial Branch staff in small, large, rural, and urban locations throughout the state. To extend the breadth of this outreach, BerryDunn also conducted a web-based survey in which over 2,800 Judicial Branch staff and external stakeholders participated. These outreach activities provided BerryDunn with an understanding of how current technology enables business functions, while also identifying areas in which the lack of technology is a barrier to the advancement of business functions. As a result of these preliminary information gathering activities, a technology maturity model was developed, including desired performance metrics upon which the NCAOC expects to evaluate its progress.

The BerryDunn team then identified eight peer states that recently underwent a similar technology transformation: Utah, Iowa, Missouri, Oregon, Nebraska, Colorado, Wisconsin, and Georgia. Peer states were selected based on meeting most or all of the following criteria:

- Use of a statewide Case Management System (CMS) implementation method
- Progressive interfaces with other justice systems within the state
- Broad-based and of similar jurisdictional structure to North Carolina (technically "unified" or not)
- Similar demographics and population to North Carolina
- Implemented performance metrics and maintained statistics available for review
- Evolution to an e-Court environment is underway and far enough along that the state can share lessons-learned and reflect on the process as a whole

BerryDunn conducted interviews with each of the states via email and telephone, and supplemented our research by reviewing published reports and National Center for State Courts (NCSC) court technology findings. BerryDunn's research included considering best practices set forth by the NCSC, the Project Management Institute (PMI), and the Integrated Justice Information Systems (IJIS) Institute.

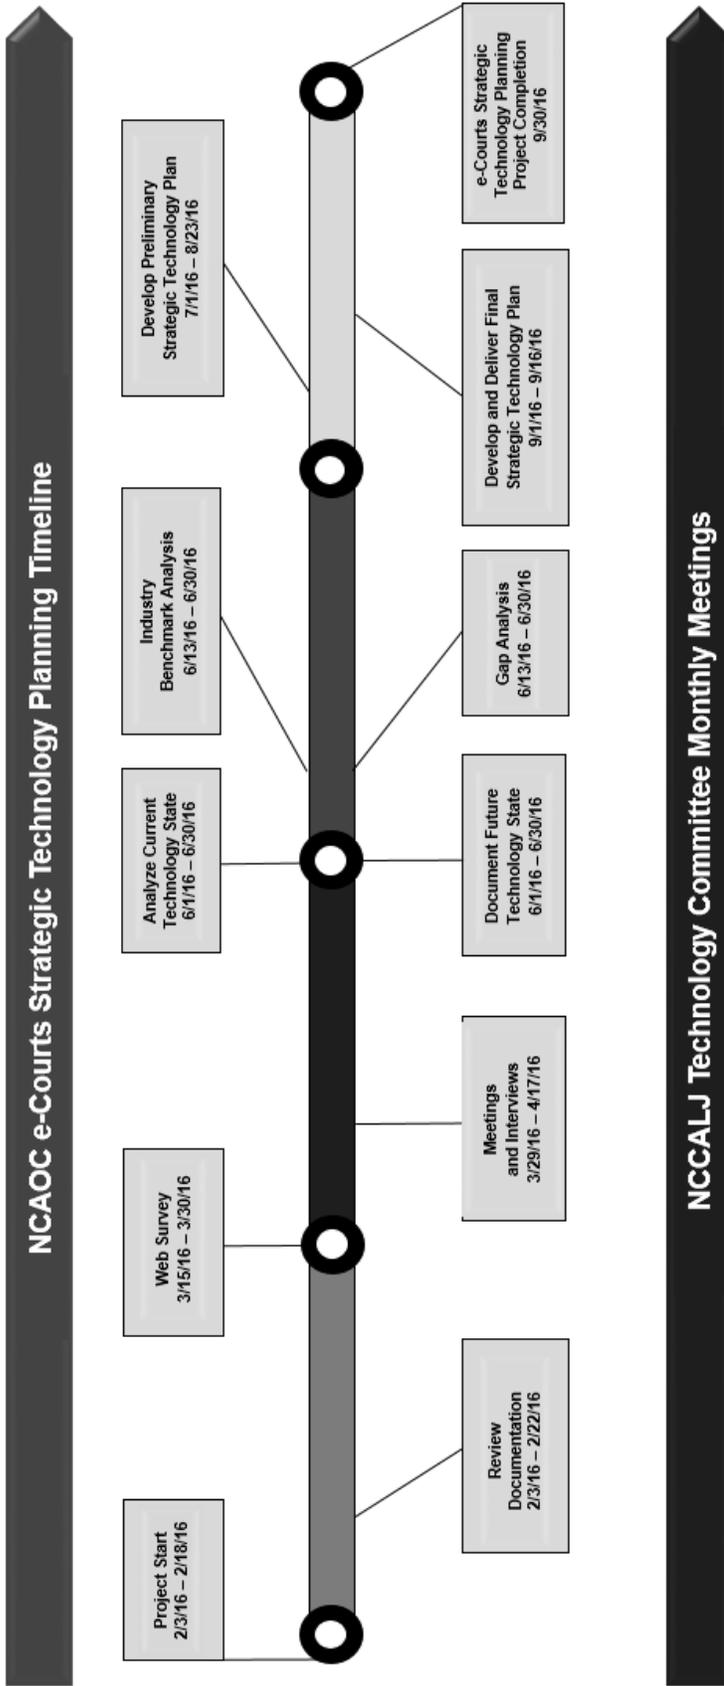

As a result of the market research and the gap analysis, the BerryDunn team developed a preliminary list of e-Courts Strategic Technology Initiatives. BerryDunn then collaborated with a subcommittee of the NCCALJ Technology Committee and the Judicial Branch to refine and prioritize the technology initiatives during an on-site work session. Once a series of technology initiatives were identified and prioritized, BerryDunn developed a budget for each, and overlaid the execution of the initiative onto a timeline matrix depicting each initiative's financial implications over a multi-year planning horizon.

Project closure activities included the transfer of knowledge and artifacts gathered during the execution of the e-Courts Strategic Technology Planning project to NCAOC personnel. This information is critical for the implementation and ongoing evolution of the resulting e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan, supported by the proposed Management and Governance approach.

This e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan includes the prioritized list of initiatives, along with the budget and timeline implications. It serves as a roadmap for the Judicial Branch's overall technology objectives, and provides a repeatable methodology in order to verify progress, address new issues, and make updates as necessary.

Detailed information regarding activities resulting in the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan can be found in the Supplemental Materials.

2.0 Gap Analysis

This section describes a Maturity Model for e-Courts technology and how this aligns with the Judicial Branch's current ("as-is") and desired ("to-be") environment, as well as how the Judicial Branch's current environment relates to the peer states that were interviewed. In addition, this section illustrates the gaps between the current state of the Judicial Branch's technology environment and the Judicial Branch's future vision and objectives. Gaps are organized into three categories:

1. Management and Governance
2. Business Environment
3. Technology

The purpose of identifying the gaps in these three areas is to understand the Judicial Branch's current state, the issues facing the court system, and how they impact the overall functionality of the Judicial Branch.

A gap is identified by comparing the resources and assets in the current environment with the desired "to-be" environment and industry best practices. A gap results when the existing technology provides no or partial functionality in the current environment to meet current and anticipated future needs.

2.1 Peer State Analysis and e-Courts Maturity Model

As a result of the peer state reviews, the BerryDunn team determined North Carolina's current state as compared with the desired future e-Courts state, and peer states. In general, the largest gaps between North Carolina and peer states relative to the three domain areas and e-Courts elements are found in the following areas:

- Operational and mature initiative governance models
- Centralized ICMS

In these areas, the peer states seem to be further advanced than North Carolina. However, there were two areas in which the gap between the NCAOC and the peer states is not as wide. These include:

- Use of a modern, fully functional FMS
- Reporting and analytics

The NCAOC and the peer states were significantly similar (i.e., little or no gap identified) in the following areas:

- Document management (and the use of the fully integrated document management system as a component of the e-Courts strategy)
- Availability of a "Judicial Workbench"
- Electronic public access to court services
- Judicial Branch-wide use of e-filing

Based on analysis of the peer states, who are generally considered to be ahead of the curve regarding technology transformation, the NCAOC seems to be remaining current regarding functionality, but falling behind when it comes to the technology used to support the functionality. Of particular concern is the technology used to support case management functionality, where the NCAOC seems to be further behind the peer states.

Table 2.1 (on the following page) displays the current state of the NCAOC technology-related e-Courts elements, depicted in peach; desired future e-Courts state, depicted in green; and comparison peer states, indicated by ovals. White indicates a transitional maturity level between North Carolina's current state and desired future state.

2.2 Gap Analysis Categories

Category 1: Management and Governance

The gaps identified relative to the Management and Governance domain specifically related to the value of having a fully operational and mature governance model in place to support the identification, consideration, prioritization, and approval of initiatives, followed by a disciplined portfolio management methodology to track the portfolio of enterprise initiatives.

Peer states cited the importance of management and governance as the primary critical success factor for prioritizing initiatives that best support the overall mission of the courts, including court improvements expected from the implementation of technology.

BerryDunn identified the following gaps in the Management and Governance domain area:

- The North Carolina Judicial Branch has defined, but not yet made operational, a governance framework – Industry organizations (e.g., PMI and NCSC) and peer states indicate that a formal management and governance model is the most critical success factor and will allow for the allocation of funds and personnel to prioritized initiatives. The Judicial Branch does not currently have such a framework in operation.
- Business rules are not defined nor applied consistently from county to county – Though county courts are part of the unified court system, they operate autonomously and define elements and conditions of their own business and court processes and procedures. These process variations were acknowledged by court clerks and others interviewed, as well as by private practice attorneys and district attorneys (DAs), during focus group sessions. Additionally, prompted by the lack of modern technology, many county courts have developed local point solutions, which has spawned a set of unsupported “micro applications” to bridge the gaps between the current technology and the requirements of the business. These point solutions result in decreased process and technology uniformity across the courts within North Carolina.
- The NCAOC does not own or manage the court facilities (this is a county-level responsibility) – Although the NCAOC provides the majority of technology to the courts throughout the state, the counties are currently accountable for implementing technologies that are related to specific court facilities. The projects undertaken by the individual courts to implement local technology are driven by financial resources and priorities within the counties themselves and, as a result, are not uniform from county to county. These technologies include, but are not limited to, courtroom exhibit management technology, audio/video equipment, and electronic calendar displays in public areas of the courthouse. Because these projects are not centralized NCAOC initiatives, economies of scale (e.g., leveraging centralized volume purchasing power, centralized management of common technologies) may not be realized.
- The NCAOC is not establishing the standards of all judicial education programs, nor administering the education and training for all judges and staff – This may result in business processes that are inconsistent from court to court. Industry organizations and peer states indicate that increased common business processes across the state result in standardization in how participants interact with the courts and normalization of data that is captured and utilized during the disposition of cases. This increases the ability to report on metrics for the purposes of defining court performance.

- The NCAOC is currently functioning consistent with best practices in project management and program management but not portfolio management, as described by PMI standards – The NCAOC has a strong Project Management Office (PMO), leveraging industry best practices in the areas of project and program management. The primary gap between the current practices and best practices is the implementation of a formal and rigorous portfolio management process to support the approved enterprise-level initiatives.

Review of the peer states and current best practices promulgated by the NCSC, PMI, and IJIS suggests that solutions exist to close all of these gaps, which would enable the NCAOC to effectively implement its e-Courts vision. It will require the NCAOC to operationalize its endorsed governance initiative across all phases of the strategic planning process. This includes implementing a streamlined approval process that can efficiently advance the initial tasks included in the nine initiatives described in this report. The approval and governance process must be implemented as soon as possible so that initiative working groups can be formed, resources allocated and committed, and sponsorship and support from all participating stakeholders strengthened.

While high-level tasks key to implementing the specified service or technology were defined for each initiative, the Management and Governance initiative must be consistently applied across all aspects of the e-Courts initiatives to:

- Maintain a coordinated and timely schedule and process
- Limit scope creep
- Enable periodic performance review
- Assess progress against defined objectives and deliverables
- Ensure resource commitment to completing specific tasks
- Ensure coordination across initiatives
- Identify integration and collaboration processes and needs
- Enable fiscal and operational continuity

The most frequently cited lessons learned from courts endeavoring a statewide e-Courts vision are the need for strong endorsement of overall portfolio management, governance, and stakeholder commitment to assigned tasks, deliverables, and scheduled activities. Due to the NCAOC's multiple jurisdictional and administrative management priorities, consistent and regular restatement of objectives and renewal of buy-in by key stakeholders is essential to maintaining forward progress. This includes ensuring that benefits continue to support to the longer-term vision and continue to engage individual stakeholders in achieving success over the length of each initiative. Often the terms "Quick Wins" or "Phased Deliverables" are used to ensure that stakeholders see value and some immediate return on the investment of their time in the short term.

Category 2: Business Environment

The gaps identified relative to Judicial Branch's Business Environment are largely centered around the use of performance metrics to gauge court performance. These may be related to measuring a court's performance improvement as a result of technology change, business process change, or both. The NCSC defines a set of performance metrics, known as "CourTools," which includes 10 performance measures for trial courts and six performance measures for appellate courts. It also provides guidance for "specialty courts and cases," such as drug courts, mental health courts, and elder abuse cases. Some states have adopted these CourTools measures in their totality; however, most peer states indicated that they selected a subset of these measures, while also using other measures that were not specifically identified within the CourTools model. Most peer states indicated that the use of performance measures did not drive decisions regarding the prioritization and funding of technology initiatives. Instead, they indicated that, once new technology was implemented, the availability of metrics to measure court performance was an important and useful byproduct of the implementation of the new technology and its impact on court performance.

The BerryDunn team found no substantive gap between how the Judicial Branch is currently using available performance metrics and how other states are using them. The Judicial Branch is currently using a subset of available CourTools metrics to determine court performance in these areas. They are also capturing metrics that are not specifically aligned with the CourTools model, but are generally available by mining data in the current data repositories that are used by current systems and applications. However, for states that recently implemented modern technology solutions, the availability of performance metrics to determine court improvements increased, enabling them to better use these metrics to determine areas of improvement.

The following gaps were identified in the Business Environment domain area:

- While the NCAOC is seeking to implement standard metrics, including CourTools metrics, the current statistical reporting is inadequate to effectively measure business processes and performance – Metrics provided to and reviewed by BerryDunn did not present elapsed time for tasks within a larger workflow. Having these metrics would allow the NCAOC to determine where bottlenecks occur and where the judicious application of technology or process change might prove beneficial.
- Limited use of performance metrics makes it difficult to determine if there is a quantifiable improvement resulting from any change in technology – Industry best practices support defining performance metrics, conducting an initial baseline analysis of court performance against these metrics, and performing ongoing analysis of the advancement of court performance. Peer states report that, although the approval of technology initiatives is largely not driven by the need for metrics, once the approved technology has been operationalized, the availability of data to support the defined metrics is important for measuring court improvements.

Category 3: Technology

The Technology Gap Analysis is broken into the following e-Courts areas:

- e-Filing
- Document Management
- Financial Management
- Case Management
- Reporting and Analytics
- Electronic Public Access
- Judicial Workbench

e-Filing

The NCAOC has undertaken a pilot of e-filing capabilities, currently supporting a small percentage of the total number of cases and case types that may be filed electronically. Other forms of “electronic filing” are currently in place (e.g., eCitations), but are not fully automated and require clerks to print many of the citations that are filed with the Judicial Branch electronically. To support a paperless environment and the Judicial Branch’s e-Courts vision, e-filing must support all relevant case types. Peer states report that full adoption of e-filing may require policy or statute changes to ensure that all filings are conducted electronically, with waivers in place to support those that may not have access to computers. Some peer states have such statutes in place and are achieving nearly 100% compliance. Other peer states are still early in the implementation of e-filing technology, waiting until core supporting technology is in place before fully deploying e-filing. Supporting technology includes, but is not limited to, a fully integrated CMS and fully functioning EIMS. The current process is time-consuming and involves an excessive use of paper for certain case types that are not set up for e-filing. Court clerks must maintain both manual and e-filed documents, resulting in duplicative business processes for case management.

Document Management

The NCAOC supports the storage and retrieval of some forms of electronic document currently; however, the initiative to implement a fully functioning EIMS is in its infancy. An EIMS solution has been identified and acquired, and there are efforts underway to determine its configuration and utilization. The gap between the NCAOC and some peer states in this area is negligible; however, the implementation of an EIMS is a predecessor to fully enabling e-filing capabilities. In the current process, searching and archiving is limited because storage flows through a shared network linked to the CMS. Additionally, traveling judges and justices continue to be burdened and slowed down because they are tethered to paper files.

Financial Management

The NCAOC currently supports an FMS that has evolved over several years. However, the technology is nearing obsolescence, making it difficult to find personnel to support it. This system is not fully integrated with the case management functionality, requiring duplicate data entry and increasing the potential for errors. Peer states report that they are utilizing more modern technologies to support the financial needs of the courts and administration. As such, they are slightly more advanced than the Judicial Branch. As a whole, though, they have still not advanced to the highest level of maturity for financial management. For example, limiting how many cases a clerk can have open at a time delays the amount of work they can accomplish. Additionally, the current process for credit card payments is cumbersome and error-prone, and sometimes charges are mistakenly processed twice, which results in reduced confidence in the system.

Case Management

Case management is the area in which the largest gaps exist between the North Carolina Judicial Branch and peer states. NCSC and the peer states indicated that a centralized case management system is a critical success factor to support business process consistency and improvement for all courts and case types within a unified court system. An ICMS is distinguished from a CMS in that it supports multiple case types through multiple levels of a court system; whereas a traditional CMS has historically targeted a single case type or court level. Additionally, the user community for an ICMS extends beyond clerks and administrative staff to include judges and justices. Many of the peer states report that they are implementing an ICMS model—some of which began with an ICMS vision, others of which started with a traditional CMS model and have been expanding the capabilities to support multiple case types, courts, and users.

The NCAOC supports a system of eight case management modules that provide limited CMS functionality. These modules have evolved over the past 30 years (some are more modern) and were designed to support specific case types. As currently implemented, the modules comprising case management functionality are used inconsistently, which results in redundancy in workflow, the potential for loss of information and/or files, and increased time spent to correct errors.

Reporting and Analytics

Currently, most reports must be requested from the NCAOC (specifically the TSD) for development. This process can be time-consuming, limiting the availability of reports in a timely manner. Most reports are executed in a batch (e.g., overnight) mode, and ad hoc queries and reporting are generally not available for users in the courts to execute. Peer states with modern CMS technology in place claim that reporting has become much more real time and accessible to those that require it. Modern ICMS technology enables the definition and utilization of common business practices across the organization, further supporting the use of common data element definitions. Because the data is stored in a common manner, reporting on performance metrics is much more accurate and useable to determine where the courts may require improvement.

Electronic Public Access

Most peer states and the Judicial Branch support some level of electronic access to the courts. This is typically enabled through a public website or portal, and can also be supported through the use of kiosks that are strategically placed throughout the state. There is no significant difference between the Judicial Branch's maturity and capabilities in this area and those of the peer states. However, many industry publications describe mature electronic access to the courts models, in which case participants, the public, and other stakeholders have access to appropriate information at any time, using technology that is not location dependent. Increasing the Judicial Branch's maturity in this area will require an ICMS and a fully functional EIMS. It may also require statute or policy changes to enable access to files that currently must be accessed solely by visiting a courthouse.

Judicial Workbench

The NCAOC supports elements of a Judicial Workbench, including access to jury instructions technology and links to electronic versions of statutes, judicial briefs, and other related documents for use on the bench and during case preparation. The industry generally refers to the Judicial Workbench as an interactive view into case information that may be stored in various locations, such as an ICMS and EIMS. One working definition of the Judicial Workbench is provided in the context of “Judicial Tools” through the JTC, established by the Conference of State Court Administrators (COSCA), the National Association for Court Management (NACM), and the NCSC. Of the judges and justices interviewed, many of them were unaware of the value of a Judicial Workbench, including the ability to interact with cases in real time and actively manage their dockets.

3.0 e-Courts Strategic Technology Initiatives

3.1 Strategic Initiatives Development

A set of nine initiatives were identified as a result of the gap analysis phase. These initiatives are intended to advance the NCAOC technology environment towards a more evolved e-Courts maturity. Many of these initiatives are currently in some stage of implementation already. This section includes a proposed order of implementation based on best practices, initiative dependencies, and feedback from a subcommittee of the NCCALJ Technology Committee during a workshop conducted in July 2016. A summary of these initiatives is provided in the table below.

3.2 Prioritized List of Strategic Technology Initiatives

This section contains a short description of the nine e-Courts Strategic Technology Initiatives in priority sequence, along with a graphic depicting the Anticipated Benefits Rating and the Complexity Rating. While listed in ascending order, some initiatives will overlap and run concurrently. For a complete description of the nine e-Courts Strategic Technology Initiatives, see Appendix A.

Initiative A – Fully Implement Management and Governance Process
Initiative Description: Two separate technology committees have endorsed an IT governance model and charter. The charter sets forth a method by which decisions are made and by whom; however, it has not yet been fully operationalized and expanded. The governance model is the foundation of the e-Courts vision. BerryDunn recommends that the NCAOC operationalize the Governance Charter. The charter establishes a set of policies and procedures that dictate the process by which chief strategic decisions are made, and is less focused on tactical or smaller projects. The overarching governance model will serve as the method to achieve all of the remaining initiatives laid out in this Plan. The NCAOC should consider implementing a best-practice portfolio management framework (such as is recommended in PMI’s Project Management Book of Knowledge [PMBOK]) and apply it to all NCAOC initiatives. Additionally, the NCAOC should consider updating the current initiative or project submission and prioritization process to address all project sizes (e.g., large multiyear projects, small ad hoc projects, projects that may arise within the fiscal year).

Initiative B – Identify Metrics and Conduct a Baseline Analysis

Initiative Description:

Disciplined tracking and reporting of performance metrics will help the Judicial Branch determine where personnel and funding are best applied in order to achieve its vision and improve performance against organizational goals.

The NCAOC has metrics it currently monitors and analyzes. Three of the measures are drawn from CourTools. We suggest the NCAOC determine the metrics on which it wants to base its effectiveness and efficiency. We recommend the NCAOC define the data elements it wishes to use and take steps to ensure they are standardized across the state. The NCAOC should also define the “to-be” business process descriptions when developing the metrics.

In addition, the stakeholders or audience for whom the measures are of interest should be considered, along with how that information or the results of that analysis are presented to them. The baseline analysis should occur as soon as possible, but it may need to wait until after Initiative C – Reporting and Analytics has commenced and the tools needed to analyze the data are in place.

Initiative C – Reporting & Analytics

Initiative Description:

Judicial Branch staff across the state with direct daily operational management duties do not have comprehensive ad hoc reporting and querying capabilities and are unable to drill down into core court business processes for data analysis and reporting. By expanding the reporting and analytics capabilities, parties performing queries and analyzing data will be able to identify areas within business processes that need change. They will also be able to review performance and the status of case workflow, and be better able to manage case activity.

In order to expand upon current reporting and analytics capabilities, the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan needs to include a robust, feature-rich reporting and management analysis toolkit. The data source upon which the reporting and management analytics occurs could take the form of a “data lake,” data warehouse, or some other repository that consolidates disparate data sources. Sources of data could include the ICMS, FMS, EIMS, and others. This reporting and analytics capability could be acquired and implemented after a Request for Proposals (RFP) and procurement process, and the system selected will provide pre-formatted reports that allow for drill-down in data from query results. It will also allow for scheduling standard, periodic, or batch report runs.

Additionally, this functionality will be configurable; allow for standard and ad hoc reporting; include user-friendly query tools common in standard statistical or analytical software; have the ability to create and run ad hoc reports by any set of criteria; have the ability to save, copy, and manipulate reports and report data; and allow authorized users to redact or hide private or sensitive data as necessary. The CourTools integration standards and other performance measures to evaluate court metrics in a standardized manner is essential.

Initiative D – Enterprise Information Management System (EIMS)

Initiative Description:

An EIMS is a secure electronic repository used to store, retrieve, archive, and associate a variety of documents with cases and court proceedings. The EIMS is integrated with other e-Courts applications to create a consolidated electronic court case record with data from the ICMS, the FMS, e-payment, and e-filing components.

The EIMS facilitates other applications’ ability to use data accumulated in association with a case. Using the EIMS’ workflow features, the court may electronically route documents and include individuals’ annotations. The EIMS would support document scanning, document processing, indexing, sorting, reporting, and tracking and search functions. Currently, these activities are performed manually on documents received by the court.

Including an EIMS in the NCAOC e-Courts applications suite provides internal and external stakeholders with access to documents appropriate for their role in court interactions. The EIMS enables information sharing, exchange, and document access to occur electronically. An EIMS replaces paper transactions, whether within the courtroom, chambers, the office, police car, or at home.

The NCAOC is in the early stage of implementing an EIMS to support future e-filing and related e-Courts initiatives. This initiative, as presented here, is intended to prioritize and formalize the implementation approach. The NCAOC should consider leveraging the current EIMS capabilities specific to creating portals for the “Actor Views.” The use of portals that are tailored specific to the actor/user to display the reports and dashboards generated from Initiative C – Reporting and Analytics gives the user the exact information in a manner that it can be best utilized.

The documents within the EIMS may originate from a variety of sources, including from the ICMS or another e-Courts application, or as e-filed by parties and external stakeholders. The EIMS may access images from a repository of converted hardcopy back-up files, documents submitted electronically as images (not e-filing), converted microfilm, and other media. Images/documents within the EIMS can be made accessible online for searches, through a portal, and to the court and external case parties as needed for case processing, without the need to produce a hardcopy when the file moves from one workflow stage to another.

Though the EIMS would provide paperless electronic filing capabilities, court order and legislative statutory changes may be required in instances where original record regulations and/or court policy requires maintenance of a hardcopy record, or when certain original documents require a “wet signature” and manual filing with the clerk’s office.

Initiative E – e-Filing

Initiative Description:

An e-filing system provides a means for anyone involved with the court system—the public, attorneys, and court officials—to submit documents and/or information to the court electronically. This includes forms submitted to the court from law enforcement, litigants, district attorneys, and pro se defendants, and includes search warrant requests, citations, criminal complaints, indictments, and dismissals, as well as civil, juvenile, and appellate complaints and responses. Some electronic filings will originate from fillable forms available on the web. The NCAOC should take into consideration the “actors” and their respective “views” through the e-filing system as it works through this initiative.

With e-filing, once the data is submitted via the fillable form, it may be evaluated and processed to respond to triggered events or initiate other tasks or events within the ICMS. As a component of the NCAOC e-Courts strategy, receipt of documents submitted through e-filing should trigger events within defined workflows. These would include notification, financial tracking, case event status, and other management-specific processes.

As was noted in Initiative D – EIMS, the Judicial Branch may eventually need to change rules and statutes to require that all submissions to the court come through e-filing, enabling the appropriate component(s) of the NCAOC e-Courts system to incorporate the data included in the e-filed document and eliminating the need to reenter data in the ICMS, FMS, or other system modules.

Based on a set of requirements defined in 2007, the NCAOC has previously licensed an e-filing system and rolled out functionality to a subset of counties in a pilot project. Additionally, the NCAOC has developed electronic filing capabilities for both criminal and non-criminal violations, such as motor vehicle and seat-belt, traffic, hunting and fishing, underage drinking, and speeding violations. The NCAOC should define a fresh set of business requirements in regard to e-filing and consider issuing either a Request for Information (RFI) or RFP to identify possible e-filing solutions/vendors.

Initiative F – Integrated Case Management System (ICMS)

Initiative Description:

One of the most prevalent requests for a near-term initiative during the interviews was for the provision and implementation of a comprehensive (feature-rich) ICMS. The various participants in the interviews often referred to specific system components, such as a scheduling system, electronic notification, date and event-driven “ticklers,” reporting, and docketing. From a strategic technology planning perspective, all such features are considered functionality contained in a single solution—that being an ICMS.

The overall goals of the ICMS could be achieved through the implementation of a centralized, statewide, uniform platform that includes all functionality necessary to complete all tasks for clerks, judges, court administrators, and prosecutors necessary for case initiation, docketing, scheduling, processing, decision making, adjudication, and disposition. This includes incorporation and maintenance of all case-related documentation and electronic approval processes necessary to initiate and seamlessly process a case electronically from initiation through dismissal. Whether the NCAOC chooses to implement a new ICMS – either through acquisition of a commercial off-the-shelf (COTS) product or through in-house integration and upgrade of the existing standalone components – the resulting system should provide specific views and access based upon the roles and actors who will use the ICMS to complete specific actions for case-specific, case-type functions or roles. To achieve the goals, the ICMS should:

- Provide electronic processing functionality for all case types to record, track, and manage events and actions from case initiation through case disposition, utilizing thorough, flexible workflows that generate automated reminders (ticklers) and electronic notification to court staff and case participants/parties of case events, decisions, and court calendars.
- Enhance the concept of a fully, or near-fully, paperless case records and document management system.
- Integrate with an e-filing solution that enables electronic access, signature, and authorization capabilities for court-related events, warrants, and other court criminal and civil processes, dispositions, and judicial actions. This includes the ability to create, docket, electronically deliver, electronically sign, and print relevant court notices and case-related documents and notices.

Initiative F – Integrated Case Management System (ICMS)

- Collect the data necessary to enable ongoing management reporting, workload management, and performance measurement and analytics.
- Integrate the case and financial management features of the case and support existing interfaces to enable automated data exchange, financial and case disposition reporting, and search and query both internally and with other State and local agencies and justice partners.
- Provide comprehensive functionality to integrate documents, images, and exhibits maintained in the EIMS to the ICMS, including archiving and retrieval capabilities.

As FMS functionality is incorporated into most COTS ICMS solutions, BerryDunn recommends including the FMS requirements in the ICMS model if it is acquired by RFP. These requirements can be used to evaluate flexibility and scope of the COTS solutions proposed to meet both the ICMS and FMS, as well as address the NCAOC expectations for quality and performance improvement goals included in the performance reporting and analytics initiatives.

Initiative G – Financial Management System (FMS)

Initiative Description:

During focus group sessions with court clerks, attendees routinely describe the FMS and the process of determining and collecting fees, fines, and costs as cumbersome, with a variety of shortcomings. The NCAOC should look at the ICMS solution that has commenced in Initiative F to make sure the capabilities sought do not already exist and need to be leveraged out of the ICMS solution. The NCAOC should also take into consideration the “actors” and their respective “views” through the FMS as it works through this initiative.

Capabilities of any standalone FMS deployed, or an FMS component within the ICMS, should include the ability to integrate with the ICMS across all courts and case types. In addition, it should have real-time presentation of fees, fines, and costs with any offsetting prior payments. It should also have the ability to make real-time adjustments at the cashier’s window when presented with authenticated documentation. Additionally, the FMS should have the ability to:

- Support multiple charge codes with varying costs based on location
- Support payment through multiple means, including credit card, debit card, cash, personal check, and cashiers/bank check
- Generate a statement of charges and payments for a case or range of cases, and print or email the statement(s)
- Produce a range of management reports
- Export and transmit transaction activity, in detail or in aggregate, to external systems or other financial systems maintained at NCAOC or elsewhere
- Maintain case-related transaction activity within the FMS and available for presentation through self-service kiosks, browser-enable workstations, smartphones, or other devices to support inquiry and payment online

Initiative H – Electronic Public Access

Initiative Description:

The Electronic Public Access capability provides the public with access to available Judicial Branch information (including that from ICMS) through self-service kiosks and personal devices (e.g., smart phones, tablets, and desktop and notebook computers). Web-based Electronic Public Access capabilities will provide the public the ability to conduct an online search of publicly available court records and documents, submit online payments, and complete online forms (eForms) related to case initiation, processing, and requests for services.

Currently, the NCAOC provides access to standard forms from the Judicial Branch website and the public may only obtain publicly available case documents in hardcopy format on-site at a court location. The e-Courts vision includes expanding the Electronic Public Access capabilities and the need to provide access to publicly available case documents from anywhere, at any time, as supported by State statute and Judicial Branch policy. As part of this initiative, the Judicial Branch should review its policies around the scope and restrictions of publically available documents. Leveraging the practices of other states, as well as the best practices recommended by the NCSC, should help guide the NCAOC when tailoring its policies to find a balance between the intended transparency of the Judicial Branch and the privacy rights of citizens.

The Electronic Public Access capabilities will interface with the EIMS, which will interface with the e-filing capabilities of the ICMS, to enable documents to be filed, retrieved, and work-flowed electronically, without a need for printing or creation of manual files. The result of the Electronic Public Access initiative will provide the public stakeholders with a readily accessible self-service capability and e-access to the right information, at the right time, right where they are.

Initiative I – Judicial Workbench

Initiative Description:

The Judicial Workbench is a dashboard/portal application that provides the electronic tools to meet the specific case processing, judicial decision making, and management needs of trial court judges on the bench and in chambers. Utilizing a dashboard or workspace format, the Judicial Workbench provides a single point of entry into the day-to-day operational and managerial information needed by a judge. It provides access to the data included in the e-Courts ICMS, summary case and defendant history, and information from other justice agencies. The Judicial Workbench also brings together – under one umbrella system – traditional office applications, legal research capabilities, web portal access to external applications, and a powerful decision support capability to judges.

Judicial Workbench functionality will assist in meeting the overall e-Courts objective to provide internal and external stakeholders with the right information, at the right time, right where they are. A Judicial Workbench enables judges to access the right information needed to enable them to better manage their workload and to carry out their daily activities more effectively than in the current environment.

4.0 Implementing the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan

This section provides guidance on implementing the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan, including a listing of the initiatives in priority sequence, the estimated cost of each initiative, the year in which the initiative is proposed to begin, and guidance for the ongoing governance of the Plan.

4.1 Budget and Timeline

Section 3.2 of the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan provided descriptions for each initiative and what each entails, identified implementation complexity and timing for the initiative, and listed anticipated benefits of the initiative.

Table 4.1 summarizes the budget estimates for the recommended initiatives that have been presented in this plan. The timeline provides a framework for budgeting initiative costs and for planning implementation timeframes over a six-year horizon (including the current fiscal year as “Year 0”). The initiative costs are presented as estimates and will vary based on the budget of the Judicial Branch, competing technology initiatives, the availability of support resources, and the specific technical approach used to undertake an initiative. Table 4.2 depicts the estimated operational costs post implementation.

Each initiative in the table can be started and/or completed within a given fiscal year. Rather than attempting to determine exactly when a particular initiative would be undertaken, this table is intended to identify the fiscal year(s) in which an initiative should be initiated. A dash symbol indicates that there are no planned activities for the initiative during the respective fiscal year. For a detailed list of budget assumptions made for each of the nine initiatives, see Appendix A.

For each of the initiatives, the major assumptions used in preparing the budgetary estimates are described with Appendix A. All of the estimates assume that TSD will make available resources in addition to the Judicial Branch and consultant hours. Resources were priced based upon staff role estimates for specific role-based positions and tasks and segmented by:

- TSD Staff
- Judicial Branch subject matter experts (SMEs)/Non-TSD staff
- External consultants

For each staffing classification, blended rates and industry standard costs for major staff roles were developed. The major staff roles include, but are not limited to, Programmers, Web Developers, Senior Business Analysts, Planners, and Judicial Branch SMEs.

The NCAOC provided staffing data and case management data that was used for planning and cost estimations.ⁱ

Generally, implementation go-live resource cost estimates included tasks assigned to the NCAOC SME, non-TSD staff, TSD, and either contractor staff or vendor staff as relevant. Implementation costs also include the following assumptions:

- All software will be loaded and installed by the NCAOC and TSD according to current procedures.
 - Local on-site technical support for end users in the courts will be provided by the TSD as an overall expansion of the current support procedures.
 - Helpdesk volume estimates for end users and local court staff were based upon NCAOC-provided data.

The initiatives and associated assumptions are provided in Appendix A.

The figures below depict the six-year trend of capital expenditures and ongoing operational costs for both the ICMS-build and ICMS-buy options.

Figure 4.3: Spending Levels of Capital Expenditures and Ongoing Operational Costs with an ICMS-Build

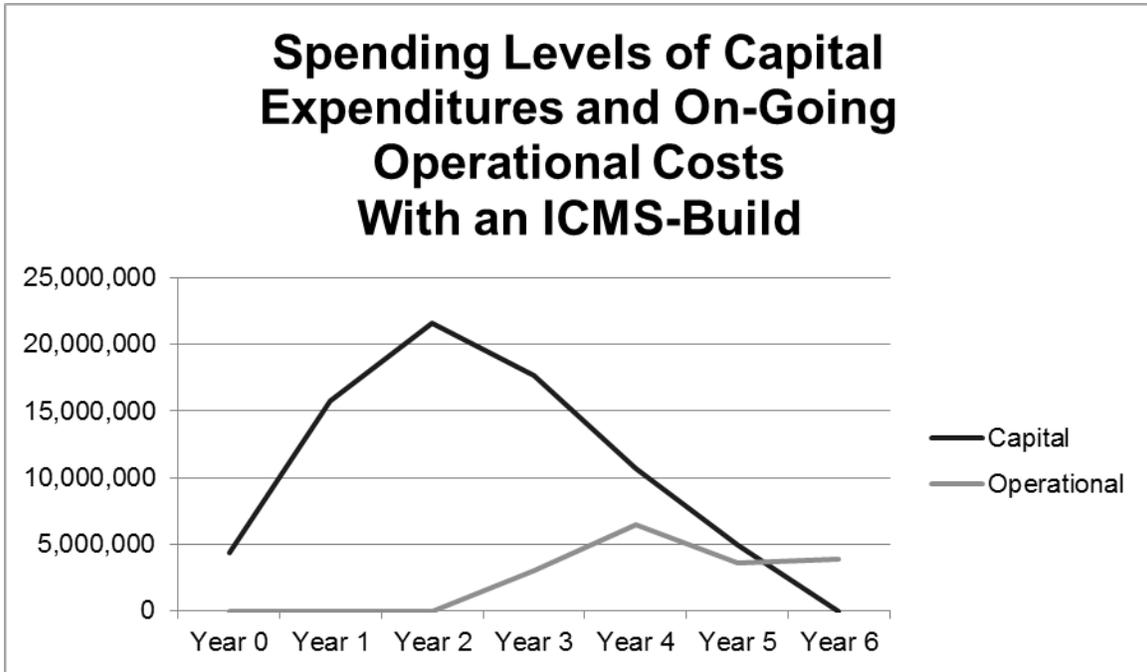

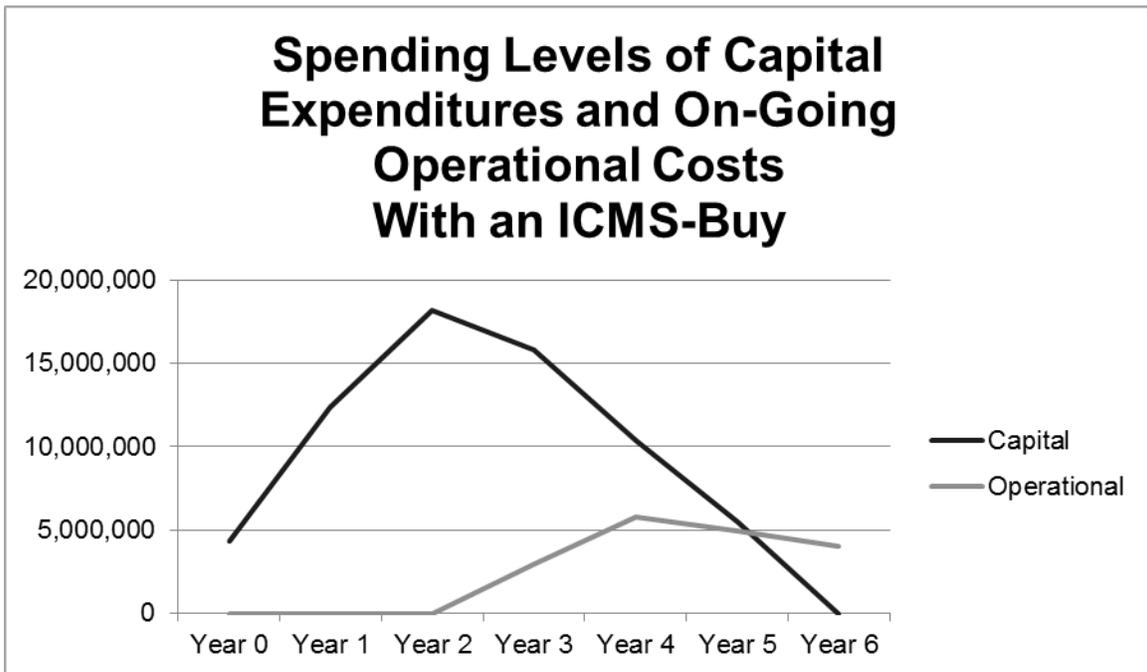

Figure 4.4: Spending Levels of Capital Expenditures and Ongoing Operational Costs with an ICMS-Buy

The first year of each initiative generally includes initiative planning work, which is typically not as funding-intensive as later years. Similar organizations undertaking strategic technology planning initiatives typically follow an approach to have the increased budget levels mostly be realized in the second, third, and fourth year of the plan to ensure adequate time to secure funding. The increase in budget levels in these years of the Plan represents the investment related to initiatives for new applications. In years six through 10, the costs shift from capital expenditures to ongoing operational costs.

In addition to new funding that may be needed to support the identified Strategic Initiatives, additional operational funding will need to be secured in cases where new applications or technologies are implemented as part of the plan.

4.2 Updating the Plan

BerryDunn recommends that the Judicial Branch review and update the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan twice a year. It is anticipated that new initiatives will be identified throughout the year and they may impact the priority level of the initiatives proposed in this Plan. The review process should follow a ratified management and governance model and involve executive management from the Judicial Branch, as well as the TSD Chief Information Officer (CIO). The review meetings should address the following:

- The first update of the year should be to track the progress made against initiatives.
- The second update should focus on reassessing upcoming initiatives and reprioritizing the order of them for the upcoming fiscal year. The overall decision to reprioritize initiatives should be made by the Judicial Branch executive team. As part of this update, a Judicial Branch representative, along with the TSD CIO, should meet with department directors to obtain their input and communicate plans for the upcoming year.

4.3 Success Factors for the Plan

One of the critical success factors for the implementation of the e-Courts Strategic Technology Plan will be executive support for the initiatives in the plan. The Judicial Branch has committed to undertaking the initiatives in this Plan, and support will need to be provided to allocate the appropriate resources, as well as ensure that initiatives outside the scope of this Plan in current and future years are thoroughly evaluated before adjusting the existing priorities of the initiatives in the Plan.

In order to implement the initiatives in this plan, it will be critical for the Judicial Branch to implement the recommended portfolio management practices. Implementing the initiatives in this Plan will not only require Judicial Branch resources and appropriate staff, but also a structured methodology to increase the likelihood of success.

It is important that, over the next five years, the roles of the Judicial Branch and TSD continue to evolve and that they continually assess leading edge and proven technology tools to solve technology issues within the NCAOC.

MEDITATION XVII, Devotions upon Emergent Occasions

John Donne

The NCCALJ would not exist without the vision of Chief Justice Mark Martin. We are grateful for his leadership in convening the Commission.

Contributions to the work of the Commission extended beyond the 85 commissioners, reporters, and ex officio members. Throughout its tenure, the Commission received generous support from internal and external stakeholders who should be recognized for their meaningful participation in this effort.

The Commission’s work would not have been possible without the financial support of the Z. Smith Reynolds Foundation, the State Justice Institute, and the North Carolina Governor’s Crime Commission. The combined funding of this public / private partnership sustained the effort and, together, provided over two-thirds of the NCCALJ’s budget.

The National Center for State Courts (NCSC) was a vital partner, and on numerous occasions provided Commission members, reporters, and staff with valuable insight into the national perspective on best practices, standards, and court reform models across each of the NCCALJ’s areas of focus.

The Commission benefited from the expertise and guidance of more than 100 presenters, panelists, and speakers from across North Carolina and around the nation. Their experience and insights served as the foundation for the informed dialogue and decision-making of each of the five Committees. These individuals and their presentation materials can be found on the NCCALJ's website, www.nccalj.org.

Thank you to Lori Kroll and Sally Ann Gupta for their contributions to the deliberations of the Technology Committee.

Commission staff is deeply grateful to Professor Jim Drennan of the UNC School of Government for taking on the primary role of shaping the overarching framework of the Commission's work detailed in Part One of this report. Jim brought to this effort his decades of experience in the area of court reform in North Carolina, and the Commission benefited in numerous ways from his sage counsel and guidance.

Special thanks is due to Director Dr. Martin Kifer at the High Point University Survey Research Center and to Dr. Kenneth Fernandez and the staff at the Elon University Poll. The two North Carolina-based polling centers partnered to conduct the first survey in many years aimed at gauging the public's trust and confidence in the state's Judicial Branch. As is evident in the text of this report, the results of these surveys guided the work of the Commission and were invaluable in helping the five Committees determine where to focus their recommendations for improvement.

We are grateful for the invaluable commitment to our work that North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts Director Judge Marion Warren and his organization demonstrated. The NCCALJ benefited tremendously from the skills and support of many people at the NCAOC. Among those people are:

1. Research and Planning Division — Brad Fowler, Danielle Seale, Kurt Stephenson, and Patrick Tamer;
2. Technology Services Division for attending and contributing to numerous Committee meetings and for setting up and maintaining the NCCALJ's email system;
3. Office of Governmental Affairs — Tom Murry — for shaping the legislative strategy for recommendations requiring General Assembly action;
4. Communications Office — Sharon Gladwell, Justin Furr, Jodie A. Lanning, and Samuel Tate — for providing ongoing media support, marketing / branding, publication design and layout, website design and maintenance, and an all-hands-on-deck approach to the Commission's many other needs; and
5. Print Shop, for assisting with numerous print jobs.

Finally, the Commission extends its sincere gratitude to the citizens of the Triad, Wilmington, Asheville, and Charlotte areas who participated in the public meetings in August 2016, and for the more than two hundred individuals and more than twenty-five organizations that provided online comments to the Commission in its public input process. The feedback from these individuals and organizations shaped the Commission's final recommendations.

OUR MISSION

The NC Equal Access to Justice Commission (NCEATJC) was established in November 2005 by order of the North Carolina Supreme Court. The mission of the Commission is to expand access to civil legal representation for people of low income and modest means across North Carolina.

www.ncequalaccesstojustice.org

2014 HIGHLIGHTS

NCEATJC released its economic benefits report, finding that the work of legal aid providers across the state generated $48,775,276 in economic impact in 2012. The report details the direct and indirect economic benefits, as well as the cost savings attributed to the work of three North Carolina legal aid providers: Legal Aid of North Carolina, Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, and Pisgah Legal Services. The study finds that legal representation helped North Carolinians gain access to $9.2 million in new federal benefits, as well as $8.8 million in child support and housing awards. Indirect impact, including increases in employment, wages, and business outputs due to the new spending, totals nearly $13.9 million. Domestic violence, eviction, and foreclosure prevention generate cost savings for the state of $17.1 million.

NCEATJC coordinated the work of the NC Pro Bono Veterans Network, as well as launching NCVetsLegal.org. The NC Pro Bono Veterans Network provides a collaborative structure and regular sharing of information for those interested in expanding pro bono representation to veterans. NCEATJC developed NCVetsLegal.org as an online clearinghouse of veterans-related information. The site features legal information and resources specific to North Carolina for both veterans and practitioners, and it also serves as a portal for the recruitment and placement of pro bono attorneys. The website was made possible by a grant from the ABA.

NCEATJC coordinated the NC Access to Justice Campaign, Law Firm Division, which raised almost $200,000 for legal aid providers.

NCEATJC conducted a survey of all North Carolina attorneys to better understand the current status of pro bono and how to support greater participation. Seventy-two percent of respondents indicated they complete pro bono, and the median number of hours was 32 per year.

NCEATJC serves as the communications hub for North Carolina's access to justice community, while coordinating ongoing legislative advocacy efforts.

COMMISSION PRIORITIES:

- Establish the right to counsel in civil matters affecting basic human needs.
- Increase legislative funding of civil legal services at the state and federal levels.
- Encourage/support pro bono attorney participation.
- Help pro se litigants navigate the court system successfully.
- Educate the public.
- Increase the role of the business community.
- Include people with limited English proficiency in the justice system.
- Increase loan repayment assistance.

The Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts

Williamsburg, Virginia

Note: The Allegheny County Court of Common Pleas in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, was one of 152 courts in 10 counties that participated in the NCSC Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts. The study examined all civil cases disposed in those counties from July 1, 2012 through June 30, 2013. The resulting dataset included over 900,000 cases, approximately five percent of the total civil caseload in state courts nationally.

Acknowledgements

This study was undertaken to inform the deliberations of the Conference of Chief Justices (CCJ) Civil Justice Improvements Committee as it developed recommendations based on evidence-based practices to improve civil case processing in state courts. We are grateful to the committee members and staff who asked probing questions that spurred us to mine the Landscape dataset for as much information as could possibly be gleaned. We are especially indebted to the Committee Chair, Chief Justice Thomas Balmer (Supreme Court of Oregon); the chairs of the Rules/Procedures and Court Operations subcommittees, Judge Jerome Abrams (First Judicial District Court, Minnesota), and Judge Jennifer D. Bailey (Eleventh Judicial Circuit, Florida); the Committee Reporter, Judge Gregory E. Mize (D.C. Superior Court); and Brittany Kauffman and Corina Gerety of the Institute for the Advancement of the American Legal System (IAALS), who shouldered far more than their fair share of research and administrative support for the Committee's work.

We are also immensely grateful to the state courts that participated in the study. It is a gross understatement to say that state courts today are operating under enormous pressure to manage voluminous caseloads with significantly reduced resources. We recognize that it is no small task for those courts to allocate scarce resources to extract case-level data from their case management systems and, as important, to answer detailed questions about computer codes and formatting that is necessary to make sense of the data. Their willingness to do so is a testament to their commitment to maintaining the American civil justice system as a forum for the speedy, inexpensive, and just resolution of civil claims.

No research project undertaken by the National Center for State Courts is ever solely the product of the professional staff assigned to that project. We relied heavily on guidance and support from colleagues who contributed many hours to this project brainstorming ideas, answering questions about related projects, reviewing report drafts, and generally offering encouragement throughout the process. We especially acknowledge the following individuals who were particularly helpful: Tom Clarke, Vice President, Research & Technology; Richard Schauffler, Director, Research Services; Neil LaFountain, Senior Court Research Analyst; Pamela Petrakis, Senior Administrative Manager; Brenda Otto, Program Specialist, and Bethany Bostron, Research Intern.

Finally, both the CCJ Civil Justice Improvements Committee and the Landscape study were generously supported by a grant from the State Justice Institute (SJI-13-P-201). The views expressed in this report are those of the authors and do not necessarily represent those of the State Justice Institute, the National Center for State Courts, or the participating courts.

The Future of the Civil Justice System in State Courts?	37

Much of the debate concerning the American justice system focuses on procedural issues that add complexity to civil litigation, resulting in additional cost and delay and undermining access to justice. Many commentators are alarmed by the increasing privatization of the civil justice system and particularly by the dramatic decline in the rates of civil bench and jury trials. In addition, substantially reduced budgetary resources since the economic recession of 2008-2009 have exacerbated problems in civil case processing in many state courts.

In response to these concerns, state and federal courts have implemented a variety of civil justice reform projects over the past decade. Some have focused on particular types or characteristics of civil cases such as business and complex litigation programs. Others have aimed at problematic stages of civil litigation, especially discovery. In 2013, the Conference of Chief Justices (CCJ) convened a Civil Justice Improvements Committee to assess the effectiveness of these efforts and to make recommendations concerning best practices for state courts. To inform the Committee's deliberations, the National Center for State Courts (NCSC) undertook a study entitled The Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts to document case characteristics and outcomes in civil cases disposed in state courts.

Differences among states concerning data definitions, data collection priorities, and organizational structures make it extremely difficult to provide national estimates of civil caseloads with sufficient granularity to answer the most pressing questions of state court policymakers. The sample of courts in the Landscape study was intentionally selected to mirror the variety of organizational structures in state courts. The resulting Landscape dataset consisted of all non-domestic civil cases disposed between July 1, 2012 and June 30, 2013 in 152 courts with civil jurisdiction in 10 urban counties. The 925,344 cases comprise approximately five percent (5%) of state civil caseloads nationally.

Many commentators are alarmed by the increasing privatization of the civil justice system and particularly by the dramatic decline in the rates of civil bench and jury trials.

FINDINGS

The picture of civil caseloads that emerges from the Landscape study is very different than one might imagine from listening to current criticism about the American civil justice system. High-value tort and commercial contract disputes are the predominant focus of contemporary debates, but collectively they comprised only a small proportion of the Landscape caseload. In contrast, nearly two-thirds (64%) were contract cases, and more than half of those were debt collection (37%) and landlord/tenant cases (29%). An additional sixteen percent (16%) were small claims cases involving disputes valued at $12,000 or less, and nine percent (9%) were characterized as “other civil” cases involving agency appeals and domestic or criminal-related cases. Only seven percent (7%) were tort cases and one percent (1%) were real property cases.

To the extent that damage awards recorded in the final judgment are a reliable measure of the monetary value of civil cases, the cases in the dataset involved relatively modest sums. Despite widespread perceptions that civil litigation involves high-value commercial and tort cases, only 357 cases (0.2%) had judgments that exceeded $500,000 and only 165 cases (less than 0.1%) had judgments that exceeded $1 million. Instead, three-quarters (75%) of all judgments were less than $5,200. These values varied somewhat based on case type; three-quarters of real property judgments, for example, were less than $106,000 and three-quarters of torts were less than $12,200. For most represented litigants, the costs of litigating a case through trial would greatly exceed the monetary value of the case. In some instances, the costs of even initiating the lawsuit or making an appearance as a defendant would exceed the value of the case.

Litigation costs that routinely exceed the case value explain the low rate of dispositions involving any form of formal adjudication. Only four percent (4%) of cases were disposed by bench or jury trial, summary judgment, or binding arbitration. The overwhelming majority (97%) of these were bench trials, almost half of which (46%) took place in small claims or other civil cases. Three-quarters of judgments entered in contract cases following a bench trial were less than half of those in small claims cases ($1,785 versus $3,900). This contradicts assertions that most bench trials involve adjudication over complex, high-stakes cases.

Most cases were disposed through an administrative process. A judgment was entered in nearly half (46%) of the cases, most of which were likely default judgments. One-third of cases were dismissed, possibly following a settlement; ten percent (10%) were explicitly recorded as settlements.

Summary judgment is a much less favored disposition in state courts compared to federal courts. Only one percent (1%) were disposed by summary judgment, and most of these would have been default judgments in debt collection cases except the plaintiff pursued summary judgment to minimize the risk of post-disposition challenges.

A traditional hallmark of civil litigation is the presence of competent attorneys zealously representing both parties. One of the most striking findings in the dataset was the relatively large proportion of cases (76%) in which at least one party was self-represented, usually the defendant. Tort cases were the only ones in which a majority (64%) of cases had both parties represented by attorneys. Small claims dockets had an unexpectedly high proportion (76%) of plaintiffs who were represented by attorneys, which suggests that small claims courts, which were originally developed as a forum for self-represented litigants to obtain access to courts through simplified procedures, have become the forum of choice for attorney-represented plaintiffs in lower-value debt collection cases.

Approximately three-quarters of cases were disposed in just over one year (372 days), and half were disposed in just under four months (113 days). Nevertheless, small claims were the only case type that came close to complying with the Model Time Standards for State Trial Courts (Standards). Tort cases were the worst case category in terms of compliance with the Standards. On average, tort cases took 16 months (486 days) to resolve and only 69 percent were disposed within 540 days of filing compared to 98 percent recommended by the Standards.

IMPLICATIONS FOR STATE COURTS

The picture of civil litigation that emerges from the Landscape dataset confirms the longstanding criticism that the civil justice system takes too long and costs too much. As a result, many litigants with meritorious claims and defenses are effectively denied access to justice in state courts because it is not economically feasible to litigate those cases. Most of the litigants who have the resources and legal sophistication to do so have already abandoned the civil justice system either preemptively through contract provisions (e.g., for consumer products and services, employment, and health care) or after filing a case in court through private ADR services. Ironically, private ADR is often provided by experienced trial lawyers and retired judges.

The vast majority of civil cases that remain in state courts are debt collection, landlord/tenant, foreclosure, and small claims cases. State courts are the preferred forum for plaintiffs in these cases for the simple reason that in most jurisdictions state courts hold a monopoly on procedures to enforce judgments. Securing a judgment from a court of competent jurisdiction is the mandatory first step to being able to initiate garnishment or asset seizure proceedings. The majority of defendants in these cases, however, are self-represented. Even if defendants might have the financial resources to hire a lawyer to defend them in court, most would not because the cost of the lawyer exceeds the potential judgment. The idealized picture of an adversarial system in which both parties are represented by competent attorneys who can assert all legitimate claims and defenses is an illusion.

State court budgets experienced dramatic cuts during the economic recessions both in 2001–2003 and in 2008–2009, and there is no expectation among state court policymakers that state court budgets will return to pre-2008 recession levels. These budget cuts combined with constitutional and statutory provisions that prioritize criminal and domestic caseloads over civil caseloads have undermined courts' discretion to allocate resources to improved civil case management. As both the quantity and quality of adjudicatory services provided by state courts decline, it becomes questionable whether state legislators will be persuaded to augment budgets to support civil caseloads.

These trends have severe implications for the future of the civil justice system and for public trust and confidence in state courts. The cost and delays of civil litigation greatly outpace the monetary value of most cases filed in state courts, effectively denying access to justice for most litigants and undermining the legitimacy of the courts as a fair and effective forum to resolve disputes. Reductions in the proportion of civil cases resolved through formal adjudication threaten to erode a publicly accessible body of law governing civil cases. Fewer common law precedents will leave future litigants with lessened standards for negotiating civil transactions or conforming their conduct in a responsible manner. The privatization of civil litigation likewise undermines the ability of the legislative and executive branches of government to respond effectively to developing societal circumstances that become apparent through claims filed in state courts. Because the civil justice system directly touches everyone in contemporary American society — through housing, food, education, employment, household services and products, personal finance, and commercial transactions — ineffective civil case management by state courts has an outsized effect on public trust and confidence compared to the criminal justice system. If state court policymakers are to return to the traditional role of state courts as the primary forum for dispute resolution, civil justice reform can no longer be delayed or even implemented incrementally through mere changes in rules of procedure. It is imperative that court leaders move with dispatch to improve civil case management with tools and methods that align with the realities of modern civil dockets to control costs, reduce delays, and ensure fairness for litigants.

Ineffective civil case management by state courts has an outsized effect on public trust and confidence.

Concerns about the slow pace, high costs, procedural complexity, and lack of predictable outcomes associated with civil litigation have been raised repeatedly for more than a century.¹ Many of the court reform efforts of the 20th century were intended to address these concerns even as courts struggled to manage rapidly expanding criminal, family, and juvenile caseloads. After the federal judiciary adopted uniform rules of civil procedure in 1934, the vast majority of state courts followed suit, enacting state rules of civil procedure that often mirrored the federal rules verbatim. In subsequent decades, courts experimented with a variety of procedural and administrative reforms to the civil justice system including simplified evidentiary requirements for small claims cases, front-loading discovery through automatic disclosure of witnesses and other key evidence supporting each party's claims and defenses, differentiated caseload management, increased judicial case management, and alternative dispute resolution (ADR) programs.

CHALLENGES CONFRONTING THE CIVIL JUSTICE SYSTEM

Despite the good intentions, it is clear that these efforts have either been an inadequate response to current problems or have been rendered obsolete by new challenges confronting the civil justice system. In some instances, reform efforts have even created new problems. A detailed description of the myriad issues confronting the contemporary civil justice system is beyond the scope of this report and, in any case, would merely duplicate a great deal of scholarly work. Nevertheless, a brief summary of the most common complaints and some applicable responses helps to illustrate the scope of the problem.

- Pleadings. The complaint and answer are the formal court documents that initiate a civil case and articulate the factual and legal basis for any claims or defenses. Increasingly, courts have moved from notice pleading, in which plaintiffs merely state the initiation of a lawsuit, to fact pleading, in which plaintiffs are required to state the factual basis for the claim. Under a fact pleading standard, defendants likewise must state the factual basis for any legal defenses they plan to raise. The rationale for fact pleading rather than notice pleading is twofold. First, because both parties have knowledge of the factual basis for their opponent's claims, they can prepare more promptly and efficiently for subsequent stages of the litigation process (e.g., discovery, settlement negotiations). Second, fact pleading is also intended to minimize frivolous litigation by requiring both parties to make a sufficient investigation of the facts before filing claims, thus preventing the expenditure of needless time, energy, and resources to defeat unsupported claims.² In 2009, the U.S. Supreme Court further heightened the fact pleading standard. In federal courts, plaintiffs must now allege sufficient facts to allow a trial judge to determine the plausibility of a claim.³ This raises Seventh Amendment concerns that judicial plausibility assessments based on the factual content in pleadings will displace the role traditionally played by juries in a full evidentiary trial.⁴

² The ease with which litigants may assert legally or factually unsupported claims is a constant concern in the civil justice system. Civil justice reform leaders initially hailed efforts to impose sanctions on frivolous filings. However, many scholars have regretted the institution of such reforms due to satellite litigation over whether, in fact, the claims and/or defenses were known to be unsupported when filed. - Service of process. Traditional procedures for serving notice in civil lawsuits are functionally obsolete, especially in suits against individuals. Typical methods of serving process are riddled with inaccuracies and inadequacies. In some cases, private process service companies have undergone civil lawsuits and criminal prosecutions regarding service practices.⁵ One study of process service in New York's King and Queen Counties found that personal service was achieved in only six percent of civil debt collection cases.⁶ Service of process via newspaper publication and/or posting on the courthouse door seems quaint in light of technological advancements. The consequences of inadequate service are especially damaging for individuals who only learn of a case through court orders authorizing award enforcement by garnishment or asset seizure following a default judgment. Technological advancements have alleviated some of the issues surrounding inadequate service of process. Electronic service provides a method of serving process for especially difficult-to-reach parties. The cost-saving potential of electronic service is also incredibly high. However, electronic service is not without its limitations with potential controversies over receipt of service and sufficiency of notice.⁷
- Discovery. While opinions on excessive discovery may vary from the plaintiff to the defense bar, several national surveys report a consensus that the time devoted to discovery is the primary cause of delay in the litigation process.⁸ Most state court rules and case law permit discovery for anything that might lead to admissible evidence. This results in an unfocused, and often disproportionate, approach to discovery in which lawyers fail to identify key issues and spend time and effort investigating tangential issues. This expansive nature of discovery and the resulting delays translate to increased litigation costs. In fact, there are frequent complaints that discovery costs often dwarf the value of the case.⁹ The traditional law firm business model (based on the billable hour) and the lack of disciplinary action in response to excessive discovery filings encourages lawyers to do more discovery rather than smart discovery.

- Electronically Stored Information (ESI). Evidence needed to support claims and defenses increasingly exists only in electronic format rather than live witness testimony, papers, or other tangible objects. The costs of ESI discovery include expenses associated with processing old data, reviewer complications based on qualitative differences between paper and electronic documents, and the production of documents.¹⁰ The expertise needed to organize, review and analyze electronic records is also very expensive, further increasing the costs of the discovery process. A lack of experience and knowledge on the part of judges and attorneys about how to assess and manage ESI discovery often leads to overly broad requests for production. The effects of over-production are especially felt in specialized areas of civil litigation such as business litigation. As the amount of ESI grows, concerns about costs associated with developing an efficient and effective ESI discovery process are paramount.¹¹

- Expert evidence. Scientific or expert evidence is needed to support a growing proportion of claims in all types of civil cases with respect to both causation and damages. Procedures developed to govern the admissibility of expert evidence require judges, who are rarely subject matter experts, to make a twofold assessment: 1) the expert's qualifications to opine on a given issue and 2) whether the expert's opinion is sufficiently grounded in recognized science to be admissible in a court of law.¹² This process has raised Seventh Amendment concerns related to judges usurping the jury's role in making determinations about the weight of expert evidence.¹³
- Mandatory alternative dispute resolution (ADR). ADR encompasses a range of services including mediation, arbitration, and neutral case evaluation and is an integral part of virtually all civil litigation. It offers opportunities for litigants to settle their cases, usually in less time than a formal court hearing (trial) and often at less cost. Beginning in the early 1980s, many courts introduced procedural requirements that litigants engage in one or more forms of ADR, or at the very least consider doing so, especially in lower-value cases (e.g., less than $50,000).¹⁴ ADR programs are not without their critics.¹⁵ Some allege that mandatory ADR imposes an additional procedural hurdle on litigants and drives up the cost of litigation. Other complaints have focused on the qualifications of the professionals who conduct the ADR proceedings. The fees charged by ADR professionals also often exceed court fees.¹⁶ Because courts must ensure the quality of their mandatory arbitration programs, there are concerns that the maintenance costs for mandatory ADR programs will pass on unnecessary costs to all litigants.

- Summary judgment. Summary judgment rulings in federal and state courts have broad implications for the civil justice system.¹⁷ The resolution of a case at the early stages of litigation both halts the unnecessary continuation of litigation and contributes to the expansion of discovery. Rule changes and subsequent case law have facilitated summary judgment rulings in recent decades,¹⁸ creating controversy as jurisprudence and rules continue to develop.¹⁹ Variations in local rules and ruling propensities of local judges can also complicate summary judgment procedures and make the summary judgment stage a source of uncertainty for litigants.
- Perceived unpredictability in trial outcomes, especially jury verdicts. The proportion of civil cases disposed by trial has decreased dramati-ically over the past 40 years.²⁰ The reasons for the decline are numerous and, in some instances, quite subtle. They include increases in the availability of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) programs including contractually required binding arbitration in many consumer and employment contracts; the costs for discovery and pretrial stages of litigation, which have prompted some litigants to forego trials for a negotiated settlement; delays in scheduling trials due to the increased volume of civil cases without commensurate increases in court resources; and widespread public perceptions about the unpredictability of trial outcomes, especially in jury trials.²¹ Although empirical research confirms that jury trial verdicts are actually very predictable,²² the shift away from trial as the dominant mode of case disposition has likewise reduced the number of attorneys with jury trial experience. Consequently, attorneys are less qualified to assess the merits of their cases and to advise clients about taking cases to trial by jury.²³

- Lack of court resources allocated to civil justice. Constitutional guarantees of a speedy trial in criminal cases tend to relegate civil matters to the bottom of scheduling priorities.²⁴ This is exacerbated in tight budgetary cycles as courts may be operating under furloughs or reduced hours, further decreasing scheduling options for civil cases. Some courts have responded by creating specialized courts, especially for business or commercial litigation, to address the recent lack of court resources. Although these dockets and courts guarantee civil litigation its own niche in court scheduling, sustaining the dockets may become challenging as there must be a sufficient case volume to justify the expenditures. Additionally, efforts to provide scheduling priorities within civil case categories might meet statutory requirements,²⁵ but the bulk of civil litigation is then left last in line for scheduling.

CIVIL JUSTICE IMPROVEMENT EFFORTS

The general complaint concerning these challenges is that collectively they contribute to unsustainable cost and delay in civil litigation, ultimately impeding access to justice. These problems have not been allowed to develop entirely unchecked, however. Across the country, court leaders have developed a variety of reform efforts to address issues in the civil justice system. For example, some states have designed and implemented programs targeting specific types of cases, especially related to business, commercial, or complex litigation. The California Judicial Council instituted a complex civil litigation pilot program in response to litigant concerns regarding the “time and expense needed to resolve complex cases, the consistency of decision making, and perceptions that the substantive law governing commercial transactions was becoming increasingly incoherent.”²⁶ Fulton County, Georgia implemented a Business Court that moves complex contract and tort cases through the litigation process in half the amount of time the general docket moves the same types of cases.²⁷ Other states have designed and implemented more tailored projects. In 2009, Colorado began developing pilot rules and procedures for the Colorado Civil Access Pilot Project (CAPP) applicable to business actions

²⁵ It should be noted that certain civil matters such as protective order hearings also have temporal scheduling requirements and supplant more generic civil matters in scheduling. For examples of these requirements see e.g., N. H. REV. STAT. ANN. § 173-B:3 (2014) (setting timeline for domestic violence protective order hearing); VA. in the Colorado district courts. The CAPP program focused on developing new procedures to streamline the pretrial discovery process and minimize expert witness costs.²⁸ The final pilot rules were implemented in 2012 and have been authorized for application to cases filed through December 31, 2014.²⁹

Similarly, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Texas have all undertaken efforts to coordinate the management of mass tort litigation through the promulgation of court rules. For example, the Supreme Court of New Jersey promulgated a rule enabling the unification of qualifying mass tort cases for central management purposes.³⁰ The rule grants the Administrative Director of the Courts the power to develop criteria and procedures for unifying the mass tort litigation, subject to approval by the Court. Complex litigation centers generally serve as the clearinghouse for such litigation. Similar coordination efforts in the form of dedicated trial calendars have also taken place for landlord/tenant and mortgage foreclosure cases.

Federal and state courts have also pursued procedural reforms on a broader scale. As discussed above, federal courts have heightened pleading standards. New Hampshire also altered their pleading standards (from notice pleading to fact pleading) in a two-county pilot program implemented in 2010. The pilot rules were subsequently adopted on a statewide basis effective March 1, 2013.³¹ Statewide rule changes in Utah have altered the discovery process in a variety of ways including proportional discovery requirements and tiered discovery based on the amount in controversy.³² Discovery reforms have also taken place in the federal courts. The Seventh Circuit Electronic Discovery Pilot Program aims to reduce the rising costs of e-discovery through a myriad of reforms and is currently in phase three of its implementation.³³

Some federal agencies are also focusing on civil justice improvement in certain types of cases. For example, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB) recently issued proposed rules of procedure for debt collection cases filed in state courts to address complaints concerning venue, service of process, and disclosure of the factual basis for debt collection claims.³⁴ Research organizations such as the NCSC and the Institute for the Advancement of the American Legal System (IAALS) have also coordinated with pilot project jurisdictions to conduct comprehensive outcome and process evaluations of reform efforts. These implementation and evaluation reports are a crucial aspect of ensuring effective and efficient reforms of the civil justice system. This is especially the case as court leaders continue to take a proactive stance towards civil justice reform through efforts such as the Conference of Chief Justices (CCJ) Civil Justice Improvements Committee.³⁵

³⁵ In 2013, The Conference of Chief Justices created the Civil Justice Improvements Committee. The mission of the committee is to translate the lessons learned from state pilot projects, applicable research, and rule changes into guidelines and best practices for civil litigation. The committee's mandate also includes the development of caseload management reforms for the improvement of the state court civil justice system. Committee membership was finalized in the spring of 2014 and consists of judges, lawyers, academics, researchers, and court administrators with broad expertise related to civil litigation issues. The committee membership strikes a balance between the plaintiff and defense bars, trial and appellate judges, and court administrators with case management expertise. Both the National Center for State Courts (NCSC) and the Institute for the Advancement of the American Legal System (IAALS) provide research and logistical support to the committee. The Civil Justice Improvements Committee is conducting the bulk of its work through plenary meetings and subcommittees. This report is meant to provide an overview of the current landscape of civil litigation in state courts for the committee members.

An Incomplete Picture of the Civil Justice System

The vast majority of civil cases in the United States are filed in state courts rather than federal courts.³⁶ However, other than the actual number of filings, and sometimes number of dispositions, detailed information about civil caseloads in the United States such as caseload composition, case outcomes, and filing-to-disposition time, is difficult to obtain. The most recent large-scale national study of civil caseloads is the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts (see Figure 1).³⁷ In that study, the NCSC collected detailed information about civil cases disposed in 1992 in the general jurisdiction courts of 45 large, urban counties

³⁶ In 2013, litigants filed approximately 16.9 million civil cases in state courts compared to 259,489 civil cases filed in U.S. District Courts. NCSC COURT STATISTICS PROJECT, EXAMINING THE WORK OF STATE COURTS, 2013 (2015) (this estimate includes probate and mental health filings in addition to general civil filings). Federal Judicial Caseload Statistics, Table C available at <http://www.uscourts.gov/statistics-reports/caseload-statistics-data-tables?tn=C&pn=All&t=68&m%5Bvalue%5D%5Bmonth%5D=12&y%5Bvalue%5D%5Byear%5D=2014>.

and used that information to estimate civil caseloads and case outcomes for the 75 most populous counties in the country.³⁸ Of more than 750,000 civil cases disposed in the 75 most populous counties, it estimated that approximately half (49%) alleged tort claims, 48 percent alleged contract claims, and two percent were real property disputes. Automobile torts were the single largest subcategory of tort cases, accounting for nearly two-thirds (60%) of all tort cases. In contrast, product liability and medical malpractice cases, which generate some of the greatest criticisms of the civil justice system, reflected only four percent of total civil cases combined. More than half (52%) of the contract cases were debt collection (seller-plaintiff) cases, and mortgage foreclosures accounted for another 18 percent of total civil cases.³⁹

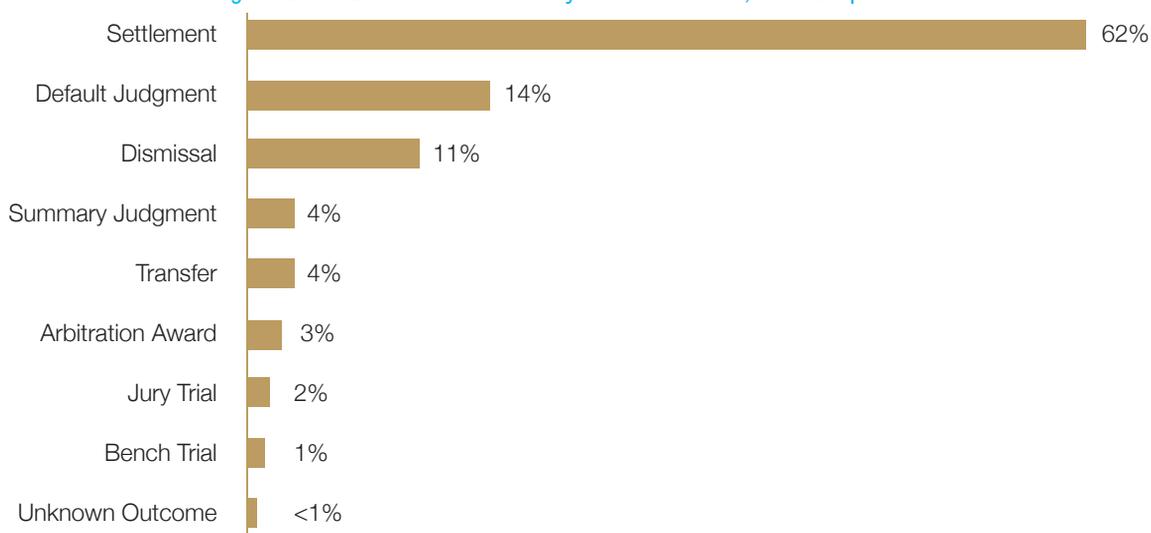

Settlement by the parties was the single most common outcome for a civil case (62%), compared to 14 percent default judgments, 10 percent dismissals for failure to prosecute, four percent transfers to another court, four percent summary judgment, and only three percent judgments following a bench or jury trial (see Figure 2).

Subsequent iterations of the Civil Justice Survey of State Courts focused exclusively on bench and jury trials. Consequently, more recent descriptions of civil justice caseloads have relied on aggregate statistics reported to the NCSC as part of the Court Statistics Project as well as studies of specific issues in individual state or local courts. For a variety of reasons, these types of studies are often unable to provide definitive answers to the most commonly asked questions.

Part of the difficulty stems from the inability of many case management systems to collect and generate reports about civil caseloads. Most case management systems were initially developed to schedule and record case filings and events (e.g., hearings and trials) and report the progress of the case through the system in general terms. Although some of these

³⁸ In the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts, the U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics employed a 2-stage stratified sample in which 45 of the 75 most populous counties were selected based on aggregate civil cases filed in 1990. For a detailed description of the sampling methodology, see CAROL J. DEFRANCIS ET AL., CIVIL JURY CASES AND VERDICTS IN LARGE COUNTIES 11 (July 1995). The Civil Justice Survey of State Courts restricted data collection to cases identified as general civil (e.g., tort, contract, and real property) in which monetary damages were sought. The data excluded cases involving equitable relief as well as probate/estate, mental health, domestic, other civil, and unknown case types.

³⁹ Thirty-one states permit mortgage holders to foreclose on property through an administrative procedure specified by statute without court involvement; 20 states require that foreclosures be conducted through the court. systems capture detailed case-level information, very few are programmed to extract and report that information in a format conducive to a broader management-oriented and case propulsion perspective.

DATA DEFINITIONS

A related issue is the relative lack of uniformity in the use of case definitions and counting rules. In most courts, the term "general civil" encompasses tort, contract, and real property filings and differentiates those cases from probate/estate, domestic relations, and mental health cases. But in many courts, court automation systems are not programmed to offer a more finely grained picture of civil caseloads. For example, Figure 3 documents civil filings from general jurisdiction courts in 17 state single-tier or general jurisdiction courts that were able to breakdown their caseloads to seven categories in 2010. The wide variation in percentages across courts and case types is largely due to differences in how those states define and count cases, differences in whether cases are filed in the general jurisdiction court or in limited jurisdiction courts (which are not reflected in the graph), and differences in state law and community characteristics that affect the types of legal disputes that might be litigated in those states.

Similarly, courts differ with respect to how case events are counted. For example, when a civil case has been closed and is then reopened for some reason (e.g., a default judgment that is later challenged for lack of service in the original case), some courts will count the case as a new case. Other courts will count this as a reopened case and still others as the same case that was originally adjudicated. Although there is no requirement that state and local courts adopt uniform case definitions and counting rules, the NCSC Court Statistics Project has promulgated standardized data definitions and counting rules for more than three decades.⁴⁰ Courts are increasingly adopting the standards and integrating them into their case management systems to be able to compare their caseloads with those of other courts and to take advantage of more sophisticated case management tools available in newer case automation systems.

DATA COLLECTION PRIORITIES

Another factor contributing to the difficulty in obtaining a detailed national picture about the civil justice system is courts' philosophical focus on operational process rather than substantive outcomes in civil litigation. Whether an enforceable judgment had been entered in a case is generally considered operationally more important than which party prevailed in the case or what remedy the judgment actually ordered (e.g., money damages, specific performance, or injunctive relief). Those details are obviously important to the parties, and legislative and executive leaders might be interested for the purpose of informing public policy, but the primary objective of the judicial branch has always been to provide an objectively fair process for resolving disputes. Thus, focusing attention on substantive outcomes was often viewed as unseemly and potentially detrimental to public confidence in the objectivity and neutrality of the judicial branch. Documentation of case outcomes, where it existed at all, was often captured in text files in case automation systems and was consequently extremely difficult to extract and manage in an aggregate format.

Clearance rates, which traditionally express the ratio of new filings to dispositions over a given period of time, served as the primary measure of court efficiency. Clearance rates do not, however, document the amount of time expended from filing to disposition. Beginning in the mid-1970s, concerns about court delay led many prominent court and bar organizations to promulgate time standards as aspirational deadlines for resolving cases.⁴¹ A major criticism of these standards was that they were often based on the amount of time that these organizations thought cases should take to resolve rather than the amount of time that cases actually took to resolve. For example, the national time standards promulgated by the Conference of State Court Administrators (COSCA) in 1983 specified that all civil cases resolved by jury trial should be disposed within 18 months of filing, and all non-jury civil cases should be tried, settled, or disposed within 12 months of filing. Based on the cases examined in the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts, however, less than half (49%) of non-jury cases met those standards and only 18 percent of jury trial cases did so. The discrepancy between the aspirational time standards and actual disposition time served as a considerable disincentive for courts to adopt those standards, much less to publish their performance based on the standards. Since then, researchers have developed and promulgated more empirically based standards including the Model Time Standards for State Trial Courts, which was a collaborative effort by the Conference of Chief Justices, the Conference of State Court Administrators, the American Bar Association, the National Association for Court Management, and the NCSC. The Model Time Standards now recommend that 75 percent of civil cases should be fully disposed within 180 days, 90 percent within 365 days, and 98 percent within 540 days.

⁴⁰ The State Court Model Statistical Dictionary (1980), developed jointly by the Conference of State Court Administrators and the National Center for State Courts, was the first effort to provide a uniform set of data definitions. The Dictionary was revised in 1984 and again in 1989. The Dictionary was replaced with the State Court Guide to Statistical Reporting (Guide) in 2003. The most recent version of the Guide was published in 2014.

⁴¹ For a summary of the evolution of various time standards for civil cases, see RICHARD VAN DUIZEND, MODEL TIME STANDARDS FOR STATE TRIAL COURTS 13-15 (2011) [hereinafter MODEL TIME STANDARDS].

ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE

Perhaps the largest hurdle to learning about civil litigation in the state courts lies at the heart of courts as organizations. State court organizational structures are the culmination of each state's unique legal history and efforts to improve the administration of justice. Accordingly, state courts organizational structures can be as unique as the constituencies they serve. Data collection efforts must accommodate these varying structures without sacrificing data integrity and reporting. To consider how this may be done, it is imperative to fully consider the diversity of organizational structures across courts with civil jurisdiction.

Figure 4 illustrates how state courts allocate jurisdiction over civil filings among general jurisdiction and limited jurisdiction courts. The most common organizational structure (20 states) involves a single general jurisdiction court and a single limited jurisdiction court. The two courts may have exclusive jurisdiction over particular types of cases or cases involving certain amounts-in-controversy. Some states provide for over-lapping (concurrent) jurisdiction for a specified range of cases based on amount-in-controversy. Ten states and the District of Columbia have only a single-tier general jurisdiction court for general civil cases, although many of these permit local courts to organize their dockets and judicial assignments based on case type or amount-in-controversy.

The remaining states exhibit some combination of multiple general jurisdiction and limited jurisdiction courts. In most instances, these courts are situated within individual counties, municipalities, or judicial divisions encompassing multiple counties. However, a few states also maintain statewide general or limited jurisdiction courts over specific types of cases. Examples include Courts of Claims in Michigan, New York, and Ohio, which have jurisdiction over civil cases in which the state is a litigant; Water Courts in Colorado and Montana, which have jurisdiction over civil cases involving claims to water rights; and Worker's Compensation Courts in Montana and Nebraska, which have jurisdiction over administrative agency appeals.

Eleven states have a single general jurisdiction court with two or more limited jurisdiction courts. In Georgia, for example, the Superior Court is the general jurisdiction court for the state's 149 counties; the Superior Court is organized into 49 judicial circuits and has jurisdiction over tort, contract, and all real property cases as well as civil appeals from the State Courts (70 courts), the Civil Courts (in Bibb and Richmond Counties, only), and the Municipal Courts (383 courts). The State Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the Superior Court for tort and contract cases; the Civil Courts have jurisdiction over tort and contract cases up to $25,000 in Bibb County and up to $45,000 in Richmond County; the Municipal Courts have jurisdiction over small claims up to $15,000 and, in Bibb and Richmond Counties, concurrent jurisdiction with the Civil Court over tort and contract cases.

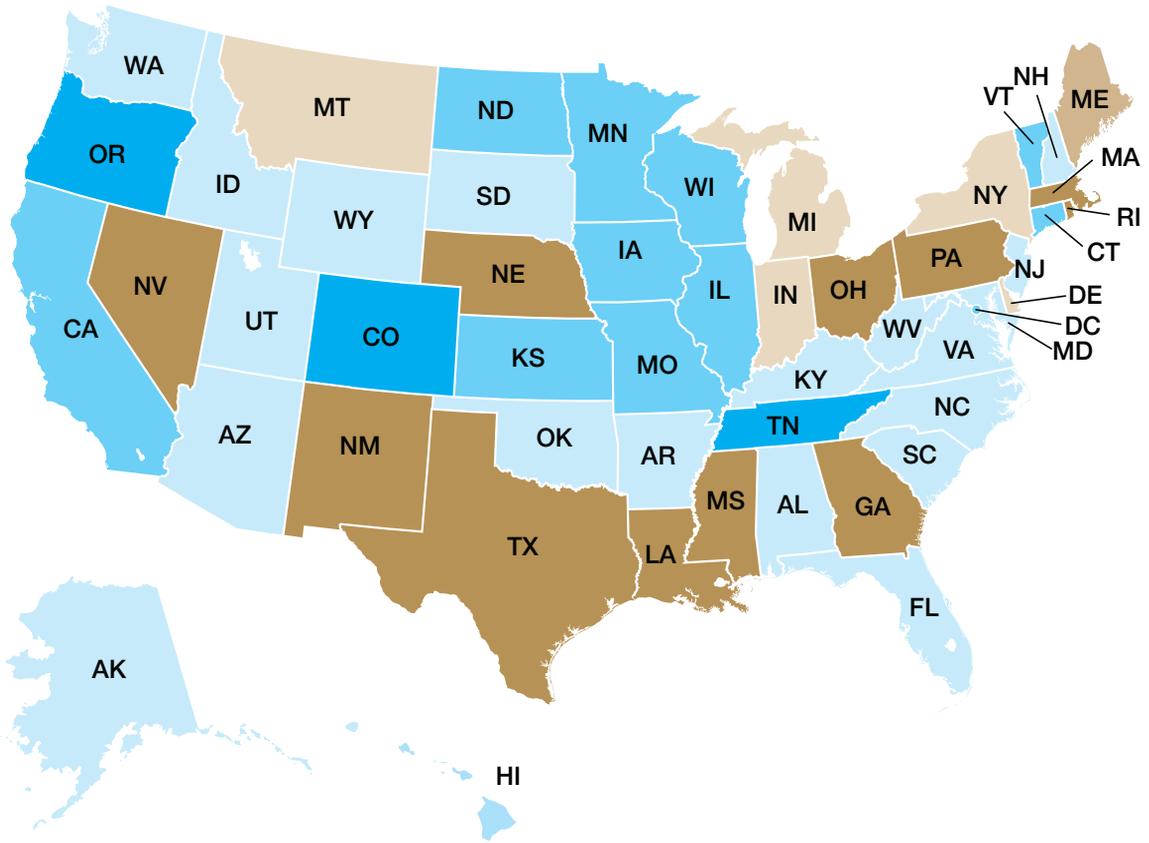

Eight states have multiple general jurisdiction courts with concurrent jurisdiction over general civil matters and one or more limited jurisdiction courts. Delaware, for example, has both a Court of Chancery, which has general jurisdiction over tort, contract, and real property cases seeking equitable relief, and a Superior Court, which has general jurisdiction over civil cases seeking money damages or other legal relief. In addition, Delaware has two limited jurisdiction courts: the Court of Common Pleas, which has jurisdiction over tort, contract, and real property cases up to $50,000, and the Justice of the Peace Court, which has jurisdiction over tort, contract, and real property cases up to $15,000.

Maine has two general jurisdiction courts — the District Court and the Superior Court — with concurrent jurisdiction over general civil matters. The primary difference in jurisdictional authority is that the District Court has exclusive jurisdiction over small claims cases (up to $6,000) and cannot conduct jury trials in general civil cases.

Figure 5 illustrates the maximum amount-in-controversy thresholds for litigants to file in limited jurisdiction courts. The thresholds range from $4,000 (Kentucky) to $200,000 (Mississippi and Texas).⁴² In 18 states, the general jurisdiction and limited jurisdiction courts have concurrent jurisdiction up to the amount-in-controversy threshold for the limited jurisdiction court. That is, a litigant can opt to file a case up to the threshold in either the general jurisdiction or the limited jurisdiction court in those states. Ten states have concurrent jurisdiction for civil cases with the minimum threshold for filing in the general jurisdiction court ranging from as little as $50 in Tennessee to as much as $10,000 in Alabama. In the remaining nine states, the general jurisdiction and limited jurisdiction courts each have exclusive jurisdiction for their respective caseload thresholds ranging from $4,001 in Kentucky to $52,001 in Nebraska.

⁴² The County Court in Mississippi has jurisdiction over tort, contract, and real property cases seeking money damages or other legal relief up to $200,000; the Chancery Court has jurisdiction over civil cases seeking equitable relief. County Courts in Texas have jurisdiction over tort, contract and real property cases up to $200,000 and the Justice Courts have jurisdiction over tort, contract, and real property up to $10,000.

States also differ with respect to the types of cases encompassed by their civil caseloads. In addition to the more widely recognized categories of tort, contract, and real property disputes, a civil case may refer to any non-criminal case including family and non-criminal juvenile matters, probate/estate and guardianship matters, mental health cases, state regulatory and local ordinance violations, traffic infractions, small claims, and appeals from state and local executive agency decisions. State general jurisdiction courts are typically authorized to hear appeals of decisions from civil cases adjudicated in limited jurisdiction courts, often on a de novo basis. Although some states have created general jurisdiction courts specifically for family, juvenile, or probate and estate matters, in those states that maintain only a single general jurisdiction court (single-tier courts), local courts often segregate their civil dockets to manage family, juvenile, and probate/estate cases separately from general civil cases. Nevertheless, the resources allocated to courts with broad jurisdiction over civil cases are generally shared across all case types. Most states have eliminated the distinction between law and equity for the purposes of civil procedure, but some states — notably Delaware and Mississippi — maintain separate courts for law and equity at either the general jurisdiction or limited jurisdiction court level.

Small claims cases are lower-value tort or contract disputes in which litigants may represent themselves without a lawyer.⁴³ Most small claim dockets also involve somewhat less stringent evidentiary and procedural rules. Figure 6 illustrates the amount-in-controversy maximums for small claims cases, which range from $1,500 in Kentucky to up to $25,000 in Tennessee. In many instances, the limited jurisdiction courts have exclusive jurisdiction over small claims cases; litigants opting to file their cases in the general jurisdiction court, or in limited jurisdiction courts rather than in the small claims docket, are expected to adhere to the established procedural and evidentiary rules regardless of whether they are represented by counsel or self-represented.

All of these factors — the lack of common data definitions, differing organizational structures and subject matter jurisdiction for trial courts, and the traditional reluctance to collect and report performance measures — make it extraordinarily difficult to compile an accurate picture of civil litigation based on aggregate statistics published by state courts themselves. The only reliable method of doing so involves the extremely time-consuming and labor-intensive task of collecting case-level data from the trial courts themselves and mapping them onto a common template that facilitates both a reliable count of the cases themselves and an “apples-to-apples” comparison among courts.

⁴³ Small claims courts were originally developed for self-represented litigants, but states vary with respect to whether and under what conditions lawyers may appear on behalf of clients in small claims court.

Project Methodology

A perennial challenge in conducting multi-jurisdictional research using data extracted from case management systems (CMS) is to obtain data with both sufficient accuracy and granularity to be able to make reliable comparisons across jurisdictions. For several reasons, the NCSC decided to limit the potential courts from which to request data to courts with civil jurisdiction in counties that have participated in the Civil Justice Survey of State Courts series. First, those courts have participated in numerous NCSC research studies over the past three decades and thus are familiar with the NCSC and confident in the quality of the research conducted, which tends to improve participation rates. Likewise, NCSC staff are familiar with the CMS in those courts and confident in their ability to extract CMS data. The NCSC also had confidence that those courts would be able to produce data with sufficient case and disposition type granularity for the present study based on their previous participation in the Civil Justice Survey of State Courts.

To select the courts to participate in the Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts, the NCSC randomly selected 10 counties from the 45 counties that participated in all four iterations of the Civil Justice Survey of State Courts. The sampling design classified counties into two categories based on the organizational structure of courts with civil jurisdiction: (1) counties with a unified general jurisdiction court in which all civil cases are filed (single-tier courts); and (2) counties with one or more general jurisdiction courts and one or more limited jurisdiction courts (multi-tier courts). The intent of the sampling design was to ensure some representation of different organizational structures found in state courts. The counties that were selected are listed in Table 1. These included two counties with single-tier courts, and eight counties with multi-tier courts. Within the 10 counties were 36 courts of general jurisdiction and 116 courts of limited jurisdiction.⁴⁴

The two single-tier courts have segmented dockets for civil cases within the unified court structure. The docket assignments for the Santa Clara County Superior Court are based on the amount in controversy: the limited civil docket includes all cases with claims valued less than $25,000 and the unlimited civil docket includes all claims $25,000 and over.⁴⁵ The Cook County Circuit Court employs different dockets for legal and equitable claims and for small claims.

Three counties have three separate tiers of trial courts with jurisdiction over civil cases.⁴⁶ Marion County, Indiana has two general jurisdiction trial courts — the Circuit Court and the Superior Court — that have concurrent jurisdiction over tort, contract, and real property cases. There is no monetary threshold for cases filed in these courts, but small claims cases up to $6,000 can be filed in any of nine Marion County Small Claims Courts.⁴⁷ Harris County, Texas has one general jurisdiction trial court (the District Court), which has jurisdiction over civil cases involving claims greater than $200 as well as exclusive jurisdiction for administrative agency appeals. The Harris County Civil Court of Law is a limited jurisdiction court with jurisdiction over civil cases involving claims up to $200,000. The Civil Court of Law also has exclusive jurisdiction over eminent domain cases in Harris County and appeals from the Harris County Justice of the Peace Court (Justice Court).⁴⁸ Finally, the Harris County Justice Court has jurisdiction over tort, contract, real property, and small claims up to $10,000. Cuyahoga County has a countywide general jurisdiction trial court (Court ⁴⁴ In the Texas judicial system, each District Court, Civil Court of Law, and Justice Court is comprised of a single judge elected to that office. In the Indiana judicial system, the Superior Court and the Circuit Court are courts of general jurisdiction that have concurrent jurisdiction over civil matters. In the Ohio judicial system, the Court of Claims is a statewide general jurisdiction court with jurisdiction over civil matters in which state agencies are named as litigants.

⁴⁵ The $25,000 monetary threshold differentiating limited from unlimited civil cases is a remnant from the court structure in place prior to 2000, when the California judicial branch unified its trial courts into a single tier. With unification, the former municipal courts, which had jurisdiction over civil cases up to $25,000, were incorporated into the county superior courts. Most courts maintained the $25,000 threshold as a familiar mechanism for case assignments.

⁴⁶ The 1816 Indiana Constitution established the Circuit Court (IND. CONST. art. 7, §8) and the Marion County Superior Court was established by statute in 2004 (IND. CODE § 33-33-49). By agreement, the Superior Court exercises exclusive jurisdiction over criminal cases and the Superior and Circuit Courts have concurrent jurisdiction over civil cases. The Circuit Court has exclusive jurisdiction for insurance reorganizations/ liquidations, medical liens, and Marion County tax collection cases. The Circuit Court also supervises the Marion County Small Claims Courts.

⁴⁷ Each township in Marion County has a Small Claims Court. These courts have jurisdiction over civil cases in which the claim for damages does not exceed $6,000. Generally, a small claims case may be filed in any township's Small Claims Court, however all landlord/tenant cases must be filed in the township where the property is located.

of Common Pleas) with jurisdiction over civil claims exceeding $15,000 as well as appeals from administrative agencies and mental health/probate cases. Civil claims up to $15,000 are filed in the 12 municipal courts in Cuyahoga County. In addition to these county-based courts, Ohio has a statewide Court of Claims, which has jurisdiction over civil claims in which the State is a defendant as well as claims filed in the Victims of Crime Compensation Program.

The remaining five counties in the sample each have a single general jurisdiction court and a single limited jurisdiction court. Bergen County Superior Court has exclusive jurisdiction for all general civil cases, but a separate limited jurisdiction Tax Court has jurisdiction over administrative agency appeals and tax cases. The monetary thresholds for the other four limited jurisdiction courts range from $10,000 (Maricopa County Justice of the Peace Court) to $40,000 (Oahu, Hawaii District Court). The general jurisdiction and limited jurisdiction courts in Miami-Dade maintain exclusive jurisdiction over their respective caseloads. The Miami-Dade County Court has jurisdiction over cases up to $15,000 and the Circuit Court has jurisdiction over cases exceeding $15,000. The general jurisdiction and limited jurisdiction courts in Allegheny and Maricopa Counties and Oahu have concurrent jurisdiction over some portion of their respective civil caseloads ($0 to $15,000 in Allegheny County, $1,000 to $10,000 in Maricopa, and $5,000 to $40,000 in Oahu).

All of the counties in the sample have small claims courts. The monetary thresholds for small claims range from $3,500 (Maricopa County, Arizona) to $12,000 (Allegheny County, Pennsylvania). With the exception of Bergen County, jurisdiction for small claims cases is exclusively in the limited jurisdiction courts in counties with multi-tier court structures.

In November 2013, NCSC contacted each of these courts in a letter that described the goals and objectives of the Landscape of Civil Litigation in State Courts study and requested their participation by providing case-level data for all non-domestic civil cases disposed in those courts between July 1, 2012 and June 30, 2013.⁴⁹ The requested data elements included the docket number, case name, case type, filing and disposition dates, disposition type, the number of plaintiffs and defendants, the representation status of the parties, and the case outcome including award amounts. NCSC project staff obtained detailed case-level data from all of the contacted courts except the Superior Court of California, Santa Clara County; the Bedford, Cleveland Heights, and South Euclid Municipal Courts in Cuyahoga, Ohio; the Ohio Court of Claims⁵⁰; and the Decatur and Pike Township Small Claims Courts in Marion County, Indiana.⁵¹

Upon receipt of the case-level data, NCSC project staff formatted the individual datasets to conform to a common set of data definitions based on the NCSC State Court Guide to Statistical Reporting.⁵² The coding process also involved aggregating some records to obtain a single code or value per case for datasets that included multiple records per case (e.g., judgment amounts, representation status). The final dataset consisted of 925,344 cases including aggregated cases from courts unable to provide case-level data. The NCSC originally intended to apply case weights to estimate civil cases, characteristics, and outcomes nationally, but was unable to generate reliable estimates due to the small sample size and the complexity of the weighting procedure. Consequently, these findings report statistics only for the courts serving these 10 counties. The counties themselves, however, reflect the variation in national court organizational structures for civil cases. Collectively, their caseloads comprise approximately five percent of general civil caseloads nationally.

⁴⁹ The State Court Guide to Statistical Reporting includes the following case types as non-domestic civil cases: tort, contract, real property, guardianship, probate/estate, mental health, civil appeals, and miscellaneous civil (habeas corpus, writs, tax, and non-domestic restraining orders). NAT'L CTR STATE CTS., STATE COURT GUIDE TO STATISTICAL REPORTING (ver. 2.0) 3-8 (2014) [hereinafter STATE COURT GUIDE].

⁵¹ The NCSC was ultimately able to obtain aggregate case information for these courts from the Administrative Office of the Courts in the respective states, which eliminated the need to select replacement counties.

⁵² The State Court Guide provides a standardized framework for state court caseload statistics, enabling meaningful comparisons among state courts. STATE COURT GUIDE supra note 49.

CASELOAD COMPOSITION

Table 2 shows both the total number of disposed civil cases provided to the NCSC by court structure type and the percentage breakdown of these cases by broad case type descriptions (contract, tort, real property, small claims, and other civil). Limited jurisdiction courts within multi-tier court structures disposed of 43 percent of the total civil caseload. The single-tier courts in the sample (Santa Clara and Cook Counties) account for slightly less than one-third (31%) of the total cases and the general jurisdiction courts in multi-tier court structures account for 26 percent of the total caseload.

Across all of the courts, slightly less than two-thirds (64%) of the cases are contract disputes with the remainder of the civil caseload consisting of small claims (16%), other civil (9%),⁵³ tort (7%), unknown case type (4%),⁵⁴ and real property (1%). One of the most striking features is that contract cases comprise at least half of the civil caseloads across all three types of court structures, although there are some notable differences. For example, in addition to having the largest volume of cases overall, limited jurisdiction courts have the highest proportion of small claims cases (30%) and the lowest proportion of contract cases (50%). It is highly likely that many of those small claims cases are, in fact, lower-value debt collection cases (a subcategory of contract cases) that were filed as small claims cases to take advantage of simplified procedures. Tort cases have a much higher concentration in general jurisdiction courts of multi-tier court structures than in limited jurisdiction courts. This is likely due to claims for monetary damages exceeding the maximum thresholds for limited jurisdiction courts in personal injury cases.

Small claims cases constituted only six percent of the caseload in counties with single-tier courts, which is due mainly to the small proportion of small claims cases in Cook County.⁵⁵ In Santa Clara County, small claims accounted for 18 percent of the total civil caseload. Interestingly, the monetary limit on small claims cases is $10,000 in both Santa Clara and Cook

⁵³ "Other civil" includes appeals from administrative agencies and cases involving criminal or domestic-related matters (e.g., civil stalking petitions, grand jury matters, habeas petitions, and bond claims).

⁵⁴ Nearly all of the unknown cases (99%) were filed in six of the 12 municipal courts in Cuyahoga County. Because the other six courts indicated multiple case types, and their caseload composition varied across courts, NCSC staff were unwilling to infer case types for this analysis.

Counties, which is considerably higher than both the average limit for counties with multi-tiered court structures ($5,938) and the actual limit in all but two of the eight counties. For some reason that may be unique to Cook County, rather than to single-tier courts generally, litigants opt to file lower-value contract cases as contract cases rather than as small claims cases.⁵⁶

Table 3, however, documents some striking variations across counties. For example, the proportion of contract cases in Marion County, Indiana is only eight percent compared to an overall caseload average of 64 percent while small claims comprise 82 percent of the civil caseload compared to the 16 percent overall average. In Marion County, many creditors file debt collection actions in the Marion County Small Claims Courts, ostensibly due to perceptions that those courts are a more attractive venue for plaintiffs.⁵⁷ The proportion of contract cases in Cuyahoga County is also much lower (39%) than the overall average.⁵⁸

The counties participating in this study did not consistently describe case types with more detailed subcategories, but most broke down caseloads for case types of particular local interest. Those breakdowns provide additional information about civil caseloads.

⁵⁶ Illinois does not permit corporations to initiate small claims cases unless they are represented by an attorney, although a corporate representative may appear to defend a small claims case. IL SUP. CT. R. ART. II, R. 282(b). The cost of retaining an attorney may negate the cost advantage of filing in small claims court.

⁵⁷ The Marion County Small Claims Courts have been the focus of intense criticism for several years due to concerns about venue shopping, lack of due process for defendants in debt collection cases, and collusion between debt collection plaintiffs and Small Claims Court judges. See Marisa Kwialkowski, Judges Call for an End to Marion County's Small Claims Court System, IndyStar (July 12, 2014) (<http://www.indystar.com/story/news/2014/07/12/judges-call-end-marion-countys-small-claims-court-system/12585307/>). Debt collection procedures are also the basis for a class action lawsuit alleging violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. Suesz v. Med-1 Solutions, LLC, 734 F.3d 684 (7th Cir. 2013). A Small Claims Task Force appointed by the Supreme Court of Indiana and an evaluation by the NCSC have both recommended that the Marion County Small Claims Courts be incorporated into the Superior Court to provide appropriate oversight and due process protections for litigants. See JOHN DOERNER, MARION COUNTY, INDIANA, SMALL CLAIMS COURTS: FINAL REPORT (July 2014); INDIANA SMALL CLAIMS TASK FORCE, REPORT ON THE MARION COUNTY SMALL CLAIMS COURTS (May 1, 2012).

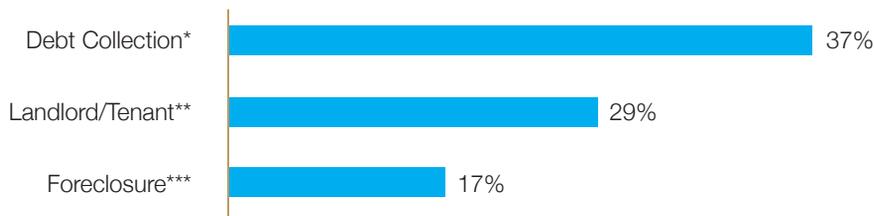

⁵⁸ It is likely that a large proportion of the unknown casetypes in the six municipal courts from Cuyahoga County that did not provide case-level data are actually contract cases.

Figures 7 and 8 illustrate the caseload composition for common subcategories of contract and tort caseloads. Contract caseloads consist primarily of debt collection (37%), landlord/tenant (29%), and foreclosure (17%), cases.⁵⁹ Tort caseloads consist primarily of automobile tort (40%) and other personal injury/property damages cases (20%).⁶⁰ Although medical malpractice and product liability cases often generate a great deal of attention and criticism, they comprise only five percent of tort caseloads (less than 1% of the total civil caseload).

CASE DISPOSITIONS

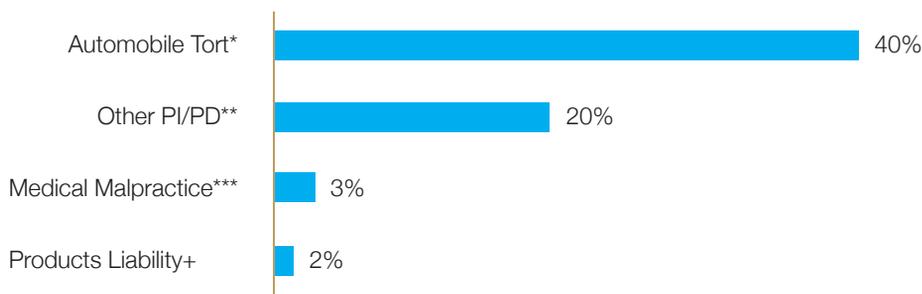

Documenting how civil cases are actually resolved is somewhat challenging due to varying disposition descriptions among case management systems. As discussed previously, courts traditionally record the procedural significance of the disposition in the case management system rather than the actual manner of disposition. Consequently, a case may be recorded as “dismissed” for a variety of reasons such as an administrative dismissal for failure to prosecute, upon motion by a litigant for withdrawal or non-suit, or upon notice that the parties have settled the case. Similarly, a case disposed by “judgment” may indicate either a default judgment or an adjudication on the merits in a bench or jury trial. Some of the courts in the Landscape study employed more descriptive disposition codes that provide guidance about the manner of disposition. For example, a dismissal with prejudice often indicates that the parties have settled the case while a dismissal without prejudice generally indicates either withdrawal or an administrative dismissal. Cases adjudicated on the merits usually had some notation to that effect (e.g., judgment from jury trial, judgment from nonjury trial, arbitration judgment). Nevertheless, the lack of consistency across counties with respect to the data definitions and the lack of descriptiveness for disposition codes undermines the reliability of precise estimates, especially when compared to earlier studies such as the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts. For this study, the NCSC coded dispositions as follows:

⁶⁰ “Personal injury/property damage” reflects a characteristic of the type of damages rather than the legal claim upon which relief is requested. Consequently, that term is not recognized as a unique case type by the NCSC State Court Guide. Nevertheless, that term is used by many courts, including courts in eight of the 10 counties participating in the Landscape study. Although the term is over-inclusive, it likely includes premises liability and other negligence cases.

- Dismissal: cases recorded as withdrawal, dismissed, or dismissed without prejudice;
- Judgment (unspecified): cases recorded as judgment;

- Default judgment: cases recorded as default judgment;
- Settlement: cases recorded as settlement, agreed judgment, stipulated judgment or dismissal with prejudice;
- Summary judgment: cases recorded as summary judgment;
- Adjudicated disposition: cases recorded as disposed by jury trial, directed verdict, bench trial, or arbitration;
- Other disposition: cases recorded as change of venue, removal, transferred or bankruptcy stay; and
- Unknown disposition: cases without a specified disposition.

Keeping these caveats in mind concerning the reliability of disposition rates, Figure 9 reflects the overall disposition breakdown based on this categorization. Dismissals were the single largest proportion of dispositions, accounting for more than one-third (35%) of the total caseload. Judgments (unspecified) and default judgments were the second and third largest categories, at 26 percent and 20 percent respectively. Settlements comprised only 10 percent of dispositions. Four percent of cases were adjudicated on the merits and only one percent were disposed by summary judgment. These disposition rates are a dramatic change from the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts.⁶¹ The dismissal rate is more than three times higher and the default rate is 42 percent higher in the Landscape study. The settlement rate, in contrast, is less than one-fifth of the 1992 study. Adjudicated dispositions also declined from six percent to four percent.

Some of these differences may reflect differences in how these studies were conducted. The 1992 survey examined civil cases disposed in the general jurisdiction courts of 45 large, urban counties. Although all of the counties selected for the Landscape study participated in the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts, the Landscape study also collected data from the limited jurisdiction courts in those counties, which accounts for almost half (43%) of the total caseload.⁶² Table 4 suggests that some of the difference in disposition rates may be the result of differences in the respective caseloads of limited jurisdiction and general jurisdiction courts. Approximately one-third of the cases in the limited jurisdiction courts (32%) were disposed by default judgment, but only 18 percent of the general jurisdiction court cases were default judgments.⁶³ The default rate for single-tier courts was three percent, which is unrealistically low and it is likely that a substantial majority of the unspecified judgments for single-tier courts (51%) are actually default judgments.⁶⁴ Settlement rates in the single-tier and general jurisdiction courts (13% and 12%, respectively) are two times the settlement rate in the limited jurisdiction court (6%), but all are still much lower than the 62 percent settlement rate in the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts. It is likely that a substantial proportion of cases disposed by dismissal are also settlements rather than withdrawals or administrative dismissals.⁶⁵ Surprisingly, adjudication rates are highest in the limited jurisdiction courts (5% compared to 4% in general jurisdiction courts and 1% in single-tier courts), but two-thirds (66%) of the adjudicated dispositions are bench trials in contract, other civil, and small claims cases in limited jurisdiction courts.

In addition to differences in courts included the samples, the coding methodology employed in the two studies differed. Data for the 1992 Civil Justice Survey was collected through personal inspection of individual case files rather than extraction from the case management systems. Consequently, the 1992 data are more accurate and precise than the Landscape data. It is particularly difficult to interpret the dismissal and unspecified judgment rates in the Landscape dataset. Generally, litigants will request that settled cases be dismissed with prejudice to preclude the plaintiff from refiling the case in the future. Cases with that designation were classified as settlements in the Landscape dataset, but some cases may have been coded by court staff only as dismissals in the case management system, which would result in an inflated dismissal rate. Similarly, unspecified judgments may include a substantial proportion of cases that were actually default judgments.

Finally, the current study was undertaken shortly after this country's most significant economic recession since the Great Depression, during which state courts experienced a spike in civil case filings, especially in debt collection and mortgage foreclosure cases.⁶⁶ The disposition rates may reflect the unique economic and fiscal circumstances of state court caseloads during this period rather than more general trends. Table 5, which describes case dispositions by case type, documents substantially higher default judgment rates for contract and small claims cases (21% and 32%, respectively). Tort cases, in contrast, had substantially higher settlement and dismissal rates (32% and 39%, respectively). Real property, small claims, and other civil cases were the most likely to be adjudicated on the merits (6% for real property and other civil cases, 10% for small claims cases).

⁶⁵ Cases dismissed for failure to prosecute averaged five percent among the 17 courts in seven counties that separately identified these cases, but ranged as high as 14 percent in the general jurisdiction courts. Even if all of the dismissals in the general jurisdiction courts were settlements, it would only bring the settlement rate to 34 percent (approximately 55% of the 1992 settlement rate).

⁶⁶ LAFOUNTAIN, supra note 62, at 4.

Collectively, these factors suggest that the actual differences in disposition rates may be less dramatic than indicated by the differences between Figure 2 and Figure 9, but it is unlikely that they account for the entire difference. Compared to two decades ago, it seems likely that more civil cases are being disposed in a largely administrative capacity (dismissals or default judgments), resulting in lower overall settlement rates. With the exception of cases filed in limited jurisdiction courts, in which contract, other civil and small claims collectively comprise 40 percent of the total civil caseload, very little formal adjudication is taking place in state courts at all.

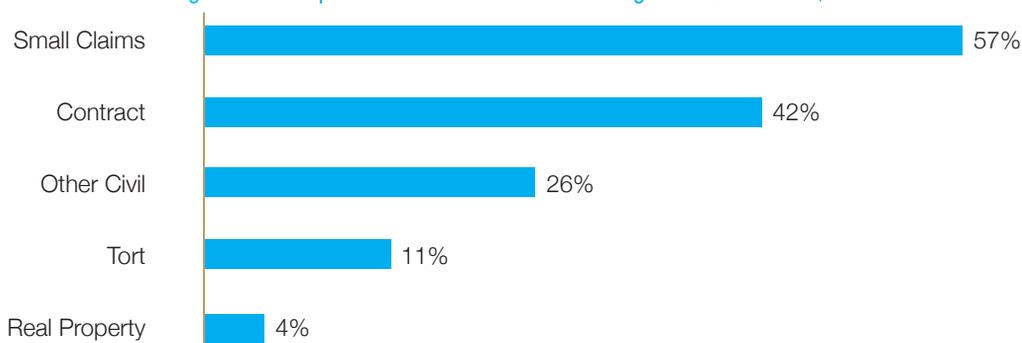

CASE OUTCOMES AND JUDGMENT AMOUNTS

The Landscape courts were not able to provide data documenting which party prevailed in cases that resulted in a judgment, so we are only able to infer case outcomes based on whether the judgment included a damage award. This is an imprecise measurement insofar that some judgments in which the plaintiff prevailed will include only equitable rather than monetary relief.⁶⁷

By the same token, a judgment in which the defendant prevailed on both the original claim as well as a counterclaim against the plaintiff will also reflect a monetary award.⁶⁸ Recall also from Tables 4 and 5 that only 46 percent of cases were disposed by judgment (26% judgment (unspecified), 20% default judgment), and that rate varied considerably by case type. Only 15 percent of tort cases were disposed by judgment compared to 65 percent of small claims, 56 percent of contract cases, 45 percent of real property cases, and 32 percent of other civil cases. Figure 10 provides the proportion of judgments greater than zero, which may be interpreted as a very rough proxy for the plaintiff win rate. Given the factors discussed above, however, these rates likely underestimate the actual rate at which plaintiffs prevailed, but it is not known by how much. The estimated rates are likely to be considerably more accurate for small claims and contract cases in which the proportion of cases disposed by judgment is higher.

For the most part, the monetary values at issue in state court civil cases are relatively modest, at least in cases resulting in a formal judgment. Table 6 shows the average amount and the interquartile range⁶⁹ of the final award for cases resulting in a judgment greater than zero by court type, case type, and manner of disposition.⁷⁰ Overall, the average judgment award was less than $10,000 and the interquartile range was just $1,273 (25th percentile) to $5,154 (75th percentile). Not surprisingly, these values were lowest in limited jurisdiction courts, ostensibly due to the lower monetary thresholds for those courts. General jurisdiction courts had the highest judgment awards, while judgment amounts for single-tier courts, which manage all civil cases for their respective jurisdictions, predictably fell in between. Although some cases resulted in extremely large judgments,⁷¹ they comprised only a small percentage of judgments greater than zero. For example, only 357 cases (0.2%) had judgments that exceeded $500,000 and only 165 cases (less than 0.1%) had judgments that exceeded $1 million.

⁶⁹ The interquartile range is the value of judgment awards at the 25th, 50th, and 75th percentiles. Because the mean (average) is often skewed by extreme outliers, the interquartile range reflects a more accurate picture of the value of typical cases for each category.

⁷⁰ Monetary damages were reported for less than half (41%) of cases that resulted in a final judgment. These cases comprise 25 percent of the entire Landscape caseload.

With respect to case types, average judgments awarded in real property cases were the highest overall ($157,651), followed by torts ($64,761), other civil cases ($12,349), contracts ($9,428), and small claims ($4,503). Although average judgments in real property cases were the highest of all of the case types, they comprised only a fraction (0.5%) of the total cases in which a judgment was entered; contracts and small claims cases comprised 82 percent of the caseload in which a judgment was entered, and 88 percent of the cases in which the judgment exceeded zero.

The monetary value of judgments is considerably lower than one would imagine from listening to debates about the contemporary justice system and largely confirms allegations that the costs of litigation routinely exceed the value of the case. In 2013, the NCSC developed a methodology — the Civil Litigation Cost Model (CLCM) — to estimate legal fees and expert witness fees in civil cases.⁷² Using the CLCM, the NCSC found that in most types of civil cases, the median cost per side to litigate a case from filing through trial ranged from approximately $43,000 for automobile tort cases to $122,000 for professional malpractice cases. Indeed, in many cases the cost of litigation likely outstrips the monetary value of the case shortly after initiating the lawsuit.⁷³ Debt collection cases were the only exception. In a study of Utah attorneys using the CLCM, the NCSC found that the median cost per side to litigate a debt collection case through trial was $2,698.⁷⁴ Given the median judgment amount, most plaintiffs would find it economically feasible to pursue these claims, but not most defendants. There is, moreover, a fairly wide gap between the actual costs involved in resolving civil disputes and litigant expectations about what those costs should be. In 1999, for example, the New Mexico Judicial Branch conducted a series of public opinion polls, focus groups, and litigant surveys to measure the gap between the costs that litigants believe are reasonable and the actual costs in civil cases.⁷⁵ Litigants reported that the estimate of a reasonable cost for resolving their case was $3,682 on average, but actual costs were $8,385.⁷⁶

BENCH AND JURY TRIALS

Courts reported a total of 32,124 trials as case dispositions in the Landscape dataset, 1,109 of which were jury trials (3%) and 31,015 were bench trials (97%).⁷⁷ Collectively, they comprised less than four percent of the entire Landscape dataset (0.1% jury trials, 3.4% bench trials). Jury trials were distributed about equally in the single-tier and general jurisdiction courts (49% and 45%, respectively) with only seven percent of jury trials taking place in limited jurisdiction courts. In contrast, limited jurisdiction and single-tier courts disproportionately conducted bench trials (45% and 42%, respectively) compared to only 13 percent in the general jurisdiction courts. As Figures 11 and 12 illustrate, over three times as many jury trials took place in tort trials (65%) as in other types of cases. Over half of all bench trials (51%) took place in contract cases, followed by other civil cases (27%), small claims (19%), tort (2%), and real property cases (1%).

Only 69 percent of the jury trials and 58 percent of the bench trials in the Landscape dataset included information about the final judgment amount. As noted previously, some of the bench trials may have involved equitable relief, which would explain the absence of a damage award. In other instances, judgment awards were not included in the case-level data.⁷⁸ Tables 7 and 8 provide the average (mean) judgment award by case type for jury and bench trials in which the reported judgment was greater than zero. Those data highlight some important differences between bench and jury trials. First, the damage awards in jury trials are 48 or more times greater than those in bench trials for all case types except small claims. This suggests that litigants engage in significant case selection strategies when deciding whether to try a case to a judge or jury. Tort cases, especially those involving more serious injuries and/or more egregious negligence on the part of the defendant that might warrant punitive damages are much more likely to be tried by a jury. Cases in which there is only limited potential for higher damage awards are more likely to be disposed by bench trial because the costs associated with a jury trial will exceed the potential award.

Second, the average jury and bench awards are heavily skewed by a very small number outlier cases. For example, compared to a mean jury award of $2 million in tort cases, 50 percent of jury awards in tort cases were $30,000 or less, and 75 percent of jury awards in tort cases were less than $152,000. Jury awards exceeded $500,000 in only 17 cases (3% of cases in which judgment exceeded zero), and exceeded $1 million in only 13 cases (2%).⁷⁹ The average judgment awarded in bench trials ($6,408) was three times more than the judgment awarded at the 75th percentile ($2,028).

Another noteworthy consideration concerning bench and jury trials is number of trials involving self-represented litigants. In the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts, attorneys represented both parties in 97 percent of jury trials and 91 percent of bench trials. In the trials from the Landscape dataset, the proportion of trials in which both parties were represented decreased to 87 percent of jury trials and 24 percent of bench trials. Restricting the analysis to general jurisdiction courts (for better comparability with the 1992 Civil Justice Survey) does not measurably improve the picture. Except for tort trials, defendants had representation in less than 30 percent of bench trials. In tort cases, plaintiffs were represented in 69 percent and defendants were represented in 71 percent of bench trials, resulting in only 56 percent of bench trials with both sides represented. The costs associated with bringing a case to trial may be a factor in the relatively high proportion of bench trials involving self-represented litigants in general jurisdiction courts.

TIME TO DISPOSITION

The average time from filing to disposition for cases in the Landscape dataset was 306 days (approximately 10 months); the interquartile range was 35 to 372 days (approximately 1 month to just over 1 year). Table 9 documents the average disposition time as well as the interquartile range for disposition. On average, tort cases took the longest time to resolve (486 days), followed by real property cases (428 days), other civil cases (323 days), contract claims (309 days), and small claims (175 days).

Some cases in the Landscape dataset had unusually long disposition times. A total of 1,252 cases (0.1%) were 10 years or older when they were finally disposed. Of the 521 cases that were 15 years or older, more than half were foreclosure cases filed in the Bergen County Superior Court. The second oldest case in the dataset, People's Trust of New Jersey v. Garra, filed in 1972 and administratively closed in 2013 (41 years), was one of these, although case records suggest that the case was actually resolved in 1998 (26 years). The oldest case was a guardianship case (coded as "Other Civil—Domestic Related"), filed in the Marion County Superior Court in 1950 (62 years).⁸⁰

Addressing court delay has been a major focus of court improvement efforts for several decades. The most recent national effort to manage civil caseloads in a timely manner was a component of the Model Time Standards for State Trial Courts. The Model Time Standards recommend that 75 percent of general civil cases be disposed within 180 days, 90 percent within 365 days, and 98 percent within 540 days.⁸¹

⁷⁹ The highest jury award in the Landscape dataset was $80 million, awarded in a premises liability case involving an iron worker who became paralyzed from the neck down after falling headfirst from a steel beam while not using a safety harness. Bayer v. Garbe Iron Works, Inc. et al., No. 07-L-009877 (Cook Cir. Ct., Dec. 17, 2012). The trial judge subsequently reduced the $80 million verdict to $64 million.

⁸⁰ The State Court Guide recommends that guardianship and other cases in which an initial entry of judgment is filed, but are then reviewed on a periodic basis by a judicial officer, be coded in the case management system as "set for review" rather than leaving the case as "pending" or "open" on the court docket to avoid distorting disposition time statistics. Generously speaking, it is clear from Table 10, which documents the proportion of cases disposed within these timeframes, that the Model Time Standards are still an aspirational goal rather than a current achievement. Overall, only the limited jurisdiction courts come close to meeting the Model Time Standards, with 71 percent of general civil cases disposed within 180 days, 84 percent within 365 days, and 89 percent within 540 days. General jurisdiction courts fared the worst with only 75 percent of cases disposed within 540 days.

Because contract cases comprise such a large proportion of civil caseloads, they will necessarily have an outsized effect on disposition times. Looking closely at the different subcategories of contracts, we find that debt collection cases (37% of contracts) are generally disposed quite quickly, with 91 percent closed within 180 days and 95 percent within 540 days. However, foreclosures (17% of contracts) are significant contributors to overall delay in contract cases.⁸² Only 14 percent were disposed within 180 days, and slightly more than half (51%) within 540 days. Landlord/tenant cases similarly did not meet the Model Time Standards guidelines, although they fared considerably better than mortgage foreclosures.

Although tort cases comprise only seven percent of the Landscape dataset, they were the worst case category in terms of compliance with the Model Time Standards. Only two-thirds (69%) were disposed within 540 days. Automobile torts performed somewhat better (74% disposed within 540 days) than other subcategories of torts. Less than half of the medical malpractice and product liability cases were disposed by 540 days, ostensibly due to their evidentiary and legal complexity. Perhaps the most surprising of the disposition time analysis is the fact that even small claims cases did not fully comply with the Model Time Standards, although they came closer than any other broad case type. Small claims slightly exceeded the Model Time Standards guidelines for cases disposed within 180 days (76%), but then lost ground for cases disposed within 365 days (88%) and 540 days (92%).

The manner of disposition may also explain some of the longer disposition times. Cases disposed by summary judgment and settlement, which necessarily would be characterized by longer discovery and pretrial litigation activity, were the least likely to have closed within 540 days (73% and 70%, respectively). In contrast, almost all (97%) of the cases disposed by default judgment closed within 540 days. Although some of the dismissals were undoubtedly administrative dismissals for failure to prosecute, the relatively long timeframes to close these cases (75% disposed within 540 days) suggests that many of these may have been settlements. Nevertheless, closer supervision of these cases might have improved compliance with the Model Time Standards.

REPRESENTATION STATUS OF LITIGANTS

Most state court judges and court administrators can attest that the representation status of civil litigants has changed dramatically since the publication of the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts.⁸³ In that study, attorneys represented both plaintiffs and defendants in 95% of the cases disposed in general jurisdiction courts. This high level of attorney representation existed across case types; both parties were represented by attorneys in 98 percent of tort cases, 94 percent of contract cases, and 93 percent of real property cases. While plaintiffs remained overwhelmingly represented by counsel (92%) in the Landscape dataset, the average representation for defendants was 26 percent and the average percentage of cases in which both sides were represented by counsel was only 24 percent (see Table 11). As before, there are some striking variations across court types, case types, and disposition types.

Cases filed in general jurisdiction courts provide the most accurate comparison of the 1992 Civil Justice Survey of State Courts and the Landscape datasets. Although attorney representation for plaintiffs has declined only slightly (from 99% to 96%), attorney representation for defendants has decreased by more than half (97% to 46%), resulting in a commensu-

⁸² Mortgage foreclosures were a substantial factor in the spike in civil filings following the 2008-2009 economic recession. U.S. CENSUS BUREAU, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 2012, Table 1194: Mortgage Originations and Delinquency and Foreclosure Rates: 1990-2010. Many state courts found themselves overwhelmed by the volume of foreclosure filings, including the Miami-Dade Circuit Court and the Maricopa County Superior Court. Subsequent complications related to mortgage servicing company record-keeping and internal foreclosure procedures may account for some of the delays apparent in these cases. Joe Adler, OCC Offers Updates on Compliance with Foreclosure Settlement, AMERICAN BANKER (April 30, 2014) available at http://www.americanbanker.com/issues/179_83/occ-offers-update-on-compliance-with-foreclosure-settlement-1067226-1.html, last visited on Aug. 24, 2015; Kate Berry, Robo-Signing Redux: Servicers Still Fabricating Foreclosure Documents, AMERICAN BANKER (Aug. 31, 2011) available at http://www.americanbanker.com/issues/176_170/robo-signing-foreclosure-mortgage-assignments-1041741-1.html?BCnopagination=1&clid=CMWK-MmXwscCFcEUHwod0X4LRw, last visited on Aug. 24, 2015.

rate decrease in cases with attorney representation for both sides (96% to 45%). Not surprisingly, limited jurisdiction courts had the lowest proportion of plaintiff representation (86%), but single-tier courts had the lowest proportion of both defendant representation (13%) and overall litigant representation (11%).

Tort cases had the highest proportion of attorney representation overall (64%) and were the only case category in which more than half of defendants were represented (67%). Attorney representation was lowest in small claims cases (both sides represented in 13% of cases), which was expected given that these calendars were originally developed as a forum for self-represented litigants to obtain access to courts through simplified procedures. What was surprising, however, was the higher than expected proportion of small claims cases in which plaintiffs were represented by counsel (76%). This suggests that small claims courts may have become the forum of choice for many debt collection cases.³⁴ If so, it raises troubling concerns that small claims courts, which were originally developed as a forum in which primarily self-represented litigants could use a simplified process to resolve civil cases quickly and fairly, provide a much less evenly balanced playing field than was originally intended.

The Landscape data are insufficiently detailed to draw firm conclusions about the impact of attorney representation in any given case, but it is clear that it does affect case dispositions. For example, cases disposed by summary judgment had the highest proportions of attorney representation (61% with both sides represented), and likely reflects the fact that self-represented litigants would be less likely to file motions for summary judgment. Defendants in cases resolved by “other disposition” (e.g., bankruptcy stays, removal to federal court, and change of venue) were represented more than half the time (54%), again suggesting that lawyers would be more aware of and inclined to take advantage of these procedural options.

Conclusions and Implications for State Courts

The picture of contemporary litigation that emerges from the Landscape dataset is very different from the one suggested in debates about the contemporary civil justice system. State court caseloads are dominated by lower-value contract and small claims cases rather than high-value commercial and tort cases. Only one in four cases has attorneys representing both the plaintiff and the defendant. In addition, only a tiny proportion of cases are adjudicated on the merits, and almost all of those are bench trials in lower-value contract, small claims and other civil cases.

With rare exceptions, the monetary value of cases disposed in state courts is quite modest. Seventy-five percent (75%) of judgments greater than zero were less than $5,200. Only judgments in real property cases exceeded $100,000 more than 25 percent of the time. At the 75th percentile, judgments in small claims cases were actually greater than judgments in contract cases ($6,000 compared to $4,981). This is particularly striking given recent estimates of the costs of civil litigation. In the vast majority of cases, deciding to litigate a typical civil case in state courts is economically unsound unless the litigant is prepared to do so on a self-represented basis, which appears to be the case for most defendants.

The relatively high proportion of self-represented defendants in civil cases is also troubling. Much of the civil justice system is designed with the assumption that both parties will be represented by competent attorneys. The asymmetry of representation between plaintiffs and defendants across all of the case types — even in small claims courts — raises serious questions about the substantive fairness of outcomes in those cases.⁸⁵ Although there has been a sea change in state court policies with respect to the legitimacy of court-supported assistance to self-represented litigants, it is still a very controversial topic in many states.⁸⁶ Moreover, most of that assistance takes the form of self-help forms and general instructions for filing cases and gathering documents in preparation for evidentiary hearings. As a general rule, state codes of judicial ethics prohibit judges from giving the appearance of providing assistance, much less actually giving assistance, to a self-represented litigant.⁸⁷ This has certain implications with respect to public trust and confidence in the courts. The idealized view is that courts provide a forum in which civil litigants can negotiate effectively to resolve disputes, but also one in which Justice (with a capital J) will be done if those negotiations fail. It is fair to question the extent to which self-represented defendants are able to bargain effectively with represented litigants given unequal resources and expertise.

The economic realities of contemporary civil litigation suggest one explanation for the dominance of contract and small claims cases, which comprise 80 percent of civil caseloads in the Landscape courts. For plaintiffs in these cases, state courts essentially function as a monopoly insofar that securing a judgment from a court of competent jurisdiction is the only legal mechanism for enforcing payment of the award through post-judgment garnishment or asset seizure proceedings. Even so, plaintiffs must generally wait months to secure the judgment before they can initiate enforcement proceedings. The majority of claims asserted in tort cases, in contrast, are likely to involve insurance coverage for the defendant, which provides greater incentives for litigants to settle claims and a mechanism for judgments and settlement agreements to be paid. Indeed, in the vast majority of incidents giving rise to tort claims, the existence of a robust and highly regulated insurance market largely precludes the need to file cases in court at all.⁸⁸

DISTORTED PERCEPTIONS OF CIVIL LITIGATION IN STATE COURTS

This reality raises the question of why perceptions of civil litigation are so distorted. One possibility is that some findings from the Landscape study may be at least partly attributed to ongoing effects of the 2008-2009 economic recession. For example, the large proportion of debt collection and foreclosure cases may have inflated the proportion of contract cases relative to other case types. However, the majority of those cases were filed after July 1, 2011, well after the peak of civil filings from the recession. Moreover, civil case filing statistics indicate that the proportion of contract cases routinely fluctuates over time in response to economic conditions, and rarely dips below 50 percent of civil caseloads. The relative stability of caseload compositions over time tends to counter the possibility that the Landscape findings are a temporary anomaly.

A more likely explanation is the focus on high-value and complex litigation by the media (especially business reports), much of which is filed in federal rather than state courts. Lower-value debt collections, landlord/tenant cases, and automobile torts involving property damage and soft-tissue injuries are rarely newsworthy. Another explanation is that perceptions are largely driven by the experiences of lawyers, who are repeat players in the civil justice system and who are much more likely to be involved in high-value and complex cases. Likewise, judges tend to focus on their experience in cases that demand a great deal of judicial attention. A final explanation for the distorted perception of civil caseloads is the institutional complexity inherent in the variety of organizational structures and jurisdictional authorities in state courts, which make it extremely difficult to document the size of civil caseloads, much less make accurate comparisons across states.

In spite of distorted perceptions, state courts do have serious problems managing civil cases. Of particular concern is the extent to which costs and delay impede access to justice. Procedural complexity is often cited as a contributing cause of cost and delay, but recent commentary suggests that uniform procedural rules that treat all cases exactly the same regardless of the complexity of the factual and legal issues underlying the dispute may be a more significant problem.⁸⁹ Most uniform rules place a great deal of discretion in the hands of lawyers to determine the extent to which each case should be litigated. The bar has largely resisted proposals to restrict that discretion on grounds that any individual case might need an exceptional amount of time or attention to resolve and therefore all cases should be managed as if they need that exceptional treatment. Courts that have imposed mandatory restrictions on lawyer discretion have tended to generate considerable pushback including the use of creative procedural techniques to exempt cases from their application.⁹⁰ Opt-in programs designed to streamline case management have often failed due to underuse.⁹¹ As the findings from the Landscape dataset make clear, however, very few cases need as much time or attention as the rules provide and, ironically, many of them likely take longer and cost more to resolve as a result.

Another contributor to cost and delay is the traditional practice of allowing the litigants, rather than the court, to control the pace of litigation. Proponents ⁹⁰ After the Utah Supreme Court implemented mandatory restrictions on the scope of discovery based on the amount in controversy in November 2011, attorneys appear to have inflated the purported amount-in-controversy to secure assignment to higher discovery tiers. UTAH RULE 26 REPORT, supra note 32, at 10-12. The NH PAD Pilot Rules required attorneys to meet and confer within 20 days of the filing of the Answer to establish deadlines for various discovery events, alternative dispute resolution (ADR) proceedings, dispositive motions, and a trial date, and submit a written stipulation to the court to be used as the case structuring order. Although compliance with the PAD Pilot Rules was quite high, it did not have the intended effect of reducing disposition time. Because the rules did not impose restrictions on the timeframe for completing discovery and pretrial procedures, attorneys simply stipulated to the timeframes to which they were already accustomed. NEW HAMPSHIRE PAD RULES REPORT, supra note 31, at 7-9.

⁹¹ Several states and local trial courts have developed opt-in programs designed to increase civil jury trial rates by offering expedited pretrial processing, but participation rates have varied considerably. See SHORT, SUMMARY & EXPEDITED, supra note 14.

of this tradition offer several justifications. First is a philosophical justification that although the civil justice system is a public forum, the cases themselves remain private disputes that should be wholly controlled by the parties. Proponents of party-driven pacing argue that the parties have more complete knowledge about the case and the attractiveness of any proposed resolution and are therefore in a better position to determine the pace at which the case should proceed and the extent to which additional investments in litigation are worthwhile. Second, until fairly recently, most litigants were represented by attorneys who were repeat-players in the civil justice system. As such, courts have generally been more attentive to bar demands for control over case management than litigant demands for speedy, just, and inexpensive resolution of disputes.

Finally, courts historically have not had sufficient resources to effectively manage civil caseloads. The sheer volume of civil cases filed in state courts greatly overwhelms the ability of judges to provide individual attention and oversight to every case. Instead, judges focus most of their attention on the “squeaky wheels,” (cases involving overly aggressive litigants clamoring for the court’s attention and using extensive motions practice to disagree on every conceivable issue). Judges have few incentives to pay attention to those cases that are just quietly “pending” on the civil docket. With rare exceptions, previous recommendations concerning caseload management have not been broadly adopted or institutionalized in state courts. Nor have courts developed case management automation to support effective caseload management.

While most automation systems can track case filings and calendar events, they lack the ability to monitor compliance with deadlines or other court orders.⁹² Case progress, therefore, depends on the litigants to inform the court that the case is in need of some judicial action (e.g., to resolve a discovery dispute, rule on a summary judgment motion, or schedule the case for trial). Furthermore, non-judicial staff serve primarily in clerical roles and rarely have either the training or the authority to undertake routine case management tasks on behalf of the judge. As a result, state courts struggle to comply with the Standards.

THE FUTURE OF THE CIVIL JUSTICE SYSTEM IN STATE COURTS?

Substantial evidence supports allegations that civil jury and bench trials have declined precipitously over the past several decades.⁹³ The most frequent explanation for this trend is that the cost and time involved in getting to trial make alternative methods of dispute resolution more attractive.⁹⁴ A substantial commercial industry providing ADR services (e.g., mediation, arbitration, private judging) not only actively competes with state and federal courts for business, it even relies largely on experienced trial lawyers and judges to provide those services. Not only are these methods more likely to be pursued in existing disputes, many routine consumer and commercial transactions (e.g., utility contracts, financial services agreements, health-care and insurance contracts, commercial mergers, and employment contracts) now specify that future disputes must be resolved by mediation or binding arbitration.⁹⁵ The rise of the Internet economy has also spurred the development of online dispute resolution forums for major Internet-based companies such as E-bay, PayPal, and Amazon.⁹⁶ A significant consequence of these trends is the growing lack of jury trial experience within the bar and increasingly the state court trial bench. This may further feed the decline in civil jury trials as lawyers and judges discourage their use due to unfamiliarity with trial practices.⁹⁷ In addition to declining trial rates, there is growing concern that many civil litigants are not filing claims in state courts at all.⁹⁸ Preemptive clauses for binding arbitration in consumer and commercial contracts divert claims away from state courts, but other factors including federal preemption of certain types of cases,⁹⁹ international treaties,¹⁰⁰ and legislative requirements that litigants exhaust administrative remedies in state or federal agencies before seeking court review¹⁰¹ have also proliferated in recent years.

Although not related to trends in civil caseloads and disposition rates, state court budgets declined precipitously during the economic recessions in 2002-2003 and again in 2008-2009. Although most state courts experienced some recovery after the 2003 recession, there is currently no expectation among state court policymakers that state court budgets will return to pre-2008 recession levels. Moreover, state and federal constitutional and statutory provisions place higher priority on criminal and domestic caseloads in state courts, further undermining timely and effective management of civil caseloads. For the past two decades, state courts leaders have resigned themselves to doing more with less, all the while watching civil litigants move with their feet to other forums to resolve disputes or forego civil justice entirely.

These trends have severe implications for the future of the civil justice system and for public trust and confidence in state courts. The cost and delays of civil litigation greatly outpace the monetary value of most cases filed in state courts, effectively denying access to justice for most litigants and undermining the legitimacy of the courts as a fair and effective forum to resolve disputes. Reductions in the proportion of civil cases resolved through formal adjudication threaten to erode a publicly accessible body of law governing civil cases. Fewer common law precedents will leave future litigants without clear standards for negotiating civil transactions or conforming their conduct in a responsible manner. The privatization of civil litigation likewise undermines the ability of the legislative and executive branches of government to respond effectively to developing societal circumstances that become apparent through claims filed in state courts. Because the civil justice system directly touches everyone in contemporary American society — through housing, food, education, employment, household services and products, personal finance, and commercial transactions — ineffective civil case management by state courts has an outsized effect on public trust and confidence compared to the criminal justice system. If state court policymakers are to preserve the traditional role of state courts as the primary forum for dispute resolution, civil justice reform can no longer be delayed or even implemented incrementally through changes in rules of civil procedure. Instead, it will require dramatic changes in court operations to provide considerably greater court oversight of caseload management to control costs, reduce delays, and improve litigants' experiences with the civil justice system.

⁹⁸ The NCSC Court Statistics Project reports that civil filings have declined by 13.5% since the peak in filings in 2009. Although population adjusted filings vary periodically in response to economic conditions, there is no apparent decrease overall since 1987, the year that the NCSC began reporting these statistics.

Leading Off: Filling Big Shoes

Millennials would not be expected to remember this catch phrase; it may even be a stretch for Generation Y. But if you turned on a television set in the 1970s or '80s, you were likely to see traffic stop and pedestrians freeze in their tracks whenever advice from the E. F. Hutton brokerage firm was being shared.

In December, multiple generations of lawyers made their way into Dorsett Auditorium for the Professionalism Committee's annual CLE program. Prominent among the speakers that day was the outgoing executive director of the N.C. Chief Justice's Commission on Professionalism, Mel Wright.

Such a presentation should be routine for Wright, who is retiring this summer after 20 years as the commission's founding executive director, yet he remains meticulous in his preparation and appearance. The fact that he has presented professionalism programs in every North Carolina judicial district, in every county for that matter, is irrelevant.

Be they young or old, everyone who came to the N.C. Bar Center that day was going to get his best effort. It was another chance to make another positive impression on behalf of the commission and the legal profession at large, and true to form, he nailed it.

His successor will be chosen from a field of applicants who either know or will soon learn that they have big shoes to fill. North Carolina is not only a large state, it's a wide state, as Wright and anyone else from Elizabeth City well knows.

“I think it is important for the bar that the director be willing to go from Manteo to Murphy with the message of professionalism,” Wright said. “Let judges and lawyers know that if there is anything the professionalism commission can do to help them that we will.

“I hope they will choose someone who has some experience but has demonstrated that they care about our profession, and that they will do their very best to enhance professionalism in whatever capacity or way that they can.”

The interview continues on page 19. His legacy of professionalism will endure for generations.

When Mel Wright talks, people listen. NCL

The President's Perspective

By Kearns Davis

Fred Lind, Chief Public Defender for Guilford County, recently shared a letter from a juror:

Last week I had the privilege of serving on a jury for a case defended by Mr. A. Brennan Aberle.

I was so impressed by his performance on this case I felt I had to put something on the record.

At the start Mr. Aberle promised a defense based on facts and reason, and he delivered on that promise. ...

I am often worried that justice is only for those who can afford it, but Mr. Aberle's effective defense of his client reassures me that the freedom of ALL residents of Guilford County is well-protected by your office. I don't believe a better defense could have been purchased at any price.

My Cousin Vinny (1992) is a legal film classic. But its caricature of a stammering, timid, poorly prepared public defender reinforced a stereotype that is widely shared but wildly wrong. As those who appear regularly in criminal court know, public defenders are experts. It is the public defender who spends every day in the same courthouse, working with judges and prosecutors and handling the cases that are staples for indigent clients. One United States district judge, who observes skilled, experienced counsel every day, describes the Federal Public Defender's office in his district as, "lawyer for lawyer, the best trial law firm in the State of North Carolina."

Gideon v. Wainwright, in 1967, established states' Sixth Amendment responsibility to provide counsel to indigent criminal defendants. Soon afterward, the North Carolina Senate directed the Courts Commission to study the implementation of a statewide public defender system.¹ A half century later, though, public defender offices serve just 31 of our 100 counties.²

Public defender offices are effective and productive. The North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice, appointed by Chief Justice Mark Martin in 2015, conducted a thorough study of indigent defense in North Carolina.³ In its recent Final Report, the Commission cited empirical research findings that public defenders perform as well or even better on average than private appointed attorneys. By concentrating on particular types of criminal cases, the Commission found, public defenders develop expertise that promotes both quality and efficiency.⁴

Public defenders do not eliminate the need for private,

"To achieve justice, the system must be reliable, and reliability requires effective advocacy on both sides."

appointed practitioners. On the contrary, due to conflicts of interest and workloads, jurisdictions with public defenders "require continued active participation by the private bar."⁵ Indeed, public defenders make the private bar better. The devoted private lawyers who commit their time and energies to indigent defense, at very low rates, profit from the support, expertise, and collective experience of public defender offices.⁶

Other stakeholders, too—including judges and prosecutors—strongly support public defenders' work and role. Accordingly, the Commission concluded, "the best delivery system for indigent defense services in North Carolina is a public defender office." Its Final Report recommended a statewide system of district and regional public defenders.⁷

The state makes its weightiest decisions in the criminal courts. In pursuit of justice, the machinery of government turns from protecting liberty—our nation's founding purpose—to taking liberty away.

To achieve justice, the system must be reliable, and reliability requires effective advocacy on both sides. Gideon's promise is that everyone accused of a crime, the powerless as well as the powerful, will have an effective advocate. Fifty years of experience teaches that public defenders—the system's unsung heroes—are the best fulfillment of that promise. .vcl

Member in Focus: Deborah Sperati

Ask Deborah Sperati if she would rather run a craft brewery or practice law as a partner at Poyner Spruill, and she answers with a question: “Why choose when you can do both?”

As co-founder, legal counsel and chief cultural officer of Koi Pond Brewery in Rocky Mount, Sperati blends her passion for craft beer and her 18 years of experience as a civil and commercial litigator. A North Carolina native who grew up in Greenville, Sperati earned her law degree from UNC School of Law and has practiced for 18 years. At Poyner Spruill, she leads the Brewery, Winery and Distillery Practice Group, which offers her critical insight into the challenges facing the state’s growing group of beer, wine and spirits artisans. Here, she offers some insight on how she keeps these dual pursuits alive.

Q: How does your interest in breweries overlap with your practice of law?

A: The legal hurdles that breweries, wineries and distilleries face are a constantly evolving and imposing aspect of trying to start and run a business in these industries. I feel like I am in a unique position to understand it from both the legal side and the business owner side, so it is critical that I utilize my legal experience whether it be for Koi Pond or any of our friends in the industry.

Q: What is it about North Carolina beers that inspired you to co-found a brewery?

A: Breweries have a unique ability to showcase local products grown in our area, simultaneous with giving people a sense of the history and culture. Beers made here are beers with a sense of place, a place that I know, demonstrating artistry, ingenuity, optimism, and boundless creativity. I grew up on a farm in Greenville, N.C., and take great pride in eastern North Carolina. As we lose our traditional industries of tobacco and textiles, breweries can repurpose our agricultural strengths by utilizing our farms to grow all the products we need to brew beer: barley, hops, plants for naturally occurring yeast and all the fruits, produce and herbs which may go into our flagship and specialty beers. Witnessing the success of new craft brewers in the region has been an inspiration. We can grow things here, and we will.

Q: Do you have a current Koi Pond beer favorite?

A: It depends on the day! We offer a lot of seasonal ales and with spring upon us, there are some great ones in the works like our Strawberry Lotus Saison that won gold at the N.C. Brewers Cup last year, and one of my favorites—our Cucumber Basil Summer Ale. I’m also a sucker for our stouts, particularly Rising Sun Mocha Java Stout and our Destination Stout made with almond and toasted coconut.

Q: How hands-on is your role in the brewing process?

A: I am not a brewer and our beer is better because I know that. Brewing is science, and art, and more science, and highly technical and mechanical know-how, and a thousand other things outside my skill set. I think we have the best team anywhere and I am constantly in awe of what they create, so my job is to make sure they can do their job.

Q: Do you have any quotes that inspire you?

A: We have a friend that is an artist and painted us a sign to hang in the brewery as a gift for our grand opening. It has a familiar quote that always inspires me to keep moving and trying new things: “Your life is your story. Write well. Edit often.”

Q: Was there a particular person or event in your life that inspired you to be an attorney?

A: I started saying I wanted to be an attorney somewhere around age 5. I always thought of practicing law as a way to chart your own path and impact the world around you, and most importantly, make your parents proud.

Q: Tell us about your family.

A: My husband Matthew Sperati is also an attorney and operates his own firm in Rocky Mount. We have two dogs, Amos and Olive, that keep us on our toes and are big fans of pet-friendly craft breweries.

Q: How has your membership in the North Carolina Bar Association helped you as an attorney?

A: The NCBA is the glue that holds us all together, reminds us why we got into the profession, keeps us moving forward, and facilitates giving back to our communities. .ncz

A WORTHY CAUSE

COMMISSION REPORT A BLUEPRINT FOR FUTURE OF JUSTICE SYSTEM

BY CHIEF JUSTICE MARK MARTIN

On March 15, 2017, in a ceremony at the Supreme Court of North Carolina, the North Carolina Commission on the Administration of Law and Justice (NCCALJ) presented its Final Report. This report is only the third effort of its kind in the history of the North Carolina judicial branch, following the work of the Bell Commission in the 1950s and '60s and the report of the Medlin Commission in the 1990s.

The NCCALJ initiative coincided with the 50th anniversary of several judicial branch milestones that arose from the Bell Commission's recommendations. The timing is appropriate because, I hope that, 50 years from now, future generations of North Carolinians will mark the NCCALJ's recommendations as another set of significant achievements for our state's courts.

In February 2014, I announced a plan to strengthen our judicial system. Having served as a judge in the trial division and in our state's appellate courts for over two decades, I knew firsthand the systemic challenges facing our judicial branch. Almost two decades had passed since the last full review of our court system, and our state had changed significantly. The top priority of my administration-of-justice plan was to start a new commission, so, in September of 2015, I convened the NCCALJ. The commission was directed to undertake a comprehensive and independent review of North Carolina's court system and make recommendations for improving the administration of justice.

The NCCALJ's membership was drawn statewide from business, academia, the judicial branch, the legislative branch, the executive branch, the legal profession and the non-profit sector. Each of the commission's 65 members served on one of five committees: Civil Justice, chaired by Dean David F. Levi of Duke Law School; Criminal Investigation and Adjudication, chaired by Judge William A. Webb, retired federal magistrate judge; Legal Professionalism, chaired by Catharine Biggs Arrowswood, former NCBA president and a law partner at Parker Poe; Public Trust and Confidence, chaired by J. Bradley Wilson, CEO of Blue Cross and Blue Shield of North Carolina; and Technology, chaired by Supreme Court Justice Barbara A. Jackson. Thirteen non-voting ex officio members also participated in the commission's work. Each committee was served by one or two reporters, and all of the committees were supported by three full-time commission staff members.

The commission met four times as a full body. Individual committees met many more times on their own, for a total of 62 meetings over a 15-month period. The National Center for State Courts, other experts and organizations that attended these meetings, and the NCCALJ's research associate ensured that committee discussions were well informed and data driven. Seeking as much public input as possible, the commission conducted four well-attended public hearings in the summer of 2016 and also solicited comments online from judicial branch stakeholders and members of the general public. In addition, the polling centers at Elon University and High Point University conducted a series of surveys on public trust and confidence on the NCCALJ's behalf in the fall of 2015. The results of these polls helped inform the commission's thinking.

The commission's work has been collaborative, innovative and thoughtful. Each committee identified and then deliberated about a diverse set of issues and, through healthy dialogue, arrived at empirically grounded, fact-based recommendations. The committees' efforts focused on how North Carolina's courts could best meet the public's expectations for a modern court system. The committee reports are unified by three fundamental principles of sound judicial administration—fairness, accessibility and efficiency. Those principles echo the Judicial Branch's constitutional mandate to administer justice “without favor, denial, or delay.” N.C. Constitution, art. I, § 19.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the commissioners and reporters who collectively volunteered over 4,000 hours to the NCCALJ. Included among those were more than 20 practicing attorneys and all seven of the state's law school deans. I also appreciate the many lawyers who addressed the committees on various topics, and those who provided comments at one of the NCCALJ's public hearings or submitted comments online during the commission's public comments period. I am especially grateful to NCBA President (and NCCALJ commissioner) Kearns Davis and the leadership of the Bar Association for their enthusiastic support of the NCCALJ.

The NCCALJ's commitment to tireless collaboration and public input is perhaps best exemplified by the Criminal Investigation and Adjudication Committee's recommendation on juvenile reinvestment. The committee recommends raising the juvenile age—that is, the age at which a youth is prosecuted in adult criminal court instead of appearing in juvenile court—from 16-years-old to 18-years-old for nonviolent crimes. This recommendation enjoys support from a broad range of organizations, such as the N.C. Sheriffs' Association, the N.C. Chamber of Commerce's Legal Institute, and groups as diverse as the ACLU and the John Locke Foundation. The NCCALJ's public comments period last August evidenced a high level of support as well. A Civitas poll released this March again confirmed this public sentiment, showing 70 percent public support for raising the juvenile age. Legislation to implement the recommendation was recently introduced in the General Assembly with strong bipartisan support. I am hopeful that juvenile reinvestment will be enacted into law this session.

The majority of the NCCALJ's recommendations are within the judicial branch's authority to implement on its own. Almost all of the recommendations require involvement by the North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts' (NCAOC) various offices and divisions, including Technology Services, Research and Planning, Court Services, Court Programs and the Governmental Affairs Office, which can continue working on recommendations, such as juvenile reinvestment, that require legislative changes. Accordingly, the NCCALJ co-chairs have recommended that the NCAOC director take primary responsibility for carrying out the commission's work. The director has initiated key steps in this regard, including an important restructuring of NCAOC to position that organization to implement the commission's recommendations. In addition, NCAOC has already acted on several recommendations, including the creation of a judicial fellows program that will provide research and support to trial court judges; a revamp of the NCcourts.org website to increase transparency and access to the court system; a speakers bureau that has enlisted civics education speakers who are available to speak in all 100 counties; and the creation of NCAOC's e-Courts division, which will be responsible for the five-to-seven-year process of implementing the Technology Committee's strategic technology plan.

I am confident that the NCCALJ's recommendations will create a framework for dramatic, systemic improvement in the

Academic Freedom In Interesting Times

By William Joseph Austin Jr.

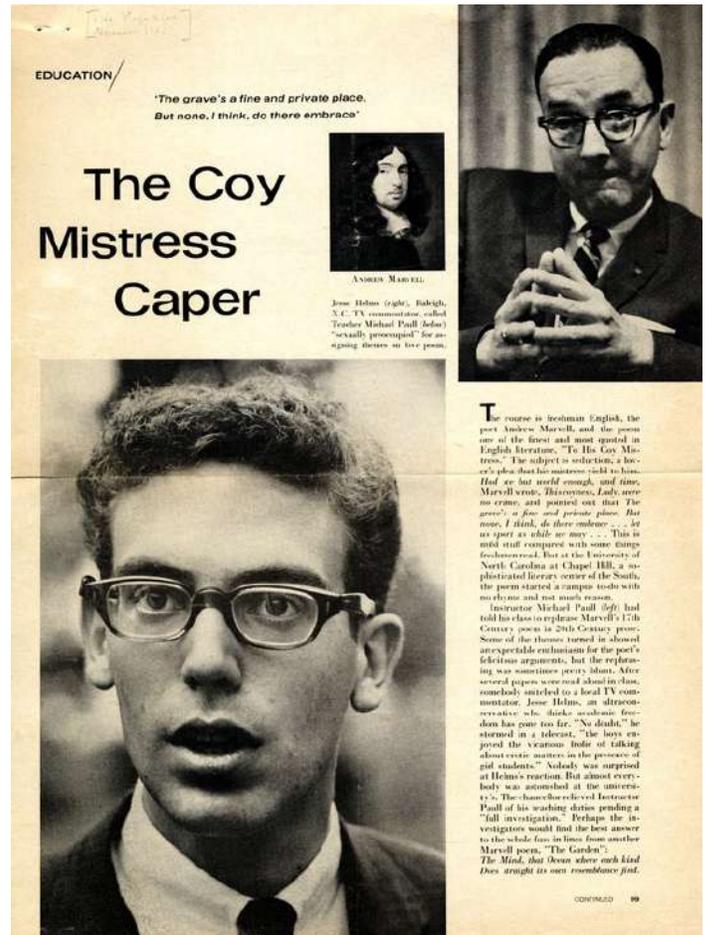

A 50th anniversary came and went this past fall without fanfare or commemoration. But for several weeks in October and November of 1966, Andrew Marvell's poem, "To His Coy Mistress," written circa 1650's, was a "national sensation."^[1] On Oct. 17, 1966, the television station WRAL reported that a UNC English instructor had assigned his students to write a paper on seduction using this 17th-century poem.^[2] Subsequent investigation by a departmental committee determined in November that the instructor, Michael Paull, had not given the students that assignment, but asked them to use the poem to explain imagery and six figures of poetic speech.^[3]

In the meantime what was called the "Coy Mistress" case became the subject of television commentaries by then editorialist Jesse Helms in his Viewpoint series. Quoting from the transcript of one of them, he had this to say:

In the sometimes fuzzy, superficial world of misguided academic freedom and irresponsible freedom of the press, all the world is mostly a stage and a good many of the people are actors. Therefore, it is remotely possible, though not logically probable, that the young English professor at Chapel Hill—the one with such an apparent preoccupation with sex—may somehow manage to wear that crown of pious martyrdom so frantically placed upon his head last week by the "liberal" newspapers of the state.^[4]

The history of how a freshman English assignment was seized upon by the press and politicized is discussed in depth elsewhere.^[5] Yet the "Coy Mistress" case is often forgotten, perhaps eclipsed. This chapter in UNC history occurred in the wake of the 1966 "student revolt" against the Speaker Ban Law.^[6] Overturning the Speaker Ban Law was ultimately a victory for academic freedom in the classic Sweezy v. New Hampshire sense that educational institutions should be allowed to freely determine on educational grounds who may teach, what may be taught, and how it shall be taught.^[7] The "Coy Mistress" case, on the other hand, at least according to one scholar, involved the "politics of character assassination,"^[8] referring to the invective heaped on the English instructor and the effect it had

"The Coy Mistress Caper," Life, November 1966: 99-102. Records of the Department of English (#40081), University Archives, Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

on his teaching career. It also involved a direct attack on the Sweezy freedom^[9] to let the university determine what may be taught and how. After all, "To His Coy Mistress" was then, and still is, recognized as a "Masterpiece," reviewed in the eponymous Wall Street Journal weekly feature.^[10]

However our purpose here is not to cast judgment, but to demonstrate, once again, what's past is prologue. Fifty years later, the fall semester of 2016 was marked by increased incidence of newsworthy speech and speech acts in school settings, albeit none as intense (so far) as the "Coy Mistress" case:

- In September a high school teacher resigned after her students said she asked them to compare speeches by Adolf Hitler with those made by then presidential candidate Donald Trump.
- In October, several members of a university marching band, emulating the racial protest of a professional football player, “took a knee” during the “Star Spangled Banner” at a college football game.

Collectively, these cases are suggestive of the panoply of First Amendment free speech issues that can arise in the school setting. For example, the controversy over the college sports course evokes Sweezy again. Then the actions of the members of the school marching band call to mind the First Amendment issues raised in the case of Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District.^[12] There, students who protested the Vietnam War by wearing black armbands to school were punished. The issue then was whether the disciplinary action violated the

An improper topic

When asked about the Paull affair, Chancellor J. Carlisle Williams said, “I am sorry.” He transferred Paull from teaching to research duties on the recommendation of a faculty group. Because, he explained, the theme topic wasn’t proper for “girls who had been in school for only one month.”

Of course, the fun grew to unendurable proportions that finally erupted outside from Paull’s English section scurried to classes hitting their faces from photographers’ cameras.

As the chairman of the English department, Raymond Adams (left) was one of several members who recommended Paull be transferred— not because his group found the specific theme suggestive but Adams says vaguely, “because of the situation.” Meanwhile Paull’s students, led by Harold White (below), all signed a petition denouncing their teacher.

- In November an elementary school canceled a “wax museum” presentation in which third-graders had chosen to portray Adolf Hitler.
- It was reported that a university course on college sports, “Big-time College Sports and the Rights of Athletes, 1956 to the Present,” was the object of efforts to “do away with the course.”^[11]

The incidents involving teachers could implicate the Supreme Court’s analytical way of handling public employee free speech cases, sometimes called the Pickering/Connick Test, or the Pickering Balancing Test, which takes its name from one or both cases, Connick v. Myers^[14] and Pickering v. Board of Ed.^[15] in which the U.S. Supreme Court constructed this model. The

Jesse Helms outlines his case against UNC-Chapel Hill English instructor Michael Paull in this transcript of a commentary he delivered in October 1966. (Viewpoint #1466, 25 October 1966, Viewpoint, IRaleigh, N.C.: Capitol Broadcasting Co.). 1960-1976. North Carolina Collection, Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.)

Supreme Court defined the task as seeking a balance between the interest of public employees, including teachers, in commenting on matters of public concern and the interest of the state, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees.[16] The test recognizes that the public employee retains rights “as a citizen” of the United States; and also that the governmental employer does have a legitimate albeit constrained interest in regulating the speech of its employees.[17]

Also relevant is the Supreme Court’s decision in the case of Garcetti v. Ceballos,[18] another landmark decision concerning the First Amendment rights of public employees. In that case, a deputy district attorney complained of retali-

tion after he criticized a search warrant obtained by a deputy sheriff in a criminal case. The Supreme Court held that public employees who make statements pursuant to their official duties are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes and are not insulated from employer discipline for their communications in the course of public employment.[19] In dissent, Justice Souter questioned whether the majority opinion meant to imperil First Amendment protection of academic freedom in public college and universities.[20] The majority, through the opinion written by Justice Kennedy, rejoined, “We need not, and for that reason do not, decide whether the analysis we conduct today would apply in the same manner to a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.”[21] Thus, Garcetti does not foreclose protection for “speech related to scholarship or teaching” in addition to the Pickering/Connick protection for the teacher’s right to speak out, as a citizen, on matters of public concern. There are implications for the education process, start to finish, from preK to postdoctoral.

The Garcetti case could be applicable in the cases involving the high school teachers inasmuch as their actions occurred in the classroom and involved instructional activities. However, received wisdom is that K-12 teachers do not possess rights of academic freedom when it comes to teaching in a classroom.[22] Citing North Carolina general statutes,[23] respected commentators have agreed that it is the local school board in North Carolina that has the sole authority and discretion for controlling curricular speech in the public school classroom.[24] One commentator has stated:

Although teachers, not board members, deliver the curriculum, teachers do not have a right to select content or instructional materials or methods unless they have been specifically assigned that authority by the state or local board of education. Court decisions have established that a teacher in North Carolina has no right under the First Amendment to challenge or fail to follow a school board's decision related to the curriculum, whether or not the teacher is convinced that he or she knows how best to help students learn and achieve.[25]

The Fourth Circuit has also held that the same principles apply to extracurricular activities in high school, such as putting on a controversial play in a statewide competition.[26] On the other hand, what if a school board required the high school history teacher to teach "alternative facts" such as Holocaust denial or the racial views of John C. Calhoun? The remedy due the teacher who is ordered to convey factual misinformation to students appears to be somewhat of an open question,[27] although the equities would seem to favor a paradigm shift in such a case in favor of the teacher.

A U.S. District Judge in the Eastern District of North Carolina has quoted, albeit in a footnote, the dictum in Garcetti v Ceballos,[28] "expression related to academic scholarship or classroom instruction" may not get treated the same as statements made by public employees in performance of their official duty.[29] However, it did not come into play in that case, which was one of a middle school special-education teacher. The court held that the teacher had failed to create a genuine issue of material fact under Pickering-Connick as to whether her interest in speaking out about the consolidation of life skills classes outweighed the school board's interest in providing effective and efficient public service.[30] Also, what she had to say in the course of being interviewed by her principal about the alleged sexual assault of a student was held to have been made pursuant to her job duties as a teacher, therefore, as an employee, not as a private citizen.[31] Her speech was not about classroom instruction, therefore, squarely placed in the unprotected category established in Garcetti. The judge stated, "when a teacher is performing administrative duties, as opposed to instructional duties, the Garcetti rule fully applies." [32] Nevertheless, the judge's footnote may yet signal a foot in the door in a future teacher academic freedom case that does involve academic scholarship.

In 1966, the same year that gave us the "Coy Mistress" case, Robert F. Kennedy gave a speech in which he quoted what was said to be a Chinese curse, "May he (sic) live in interesting times." [33] Sen. Kennedy went on to say, "Like it or not, we live in interesting times. These are times of danger and uncertainty; but they are also the most creative of any time in the history of mankind." Like the decade of the '60s, the present time is interesting in much the same way. We are apt to see not only acts of protest but also creativity in our schools, colleges and universities, which will require invocation and perhaps expansion of the legal principles discussed in this article. NCL

A Legacy of Professionalism: Mel Wright Set the Bar High

By Russell Rawlings

The North Carolina Chief Justice's Commission on Professionalism (CJCP) will reach the generally accepted age of adulthood—18 years—when its founding executive director, Mel Wright, retires in the summer of 2017.

But in this instance the parent, and not the child, will be leaving. When he departs, Wright will leave behind a legacy of professionalism that will endure for generations.

And he will be the first to tell you that it is not his legacy. The high standards of professionalism that permeate the legal profession in North Carolina were not his to begin with, nor will they vacate the premises when he and his wife, Jo, return to full-time occupancy of their Winston-Salem home.

It is a legacy that belongs to the lawyers of North Carolina.

"I believe that 99.9 percent of our lawyers and judges understand and appreciate the core values and elements of professionalism," Wright said, "and they do their best every day to serve their clients and the courts well.

Wright's mission, consequently, has been to do whatever he can to reach that one tenth of one percent who sometimes wander astray.

"I have said many times," Wright continues, "that I consider my job to be similar to a Salvation Army preacher or volunteer at Christmastime ringing the bell outside of the grocery store. I have been ringing the professionalism bell as often as I can in as many places as I can."

Wright thought he had missed his chance to ring that bell when he read about the creation of the CJCP in 1999.

"I was sitting in my office in Winston-Salem in August and I saw the announcement of the creation of the Commission on Professionalism," Wright said. "I had always been interested in professionalism and doing things the right way.

"I was in my mid 50s and I had practiced for 26 years, and I thought this might be something I would be interested in. Then I got to the end of the article and it said please submit your resume by June 15, and it was August. The (State Bar Journal) was passed around the office, and I didn't always see it when it first came out."

Wright decided to inquire anyway, at which time he learned from the State Bar that the position had not been filled because the Chief Justice of the North Carolina Supreme Court, Burley Mitchell, was retiring. Incoming Chief Justice Henry Frye would ultimately chair the search committee that selected Wright.

Wright would also serve under Chief Justices I. Beverly Lake Jr., Sarah Parker and Mark Martin.

"Having been at the helm since its inception in 1999," Chief Justice Martin said, "Mel has made the commission an important and integral part of North Carolina's legal community. Few have done more to advance the value and understanding of professionalism and civility in North Carolina.

"On behalf of the entire judicial branch, I express my sincerest thanks to him for his many years of dedication and commitment to this most noble of causes."

At the time Wright began his tenure, he had spent the better part of his career as a litigator and partner with Wright, Parrish, Newton & Rabil. He had served as president of the Forsyth County Bar Association and, perhaps more importantly, had chaired its Ethics and Grievances Committee.

"At that time," Wright said, "there was growing interest nationally in professionalism. Bill King and Jerry Parnell had attended an ABA meeting where a presentation was made concerning professionalism commissions. They brought the idea of a Commission on Professionalism back to North Carolina. Chief Justice Mitchell thought it was a good idea and the North Carolina Chief Justice's Commission on Professionalism was born.

There was no template for Wright to follow, so he traveled to Florida and Georgia to get a firsthand look at their respective professionalism commissions.

"Those people could not have been more helpful," Wright said. "They offered me every document, every file, everything they could do to assist me, and were available by phone call at any time.

From the outset, Wright realized that above all else he was in the people business.

"One of the early programs was at Wake Forest," Wright said. "The auditorium was full of lawyers, and I remember telling a professionalism story involving the late Grady Barnhill, and how he and so many older lawyers mentored me and were supportive when I was a young lawyer."

Since then, Wright has been to every judicial district in North Carolina and every county. At virtually every meeting, he has stressed the importance of enhancing professionalism and celebrating the practice of law in the local District Bars. The Chief Justice's Commission on Professionalism and Lawyer's Mutual have jointly sponsored free District Bar CLE programs that feature the Chief Justice and allow local judges and lawyers to talk about professionalism.

Speakers typically represent a broad cross-section of the Bar, from Superior Court and District Court judges to prosecutors, criminal defense lawyers and civil litigators. Senior lawyers talk about professionalism as it was defined when they began practicing."

Wright's career timeline generally parallels the proliferation of attorney advertising, which came about as a result of Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977). A native of Elizabeth

City and graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, Wright earned his law degree from Wake Forest University School of Law in 1973. Prior to law school he served in the U.S. Army, where he earned the Bronze Star for Meritorious Service and the Air Medal while serving in Vietnam.

“Bates v. Arizona did not come along until 1977,” Wright said, “so I lived through that transition period and saw the older members of the Bar resist advertising. They had not been allowed to advertise, and it was unethical by State Bar standards across the country.

“As a result of that, one of the things that has been the most effective program that our commission has utilized is what we call the Professionalism Support Initiative, or PSI. It is a confidential peer intervention program to try to keep unprofessional conduct from escalating to an ethical violation for the State Bar to ultimately have to deal with.”

An episode Wright dealt with as the local bar president helped prepare him for dealing with the advertising issue. The attorney in question had launched an advertising campaign that had proven too successful for his own good.

“A sole practitioner in our district started advertising,” Wright recalled. “He had two offices, one in Forsyth County and one in another county, and he hired an advertising firm that was terrific. They ran a series of ads for him in the newspaper.

“This was back when you could go into a restaurant for lunch and order the ‘blue plate’ special. His ads were for ‘blue light’ specials; in effect, if you got stopped by a blue light or a policeman you could call him and he would help you.”

The ads brought in so much business that the attorney had problems managing both of his offices.

“At the time the only thing the local bar knew to say to somebody who had a complaint about a lawyer was to call the State Bar and file a grievance,” Wright explained. “But if the conduct in question didn’t violate a rule the State Bar was obligated to find no probable cause. Complaints were being made but the State Bar was basically reviewing it and saying this is not a violation of a rule; it is unprofessional but it is not a rule violation.”

Wright convened a meeting of his executive committee to discuss the situation.

“And one of the people on the committee said, ‘Why don’t I go and talk to him?’ And we said, ‘Wow, you would be willing to do that?’ And the lawyer said ‘yeah; it can’t hurt.’

“He went and talked to him, and it was well received. The lawyer said he knew he hadn’t been returning phone calls and going to court on time and doing the professionalism things that we were stressing, and that he would do better. And he did do better.”

Applying that lesson to his work with the professionalism commission, Wright has utilized the Professionalism Support Initiative in a similar manner.

“When someone is acting unprofessionally,” Wright said, “whether it is a lawyer or a judge, then we will call and invite the lawyer to go to lunch and talk about it. We have no power to make anybody meet with us and we have no authority to discipline anybody, but the idea is to go as members of the profession to basically say ‘we’ve had this complaint.’

“The complaints are not anonymous; you have to step up and say ‘I am complaining about this,’ because the first thing the person is going to ask me is who complained and what did they say?”

That, Wright added, is when things can get a little sticky.

“If it’s a judge who is acting improperly, the lawyer is going to say that he or she cannot complain because he would not be able to go back into that judge’s courtroom. That is when I would usually suggest that we use the Chief Judge or the Senior Resident Superior Court Judge, if they are aware of the problem.

“That way everybody is aware. It lets them register the complaint, and we go from there. I think those interventions are one of the best things we have done.”

When Wright makes that call and schedules the meeting, his desire is to start with a handshake and end with a handshake, as friends, not as a disciplinarian.

“There have been occasions,” Wright said, “when I have gone to meet with somebody as a result of a complaint, and when I get there the person will say the problem is the person who filed the complaint. So we listen, and sometimes I agree with them, and I will go talk to the person on the other side.

“I remember one of those not too long ago when that kind of situation occurred. At the end of the second intervention, I said I think we need to all get together. So we all got together and talked about it, sort of a mediation process if you will. The two lawyers involved had been friends before this thing blew up, and before we left, they were hugging and crying.

“That was a good day.”

Whether his successor follows the roadmap that Wright is leaving behind or chooses to take the program in an entirely different direction, it is imperative that he or she establish in their mind what are the most important core values of professionalism and to focus on those, Wright concluded.

Wright’s final thought was that if we would treat everyone we meet with respect and demonstrate that every client’s case is one of the most important in the office, our profession will be fine. NCL

NCPA Award Like ‘An Oscar’ For Amanda Martin

By Russell Rawlings

The North Carolina Press Association recently honored Amanda Martin as the latest recipient of the William Lassiter First Amendment Award. The award is presented annually at the NCPA Winter Institute to a citizen who has demonstrated exemplary commitment to open government and First Amendment rights.

Martin could not be a more fitting recipient. Even back in high school, when she was drafting mock legislation on a reporter’s privilege, Martin has always been passionate about First Amendment causes.

“I got interested in those issues then,” Martin said, “and when I studied journalism at the University of Florida, I took a media law class and loved it. It has been an interest and passion of mine for decades.”

Martin, who was born in Raleigh, grew up in Florida because that’s where her father’s position with Monsanto had taken her family. She came back to the state to attend the University of North Carolina School of Law and, save for a brief stint in Atlanta, has called North Carolina home ever since.

“I had worked with John Bussian for about a year in Durham,” Martin recalled, “when an opening came up with Everett Gaskins. Bob and Heather Gourley were law school classmates of mine, and Bob was in the firm.

“I got a call from Hugh Stevens, who was doing the work for the press association that I now do, and he asked if I was interested in coming to work with him. That was 22 years ago.”

Martin joined the firm in 1995 and took on the title of associate general counsel. She became general counsel in 2002 when Stevens retired from his full-time duties with the press association and became counsel emeritus. He received the Lassiter Award in 2003.

“Hugh has been the best mentor any lawyer could have,” Martin said. “He simultaneously pushed me to do what I could do but stayed there as safety net when I needed it. I know I said something about him that evening when I received the award, but I am not crystal clear what I said.

“Essentially, I would not be sitting where I am today if not for the leadership and caretaking that Hugh Stevens has given me throughout my career.”

A past chair of the NCBA Constitutional Rights & Responsibilities Section, Martin continues to embrace the opportunities afforded her by working with the press association.

“It has been an amazing opportunity,” Martin said. “Because we represent the press association, we do two things. As corporate counsel, I go to their board meetings, but the bigger piece of this job is answering calls from reporters and doing training for reporters.

Carolyn Martin beams as she helps present the award to her daughter, Amanda Martin.

“For instance, on the Thursday afternoon of the winter institute, I facilitated a panel about police wearing body cameras. I have been across the state doing training in newsrooms, and I just love all of that. I have taught off and on at UNC and Campbell, teaching media law to undergraduates and law students. It is an extended version of the teaching that I do for reporters, and a delightful part of what I do.”

Martin was overwhelmed by her selection for the award.

“It was an amazing feeling,” Martin said, “made doubly so by having my mom, Carolyn Martin, there with me to help present the award. I told friends the next day that I felt like I had won an Oscar.

“There is no group whose confirmation could mean more to me than the North Carolina Press Association. It truly has been a joy to represent them for 22 years. Never in a million years did it occur to me that I would be receiving this award.

“I could not have been more surprised.” vcl

Chief Judge Linda McGee has served on the N.C. Court of Appeals since 1995, and as chief judge since August 2014.

With Liberty Bell Honor, Linda McGee Joins Ranks Of Her Mentors

By Russell Rawlings

As fitting as it is that Chief Judge Linda McGee receives the Liberty Bell Award in this the 50th year of the N.C. Court of Appeals, her connections to one of the North Carolina Bar Association’s highest honors and the event at which it is presented run much deeper than that.

The award is presented annually on Law Day by the Young Lawyers Division to an individual “who has strengthened the American system of freedom under law.” Student winners of the various Law Week competitions are also being recognized, as McGee well knows because of her frequent involvement in the event.

McGee has long been a champion of civic education. She is a founder and former co-chair of the Lawyers in the Schools program and previous recipient of the Sweet 16 Award which recognizes legal professionals and educators for their contributions to the NCBA’s Law-Related Education initiative.

Furthermore, she now joins two of her mentors from her days in private practice in Boone as Liberty Bell recipients.

“That is particularly important to me,” McGee said, “that two of my admired lawyers and mentors from Boone have also received this award, and I had the honor of sending in letters of recommendation for both of them.

“Wade Brown and Stacy Eggers Jr. have both received this award, so it is truly an honor to follow in their footsteps. Wade Brown was the kind of person in Boone, which was a relatively small place, who took everybody under his wings and introduced them to the bar, and was always there to help answer questions.

“And Stacy Eggers and his entire family have always been supportive of the bar. His daughter, Rebecca Eggers-Gryder, is a judge now, and the entire family has been stalwarts of the local bar.”

Beloved In the Community

A native of Marion, McGee is a graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and the UNC School of Law. She served as executive director of the N.C. Academy of Trial Lawyers (now Advocates for Justice) from 1973-78, after which she practiced for 17 years in Boone with di Santi, Watson and McGee.

“On the 50th anniversary celebration of the North Carolina Court of Appeals, there is no one more deserving to receive the Liberty Bell Award given by the Young Lawyers Division of the North Carolina Bar Association this year,” wrote longtime law partner Tony di Santi in support of her nomination by the former chief judges of the Court of Appeals.

“Chief Judge Linda Mace McGee is a person who exemplifies one who has strengthened the American system of freedom under law and exemplifies the best of our profession, our community and our society.”

McGee, he added, is still considered an honorary emeritus member of the firm.

“As a small-town general practitioner, she exemplified the best of what it is to be a lawyer,” di Santi said. “She treated all of our clients with professionalism, integrity, care, comforting, counseling and service ... no matter the issue or the status of the individual who sought her counseling and advice.

“She was, and remains, a beloved individual in our community and our firm 22 years after her appointment by Gov. Hunt.”

McGee was appointed to the N.C. Court of Appeals in 1995 and elected to eight-year terms in 1996, 2004 and 2012. McGee has served as chief judge since August 2014.

“It is a special honor being recognized on Law Day,” McGee said. “I have had the pleasure of working with the YLD for their Law Day and moot court competition, getting to meet the young people and their families, and talking to them about the rule of law.

“Participating in that event has always been a particular pleasure for me. Working with young people and seeing the pride their families have has been a special opportunity. It is a joy to share a little bit of the flame you’ve had all along—the reason you go to law school—and doing a little bit to try to foster that flame in young people.”

Spotlight On the COA

As chief judge and chair of the Celebrate N.C. Courts initiative, McGee is keenly aware of ongoing anniversary events commemorating the Court of Appeals, and views this honor in part as recognition for the entire court.

“I think it not only recognizes some of the opportunities I have had,” McGee said, “but also clearly recognizes the good work of the North Carolina Court of Appeals and the 77 other judges who have served on the court during the last 50 years.

“It helps point out the fact that the role of our court is honored by the lawyers of the NCBA and its Young Lawyers Division, and by the bar in general.”

McGee previously served on the NCBA Board of Governors and received the Pro Bono Attorney of the Year Award in 1992. She has also been active in many other bar groups, including the N.C. Association of Women Attorneys, where she is a charter member and past recipient of its Gwyneth B. Davis Service Award and Outstanding Judge of the Year Award.

She has served on the boards of the N.C. Board of Law Examiners, Legal Services of North Carolina and IOLTA, and was an initial member of the Chief Justice’s Equal Access to Justice Commission, where she served through 2016.

Previous winners of the Liberty Bell Award are Judge Beth Keever, Judge Sammie Chess Jr., Maj. Gen. (retired) James B. Mallory III, Patricia Timmons-Goodson, Earl Britt, Burley Mitchell, Harry C. Martin, Janice McKenzie Cole, Stacy C. Eggers Jr., E. Maurice Braswell, Herbert L. Improving Legal Writing Through Better Typography

By Judge Richard Dietz, Drew Erteschik, Clark Tew and J.M. Durnovich

Introduction

We know what you're thinking: Why should I care about fonts? The authors of this article—an appellate judge and a few litigators—would like to answer this question in two parts.

The first part discusses the current font norms for North Carolina lawyers, and why the fonts favored by those norms are not optimal for legal writing.

The second part briefly describes how fonts within the Century family increase readability and retention—features that can give lawyers a competitive edge.

The Current Font Status Quo

This is Times New Roman, the font that most North Carolina lawyers use for their legal writing. Times New Roman was developed in the 1920s by a British newspaper, The Times of London. It was designed for a specific purpose: to allow speed-skimming the newspaper's articles.¹

The letters in Times New Roman are narrow, closely spaced, and designed to force readers' eyes across the page as quickly as possible. Another benefit of this closely spaced font was that it left ample space for advertisements.² It was not, however, designed for intensive reading—for example, reviewing lengthy briefs. The emphasis was on speed, not retention.

Today, for whatever reason, Times New Roman has become the standard, including for North Carolina lawyers. As one commentator has remarked, Times New Roman is “the font of least resistance.”³ It “is not a font choice so much as the absence of a font choice.”⁴ It is the beige of fonts.

This is Courier New, another font that many North Carolina lawyers use. Courier was developed by IBM in the 1950s, but it became the standard typewriter font in the 1960s.⁵

Courier's original purpose had even less to do with reading retention than Times New Roman. Instead, its purpose was to make it easier to edit documents typed on typewriters. With Courier font, the letters are all the same size—in typography terms, “non-proportional.” With an “i” taking up the same space as a “w,” for example, it allowed a typewriter to use a white-out key that was the same size for every letter.⁶

In the 1950s, this function may have seemed modern and streamlined. Even after typewriters began to die out in the 1980s and 1990s, however, Courier stuck around. Perhaps it was because writers found it familiar. Eventually, it became the basic font for computer processing.⁷ From there, like Times New Roman, it gained popularity because of its ubiquity, not its attributes.

Recently, governments and private companies have started to reject Courier as an old, outdated, and “clunky” font.⁸ Like all non-proportional fonts, Courier is not an efficient use of each page because it takes up more space than necessary. It is also more difficult to read than newer, better-designed fonts.⁹ This is, in part, because “[w]hen every character is the same width, the eye loses valuable clues that help it distinguish one letter from another.”¹⁰

Ultimately, though, neither Times New Roman nor Courier was designed for legal writing. For their legal writing needs, lawyers can do much better.

Fonts in the Century Family = Better Readability and Retention

For good reason, fonts within the Century family have emerged as the favorite of many legal writers. Among its attractive features, Century Schoolbook is “highly readable, yet commands an air of authority with letters that take up more space than Times New Roman.”¹¹ It has even been called the “crème-de-la-crème of legal fonts.”¹²

The book “Typography for Lawyers,” for example, ranks Century Schoolbook on a short “A list” of fonts. Times New Roman and Courier, by contrast, made the “C list” of “questionable” fonts for lawyers.

While you may not immediately recognize the name Century Schoolbook, you’ve been reading legal opinions in this font since your first year of law school. The U.S. Supreme Court publishes its opinions in Century

Schoolbook. Likewise, Rule 33(1)(B) of the Supreme Court’s Rules states that the text of all major documents, including briefs, “shall be typeset in a Century family (e.g., Century Expanded, New Century Schoolbook, or Century Schoolbook) 12-point type.”

In addition, the U.S. Courts of Appeals for the 5th, 7th, and Federal Circuits have long used and endorsed Century-family fonts. The 7th Circuit has offered this explanation for its choice:

The briefs, opinions of the district courts, essential parts of the appendices, and other required reading add up to about 1,000 pages per argument session. Reading that much is a chore; remembering it is even harder. You can improve your chances by making your briefs typographically superior. It won’t make your arguments better, but it will ensure that judges grasp and retain your points with less struggle. That’s a valuable advantage, which you should seize.¹³

For that same reason, fonts within the Century family—especially Century Schoolbook—are used in situations where readability and retention matter most. As one non-exclusive example, pharmaceutical researchers recommend Century Schoolbook for prescription medicine labels—a place where suboptimal font choice could have serious consequences.¹⁴

Switching to fonts in the Century family may also produce cost savings. As NPR reported, when a major university recently switched its email system’s default font from Arial to Century, it saved thousands of dollars annually in printing costs.¹⁵

In recent years, the North Carolina Supreme Court and the North Carolina Court of Appeals stopped publishing their opinions in Courier New, and instead, began publishing their opinions in Century Schoolbook. More recently, on December 20, 2016, the North Carolina Supreme Court amended the North Carolina Rules of Appellate Procedure to expressly endorse Century Schoolbook as one of the preferred fonts for appellate briefs.¹⁶

The Supreme Court’s recent amendment embraces the uncontroversial idea that lawyers should use a font that serves two purposes: readability and retention. After all, briefs are not meant to be quickly skimmed over a morning cup of tea along with newspaper advertisements (The London Times’ Times New Roman). Nor are they meant to meet the mechanical needs of a typewriter's white-out function (Courier New).

As the 7th Circuit explained, "The Times of London uses Times New Roman to serve an audience looking for a quick read. Lawyers don't want their audience to read fast and throw the document away; they want to maximize retention."¹⁷ North Carolina's appellate courts, by switching to Century Schoolbook for their opinions and endorsing it for appellate briefs, apparently agree.

In view of the Supreme Court's use of Century Schoolbook and its endorsement of that font in the appellate rules, perhaps more North Carolina lawyers will consider using a font in the Century family for their legal writing needs. The authors are hopeful that this article may be useful in inviting a dialogue on the topic.

Conclusion

While fonts may not be at the top of everyone's list of important items to tackle, we hope that this article was thought-provoking.

We welcome your comments on the information in this article. We would enjoy picking up this discussion with you by phone or by email—particularly if your email is written in Century Schoolbook. NCL

Enough With the Robot Lawyers Already

By Erik Mazzone

In the morning before I leave for work, I ask my Google App how long it is going to take me to drive to the office and what the weather will be.

In the evening when I return home, I ask Alexa (the virtual assistant that powers the Amazon Echo speaker) to continue reading aloud my current Kindle book so I can keep up the pace on my goal to read 52 books this year. Spoiler alert: As of the time of this writing, we're 12 weeks into 2017 and I've read four books. Sad trombone.

While I was hate-watching March Madness (the unofficial mascot of Boston College sports is schadenfreude), I ask Siri, "Hey Siri, how many times has Grayson Allen tripped people?"

Artificial intelligence. Machine learning. Robots.

I know two things about this stuff.

One: There is no more overheated topic in legal technology in 2017 that gets the legal geek squad sputtering in breathless anticipation of imminent transformative change than the trifecta of AI, machine learning and robots.

Two: They're a bit early, they're overly amped up, and they're not wrong.

Clucking our collective tongues at the chicken little prognosticators of a legal robot rebellion (will there be more than three laws? There had better be, or those robot lawyers are going to be boooooored...) is satisfyingly reassuring of the notion that tomorrow in law practice is probably going to be a lot like today. But outright dismissal of the arrival of AI in legal tech is a mistake.

Like Siri and Alexa inching their way into our lives (Amazon Echo was the best-selling product across all of Amazon this past holiday season), AI is also inching its way into legal tech. It's not quite ready to pop on a tie and grab a briefcase and freak everybody out in your District Court, but it's definitely having a moment.

It's not clear what that moment is, exactly, but it's having one.

A few weeks ago, The New York Times ran a clickbait article headlined, "Tech Roundup: Will Robots Replace Lawyers?" The day before, that same newspaper ran a second article titled, "Sorry, a Robot is Not About to Replace Your Lawyer." Yes, it's weird that the seemingly responsive article was published first. Cognitive dissonance, thy name is print journalism.

The whiplash between those two articles pretty well captures the feeling that something is happening with AI and legal tech, we're just not entirely sure what yet.

I think the smart money for lawyers here is to start paying attention to AI and to think of it as an opportunity rather than a threat. (Going deep into the old SWOT analysis grab bag for that reference.) Think of it as an improving set of tools to help erstwhile human lawyers do their jobs more efficiently.

Take a look at legal tech startups like ROSS Intelligence, a legal research service which uses AI to make a faster more intuitive research tool for lawyers. If you like to spend time on Twitter, follow ROSS founder, Andrew Arruda (@AndrewArruda) or Fastcase CEO Ed Walters (@EJWalters), two really smart guys who produce a constant stream of thought-provoking stuff on where this technology is headed.

You'll find that companies like ROSS Intelligence are not just some Silicon Valley VC-funded fever dream—with a little poking around you'll notice they are racking up a client roster of law firms very quickly, including some you know right here in North Carolina. We're at the start of this curve in legal tech, but the starter's pistol has gone off.

This is the part of the continuum between denial and alarm, and that's a good place to be. Noting with some dread that there is not a single science fiction movie or book that ends with the robots happily serving humans forever (with the possible exception of the Jetsons, but who really knows what that Rosie the Robot Maid was thinking...), for now we are in a place where these AI tools can make lawyers lives and practices better.

Take advantage of the opportunity. If you're not sure how, just ask Alexa. NCL

Can Young Lawyers Learn Something From Older Lawyers About Managing Their Professional Reputations Online (and Vice Versa)?

By Matthew A. “Matt” Cordell, YLD Chair

When I have the opportunity to give advice to law students and young lawyers, one of the things I try to impress upon them is the importance of their reputations, including their “online reputations.”

Usually the comment is quickly met with a knowing nod. Everyone seems to know that their reputation is important.

However, having witnessed many lawyers of all ages impair their professional reputations online, I have begun to realize that many of us fail to recognize some aspects of maintaining our online reputations, and I have begun to be much more specific in my advice to younger lawyers.

Older lawyers, I have observed, often seem to understand some of the things that younger lawyers may miss, but older lawyers can have their own blind spots in this area. In this short piece, I would like to describe a few observations about lawyers’ online reputations and suggest that young lawyers and older lawyers can learn much from one another regarding this topic. (There are, of course, plenty of exceptions to my generational generalizations.)

For many of us, especially those of us who attended law school in North Carolina, our professional reputations began to develop during law school. I often remind law students that their law school classmates form their initial professional network. Their classmates are likely to become their partners, opposing counsel, judges and clients.

I suggest that they will want to be remembered as the friendly, reliable law student who was always prepared and who shared notes freely with deserving classmates; they will not want to be remembered as the John “Bluto” Blutarsky of their law school class (i.e., John Belushi’s character in the cult classic “Animal House”) or the sharp-elbowed “gunner.”

Some law students and young lawyers seem to be unaware that their social media posts can affect their professional reputations. When the weekend’s party photos are just a click away, the line between one’s professional reputation and one’s personal life can become blurred, or disappear entirely.

Too many young lawyers allow themselves to be photographed or videotaped in unflattering circumstances without realizing that it may affect how others perceive them in a professional context (whether consciously or unconsciously). Older lawyers, by contrast, tend to be more perspicacious in their social media activity. Perhaps age brings wisdom in these matters.

I have also observed that young lawyers seem more attuned to their online presence when it comes to ratings and reviews. Young lawyers tend to be conscious of what is being said of them on online rating and review websites, and tend to be more proactive in engaging with these sites.

For example, young lawyers tend to be more likely to “claim” their Avvo profiles and ensure that the information presented there is accurate, because Avvo profiles tend to get remarkable priority in search engine results. Older lawyers seem more likely to dismiss sites like Avvo as meaningless (perhaps because Avvo’s ratings system is open to criticism).

Older lawyers also seem less likely to recognize how a clunky website or free email account (e.g., that old AOL account) can cause a client or prospective client to lose confidence in them.

The topic of online reputation management seems to be an area that is ripe for intergenerational learning. Older lawyers can share the wisdom that comes from experience and young lawyers can share their technological savvy. I hope this article will spark conversations here and there between older lawyers and their younger counterparts. We all have more to learn from one another, both online and offline. ncz

N.C. LAP and BarCARES: Separate Programs, Similar Mission

By Zeb Barnhardt and Robynn Moraites

CONFIDENTIALITY:	Confidential	Confidential
ELIGIBILITY:	In-state lawyers and judges	Members of NCBA, participating local bars

Numerous studies have documented the pressures faced by attorneys and the need many attorneys have for personal support and counseling. While previous studies seemed to highlight issues that surfaced as individuals practiced for several years, a more recent study by the American Bar Association noted that personal difficulties appear to be impacting even the most recent practitioners.

Both the North Carolina Bar Association and the North Carolina State Bar recognized the importance of helping fellow attorneys many years ago, establishing complementary programs to provide assistance.

Important Distinction

The N.C. Lawyer Assistance Program (N.C. LAP), a program of the N.C. State Bar, and the BarCARES program sponsored by the N.C. Bar Association (NCBA). There are numerous similarities between the programs. Both programs assist lawyers who need counseling or treatment for the full panoply of addictions and mental health issues. Both are confidential programs. Both are also free of charge. But they operate differently—each working as a superb complement to the other.

BarCARES

BarCARES provides referral for counseling services to lawyers who are either members of the NCBA or of local bar associations that have subscribed to the program. The program also serves district court judges, paralegals and members of the Eastern Bankruptcy Institute. Members in qualifying organizations are entitled to three free visits a year with a counselor in the BarCARES referral network.

In many districts a unique feature of BarCARES is that any of the three free annual visits may be used by a family member and are not limited to only the lawyer. Following the free visits offered within BarCARES, an attorney can generally continue work with the same counselor, if need be, using insurance benefits or other resources.

All BarCARES contacts are made through HRC Behavioral Health & Psychiatry, P.A., the organization that administers and arranges counseling provider services for the BarCARES program. BarCARES has a network of counselors and therapists across the state who specialize in treating a wide variety of mental health and addiction conditions, as well as working with normal stress and personal dilemmas that could interfere with lawyer performance and/or quality of life.

N.C. LAP

N.C. LAP provides services to all lawyers, judges (both federal and state) and law students in the state. While N.C. LAP has three full-time, licensed counselors on staff and provides some short-term or targeted direct counseling services, most of their work involves initial assessment, referral, longer-term support and case management.

First N.C. LAP provides an initial consult to determine what issues most need attention and assistance. N.C. LAP then refers lawyers to counseling services that are likely the best fit or makes treatment recommendations based on the unique needs of the lawyer. N.C. LAP may pull from its network of 200+ lawyer and judge volunteers across the state who have overcome similar issues and connect the lawyer with a peer support person or a lawyer discussion group.

For lawyers who are recovering from drug or alcohol problems, N.C. LAP supports them when they return from treatment for the first few years with mentor pairing, support groups and case management.

N.C. LAP also runs peer support and discussion groups across the state. These groups are not limited to lawyers recovering from alcohol or drug problems, and lawyers dealing with stress, depression and other issues also benefit.

Many lawyers who engage with N.C. LAP long-term eventually become volunteers. N.C. LAP provides on-going training for its volunteers and through its support groups and annual conferences, N.C. LAP volunteers and clients become a tight-knit community across the state.

Cooperation

BarCARES and N.C. LAP work cooperatively and cross-refer. For example, if a lawyer contacts N.C. LAP and is located in a BarCARES district, in the event long-term counseling is recommended (and it almost always is), N.C. LAP will match the lawyer with the most suitable counselor in the BarCARES network, so that the first three visits each year are free.

N.C. LAP counselors know which counselors in the BarCARES network specialize in career counseling, divorce, depression and the like; and N.C. LAP can pair client and therapist personalities and approaches—sometimes we need a comforting ear, sometimes we need a kick in the rear. Getting that match right is important.

Sometimes a lawyer has a unique issue that requires a specialized counselor. When N.C. LAP has requested that lawyers be paired with such specialists, BarCARES has agreed to bring those N.C. LAP-recommended counselors “in network” for the benefit of the lawyer. This has proved especially helpful in smaller, more rural districts.

Similarly, if a lawyer has been seeing a counselor in the BarCARES network, and the counselor thinks the lawyer would benefit from additional support like speaking to peers who have overcome similar issues or that the lawyer needs more comprehensive, engaged support than traditional therapy can provide, the BarCARES counselor will recommend that the lawyer contact N.C. LAP.

Lawyers who are cross-referred in this way sign releases allowing the BarCARES and N.C. LAP counselors to confer about what would be most helpful to the lawyer along the way. Lawyers who take advantage of these programs fare incredibly well and receive a network of support enjoyed by few.

Both programs are confidential and work together for the good of North Carolina’s legal community, a commitment of help and cooperation made by their respective organizations, counselors and volunteers. Each program can be contacted independently but the key is making contact with either BarCARES or N.C. LAP if you need help. Few states have such comprehensive resources available to their lawyers and judges. We should count ourselves lucky indeed. NCL

Durham Receives Bankruptcy Award

At Durham of Rayburn Cooper & Durham in Charlotte received the NCBA Bankruptcy Section's Lifetime Achievement Award at the 39th Annual Bankruptcy Institute in New Bern.

The award recognizes a bankruptcy practitioner who, for not less than 25 years, has contributed to the betterment of the North Carolina Bar Association Bankruptcy Section and the profession, and who has set an aspiring example for those who follow.

Durham served as chair of the Bankruptcy Section in 1990-91. He has been a Certified Specialist in Business and Consumer Bankruptcy Law since 1987, the first year the N.C. State Bar certified specialists in those fields.

He has practiced bankruptcy law for more than 40 years, appearing in the bankruptcy courts of North Carolina, South Carolina and Delaware. He has been a frequent speaker at seminars sponsored by the Bankruptcy Section, the Mecklenburg County Bar and the National Association of Bankruptcy Trustees.

A graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and the UNC School of Law, Durham now serves of counsel with the Rayburn Cooper & Durham. He joined the firm in 1994 when it was known as Rayburn, Moon & Smith.

“To be fair,” Durham said, “I don’t deserve this award, but I am happy to get it and I don’t want to give it back. I ascribe it to longevity and smarter lawyers whom I have worked with all these years.

“You can win awards and not be smart if you surround yourself with smart people.”

In that vein, Durham mentioned Rick Mitchell, Rob Cox, Tom Moon, Hunter Wyche, Craig Whitley, and Rick Rayburn, Paul Baynard, Shelley Abel and Jack Miller from his firm, as well as Keith Johnson and Warren Tadlock.

Durham especially recognized the contributions of Julia Robinson, who has been his assistant for almost 36 years.

“If I have ever accomplished anything, it’s because of these people,” Durham continued, “and the judges. I have appeared before good judges who understand the individual aspect of business bankruptcies, which is what I do. They follow the law, but they understand the human element too.” NCL

Administrative Law Honors Morrison

Judge Fred Morrison Jr., senior administrative law judge in the N.C. Office of Administrative Hearings, is the initial recipient of an award created by the Administrative Law Section of the North Carolina Bar Association.

Morrison received the first Administrative Law Award for Excellence on Friday, March 31, at the section’s annual meeting and CLE at the N.C. Bar Center.

Judge Julian Mann, director and chief administrative law judge in the N.C. Office of Administrative Hearings, presented the award.

“I very much appreciate this award,” Morrison said. “It means a great deal to me because I have been involved with the Administrative Law Committee followed by the Section since 1987.”

The Administrative Law Award for Excellence was established to “honor an outstanding Administrative Law Section attorney as an exemplar of the excellence, dedication and passion for administrative and/or regulatory law” to an active, practicing member of the section.

Morrison has practiced law for more than 50 years and has served in the Office of Administrative Hearings for more than three decades. He is also a former solicitor of the Thomasville Records Court, former legal counsel to Governors Bob Scott and James Holshouser, and was the first executive director of the North Carolina Inmate Grievance Commission.

He chaired the Administrative Law Section in 2003-04.

Prior to its elevation to section status in 1989, Morrison worked to promote attendance at the committee’s CLE on administrative litigation, held in October 1987 at the Raleigh Civic Center. Since then he has attended every CLE offered by the Administrative Law Section.

“This involvement with the section, its members, and bar association personnel has been an invaluable asset to me in performing my duties as an administrative law judge,” Morrison said. “Getting to know and associate with all involved in this area of the law has helped make me a better person, a more informed attorney, and a well-educated judge.

“I am grateful to everybody with whom I have crossed paths at the North Carolina Bar Association.”

Morrison grew up in eastern Tennessee. He is a graduate of Maryville College and Wake Forest University School of Law. NCL

Sawchak Earns Antitrust Recognition

The Antitrust & Complex Business Disputes Law Section presented its Distinguished Service Award to Matt Sawchak at the section's annual meeting and CLE on Feb. 17 at the N.C. Bar Center.

The award was presented by his former law partner, Paul Sun of Ellis & Winters in Raleigh. At the time he accepted the award, Sawchak had recently been named Solicitor General of North Carolina by Attorney General Josh Stein.

Sawchak served as chair of the Antitrust & Complex Business Disputes Law Section in 2000-01 and is also a past chair of the Appellate Rules Committee. He serves as a senior editor of the ABA Antitrust Section's Antitrust Law Journal.

He is also a member of the American Academy of Appellate Lawyers, the North Carolina Business Court's Rules Advisory Committee and Civil Rules Committee of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina.

"Our Bar Association, and the Antitrust and Complex Disputes Section, have played a huge role in my development as a lawyer," Sawchak said. "I developed a lot of my speaking and writing skills through programs for this section.

"I encourage everyone who wants to advance as a lawyer to go 'all in' with the NCBA."

Sawchak is a graduate of Harvard and the Duke University School of Law. He clerked for Justice Clarence Thomas when Thomas was serving on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, and also clerked in the Office of the Solicitor General of the United States.

The Distinguished Service Award was established to recognize members of the North Carolina Bar Association Antitrust & Complex Business Disputes Law Section (or others under extraordinary situations) who: (1) have demonstrated the highest ethical standards; (2) have shown a high level of professional competence; and (3) have made significant contributions (a) to the Section, (b) to scholarship in the fields of antitrust or complex business disputes law, and/or (c) to advocacy on behalf of clients, consumers, or the public in the fields of antitrust or complex business disputes law. Section Recognizes Judge Whitney

The Government & Public Sector Section presented the Grainger Barrett Award for Excellence to Chief Judge Frank Whitney of the U.S. District Court for the Western District of North Carolina during the section's recent annual meeting at the N.C. Bar Center.

"It is indeed an honor to receive the award," stated Whitney, who served as chair of the section in 2014-15 and currently serves as a vice president on the NCBA Board of Governors. "Public sector attorneys serve their communities well while receiving little or no recognition for their work.

"This award, named for a distinguished lifelong public servant, really belongs to all those unsung public sector attorneys. I am humbled that the Section would select me for the award."

John Schifano, section chair, presented the award.

"In my humble opinion and that of the nominating committee," Schifano said, "(Judge Whitney) is an excellent exemplar of the quiet excellence of North Carolina's government and public sector attorneys."

Whitney is a native of Charlotte and 1982 graduate of Wake Forest University, where he was a member of the ROTC program and Phi Beta Kappa Society. He earned a joint law degree and MBA from the University of North Carolina School of Law and UNC-Chapel Hill, respectively, in 1987.

After a year in private practice in Washington, D.C., Whitney clerked for Judge David B. Sentelle of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. He then returned to private practice before serving as an assistant U.S. Attorney for the Western District of North Carolina from 1990-2001.

Whitney returned to private practice for one year in Charlotte before serving as the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of North Carolina from 2002-06. He has served on the Western District bench since 2006 and as chief judge since 2013.

Whitney's distinguished military career includes service in the U.S. Army Reserve since 1982 and deployment to Afghanistan and Iraq. He is believed to be the first federal judge to serve as a military judge presiding over courts-martial in a combat theater, and presided over the last court-martial in Iraq before completion of the U.S. troop withdrawal there. Johnson CLE Volunteer of the Year

Linda Funke Johnson received the CLE Volunteer of the Year Award at the winter meeting of the NCBA Board of Governors. Roberta King Latham, who chairs the CLE Committee, presented the award.

“What sets apart our CLE from other providers,” Latham said, “is the quality of offerings—the quality programming and the quality of publications—which is only possible through the dedication, commitment and passion of our volunteers.”

“(Linda) has shown amazing passion, commitment and dedication to not only the Foundation, but also our Association as a whole. This is really more of a life-time achievement award than an award for one’s work during one year.”

Johnson is a solo practitioner with Senter, Stephenson, Johnson, P.A. of Fuquay-Varina. Originally from Connecticut, she is a graduate of Fairfield University and Quinnipiac University School of Law. Johnson is licensed to practice in Connecticut, Hawaii and North Carolina.

“To say that Linda Johnson has been active in the Bar Association and Foundation is an understatement,” Latham added. “Not only is she a frequent CLE speaker, she is currently serving as a council member of the Estate Planning & Fiduciary Law Section.

“She is a long-time planner, speaker and contributor at the Estate Planning & Fiduciary Law Section’s Annual Meeting and has been instrumental in obtaining sponsors to fund the program.”

Johnson’s dedication to her section’s CLE programming and continuing legal education in general is an extension of her core belief and practice to give back.

“That is how my personality is,” Johnson said. “My involvement with CLE helps me give back, but it also keeps me sharp professionally. The Bar Association is very open to anyone who wants to jump in and help, and not only that, you also get to meet a ton of great people.

“Receiving this award, especially as a solo practitioner in a small town, is a huge deal for me.”

Previous honors received by Johnson include the Mollie Pitcher Award for Outstanding Service to the Field Artillery Community, which she received from the U.S. Army, Schofield Barracks, in 1991 when her husband was stationed in Hawaii. NCL

NCBA Past-President E. James “Jim” Moore 1927-2017

E. James “Jim” Moore of North Wilkesboro died Feb. 1 at the age of 90. He served as president of the North Carolina Bar Association in 1987-88.

A native of Winston-Salem, he grew up in North Wilkesboro and received his undergraduate (1949) and law degrees (1951) from Wake Forest University. Moore served in the United States Army in both World War II and the Korean War, achieving the rank of first lieutenant.

Moore began his legal career in Charlotte in 1952 as an associate with Lassiter, Moore & Van Allen. He returned to North Wilkesboro in 1953 to open a solo practice. Moore was a partner in Porter & Moore from 1955-60, after which he resumed and maintained a solo practice for the remainder of his career.

He served on the NCBA Board of Governors from 1981-84 and was also a member of the American Bar Association. Moore served as councilor of the N.C. State Bar from 1971-74 and was a member of the Disciplinary Hearing Commission from 1975-81.

Moore was a civic and community leader in North Wilkesboro and Wilkes County. He served as mayor of North Wilkesboro and as a judge for the Wilkes County Records Court, and was a member and president of the N.C. Association of Municipal Attorneys.

He was also a member of the North Wilkesboro Lions Club, where he served as president, and a board member and vice president of the Wilkes Chamber of Commerce.

“When I think of Jim Moore, two words come to mind—dignity and professionalism,” fellow attorney and NCBA member John Willardson told the Wilkes Journal-Patriot. “Jim was a great role model not only for attorneys, but for all of us. He was a dear friend and will be sorely missed.”

“Jim was recognized statewide as both a great lawyer and leader, as evidenced by his selection as president of the N.C. Bar Association.” .ncz

Chair, Civil Justice Strategies Task Force

Date: February 13, 2015

To: Members CJSTF, Witnesses, Staff and Public Attendees:

From: Luis J. Rodriguez, Chair, CJSTF

As Chair of the CJSTF, I want to express my appreciation for the hard work of everyone involved and thank all of you for your effort.

The challenge for any group, given this very large task and very short amount of time, is that we've had a lot of big, dreaming conversations and engaged quite a few radical ideas; hoping to be bold.

We've heard from some: "don't blow things up ... there are things that are working." We've heard from others that the only way to solve the access problem is to do things completely differently than in the past. These opposing perspectives have been part of the discussion as well as part of the challenge.

As we enter into a great transformation of the legal profession and see positive momentum in the equal access movement, we are also highly cognizant that our efforts are but one step towards the realization of societal justice.

It is the desire of the Civil Justice Strategic Task Force members that the California State Bar Board of Trustees embrace these recommendations. We believe that this report will serve as a road map that will empower the many to do the necessary work for the needy in our legal system

Regards,

Luis Rodriguez
Chair, CJSTF

Civil Justice Strategies Task Force Background

In November 2013, the State Bar Board of Trustees approved the creation and appointment of the Civil Justice Strategies Task Force as a special committee of the board.

The charge of the task force was to analyze the reasons for the existing “justice gap,” to evaluate the role of the legal profession in addressing the crisis, to seek the input of groups who have been working to expand access to justice to understand what efforts have worked and which have not been successful, to study creative solutions being considered in other states and other countries, and to develop an action plan with recommendations for steps that should be taken to fill the justice gap and achieve true access to justice in California.

Development of the action plan included a series of public meetings with presentations by experts to obtain input from key stakeholders, including those who have long struggled to address the justice gap, as well as others who may be able to suggest creative solutions. The task force was chaired by Luis Rodriguez (2013-14 State Bar President) and was comprised of members of the State Bar Board of Trustees, Solo, Small Firm and Large Firm representatives, Public Sector representatives, Modest Means representatives, Bar Associations, Lawyer Referral and Information Services, Public Members, Academics and liaisons from the California Supreme Court and the California Commission on Access to Justice.

Seven all-day public hearings were held by the task force to consider input and make recommendations to the Board of Trustees.

- Hearing I: Examining the Causes - March 26th (10:00 AM - 4:00 PM) (Los Angeles)
- Hearing II: Access to Justice Obstacles and Success - April 30 (10:30 AM - 3:30 PM) (San Francisco)
- Hearing III: Access to Justice Obstacles and Success - May 28 (10:30 AM - 3:30 PM) (Los Angeles)
- Hearing IV: New Solutions - June 18 (10:30 AM - 3:30 PM) (Los Angeles)
- Hearing V: Cost of Legal Education - August 26 (10:30 AM - 3:30 PM) (San Francisco)
- Hearings VI: Prepare Action plan - October 20 (10:30 AM - 3:30 PM) (Los Angeles)
- Hearing VII: Prepare Action plan - November 13 (10:30 AM - 3:30 PM) (Los Angeles)

Chair Luis Rodriguez created three subcommittees of the task force to help guide the work of the full task force and with the hope that the task force could arrive at a consensus about how to improve the access to justice problem and lay the groundwork for dramatic progress in the next few years.

The three subcommittees were: (1) the “Now Group” which was tasked with a review of the current access environment in order to identify what approaches are working now and what may be scalable or can be replicated; (2) the “New Group” which focused on innovations that currently are being considered or implemented in other jurisdictions; and (3) a “Law School Debt Group” that examined the intersection of law school debt and access to justice.

This report includes the following sections: an acknowledgement by Luis Rodriguez; a brief introduction of the problem the task force set out to address; lists of the topics and witnesses included in each hearing; a summary of key recommendations; excerpts from the testimony; and the individual reports from each of the Civil Justice Strategies Task Force’s subcommittees.

Introduction

*The United States has "the heaviest concentration of lawyers on earth...but no resource of talent and training...is more wastefully or unfairly distributed than legal skills. Ninety percent of our lawyers serve ten percent of our people. We are overlawyered and underrepresented."*¹

In recent years, access to legal representation and the courts has become increasingly limited. Despite the existence of a diverse, statewide network of non-profit legal services organizations, millions of low and moderate income Californians are unable to access affordable legal assistance when they need it. For many, the cost of legal representation makes seeking legal assistance impossible. For others still, unfamiliarity with our legal system, and language, geographic, or cultural barriers limit access to justice.

Unfortunately, there has never been adequate funding to provide legal assistance for the millions of Californians who need help. Even before the economic downturn, legal services organizations only had sufficient resources to meet about 20-30 percent of the legal needs of low-income Californians. In recent years, the funding has reached critically low levels. One of the largest sources of state funding, interest on lawyers' trust accounts ("IOLTA"), has dropped from over $22 million in 2007-2008 to under $5 million in 2013-2014. Not only did IOLTA revenue drop over 80% between 2008 and 2014, but other sources of funding including government grants and contracts, foundation funding and private giving, have all been negatively affected by the economic downturn.

Similarly, the primary federal source of funding for legal services, the Legal Services Corporation (LSC), also has faced historic declines. In 2014, LSC provided $365 million nationally for civil legal assistance to low-income people – down from $420 million four years ago. This marks a 30 percent decrease from 2007 to today.² Meanwhile, the number of persons financially eligible for LSC-funded legal aid– those with incomes at or below 125% of the federal poverty guideline (currently $14,588 for an individual and $29,813 for a family of four) has grown over this same period. Since LSC funding directly supports 11 of the largest legal service providers in California, and many others through sub-grants, these declines have had a severe negative impact on the ability to provide legal services to low-income Californians. Reduced funding has forced many legal services organizations to reduce staff and cut needed programs. According to LSC, nearly 50% of its grantees reduced staff and client intake services in 2013.

In California, thousands of individuals who seek help are turned away simply because legal aid providers do not have sufficient resources to assist all who qualify for their services. Millions more moderate-income Californians are ineligible for free legal aid yet they cannot afford to pay for lawyers. This “Justice Gap” means that increasing numbers of individuals often have no choice but to represent themselves. While there are no comprehensive statistics on how many people represent themselves in court, according to an American Bar Association survey, 60% of state judges have reported increases in the number of civil litigants who are appearing without counsel.

Sixty-two percent of the surveyed judges stated that parties were hurt by not having a lawyer.³ While some legal problems are relatively simple and can be resolved appropriately without counsel, others are more complex and require legal advice and guidance. Still other legal matters demand full representation due to their complexity, the interests at stake, or other factors. A lack of adequate legal assistance can have dire consequences, including a loss of income, housing, or educational opportunities; family instability; damage to physical or mental health; or verbal or physical violence or threats of violence.⁴ In addition to risking severe and potentially irreparable harm to individuals and families, the increase in self-represented litigants affects the courts’ ability to handle and dispose of cases which, in turn, often adversely affects the timeliness of the handling of cases in which litigants are represented by counsel.

Over the past two decades, some significant efforts to expand access to justice in California have occurred, including identification of new funding sources for legal aid, expansion of self-help resources, and increased mobilization of pro bono attorneys. As Professor Deborah Rhode observes, despite these efforts, “...the situation has not improved. And at least part of the problem is of the profession's own making. Our nation does not lack for lawyers. Nor does it lack for ideas of how to make legal services more accessible. The challenge remaining is to learn more about what strategies work best, and to make them a public and a professional priority.”⁵

This challenge was at the heart of the formation and work of the Civil Justice Strategies Task Force. Over the course of nine months last year, the Task Force conducted hearings and heard from witnesses on a wide range of topics related to improving access to civil justice in California. While witnesses and Task Force members discussed many obstacles and challenges, they also discussed strategies and approaches for helping to narrow the Justice Gap in California. Based on the hearings, discussions, and related materials, the Task Force developed the recommendations discussed in this report. The Task Force recognizes that there is no single solution that will close the Justice Gap in California. As discussed in this report, however, the Task Force believes that there are a number of concrete steps that the State Bar, courts, lawyers, and other stakeholders can take to help ensure that every Californian can access legal help when they need it.

Civil Justice Strategies Task Force Report and Recommendations

APPENDIX B: Summary of Recommendations

March 2015

CJSTF RECOMMENDATIONS

“Now Group” Draft Recommendations

1. Funding: recommend that the State Bar boost promotion of the Justice Gap Fund in order to increase donations to the fund by lawyers and law firms.
2. Incubators/Modest Means: recommend that the State Bar track the trajectory of incubator participants; and recommend that the State Bar help create a framework (e.g., mentors, toolkits, forms, etc.) to assist modest means practitioners.
3. Unbundling: recommend that the State Bar do more to promote and incentivize limited scope representation.
4. Improved Coordination: recommend greater coordination between the State Bar and Judicial Council, including in efforts to link the various stakeholders involved in providing affordable legal services.
5. Civil Gideon: recommend that the State Bar support efforts to secure universal representation starting with the following four areas: Land Lord / Tenant, Family, Domestic Violence, Immigration; and recommend that State Bar help to market what’s working in the pilot projects, publicly support them, and help to scale them.

“New Group” Draft Recommendations

1. Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT): The State Bar should study the design of a pilot program, in one subject matter area, and, with input from the Supreme Court, address how the governance, oversight, and “licensing” would be handled. It is important to allow the time for the Court to have input at the early stages, rather than after design is complete.
2. Alternative Business Structures (ABS): The State Bar should monitor the ABS concept in other jurisdictions, with particular attention to the impact on pro bono and public impact litigation in jurisdictions that adopt these practices. Until this information is available to consider and understand, the Bar should not proceed with new rules or programs.
3. Re-engineering: recommendation for a pilot project, perhaps in landlord-tenant, using a joint working group of the bar, the courts, and perhaps relevant social scientists and tech people, to explore how the system could be redesigned to streamline the process, make it easier to use, and provide protection for the parties’ rights.
4. Navigators: A program should be designed to be piloted in one or more self-help centers, to provide volunteer assistance to self-represented litigants in attending hearings. Permission should be requested to have the navigator sit at counsel table with the litigant, but not to address the court. Based on experience in other jurisdictions, the focus should be on this as a volunteer program, not as a for-profit method of assistance.

Law School Debt Draft Recommendations

1. Info Clearinghouse: The Bar should serve as a clearinghouse of information on student debt management and repayment programs and key student loan debt and repayment information.
2. California Young Lawyers Association: Working through CYLA, the Bar should develop mechanisms and new approaches to assist young lawyers in better understanding and proactively addressing the implications of their student debt obligations.
3. Creating an Enhanced Understanding of Student Debt Data, Concerns and Implications: The Bar should continue to put a spotlight on the issue of law school debt, promote an enhanced understanding of the link between student debt and broader community access to justice and public safety concerns, and assist others working to study, quantify and better define the implications of student loan indebtedness.
4. Assess Relationship to Misconduct: The Bar should work through its discipline arm to assess whether student debt is precipitating or contributing to lawyer misconduct.
5. Work with Law Schools: The Bar should use both its law school regulatory power as well as its established relationships with law school leaders to encourage enhanced counseling, strategies and disclosures in regard to student debt.
6. Participate in National Dialogue: The State Bar should consider ways to add its voice to the national dialogue seeking to develop and promote enhanced loan forgiveness and repayment approaches.
7. Encourage New Law School Cost Models: The State Bar should help encourage new and innovative models that seek to address law school cost concerns.

Implementation: The Board of Trustees should create a group to implement these recommendations

APPENDIX C: Excerpts from Witnesses at Hearings

March 2015

Excerpts from Witnesses at Hearings

Luis Rodriguez, Chair CJSTF & 2013-14 State Bar President

If you can indulge me just a couple minutes, it's somewhat of a selfish reason as to why this is important. I've been a Public Defender for about 20 years, and on the criminal side, although it's not a perfect system, there is a constitutional guarantee to counsel. And in the two decades that I've been in that office, I've seen the benefits of our clients having a voice in those tough situations. The selfish part is this, is that many of our clients and their families are your clients in the civil side and their families as well, and the struggle that they face on a regular basis, not only them but 4 everybody else, we're looking at about four-fifths of the general population cannot afford an attorney in a civil action."

"The charge of the Task Force is as follows: It's to analyze the reasons for the existing justice gap, to evaluate the role of the legal profession in addressing the crises, to seek the input of groups who have been working to expand access to justice, to understand what efforts have worked and which have not been successful, to study creative solutions being considered in other states and in other countries, and to develop an action plan with recommendations for steps that should be taken to fill the justice gap and achieve true access to justice in California. Those are our responsibilities." March 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Justice Earl Johnson, Jr., Visiting Scholar, University of Southern California Law School

"...the California legislature said.[If we could make them live up to what they said in their findings when they created the Sargent Shriver Counsel Project, take a look at what they had to say] "In many civil cases, lawyers are as essential as judges and courts to the proper functioning of the justice system. The state has just as great a responsibility to ensure adequate counsel is available to both parties in those cases as it does to supply judges, courthouses, and other forums for the trial of those cases." March 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Justice Laurie Zelon, Associate Justice, Second District, Division Seven of the California Courts of Appeal

"And one of the problems that I hope we can think about together is the fact that our whole system of laws and courts was designed where the judge gets to sit and listen to trained advocates who have prepared the matter, who know the rules of evidence, and who know the law, present that case to the judge, and the judge can then hear the merits of the case, can get the testimony in that is relevant to the matter, and make a decision on the merits with some confidence that that judge knows what the legal principles applicable are. We don't have that system anymore. So everything we talk about has to be in light of the fact that our system might not have wanted to change but change has been thrust upon us"

"So we are somehow stuck. The poverty population, the needs of the public, the increasing complexity of the social welfare system and everything else in the country that faces them has outstripped our ability to continue to use the same processes that we have been using in order to solve their problems. Which brings me to Einstein. Doing what we have been doing in the same way we have been doing it meets his definition of insanity to a "T," and I think that is why our President, Mr. Rodriguez, has brought us here. Because we need to look at some more fundamental and systemic changes in order to break through that barrier that we seem to be stuck at."

"Enhanced pro bono services, as I said, we have made strides in pro bono. As more and more lawyers are having trouble finding employment, we have this interesting anomaly of unemployed lawyers, clients who need services, and no match between them, and that's something that is not necessarily limited to pro bono but deals with something that I'm going to talk about next, which is enhanced law school programs and incubators.

If we could teach lawyers how to manage a practice effectively and give them techniques so that they could represent clients for less, then a lot of the people of modest means who are now priced out of the market might have a possibility of obtaining counsel at dollar amounts they could afford." March 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Kelli Evans, Senior Director, Administration of Justice, State Bar of California

"My bottom line is notwithstanding all of these different pieces and pots and pools of money that we've put together in a patchwork to help support legal aid, it's just not sufficient. It hasn't been sufficient historically even when IOLTA was at much higher rates. It's certainly not sufficient now.

We don't anticipate the rates going up anytime soon, certainly not at the level -- you know, there would be something else happening with the economy if we saw the rates be at the level we need them to be to make a real dent.

So I think the charge and the challenge of the Task Force is crystal clear. We have to, I think, look beyond the dollars in coming up with creative, innovative ways of helping to narrow the justice gap." March 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Gillian Hadfield, University of Southern California, Gould School of Law, Richard L. and Antoinette Schamoi Kirtland Professor of Law and Professor of Economics

"Now, what I'm going to say to you -- I think you've also heard -- this is not really just a poverty problem. I mean, I would say look at the 95 percent problem. We'd be lucky if we think that 5 percent of the population actually accessed reasonable amounts of legal services, but that's the usual definition there.

"We do know casually the amount of unrepresented -- lack of representation in courts -- again, maybe you live with this -- are very high. The New York study did look at this systematically, and their numbers are just off the charts; 98 percent of 15 people facing eviction, 98 percent of people in family matters, 58 percent of people facing foreclosure, of course, standing up against a real represented bank. Just off the charts"

“So here's just some calculations. So California has 12.5 million households, and if you take those, the ABA numbers because we don't have specific California legal needs numbers -- if you just took the 1995 ABA which is probably low, half of those households at any point in time are dealing with a legal problem, and if they are, they're probably dealing with two. So that's 12.5 million legal problems. I know I said no math, but I'm doing it for you. So that's a minimum. Suppose you wanted to give one hour of legal help to each of those households. Now, remember, these are only -- the kinds of problems that get asked on these surveys are what you might call erupted problems. These are not the legal advice needs. We don't ask did you sign a mortgage document recently, did you sign a rental agreement recently, have you now got a problem that's turned into a problem. So if you wanted to give one hour of help on 4 those erupted legal problems, that would cost $3.1 billion at the average rate of a solo, small firm practitioner, which is in the area of 200 to $250 an hour. So that's if you just wanted to extend that out into the population of lawyers who are regularly serving ordinary households.”

“...And if you wanted to do it with pro bono, it would be 70 hours per active lawyer in California. That's for one hour of help.” March 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Professor Deborah Rhode, Ernest W. McFarland Professor of Law, Stanford Law School

“Ontario which has licensed the paralegals to represent individuals in minor court cases in administrative tribunal proceedings report solid levels of public satisfaction with the services received. And, in this country, one study of nonlawyer specialists who provided legal representation in bankruptcy and administrative agency proceedings found that they generally performed as well or better than attorneys. Extensive education is, in short, less critical than daily experience, and we need to recognize that much as such.” April 30, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Associate Justice Goodwin Liu, California Supreme Court and Co-chair of the Access to Justice Commission of Modest Means Incubator Project

“I would like to read -- this is Business & Profession Code 6068 (h) [it] says, “It shall be the duty of an attorney... never to reject, for any consideration personal to himself or herself, the cause of the defenseless or the oppressed.” That's actually in the state law. And that's aspirational, of course, but I think it captures so much of why young people go to law school, why perhaps most of you were motivated to study the law, and, yet, that's not a reality for so many of our people. And, so, in addition to locating our effort in relation to other bigger structural things that you are all thinking about, I want to emphasize that the reason our project is called Modest Means Incubator Project is that we are not specifically talking about legal aid solutions.”

“I was remarking just the other day ... just reading the newspaper that 70 percent of the things that are covered in the newspaper are about law... I don't know if that's as true in other nations, but we are a very ... law fixed society. And so the nature of the needs that we have -- I would just look at what we just went through with respect to mortgages and foreclosures -- is it reasonable to ask ordinary people to go through that without expert advice of some sort?" April 30, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Sue Talia, Certified Family Law Specialist and Private Family Law Judge

"When we have lawyers who can't get work and thousands of people who need legal assistance there's something wrong systemically, and I commend this task force for looking at the issue from all angles and looking for systemic solutions. It is critical that we develop new deliver methods which enable lawyers to cost effectively to provide necessary services to civil litigants, and I think one of the most promising of these is limited scope representation." April 30, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Bonnie Hough, Managing Attorney Administrative Office of the Courts

"[A] really important feature of the self-help center is they are a key point for triage. One of the things that they are trying to do is help people to understand what they can effectively do on their own and what things they need assistance with." April 30, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Hon. Chief Judge Lippman, New York State

We know that at best we are meeting 20 to 25 percent of the needs of low-income people for legal services. And really these are services dealing with the necessities of life, the roof over somebody's head, their physical safety, the well-being of their families, their livelihoods. These are the essentials of life that people today, overwhelmingly; people without means are lacking representation.

"We see ... nonlawyers as housing counselors in foreclosure proceedings, and we're starting to use it in other areas. We, in New York, base to some degree on the work of Professor Hadfield at USC and the British model. They opened up a new world saying ... this is not the only way to do this.

What we now have is a group that we call "Navigators," who go with the litigant into the courtroom. They provide moral support for the litigant, they provide information. They will not argue in front of the judge, but if the judge asks them a question, they will certainly answer it." May 28 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Dean Linda Bisesi, Assistant Dean for Financial Aid at UC Hastings

"We're kind of typical for a state school. . . . The average amount that a law student will pay in one year is over $70,000 and if they were to borrow all of that, the cost is $213,000 over a three-year period. So this does have a burdensome effect on students and it does cause them to give thought as to whether or not they want to incur the cost that is required in order to join the profession."

"I think you're beginning to see the complexity of the loan repayment -- of the loan portfolio and you might be able to imagine then, a student as they get ready to go into repayment

how confusing this could be. Where do they even find the information that they need to determine what their interest rate is and what it has been over time and if they have undergraduate debt and graduate debt, it is very complex. . . . You know, we want to help them. This is our passion. We've all been students. We want to help students and we want them to understand this and we are in a unique position as administrators to understand the mechanics of all this and how it works and be able to explain it to students, but it adds a burden on us to do this, so therein lies the catch for us.” August 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Heather Jarvis, Student Loan Expert

“[T]he programs are so complicated, so convoluted, the system is difficult to navigate that I think the programs are far less useful and effective than they might be, but they do exist.”

“In my view, the objective assistance and information for student loan borrowers is completely inadequate. . . . I think schools are less focused on providing support for their graduates when it comes to selecting repayment options than they are in providing the financial aid to begin with. . . . It needs to be simplified considerably. . . . I think that schools can and should invest more in providing the resources that would be necessary to give more personalized advice to their graduates.” August 26, 2014 CJSTF Hearing

Civil Justice Strategies Task Force Report & Recommendations

APPENDIX D: Reports of the CJSTF Subcommittees

March 2015

“NOW” REPORT

The “Now” Group was tasked with a review of the current access environment in order to identify what approaches are working now and what may be scalable or can be replicated.

INTRODUCTION

For both low- and moderate-income persons, the concepts of access to justice and delivery of legal services should not be viewed as synonymous with access to an attorney, access to judicial process, or individual representation. For both groups, a broad range of strategies, services, providers, and forms should be available.⁶

A full 25 years ago, these were the words of the ABA Conference on Access to Justice. And despite the realization then that a complex mix of systems and providers are needed to meet the Justice Gap, it still persists.

The Civil Justice Strategies Task Force had no illusions it could solve this long-standing problem overnight. But the “Now” Group took on the examination of these issues to further kick the ball down the field to make some progress, and sought to look “broadly... [at] innovations in courts, the bar, legal aid, and community that make it easier for people to obtain access to justice institutions, and just results within those institutions.”⁷

The justice gap that exists for both poor and the middle class is widely documented. For example, a 2009 Justice Gap report issued by the Legal Services Corporation notes that roughly half of the people who seek help from LSC-funded legal aid providers are denied service.⁸

As stated in a 2009 Symposium “Access to Justice: It’s Not for Everyone,” the middle-class in the United States is often priced out of the legal system because their income level disqualifies them from being eligible for legal aid services, but they cannot actually afford to hire an attorney.⁹

Lan W. Houseman, Senior Fellow for Law and Social Policy, at CLASP states in his “Civil Legal Aid in the United States an Update For 2013,” (t)he trends in US civil legal aid over the last 12 years continued through 2013. We saw increases in state funding as well as from other funding sources. However, we saw decreases in both IOLTA funding in 2012 and there are likely more to come in 2013. There are more Access to Justice Commissions and increased attention to civil legal aid at the state level. The notion of a right to counsel in civil matters has gained renewed attention. Yet, the basic civil legal aid system has not closed the “justice gap.” Efforts to expand access through technology and self-help representation activities continued and have expanded, but the fundamental problem remains: there are not enough actual staff lawyers, paralegals, lay advocates, law students and private attorneys available to meet the huge needs of low-income persons for advice, brief service and full representation.”

Testimony Presented To, And Information Acquired By,
The Task Force to Learn About and Understand Existing Efforts

A. The Task Force’s Information Gathering

1. Witnesses Interviewed and Materials Reviewed
2. For nearly a year, the Task Force met in public hearings to learn from a diverse group of state and national experts and reviewed and analyzed numerous reports and articles related to the major existing efforts to provide civil legal services to low and moderate income Californians.
3. The witnesses, who testified about current legal services for those of low and moderate incomes over the course of the Task Force hearings, are included in Appendix E.

B. “Now Group Recommendations

1. Funding: recommend that the State Bar boost promotion of the Justice Gap Fund in order to increase donations to the fund by lawyers and law firms.
2. Incubators/Modest Means: recommend that the State Bar track the trajectory of incubator participants; and recommend that the State Bar help create a framework (e.g., mentors, toolkits, forms, etc.) to assist modest means practitioners.
3. Unbundling: recommend that the State Bar do more to promote and incentivize limited scope representation.
4. Improved Coordination: recommend greater coordination between the State Bar and Judicial Council, including in efforts to link the various stakeholders involved in providing affordable legal services.
5. Civil Gideon: recommend that the State Bar support efforts to secure universal representation starting with the following four areas: Land Lord / Tenant, Family, Domestic Violence, Immigration; and recommend that State Bar help to market what’s working in the pilot projects, publicly support them, and help to scale them.

C. Inventory & Description of Existing Efforts

The Now subcommittee compiled an inventory of the major efforts currently underway in California to assist those who fall into the justice gap. This is not an exhaustive list, nor could it ever be, since the Task Force learned that there are constant ongoing efforts to bring new and better ways of providing legal services all the time. We are proud to have been the recipients of this knowledge and hope that the work of the task force does some justice to the efforts of so many throughout our state.

Inventory & Description of Existing Efforts

1. LEGAL SERVICES FUNDING (CALIFORNIA)

The Legal Services Trust Fund Program of The State Bar of California makes grants to nonprofit organizations that provide free civil legal services to low-income Californians. Four primary sources provide funds for the program: Interest on Lawyer Trust Accounts (IOLTA); California Equal Access Fund (EAF); the Justice Gap Fund and State Bar Dues Voluntary Contribution for Legal Services. In addition to these funding sources, the Campaign for Justice works to raise awareness about the critical importance of legal services and to encourage increased support and funding.

- IOLTA

Legislatively created in 1981, the IOLTA program provides funding for almost 100 nonprofit legal aid organizations, including direct legal service providers and support centers. IOLTA revenue has totaled over $360 million since inception, with high years over $20 million but, due to low bank interest rates, recent years below $5 million.

- California Equal Access Fund (EAF)

The State Budget Act allocates funds to the Equal Access Fund “to improve equal access and the fair administration of justice.” The Fund is given to the Judicial Council to be distributed through the State Bar’s Legal Services Trust Fund Program.

Since 2006, $4.80 of each civil filing fee collected by local courts is added to the Equal Access Fund. Filing fee revenue has ranged from approx. $5.3 million to $6.75 million annually, bringing the Equal Access Fund distribution to roughly $16 million annually.

Ten percent of the funds available for distribution support Partnership Grants to legal services programs “for joint projects of courts and legal services programs to make legal assistance available to pro per litigants.” In 2014 approximately $1.5 million were distributed

Partnership Grants are awarded through a competitive process, as distinct from the administration of other State Bar Trust Fund Program grants. The Trust Fund Commission and Judicial Council have complete discretion and flexibility to distribute Partnership Grant funds in the way they deem most appropriate. Grant award recommendations are approved by the Judicial Council.

- Justice Gap Fund

The Justice Gap Fund was created by the California Legislature in 2006. It allows the State Bar to collect voluntary contributions from its members and others to help fund legal aid organizations statewide.

The annual dues bill includes a voluntary check-off box and a suggested donation amount of $100 contribution to the Justice Gap Fund. Distributions can be made year-round through the Campaign for Justice Website. Annually, only about 5% of lawyers make a contribution to the Justice Gap Fund.

The donations received through the Justice Gap Fund are combined with revenue from Interest on Lawyers' Trust Accounts (IOLTA) and distributed on a formulaic basis to all California legal aid organizations that qualify for grant funding.

- State Bar Dues Voluntary Contribution to Legal Services

In addition to the Justice Gap Fund, each year since 2011, the State Bar Dues Bill has included an additional line-item enabling attorneys to make a small contribution for legal services. In 2011, the amount was $10; in 2012 and 2013, the contribution was increased to $20; in 2014 it was $30 and in 2015, the amount was increased to $40. Over $15 million for legal services has been raised through the State Bar Dues Bill.

- Campaign for Justice

The Campaign for Justice was created by a network of legal aid organizations, private lawyers, the Office of Legal Services of the State Bar of California and the Legal Aid Association of California, united in a mission to spread awareness about the importance of legal aid and of increasing the resources available to meet the needs of indigent Californians. The goal of the Campaign for Justice is to increase funding for the important network of legal aid organizations that give a voice and representation to Californians who need help accessing justice.

The Campaign for Justice consists of four key components: educating policymakers about the importance of legal assistance, encouraging banks to maximize interest and waive fees on IOLTA accounts, increasing individual contributions to the Justice Gap Fund and legal assistance organizations, and encouraging pro bono services that leverage legal aid resources. By expanding awareness of the importance of legal assistance, the Campaign for Justice seeks to increase local and statewide legal aid resources so Californians are not denied justice simply because they cannot afford an attorney.

2. LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

The Legal Services Corporation (LSC) is the single largest funder of civil legal aid in the country. LSC funds a total of 134 legal aid organizations, including 11 in California. LSC promotes equal access to justice by awarding grants to legal services providers through a competitive grants process; conducting compliance reviews and program visits to oversee program quality and compliance with statutory and regulatory requirements as well as restrictions that accompany LSC funding, and by providing training and technical assistance to programs.

In 2014 LSC provided $365 million nationally for civil legal assistance to low-income people – down from $420 million four years ago. The reduction in LSC funding has resulted in staffing and service cuts in legal services programs in California and across the country that depend upon LSC funding.

3. PRO BONO

Lawyers in the United States are recommended under American Bar Association (ABA) ethical rules to contribute at least fifty hours of pro bono service per year(s). Some state bar associations, however, may recommend fewer hours. Rule 6.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct strongly encourages lawyers to provide at least 50 hours of pro bono service each year and quantifies the minimal financial contributions that lawyers should aspire to make to organizations providing legal services to the poor and underserved.

In 1989 (amended June 22, 2002), the State Bar of California's Board of Governors, adopted a Pro Bono Resolution urging attorneys to devote at least 50 hours per year to pro bono service; that law firms and governmental and corporate employers support the involvement of associates and partners in pro bono; that law schools encourage the participation of law students in pro bono activities; and that attorneys and law firms contribute financial support to not-for-profit organizations that provide free legal services.

The Chief Judge of New York has also instituted a requirement that applicants who plan to be admitted in 2015 and onward must complete fifty hours of pro bono service in order to qualify. All attorneys who register must report their voluntary pro bono hours and/or voluntary contributions.

In California, the Task Force on Admissions Regulation Reform (TFARR) has recommended a competency training requirement, fulfilled either at the pre- or post-admission stage, where 50 hours of legal services is specifically devoted to pro bono or modest means clients.

While providing pro bono service is a core value of the legal profession, pro bono, legal work currently accounts for a very small percentage of legal work performed in the country.

4. SELF-REPRESENTATION

A Self-Represented Litigant is a person (party) who advocates on his or her own behalf before a court, rather than being represented by an attorney. These litigants are also known as pro se or pro per litigants.

California's courts are facing an ever-increasing number of litigants who go to court without legal counsel, largely because they cannot afford representation. Self-represented litigants typically are unfamiliar with court procedures and forms as well as their rights and obligations, which leaves them disadvantaged in court and requires significant court resources.

- Task Force on Self-Represented Litigants

The Judicial Council established the Task Force on Self-Represented Litigants in 2001 to coordinate the statewide response to the needs of litigants who represent themselves in court. The task force drafted a statewide action plan to serve self-represented litigants that was based in large part on local courts' own plans to add programs and services for self-represented litigants.

- Self-Help Centers

Effective January 1, 2008, the Judicial Council adopted rule 10.960 of the California Rules of Court, which states that court-based, self-help centers are a core function of the California courts. Self-help centers are located in or near the courthouse. They are staffed by attorneys and other qualified personnel under their direction to provide information and education to self-represented litigants about the justice process. While courts in every county have self-help centers, services have been curtailed due to budget cuts.

- Family Law Facilitators

Many self-help centers are combined with the family law facilitator program in their court. Effective January 1, 1997, Family Code section 10002 established an Office of the Family Law Facilitator in each of the 58 counties. The Judicial Council administers the program, distributing funds to these court-based offices that are staffed by licensed attorneys.

- Family Law Information Centers

The Judicial Council administers three pilot project centers in the Superior Courts of Los Angeles, Sutter, and Fresno Counties. The centers are supervised by attorneys and assist low-income, self-represented litigants with forms, information, and resources concerning divorce, separation, parentage, child and spousal support, property division, and custody and visitation.

- JusticeCorps

The JusticeCorps program began in 2004 as an innovative partnership of the AOC, AmeriCorps, the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, various University of California (UC) and California State University (CSU) campuses, and community-based, legal aid service providers. Since 2004, the Superior Courts of Alameda and San Diego Counties, as well as the Counties of San Francisco, San Mateo, Santa Clara, Placer, Yolo, and Sacramento, have joined the JusticeCorps. Members are recruited from UC and CSU undergraduate programs. They undergo intensive training in family law, small claims, and housing law before being placed in legal self-help centers to provide legal information to self-represented litigants under the direction of an attorney.

- Online Forms and Document Assembly Programs

California has standardized statewide forms for nearly all matters involving self-represented litigants. All of the forms can be completed online and saved as a PDF.

- Websites

The Judicial Council provides a comprehensive “Online Self-Help Center” for court users who do not have attorneys and for others wishing to become better informed about the law and court procedures. The entire site has been translated into Spanish and provides over 4,000 pages of information in each language on topics including family law, landlord/tenant, small claims, guardianships, conservatorships, domestic violence, elder abuse, and a host of other topics. In addition to the court’s website, the Legal Aid Association of California (LAAC), with funding from the State Bar, operates LawHelpCA.org, a website that provides information about common legal issues and a directory of organizations that provide free or low-cost legal advice and representation.

5. RIGHT TO COUNSEL - CIVIL GIDEON

There is a national movement underway to guarantee a right to counsel in certain civil legal cases. Modeled after the U.S. Supreme Court case of Gideon v. Wainwright, which guaranteed a right to counsel in criminal cases, the effort is being pursued along multiple fronts.

In 2006, the American Bar Association unanimously adopted a resolution supporting the right to counsel in basic human needs cases. In addition to being co-sponsored by 13 state and local bar associations, the Resolution's goals were subsequently adopted in an additional six states. The ABA followed up in 2010 with two documents: a Model Access Act (which provides implementation suggestions for states establishing new rights to counsel), and Basic Principles of a Right to Counsel in Civil Legal Proceedings.

Information about status of right to counsel in each state can be found at the National Coalition for Civil Right to counsel at <http://www.civilrighttocounsel.org/> .

California provides counsel in a limited number of civil contexts, for example, removal of a child from indigent parents or termination of custody (See NCCRC site for examples)

- California - Sargent Shriver Civil Counsel Act (AB 590 - 2009 - Feuer)

With the passage of the Sargent Shriver Civil Counsel Act (AB 590, Feuer) in 2009, seven pilot projects selected by the Judicial Council of California through a competitive RFP process provide representation to low-income Californians on critical legal issues affecting basic human needs. The pilot projects are operated by legal services nonprofit corporations working in collaboration with local courts.

Pilot projects started in fiscal year 2011–2012 and are initially authorized for a three-year period, subject to renewal. All pilots and funding will terminate after six years (in 2017) unless the Legislature extends the statutory authority.

On August 21, 2014, the Sargent Shriver Civil Counsel Act Implementation Committee recommended that the Judicial Council award $7,738,000 million in grants to the following qualified legal service organizations and court partners for pilot projects:

1. Bar Association of San Francisco Voluntary Legal Services Program Superior Court of San Francisco County
Child Custody Pilot Project $394,364
2. Greater Bakersfield Legal Assistance Superior Court of Kern County
Housing Pilot Project $536,282
3. Legal Aid Society of San Diego

- San Francisco Justice and Diversity Center Civil Right to Counsel

In 2012, a city ordinance signed by Mayor Ed Lee in early April has made San Francisco the first city in the nation to create a guaranteed right to civil counsel. The ordinance, passed in March by the Board of Supervisors, authorizes a one-year Right to Civil Counsel pilot program but restricts the city's financial commitment to paying one staff person to coordinate the city, clients, and pro bono lawyers. To be eligible for free counsel, a person would need to live within 200 percent of the federal poverty line and have a case touching on "a basic human need," such as housing, safety, or child custody.

- Other Right to Counsel Efforts

In other states, efforts are driven mostly by court decisions, private bars, legal service organizations, and court-created justice commissions. For example, in 2009, the Philadelphia Bar started civil Gideon pilot projects in mortgage foreclosure and child custody cases. In 2007 the Boston Bar conducted a similar project with regard to eviction cases.

In 2013, a special Maryland state task force began a one-year mission to evaluate the feasibility of providing a right to legal counsel for Marylanders who are involved in certain kinds of civil disputes. They will study whether low-income Marylanders should have the right to counsel at public expense in basic human needs civil cases, such as those involving shelter, sustenance, safety, health, or child custody. Established by the legislature and signed into law by the Governor in 2013, the task force was approved to run until Sept. 30, 2014, when it will report its findings and recommendations.

6. UNBUNDLING

“Unbundling,” sometimes referred to as “limited scope representation is a way to spread scarce legal talent, especially in the context of providing services to people who cannot afford to pay for full representation. For example, a lawyer may prepare a document for someone or represent people through one court appearance or settlement negotiation.

Attorneys may provide limited scope representation pro bono or charge a fee for services performed. When Limited scope representation is done on a fee paid basis, the attorney is paid a fee for the part of the case s/he handles. This can be done on a flat fee (fixed charge for drafting a motion, filing a divorce, or similar discrete task), or hourly, at a full rate or reduced rate. The process concentrates the attorney’s time and expertise where it will be most effective, and limits the cost to the client to those tasks where professional assistance is most critical.

Unbundled representation sometimes requires approval from the court because it could be seen as violating professional ethics for a lawyer to be involved in a case on such a limited basis. California permits lawyers to provide unbundled legal services. The Judicial Council has created forms for use in both general civil cases and in family law cases to inform the court of such representation.

7. INCUBATORS

Legal incubators are emerging as models that enable newly-admitted lawyers to acquire the range of skills necessary to launch successful practices. The alpha incubator was established at the City University of New York over a decade ago. Recent changes in the economy have led to the creation of similar models by both law schools and bar associations.

Incubator programs are examples of what law schools and other stakeholders can do to respond to trends in the profession, to community needs, and to legal education trends. Recent trends in the profession include a decrease in the number of paid lawyer positions. Like all other graduates, law graduates are facing the prospect of creating their own jobs, and incubator programs that respond by enabling students to successfully create their own jobs fill a need. Additionally, with the significant decrease in federally and locally sponsored free legal services, lawyers are needed in community-based practices to provide affordable and innovative services to fill the gap.

The California Access Commission has a current project in which it has provided seed grants to organizations to start or expand incubator programs focused on modest means representation.

8. ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION (ADR)

Alternative dispute resolution (ADR) systems are becoming a mainstay of legal systems around the world, especially within systems of justice suffering from significant backlogs and delay. While arbitration used to be the bastion of most commercial law disputes, today mediation is more widely used in both public and private justice systems. The growth of mediation has prompted some to consider the possibility of the wider use of online dispute resolution (ODR) platforms. Because many ADR systems are in fact reducing case backlogs, the focus has been on the speed of resolution and not necessarily on procedural protections and providing justice

- Online Dispute Resolution (ODR)

In a manner similar to ADR at its inception, ODR providers often lack appropriate funding and procedural safeguards. One means to address the former by reducing cost is to automate portions of the system. In fact, some argue that significant cost saving could be realized – and justice may be better served – by removing human neutrals from the equation; in other words, to fully automate some types of justice. As ADR gains wider use, many commentators hypothesize the next generation of ADR will be an ODR platform, which will use an algorithm and possess no neutral human decision maker.

9. MODEST MEANS

Modest Means representation provides low-cost legal assistance to individuals who do not qualify for free legal services, but cannot afford the expertise of attorneys at the standard rate.

Some state and local bar associations work to identify and stimulate innovative programs designed to make legal services more readily available to people of average means. Their websites lists programs that they believe are creative initiatives in the delivery of legal services to people who do not qualify for subsidized legal services and yet lack the income to retain traditional legal representation.

Listings may include bar-sponsored programs, lawyer referral services, military-sponsored programs, non-profit initiatives, court-based projects and individual-sometimes entrepreneurial-endeavors.

The ABA maintains a list at the following link of innovative programs to help people of modest means obtain legal help. In California, a number of lawyer referral services include attorney members who have agreed to accept modest means clients.

10. LAW SCHOOL CLINICS

Clinical legal education is an increasingly emphasized component of legal education. In particular, the Carnegie Report, “Educating Lawyers—Preparation for the Profession of Law,” emphasized the educational value of law clinics. Students and schools increasingly favor clinical education due to the current enrollment and employment challenges for the nation’s law schools. In a recent survey of 156 law schools, there were a total of 1036 distinct live-client law clinics, with an average of 6.6 per law school. Nearly 80% of the respondent schools noted that demand for live-client clinics increased during the prior five years, 19% reported the demand remained constant during that time period, and less than 1% noted a decrease in demand.¹⁰

Nationwide, more than one thousand faculty teach and supervise clinic students in increasingly diverse fields. Clinic students at all ABA-accredited law schools in the 2009–2010 academic year provided over 1.38 million hours of free civil legal services and represented almost thirty thousand civil clients.¹¹

11. LIBRARIES

With increasing costs of providing legal reference resources and often limited library budgets, libraries are collaborating with courts to provide services to pro se litigants. Because libraries typically allow access to public computers and because library staff are already trained in assisting the public with research issues, they are a natural partner for providing self-help services.

One example of effective partnering in support of building up public libraries as access-to-justice gateways is Montana, in which the state law library has systematically reached out to public libraries and trained their staff in how to provide informational assistance.

Another example is Illinois, in which Illinois LegalAid Online has, with funding from the IOLTA (interest on lawyers’ trust accounts) program, placed “out of the box” self-help centers in over 20 public libraries. The program paid for a computer, and the library maintains access to it.

In New York, LawHelpNY, the legal aid Web site that collaborates closely with the court system in posting information, has conducted extensive training of public and law libraries, including the Queens Public Library, which has extensive outreach to patrons with limited proficiency in English.

12. LAW LIBRARIES

Law libraries are seeing a changing user base: in many, if not most, law libraries, the numbers of lawyers and court staff visiting law libraries is decreasing at the same time that an increasing number of members of the public and people without lawyers are approaching law libraries for help. As the number of people without lawyers coming to law libraries continues to increase, like courts, law libraries must adjust the delivery and availability of its services.

In order to carry out this mission, law libraries will need to move towards providing a broader range of services, including assisting individuals to diagnose their legal problems; generating and providing legal information appropriate to a wide range of constituencies with varied education and literacy levels; providing tools that assist litigants prepare and present their cases to the courts; and information and assistance designed to help with longer term legal planning.

There are examples of law libraries across the country that already have embraced this role, and have experimented and innovated to make a major contribution to access to justice. These changes have been made possible by broad changes taking place in courts, in technology, and in the conceptual understandings of the way that legal information is provided, particularly to those without lawyers.

13. VOLUNTEER LAWYER'S PROGRAMS

New York State Courts

The New York State Courts' Access to Justice Program is the statewide pro bono initiative intended to encourage and increase attorneys' free legal services for New Yorkers to provide legal assistance to New Yorkers of limited means who enter their courts without representation.

The New York State Courts Access to Justice Program provides pro bono legal services to litigants in the following areas:

- Consumer Debt
- Family Court matters
- Foreclosure
- Housing
- Uncontested Divorce

Attorneys who volunteer in these programs receive free training, with CLE credit, in exchange for 12 hours of service at the attorneys' convenience, in one of the Access to Justice Programs. The volunteers are supervised by court attorneys, or trained attorneys from organizations that work in partnership with the courts.

14. Immigration

- San Francisco US Immigration Court “Attorney of the Day” (AOD) Program

The "Attorney of the Day" program is unique to the San Francisco based US Immigration court. The Bar Association of San Francisco's Lawyer Referral Service has administered this program for the court for over 25 years. It has recently garnered attention because of the "surge" dockets for unaccompanied minors and families with minors from Central America and Mexico. There are three immigration courts in CA: San Diego, Los Angeles and San Francisco. Although there has been interest from other states in the 9th circuit to develop an AOD program, it has not often been replicated.

Under the AOD program, the BASF maintains a panel of experienced immigration attorneys who have agreed to provide pro bono limited scope representation to respondents in removal proceedings (deportation) at their Master Calendar hearings (the initial hearing). BASF produces a calendar for the court of the attorneys who are available. While they usually schedule 2 attorneys per day for the court, currently with the surge dockets, they are scheduling up to another 8 attorneys per day, and given the expanded need, are looking to recruit more experienced attorneys for the AOD program.

This program fell naturally into a Lawyer Referral Service because they have experience standards that attorneys must meet in order to participate. BASF's pro bono application is on their website and they work closely with the immigration bench and administration to monitor quality and the reliability of the attorneys. BASF also works with the court and model practitioners to modify the pro bono application as needed.

- Public Defender Immigration Representation Project:

Alameda County

On January 21, 2014, the Alameda County Public Defender's Office made history by launching California's first public defender immigration representation project. This marks the first time that a county public defender's office in California has appeared on behalf of clients in immigration court. Public defender offices in New York City were the first in the nation to do so.

This new position is a direct response to the lack of procedural safeguards available to noncitizens in removal proceedings, including the lack of a right to appointed counsel for indigent noncitizens facing deportation. What happens in criminal court can have disproportionately punitive consequences in immigration court, and this new role recognizes that effective representation does not end at the courthouse doors. The Alameda County Office of the Public Defender sees this new role as an important shift toward a more holistic model of indigent defense, and invites other public defenders to follow in its footsteps.

San Francisco County

In July 2014, the San Francisco County Office of the Public Defender launched the second public defender immigration representation project in California. The San Francisco Public Defender's office hired a full-time civil immigration attorney to help clients facing deportation or similar consequences.

The attorney will advise trial attorneys on the immigration consequences in cases involving criminal charges against non-citizens, conduct trainings and outreach, and represent some public defender clients in civil proceedings in immigration and federal court.

Federal legislation passed in 1996 expanded the range of criminal dispositions that can trigger deportation and mandatory detention. Meanwhile, current enforcement trends mean non-citizens with criminal convictions are more likely to be arrested during federal immigration sweeps.

On August 27, 2014, San Francisco officials announced that it would provide funding to help immigrants facing deportation to obtain an attorney. The city's $100,000 will go to the nonprofit Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights, which will use it to provide free legal representation for immigrants living in the country illegally.

The initiative is an expansion of the city's Right to Civil Counsel program that had focused on tenants facing evictions.

15. Lawyer Referral And Information Services (LRIS)

A lawyer referral service refers potential clients to attorneys. The lawyer referral service staff interviews individuals and, if they have a legal problem, will match them with a lawyer who is experienced in the appropriate area of law. The client then sees the lawyer for an initial consultation or speaks to the lawyer on the phone for free or for a low initial consultation fee.

In California, lawyer referral services must be certified by the State Bar and must conform to certain standards adopted by the California Supreme Court.

Some lawyer referral services are helping to bridge the justice gap with Reduced Fee or Modest Means Panels. Clients who call the referral line, meet the income guidelines and do not have a case that might be accepted on a contingent fee basis, are matched with attorneys who have agreed in advance not to charge more than a set amount per hour for their services. Reduced Fee or Modest Means Panels are designed to assist people whose income is too high for free civil legal aid, but who cannot afford to pay an attorney's standard rate.

“NEW” REPORT

The "New" Group focused on innovations that currently are being considered or implemented in other jurisdictions.

“New Group” What More Can We Do?

Introduction

Access to justice is a problem for many members of the public and there is a growing justice gap. The current means for the provision of legal services have not evolved sufficiently to address this gap and, as such, this failure has effectively opened the door to ancillary providers of legal services and nonlawyers to satisfy the unmet need for legal services through a multitude of means including the use of websites, online self-help tools, and data analytics.

Consequently, the "New Group" focused on innovations that currently are being considered or implemented in other jurisdictions including: Alternative Business Structures; technological innovations; legal process outsourcing (e.g., research, document drafting and review, e-discovery, etc.); limited license legal technicians; Court Navigators; court re-engineering; non-traditional "legal service" providers; and private funding of access to justice projects.

During its hearings, the task force heard from a diverse group of experts regarding innovations that are occurring in other jurisdictions, including: Professor Gillian Hadfield, University of Southern California, Gould School of Law; the Honorable Jonathan Lippmann, Chief Judge of the New York Court of Appeals; Steve Crossland, Former President, Washington State Bar & Chair of the Limited Licensing Board; Veyom Bahl, Program Officer, Robin Hood Foundation - funding NY Immigrant Justice Corp; Margaret Hagan, Fellow at the Stanford Center for Internet and Society; Colin Rule, CEO of Modria.com, an online dispute resolution service provider, and non-resident Fellow at the Center for Internet and Society at Stanford Law School; and Deborah Rhode, Ernest W. McFarland Professor of Law, Stanford Law School.

After learning about a range of innovations, the "New Group" focused its discussions in four areas:

(1) Limited License Legal Technicians; (2) efforts to re-engineer the court system; (3) alternative business structures; and (4) court navigator programs. Below are summaries of these issues followed by the "New Group" recommendations for California.

1. Washington State's Limited License Legal Technician Program

In 2011, the World Justice Program issued a Rule of Law Index which ranked the United States 21st out of 66 countries studied in providing access to civil justice and 20th out of 23 countries in its income group.¹² As the justice gap widens, some states have taken bold steps in initiating programs which may assist those in need of legal services, but who cannot afford a lawyer.

¹² Mark David Argast, Juan Carlos Botero and Alejandro Ponce, The World Justice Project Rule of Law Index, The World Justice Project1, 111 (2011)

On June 15, 2012, the Washington State Supreme Court voted 6-3 to allow non-lawyers to engage in limited forms of practice in the state of Washington.¹³ The non-lawyers have been termed, Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT). After a quite lengthy and heated debate, the Washington Court was persuaded to adopt the rule based upon, among others, two primary concerns. In recognizing the need, the Court noted the complexity of the civil legal system, and recognized that it is unaffordable not only to low income people, but people of moderate income as well (defined as families with incomes between 200% and 400% of the poverty level).¹⁴ The Court further expanded that poor people with legal problems “seek but cannot obtain help from an overtaxed, underfunded civil legal aid system...With moderate income, people with legal problems find the “existing market rates for legal services...cost prohibitive.”¹⁵

In January 2013 the LLLT Board began the process of picking a practice area to which the LLLT Rule would be applied initially, with expansion to other practice areas in the future. The area of family law was initially chosen as it was understood to be one of the areas of highest unmet need.¹⁶ As Washington State Supreme Court Justice Barbara Madsen wrote, “No one has a crystal ball,” but potentially, “the public will have a source of relatively affordable technical help with uncomplicated legal matters.”¹⁷

When deciding to adopt the LLLT program, the Court took note of the public protection issue. The Court was aware that Washington State is not devoid of the fraudulent practices of many non-lawyer businesses, and stated that another focus was to keep in check “the unregulated activities of many untrained, unsupervised legal practitioners who daily do harm to ‘clients’ and to the public’s interest in having quality civil legal services provided by qualified practitioners.”¹⁸

Under Washington’s rule, LLLT’s may assist litigants in completing legal forms, review and explain pleadings, and further apprise clients of procedures and timeline. LLLT’s, however, cannot represent litigants in court proceedings, formal administrative proceedings, or formal dispute resolution processes. Moreover, they are prohibited from communicating with another person or lawyer on behalf of the client.

The educational requirements to become a LLLT in Washington State are quite rigid. Applicants must have a college degree in “paralegal/legal assistance studies” and a minimum of two years’ experience as a paralegal/legal assistant doing substantive law related work under the supervision of a lawyer or a post baccalaureate certificate program in paralegal/legal assistant studies and three years' experience as a paralegal/legal assistant doing substantive related work under the supervision of a lawyer. LLLT's are also held under the same standard of care as a Washington lawyer (See, Attachment 1, Pathway to LLLT Admission, admission procedure flowchart).

Consistent with Washington State's General Rule 24, (the Washington Supreme Court rule establishing the Practice of Law Board)¹⁹ the rule establishes a framework for the licensing and regulation of non-attorneys to engage in discrete activities that currently fall within the definition of the "practice of law." Such activities are subject to exclusive regulation and oversight by the Washington State Supreme Court. The rule establishes the regulatory framework to allow LLLT's the opportunity to practice. Hence, GR 25 establishes:

- certification requirements (age, education, experience, pro bono service, examination, etc.);²⁰
- specific types of activities in which a LLLT would be allowed to engage;²¹
- the circumstances under which the LLLT would be allowed to engage in authorized activities (office location, personal services required, contract for services with appropriate disclosures, prohibitions on serving individuals who require services beyond the scope of authority of the LLT to perform)²²
- a detailed list of prohibitions;²³ and
- continuing certification and financial responsibility requirements.²⁴

A study of the efficiency of Washington's LLLT program is scheduled to be completed by 2016. Although contracting a LLLT would not be the same as retaining counsel, it offers the potential of helping to close the justice gap. The California State Bar should consider designing a similar program.

2. Re-engineering The Court System

The subcommittee felt that there is a need to think about whether court processes are getting in the way of cases being decided on the merits. It was the subcommittee's belief that a multi-disciplinary approach should be considered in streamlining the court system. The concept of reengineering the legal process encompasses, in part, identifying problems with current court processes, rules, forms, and the possibility of determining which legal issues should be taken out of the courtroom and ultimately out of the courthouse.

For example, some task force members queried whether a psychologist or social worker might be better suited than a judge in determining child custody issues in a family law matter. Another example of “delegalization” cited, was eBay’s online dispute resolution (ODR) process which offers two services to disgruntled/dissatisfied customers. The first is a free web-based forum which allows users to attempt to resolve their differences on their own, and/or, if necessary, the use of a professional mediator. The cost of a mediator is $20 for each dispute. One of the presenters to the CJSTF was Colin Rule, who is the Chairman and COO of modria.com, an online dispute resolution service provider in Silicon Valley, and was from 2003 to 2011 the Director of Online Dispute Resolution at eBay and PayPal. Mr. Rule explained that online dispute resolution, as practiced by entities like eBay and Modria, use technology to efficiently and inexpensively resolve a high volume of disputes and that such processes could be explored for the justice system as well.

ODR, if employed by the courts, could be a means of alleviating pressure on the courts and reducing costs through automation of some aspects of the court process. This may be an appropriate issue for further strenuous review by either the Judicial Council or the recently created Commission on the Future of the Courts which “will examine ways to increase the efficiency of adjudicating cases in civil, criminal, traffic, juvenile and family law matters, as well as ways to enhance the underfunded court system’s fiscal stability.”²⁵

3. Alternative Business Structures

After a long review process, the UK implemented a new regulatory set-up for legal services in order to foster competition, innovation, and consumer protection, as well as so-called accountable regulatory enforcement (under the Legal Services Act 2007; hereafter “LSA 2007”). These reforms grew out of the Clementi Report (published in December 2004). It argued for alternative business structures (allowing non-lawyers to go into business with lawyers as well as non-lawyers ownership of law firms, including the possibility of public trading of shares in law firms; hereafter “ABSs”), an independent agency to deal with disciplinary complaints (rather than leaving it to self-regulation; currently the Legal Ombudsman and the Office for Legal Complaints), and greater freedom for legal service providers to compete (under the supervision of the Legal Services Board, operational since 2010).

The act is intended to liberalize and regulate the market for legal services in England and Wales, to encourage competition and provide a new consumer complaint mechanism. The LSA also allows alternative business structures (ABSs) with nonlawyers in professional, management or ownership roles. These legal disciplinary practices (LDPs) can have up to 25 percent nonlawyer managers.

The Solicitors Regulation Authority (“SRA”), the independent regulatory body of the Law Society, became a licensing ABS authority in 2007 and started accepting applications for ABS licenses in January 2012.

In the United States, the District of Columbia has permitted a form of non-lawyer ownership or management of law firms for over 20 years.²⁶ Anecdotally, these firms believe that there is or will be client demand for the legal services that firms with non-lawyer partners are well-positioned to provide (e.g., family law firms with social workers and family planners on the client service team). In addition, ABS legal companies such as Legal Zoom and Rocket Lawyer have entered the UK market and are regulated there.

²⁵ Chief Justice Creates Commission on the Future of the Courts, press release, July 9, 2014

Although ABS' may provide financially manageable and perhaps legally sound document preparation services, we believe they are too untested to recommend adoption in California at this time and that there are other alternatives to improving our justice gap. Accordingly, the task force recommends that we continue to monitor the development of ABS' and whether they result in more affordable legal services while providing adequate protection to consumers. The California State Bar Board of Trustees has decided to regularly evaluate developments in this area, including whether emerging companies who provide law-related services should be subject to additional regulation and oversight.

4. New York State Navigator Program

In his 2014 State of the Judiciary address, New York Chief Judge Jonathan Lippmann acknowledged that there are many tasks only a lawyer is authorized to do, and further acknowledge that there is no substitute for legal representation, stating that a lawyer is trained to analyze the law, advise their clients, and represent them in a court of law. But he asked everyone to keep in mind that there is “a vast pool of poor people with legal problems who cannot afford a lawyer to represent them.”²⁷ Chief Lippman then suggested that the legal profession look to the medical model wherein patients are routinely assisted by health care professionals other than physicians and announced that “for the first time, the trained non-lawyers, called Navigators, [would] be permitted to accompany unrepresented litigants into the courtroom in specific locations in Brooklyn Housing Court and Bronx Civil Court.”

The Navigator program currently operates in the State of New York as a pilot program. Navigators are specially trained and supervised non-lawyers who provide pro bono assistance to unrepresented litigants in both housing and consumer cases. The program permits non-lawyer volunteers to assist litigants to complete legal paperwork and organize documents. They may also accompany litigants to court. Upon court direction, the Navigators may answer factual questions, such as which benefits a person has applied for and whether a certain building is regulated. Navigators are prohibited from giving legal advice; however, they may assist in settlement negotiations outside the courtroom.

Although New York's Navigators are limited in providing assistance in the areas of consumer credit actions and evictions, an expansion of their roles is the subject of a current on-going study. Navigators receive training in the documentation in which they are assisting litigants, however, no formal legal training is provided.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The goal of the CJSTF “New Group” was to analyze various innovative programs being implemented or proposed by other jurisdictions to provide civil legal services to low and moderate-income individuals. In doing so, the task force reviewed programs in many jurisdictions and particularly in the states of Washington and New York. The task force reviewed their respective advantages and disadvantages, and further dissected and analyzed these programs to determine whether and how they might be adjusted to accommodate the growing number of unrepresented litigants in the state of California.

The recommendations proposed below will, by no means alone, close the justice gap. The task force believes, however, that, if adopted, these recommendations will provide additional legal assistance to individuals in need of assistance and will benefit the court system. As noted by Justice Jonathan Lippmann:

“. . . beyond having aspiring lawyers help those most in need of legal assistance, further new thinking is required to tackle the crisis in access to legal services for the poor. We must be creative and embrace new ideas about the very manner in which we deliver legal services to the poor as they seek to navigate our legal system.”²⁸

This subcommittee is hopeful that the proposed recommendations outlined herein, will be used as springboard to implement programs that will decrease court congestion, stress, and more importantly, provide a voice for those who would otherwise remain a space in our ever growing justice gap.

1. Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT)

The State Bar should study the design of a pilot program, in one subject matter area, and, with input from the California Supreme Court and the Judicial Council at the early stages rather than after the design is completed. Because of the profound regulatory impact such a program may have, the State Bar should also address how the issues of governance, oversight and licensing would be handled.

Other considerations discussed were as follows.

- Narrow subject matter. Some of the subject matter areas suggested by the Task Force members were landlord-tenant, limited jurisdiction consumer cases, and family law (specifically, domestic violence cases).

²⁸ Vision and Action in Our Modern Courts, Jonathan Lippman, Chief Judge of the State of New York, The State of the Judiciary, 2014

- Regulation. If the State Bar is to be considered as a regulatory body, then its General Counsel must research whether there are potential anti-trust issues. Other entities mentioned as a possible regulatory agency for limited license technicians were the Department of Consumer Affairs and the California Supreme Court.
- Timeline. The Task Force believes it is necessary for the State Bar to establish a realistic time frame as to when a LLLT concept can be developed and implemented.
- Commission on the Future of the Courts. The State Bar should keep the Commission on the Future of the Courts abreast of the LLLT progress.
- LLLT Qualifications/Costs: The Washington State LLLT requirements are quite rigid and perhaps cost prohibitive. The state of Washington has approximately 30,000 lawyers on its rolls. In addition, the state has three primary cities-- Seattle, Yakima and Spokane. The Washington State Bar is working in conjunction with the four law schools in that state and their local community colleges and universities in establishing a curriculum. Attached, herein, is a document entitled, "Pathway to LLLT Admission". The minimum qualifications require an associate level degree and 3,000 hours of substantive law related experience (18 months). It was believed that the costs associated with acquiring an associate degree may ultimately be handed down to the consumer. The number of hours applied towards experience should be considered carefully. Regardless, should the State Bar adopt a similar program, it should take into consideration the immediate need for assistance at this time as well as the length of time it may take to get a successful program off the ground.
- Testing: The Task Force believes that LLLT's should complete an examination prior to licensing.

2. Alternative Business Structures

The State Bar should conduct an on-going review of ABS, with particular attention to the impact on pro-bono and public impact litigation as well as their regulatory structure in jurisdictions that adopt these practices. Until this information is available to consider and understand, the State Bar should not proceed with new rules or programs.

3. Systems Re-Engineering

Systems re-engineering can be interpreted as a broad or narrow concept. With that in mind, the task force recommends a pilot project perhaps in landlord-tenant law or low-level consumer cases. The task force recommends the use of a joint working group of members of the bar, the courts, court users, and perhaps relevant social scientist and tech people, to explore how our legal system can be redesigned to:

- streamline the process,
- make the legal process easier to use, and
- provide protection for the litigant's rights.

The Task Force further recommends that the State Bar work in concert with the Supreme Court and the newly formed Futures Commission which is currently reviewing the legal and structural challenges in maintaining the efficiency of California Courts.

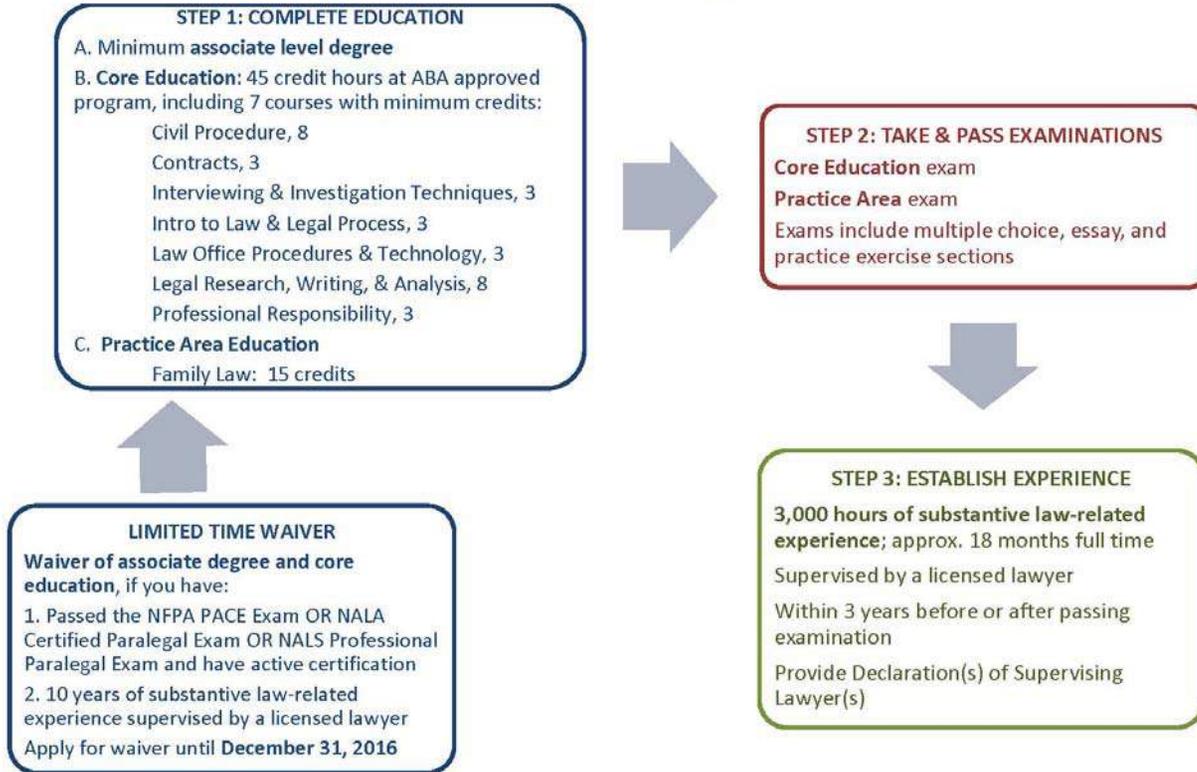

4. Navigators

A pilot program should be designed to operate in one or more self-help centers to provide volunteer assistance to self-represented litigants in attending hearings. Permission should be requested to have the navigator sit at counsel table with the litigant, but not to address the court unless otherwise asked by the court to assist. Based on experience in other jurisdictions, the focus should be on this as a volunteer program, not as a for-profit method of assistance.

- Training: A training model exists which can be implemented to educate Navigators on the California Family Law procedures and practice. The training model is that used by the Self-Help Centers.
- It is recommended that Navigators be knowledgeable in the preparation of court orders and other documents.
- It is recommended that Navigators be sensitive to cultural needs.
- It is recommended that the State Bar keep both the Supreme Court and the Futures Commission abreast of the design and development of this program.
- Volunteer sources: AmeriCorps, law students, community colleges and universities, and other private universities.

LAW SCHOOL DEBT REPORT

The “Law School Debt Group” examined the intersection of law school debt and access to justice.

STUDENT DEBT CHAPTER

A. INTRODUCTION

1. The Disturbing Facts and Figures

In California today, the average student debt for law school graduates as they enter the profession is in excess of $134,000²⁹ and the amount of money borrowed by law students has more than doubled over the past ten years.³⁰ These figures have been driven in no small part by the escalating cost of law schools at levels that have far outpaced inflation. The rise in the cost of a law degree is particularly concerning in a state such as ours, which has numerous public institutions of higher learning; the cost of public law school tuition have increased by a factor of eight over the past two decades.³¹ Law students who matriculate from private law schools fare no better. Nationally, private law schools have increased tuition by a factor of four in real (inflation-adjusted) dollars over the last 40 years.³²

While law school debt has been on the rise, we have not seen a commensurate increase in starting salaries for young lawyers. Over the past 15 years, median starting salaries for lawyers in solo and small firm practices, legal services, and the public sector have increased by fewer than 50%.³³ And as recent studies have made clear, even in the wake of an improving economy, far too many of our law school graduates face the prospect of no employment in the legal sector for months (or even years) after graduation.³⁴

This troubling scenario is not simply a concern faced by a few – 87% of our state’s law school graduates leave their years of schooling facing significant student debt.³⁵ For lawyers who entered the profession in past decades, these figures are almost unimaginable. For our newest lawyers, this debt can factor into the professional choices they make and the career path they take. Some may opt to forego a career in lower paid positions that might allow them to serve low or modest means clients; others may feel pressure to minimize pro bono and “nonpaying” work; and still others may elect to leave the legal profession entirely in an effort to secure any employment that can enable them to cover their student debt.³⁶ Indeed, a recent ABA study found that nearly one-third of 2013 law school graduates had no full time bar-required or JD-preferred work and 11% of that graduating class was unemployed as of a year after graduation.³⁷

²⁹ See Which law school graduates have the most debt?, U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT: 2015 BEST LAW SCHOOLS, <http://grad-schools.usnews.rankingsandreviews.com/best-graduate-schools/top-law-schools/grad-debt-rankings> (last visited Oct. 9, 2014) (averaging debts of California law schools).

This state of affairs may be driving prospective talent away from even considering law school. A recent Wisconsin Task Force study determined that a disheartening 40% of law school graduates surveyed would not choose to attend law school, given what they now know, if they had the choice to make over again.³⁸ As these sentiments take hold, it is not surprising that law school enrollment figures have dropped over the past few years.³⁹

2. Broader Implications for Our Community

As troubling as the law school debt picture may be for our newest generation of lawyers, these concerns are not ones that should be viewed as a self-interested “young lawyer only” problem. Although hard data on the full impact of escalating student debt has yet to be compiled, there are sound reasons to view this issue as one that impacts our entire community. Those concerns have been well documented in a number of recent reports by esteemed groups that have studied these issues in other parts of the nation and were also thematically presented by individuals who shared their perspectives with our Task Force (as discussed more fully below). In particular, the impact of student debt on our broader community arises in three contexts: access to justice, public protection, and enhancing the diversity of the legal profession. Each of these issues is integral to the State Bar’s core mission and fundamentally impacts the public, whose interests our organization is committed to protect.

a. Access to Justice and Justice Gap Concerns

³⁵ See U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT, supra note 1.

³⁶ These sentiments were seen in the survey presented to the Task Force by the CYLA on Aug. 26, 2014 (on file with Civil Justice Strategies Task Force). These same concerns were memorialized in Task Force reports and hearings held in Illinois, Wisconsin and New York. See Challenges Facing New Lawyers Task Force, State Bar of Wisconsin, Challenges Facing New Lawyers Task Force Report and Recommendations 7 (November 2013), <http://taxprof.typepad.com/files/challenges-facing-new-lawYers-task-force-report.pdf> [hereinafter Wisconsin Report]; Committee on Legal Education and Admission to the Bar, Association of the Bar of the City of New York, Law School Debt and the Practice of Law n.23, <http://www.nycbar.org/pdf/report/lawSchoolDebt.pdf> [hereinafter New York Report]; See Illinois Report, supra note 6, at 1-2., as described herein.

Student debt restricts the ability of lawyers to pursue career options that would enable them to serve the needs of low and modest means clients and, as such, exacerbates access to justice and justice gap concerns. A recent Illinois Task Force report observed that the “law school debt crisis is having a serious and negative impact on the quality and availability of legal services that the legal profession provides.”⁴⁰ Moreover, the report observed that “significant student debt makes it difficult to obtain a loan” – financing that new attorneys seeking to open a solo practice may require.⁴¹ Another recent report similarly concluded:

[T]he burden of law school debt can distort the employment choices of young attorneys. Small firms, particularly those in rural areas face greater difficulty hiring and retaining competent attorneys. Fewer lawyers are able to sustain a career working in low-paying public interest jobs.⁴²

While recent changes in federal law have created law school debt relief programs that base loan repayment amounts on income levels and also seek to alleviate the loan repayment burden for lawyers who work in the legal services or public interest arena, some of these programs are not available to lawyers who opt to work as community lawyers and focus their practice on low or modest means clients. Nor is there equally advantageous debt forgiveness or support for lawyers who seek to practice as solo practitioners or as part of an incubator model. One relief program discharges student loan debt made or guaranteed against default by the U.S. government after 20 years, but the program only provides relief for certain types of loans—not private student loans.

b. Public Protection Concerns

The burden of law school debt can also trigger public protection concerns, an issue at the heart of the Bar’s mission.

Lawyers have the dubious distinction of having the highest student loan default rates among graduate students – with a lifetime cumulative default rate estimated at between 15 and 20 percent.⁴³ Some have expressed concerns that these defaults, and the fiscal pressures facing young lawyers, can create pressure to engage in risky professional behavior, especially for young lawyers.

As a recent ABA Young Lawyers Division Report (the “ABA YLD Report”) observed, “[l]awyers burdened by debt face greater pressures and temptations to violate ethics

⁴⁰ See Illinois Report, supra note 6.

⁴¹ See Illinois Report, supra note 6, at 21.

⁴² See ABA YLD Report, supra note 3, at 3.

⁴³ See New York Report, supra note 8, at 8.

rules.”⁴⁴ Similar concerns regarding the impact of law school debt on the quality of legal services were articulated by the Illinois State Bar Task Force Report: “attorneys with heavy debt loads may be more likely to commit ethics violations. The greatest pressures are on solo practitioners, who may take work beyond their competency, face financial pressures to prolong litigation, or terminate a representation inappropriately if a client has difficulty paying.”⁴⁵

c. Diversity of the Legal Profession

Finally, the issue of student debt necessarily impacts our community through the adverse impact these financial concerns can have on the diversity of our law schools, and in turn the diversity within our profession. As aptly noted in the ABA YLD Report:

[T]he high cost of a legal education creates additional barriers to entry for Blacks and Hispanics, who generally receive less support from their families to attend law school. The rapid rise in law school tuition is therefore one of the factors holding the legal profession back from embodying the full spectrum of diverse backgrounds in America.⁴⁶

For all of these reasons, the time is ripe to bring attention to the ever-increasing law school debt, examine the role that the State Bar can play in addressing these concerns, and look for ways to enhance information gathering and engagement by the Bar moving forward. Indeed, by putting a spotlight on this issue and seeking solutions that can alleviate existing concerns, our State Bar will be joining a mounting focus on this issue at a national level, as well as in other states. Our voice can help guide the thinking and solutions that are being crafted across the nation and ensure that the valuable perspectives -- and concerns -- of our state are part of this important dialogue. Undoubtedly, these actions will benefit not simply our newest generation of lawyers, but our entire community.

B. TESTIMONY PRESENTED TO, AND INFORMATION ACQUIRED BY, THE TASK FORCE

1. The Task Force’s Information Gathering

a. Witnesses Interviewed and Materials Reviewed

The Task Force interviewed a diverse group of state and national experts, and reviewed and analyzed numerous reports, articles, statutes, and proposed legislation related to law school debt and access to justice.

⁴⁴ See ABA YLD Report, supra note 3, at 3.

⁴⁵ See Illinois Report, supra note 6, at 2.

⁴⁶ See ABA YLD Report, supra note 3, at 3.

In addition to the witnesses who testified over the course of two Task Force hearings,⁴⁷ the individuals interviewed included: Barry Currier, ABA Managing Director of Accreditation & Legal Education; Justice Ann Jorgensen, Co-Chair Illinois State Bar Association Special Committee on the Impact of Law School Debt on the Delivery of Legal Services; Kathleen Smith, Senior Vice President of Access Group; Neil Thapar and Janelle Orsi, Sustainable Economies Law Center; and Daniel Thies, ABA Young Lawyers Division. (A list of the materials reviewed and analyzed by the Task Force is attached hereto as Appendix ___, Law School Debt Background & Research Materials.)

b. CYLA Information Gathering

The California Young Lawyers Association (CYLA) is the nation's largest association of young lawyers, comprised of over 40,000 members who have either been in practice for five years or less or are 36 years old or younger. The Civil Justice Strategies Task Force invited CYLA to present testimony and information gathered from its members about the effects of crippling law school debt on California's newest generation of lawyers. CYLA testified that the issue of law school debt, including whether young lawyers are being prevented from entering public service or performing pro bono work as a result of their indebtedness burden, is of great concern to its members.

CYLA performed a student debt survey, collecting a myriad of information from its 20 member Board, which is comprised of young lawyers from all over the State. The survey contained questions regarding whether the attorney graduated with law school debt and whether the individual presently had debt; the amount of that debt; whether the attorney received governmental assistance, or credit/loan forgiveness from his or her employer; whether debt prevented the attorney from a career in public interest law; whether the attorney actively engages in pro bono work; and any suggestions as to how the State Bar could assist future law school graduates. The results of this survey were telling. Among those surveyed, the average student loan debt was $100,000. Only one attorney received governmental assistance (through the GI bill) and none of those surveyed had received credit/loan forgiveness from an employer. A staggering 42% of those surveyed confirmed that their law school debt prevented them from embarking on a career in public interest law.

At the Task Force's August hearing, CYLA representatives testified and recounted the perspectives of young lawyers they had heard from as part of their research. These statements underscore the impact debt has on career choices.

I wanted to be a public defender when I went to law school and completed several externships in government legal offices. I also did a lot of course work in juvenile law issues during law school, and would've considered the right legal aid job in that area of law. It's simply impractical for me to work in the public interest/service sector with the amount of debt I have.

⁴⁷ See Appendix B: Panelists & Witnesses at the Hearings on Civil Justice Strategies: June 18, 2014 hearing and August 26, 2014 hearing.

** ** *

I can barely afford my loan payments working at a medium sized firm that pays well. I would love to consider doing something in the public interest sector but my loans have prevented me from even considering this as an option.

c. State Bar Informal Survey

The State Bar similarly engaged in a process of polling its members. An informal multiple-choice poll on the topic of student debt was circulated as part of the California Bar Journal electronic newsletter on August 1, 2014. The poll asked readers: “What level of debt did you have when you finished law school?” Of the 702 responses recorded online by August 11th, 16.95% chose the category “Less than $25,000”; 9.26% chose the category “$25,000 to $50,000”; 19.37% chose the category “$50,000 to $100,000”; 38.60% chose the category “More than $100,000”; and 15.81% chose the category “None.” (Poll percentages changed slightly as more audience members weighed in during subsequent days.) Admittedly this poll, with self-selecting participation, was unscientific; it nonetheless provided another item of information that the Task Force was able to consider.

2. Common themes from our August Hearing

Certain themes emerged during testimony the Task Force heard at its hearing on August 26, 2014. While some of these accounts were anecdotal, the voices we gathered together included leading experts from around the nation. Moreover, the messages we heard from these individuals were consistent with findings made by other Task Forces that have studied this issue in different parts of the country (as discussed herein). The themes that arose during the testimony are summarized below.

a. Law school cost and the student debt problem have escalated in recent years and are a serious concern

Dean Linda Bisesi, Assistant Dean for Financial Aid at UC Hastings:

“We're kind of typical for a state school. . . . The average amount that a law student will pay in one year is over $70,000 and if they were to borrow all of that, the cost is $213,000 over a three-year period. So this does have a burdensome effect on students and it does cause them to give thought as to whether or not they want to incur the cost that is required in order to join the profession.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 36-38.

Travis Thompson, President of the Business Law Association at Golden Gate University School of Law:

“I wouldn't be telling the truth if I didn't say I'm pretty scared right now.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 89.

Nathaniel Lucey, CYLA Special Advisor and former Board Member:

“[A]s you have this increase in debt over ten years, over a 50 percent increase in debt, wages for first-year attorneys have basically stagnated.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 75.

b. These issues have the potential to impact career choices

Nathaniel Lucey, CYLA Special Advisor and former Board Member:

“[T]he increased cost of law school is making public sector and public interest work not feasible for the average graduate.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 76.

Travis Thompson, President of the Business Law Association at Golden Gate University School of Law:

“I'm not looking seriously into the public interest sector or any type [of] government employment, simply just running the numbers, if you will; I wouldn't be able to afford it. I've centered my search on any type of corporate tax position that may be available in the local area.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 89-90.

Shavonte Keaton, President of the Black Law Students Association at Golden Gate University School of Law:

“[M]y dilemma throughout law school is balancing whether or not I wanted to go into public interest after law school, knowing that I'm going to come out of law school with $200,000 in debt. . . . My whole dilemma through law school has been whether I'm going to still pursue a public interest career.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 92.

c. Navigating and managing student debt is intensely complicated

“[T]he programs are so complicated, so convoluted, the system is difficult to navigate that I think the programs are far less useful and effective than they might be, but they do exist.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 12.

Dean Linda Bisesi, Assistant Dean for Financial Aid at UC Hastings:

“The portfolio can be quite complex and students often are not equipped to really understand the complexity of it.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 41.

“So I think you're beginning to see the complexity of the loan repayment – of the loan portfolio and you might be able to imagine then, a student as they get ready to go into repayment how confusing this could be.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 45.

Emily Aldrich, CYLA Chair:

“We're a savvy population. We're going into a very savvy career and yet this – they are very complicated, these programs, and it's very hard to kind of understand what you're getting into and then it goes to a loan provider and you're getting information from – mine is Great Lakes – and you don't know what's going on. I think education is key for new and young lawyers.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 84.

d. Information and assistance to law school students or young lawyers isn't always readily available

Heather Jarvis, Student Loan Expert:

“In my view, the objective assistance and information for student loan borrowers is completely inadequate. . . . I think schools are less focused on providing support for their graduates when it comes to selecting repayment options than they are in providing the financial aid to begin with. . . . It needs to be simplified considerably. . . . I think that schools can and should invest more in providing the resources that would be necessary to give more personalized advice to their graduates.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 18-19.

Dean Linda Bisesi, Assistant Dean for Financial Aid at UC Hastings:

“I think you're beginning to see the complexity of the loan repayment -- of the loan portfolio and you might be able to imagine then, a student as they get ready to go into repayment how confusing this could be. Where do they even find the information that they need to determine what their interest rate is and what it has been over time and if they have undergraduate debt and graduate debt, it is very complex. . . . You know, we want to help them. This is our passion. We've all been students. We want to help students and we want them to understand this and we are in a unique position as administrators to understand the mechanics of all this and how it works and be able to explain it to students, but it adds a burden on us to do this, so therein lies the catch for us.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 45.

“So my point in saying all of this is that there are nuances that can work against a student if you don't know that they're there....

This goes back to the counseling and you've asked about how important the counseling is.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 49.

Professor Eleanor Lumsden, Associate Professor of Law at Golden Gate University:

“There is mandatory entrance and exit counseling, but I will echo what everyone else has said, there is not enough counseling. There's not enough counseling, but, again, we're strapped.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 61-62.

e. We need to do more to develop the narrative, put a spotlight on this issue, and gather key data

Chris Chapman, President and Chief Executive Officer of Access Group:

“I think the first thing that needs to be done is you need to develop a narrative, a narrative that states the case for the activities that you wish to achieve. Nobody argues about access to justice. . . . You have to have the narrative. I believe the narrative is there. You just have to make it, both from a qualitative standpoint and a quantitative standpoint.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 34.

f. Existing loan forgiveness and repayment programs aren't fully adequate

“[S]tudent loan borrowers [who have their loans forgiven] have the possibility of significant tax bills at the end of their repayment period.”

8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 11.

“Public service loan forgiveness is available for those who work full time for pay in government positions at all levels of government, state, local, federal, tribal governments and it's available for people who work in 501(c)

(3) nonprofit organizations, plus a few narrowly defined organizations, but all of them being nonprofit, so there is no for profit structure in which someone would qualify for public service loan forgiveness.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 16.

Dean Linda Bisesi, Assistant Dean for Financial Aid at UC Hastings:

“[S]mall solo practitioners, family law, people that are not a 501(c) (3) or a government agency, but have low income are not provided any relief in the Public Service Loan Forgiveness Program. . . Somebody like this does not reap any benefits from the federal repayment assistance. And then there are some states that have the Public Interest Loan Forgiveness Programs, but California does not.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 51.

Professor Eleanor Lumsden, Associate Professor of Law at Golden Gate University:

“[V]ery few loan repayment assistance programs extend beyond work that consists of legal services work, public interest or government service.”
8/26/14 hearing transcript, p. 60.

C. RECOMMENDATIONS

One of the biggest challenges for the Task Force was to identify how the State Bar can impact what is an admittedly complex and far reaching problem. The recommendations below provide our best thinking in regard to proposed recommendations, but we also believe that further consideration as to the Bar’s most effective role in this area is appropriate. To that end, we encourage the Bar to view this work as the start rather than the end of a process. We hope that the Bar’s leadership will create a vehicle for implementation of these recommendations as well as ongoing consideration of ways to address the multitude of concerns associated with the crisis of overwhelming student loan debt.

1. The Bar should serve as a clearinghouse of information on student debt management and repayment programs

The Task Force heard in no uncertain terms about the complexities of student debt management as well as the knowledge gaps among law school students and young lawyers in regard to this issue. While some law schools are proactive in their efforts to educate students about student debt, there is no uniform set of standards in regard to either law school counseling or law school loan repayment programs.

The Bar can help fill this void by working with state and national experts and organizations (including Access Group) to improve the level of understanding among law students and new lawyers in regard to these complex issues. The Bar can also serve as a clearinghouse of available information. While the Bar’s website has some useful information for “future lawyers” (see <http://admissions.calbar.ca.gov/>) – including a list of California law schools and requirements for admission to practice law – there is no information on key questions to ask in regard to student debt, financial literacy, and repayment programs. Nor are there links to other resources on these topics, or information on Bar Foundation grants and resources that can help law students or struggling graduates pay for or help defray the costs of tuition and/or bar review courses.

We recommend that the Bar reach out to others developing useful resources (including Access Group), provide a centralized place on the Bar website to enable lawyers to find and access key information and statistics (including material gathered during the Task Force’s tenure), offer a vehicle for prospective law students to assess differences among California law schools in regard to loan forgiveness programs, and create a platform for information sharing on an ongoing basis. This enhanced compilation of information could also include financial literacy worksheets for prospective or current law school students that can assist them in assessing the extent of debt they might reasonably consider taking on.

2. Working through CYLA, the Bar should develop mechanisms and new approaches to assist young lawyers to better understand and proactively address the implications of their student debt obligations

CYLA was an enthusiastic contributor to the work of the Task Force and has expressed its interest in remaining engaged in next steps. There is an invaluable ongoing contribution that CYLA can make by prioritizing this issue and developing a plan over the next two years to create educational programming, fact sheets, counseling and peer advisors, and other mechanisms for enhancing the understanding of new lawyers in regard to management of their student debt. CYLA should also consider ways to reach out to and work with undergraduate pre-law advisors, law schools and local bar associations to promote collaborative efforts that would advance enhanced information for, and education of, prospective and current law students about the importance of appropriate, informed and responsible borrowing

3. The Bar should continue to put a spotlight on the issue of law school debt, promote an enhanced understanding of the link between student debt and the broader community's access to justice and public safety concerns, and assist others working to study, quantify and better define the implications of student loan indebtedness

The work of this Task Force, and the hearing on law student debt held in August 2014, marked the first visible engagement by the State Bar in educating the community about the broader public concerns that are implicated when lawyers enter the legal profession burdened with over $100,000 in student debt. It is our hope that this hearing will not be the only opportunity for this issue to receive public attention and discourse. In particular, there are a host of ways that Bar leadership and staff can continue to promote a deeper understanding of this issue and its import – through articles and speaking opportunities, development of educational materials, adding pertinent information to the Bar website, and other Bar outreach techniques. Simply helping to promote and define a narrative that underscores the broader public concerns triggered by mounting law school debt are valuable efforts in an area that for too long has been viewed as a self-interested “lawyer only” concern.

There is also an effort afoot nationally by groups including the ABA and Access Group to study and gather data in regard to the broader implications of law student debt. The State Bar should consider ways to assist these organizations and bring California’s voice into the forefront as this fact finding process continues. The Bar, in turn, can benefit from the perspectives and new ideas generated during the ongoing national consideration of these issues.

4. The Bar should work through its discipline arm and endeavor to assess whether student debt is precipitating or contributing to lawyer misconduct

The potential for crushing student debt to result in defaults, financial problems, and/or ethical violations is an appropriate concern for the Bar and the public we are charged with protecting. Yet not enough is known in regard to the actual impact of student debt on discipline violations and attorney misconduct. Having a deeper understanding of this information, and establishing preventative measures and other responses that might address these concerns, would further the Bar’s core mission of public protection and enable the Bar to put in place efforts that might help avoid attorney misconduct before it occurs.

With these objectives in mind, the Bar should encourage its discipline arms – the Regulation and Discipline Committee as well as the Office of Chief Trial Counsel – to explore ways to assess whether discipline actions related to these concerns are arising and, if so, what preventative strategies might be in order.⁴⁸

5. The Bar should use both its law school regulatory power as well as its established relationships with law school leaders to encourage enhanced counseling, strategies and disclosures regarding student debt

The Bar has a strong relationship with the many law schools in our state – both through its regulatory role and as a result of its ongoing work with law schools on a host of issues and reforms. While some law schools have instituted impressive individualized loan debt counseling for students, there is no established set of ⁴⁸ Possible preventative strategies might include financial literacy support and training for those lawyers who are facing financial and economic stresses. Similar strategies that seek to address the root cause of disciplinary problems and thereby prevent future misconduct have been employed by the Lawyer Referral Assistance Program in the context of lawyers who find themselves in the disciplinary system due to substance abuse issues or other external pressures.

standards or best practices.

Working with key law school leaders, the Bar should endeavor to create and encourage schools to implement a set of best practices that would include:

- a. Individualized counseling for students, prospective students and recent graduates at all stages – including before, during, as they near completion of, and immediately upon graduation from, their law school tenure – on topics such as calculating total law school costs, loan consolidation and refinancing strategies, true (and hidden) loan costs, and other nuances of managing their debt;
- b. Financial literacy counseling and guidance as part of law school admissions and orientation processes;
- c. The creation of a loan “ombudsman” to serve as a point of contact for law students as well as alumni on this issue;
- d. Expansion of LRAP programs beyond public interest and public service attorneys to include attorneys in small or solo practices focused on addressing the needs of low and modest means clients; and
- e. Public disclosure and tracking requirements that help ensure complete and accurate information regarding (i) law school costs, (ii) student debt statistics and alumni default rates, and (iii) accurate post-graduation law-related employment figures and prospects.

6. The State Bar should consider ways to add its voice to the national dialogue seeking to develop new and enhanced loan forgiveness and repayment approaches

There are a host of national efforts to protect existing favorable student loan and income based repayment programs and also to promote new approaches in this arena. At the same time, the ABA is studying how to best address the increased cost of law school as well as mounting student debt. The Bar’s voice and perspectives can be an invaluable part of this national dialogue.

Issues where the Bar may wish to consider engagement include:

- Expanding favorable public service loan forgiveness and repayment programs beyond public interest and legal services attorneys to include community and solo practitioners who are focused on representation of low and modest means clients;
- Eliminating the higher interest rates associated with graduate student loans (the so-called graduate student loan “penalty”);
- Allowing for the repayment of loans with before tax monies;
- Addressing “hidden” loan costs;
- Eliminating the accrual of interest during law school;

- Creating an interest free loan deferral period after graduation so lawyer have a longer period to get on their feet, pass the bar and embark on their careers; and
- Basing federal loan availability on the law school's employment track record or other benchmarks that reflect the employability of the school's graduates.⁴⁹

In addition to these national policy discussions, the Bar should explore with the ABA possible ways to help provide financial literacy and student debt information to prospective law school students as part of the law school admissions process. The Bar should also encourage the CYLA to work with the national YLD to create a "future lawyers" clearinghouse with key student debt information and links to state bar websites that contain useful student debt, financial literacy and debt planning information.

7. The State Bar should help encourage new and innovative models that seek to address law school cost concerns

Rising law school costs are a significant concern in our state as well as nationally. The Task Force does not profess to have the answers to resolve these concerns. We did, however, hear about models that seek to consolidate the total number of years required to achieve a law school degree. Innovative models such as the 3+3 program – whereby colleges and law schools partner to allow undergraduates to receive credit toward law school graduation and thereby achieve both a Bachelors and Law degree in 6 (rather than the usual 7) years – are an intriguing vehicle for reducing law school costs. Also of interest to the Task Force is the New York "Legal Scholars" program whereby students are able to take the Bar at the end of their first semester of their 3L year and spend their final half year getting practical legal services job experience. We believe that these are models that should be closely studied by the Bar and its law school regulatory arm. The Bar should help encourage innovative thinking in this area and do what it can to highlight, encourage and, when appropriate, consider vehicles that might eliminate barriers to the development of new models.

8. The Board of Trustees should create a group to implement these recommendations

As noted above, there is a need for ongoing strategic thinking in regard to how the Bar – through its staff and leaders – can best impact change in regard to the concerning issue of student debt. With national discussions ensuing, the Bar can also be instrumental in tapping national experts and helping guide national perspectives on this vitally important topic. These national efforts may also identify new thinking and innovative approaches that would suggest additional strategies that the Bar might want to explore. The recommendations set forth above would benefit from the direction and oversight of a committed group of individuals who could work with Bar staff, CYLA and law schools in charting and implementing next steps.

This issue is one of concern not simply to our profession, but more broadly to our community as a whole. While the Task Force was able to make great strides in its short tenure and identified some concrete areas for effective engagement by the Bar, more work remains to be done to have a meaningful and lasting impact on this landscape.

ORDER IMPLEMENTING LEGAL PARAPROFESSIONAL PILOT PROJECT

The Implementation Committee for the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project was established in 2019 to evaluate the delivery of legal services in areas of unmet civil legal needs, particularly in the areas of family law, landlord-tenant disputes, or debtor-creditor disputes. The committee was directed to define the structure and rules to implement a pilot project for the delivery of civil legal services by legal paraprofessionals under the supervision of a licensed Minnesota attorney. See In re Implementation Committee for Proposed Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project, No. ADM19-8002, Order at 2–3 (Minn. filed Mar. 8, 2019).

The Implementation Committee filed a report on March 2, 2020, recommending that a pilot project be established to evaluate the expanded use of legal paraprofessionals in providing legal services in two substantive legal areas: landlord-tenant disputes and family law disputes. We opened a public comment period; eleven comments were filed. We held a public hearing on August 11, 2020, at which the co-chair of the Implementation Committee, Judge John Rodenberg, spoke. Representatives of the Minnesota Paralegal Association, the National Federal Paralegal Association, and Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid, along with attorney Peter Swanson, also presented remarks.

We directed the Implementation Committee to develop a plan to implement a pilot project to evaluate the use of legal paraprofessionals, supervised by an attorney, in certain family law and landlord-tenant case types. The committee's report provides that plan. We have carefully considered the comments filed during the public comment period that express disagreement with a decision we have already made: to proceed forward with a pilot project. We appreciate the views and concerns expressed in these comments, but ultimately, we conclude that the point of a pilot project is to test the assumptions that underlie our decision: that the need for civil legal aid, particularly in the areas of family law and landlord-tenants disputes is great, and that legal paraprofessionals can contribute to the legal needs of Minnesota citizens in these areas.

Based upon all the files, records, and proceedings herein,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED THAT:

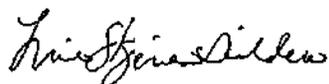

1. The attached amendments to the Supervised Practice Rules are promulgated. The effective date of the amendments shall be March 1, 2021.
2. The pilot project to evaluate use of legal paraprofessionals shall be administered by a Standing Committee, to which appointments will be made by December 1, 2020. Among other tasks, the Standing Committee shall oversee implementation of the pilot project, review applications for certification submitted by paraprofessionals, evaluate whether the pilot project satisfies the goal of improving access to legal services, and prepare an interim report and a final report on the pilot project.
3. The Standing Committee is directed to work with the State Court Administrator or his designee to establish procedures to monitor, evaluate and report on the pilot project. On or before December 31, 2021, the committee shall file an interim status report on the pilot project with recommendations for any further rule amendments or other refinements to the pilot project. On or before January 17, 2023, the committee shall file a final status report on the pilot project that includes recommendations for continuation, abandonment, or modification of the pilot project, or for permanent codification of the rules for the pilot project.

4. Unless extended by further order of this court, the pilot project shall end and the Supervised Practice Rules that govern the pilot project shall expire on March 31, 2023.

AMENDMENTS TO THE SUPERVISED PRACTICE RULES

[The text of Rule 12 is entirely new and therefore is shown without underlining]

Supervised Practice Rules

* * * *

Rule 12. Authorized Practice by Legal Paraprofessionals in Pilot Project

Rule 12.01 Scope of Work

An eligible legal paraprofessional may, under the supervision of a member of the bar, provide the following services:

- (a) Provide advice to and appear in court on behalf of tenants in housing disputes as defined in Minnesota Statutes Chapter 504B and Minnesota Statutes § 484.014. Eligible legal paraprofessionals may only provide such services in district courts that have established a Housing Court or a dedicated calendar for housing disputes, except that eligible legal paraprofessionals shall not appear in Housing Court in the Fourth Judicial District.
- (b) Provide advice to and appear in court on behalf of clients in family law cases, but such services shall be limited to advice and hearings related to child-support modifications, parenting-time disputes, and paternity matters. With the approval of the supervising attorney, legal paraprofessionals may also appear in court in family law cases for the following purposes: (1) default hearings, (2) pretrial hearings, and (3) informal family court proceedings. Legal paraprofessionals may also appear with a client in family law mediations where, in the judgment of the supervising lawyer, the issues are limited to less complex matters, which may include simple property divisions, parenting-time matters, and spousal-support determinations. Under no circumstances shall a legal paraprofessional provide advice or appear in court or at a mediation under this paragraph if the family law case involves allegations of domestic abuse or child abuse.
- (c) With authorization from the supervising attorney, prepare and file a limited set of documents identified in Appendix 1 to these rules without the supervising attorney's final review.

Communications between the client and the eligible legal paraprofessional shall be privileged under the same rules that govern the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine.

For each case where a legal paraprofessional will appear in court on behalf of the client, the certificate of representation for the matter must identify both the supervising attorney and the legal paraprofessional. The legal paraprofessional may sign the certificate of representation, but must include with the filed certificate of representation a statement signed by the supervising attorney that authorizes the legal paraprofessional to appear in court. The signed authorization must identify the types of proceedings for which the legal paraprofessional is authorized to provide services and the starting and ending dates during which the paralegal is authorized to appear in court.

Rule 12.02 Eligible Legal Paraprofessionals

An eligible legal paraprofessional must meet the following requirements:

(a) Education and Work Experience Requirements. To participate in the pilot project, a legal paraprofessional must have the following education or work experience:

- (1) an Associate's or Bachelor's Degree in paralegal studies from an institutionally accredited school; or
- (2) a paralegal certificate from an institutionally accredited school in addition to an Associate's or Bachelor's degree in any subject from an institutionally accredited school; or
- (3) a law degree from an ABA accredited school; or
- (4) a high school diploma and 5 years of substantive paralegal experience.

(b) Ethics and Continuing Legal Education Requirements. To participate in the pilot project, a legal paraprofessional must satisfy the following ethics and continuing education requirements:

- (1) hold Minnesota Certified Paralegal credentials from the Minnesota Paralegal Association; or
- (2) provide proof that the legal paraprofessional has earned ten continuing legal education credits, including two credit hours in ethics, within the two years prior to seeking certification under Rule 12.04(a); or
- (3) provide proof that the legal paraprofessional has obtained a paralegal studies degree or certificate, or a juris doctorate within the two years prior to seeking certification under Rule 12.04(a). Such a program must include an ethics component.

(c) Written Agreement with a Supervisory Attorney. To participate in the pilot project, a legal paraprofessional must enter into a written agreement with a licensed Minnesota attorney who agrees to serve as the paralegal's supervisory attorney. The written agreement must set forth the scope and types of work the legal paraprofessional may undertake consistent with the scope of the pilot project and the steps the supervisory attorney will take to ensure that the paralegal is serving the client's interests.

(d) Roster of Approved Legal Paraprofessionals. To participate in the pilot project, a legal paraprofessional must remain in good standing on the roster of approved legal paraprofessionals established and maintained by the Standing Committee on the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project.

Rule 12.03 Supervisory Attorney

The attorney who supervises a legal paraprofessional authorized to participate in the pilot project shall:

- (a) be a member in good standing of the bar of this court;
- (b) assume personal professional responsibility for and supervision of the legal paraprofessional's work, including court appearances;
- (c) assist the legal paraprofessional to the extent necessary, and sign all pleadings;
- (d) carry malpractice insurance that will sufficiently cover the attorney's supervision of the legal paraprofessional and the work and actions of the supervised legal paraprofessional, or ensure that the legal paraprofessional has secured adequate malpractice insurance; and
- (e) execute a written agreement that establishes the terms of the supervised legal paraprofessional's work and the supervision conditions.

Rule 12.04 Standing Committee for Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project.

The Standing Committee for the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project shall establish, in collaboration with the State Court Administrator, procedures as follows:

- (a) for certifying legal paraprofessionals as authorized to participate in the pilot project and establishing and maintaining a public roster of legal paraprofessionals eligible to participate in the pilot project;
- (b) for evaluating the results and outcome of the pilot project and making further recommendations to the Supreme Court; and
- (c) for submitting, reviewing, investigating, and resolving complaints made against legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys, including removing legal paraprofessionals from the roster and prohibiting supervising attorneys from participating in the pilot project if there is a good cause to do so. Rostered legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys shall cooperate with standing committee investigations and failure to cooperate may be the basis for removal from the pilot project.

I. INTRODUCTION

In March 2019, the Minnesota Supreme Court issued an Order establishing the Implementation Committee for Proposed Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project. (See Appendix A) The Order gratefully acknowledged the prior work of the Alternative Legal Models Task Force (Task Force), convened by the Minnesota State Bar Association (MSBA). The Order authorized the Implementation Committee (Committee) to expand on one of the Task Force’s recommendations and to develop a pilot project that would permit legal paraprofessionals to provide legal advice to clients, and in some instances represent them in court, under the supervision of a licensed Minnesota attorney. The purpose of the Order is to provide greater access to justice for low- and modest-income litigants in civil cases, especially in circumstances where high rates of self-representation are common.

The Order charged the Committee with defining the “format, structure, rules, and implementation of a pilot project for the delivery of civil legal services by legal paraprofessionals.” This charge included the express objective of serving clients with unmet legal needs in housing, family law, or debtor-creditor disputes. A March 2019 news statement issued by the Minnesota Judicial Branch announced the establishment of the Committee and provided data illustrating the frequency of disproportionate representation in the three areas of civil law. (See Appendix B) The 2016-2018 data¹ showed that

- In debtor-creditor disputes 93% of debtors and 4% of creditors were unrepresented
- In housing disputes 97% of tenants and 49% of landlords were unrepresented
- In family law disputes 84% of respondents and 53% of petitioners were unrepresented

The Order required the Committee to report its recommendations to the Supreme Court by the end of February 2020.

The Committee met 11 times between April 2019 and February 2020, hearing from judges, court administration staff, attorneys, paralegals, and others with an interest in the pilot project. The Committee’s specific recommendations are organized into four categories:

- The scope of the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project
- The establishment of an oversight committee and related procedures

¹ The data were extracted from the Minnesota Court Information System (MNCIS), which tracks, among other things, whether a party is represented. MNCIS records indicate on which days, if any, an attorney represents a client during the life of a case. The State Court Administrator’s Office pulled this information for select case-types ancillary to the work of the Task Force. A litigant was considered to be unrepresented when, for at least 90% of the days in the life of a case, the MNCIS records showed no attorney representing that litigant.

- The development of a pilot project evaluation plan and tools
- The creation of a communication and marketing plan

At the heart of the Committee's recommendations is the recognition that the primary purpose of the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project is to provide greater access to justice and offer the best possible outcomes for litigants in Minnesota's courts. The recommendations are designed to guide the establishment of a pilot project that not only will provide a vehicle for legal paraprofessionals to deliver civil legal services, but also ensure that the services are effective and protect the litigant's interests.

II. SUMMARY OF IMPLEMENTATION COMMITTEE WORK

The Committee considered the experiences of other jurisdictions and their efforts to address similar issues in their states, learned about current efforts focused on the three areas of unmet civil legal need in Minnesota communities, and listened to the concerns and ideas of interested stakeholders. The Committee thoroughly deliberated the requirements of the Order and reviewed detailed filing data for Minnesota's district courts to understand the needs specific to litigants in the three areas of law. (See Appendix C) The Committee also discussed a variety of models for the pilot project, searching for options that would provide the most benefit to parties and create an economically sustainable approach for attorneys and legal paraprofessionals. The Committee discussed in depth the need to include in the pilot program both a market-based approach where entrepreneurial attorneys, with the assistance and cooperation of legal paraprofessionals, could provide services to low- and modest-income litigants in Minnesota while building a sustainable and profitable practice and non-market-based opportunities through enhancement of legal aid services programs.

A. Overview of Areas of Unmet Civil Legal Need

During its kickoff meeting, the Committee discussed the Order to acquire a united understanding of the scope of the Committee's work and of the pilot project. Representatives from the MSBA and the states of Utah and Washington shared information with the Committee at this first meeting. The overview provided by the MSBA representative covered the work of the Task Force. (See Appendix D) The goal of the Task Force was to develop a model for achieving effective access to justice for low- and modest-income Minnesotans. The Task Force sought to do this by focusing on the possibility of working with legal paraprofessionals in new and creative ways to address unmet legal needs, with a particular focus on rural Minnesota. The Task Force considered three different models:

1. A regulated, non-lawyer provider model. This model, after deliberation, was not presented to the MSBA Assembly as a viable option.

2. A “Limited License Legal Technician” model, sometimes referred to as LLLT. This model was also discussed but not presented to the Assembly.
3. An expanded or enhanced legal paraprofessional model, which contemplated a qualified, designated, and supervised legal paraprofessional role. Although this model was presented to the Assembly, it did not pass.

Although the Task Force’s recommendations were not implemented, the Committee benefitted greatly from the Task Force’s work and lessons learned. The Task Force work helped shape the Committee’s recommendations.

Representatives from legal paraprofessional programs in the states of Utah and Washington informed the Committee that the need for increased availability of legal representation in the areas of family law, housing law, and debtor-creditor disputes is not unique to Minnesota. Both representatives confirmed that the research and analysis of the issues in their states showed that, to alleviate representation disparities, legal paraprofessionals might be able to provide effective legal help with adequate supervision.²

The Committee focused the next several meetings on expanding its knowledge of the substantive legal areas identified by the Supreme Court that might benefit from the pilot project. The Committee gathered and reviewed information, including court case data from 2016-2018 on whether community needs were being met in landlord-tenant cases (housing law disputes), debtor-creditor cases, and family law cases. The Committee also learned about current practices in district courts and other legal programs that provide assistance to parties in those three areas. Representatives from the Second and Fourth Judicial Districts, legal aid offices, and other legal practitioners met with the Committee to discuss needs and existing programs and supports for housing law disputes. Dialogue with these representatives revealed that housing courts in the Second and Fourth Judicial Districts currently benefit from multiple pro bono and low bono services. The Committee was impressed with the degree of sophistication and coordination in those districts for serving the legal needs of low-income housing law litigants.

The Committee also spent significant time learning about paralegal education, training, and certification, including training on legal ethics. Representatives from the Minnesota Paralegal Association and ABA Standing Committees on Paralegals as well as from institutions that provide paralegal education in Minnesota provided the Committee with in-depth information on paralegal preparation and qualifications. The information formed the basis for many of the Committee’s recommendations. (See Appendix E)

² Utah program, <https://www.utcourts.gov/utc/limited-legal/>, Washington program, <https://www.wsba.org/for-legal-professionals/join-the-legal-profession-in-wa/limited-license-legal-technicians>.

A district court judge from the Seventh Judicial District and the Deputy Director from Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid's St. Cloud office met with the Committee, as did MSBA Family Law Section representatives, to discuss needs and opportunities in the area of family law. The information presented to the Committee suggested that there is significant need for affordable legal representation in family law cases, especially in rural areas of the state and in regional centers like St. Cloud.

The Committee learned that consumer debt cases (debtor-creditor disputes) represent a large volume of cases in Minnesota district courts and that significant need for additional legal services and advice exists, especially for debtors. Nonetheless, the Committee ultimately decided not to recommend a pilot project in the case of debtor-creditor disputes. The Committee concluded that, outside of cases brought under the federal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act where lawyers may recover attorney fees and are currently providing legal services, the economics of debtor-creditor disputes make a market-based approach challenging. Further, the Committee recognized that the best place for intervention in debtor-creditor cases is before a complaint is filed, or within days thereafter, and the infrastructure is not currently in place to make a pilot project effective.

B. Format, Structure, and Rules

The Committee spent several meetings discussing the qualifications that should be required of legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys participating in the pilot project. The Committee received information and insight from paralegals, attorneys, civil legal services, educators, and other legal practitioners. In particular, the director of the Office of Lawyers Professional Responsibility (OLPR) presented information to the Committee about the statutes and rules related to the unauthorized practice of law. The OLPR director described some of the activities that are unlawful for a person who is not a member of the Minnesota bar to conduct. (See Appendix F) After much deliberation about suitable qualifications and experience for participants in the pilot project, it was suggested that Minnesota's student practice rules might provide a model for legal paraprofessional supervision in this pilot project. The Committee's recommended supervision requirements borrow heavily from the Student Practice Rules.³

The Committee explored whether and how malpractice insurance coverage may be available to legal paraprofessionals who participate in the pilot project. The Committee Co-Chairs met with the Board of Law Examiners and the MSBA Family Law Sections. As of this writing, questions remain about whether there is a market for separately insuring legal paraprofessionals or if the supervising attorney should be required to guarantee the actions of the legal paraprofessionals who are insured under the attorney’s malpractice insurance policy.

The Committee heard about efforts underway in Crow Wing County in northeastern Minnesota and Olmstead County to provide more legal assistance to tenants in housing disputes. In the Crow Wing County model, a legal aid office worked with the local court to establish a calendar each week for housing law disputes so that legal aid attorneys and/or legal paraprofessionals could be present to provide advice and representation more efficiently. (See Appendix G)

The Committee also received information about the Justice for All Grant, another Judicial Branch effort aimed at offering a simplified family court process that could eventually benefit from the assistance of qualified legal paraprofessionals for unrepresented parties. (See Appendix H) This program will pilot its own efforts in 2020-2021, so opportunities to coordinate with the pilot project remain open for future evaluation.

Another model that the Committee reviewed was a regulatory “sandbox” approach. The regulatory “sandbox” is a policy structure creating a controlled environment in which new consumer-centered innovations, which may be unlawful or unethical under current regulations, can be piloted and evaluated. The Utah Supreme Court issued an August 2019 report detailing this approach in their state.⁴ The Committee reviewed this report, but determined that replicating Utah’s level of regulatory oversight would require new funding, which is not available for this pilot project. The Committee therefore concluded that a regulatory “sandbox” approach is not practical at this time. The Committee recommends, however, that this approach be revisited and implemented if the pilot project is expanded in the future.

C. Stakeholder Outreach

The Committee committed early on to reach out to critical stakeholders. Committee members considered detailed information about the skills and abilities of paralegals in Minnesota. Their knowledge was critical to the Committee because of their experience as leaders in professional associations and higher education institutions that are responsible for certifying and training individuals in the paralegal field. Committee members also met with several individuals, including lawyers and other legal professionals, outside of committee meetings to explain the Committee’s charge and to hear concerns, comments, and other feedback.

⁴ Utah Implementation Task Force on Regulatory Reform, <https://sandbox.utcourts.gov/>.

The Committee also recognized that it did not have a thorough understanding of how legal paraprofessionals, including paralegals, work with attorneys, firms, or other legal professionals. To gain a more complete understanding, the Committee distributed a survey to Minnesota licensed attorneys, district court judges, and some paralegal association members in Minnesota. The Committee received 579 responses to the survey. (See Appendix I) Some survey respondents opposed any expansion of legal paraprofessional responsibilities. Others conveyed strong support for the effort. The Committee noted the concerns raised by “opposing” responses and incorporated those concerns into its deliberations. Nevertheless, understanding its charge to develop a pilot project for the Supreme Court, the Committee determined that abandoning the pilot project in the face of some opposition is not for the Committee to recommend.

The Committee worked with State Court Administration to organize and evaluate the many survey responses. The Committee learned that the range of responsibilities that Minnesota lawyers entrust to paralegals varies widely. Some lawyers limit their paralegals to a narrow range of responsibilities that is much more limited than what is allowed under current Minnesota law and Rules of Professional Responsibility. The Committee believes that expanded lawyer education should be made available regarding the level of responsibility that legal paraprofessionals are currently allowed to undertake.

After reviewing the survey responses, the Committee enlisted a focus group to gain additional outside perspectives. Several attorneys and legal paraprofessionals volunteered to participate in the focus group and met at the Judicial Center over the course of two days. The group made several helpful suggestions for the Committee’s consideration that helped formulate some of the Committee’s recommendations to the Court. (See Appendix J)

III. REASONS FOR IMPLEMENTATION COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Under the Order, the Committee “must limit the pilot project to one of three areas of unmet need in civil law.” The Committee nevertheless respectfully suggests that the Supreme Court consider piloting in two of the three substantive legal areas: housing law disputes and family law disputes.

The Committee concludes that a pilot project for landlord-tenant disputes allowing the expanded use of legal paraprofessionals operating under the supervision of attorneys has the potential to assist civil legal aid providers to serve more Minnesota litigants. Several legal aid entities have expressed interest in deploying their existing legal paraprofessionals to do a broader range of legal work than is currently allowed. Corporate legal entities have also expressed their willingness to have their legal paraprofessionals provide assistance to legal services on a pro bono basis through the pilot project, possibly assisting with both housing law disputes and family law cases.

In the area of family law disputes, the Committee sees merit in testing a market-based approach where attorneys may expand their current business model by capitalizing on the expanded scope of legal paraprofessional activity to serve more clients. Through conversations with private attorneys, the Committee believes that there is interest in the legal community to test the market-based approach as well.

Although the Committee proposes that the pilot project include both of these substantive legal areas, it also recognizes that the Supreme Court will determine whether and how the pilot project proceeds. The Committee's recommendations that set forth the format, structure, and implementation of the pilot project are applicable regardless of the Court's decision on which legal area to focus the pilot project.

IV. RECOMMENDATIONS

Based on the information gathered during the course of the Committee meetings, the survey, the focus-group process, and meetings with stakeholder groups, the Committee identified three goals for the pilot project:

- A. Assess whether allowing legal paraprofessionals an expanded scope of work will help reduce unmet civil legal needs among low- and modest-income Minnesotans.
- B. Determine whether allowing legal paraprofessionals an expanded scope of work will improve court efficiency.
- C. Evaluate the sustainability and effectiveness of allowing legal paraprofessionals an expanded scope of work in the areas of housing and family law.

The Committee's substantive recommendations are aimed at achieving these goals.

Recommendation 1: The Scope of the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project Should Focus on both Housing Law Disputes and Family Law Disputes.

The Committee recommends that the Court establish a legal paraprofessional pilot project for housing law disputes and family law cases. The Committee recommends that the pilot project start on January 1, 2021, and end on June 30, 2022. The Committee further recommends that the scope of work within each substantive area must be under the supervision of a licensed attorney and should be limited as follows:

- A. The scope of the work that legal paraprofessionals may conduct in housing law disputes is limited to providing advice to and appearing in court on behalf of tenants in housing disputes as defined in Minnesota Statute Chapter 504B and Section 484.014. The decision as to whether a case is suitable for a legal paraprofessional to appear in court should be left to the judgment of the supervising lawyer who can assess the complexity of the issues and the legal paraprofessional's training and experience.. The Committee further recommends that the pilot project for landlord-tenant disputes be limited to district courts that have established a Housing Court or a dedicated calendar for housing law disputes. The Crow Wing County Eviction Court Project described in Appendix G is an example.

The Committee appreciates that some landlords, especially those who lease space in their personal homes, may also benefit from advice and representation by legal paraprofessionals. Although the Committee does not recommend including landlord representation during the pilot project, such a possibility could be revisited in the future.

- B. The scope of the work that legal paraprofessionals may conduct in family law disputes is limited to:
- Providing advice to and appearing in court on behalf of clients in cases dealing with child-support modifications, parenting time disputes, and paternity matters, appearing for default hearings, initial case management conferences (ICMC), pretrial hearings, early case management hearings, and informal court proceedings
 - Providing advice to and representing clients in mediations where, in the judgment of the supervising lawyer, the issues are limited to less complex matters such as simple property divisions, parenting time, and spousal support
 - With authorization from the supervising attorney, preparing and filing a limited set of documents without the supervising attorney's final review. (See Appendix K) Family cases involving allegations of domestic violence and/or child abuse should not be part of the pilot project.

Recommendation 2: Establish a Standing Committee for the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project to Oversee Pilot Project Development and Implementation.

The Committee recommends that the Court create and authorize a standing committee to further develop these proposed oversight recommendations before implementing the pilot project. The standing committee should be charged with the following tasks:

- A. Create an application and approval process that meets the requirements set forth by the Court based on these recommendations;
- B. Establish minimum qualifications and guidelines for legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys who participate in the program; and
- C. Develop and implement a complaint process to protect consumers.

The Committee additionally recommends that the standing committee's membership include, at a minimum, one lawyer who has substantial experience in, and currently practices, family law; one lawyer who has substantial experience in, and currently practices in, housing court; one legal aid lawyer; more than one paralegal; one district court judge; and one public non-lawyer/non-paralegal member.

Recommendation 2.1: Create an Application and Approval Process to Ensure Legal Paraprofessionals and Supervising Attorneys Meet Specific Minimum Qualifications and Requirements to Participate in the Pilot Project.

The Committee recommends that the standing committee create an application and approval process to establish a roster of legal paraprofessionals who are approved to participate in the pilot project. The standing committee should also develop rules and regulations for the removal of legal paraprofessionals from the roster if necessary. These rules and regulations should focus on consumer protection.

A. Legal Paraprofessional Roster Certification

As part of a thorough application process, the legal paraprofessional shall submit to the standing committee a written statement from attorneys who will supervise his or her work in the pilot project. The standing committee shall determine approval for certification based on the application, which shall include a statement:

1. That the supervising attorney agrees to supervise the legal paraprofessional;
2. That the supervising attorney vouches for the legal paraprofessional's skills, abilities, and substantive law-related experience to competently engage in the required work; and
3. That, in the supervising attorney's judgment and experience, the legal paraprofessional is qualified to participate in the pilot project as outlined in Recommendation 2.2.

B. Termination of Roster Certification

The certification shall remain in effect for the duration of the pilot project after the date the legal paraprofessional's application is approved. Roster certification shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any of the following events:

1. The supervising attorney withdraws certification by mailing notice to that effect to the legal paraprofessional, all courts where a joint certificate of representation has been filed, and to the standing committee, along with the reason(s) for such withdrawal.

2. The legal paraprofessional withdraws certification by mailing notice to that effect to the supervising attorney and to the standing committee.
3. The standing committee terminates certification by mailing notice to that effect to the legal paraprofessional and the supervising attorney, along with the reason(s) for such termination.

Recommendation 2.2: Establish Qualifications for Legal Paraprofessional Practice and Attorney Supervision in the Pilot Project.

The Committee recommends the following guidelines, modelled after the Student Practice Rules, for the standing committee's consideration:

A. Eligible Legal Paraprofessionals

An eligible legal paraprofessional is one who:

1. Has the following education and/or work experience:
 - a. An Associate's or Bachelor's Degree in paralegal studies from an institutionally accredited school; or
 - b. A paralegal certificate from an institutionally accredited school in addition to an Associate's or Bachelor's degree in any subject from an institutionally accredited school; or
 - c. A law degree from an ABA accredited school; or
 - d. A high school diploma and 5 years of substantive paralegal⁵ experience.
2. Meets established ethics and continuing education requirements. Legal paraprofessionals may achieve these requirements by:
 - a. Holding the Minnesota Certified Paralegal (MnCP) credentials from the Minnesota Paralegal Association; or
 - b. Providing sufficient proof that the legal paraprofessional has earned ten (10) continuing legal education (CLE) credits, including two credit hours in ethics, within the two years prior to seeking certification; or
 - c. Providing proof that the legal paraprofessional has obtained a paralegal studies degree or certificate, or a juris doctorate within the two years prior to seeking certification. Such a program must include an ethics component.

⁵ The Minnesota Paralegal Association defines a paralegal as a person qualified through education, training, or work experience to perform substantive legal work that requires knowledge of legal concepts and is customarily, but not exclusively, performed by a lawyer. This person may be retained or employed by a lawyer, law office, government agency or other entity or may be authorized by administrative, statutory or court authority to perform this work.... Additionally, the term "substantive" shall mean work requiring recognition, evaluation, organization, analysis, and communication of relevant legal facts and concepts. (<https://www.mnparalegals.org/About>).

B. Supervisory Attorney

The attorney who supervises a legal paraprofessional shall:

1. Be a member, in good standing, of the bar of this Court;
2. Assume personal professional responsibility for and supervision of the legal paraprofessional's work, including court appearances;
3. Assist the legal paraprofessional to the extent necessary;
4. Sign all pleadings;
5. Carry malpractice insurance that will sufficiently cover the attorney's supervision of the legal paraprofessional and the work and actions of the supervised legal paraprofessional, or ensure that the legal paraprofessional has adequate insurance;
6. Maintain regular and continuing supervision check-ins with the legal paraprofessional(s) under his or her supervision; and
7. Execute a clear, written agreement of the extent of work of the legal paraprofessional consistent with the scope of the pilot project prior to beginning the work.

Recommendation 2.3: Develop a Complaint Process.

The Committee recommends that the standing committee define a complaint process that is transparent and accessible to the public. The goal of the complaint process should be to protect consumers and hold providers accountable to professional standards.

The complaint process should include procedures for submitting, reviewing, and investigating complaints made against legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys in the pilot project. The Committee recommends these procedures be inclusive and accessible to all individuals. For example, the procedures must support language access for Limited English Proficient individuals. The complaint process should also define the consequences if it is determined that a complaint is valid and supported.

The Committee recommends that the standing committee review and investigate complaints about pilot project rostered legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys. The Committee further recommends that the standing committee be authorized to remove legal paraprofessionals from the roster and prohibit supervising attorneys from participating in the pilot project if there is a good cause to do so. Rostered legal paraprofessionals and supervising attorneys shall cooperate with standing committee investigations and failure to cooperate may be the basis for removal from the pilot project.

Recommendation 3: Certificates of Representation

For each case where a legal paraprofessional will appear in court on behalf of the client, the certificate of representation for the matter must identify both the supervising attorney and the legal paraprofessional. The legal paraprofessional may sign the certificate of representations, but must include with the filed certificate of representation as statement signed by the supervising attorney that authorizes the legal paraprofessional to appear in court. The signed authorization must identify the types of proceedings that the legal paraprofessional is allowed to handle and must specify the dates on which the legal paraprofessional is allowed to appear.

Recommendation 4: Develop an Evaluation Plan and Tools

The Committee recommends that the standing committee, or a workgroup designated by the standing committee, develop an evaluation plan for the pilot project in collaboration with the State Court Administrator's Office. The evaluation plan should measure the pilot project's impact on each of the three goals set forth in Recommendation 1. The evaluation plan should contain quantitative and qualitative measures, including surveys of clients, lawyers (supervising and non-supervising), legal paraprofessionals, judges, and court administrators.

Recommendation 5: Develop a Communication Plan and Select an "Identifier" that Distinguishes the Role of the Rostered Legal Paraprofessionals.

The Committee recommends the formation of an ongoing working group to develop a marketing communication plan to increase consumer, lawyer, and legal paraprofessional awareness about the pilot project by collaborating with strategic marketing partners both within and outside the Judicial Branch.

- A. Consistent with Minnesota's Rules of Professional Responsibility, the communication plan should expand awareness of the pilot project in a convenient and inclusive manner. To that end, published communication should include appropriate language formats. The following communication methods may be considered:
 1. Generate lists of all legal paraprofessionals and utilize targeted mailings and emails to inform those legal paraprofessionals of the pilot project.
 2. Publish pilot project information in web-based publications and public spaces, such as public and law libraries, community centers and organizations (especially those that serve underrepresented groups), and religious organizations.
- B. Draft and distribute a general notice of the pilot project to all firms, statewide attorney associations (e.g., MSBA, affinity bar associations, and Lawyers Concerned for Lawyers), and paralegal associations to help attract supervising attorneys and legal paraprofessionals.
 1. The Committee recommends the creation of an "identifier" for legal paraprofessionals who are participating in the pilot project. The Committee considers this important because the purpose of the pilot project is to expand the services of all legal paraprofessionals through an approved certification process within the scope of the pilot project. The Committee suggests that it would be helpful if the ongoing working group includes people with a background in marketing. The goals for this recommendation are to establish a unique identifier that is attractive to individuals who may be interested in participating in the pilot project and distinguishes legal paraprofessionals who meet the requirements of, and are participating in, the pilot project from those who are not.

V. CONCLUSION

The Committee believes that the implementation of the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project has the ability to positively impact access to justice in Minnesota. The Committee urges the Supreme Court to continue to seek ways to expand upon the recommendations contained in this report, through the encouragement and support of ongoing innovative and entrepreneurial efforts to serve the unmet civil legal needs of low- and modest-income litigants in Minnesota's courts.

The Committee appreciates the cooperation it received from district court judges, the Minnesota State Bar Association and its sections, private attorneys, legal aid attorneys and managers, the Minnesota Paralegal Association, private and public paralegals, State Court Administration, the Office of Lawyers Professional Responsibility, the Board of Law Examiners, and all of the others who helped the Committee with this compressed and intensive effort to develop these recommendations. The Committee also thanks those who helped write the Report and Recommendations, especially Hannah Reichenbach, Sarah Doege, Madeline Baskfield, Brandon Carmack, Maria Campbell, and Joann Gillis.

ADM19-8002

IN RE IMPLEMENTATION COMMITTEE FOR PROPOSED LEGAL PARAPROFESSIONAL PILOT PROJECT

ORDER

In 2017, the Alternative Legal Models Task Force convened by the Minnesota State Bar Association recommended the development of a program for affordable legal services that does not entirely rely upon licensed lawyers. Among the specific proposals the MSBA Task Force considered, and recommended, was a program that would allow a legal paraprofessional to provide legal advice and in some cases to represent a client in court, under the supervision of a licensed Minnesota attorney. Such a program would help address the needs of low- and modest-income citizens for civil legal representation, particularly in case types in which one party typically appears in court without representation. Other states have studied the delivery of legal services through alternative models, and have adopted rules that authorize legal paraprofessionals to provide civil legal representation and engage in the limited practice of law in certain defined areas of practice, such as housing law, family law, or debtor-creditor disputes. See, e.g., Utah Sup. Ct. R. Prof'l Prac. 14-802(c) (2018). See also Utah Sup. Ct. R. Prof'l Prac. Ch. 15 (2018).

The supreme court has exclusive authority over the practice of law, see In re Conservatorship of Riebel, 625 N.W.2d 480, 482 (Minn. 2001), and to establish the rules and regulations that govern those who appear before the courts. See Nicollet Restoration, Inc. v. Turnham, 486 N.W.2d 753, 755 (Minn. 1992); Sharood v. Hatfield, 210 N.W.2d 275, 280–81 (Minn. 1973). In order to address the expanding need for access to civil legal services and build on the work of the MSBA Task Force, a pilot project is the appropriate framework for evaluating the delivery of legal services in areas of unmet civil legal needs. In order to successfully implement the pilot project, the format, structure, and rules that will govern legal paraprofessionals who participate in the pilot are needed.

Based upon all the files, records, and proceedings herein,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED THAT:

1. The Implementation Committee for the Legal Paraprofessional Pilot Project is established to define the format, structure, rules, and implementation of a pilot project for the delivery of civil legal services by legal paraprofessionals. The pilot project should be designed to permit legal paraprofessionals to provide legal advice and in some cases to represent a client in court under the supervision of a licensed Minnesota attorney. The implementation committee must limit the pilot project to one of three areas of unmet need in civil law: housing disputes, family law, or creditor-debtor disputes; and if appropriate, must identify the specific sub-set of cases within that area that will be part of the pilot project.

2. The following persons are appointed as members of the implementation committee:

Hon. Paul C. Thissen

Hon. John R. Rodenberg

Thomas Nelson, Minnesota State Bar Association

Sally Dahlquist, Inver Hills Community College

Maren Schroeder, Rochester, Minnesota

Tiffany Doherty-Schooler, Duluth, Minnesota

Pamela Wandzel, Minneapolis, Minnesota

Christopher O. Petersen, Minneapolis, Minnesota

Bridget Gernander, Saint Paul, Minnesota

Liz Reppe, State Law Librarian, Saint Paul, Minnesota

Kim Larson, State Court Administration, Saint Paul, Minnesota

The Honorable Paul C. Thissen and the Honorable John R. Rodenberg are appointed as co-chairs of the committee. Kim Larson is appointed as staff attorney to the committee.

3. The committee must hold its first meeting on or before April 30, 2019. The committee shall file a report regarding the pilot project on or before February 28, 2020. The report must provide recommendations on the implementation date for the pilot project, the rules that will govern during the pilot project, and the criteria for evaluating the pilot project.

Minnesota Case Types with Asymmetrical or Low Representation

The data shown in the figure above were extracted from the Minnesota Court Information System (MNCIS), which tracks, among other things, whether a party is represented. MNCIS records indicate on which days, if any, an attorney represents a client during the life of a case. The State Court Administrator’s Office pulled this information for select case-types ancillary to the work of the MSBA Alternative Legal Models Task Force. A litigant was considered to be unrepresented if, for at least 90% of the days in the life of a case, the MNCIS records show no attorney representing that litigant.

Default Judgment Cases

A money judgment that is processed administratively in the Court Administrator's office. This primarily occurs when the plaintiff refrains from filing the summons and complaint until the period for answering the complaint has expired and the matter has been established as a default. In the majority of Default Judgment cases, the case is opened and closed at one time.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS
MINNESOTA STATE BAR ASSOCIATION
ALTERNATIVE LEGAL MODELS TASK FORCE

OVERVIEW

An important component of the Minnesota State Bar Association's (MSBA) vision calls for the organization to "be a leader in the state of Minnesota in achieving effective and equal justice for all." Adequate access to legal representation for all Minnesotans remains elusive, despite efforts to increase funding for legal aid programs, rally members of the bar to volunteer for pro bono service and provide resources so lawyers, both new and experienced, can offer their services at rates affordable to modest income clients. The Alternative Legal Models Task Force, created in response to a recommendation from the MSBA's Future of the Legal Education Task Force, represents an opportunity for the MSBA to lead our state in providing "equal justice for all." The report and recommendations that follow are the product of hours of discussion, research and engagement. We hope the Assembly will seize this opportunity to help move our profession and the state forward towards greater access to legal representation for all our residents.

After many months of research, discussion and debate, the Task Force considered three distinct approaches to the delivery of legal services to help fill the access to justice gap that do not necessarily involve reliance upon licensed lawyers. The Task Force recognizes that no single solution will solve the problems the legal profession faces in providing affordable legal services, but believe it is time to take some action that has the potential to provide alternative legal services to those that require or desire it. Once these three approaches were accepted by the Task Force, the Task Force Co-Chairs and MSBA representatives held seven listening sessions around the State. The Task Force's ultimate conclusion that the MSBA move forward with two of these recommendations is based upon the Task Force's work through subcommittee meetings, full Task Force deliberations and the comments and suggestions received during the listening sessions. A majority of Task Force members voted to recommend the MSBA work toward implementation of two proposals.

The first proposal is designed after a model employed in British Columbia, Canada that allows a paraprofessional (Legal Practitioner) to provide legal advice and, in some circumstances, represent a client in court and administrative proceedings under the direct supervision of an attorney. The Legal Practitioner would work under the supervising attorney's law license and the ethical responsibilities required of Minnesota lawyers. There would be no separate licensing or licensing board of the Legal Practitioner. The details of this recommendation are provided below.

The second proposal is modeled after the State of Washington's Limited License Legal Technicians model ("LLLT Model"). The proposed LLLT Model for Minnesota allows licensed paralegals/administrative assistants to acquire a certain level of education and experience to qualify for licensing through the passage of an exam. Once licensed, the LLLT would be free to practice law in a specific area of law that is limited in scope. The LLLT would not be required to work under the supervision of an attorney, but would be required to comply with a code of ethics, similar to lawyers' ethical requirements, and to obtain legal malpractice insurance. A separate licensing board would likely be required. The details of this LLLT model are more completely described below.

PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

The genesis of this task force comes from the work of the MSBA's Task Force on the Future of Legal Education ("Legal Education Task Force"). The Legal Education Task Force, consisting of representatives from the judiciary, legal education, and the practicing bar, examined challenges and opportunities with respect to the state's legal education system. Considerable time was spent examining ways of making legal careers more affordable, as well as addressing the existing unmet need for legal representation by low and modest income Minnesotans. Consequently, as part of its final report and recommendations, the Legal Education Task Force included the following as one of its recommendations:

Recommendation 5: In order to identify a less costly path to a career in legal services and address unmet needs for specific types of legal services, the MSBA should establish a separate task force focused on studying the viability of certifying Limited License Legal Technicians ("LLLT") with authority to provide supervised legal services in defined practice areas. This task force should consist of representatives from the state court administrative office, civil legal services and pro bono programs, private practices from diverse practice settings throughout the state, potential clients, and institutions of higher education (including, but not limited to law schools). The task force should prepare a recommendation to the MSBA Assembly on the question whether to submit a petition to the Minnesota Supreme Court to establish an LLLT practitioner rule by June 2016.

The MSBA Assembly reviewed the Legal Education Task Force's Report and Recommendations at its June 2015 meeting and approved this recommendation, among others. MSBA President (2015-16) Mike Unger then created the Alternative Legal Models Task Force with the following charge:

The Task Force's charge is to examine the advisability of supplementing traditional lawyer representation through the creation of a new type of limited-scope certified legal assistance provider to increase access to justice for those who cannot afford a lawyer. One possibility the task force will examine involves certifying Limited Legal License Technicians (LLLT) who would possess authority to provide limited legal services in particular practice areas, as the state of Washington did recently. The Task Force will develop a recommendation to the Assembly regarding viable options to increase access to justice, including possible certification of limited license legal technicians, along with necessary safeguards to assure quality of service.

After reviewing applications, President Unger appointed 24 members to the Task Force. (A list of task force members can be found in Appendix A). These members bring a wide range of backgrounds to the Task Force's work and include representation from the judicial branch, the private bar, civil legal aid and academic institutions, as well as the paralegal community and paralegal training programs. The Task Force is co-chaired by Susan Wiens of Minneapolis and Kenneth White of Mankato, both attorneys in private practice. The Task Force has met eight times as a full group from February 2016 through March 2017, in addition to numerous subcommittee meetings. (A full listing of meeting agendas and notes, as well as resources, can be found on the MSBA website at www.mnbar.org/ALM.)

The Task Force reviewed numerous resources as part of its deliberations, as well as a presentation by representatives of the Washington State Bar on the LLLT program, a presentation by several task force members involved in paralegal training regarding paralegal certification programs, and a review of law librarian/self-help assistance. The Task Force reviewed numerous articles and studies demonstrating the access to justice gap as well as many reports of projects implemented by other legal organizations attempting to bridge the access to justice gap. (A listing of reference materials can be found in Appendix B.)

The Task Force initially divided into three subcommittees to start its work, as follows:

Forms Completion – This subcommittee examined practice areas that are heavily forms driven and studied ways to license non-lawyers to help individuals with completing forms and potentially assisting in court.

Washington Model – This subcommittee examined the Washington model more thoroughly to explore whether the model was one that could work in Minnesota and should be recommended.

Business Models – This subcommittee explored potential models for serving modest means individuals and examined what it would cost to create a sustainable practice.¹

Based upon the work and recommendations of these subcommittees, the Task Force then developed a series of three options for further study and feedback. These options are more fully discussed in the next section, but can be described briefly:

Regulated non-lawyer provider for limited tasks such as forms completion as permitted by statute;

Enhanced use of paralegals in the practice of law and delivery of legal services, as recently piloted in British Columbia; and Limited License Legal Technician program (LLLT) which provides a process for non-lawyers to be licensed to provide limited legal advice in certain narrowly-defined legal areas.

¹ The Task Force also considered a fourth subcommittee (Limited Scope), but subsequently folded its work into the remaining subcommittees.

Three new subcommittees were established to study these options. Each subcommittee met numerous times, researched and studied other legal organization's efforts and provided a recommendation to the full Task Force. After the development of these focused options, the Task Force co-chairs, along with MSBA staff, convened seven listening sessions throughout the state (St. Paul (2), Minneapolis (live and as a webinar), St. Cloud, Duluth, Rochester and Mankato) in conjunction with local or district bar organizations during October and November 2016.² In addition, the co-chairs provided an update to the MSBA Assembly at the December 2016 meeting, with five simultaneous small group listening sessions held following this presentation. In total, over 200 MSBA members attended a live listening session during the fall of 2016. Discussions regarding the Task Force's work have also been ongoing via several MSBA online communities, including the Small and Solo Law Firm Section and the New Lawyers Section (which have been the most active). Task Force members reviewed feedback from all of these sources in developing the Task Force's recommendations.

LIMITATIONS

The task force recognizes the current regulatory framework, legal education models and market conditions that frame the practice of law inherently and specifically place limitations on how broad, how specific or how effective the recommendations of the Task Force can be in providing access to justice to all Minnesotans. The Task Force, aimed at providing guidance to the Assembly on ways the state bar association can increase access to justice, recognizes it must work within certain parameters for which it has no current ability to change. The following limitations on meeting access to justice goals were expressed by Task Force members during its deliberations and by members of the bar during the listening sessions.

- If more state and federal funds were allocated to legal-aid services, we could serve more of those in need.
- If more lawyers provided pro bono services, the legal profession could better meet the unmet needs for access to justice.
- If the Supreme Court required all lawyers to provide a certain number of pro bono hours, we could provide more legal services to those who cannot afford them.
- If law schools required students to provide pro bono services before they graduate, we could help provide additional legal assistance to those that cannot afford such services.
- If we developed a mechanism to forgive a portion of new lawyer's student loan debt, new lawyers could open a law practice more economically to provide services at a lower cost.
- If a legal education were to cost less, more new lawyers could open their own practices to provide services at a lower rate that is affordable by modest means clients.

² The document distributed at the listening sessions describes the options under consideration by the Task Force. (Appendix C)

- If the UPL statute was enforced, we would have fewer unqualified individuals providing ineffective legal advice and pushing willing lawyers from this market due to cost differentials.
- Allowing lawyers to enforce non-compete agreements would encourage small firms (and perhaps others) to hire and mentor more new lawyers.

While each of these suggestions for change may also have some positive effect in providing access to justice for all Minnesotans, the Task Force has no ability to effectuate such changes. Recognizing these limitations, the Task Force makes the following recommendations.

OPTIONS CONSIDERED & RECOMMENDATIONS

Overview

Throughout the Task Force’s discussions, members focused on how to bring new resources to serve low and modest income clients. In so doing, the Task Force recognized the challenges facing practicing lawyers in reaching those potential clients. At listening sessions, members of the profession discussed how the cost of doing business as a lawyer makes it difficult to set billing rates at levels affordable to many modest income clients. Younger practitioners, while concerned about the potential for competition from non-lawyers, also recounted the impact of how student loan debt, overhead and practice development place pressures on billing rates. The options considered by the Task Force reflect a need to supplement the existing system in which lawyers exclusively can provide legal advice.

Further, recent national initiatives have begun to focus on ways of providing access to all who may need legal services. For example, Resolution 5 of the Conference of Chief Justices and the Conference of State Court Administrators, adopted in 2015, urges courts to “support the aspirational goal of 100 percent access to effective assistance for essential civil legal needs and urge their members to provide leadership in achieving that goal...”³ The Resolution urges court systems and related organizations to “develop a continuum of meaningful and appropriate services” in order to implement that goal.⁴ In addition, last year, Minnesota recently applied for and received a national Justice for All grant from the National Center for State Courts and the Public Welfare Foundation, the purpose of which is to develop plans for implementing this aspirational goal and coordinating services throughout the state. The Task Force’s work fits naturally within these state and national efforts to create multiple means for enabling all to obtain affordable effective legal assistance.

⁴ Also, in late 2016, the ABA Commission on the Future of Legal Services released its final report. The Commission’s first recommendation aligns with Resolution 5: “The legal profession should support the goal of providing some form of effective assistance for essential civil legal needs to all persons otherwise unable to afford a lawyer.” <http://abafuturesreport.com>.

Administrative/Regulatory Model

A few states, such as Arizona, California and Nevada, permit non-lawyers to provide limited non-legal assistance to clients – most typically, document/forms completion. These services are not legal advice, although they may be incorporated into an existing legal practice. The state regulates this service by statute, not court rules, because of the limitations involved in scope. Licensees can assist clients with document preparation assistance and assistance to pro se litigants similar to lay advocates (e.g. helping self-represented parties organize the chronology of their cases for presentation to a judge).

In many respects, this model duplicates the existing services already provided in Minnesota by the Judicial Branch’s self-help centers. Considerable information is already available online to enable non-lawyers to understand the legal process and complete forms. Staff at in-person and telephone self-help centers currently assist customers by providing limited guidance on forms and proceedings, but no advice regarding legal strategy.

The Task Force subcommittee reviewing this option considered whether licensed laypeople could play a helpful role in assisting clients in legal proceedings, even if no legal advice could be provided. They reviewed the use of free lay advocates as part of order for protection (OFP) hearings. Since the 1990s, the Minnesota Supreme Court has allowed lay advocates to sit at counsel table and assist in these proceedings. Advocates may also help petitioners complete paperwork, but they cannot provide legal advice. While many advocates have been affected personally by domestic violence, they do not bring formal training or skill in legal advocacy. As such, licensed attorneys are still necessary to adequately represent the interest of both petitioners and respondents.⁵ Domestic violence advocates are most effective in helping victims by being present at counsel table and offering their experience as an adjunct to effective legal representation.

The main advantage of administratively licensed non-lawyer providers is that they can take on relatively low level tasks for clients and leave more sophisticated issues to attorneys. Less stringent licensing requirements (as opposed to lawyer admission) would make it easier for someone who wishes to provide these services to do so. However, given the nature of legal proceedings and the nuances of different areas of the law, these licensed providers will never supplant the need for direct lawyer involvement.⁶ Indeed, they offer little more than what any lay person could already do to assist an individual with a legal matter. These services may duplicate already existing self-help resources by the court system and lead to a secondary industry of licensed, but untrained non-lawyers providing what potential clients might take to be legal advice.⁷ Further, the subcommittee concluded that the services provided by such licensed providers could more easily be incorporated into the remaining two legal services delivery options. Given these shortcomings, the Task Force ultimately decided not to recommend further investigation of the administrative/regulatory option.

⁵ Any expansion of the responsibilities of advocates would likely necessitate more extensive training and regulation. For example, advocates would need to have baseline knowledge of court procedure and forms drafting, as well as a more sophisticated understanding of victim trauma.

⁶ Completing forms alone does not meet some of the most significant client needs, which include legal advice, discovery assistance, preparation of affidavits and certain kinds of motions, analyzing courses of action and, perhaps most importantly, representation in court to assist the client in case presentation. Family law, in particular, is a subject area most in need of assistance by clients, yet it is a complex area of law as well as one involving emotional stresses where clients need a full range of assistance to sort out child-related issues and financial issues. The statutory framework is extensive as is the case law. Mere assistance with forms would be enough in only the most routine cases, and those are likely few.

Designated Paralegal/British Columbia (BC) Model

The designated paralegal, or BC Model, in its most basic form, allows a lawyer to employ a skilled “designated paralegal” into his/her legal practice to provide to the extent the lawyer deems proper, legal advice as well as representation of the client in court. The lawyer remains responsible for the activities of the designated paralegal in the same way Minnesota lawyers remain legally and ethically responsible for those that work for them and their law firms. The expansion of services that a “paralegal” may provide to clients under the supervision of an attorney was envisioned in British Columbia as a partial solution to the access to justice gap found prevalent in the community.

Background

It bears noting that, in developing this model, British Columbia lawyers struggled with the very same issues the Minnesota State Bar Association grapples with in how to serve the unmet legal needs of those in poverty as well as those that may not be considered below the poverty line but nonetheless cannot afford typical lawyer fees. They wrestled with the same issues surrounding the fear of inferior legal services, the prediction that such non-lawyers would take work away from new law school graduates, and that the lower fees charged by non-lawyers would prevent new lawyers from staying competitive (because of higher law school debt). Recognizing the government-funded legal aid system provided needed assistance to the poor, it also found the system was severely underfunded and incapable of meeting the needs the lawyers recognized as a systemic problem.

In reviewing possible avenues for improving access to justice, the BC Law Society (the equivalent of our State Bar, although it is mandatory) determined that granting paralegals the ability to provide legal advice was at least a partial solution to the access to justice problem. The BC law society looked to the Ontario law society for guidance as Ontario, in 2007, became a leader in licensing and regulating paralegals. A five-year report to the Ontario Attorney General on the licensing program found “by an objective measure . . . it has been a remarkable success.”⁸ The BC Model, ⁷ The court’s self-help center staff will review completed forms for self-represented litigants using the I-CAN system. See <http://www.mncourts.gov/Help-Topics/Divorce/i-can-help.aspx>. I-CAN is available for divorce and fee waiver forms. Law libraries that have professional staff (Hennepin, Ramsey, Anoka, Dakota, Olmsted, Stearns, St. Louis, and Wright) can assist self-represented litigants in locating court forms, and also sample forms when fill-in-the-blank forms do not exist.

⁸ David Morris, Report to the Attorney General of Ontario: Report of Five-Year Review of Paralegal Regulation in Ontario (2012, Queens Printer for Ontario), which can be found at: https://www.attorneygeneral.jus.gov.on.ca/english/about/pubs/paralegal_review/. See unlike the Ontario program, requires the assessment by a lawyer of the skills of the paralegal to be made before a paralegal can become a designated paralegal. The BC Model does not require a minimum level of education as it relies entirely upon the judgment of the lawyer who has determined if a paralegal qualifies as a designated paralegal.

In British Columbia, the practice of law is defined by the Legal Profession Act. Like Minnesota, the “Practice of Law” was defined to include most services traditionally provided by lawyers such as appearing on behalf of clients in court or administrative hearings, giving legal advice, drafting legal documents, and negotiating and representing clients in mediations and arbitrations. The law allows a person acting under the supervision of a lawyer (i.e. a paralegal) to provide certain services to clients without violating the Act.

In June 2012, the BC law society approved a change in their Code of Profession Conduct, adopting the concept of a “designated paralegal” who would have the necessary skills and experience such that under a lawyer’s supervision, could perform tasks not previously permitted for paralegals including,

- Giving legal advice to clients
- Giving and receiving undertakings; and
- Representing clients before a court or tribunal (administrative court) as permitted by the court or tribunal

In this program, designated paralegals could manage a file, provide advice to a client and otherwise provide the similar service to the client that a lawyer may provide, with the supervising attorney monitoring the work and the advice provided. The BC courts were slow to accept paralegals in the court room causing some confusion as to when and where a designated paralegal may appear. Very few courts allowed designated paralegals to appear in their court rooms but very few designated paralegals attempted to appear in court. According to conversations with the staff attorney for the BC Law Society, the tribunal judges (administrative forum) have indicated recently a willingness to allow designated paralegals to appear in their courtrooms. As such access to tribunals is relatively new, there is no data on how this is working. Given the success of the program with lawyers and law firms, the law society’s next step is to change the Legal Profession Act to allow designated paralegals to practice law in limited areas of law and in a limited scope, patterned after the Washington State model (see the following section).

Explanation of BC Model

The BC Model restricts a lawyer to the supervision of just two designated paralegals. It does not require a certain level of education or experience but requires a lawyer to implement “Best Practices for Supervising Paralegals” and “Best Practices for Training Paralegals.” Best practices for supervising designated paralegals, set forth in Appendix E of the BC Code of Professional Conduct, include the following:

<https://www.thestar.com/news/gta/2017/03/06/judges-report-urges-ontario-to-let-paralegals-appear-in-family-court.html>.

1. Supervision is a flexible concept that is assessed on a case-by-case basis with consideration of the relevant factors, which, depending on the circumstances, include the following:

- (a) Has the paralegal demonstrated a high degree of competence when assisting the lawyer with similar subject matter?
- (b) Does the paralegal have relevant work experience and or education relating to the matter being delegated?
- (c) How complex is the matter being delegated?
- (d) What is the risk of harm to the client with respect to the matter being delegated?

2. A lawyer must actively mentor and monitor the paralegal. A lawyer should consider the following:

- (a) Train the paralegal as if he or she were training an articulated student. A lawyer must be satisfied the paralegal is competent to engage in the work assigned;
- (b) Ensuring the paralegal understands the importance of confidentiality and privilege and the professional duties of lawyers. Consider having the paralegal sign an oath to discharge his or her duties in a professional and ethical manner;
- (c) Gradually increasing the paralegal's responsibilities;
- (d) A lawyer should engage in file triage and debriefing to ensure that matters delegated are appropriate for the paralegal and to monitor competence. This may include:
 - (i) testing the paralegal's ability to identify relevant issues, risks and opportunities for the client;
 - (ii) engaging in periodic file review. File review should be a frequent practice until such time as the paralegal has demonstrated continued competence, and should remain a regular practice thereafter;
 - (iii) ensuring the paralegal follows best practices regarding client communication and file management.

3. Create a feedback mechanism for clients and encourage the client to keep the lawyer informed of the strengths and weaknesses of the paralegal's work. If the client has any concerns, the client should alert the lawyer promptly.

4. If a lawyer has any concerns that the paralegal has made a mistake, the lawyer must take carriage of the file and deal with the mistake.

5. Discuss paralegal supervision with a Law Society practice advisor if you have any concerns.

Best practices for training designated paralegals include the following:

1. Develop a formal plan for supervision and discuss it with the paralegal. Set goals and progress milestones.

2. Review the guidelines for supervising articulated students and adopt concepts that are appropriate to the scope of responsibility being entrusted to the paralegal.
3. Facilitate continuing legal education for the paralegal.
4. Ensure the paralegal reviews the relevant sections of the Professional Legal Training Course materials and other professional development resources and review key concepts with the paralegal to assess their comprehension level.
5. Have their paralegals “junior” the lawyer on files and explain the thought process with respect to substantive and procedural matters as part of the paralegal’s training.
6. Keep an open door policy and encourage the paralegal to discuss any concerns or red flags with the lawyer before taking further steps.

Recommendations

A majority of the Task Force recommends adoption of a model based significantly upon the British Columbia Model where specifically trained or experienced paralegals are provided additional responsibilities, including some traditional legal responsibilities, to serve clients at a reduced cost. The subcommittee recommended changing the “designated paralegal” name to “Legal Practitioner.” The model we propose would continue to require that an attorney supervise all activities performed by the Legal Practitioner, but the level of supervision would be tailored to the level of experience. We suggest the following framework:

Education Qualifications and/or Years of Experience

Because lawyers would remain responsible for all activities of the Legal Practitioner, Task Force members believe the Legal Practitioner must possess sufficient education and experience to meet the lawyer’s legal and ethical requirements.⁹ Allowing experienced paralegals and legal assistants to assume the role of a Legal Practitioner would likely provide hundreds of individuals that could immediately begin service. However, to protect the public and to ensure this new legal position has credibility with the public and within the legal profession, the Task Force recommends at least a two-year college degree be required that would include a certain number of credits to be applied to a specific focus area in a paralegal-like training program. The Task Force found it particularly important that some amount of educational training should be required in the particular area of law that the designated paralegal proposes to practice within.¹⁰ The Legal Practitioner designation would apply to specific areas of law.

Number of Designated Paralegals a Lawyer May Supervise & Malpractice Insurance

The BC Model limits attorneys to two designated paralegals for each lawyer. The Task Force believes this may be too restrictive and recommends increasing that number to three. In addition, ⁹ Certain individuals who have many years of experience as a legal assistant or paralegal, who many not otherwise meet the educational qualifications, could also apply for the designation.

¹⁰ No new programming is deemed necessary as there are many options for obtaining paralegal/legal assistant training in Minnesota. Programs have been certified by the American Bar Association and/or the American Association for Paralegal Education.

the Task Force recommends that only currently licensed lawyers with malpractice insurance should be able to employ, engage or otherwise use Legal Practitioners within their law practice.¹¹

Areas of Practice & Court Approval

The Task Force recommends that court approval be obtained before any Legal Practitioner may appear in court in a legal proceeding. In addition, the Task Force discussed the following areas of law that may present opportunities for including Legal Practitioners within their practice. (These could be the subject of a limited time pilot if desired by the court.):

- Administrative Hearings (Unemployment Compensation, Medical Assistance and perhaps others)
 - Surveys from earlier subcommittees identified unemployment compensation issues as a frequent issue and one that may be ripe for a non-lawyer to assist.
- Landlord/Tenant Issues – Housing Court
 - Housing Court matters routinely entered Task Force meetings as an area that may properly be managed by a non-lawyer. This proposal would keep a lawyer in the mix but allow for much more front-end form driven issues to be advanced by a Legal Practitioner.
 - Non-lawyers are already permitted in Housing Court so this is not a big change.
- Debtor/Creditor Law – Civil Court
 - Individuals in low income groups are likely to have debt collection issues. This issue was identified often in the earlier subcommittee questionnaire results as an area of law often in need of legal assistance.
- Family Law – Civil Court
 - Surveys from the earlier subcommittees identified family law as an area of highest unmet needs of those unable to afford legal services.
 - Attorneys who practice family law indicate that it is too complicated to turn over decision making to a non-lawyer but such concerns may be alleviated in this particular model by requiring that a lawyer remain involved and ethically and legally responsible for all results.

¹¹ Some members were concerned that the BC Model would not significantly increase legal services to the poor. Some legal services programs already use legal assistants to provide services under attorney supervision. Given the below-market compensation for legal services attorneys, some members thought there would not be much incentive for programs to hire legal assistants for a little less than attorneys who could be used more broadly. In addition, some members also were concerned that, without restrictions on the income levels of clients served by legal assistants, law firms with high volume practices might hire more legal assistants at the expense of new attorneys. Examples could include plaintiffs in housing court matters and debt collection actions.

- Immigration Law
 - Non-lawyers are already permitted to appear in certain immigration matters so this is not a big change.
 - Certain routine tasks can be delegated from a supervising attorney to a Legal Practitioner, opening the doors for lawyers to serve more clients.
- Estate Planning and Corporate Work
 - Routine estate planning is already very form driven. This is an area where a seasoned Legal Practitioner could provide valuable legal services.

Scope of Legal Practice

The Task Force recommends that the scope of legal practice for a Legal Practitioner should, at a minimum, include the ability to provide legal advice to clients, meet with them independently, assist with legal forms and legal documents and otherwise manage an entire file/case. In addition to those responsibilities, with court permission, a Legal Practitioner may represent clients in court. Such a scope of practice would likely require a change to the UPL statute and approval by the Minnesota Supreme Court.

Limited License Legal Technicians (LLLT) (Washington Model)

In 2012, the Washington Supreme Court created a new category of licensed practitioners to meet what it believed to be continuing concerns about access to legal services for low and modest income people. Since the program was created, a number of states have studied the Washington experience in an effort to determine whether their courts should institute such a program.¹² The Task Force reviewed these reports, as well as feedback from the various statewide listening sessions, as part of its work.

Washington Model Details

The Washington LLT was discussed in extensive detail by members of the MSBA's Task Force on the Future of the Legal Profession. See Appendix F to the Report and Recommendations of the MSBA’s Task Force on the Future of the Legal Profession. The relevant portions of that document are excerpted below:

In June 2012, the Supreme Court of Washington issued an order for a new Admission to Practice Rule (APR) 28 entitled “Limited Practice Rule for Limited License Legal Technicians.” The Court’s twelve page order states, “Our adversarial civil legal system is complex. It is unaffordable not only to low income people but...moderate income people as well.”¹³

In setting forth the rationale for its groundbreaking order, the Washington Supreme Court detailed how that state court system had attempted to fashion a number of strategies that are not dissimilar to Minnesota’s system: courthouse facilitators, court self-help centers, neighborhood legal clinics, pro bono programs and a statewide legal aid self-help center.¹⁴ The Court noted, however, these resources have limitations, including that “many litigants require additional one-on-one help to understand their specific legal rights and prerogatives and make decisions that are best for them under the circumstances.”¹⁵

The Court recognized that many self-represented litigants are “at a substantial legal disadvantage and, for increasing numbers, force(d) to seek help from unregulated, untrained, unsupervised ‘practitioners.’ We have a duty to ensure that the public can access affordable legal and law related services, and that they are not left to fall prey to the perils of the unregulated market place.”¹⁶

Importantly, the Court noted that establishing a new category of limited legal provider would not aid family law litigants with complex, contested matters. On the other hand, “the authorization for limited license legal technicians to engage in certain limited legal and law related activities holds promise to help reduce the level of unmet need for low and moderate income people who have relatively uncomplicated family related legal problems...”¹⁷

The Court also addressed concerns that creating a new class of licensed professionals would threaten the practicing family law bar, stating, “(I)t is important to push past the rhetoric and focus on what limited license legal technicians will be allowed to do, and what they cannot do under the rule.” In particular, the new class would be limited to simple family law matters where “few private attorneys make a living.”¹⁸

While admitting that adopting APR 28 “will not close the Justice Gap,” including that for moderate income persons, the Court reasoned the new rule was a “limited, narrowly tailored strategy designed to expand the provision of legal and law related services to (persons) in need of individualized legal assistance with non-complex legal problems.”¹⁹

Subpart (A) of APR 28 states in part: “The purpose of this rule is to authorize certain persons to render limited legal assistance or advice in approved practice areas of law.”

The Rule establishes a Limited License Legal Technician Board comprised of lawyers and non-lawyers which will recommend practice areas and license requirements on a go-forward basis and which will oversee administration of a licensing examination. In particular, the Rule requires that applicants:

- Be 18 years or older.
- “Be of good moral character and demonstrate fitness to practice as a...(LLLT)”
- Have an associate level degree or higher.
- Have earned 45 credit hours in a core curriculum of paralegal studies with the curriculum also being developed in conjunction with an ABA-approved law school.
- Each applicant must take an oath similar to an attorney’s oath.

Licensing requirements for Rule 28 include that successful applicants must:

- Pass a written examination.
- Acquire 3,000 hours of “substantive law-related work experience supervised by a licensed lawyer.” These 3,000 hours can precede the licensure (in other words, it appears that an experienced paralegal can apply to be a LLLT and be licensed upon passing the written examination).
- Carry malpractice insurance.

Attend annual CLE courses.

Rule 28 is very specific in terms of the scope of practice in which a Limited License Legal Technician can engage. In particular, under the rule, a LLT can:

- Perform usual paralegal duties.

¹⁹ Id. at 11.

- “Perform legal research and draft letters and pleadings documents beyond (customary paralegal duties), if the work is reviewed and approved by a Washington lawyer.”
- “Advise a client as to other documents that may be necessary to the client’s case and explain how such documents or pleadings may affect the client’s case.”
- All LLLTs are required to enter into a written contract “prior to the performance of the services for a fee...”
- LLLTs cannot appear in court or at administrative proceedings or engage in mediations or other forms of alternative dispute resolution (including negotiating settlements or agreements) on behalf of a client.

Under the Rule, an LLLT’s practice is restricted to “Domestic Relations” which is defined narrowly and confined to child support modification; divorces; parenting plans and other less complicated family law matters. Rule 28 specifically prohibits LLLTs from advising on the division of real estate or retirement assets or on bankruptcy or anti-harassment orders.

Other notable features of Rule 28 include that LLLTs are to be “held to the standard of care of a Washington lawyer.” Additionally, the Rule mandates creating a LLLT IOLTA program “for the proper handling of funds coming into the possession of the Limited License Legal Technician.” Moreover, Washington state law relative to the attorney-client privilege and law of a lawyer’s fiduciary responsibility to the client “shall apply to the Limited License Legal Technician-client relationship to the same extent as (they) would apply to an attorney-client relationship.”

Representatives of the Washington State Bar Association and Washington Supreme Court LLLT board presented to the Task Force at its first meeting in February 2016. At that time, there were nine LLLTs who were practicing, four independently of a law practice. (Approximately 100-200 people are currently taking the educational prerequisites.) The total cost for completion of the educational components of the program was approximately $15,000 and LLLTs were charging between $60-90/hour for their services. The Washington State Bar is paying for the expenses of the licensing and oversight process for the first five years of the program with the goal for the program to be self-supporting by licensing and exam fees.

Recommendations

A majority of the Task Force recommends the MSBA refine a proposal to be submitted to the Minnesota Supreme Court for the creation of an LLLT-type practitioner to expand access to legal assistance, particularly to low and modest income clients across the state with a focus in rural areas. Task Force members are aware of concerns about the LLLT model – the costs involved in setting up a separate regulatory structure, the expense (albeit less than for a JD) of satisfying the requirements for licensure, the potential for competition with lawyers (in particular, younger lawyers and lawyers in some rural communities) and the belief that clients who work with LLLT-type practitioners will receive second-class service. All of these concerns, however significant, must be balanced against the reality that significant segments of the community lack access to any legal assistance, particularly in poor and rural communities.²⁰ Moreover, by providing a pathway for licensure, an LLLT-type program can begin to mitigate the appeal of non-regulated providers who engage in the unauthorized practice of law.²¹

The Task Force suggests the following parameters for an LLLT-type program:

Education/Experience Requirements

The Task Force suggests a minimum associate level degree with a paralegal certificate and a minimum of 2 years' paralegal experience. Paralegals lacking an associate degree could substitute a certain number of years of service. Education cost is a critical factor in creating the new class of legal professional; if it is too expensive, the program will falter and the population we seek to serve will continue to be without legal assistance. Additionally, given that many paralegals have specialized knowledge in a given legal field (and often know as much, if not more, than their supervising attorney), the associate degree requirement could be waived or relaxed.

Suggested Testing and Licensing Requirements

The Task Force suggests that all candidates should be required to pass a character/fitness test and background investigation. Additionally, they would sit for an examination covering the legal basics in the areas in which practitioners seek to practice (see below). Following exam passage, practitioners would take an oath similar to an attorney's oath and complete continuing legal education classes in the subject area of practice, including an ethics component. For practitioners who open independent offices (see below), they would be required to carry malpractice insurance and comply with IOLTA rules.²²

Since these practitioners will be considered legal professionals, they should be subject to various professionalism requirements. Additionally, these requirements will act to assure competency and reassure the public that they can confidently rely on the work of this new class of practitioners.²³

²⁰ This model would also allow social service agencies to provide legal services to some of their clients on-site without having to refer them to already overburdened legal services and volunteer attorney programs.

²¹ The Committee notes that there are reports of current illegal advocate practices representing landlords in eviction cases and parties in family law matters. The Committee hopes that by regulating stand-alone practice, illegal practitioners might be prosecuted or sanctioned.

²² It bears noting that current Minnesota rules do not require licensed attorneys to carry malpractice insurance, although they must disclose whether or not they do as part of the annual attorney registration process.

²³ Some members believed that the administrative costs of the Washington LLLT system weighed against supporting the recommendation. In the first two years since the Washington program has been operational, nineteen LLLT licenses have been issued. It is unknown how many years it would take for the LLLT system to be self-supported through license fees in the same way that the attorney license system is funded. That means that the resources necessary to create a new regulatory structure for LLLTs would have to come from somewhere else. In Washington, the resources to fund LLLT administration have come from their attorney licensing body itself. Some ALM task force members felt that in Minnesota any increase in access to justice spending would be better directed to civil legal aid rather than to the creation of an LLLT infrastructure and to ongoing regulation.

Independent Practitioners

Practitioners may be able to practice independent of attorney supervision and operate “stand alone” businesses/practices. In certain cases, usually based upon practice areas, some form of attorney oversight might be helpful. Nevertheless, to enable practitioners to serve marginalized or more remote geographic communities, the Task Force determined that allowing these practitioners to work independently would best serve the goal of providing access to justice to the targeted population. Questions about competency or experience levels (a primary reason for “tethering” to attorneys) could be dealt with through the education/credentialing/examination process and requirements.²⁴

Legal Advice and Practice Areas

Practitioners would be able to give legal advice in specific areas of law where the unmet legal needs is most prevalent, such as estate planning, family law, corporate representation, conciliation court matters, unemployment insurance, domestic abuse issues, landlord-tenant, social security benefits and immigration. As with Washington State, there should be an effort to approve the program with one or two legal areas before expanding to additional areas of practice. This would allow the effectiveness of the program to be assessed before program expansion.²⁵

Court Appearance

Practitioners could be permitted to appear in court on a limited basis relative to clearly defined legal matters or controversies with court approval and only for clients who meet certain income thresholds similar to Legal Aid eligibility.

CONCLUSION

The Bench and Bar continue to struggle with the need to provide legal services to low and moderate income residents of Minnesota. History has demonstrated those needs will not dissipate over time and with the increasing economic challenges facing lawyers, it seems unlikely that lawyers alone can meet this need. The Bar should suggest changes the Court and Legislature to meet this need.

The two alternatives suggested in this report – LLLTs and Legal Practitioners – offer two approaches toward meeting that need. Each has its strengths and challenges. But, the failure to act ensures that people of low and moderate income continue to confront a challenging and often difficult legal system that is necessary to resolve the legal issues and disputes in their lives. While some additional work is necessary to flesh out details, draft statutory and rule changes, each of ²⁴ Stand-alone advocate practices have existed in the past in Minnesota. The City of Minneapolis had such a practice, with the Minneapolis Housing Service. At first, several housing advocates were supervised by an on-site attorney. Later, on-site supervision ended, and the City contracted with a legal services program to provide training to the advocates and take calls from them for advice. The service could have been improved by the education and certification requirements of the Washington Model.

²⁵ If the practice areas were limited in scope to underserved areas, LLLTs would not compete with attorneys, new or old. Some members commented that an additional protection against competition with attorneys would be to put limitations on the income levels of clients served by practitioners.

these proposals presents an opportunity for Minnesota lawyers to take a significant step towards fulfilling one of their core missions – “achieving effective and equal justice for all.”

Handout for Fall 2016 Listening Sessions

The Alternative Legal Models Task Force is co-chaired by Susan Wiens of Minneapolis and Ken White of Mankato and consists of 22 members, appointed by the MSBA President.

The Task Force's charge is to examine the advisability of supplementing traditional lawyer representation to increase access to justice for those who cannot afford a lawyer. The task force has been reviewing a select number of potential models for increasing access through the use of non-lawyers, including enhanced use of paralegals and an alternative non-lawyer licensure model.

Since February of this year, the Task Force has reviewed an extensive amount of information from other jurisdictions, as well as recent report on the future of the legal profession from the ABA. The Task Force has identified the pros and cons of various options such as:

- Washington State Limited License Legal Technician program (LLLT) (the first of its kind in the US) which provides a process for non-lawyers to be licensed to provide limited legal advice in certain narrowly-defined legal areas (currently only family law). LLLTs must meet specific educational, training and testing requirements and are individually subject to the jurisdiction and oversight of the Washington state bar.
- Enhanced use of paralegals in the practice of law and delivery of legal services, as recently piloted in British Columbia. This model, in its most basic form, allows a lawyer to employ a skilled "designated paralegal" in his/her legal practice to provide, to the extent the lawyer deems proper, legal advice and representation of the client in court. The lawyer remains responsible for the activities of the designated paralegal in the same way Minnesota lawyers remain legally and ethically responsible for those that work for them and their law firms. There is no separate licensure for the paralegal beyond the supervising attorney.
- Regulated non-lawyer provider for limited tasks, as permitted by statute. This would include registered document preparers, as permitted in Arizona, California and Nevada, who may assist with the completion of forms without providing legal advice.

The Task Force co-chairs are presenting information about these options to solicit feedback from the legal profession in listening sessions throughout Minnesota. The Task Force plans a more detailed report on its work for the December 2016 Assembly meeting with the goal of presenting any formal recommendations at the April 2017 Assembly meeting

Practicing Law and the Unauthorized Practice of Law

Susan M. Humiston
Director, Office of Lawyers Professional Responsibility
Susan.Humiston@courts.state.mn.us
651-297-2963

Authority

- ▶ Ethics rules do not define the practice of law.
- ▶ Provide that “a lawyer” shall not practice law in a jurisdiction in violation of the regulation of the profession in that jurisdiction. Rule 5.5(a), Minnesota Rules of Professional Conduct.
- ▶ Two additional resources—Supreme Court case law and Minn. Stat. § 481.02

Authority

- ▶ Case law —no comprehensive definition.
- ▶ In discussing UPL, the Court stated:
 - ▶ “The line drawn between the work of a law clerk and an attorney is a fine one. The composition and preparation of legal documents by one not authorized to practice law for approval and signature by an attorney does not ordinarily constitute the practice of law. As long as the legal assistant’s work is of a preparatory nature only, such as legal research and investigation, such that the work merges with the work of a supervising attorney, it is not considered the practice of law. Where, however, the non-lawyer acts in a representative capacity in protecting, enforcing, or defending the legal rights of another, and advises and consults that person in connection with those rights, the non-lawyer steps over that line.” In re Jorissen, 391 N.W.2d 822 (Minn. 1986) (interpreting the predecessor rule to Rule 5.5) (internal citations omitted).

Authority

- ▶ Case law — no comprehensive definition.
- ▶ Examples from case law of UPL:
 - ▶ Meeting with client, reviewing documents and accepting retainer— In re Day, 710 N.W.2d 789 (Minn. 2006).
 - ▶ Negotiating settlement on behalf of a party — In re Ray, 452 N.W.2d 689 (Minn. 1990)
 - ▶ Appearing in court or contacting opposing counsel in a representational capacity — In re Jorissen

Authority

Statute—Minn. Stat. § 481.02—Unauthorized Practice of Law

- ▶ Misdemeanor
- ▶ Authority to prosecute with county attorneys or AG's Office—Not Office of Lawyers Professional Responsibility
- ▶ Long statute but basically says—It is unlawful for a person who is not a member of the bar of Minnesota as a lawyer
 - ▶ “to appear as an attorney or counselor at law in any action or proceeding in any court in this state to maintain, conduct, or defend the same”
 - ▶ “to hold out as competent or qualified to give legal advice or counsel”
 - ▶ “to prepare legal documents”
 - ▶ “for a fee or any legal consideration, to give legal advice or counsel”

Authority

Statute—Minn. Stat. § 481.02—Unauthorized Practice of Law

- ▶ “to prepare a will” or similar instrument of trust
- ▶ For a fee, prepare any legal document, with some exceptions noted.

Authority

Rule 5.8, MRPC, Employment of Disbarred, Suspended, or Involuntarily Inactive Lawyers.

Cannot:

- (1) render legal consultation or advice to the client;
- (2) appear on behalf of the client in any hearing or proceeding or before any [legal proceeding] unless the rules of the tribunal permit nonlawyers to appear and the client has been informed of the disbarment, suspension or disability inactive status;
- (3) appear as a representative of the client at a deposition or other discovery matter;
- (4) negotiate or transact any matter for or on behalf of the client with third parties;
- (5) receive, disburse, or otherwise handle the client's funds; or
- (6) engage in activities that constitute the practice of law.

Authority

Conversely, Can

- (1) preform legal work of a preparatory nature for the lawyer's review;
- (2) communicate directly with a client regarding such matters as scheduling, billing, updates, information gathering, and confirmation of receipt or sending of correspondence or messages;
- (3) accompany a lawyer to a deposition or other discovery matter for the limited purpose of providing clerical assistance.

Supervision

Ethics rules impose supervision responsibilities over non-lawyers:

Rule 5.3, MRPC

(a) shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that the nonlawyer's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer;

Supervision

Rule 5.3, MRPC

(c) responsible for conduct of a nonlawyer for violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct:

(1) the lawyer orders or, with the knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies the conduct involved; or

(2) the lawyer with managerial authority knows of the conduct at time when consequences can be avoided or mitigated and fails to take reasonable remedial action.

Not personally responsible for actions unless ratify, order or do not stop when can

Supervision

Compare: Student Practice Rules, Rule 1.04

Supervising Attorney:

- (1) be a member of the bar of this court;
- (2) assume personal professional responsibility for and supervision of the student's work;
- (3) assist the student to the extent necessary;
- (4) sign all pleadings;
- (5) appear with the student in all trials;
- (6) appear with the student at all other proceedings unless the attorney deems his or her personal appearance unnecessary to assure proper supervision. This authorization shall be made in writing and shall be available to the judge or other official conducting the proceeding upon request.

No authority to enforce

Supervision

Potential issues to address:

- ▶ Actions considering are defined as a misdemeanor under state law (appearing in court; negotiating settlements; completing legal documents without lawyer signature)
- ▶ (But this is also true for some of student practice activities and permissible multijurisdictional practice in Minnesota by non-MN lawyers)
- ▶ No disciplinary authority over nonlawyers under ethics rules
- ▶ Limited supervisory hook
- ▶ How to limit to only authorized individuals (already broad misunderstandings)

Crow Wing County Eviction Court Project Proposal, 4.3.19

Purpose.

One of Legal Aid's primary goals is to ensure decent, safe, and stable housing. Evictions are therefore a priority legal issue, because they can lead to housing instability, homelessness, and barriers to finding future housing. Despite our current efforts to aid tenants in evictions, there are still tenants who do not contact our office and cannot afford private counsel. These litigants therefore represent themselves. This is bad for tenants, but also for landlords, courts, and the community.

Lawyers provide better outcomes for the tenants. But lawyers also help lighten the burden on the legal system. Lawyers mean cases are more likely to settle. If a case does not settle, litigation is likely to be more efficient. Judges have a more complete understanding of the relevant law and facts. Tenants have a better understanding of their responsibilities. Tenants who must move are more likely to move out on time, and they are more likely to find other housing. Higher likelihood of settlement, efficiency, and tenant understanding benefits tenants, landlords, and the court system.

There is also a ripple effect into the community at large. Housing stability means fewer familial disputes caused by the stress of eviction, lightening the load on social service providers and law enforcement. Employers have employees who can come to work because they have a housing plan. Schools have fewer absence and behavior problems because of housing crises.

The model we propose has been effective in other jurisdictions. While Crow Wing County is smaller than the Minneapolis program, many of the tools they use there are applicable here.

Methods.

Our method to reach this goal is by improving access to legal services by being present at the courthouse when eviction hearings occur. We aim to provide legal information to all people, and we can represent and advise any tenant who qualifies for our services.

Legal Aid will provide staff at the courthouse for the 1:30pm eviction calendar on Wednesdays. Legal Aid will provide all technology and materials necessary to perform the task. We envision having a private conference room with a clinic sign posted, staffed by Legal Aid, near the courtroom. Generally we will have a paralegal staffing the room, and at least one lawyer present to advise and represent tenants. Tenants who are not already clients would privately complete an intake in the conference room to ensure that they qualify financially for our services. We anticipate that most tenants will qualify, but if they do not, we will educate them about the process and provide them with pro se materials and resources.

We will have written materials available at the main table for all people, regardless of whether they are a tenant or a landlord.

For tenants who do qualify, where possible, we will represent them in the court process. Representation will include approaching landlords to attempt to seek a negotiated resolution, appearing in court with tenants, and, where necessary, trying eviction cases to a judgment. Legal Aid will have at the courthouse the technology necessary to contemporaneously efile any pleadings relating to representation. We anticipate this will be at least one laptop, a wireless device for internet access, and a scanning device. These latter two devices could be a cellular telephone.

Legal Aid will still continue to use our normal intake process for evictions (people can call or come to our office), which is still preferable because this helps us address problems before they get to court. Therefore, any publicity should encourage people to contact Legal Aid as soon as they know they have a legal problem.

Legal Aid will track relevant data.

How Court Administration can help.

1. Allow Legal Aid staff to bring wireless devices to aid in the administration of the program (e.g., allowing non-lawyer staff to bring a mobile phone into the courthouse).
2. Provide one designated conference room near the eviction courtroom for Legal Aid staff to meet privately with clients.
3. Allow Legal Aid to post a temporary sign regarding the program indicating the conference room we will be in.
4. Court staff at the main office and in the eviction courtroom (including the court staff person responsible for rounding up parties before hearings) will encourage unrepresented tenants to contact Legal Aid for assistance.
 - a. On days Legal Aid is at the courthouse, court staff will direct tenants to the Legal Aid table outside the courtroom.
 - b. On days Legal Aid is not at the courthouse, court staff will encourage tenants to call or go to Legal Aid right away.
5. Track data, especially for any cases in which Legal Aid is not involved.

Future.

If the project goes well, we could consider expanding the program:

- We anticipate that a natural outgrowth of the project will be to improve relationships with local landlords so that we can seek proactive solutions to avoid litigation entirely.
- Invite other housing-related providers that might assist in resolving cases. For example, we could invite agencies like Lutheran Social Services, Bridges of Hope, and Crow Wing County financial services. This program could be a one-stop service “hub” for people in a crisis at the place they have to be anyway--the courthouse. This would also allow service agencies to quickly and effectively work together. More services to tenants will lead to housing stability, and is anticipated to lead to more settlements and reduce the burden on the court system.
- Expand the program to include other landlord-tenant issues heard at the same time as evictions, such as rent escrow actions.
- Expand the program to include Orders For Protection since they tend to be heard on Wednesday afternoons.

CROW WING COUNTY EVICTION CLINIC

Legal Aid Service of Northeastern Minnesota (LASNEM) began the Crow Wing County Eviction Clinic project on April 10, 2019. The project has been ongoing for eight weeks currently, as of June 2, 2019.

The Crow Wing County District Court schedules eviction matters on Wednesday afternoons. There has been a total of 37 hearings scheduled in eight weeks, or an average of 4.625 per week.

30 of the cases have been the first admit/deny hearings or eviction trials and 7 have been motion hearings.

Legal Aid Service of Northeastern Minnesota has provided representation at 19 hearings to 14 defendants; 2 defendants received counsel and advice; 3 defendants were not eligible for servicesⁱ; 4 defendants declinedⁱⁱ; 9 defendants did not make an appearance and the cases proceeded by default.

ⁱ Applicants who are not eligible receive information ⁱⁱ Reasons for declining services included: settlement already agreed upon before court with landlord and/or private attorney already retained by defendant.

LASNEM has provided services to 16 clients through the Crow Wing County Eviction Clinic. Of the 16 clients served, only 3 had completed an application for services or contacted LASNEM prior to the court date and applying directly at the Eviction Clinic. 77% of clients applied for services at Court.

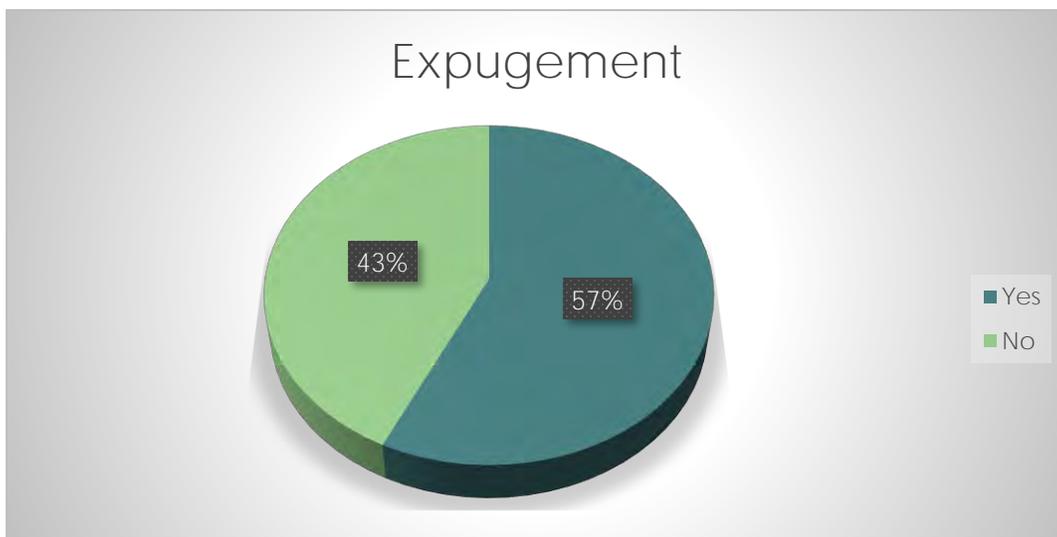

*LASNEM has had one person apply for services through the Eviction clinic for a non-eviction housing matter.

LASNEM has provided representation to 14 clients at 19 hearings in the 8 weeks of the Crow Wing County Eviction Clinic.

7 of the 14 cases have been resolved. 7 cases remain open and are ongoing. 5 of the unresolved 7 cases began one week ago.

4 of the 7 resolved eviction cases have been expunged and removed from Court records.

Executive Summary

Minnesota was one of seven states to receive a grant from the Public Welfare Foundation, administered by the National Center for State Courts (NCSC), to assess relevant available resources and to design a strategic action plan for achieving the Justice for All (JFA) vision of a system where everyone has access to effective assistance for their essential civil legal needs through a comprehensive approach that provides a continuum of meaningful and appropriate services.¹ This project required close coordination among the Minnesota Judicial Branch, civil legal aid and the private bar as the project leads, as well as input and review from over sixty stakeholder groups from across the state.²

The Justice for All Steering Committee led the assessment effort. Committee members examined the sixteen components detailed in the NCSC Guidance Materials for the project and the results of that assessment are detailed in this report. Working with community partners, the Steering Committee held outreach events and conducted focus groups to bring new perspectives to this work.

Based on the assessment and the input from community partners, there were five areas that the Steering Committee identified as high priorities for improving the Minnesota access to justice system. The five strategic goals identified in the plan are:

1. Simplify family law court processes to both (1) maximize efficiency and resources within the Minnesota Judicial Branch and (2) improve litigant usability, trust and confidence in the civil justice system.
2. Increase the number of attorneys providing discrete task (also referred to as “limited scope” or “unbundled”) representation to low- and middle-income people with civil legal needs through a robust and effective referral system.
3. Create a “no wrong door” system through which people with civil legal needs access legal information, self-help resources, and legal providers, through a user-centric approach that places the burden on the system to provide the best referral at the outset.
4. Integrate legal information, resources and referrals into community settings through co-located services, community collaboration and prevention efforts that build trust and decrease the number of civil court cases, with a specific focus on the prevention of housing evictions across Minnesota.
5. Increase communication across existing governance structures to implement the Justice for All projects and create a new governance committee specific to the triage portal work.

The strategic goals outlined above led to the following key initiatives to be implemented in 2018:

- Convene a Triage Portal Advisory Committee governance structure to coordinate the work already being done to redesign the civil legal aid online intake system with additional court self-help, ADR and private bar resources and ensure there are sufficient resources for the long-term success of this project.
- Create a Self-Represented Litigant (SRL) Judge Team to train judges and be a resource for the Minnesota Judicial Branch on best practices for working work with self-represented litigants

- Recommend simplified family law processes in conjunction with Early Case Management work underway in State Court Administration and develop a pilot project.
- Develop an Unbundled Services Roster and integrate this within both the triage portal and the phone intake and referral networks statewide.
- Create a Rural Housing Prevention Toolkit to support community partnership work in rural Minnesota.
- Fund Community Dispute Resolution Programs to provide remote mediation services to expand statewide reach and better connect with community partners in underserved areas.
- Fund a part-time position focused on general community outreach work in targeted areas in Greater Minnesota.

I. Introduction

Project Overview & Goals

Minnesota applied for a Justice for All grant to develop a shared future vision across the civil justice system of access to effective assistance for essential civil legal needs through a comprehensive approach that provides a continuum of meaningful and appropriate services. The Justice for All Grant was established in response to Resolution 5. Unanimously passed in 2015 by the Conference of Chief Justices (CCJ) and Conference of State Court Administrators (COSCA), Resolution 5³ supports an aspirational goal of 100 % meaningful access to justice for all in the civil court system. Building on our strong stakeholder network in the civil justice arena, our Justice for All project leverages existing investments and integrates systems to provide coordinated civil legal services across the state.

Minnesota has a strong foundation on which to build our Justice for All work. The Minnesota Judicial Branch (MJB) has a stated access to justice goal, which it defines as working toward “[a] justice system that is open, affordable, understandable, and provides appropriate levels of service to all users.”⁴ The Minnesota Legal Services Coalition (MLSC), the regional legal aid programs which together serve all 87 counties in Minnesota, work closely to enhance coordination and to prevent duplication of effort among legal services programs.⁵ Minnesota also has strong volunteer attorney programs and issue- and population-specific legal services providers. The Minnesota State Bar Association (MSBA) has operated the Legal Assistance to the Disadvantaged (LAD) committee since 1981, which works to secure more stable funding sources for civil legal aid and develop policy proposals promoting access to justice.⁶

While these foundational strengths provided an excellent starting point for our work, Minnesota’s robust and decentralized services culture creates challenges. Multiple entry points for seeking legal assistance in a large state make it difficult for providers across the system to know all of what is being offered and how their service or program fits. The complexity of programs and services also makes it difficult for people to know how to access the system to reach the appropriate services for their needs. In designing the process for our planning, we saw a need to increase shared understanding among our many program stakeholders of the entire web of services across the system. In addition to identifying the gaps in services, we wanted our process to identify, expand or bring to scale some of the promising practices showing good results in various parts of the state. In addition, we wanted to move towards a more integrated system that would help people navigate this very complex system to find the services they need.

The vision held at the forefront of our strategic planning effort was to work towards a system where everyone has access to effective and equitable assistance for their essential civil legal needs through a comprehensive approach that provides a continuum of meaningful and appropriate services.

Project Approach & Process

Project Team

Our project structure was divided into three tiers of participation: a planning team, a steering committee, and stakeholders.

The planning team included:

- Judge Sarah Hennesy, Assistant Chief Judge, Seventh District
- Bridget Gernander, Grant Manager for the Minnesota Judicial Branch Legal Services and Minnesota's IOLTA Program Director
- Lisa Cohen and Mary Kaczorek of the Minnesota Legal Services Coalition
- Ginny Belden-Charles, consultant, and her partners, Bob-e Simpson Epps and Corrie Lapinsky.

The planning team was responsible for designing the planning process, designing and facilitating project meetings, gathering research data, project management and communications and drafting all project documents, including the final recommendations and written plan.

In developing our project leadership, we recognized that Minnesota's rich network of services and systems necessitated a wide range of stakeholders to be actively engaged to this effort. The Justice for All steering committee consisted of representatives from the following entities:

- Minnesota District Court
- Legal Services Advisory Committee
- Statewide Self Help Center
- Volunteer Lawyers Network
- Legal Services of Northwest Minnesota
- Greater Twin Cities United Way
- Minnesota Appellate Courts
- State Law Library
- Minnesota State Bar Association
- Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid
- Client Representative
- Legal Services State Support

The role of the Steering Committee was to conduct the assessment, identify and agree on the priorities, strategic goals and initiatives, and to approve the final plan.

In addition to the Planning Team and Steering Committee, participation was sought from a wide range of stakeholders outside the legal services network to provide input in the assessment and prioritization phases. Some of these stakeholders participated in steering committee meetings, others came to a larger stakeholder meeting to set priorities, others were invited to review process step outcomes and provide input on these, others were interviewed during various steps. - Minnesota Supreme Court, to provide an overview of the JFA project so far and ensure their support for the emerging priorities (June 2017)
- Minnesota Judicial Branch Committee for Equality and Justice, to tell them about the project and get input; most interested in unbundling and triage (July 2017)
- Minnesota State Bar Association Assembly, to give an overview of the project and get input and support for innovations in unbundled representation (September 2017)
- Minnesota Legal Services Coalition Partners Meetings, to provide updates on the project to civil legal aid stakeholders and receive input (July 2017 and September 2017)
- Minnesota Corporate Counsel Pro Bono Committee, to provide an overview; most interest in triage (September 2017)
- Minnesota District Judges Conference, to give an overview of the Justice for All project and a primer on unbundled attorney ethics rules so judges would support private practice attorneys doing more of this work (December 2017)
- HCBA Pro Bono Working Group, to give an overview of the project and get input and support for innovations in the triage component (September 2017)
- Focus groups of attorneys and self-represented litigants, to get input on the unbundled initiative (November and December 2017)

Project Steps

1. Assessment

Our process for completing this work followed the approach outlined in the guidance materials provided by the Justice for All expert working group.⁷ We began by completing an inventory assessment of the 16 components outlined in the guidance materials, organized into 6 clusters which we used to conduct our assessment:⁸

We organized the components into these clusters primarily because of who in the justice and broader community would need to participate in each discussion. The community and triage discussions were large enough that we felt each deserved its own meeting and separate analysis. Three of the components we assessed differently: Design, Governance & Management; Resource Planning; and Technology Capacity. We considered these three in all other component assessments and again on their own.

The Steering Committee held an assessment meeting for each of the first five component clusters. Additional individuals working on programs or services within the cluster were included during the meetings and in additional information-gathering. Pre-work was done before each meeting to identify existing programs/resources, identify additional participants and gather relevant research data for that cluster.

The first part of the assessment was to provide an overview of the existing programs and services. We invited those engaged in relevant programs to provide information and answer questions for participants. This proved to be an important outcome of our assessment: a better understanding of the full range of legal services and programs in urban and rural Minnesota; questioning and dialoguing with those directly engaged in those services; and learning from these stakeholders about new developments, overlaps and gaps in services across the state. The result was a more comprehensive map of the various pieces of the system and how they fit into the web of services across the state.

The second part of each assessment meeting was discussion of a series of questions laid out in the project assessment materials for each component in the cluster. We asked: (1) who do these serve, (2) how much of the need is met, what are the (3) strengths and (4) gaps for each component, and we highlighted when (5) additional information was needed to complete the assessment.

The Community Integration and Prevention assessment included a longer and larger meeting in which members of community groups were invited to share information on their perceptions of the access to justice in the civil legal system. In this meeting, previous research efforts⁹ were validated regarding community perceptions, particularly in low-income and immigrant communities and communities of color: awareness of the differences between civil and criminal court is lacking; many community members do not know when they have a legal problem; and if they do, legal problems are often viewed as a lower priority to address than the more immediate needs for safety, shelter, and food. People feel intimidated going to court and communities of color and immigrant communities often do not feel welcome in the judicial system. We learned from the participants that legal/community partnerships were seen as highly important in building trust, educating communities and in doing prevention work.

2. Prioritization

We used a two-phased prioritization process. The first phase was a survey of Steering Committee member asking them to independently prioritize areas based on the inventory assessment. The second phase was a group discussion about the components and their respective rankings to come to develop a group consensus.

After completing the component assessments, the Steering Committee reviewed the summary assessment notes and completed a poll that included the following three questions:

- Choose the three component areas that you believe are the highest priority to address
- Explain why you chose these areas (how you prioritized)
- Please explain any disagreements you have with the summary assessment document or provide any additional information

The results of the poll¹⁰ were shared with the Steering Committee members, who discussed the poll results and identified areas of agreement and disagreement. The Steering Committee next discussed criteria for prioritization, reviewing the criteria from the JFA guidance materials and a summary of prioritization criteria pulled from the survey responses.

⁹ <https://www.lsc.gov/sites/default/files/attach/resources/LegalNeedsStudy-MinnesotaBarAssociation.pdf>

¹⁰ See Appendix A, Survey Results.

The group then discussed and decided on the following criteria (developed as questions we would use to assess potential action areas within each component):

- Is it something we can accomplish?
- Will it enable us to serve more people?
- Will it improve trust in the civil justice system?
- Will it leverage our strengths?
- Will it address our weaknesses?
- Will it have significant benefits at a reasonable cost?
- Will it have broad reach across the civil justice system?
- Will it respond to the most important needs of the community?

We evaluated each of the 16 different components using these prioritization criteria.¹¹ Finally, we selected five Target Areas to move forward for further research over the summer months. The five components for further research presented to stakeholders were:

1. Community Integration and Prevention
2. Triage, Referral and Channel Integration
3. Design, Governance & Management
4. Unbundled (Discrete Task) Legal Assistance
5. Simplification

Research teams were established to explore promising practices/approaches in the five select target areas and develop recommendations to bring forward for final prioritization and goal setting.

For example, in the Community Integration and Prevention component we had learned through the assessment process that legal- community partnerships were an important way in which community members gained trust and successfully accessed needed services. We researched eight successful partnership programs using a combination of online research and interviews.¹² We learned about the partnerships' origins, focus areas, the outcomes they had achieved to-date, and what had they learned in establishing a community partnership. Findings and recommendations from this research were aggregated and shared with stakeholders during the fall stakeholders meeting.

At the Fall Stakeholder meeting, discussion tables were set up for each of these five priority areas. Participants first rotated to each of the discussion tables to hear about the practices and recommendations and to ask questions. Then participants were invited to choose one area for deeper discussion. Finally, the full group heard reports from each of the discussions and the meeting finished with a group polling tool to identify the top priorities within the five areas presented.¹³ These formed the basis for the five strategic goals in the plan.

¹¹ See infra Section III, Prioritization Summary.

¹² Successful programs were potentially replicable projects showing positive outcomes. The projects included Legal Aid Service of Northeastern Minnesota's Iron Range Housing Project; Southern Minnesota Regional Legal Services' Frogtown Project Housing Early warning system for vacant buildings; Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid's Bank of America Community Redevelopment Project with Northside Resident's Redevelopment Council; Southeast Roseville Interagency Work Group (SRIWG); Stearns County Felony Domestic Violence Court; Hawaii Justice For All project approach and activities; Kansas City "Adopt-A-Neighborhood" project; and Medical-Legal Partnerships.

3. Action Plan

As a final step, the Planning Team, considering current initiatives, funding sources, Court priorities and recommendations of the Steering Committee and Stakeholder meetings, drafted a set of next step initiatives which were brought to the Steering Committee for discussion and approval.

What follows is Minnesota's strategic action plan outlining our findings and strategic goals, key JFA initiatives, performance measures and communications consideration that will work toward justice for all – a system where everyone has access to effective assistance for their essential civil legal needs through a comprehensive approach that provides a continuum of meaningful and appropriate services. Section II details our assessment findings, Section III discusses our prioritization step, and Section IV details our action plan with key initiatives for 2018 and beyond. Section V discusses our communications plan.

¹³ See Appendix A, Survey Results.

II. Assessment Findings

This section contains a summary of our assessment for all 16 Justice for All Components, organized into clusters. These are summaries of our findings from our steering committee meetings and research completed during the assessment.

Cluster 1.

The components in this cluster included:

- Courtroom Assistance Services
- Judicial & Court Staff Education
- Simplification
- Compliance Assistance

To prepare for our assessment of these components, the planning team consulted with leadership with the Statewide Self Help center and the Judicial Education Program Manager at the State Court Administrator's Office. The steering committee met via webinar to discuss these components, and overall assessed these components as areas of relative strength for Minnesota. Following the assessment, we also held a webinar to learn more about Alaska’s simplified family court processes and researched the family law simplification efforts underway in Oregon, Utah, Iowa and Idaho.

Cluster 2.

The components in this cluster included:

- Broad Self Help Informational Services
- Plain Language Forms
- Language Services Integration

To complete our assessment of these components, the steering committee consulted with the Minnesota Judicial Branch’s new forms manager, the community education and outreach staff for legal aid, a representative from the Attorney General’s office, and a client representative who runs a translation and interpretation company. While recognizing there is always more work to be done in these areas, we also assessed these components as areas of relative strength for Minnesota.

Broad Self Help Informational Services
Key elements for this component: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • All information provided in plain language • Instructions on legal processes, applicable law, and how to prepare for and present a case • Links to information and forms on other specific subject matters, including out-of-court resolution • Materials optimized for mobile viewing • Information on which courthouses hear what cases and court access (e.g., transportation) • Staffed self-help centers in/near courthouse or accessible in community • Multiple channels of providing information (e.g., workshops, online) 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Legal Aid: Hundreds of online & print resources with focus on issues with which legal aid provides service; LiveHelp with State Law Library. • AG’s office: Print & online materials with consumer focus; respond to public. • State Law Library: Librarians & online resources; broader scope; also serve inmates. • Self Help Center: Statewide remote services, some districts in-person; online help topics. “Going to Court” videos in multiple languages. • Great online resources & use of technology. • Sustainable remote service delivery at SHC - ~25K Statewide SHC calls/yr. • Strong in-person services in some areas - ~40K Henn Co. SHC walk-in customers/yr. • Self-help is relatively well-resourced at courts & legal aid. Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Less comprehensive in-person coverage in Greater Minnesota. • Not many preventative materials. • Gaps in materials – e.g. service of process. • Inconsistent internet access in Greater Minnesota may limit access to videos and online resources. • Could improve governance, especially coordination with AG’s office.

Plain Language Forms

Cluster 3.

The components in this cluster included:

- Role Flexibility for Other Professionals
- Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) Integration
- Unbundled (Discrete Task) Legal Assistance
- Expansion & Efficiency Improvements of Full Service Representation

To complete our assessment of these components, the Access to Justice Director at the Minnesota State Bar Association (MSBA) prepared reports for the Steering Committee on recent efforts at the MSBA about Alternative Legal Models and the state of unbundled in the private market. The Legal Services Advisory Committee program manager gathered data on unbundled and full representation within legal services. A solo practitioner with unbundled as her primary practice model and shared her perspective on doing unbundled work within the private market with the Steering Committee. We also invited representatives from Community Mediation Minnesota and the Bureau of Mediation Services to discuss ADR.

Given the recent outcomes of the MSBA’s Alternative Legal Models Taskforce, the Steering Committee viewed role flexibility for other professionals as not feasible at this time. The Steering Committee viewed ADR as a promising area with existing momentum. While viewing full representation as a strength area, it saw unbundled within the private bar as lacking necessary momentum and infrastructure to adequately serve people unable to get help at legal aid. The MSBA Access to Justice Director completed some additional research about unbundled at the request of the Steering Committee as part of our “promising practices research.” We also completed some focus groups with both attorneys and potential consumers of unbundled legal services to gauge interest in this approach. Other than not liking the term "unbundled", the response from the potential customers was very favorable to limited scope or a la carte services.

Role Flexibility for Other Professionals
Key elements for this component: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Assist litigants in navigating court processes on-site • Assist litigants in selecting and filling out forms • Assist litigants in complying with legal processes for case actions with large numbers of self-represented litigants 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • None; there is no existing work in this area. Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • The MSBA Future of Legal Education Task Force created an Alternative Legal Models Task Force that researched promising models and drafted recommendations for the broader MSBA Assembly. In 2017, the MSBA voted down proposals for both limited license technicians and expanded paralegal roles. This could be revisited in the future, but there is not political capital to revisit this issue in the near term.

Alternative Dispute Resolution Integration
Key elements for this component: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Provision of information about ADR modes and processes, substantive ADR law, and consequences • ADR information available online and integrated into portal • Clear codes of ethics for the non-judicial neutrals • Access to ADR modes provided within procedural context, possibly through self-help • Ethically appropriate collaborations between ATJ stakeholders and ADR providers 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Existing infrastructure: there is an Office of Collaboration and Dispute Resolution within the state’s Bureau of Mediation Services. • Community Mediation Minnesota new umbrella for expanding ADR statewide. • ~500 cases/yr for metro programs; ~30-200 cases/yr for Greater Minnesota programs. • Other nonprofits & community-based programs outside of formal ADR. • 70% of people served by Community Dispute Resolution Programs (CDRP) are low income. Services are often free or sliding-scale fee. • Community-centered approach; building infrastructure to expand • Current programming has high agreement rates & satisfaction levels • New governance/coordination structure with the CDRP Advisory Council. • High potential for technology to meet rural need; e.g. Skype <hr/> Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Only 8 of 87 counties served plus additional programs; • Some legal areas missing (e.g. divorce, guardianship). • Concerns about power imbalances and monitoring quality of volunteers. • Not always well coordinated with courts. • Not as well-resourced in Minnesota as in other states.

Unbundled (Discrete Task) Legal Assistance
Key elements for this component: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Lawyers willing to provide legal services on a discrete task (unbundled) basis • Training and resources to support participating lawyers • Screening, triage and referral components to connect these lawyers with persons seeking their services • Processes for conclusion of limited scope representation, (i.e. client is aware of any remaining legal needs and how to do that through self-help or other resources) • Adoption of rules (e.g., ghostwriting, conflicts, limited appearance) that 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Legal aid & pro bono do a lot of unbundled. Legal aid has offices statewide - ~22K advice & brief service/yr by legal aid staff. ~11K advice & brief service/yr by pro bono & Judicare. • Many online market-based unbundled services (e.g. Avvo.) • A few in-person market-based unbundled practices (e.g. Legal Nudge.) • Minnesota Legal Advice Online. • Minnesota has good unbundled rules from the professional responsibility office. • MSBA provides good online resources for unbundled. • Technology used well in both legal aid & private bar.

Expansion & Efficiency Improvements of Full Service Representation
Key elements for this component: With the proviso that strategies will be different for free legal services versus market-based solutions, key elements include: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Assessment of existing service capacity in the state, factoring in geographic differences where they exist. • Identification of effective service pro bono, legal aid and market-based delivery strategies that have potential to be replicated or scaled up. • Incorporation of litigation strategies that have the potential to impact many people and thus decrease the need for full representation in the future. • Training and assistance with implementation of best practices for utilizing technology and process improvement; and identification of potential funding, pro bono and in-kind support to make this possible. • Training and mentoring for pro bono volunteers, both on substantive issues and on how to work with low-income clients. 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Legal aid, Judicare, and pro bono attorneys do full rep at no cost to client. Legal aid has offices statewide - ~9K full rep/yr by legal aid staff. ~2K full rep/yr by pro bono & Judicare. • Modest means family law panels in Hennepin and Ramsey Counties generally serve up to 300% FPG; HCBA does ~50/yr. MSBA expanding panel statewide in late 2017. Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Difficult to find lawyers for Judicare, pro bono or staff programs because of shrinking pool to draw from in rural areas. • Resourcing Greater Minnesota is challenge – funding often tied to decreasing population.

Cluster 4.

The component in this cluster included:

- Community Integration & Prevention

While legal aid and the courts have started promising work in this area, the Steering Committee recognized that this area needs significant growth in Minnesota. To complete our assessment of this component, we had discussions with community and social service stakeholders and held a standalone meeting where we asked:

- What are the types of issues that cause your community members to need to go to civil court?
- Where do your community members go for help with these issues?
- What resources do you know of in your communities that can assist people with civil court issues/access to civil court?
- Who do these resources serve (and who is not being served)?
- How much of the current need do you think is being met by existing resources?
- What have you heard from your community members about their experiences with civil court?
- What are the barriers to accessing justice within the civil court system for your community members?

The Steering Committee reviewed the existing work happening in the civil justice system, and confirmed its perception that these efforts are insufficient to meet the needs in this area. In an extensive 2011 study of barriers to civil justice in Minnesota,¹⁹ respondents identified most frequently as underserved included the working poor, immigrants and non-English speaking persons, persons with disabilities (particularly those with mental illness), the geographically isolated, youth and ex-offenders. Their most frequently experienced problems included those in the areas of transportation, housing, health care and employment. Community stakeholders in the Justice for All assessment affirmed this study's suggestion that working with community partnerships is a key way to increase access to civil legal aid for underserved populations.

Community Integration & Prevention
Key elements for this component: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Robust information exchange between organizations, including cross training • Community resources integrated into provider services • Collecting and sharing information on user experience across providers • Collaborative partnerships, including social services providers • Community outreach, enabled by a robust communication strategy • Early issue identification and proactive, robust referrals in a range of areas • Education about dispute resolution without legal action • Cross-training between organizations. 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Many Minnesota legal aid programs are underway to strengthen relationships with community partners: Co-located services provided through Bank of America-funded projects, medical-legal partnerships, and other projects. • Legal aid does community outreach events. • State Law Library does outreach with public libraries. • Courts have existing Committee for Equality and Justice and “Know Your Court” model where justices do community outreach. • Call for Justice trained 2-1-1 and other social service providers about legal issue-spotting and referrals through Legal Liaison Program (program closed in late 2017). • Some existing court models that integrate community partners, e.g. restorative justice project in Hennepin County. <hr/> Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Systemic racism and oppression. • Perception that the system isn’t there to help people. Lack of trust of judicial system. • Going to court is complicated and intimidating; court forms are hard to use. • Lack of awareness of legal aid and existing self-help materials. • Difficulty qualifying for free lawyer; difficulty affording a private lawyer. • Access barriers for communities of color, people with disabilities, people living in rural areas, and other communities.

Cluster 5.

The component in this cluster included:

- Triage, Referral, & Channel Integration

As with community integration, the steering committee recognized that this area needs significant growth in Minnesota. To complete our assessment of these components, we held a standalone meeting with representation from the Hennepin County Bar Association, Call for Justice,²⁰ and front-line intake staff from two legal aid organizations who talked about how they complete intake and referral work.

The Legal Services Advisory Committee (LSAC) program manager also presented about a June 2017 report authored by the Legal Services Advisory Committee titled “Analysis of the Civil Legal Aid Infrastructure in Minnesota” that examined client intake and referrals in civil legal services.²¹ The timing of this report meant that it could be used as a resource for the Justice for All work, both in collecting data about current client intake and referral and in hearing community voices through focus groups.

Legal Services State Support, a project of the Minnesota Legal Services Coalition, also presented to the committee about its work in this area. State Support operates Minnesota’s legal information website, LawHelpMinnesota.org, and a statewide online intake system for civil legal aid. It applied for and received federal funding through the Legal Services Corporation Technology Innovation Grant program, and state funding through Minnesota’s Court Technology Fund, to completely redesign the system using a user-centric approach that replicates successful triage and online intake models from other states. Work on this online portal project began in October 2017.

Triage, Referral, & Channel Integration
Key elements for this component: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Identified, consistent triage and referral protocols & practices • Initial triage/assessment and referral by any existing resource (e.g., self-help centers, lawyers, social service agencies) • Effective referrals (i.e. entity can take matter without time, income, or subject matter restrictions precluding service) 	Minnesota System Strengths: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • LawHelpMN.org has online legal directory and statewide online intake for legal aid. • 2-1-1 makes legal referrals - ~14K referrals/yr. • State Law Library and Statewide Self Help Center make referrals. • Knowledgeable intake staff and strong local connections in each legal aid program. • 2-1-1 trained on making legal referrals. • Strengths identified in LSAC Report: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ Capacity for flexible response to the specific needs of local communities and their diverse populations and circumstances ○ Awareness of local conditions ○ Addressing the needs of specific populations and legal needs ○ Self-help materials and online resources

²⁰ Call for Justice was a nonprofit that, among other things, trained 2-1-1 information and referral specialists about making legal referrals. Call for Justice closed in late 2017.

²¹ John Tull et al., Analysis of the Civil Legal Aid Intake Infrastructure in Minnesota: Final Report (June 2017) (on file with author).

<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Central legal aid hotlines, and market-based equivalents for moderate income people, to diagnose legal issues and potential solutions and resolve less complex issues at an early stage • Triage supported by technology (self-help portals and case management systems) • All stakeholders, including non-traditional ones, aware of referral information. 	Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Duplication: most legal aid programs keep their own referral resource guides, in print or via internal intranet. • LawHelp directory hard to use. • Limited phone availability over lunch or after hrs. • Barriers and costs associated with civil legal aid’s access to public court records that impede the efficiency and effectiveness of up-front triage and referral activities, as well as all phases of case evaluation from initial intake through case acceptance and, later, through case investigation. • The LSAC report cited awareness of legal resources, process & technical issues with online intake, delays in responding to applicants, and lack of availability in callback times as gaps in the civil legal aid referral and intake system. It also discussed bounce, including before an applicant reaches legal aid, when an applicant is referred to multiple legal aid programs, and when an applicant has multiple contacts within a program.

Cluster 6.

The components in this cluster included:

- Design, Governance & Management
- Resource Planning
- Technology Capacity

We assessed these components slightly differently than the other components due to a view that these three components are related to all the other components and assessment of the other component clusters would help to inform evaluation of this cluster. Rather than discuss these during the assessment phase with the Steering Committee, the planning team completed an initial assessment of these components on its own and shared its findings with the Steering Committee. During prioritization, the Steering Committee flagged Governance as a high-priority area and dove deeper into this issue in our promising practices research. We also evaluated how governance, resourcing, and technology related to the remaining components during our broader assessment, and again during the action planning phase.

Design, Governance & Management

	Minnesota System Gaps: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Legal aid programs use different case management systems. • Significant limitations with existing statewide online intake platform (to be remedied in 2018).

III. Prioritization

Prioritization Summary

Following our assessment, the next step of our Justice for All project was prioritization. While recognizing every Justice for All component is an important, if not essential, piece to providing access to justice in Minnesota, the question became how to decide which areas to advance first. With limited resources, which areas were our top priorities for the next 2-3 years?

Starting with the NCSC guidance materials, the Steering Committee developed a list of prioritization criteria values:

- Is it something we can accomplish?
- Will it enable us to serve more people?
- Will it improve trust in the civil justice system?
- Will it leverage our strengths?
- Will it address our weaknesses?
- Will it have significant benefits at a reasonable cost?
- Will it have broad reach across the civil justice system?
- Will it respond to the most important needs of the community?

After developing these values, we had a general discussion where we asked these questions of each component (see below chart “Prioritization Takeaways for Each Component” for summary).

Because the JFA components are so different in scope and nature, these criteria ended up serving more as guiding principles than a strict grading rubric. We did not attempt to quantify or fully rank the components by importance. The planning team felt this exercise was unnecessarily complicated: having a detailed ranking would not be more helpful to the broader discussion, and the final list would likely have low consensus among the Steering Committee. Rather, we decided to create three categories to signify importance: Target Areas, Sustaining Areas, and Low-Priority Areas. (See the chart to the right titled “Prioritization Groupings.”)

Target Areas are high-priority and need additional attention, planning, and structure beyond what we are currently doing. Sustaining Areas need support to continue expanding the good work currently being done through existing channels & structures. Every component identified as a Target Area or Sustaining Area needs support. The Target Areas are differentiated by the fact that they need additional, more urgent action than is currently underway in the civil justice system in the Sustaining Areas.

Low-Priority Areas are those areas that were identified as not currently feasible for additional development in Minnesota at this time, but would be revisited in the future.

Prioritization Takeaways for Each Component

Design, Governance & Management

Minnesota has access to justice governance structures for the courts, the bar association and many of the civil legal aid providers. The Steering Committee has wrestled with whether to recommend disbanding some of the existing committees in favor of a new overarching governance structure. The existing structures have achieved much in terms of access to justice measures, including ongoing state legislative funding, strong language access, statewide forms, and self-help resources, and the Minnesota Supreme Court favors maintaining these structures.

While these existing governance structures provide a strong foundation for access to justice work in Minnesota, the Steering Committee felt additional governance was needed to continue the work completed in 2017 through the Justice for All project. Specifically, the steering committee wanted to ensure a continuation of bringing resources to the access to justice project and robust communication among the Minnesota Judicial Branch, civil legal aid, and the private bar after the grant term ends.

Community Integration & Prevention

Community trust and understanding of both rights and responsibilities in civil legal matters create a foundation for all other systemic supports, including improved triage, referral and channel integration, self-help informational services, use of language services and plain language forms and courtroom assistance services.

Many legal aid and other partner organization efforts are underway to co-locate services within communities and strengthen community partners. Our community stakeholders, however, said that for many members of our communities, particularly low income, communities of color and immigrant communities, civil justice is lacking. Community stakeholders in the Justice for All assessment affirmed that more work with community partnerships is needed to increase access to civil legal aid for underserved populations.

Unbundled (Discrete Task) Legal Assistance

The Steering Committee saw the lack of affordable legal services for low- and moderate-income people over civil legal aid income guidelines as a significant gap in our current system. Minnesota, like many states, sees a large gap between the people who qualify for and receive services through legal aid, and those who can afford to hire a private lawyer for their case. We see unbundled legal assistance as the most realistic, cost-effective way to help serve low- and moderate-income people with civil legal needs, particularly in family law.

Minnesota’s professional responsibility rules support unbundled representation,²² and our Office of Lawyers Professional Responsibility routinely educates attorneys about Minnesota’s rules and promotes unbundled as a promising solution to help address the justice gap.²³ Only a small number of practitioners, however, actively advertise unbundled services to the public and promote their unbundled practice as a successful business model within the private bar. There is no easy referral mechanism between the court self-help services and attorneys providing unbundled services because the current attorney referral services are based on a traditional practice model.

Triage, Referral & Channel Integration

Triage, referral, and channel integration is a strategic goal for Minnesota because it is feasible, it will increase efficiency and reduce duplication of effort across the system, create a better first point of access for people with civil legal needs, and help move toward some level of meaningful service for everyone. Minnesota has a complex system of civil legal aid programs, litigant support through the MJB, and other resources available to help people with civil legal needs.

The analysis of the Civil Legal Intake Structure identified lack of knowledge about legal aid and "bounce" as significant issues in our referral system.²⁴ Helping people navigate this system is a necessary step in achieving the “access” outlined in Resolution 5.²⁵

Simplification

Simplifying court processes will have a high return on a relatively minimal investment. Rule changes have a broad reach in Minnesota because of our unified statewide court system. The Alaska early resolution triage model, for example, saves time for both SRLs and court staff.²⁶ Replicating this program or pursuing other rule changes to simplify court processes will benefit many litigants at a relatively low cost.

Simplification efforts are also feasible given current priorities and similar projects already underway at the Minnesota Judicial Branch (MJB). With the transition to eCourtMinnesota in 2015 resulting in all district courts being on the same case management system and capable of accepting electronic filing, the MJB has already started thinking creatively about how to do its work in the most efficient and effective manner. This work fits well with additional reengineering efforts currently underway at the MJB through its oneCourt regional specialization initiative.

Focusing on this component will also improve litigant trust in the civil justice system. Simplifying court processes will make going to court easier for self-represented litigants (SRLs), as well as free up limited resources at legal aid offices.

Resource Planning

While recognizing that legal services is always in need of additional funding, strong resource planning infrastructure already exists in Minnesota through the Legal Services Advisory Committee, coordinated statewide lobbying efforts through the Minnesota Legal Services Coalition, and the MSBA Legal Assistance to the Disadvantaged community. Although this is not a standalone focus area, we do have resource planning woven in to our initiatives.

Technology Capacity

We did not view technology capacity as a component to focus on in and of itself, but instead recognized throughout our planning that technology will play a key role in most, if not all, initiatives and proposed solutions.

Judicial & Court Staff Education

Even though one of our key JFA initiatives has a judicial training component, and other initiatives will also involve judicial training, we did not view this as a focus area on its own because Minnesota has a strong training system currently in place for judges and court staff. We do not need to start from scratch, but rather can build on existing programs with a JFA focus.

Broad Self Help Informational Services

The State Law Library, Legal Services State Support, Attorney General's office, and Statewide Self Help Center have already developed an expansive library of self-help information and resources on civil legal issues. The amount of content is a strength of the Minnesota system, but access to this content will be improved with the Triage and Channel Integration initiative.

Plain Language Forms

Minnesota has had statewide forms used throughout the unified court system for more than a decade. In 2017, Minnesota Judicial Branch created a position in the courts solely devoted to improving the plain language and accessibility of court forms, both static and intelligent. Again, this is a strength of the Minnesota system, but access to forms will be improved with the Triage and Channel Integration initiative.

Language Services Integration

Minnesota is a national leader in access to justice for people with limited English proficiency;²⁷ legal services and the Minnesota Judicial Branch already prioritize and designate resources to this area. This will continue to be part of JFA work going forward.

Alternative Dispute Resolution Integration

While we recognize that ADR is not as well-resourced in Minnesota as it is in other states and this is an area for growth, the steering committee felt that it made more sense to work to initially focus on how to integrate ADR in to the triage and channeling work while also expanding community outreach by partnering with Community Dispute Resolution Programs that provide free and low-cost services and have outreach to underserved communities as a priority. Therefore, one of our JFA initiatives described below has ADR as a primary focus.

Compliance Assistance

The Judiciary Subcommittee of the Minnesota State Bar Association Legal Assistance to the Disadvantaged committee²⁸ has focused on compliance assistance in recent years, and the MJB is already doing some work in this area. This will also be integrated into the JFA initiative on judge training.

Expansion & Efficiency Improvements of Full Service Representation

While recognizing full representation is a core component of the civil justice system, and we only partially provide full representation for those eligible, legal aid already has structures in place to seek funding and support for expansion of its full representation work. Because unbundled services are such an area of growth for the private bar in Minnesota, the steering committee felt it made more sense to prioritize unbundled services over further expanding full representation at this time.

Courtroom Assistance Services

The MJB's MNCIS system has expanded online access to case records for SRLs. While Minnesota does not have any court navigators, there are many in-person self-help centers as well as a statewide self-help center is available to all litigants via phone and email. Videos are available in multiple languages on going to court in Minnesota. The steering committee felt additional work in this area was not feasible in the short term given current priorities within the civil justice system, and thought other components offered less expensive alternatives for improving access to justice.

²⁷ See supra note 17.

²⁸ See supra note 6.

Role Flexibility for Other Professionals

This did not emerge as a focus area because it is not currently feasible. The MSBA Alternative Legal Models Task Force completed research and developed proposals for limited license legal technicians and expanded roles for paralegals, but both proposals were voted down by the broader MSBA assembly in 2017.

IV. Action Plan

From the assessment process, the project partners narrowed the focus to five targeted components for further research on promising practices. Small teams were formed to investigate information and ideas for implementation to be shared at the stakeholder summit meeting in October. This meeting included the members of the steering committee plus community partners. Participants reviewed the research and recommendations, then participated in an in-depth discussion on the component of their own choosing. Below are the strategic goals and key initiatives that we developed from this research, stakeholder discussions, a second prioritization process, and final approval by the Steering Committee.

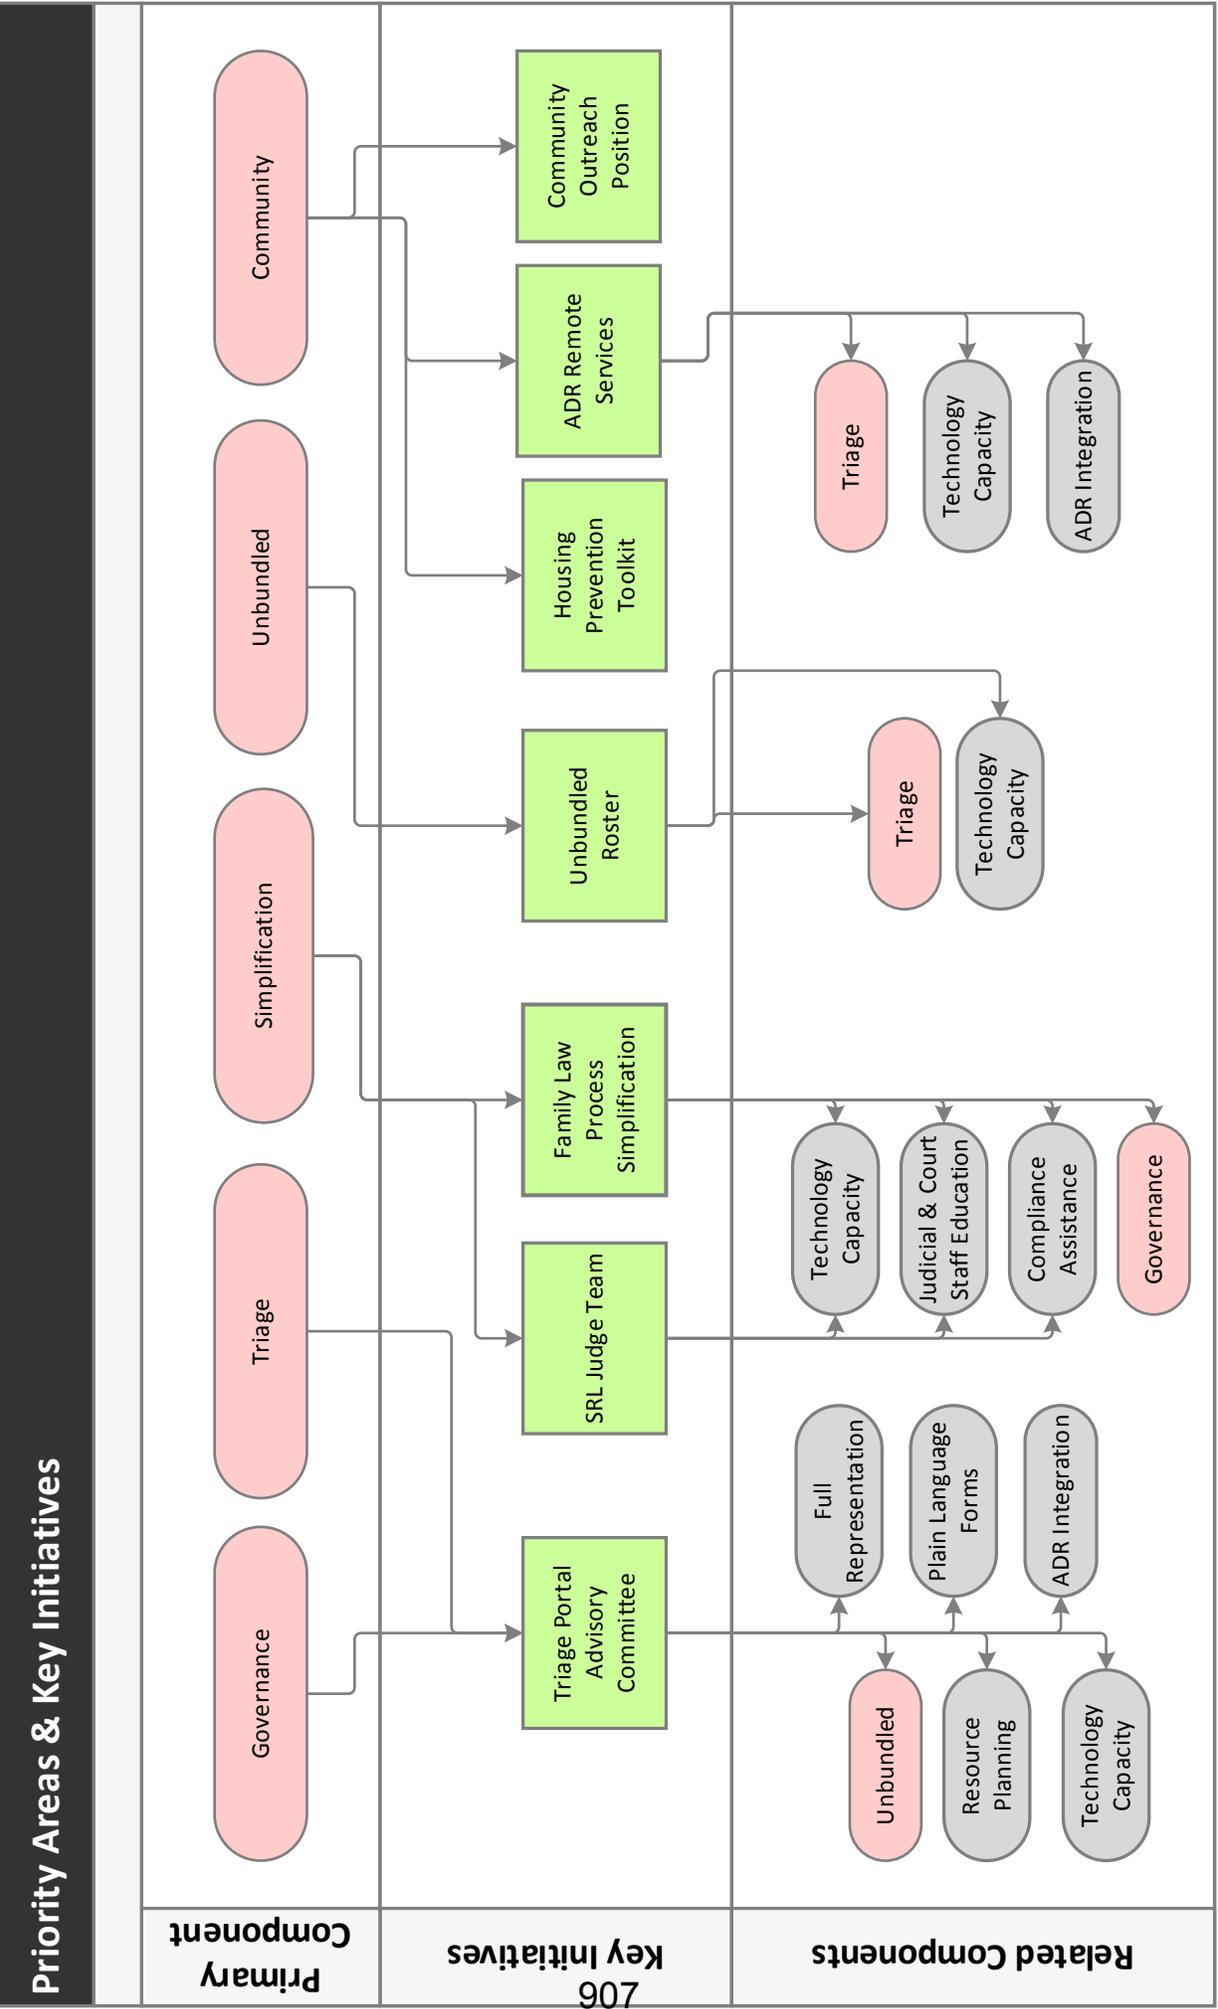

The final set of goals and initiatives submitted:

- Address the recommendations of the Steering Team and Stakeholder meetings
- Are feasible with current or reasonable additional funding
- Have the support of the MJB and align with the MJB’s strategic plan
- Provide a logical next or first step given past and current work

Strategic Goals

Simplification	Simplify family law court processes to both (1) maximize efficiency and resources within Minnesota Judicial Branch and (2) improve litigant usability, trust and confidence in the civil justice system.
Unbundled (Discrete Task) Legal Assistance	Increase the number of attorneys providing discrete task (also referred to as “limited scope” or “unbundled”) representation to low- and middle-income people with civil legal needs through a robust and effective referral system.
Triage, Referral, & Channel Integration	Create a “no wrong door” system through which people with legal civil legal needs access legal information, self-help resources, and legal providers, through a user-centric approach that places the burden on the system to provide the best referral at the outset.
Community Integration & Prevention	Integrate legal information, resources and referrals into community settings through co-located services, community collaboration and prevention efforts that build trust and decrease the number of civil court cases, with a specific focus on the prevention of housing evictions across Minnesota.
Design, Governance & Management	Increase communication across existing governance structures to implement the Justice for All projects and create a new governance committee specific to the litigant portal work.

The following page presents an outline showing how the key initiatives (in green) relate to these target areas (in pink) and other components. Following the outline, each key initiative is discussed in turn, including why it was chosen as a priority action, the current state and desired future state, how the community will be involved, resources needed and the initial evaluation and communication plans.

Triage Portal Advisory Committee

Current State

The state courts, bar association and civil legal aid all maintain separate websites. These websites link to each other, but do not share user data or provide any triage logic to assist users with navigating to the best available resource. In addition to the public facing websites, each stakeholder also separately maintains its own referral lists. This means that there is staff time spent at each civil legal aid program, the statewide self-help center, law libraries, and bar associations creating and maintaining referral lists. When new services are created or existing services end, there is no easy way to inform all stakeholders.

Future State

The vision is to create a governance structure focused on a triage portal that would be the primary online referral site for people with legal issues, regardless of income level. The database that feeds the triage portal would be updated to include information from all primary stakeholder groups and would have a component for partners to generate up to date legal referrals without having to maintain their own lists. The governance committee would make policy recommendations related to the online triage system and referral database.

JFA Action Item

Convene a Triage Portal Advisory Committee (Advisory Committee) governance structure to coordinate the work already being done to redesign the civil legal aid online intake system with additional court self-help, ADR and private bar resources and to ensure there are sufficient new resources developed for the long-term success of this project.

Why It's a Priority

Learning from the work of the NCSC Litigant Portal Workgroup, it is critically important that our triage portal have a clear governance component. There are many policy issues that have not yet been resolved in Minnesota, including defining the roles of lead agency for the portal. For example, the technological work that is already underway is through Legal Services State Support, but the resources for clients above legal aid funding guidelines are coming from the Minnesota Judicial Branch. Having the governing body ready to address these and other policy decisions as the portal development gets underway will be very important to its overall success.

Community Involvement

Community representatives from United Way 2-1-1 would be members of the Advisory Committee. Other community involvement would be in work groups for design and user testing.

Resources Needed

Funding for a .25 FTE in providing staffing support to the Advisory Committee. The funding would be sustained by LSAC, ideally through a dedicated pro hac vice fee, which is under consideration.

Performance Measures

- Amount of funding the Advisory Committee is able to dedicate to the triage portal work and supporting related JFA projects
- One of the tasks of the Advisory Committee would be to create performance measures for the triage portal itself.²⁹

Communications

The Advisory Committee would need to be very intentional about its communications plan. It will need to have regular communications (e.g., newsletter) with stakeholders to maintain excitement and commitment to the triage portal project. As the portal gets closer to implementation, the Advisory Committee would be tasked with creating an outreach strategy. Communications about the JFA project initiatives will also be included in the overall communication effort Minnesota will be coordinating with the Voices for Civil Justice staff.

SRL Judge Team
Current State Minnesota Judicial Branch requires judges to receive 45 hours of continuing education credits every three years, and a wide variety of training opportunities are organized by the Judicial Education Manager and her staff. Courses on working with self-represented litigants are regularly offered, but the trainers change, and content varies year by year. Future State The vision is for the Minnesota Judicial Branch to be a national leader in training for judges working with self-represented litigants. JFA Action Item Create a Self-Represented Litigant Judge Team to train judges and be a resource for the Minnesota Judicial Branch on best practices for working work with self-represented litigants. Why it's a Priority Taking advantage of the judicial leadership that has emerged from the first phase of the JFA project, this is an opportunity to improve the quality of training on self-represented litigant issues and have a team of judges able to advocate for best practices in this area. The Minnesota Judicial Branch has a successful model where a team of judges trained on best practices in domestic violence cases then provide training to benefit judges statewide, and replicating this model for self-represented litigant services will help to prioritize the JFA work. Community Involvement There is an opportunity to create a series of training videos with self-represented litigants talking about their experience and how it could be improved. This would provide the community voice as judges are learning from one another about how to best work with self-represented litigants. Resource Needs Funding for a team of five judges to attend national self-represented litigant training and pay for retired judges to assist with their work while the judge team is out of the office for training. Once the judge team is in place, the Judicial Branch will pay for the ongoing costs related to these trainings in the future. Performance Measures <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Tracking the number of judges trained • Tracking the responses in the Minnesota Judicial Branch Access and Fairness Survey to see if there is an improvement in results after the training has been provided

Family Law Process Simplification
Current State Minnesota has invested significant resources in creating family court forms and providing self-help services throughout the state. Less work has been done on simplifying the court process that begins once those forms are filed. Minnesota does have Early Case Management services in some counties, but many rural areas have not found a way to make that model fit due to lack of local resources. Future State The vision is for simplified family court processes in Minnesota for cases involving two self-represented litigants, including an informal domestic relations trial process. There would be services statewide to assist with the effort, including the ability to receive pro bono assistance and appear in court remotely, to ensure that rural areas are able to see full benefits of the simplification effort. JFA Action Item Recommend simplified family law processes in conjunction with Early Case Management work underway in State Court Administration and develop a pilot project. Why It's a Priority There was consensus among the Steering Committee and the stakeholders attending JFA events that this is an area of need. The current family court process (outside of expedited child support) was designed by lawyers for lawyers. With more than 90% of family cases having at least one self-represented party at some stage of the case, it makes sense to try to design a process that is simplified when that is appropriate (e.g., not domestic violence cases). The Alaska model was of great interest to the Steering Committee, especially the judges, and Minnesota would like to benefit from their experience, especially in reaching rural areas with a full range of services at the front end of the case. Community Involvement The private bar will be involved with the project for the expansion of pro bono and feedback on recommended court rule changes. Self-represented litigant feedback would be part of the pilot project effort to improve the user experience before expanding to other parts of the state. Resources Needed Having a portion of a State Court Administration staff person's time to coordinate the simplification effort would ensure that the project is integrated in to business operations and staff training. There will be more detail on the amount requested in the implementation grant application.

Unbundled Roster
Current State The Minnesota State Bar Association (MSBA) maintains a referral list for their members who choose to participate through www.mnfindalawyer.com. The district bar associations for some of the larger counties in the state provide attorney referral services by phone, including some lower fee services for people of modest means (usually defined as 300% of poverty or below). None of these attorney referral services maintain a roster specific to unbundled services. Most attorneys interviewed during the JFA unbundled focus groups reported not advertising unbundled as part of their practice, which makes it very difficult to refer people who could benefit from this service to appropriate attorneys. Future State The vision is for a high volume of self-represented litigants to be referred to appropriate unbundled services, providing a market based solution for people in need at a cost they can afford and a reliable referral source for attorneys who choose to make unbundled a significant portion of their practice. JFA Action Item The state and district bar associations would coordinate rosters of private attorneys willing to provide unbundled services accessible both for online users and phone users. For people who access services online, this would be connected to the triage portal. For people who contact legal aid or the court statewide self-help services via phone, they would be referred to the attorney referral services via phone. It is a “no wrong door” approach for people who are over the income guidelines for civil legal aid, but who can benefit from limited scope services. For the online system, users who are referred from the triage interview will have the information they have already entered in the system passed to the bar association roster, including case type, geography and income level, so that the user doesn’t have to answer all the same questions again. The bar associations would have training requirements for participating attorneys and would commit to public education regarding the purpose and availability of unbundled service. Why It's a Priority Minnesota has had favorable court rules in place allowing for limited scope services since 2005, but the lack of attorneys advertising unbundled services and insufficient referral systems has made it difficult to match unbundled services with people who need it (particularly self-represented litigants above income guidelines for legal aid limited scope clinics). This is an area for significant growth in our state.

Community Involvement

JFA Steering Committee has conducted focus groups with self-represented litigants to get their input on the need for unbundled services and how to best market the services. This outreach would continue with community members who would help with user testing of the online system as it is developed.

Resources Needed

Funding for development of the online roster, outreach to attorneys and outreach to community; bar associations would provide staffing and sustaining funding for the effort

Performance Measures

- Tracking the number of unbundled referrals to each of the bar association partners
- Tracking the success of the referrals with information back from participating attorneys
- Measuring customer satisfaction with the service through a research sample of participants

Communications

The bar association is planning a communications effort directed at potential consumers of the unbundled service. Communications about the JFA project initiatives will also be included in the ongoing communication effort Minnesota will be coordinating with the Voices for Civil Justice staff.

Housing Prevention Toolkit
Current State Rural housing cases are primarily SRLs with advice only due to short lead times, fewer available attorneys and long travel distances. 93% of eviction cases are for non-payment of rent, and the average amount of money owed is under $1500. Understanding of rights and responsibilities on the part of both tenants and landlords is lacking. Future State The vision is for legal services to work in partnership with tenants, landlords, government services, mediation and community services through effective education and access to services for tenants (mediation, financial help, legal advice) to maximize the number of housing disputes that can be resolved without an eviction being filed. JFA Action Item Community outreach and partnering through one coordinator’s work in Northeastern Minnesota has moved toward zero evictions in this region. The project will gather in one place the resources and templates that have worked in this region and include other successful practices in use in rural Minnesota. The toolkit will be piloted in at least one other rural area and evaluated in the pilot for its help in reducing eviction cases. Feedback will be incorporated to create a final toolkit, which can be promoted statewide and made available to other states. Why It's a Priority Minnesota has a statewide initiative focused on ending homelessness. Minnesota housing shortages mean even first evictions can translate to homelessness. Stable housing is cited as one of the most critical “upstream” social determinants affecting families and children’s health, education and safety. Evictions “travel” with those affected, impacting future employment and future housing opportunities. Community Involvement This project will be focused on community involvement, drawing from the experiences of one region’s successful community partnering practices and encouraging other communities to build community partnerships through the tools provided. Resources Needed Funding for the development and piloting of the toolkit in one or more rural area as resources allow.

Performance Measures

- Successful pilot of the rural Housing Court prevention toolkit as measured by qualitative feedback on the toolkit pilot(s) – Year 1
- Track the number of rural communities who use the toolkit and survey feedback on its effectiveness in their efforts to reduce eviction cases through community prevention
- Track number of eviction cases, year over year, in Minnesota to see if eviction cases are being reduced in areas using the toolkit and compare this to other areas not using the toolkit.

Communications

Part of the toolkit will be focused on communications. One key message for launching this project is that it will gather good practices from across the State.

ADR Remote Services
Current State Minnesota has six Community Dispute Resolution Programs in eight counties, with services focused in the metro area and some regions in the northeastern and southwestern portions of the state. These programs provide free and low-cost dispute resolution services using supervised volunteer mediators. The Community Dispute Resolution Programs provide mediation services for a wide range of civil disputes including neighbor to neighbor, landlord tenant, small business disputes and family members including juveniles and elders. By state statute they are prohibited from providing services in divorce proceedings, but they do cover post-divorce and never married parenting time mediations. The current service model is for telephone based intake case management followed by in-person mediation services. This has limited the ability to provide mediation services outside the eight county areas where their offices are located. Future State The vision is to make free and low-cost mediation services available in all 87 counties in Minnesota. This capability will include a centralized website and 1-800 number for individuals from anywhere in Minnesota to submit a mediation request. These requests then will be referred to mediation. In this future state the 400+ volunteer mediators will be able to respond to any Minnesotan requesting mediation either in person, or using remote conferencing. This statewide capability to access a mediation requests will be integrated in the Triage Portal so that people who could benefit from mediation will be made aware about the option for ADR before proceeding with litigation. JFA Action Item Fund Community Dispute Resolution Programs capacity to provide remote mediation services to expand statewide reach and better connect with community partners in underserved areas. Why It's a Priority The Community Dispute Resolution Programs have a service that is not well integrated with the existing civil justice system partners. In discussions about reaching new community partners and having a full range of services available through the triage portal, the Community Dispute Resolution Programs have asked how they can better connect through the JFA efforts. Their idea of providing statewide remote services and outreach fills a gap and helps reach the goals of better coordination and providing services that are not limited by geography.

Community Involvement

The six Community Dispute Resolution Programs recently entered into a joint venture agreement. Part of the mission of this new organization is to increase statewide access to mediation. As a part of this work they are reaching out to community partners in all 87 counties. Through an outbound calling campaign, local agencies have been identified to act as referral partners. In each county we are reaching social services providers, faith based organizations as well as local county help desks for outreach to clients that would be appropriate for mediation. This aligns with JFA efforts to connect with stakeholders outside of the courts, civil legal aid and the private bar.

Resources Needed

Funding for an implementation grant to buy the hardware and accessories for each location for remote mediation services through Community Mediation Minnesota and to provide outreach about the new service. Continuing funding would be provided by LSAC if the initiative is successful.

Performance Measures

- Tracking the number of community partners reached through the expansion effort
- Tracking the number of mediators trained to conduct remote mediations
- Tracking the number of people served by remote ADR

Communications

Community Mediation Minnesota is developing an outreach and communication plan. Communications about the JFA project initiatives will also be included in the ongoing communication effort Minnesota will be coordinating with the Voices for Civil Justice staff.

Community Outreach Position
Current State While civil legal aid and the courts have many different community-based initiatives underway, there is no statewide position currently devoted to community integration and prevention within the civil justice system. Call for Justice was a nonprofit that did training of United Way 2-1-1 referral and information specialists and held legal liaison programs educating social service providers about legal issues and providers. Call for Justice closed in late 2017, and worked with the Hennepin County Bar Association to continue its legal liaison program work in the Twin Cities metro area. Future State We envision a future state that expands outreach and communications efforts between the civil justice system and community partners, including social service providers. Communities across Minnesota will have better access to legal information, resources, and services to help resolve civil legal problems. Social service providers and community leaders will be able to better issue-spot legal issues, and make better referrals to legal aid and other resources when appropriate. JFA Action Item In addition to the Housing Prevention Toolkit and ADR Remote Services initiatives, we see an additional action item to staff general community integration and prevention work, with a focus on Greater Minnesota. This position would start as a part-time position that would continue the work started at Call for Justice to connect social service providers with legal resources and providers and support the implementation of the Housing Prevention Toolkit. The project partners propose this position to exist at Legal Services State Support, a statewide project of the Minnesota Legal Services Coalition. Why it's a Priority During the assessment, project partners received clear feedback from community-based participants that the civil justice system needs to increase its coordination and outreach with nontraditional justice system partners. This position will ensure that community involvement also continues to move forward as the Justice for All work and related efforts gain momentum in the next few years.

Community Involvement

Community involvement will be central to this initiative – community stakeholders will help identify their substantive training needs and the areas where this work will be most impactful.

Resource Needs

This position needs kickoff funding for a .25 FTE position and will be sustained LSAC grants that had previously been granted to Call for Justice.

Performance Measures

- Survey of social service providers and community leaders' understanding and awareness of issues and resources within the civil justice system before and after outreach activities
- Volume and quality of referrals to legal aid from social service providers

Communications

Communication channels outside of traditional civil justice system channels will be critical to this initiative. The staff funded by this position will need to create a communications plan that reflects the communities they are trying to reach. This will likely involve a combination of social media platforms and in-person outreach.

V. Communications Plan

Our communication plan is set up in three phases for 2018. The first phase is “Establishing Resources for Implementation.” We will keep communications within the working committees during this phase as we are completing the Strategic Action Plan and while 2018 initiatives are being finalized and resourced. The second phase is “Announcing the Plan.” This phase will begin when resources are confirmed, likely at the beginning of February. This Strategic Action Plan will be announced, posted and communicated more broadly through the judicial, legal aid and other related service communities. The third phase will be to weave ongoing communication on the Access to Justice priorities and plans into the community.

Phase 1: Establishing Resources for Implementation – January 2018

While we have broad agreement on the priorities and strategic goals for our plan, we will be working to secure resources for launching the initiatives in 2018. During this time, the communications will be focused to the Steering Committee and the Chief Justice.

Key Messages

- Ensuring alignment on our five strategic goals
- Preparing proposals for implementation grants and other funding
- Communicating with recipients of funds to identify roles, plans and evaluation strategies
- Extending appreciation to key stakeholders for their work over the past 12 months
- Meeting with the Chief Justice to determine messages and method to communicate the plan through the judicial system

Phase 2: Announcing the Plan – February 2018

When resources have been determined for implementing proposed initiatives, we will finalize our plan and announce it to the civil justice community, including the Minnesota Judicial Branch, civil legal services, and the private bar. The JFA Plan will be announced through the following communications:

- Announcement to the Steering Committee with a summary of next step communications
- Plan with letter of appreciation to all stakeholders participating in the planning process
- Plan communicated throughout the judicial system
- Plan posted on www.mnlegalservices.org and www.mncourts.gov
- Meetings to discuss the plan in February 2018

Key Messages

- Why access to justice is important for Minnesota
- 5 key priorities/strategic goals
- 2018 Initiatives
- Evaluation plans
- Where to send comments and feedback
- How to get/stay engaged in this effort

Phase 3: Ongoing Communications – June, September, and December 2018

Keeping the JFA plan visible in the legal and judicial communities is a final and ongoing step of communications for our work. In this phase, we want to establish quarterly communications on the implementation and evaluation of our efforts, starting 2nd quarter, 2018. It will be important to maintain awareness of our strategic goals, to evaluate the work underway, and to modify the plan as we implement.

The key audiences for this phase of our communications will be the primary stakeholder groups involved in the planning work, the Judicial branch and the Implementation grant recipients.

Communication Vehicles:

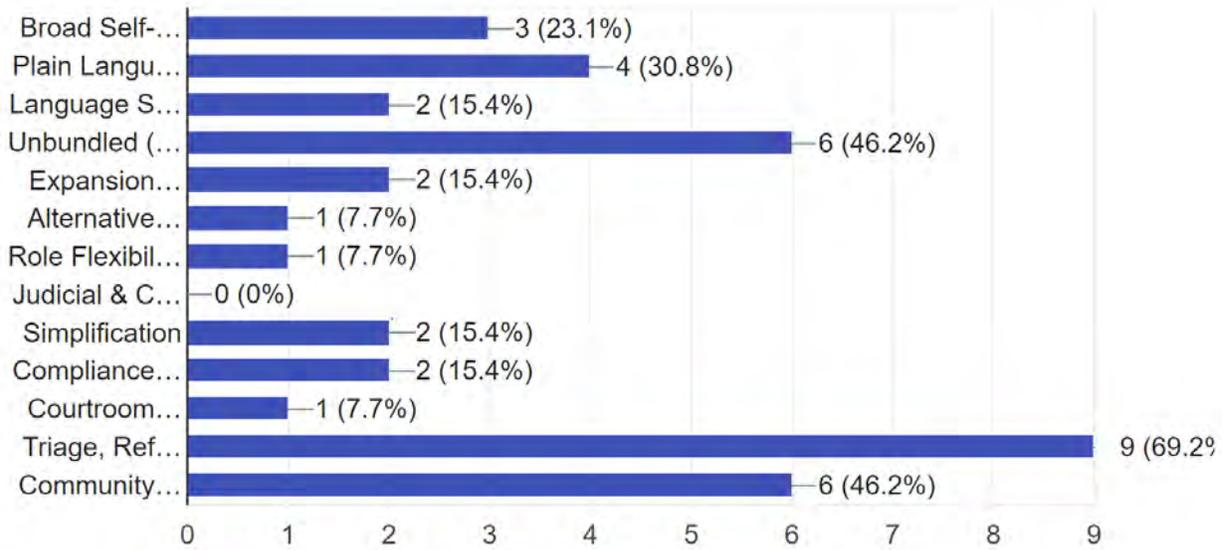

- Minnesota Legal Services Coalition blog and monthly newsletter
- Bi-monthly legal aid partner meetings
- MSBA LAD Committee, pro bono council, and assembly meetings
- Direct emails to key stakeholders
- Community meetings
- Judicial Branch newsletter “Branching Out”
- Judicial Branch annual report
- Work with the Court Information Office of the Judicial Branch to work on getting more information in legal and other media outlets.

Conclusion

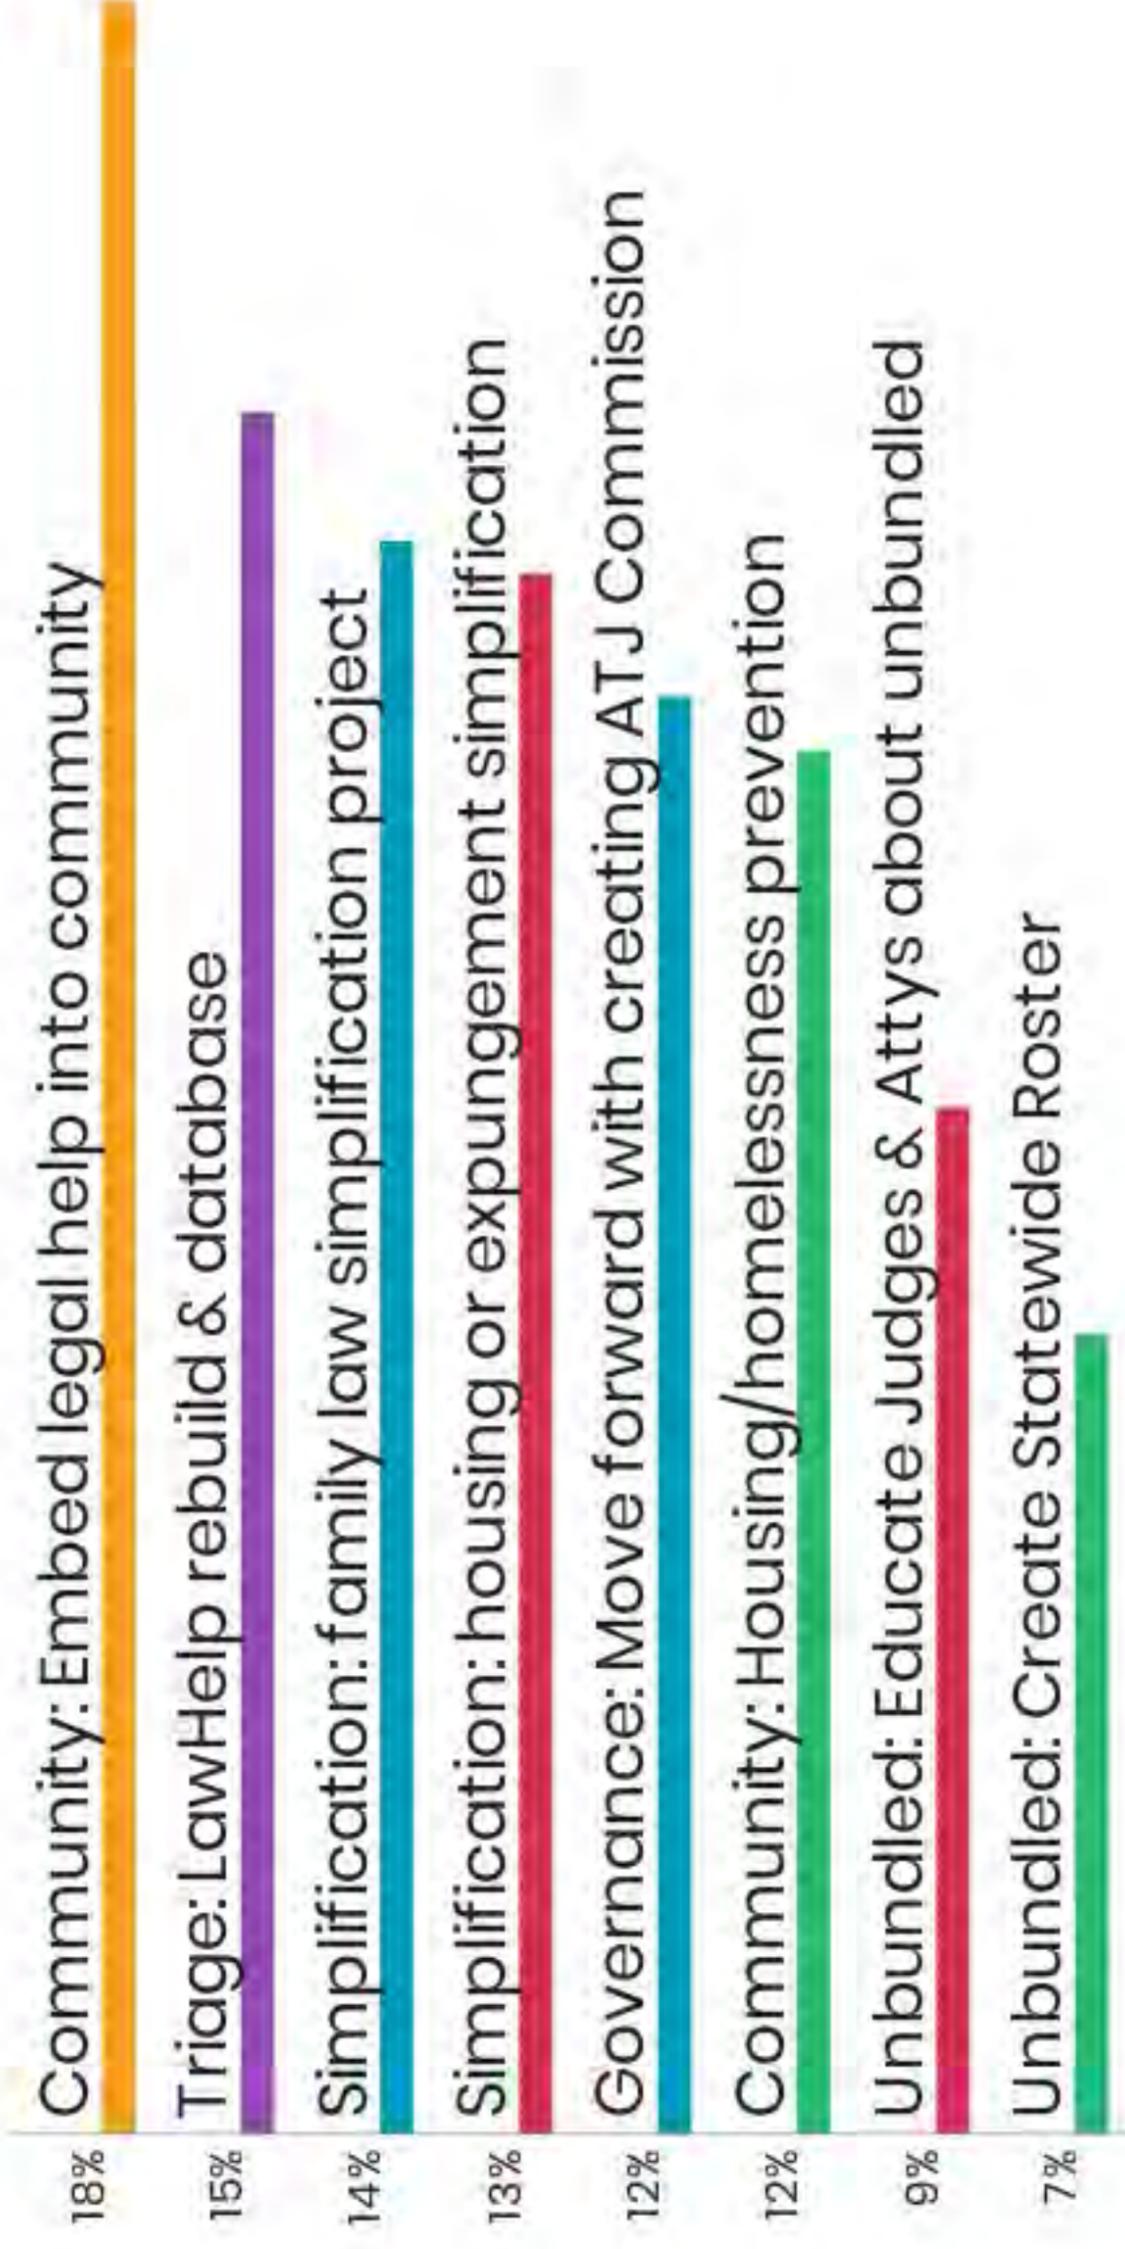

Minnesota civil justice system stakeholders are committed to steady progress towards the Justice for All goals. This strategic plan is the result of many people from across the state who provided important feedback and input into the project. The initiatives described in this report will result in expanded legal services for many Minnesotans and real changes in how partners work together to create a more user-friendly system. The JFA process has led to real commitments on the part of the courts, civil legal aid and the private bar to stretch beyond the usual stakeholders and integrate even more with the community. This plan is intended to complement and supplement a wide range of current efforts already in place or underway in Minnesota to ensure that all Minnesotans have access to effective assistance for their essential civil legal needs; that we have a comprehensive and integrated approach to the services we provide; and that our system provides a continuum of meaningful and appropriate services for all. This has been a meaningful process for our state and we are ready to move our strategic plan in to action.

Which tasks or responsibilities would you be comfortable with a paralegal handling under the supervision of a licensed attorney? Other – write in

- A lot of the answers above are practicing law and ethically, I cannot endorse any of them for that reason. Let's provide more attorney help to people instead of stretching the ethical obligations.
- Add long as the representation is limited to areas that they would be prepared for and skilled in, they should be able to
- Appearing in conciliation court.
- Appearing in conciliation court; appearing at eviction hearings (1st appearance); appearing at FENE
- Appearing in Court for hearings where no legal argument is being made such as scheduling conferences and status conferences.
- Appearing in special courts, like housing court, or the equivalent in rural jurisdictions.
- Attend child case planning activities, such as mental health or child welfare
- communication on scheduling / hearing prep
- client communications, research as to facts of a case, initial legal research, file and calendar management.
- Conciliation court appearances
- Conducting witness interviews. Drafting generic discovery requests.. Summarizing medical records. Legislative-history research.
- Depends on the matter
- Depends on the paralegals number of years of experience
- Explaining options to clients, without providing legal advice.
- Explaining the law
- Filing documents, managing case files.
- For all of the above answers, with limitations (i.e. comfortable with paras preparing certain routine documents, negotiations, mediations etc.)
- Helping clients fill in self help forms that are later reviewed by an attorney.
- I would feel comfortable in some limited settings such as negotiations or administrative hearings. However, it entirely depends on the level of training they've had. None of my paralegals are presently competent to appear in court, manage a negotiation, attend administrative hearings, or appear in mediation. But they could be trained over several years to become capable of doing those things.
- Legal research
- I am not sure where I think the line should be. The truth is the a lot of people, including paralegals, think they know more than they do which can end up doing more harm than good. But maybe if paralegals could sign off on documents and appear at uncontested hearings, that could be a good balance. Really it depends on the person and what they are capable of though. Mediation and contested hearings should require a level of knowledge that frankly not all lawyers have either.
- I do not think this is a good idea.
- I honestly wouldn't feel comfortable have any one other than a attorney handling any of these items.
- Intake, calendaring, file management
- Interviewing the client and performing discovery
- It really depends upon the person and malpractice insurance. I do not know if I would feel comfortable for a paralegal to be unsupervised unless they have done courses or experience in representing clients.

Which tasks or responsibilities would you be comfortable with a paralegal handling under the supervision of a licensed attorney? Other – write in

- None of those things should be handled by paralegals.
- None [x17]
- NONE - ALL communications should only be done by licensed attorneys.
- None of the above
- none of the above
- None of the above.
- None of these categories are sufficient detailed for me to offer an opinion (what kinds of documents? what kinds of negotiations? etc etc)
- NONE!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!
- None, stop taking business away from attorneys
- None. Terrible idea.
- None. I question the wisdom of this project.
- None. Why isn't 'none' an answer?
- Only the tasks currently performed by a paralegal
- Paralegals should not be representing clients at hearings, mediations, appearing in court or giving legal advice.
- preparing and reviewing documents only under attorney supervision.
- preparing documents subject to review by attorney only. Drafting and managing discovery may be beyond a paralegal's ability depending on the complexity of the case.
- Research and efilling
- Research, drafting memos, organizational systems
- Reviewing and preparing documents under the supervision of a licensed attorney
- See prior answer, supra; our clients are all probate, trust, estate planning and taxation matters
- Sharing statutory provisions with clients
- The caveat to each of the selections above is I feel they should have to pass some sort of test or licensing process as many holiding themselves out to be paralegals lack the breadth of experience I feel would be needed to represent a client in court.
- The paralegals I have worked with are better than first to third year attorneys, yet we still have those first to third year attorneys do all of the above.
- This question assumes an answer with a starting point, it directs the answer to an assumption that supervising someone to do something makes them as qualified as the person licensed to perform that duty. Other than review documents, none. Paralegals are not trained or qualified to provide legal representation.
- VERY limited provision of general legal advice to clients.
- Why not fund the agencies that have already established an effective means to aid low income litigants? Legal Aid; Volunteer Lawyers Network, Central MN Legal Services?
- With the right training and education and under supervision of licensed attorney a paralegal could represent a client in court, be involved in negotiations, mediation, and provide legal advice.

What do you think the minimum qualifications should be for a paralegal to do any or all of the tasks or responsibilities listed in the previous question? (Select the most appropriate answer.)

A bachelor's degree A high school diploma, or its equivalent, and more than 3 years of paralegal experience A high school A diploma, or its equivalent, and up to 3 years of paralegal experience A law degree or other advanced professional degree A paralegal certification or degree An associate degree specify

What do you think the minimum qualifications should be for a paralegal to do any or all of the tasks or responsibilities listed in the previous question? Other – write in

- High school diploma, Paralegal Associate Degree or 3 years equivalent experience + 3 years experience
- A LAW DEGREE!!!
- there should be competency standards established by the court with ethics rules
- A paralegal certification is sufficient to review and prepare documents. I don't think that paralegals should do any of the other tasks listed in the previous question.
- Street smarts and savvy. I can TRAIN anyone with common sense. Being able to meet client expectations requires ability to triage and think on ones feet
- Bachelor's degree or associate degree plus more than 5 years' experience
- Law degree. That's what we went to law school for.
- Bachelor degree, paralegal certification, and character and fitness review; including ongoing education requirements.
- At least a bachelor's degree that's more than just a paralegal certification.
- A bachelor's degree and a paralegal certification
- I don't think paralegals should be handling anything outside of drafting documents, research or memos. They are not versed in the law the way attorneys are and should still remain behind the scenes.
- This survey is defective -- it presupposes that allowing paralegals to function as lawyers is a good idea, when in fact it is an overwhelmingly bad idea.
- We have employed paralegals with a secretarial background that we essentially trained on the job and from 2 year paralegal programs,
- a high school diploma and 7+ years of hands-on experience. Maybe in lieu of some of the years of experience a paralegal certificate.
- A bachelor's degree, with a paralegal program within it, plus 5 years experience working as a paralegal
- This is a horribly drafted question. I think someone with a bachelors degree or less who is smart can draft paperwork especially if you automate your documents. I think someone who has worked in a law firm for a long time and has become familiar with the firm's practice area can likely handle a mediation. Depending on they type of hearing, if just a simple one, someone with a bit of education and instruction could represent a client at a hearing or administrative hearing. Complex legal arguments and hearings - need much higher level person to handle.
- should test for knowledge

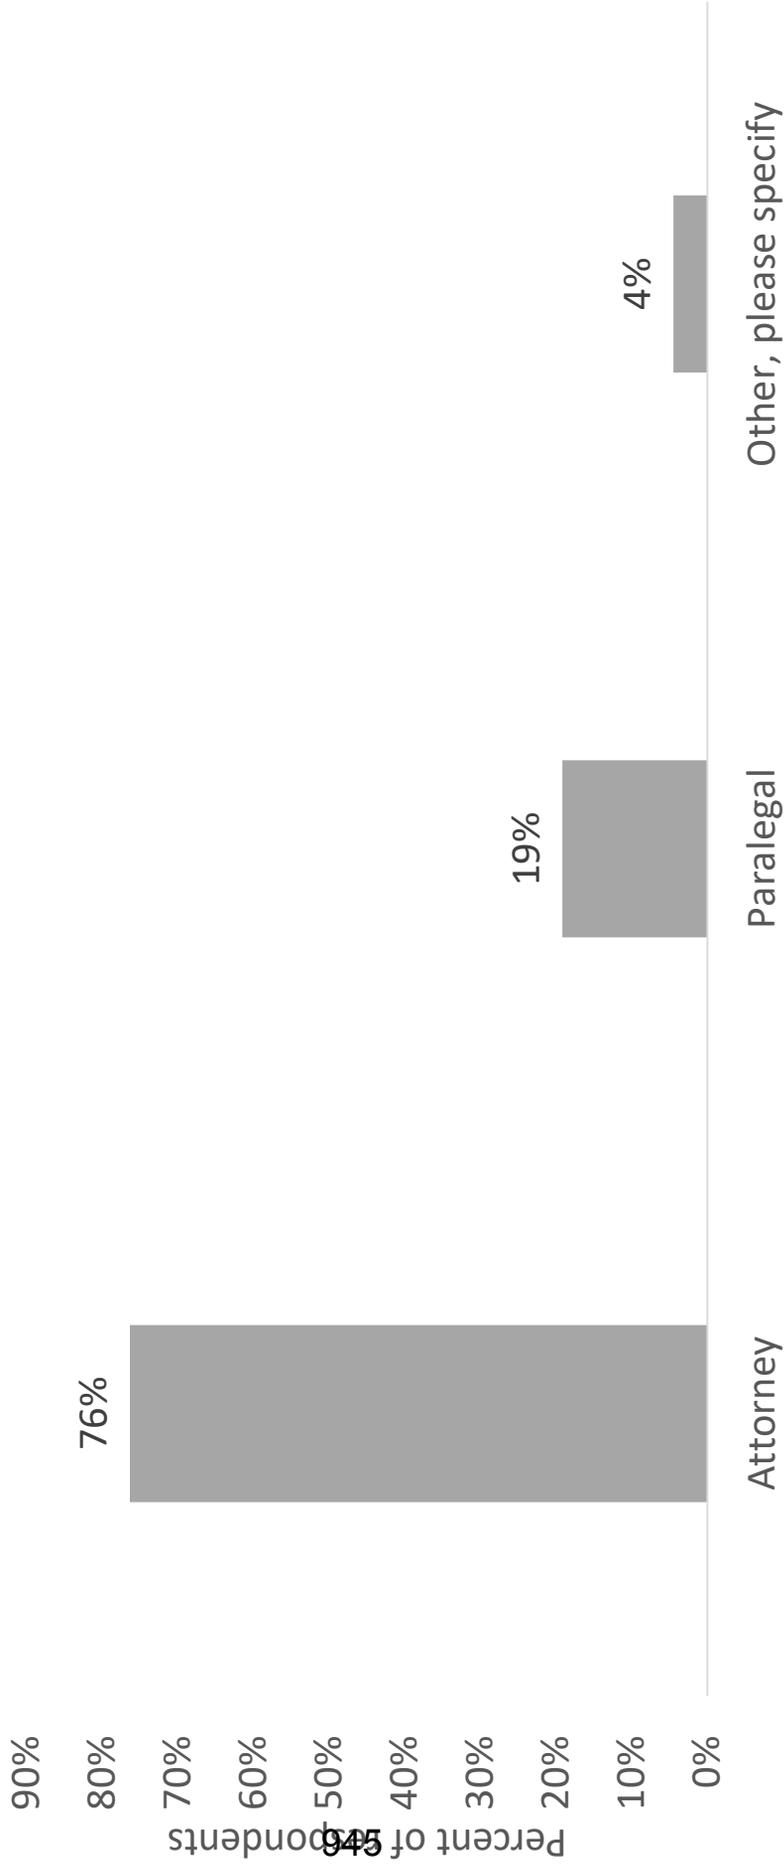

What do you think the minimum qualifications should be for a paralegal to do any or all of the tasks or responsibilities listed in the previous question? Other – write in

- I think it is about a persons skill and experience so a smart person with no diploma could still learn and do good work.
- first year of law school
- apprenticeship-style training in the specific area of law
- Certain number of years experience. 5-10?
- Atty's lic.
- minimum years experience - ex. 5 years
- An associate's degree AND three years of paralegal experience.
- A bachelors degree AND a paralegal certification are ideal if we are going to allow these individuals to give advice and other assistance.. I do think that individuals can learn on the job so a number of years working under the supervision of a licensed attorney may also be acceptable as long as the attorney is confident of the legal assistants skills.
- A law degree and a license to practice law
- The idea that we should be expanding the ability of Paralegals to actually represent people, is wrong and misguided
- Two years full time experience
- Either option 2 (HS diploma plus 3 years) or an apprenticeship or equivalent
- In my opinion, degrees matter less than experience and a certification.
- A law degree and admission to the bar.
- Bachelor's Degree or a paralegal certification and a minimum of 2 years paralegal experience
- ABA approved paralegal studies bachelor's degree or graduate degree
- I think if this is done, it should only be paralegals that have a number of years of experience.
- Some college degree (AA, BA, MBA) with practical paralegal work which can be authenticated by a licensed attorney
- A bachelor's degree in paralegal/law or a paralegal certification, plus at least 5 years substantive experience directly in the field of law services are provided.
- An associate's degree in paralegal/legal studies, 5 years experience, and pass a licensing test OR a bachelor's degree in paralegal/legal studies, 3 years experience, and pass a licensing test.
- Bachelor's degree and paralegal certificate or more than 3 years substantive paralegal experience
- A bachelor's degree plus five or more years of substantive paralegal experience
- Bachelor's Decree AND Paralegal Certification
- A law degree, bar passage, and upkeep of all licensing requirements for attorneys.

What do you think the minimum qualifications should be for a paralegal to do any or all of the tasks or responsibilities listed in the previous question? Other – write in

- A paralegal should have at least a Bachelor Degree plus a post baccalaureate paralegal certification. Licensing should be required, such as PACE
- At least an associates degree or a paralegal certification
- It all depends on the program attended. An AA with a paralegal certificate might be enough, but my thought would be there should be specific and special classes/CLEs related to any additional responsibilities in any of these areas for clients
- Bachelor's degree and five years of paralegal experience in area of practice and paralegal certification
- A bachelor's degree plus paralegal certification
